FOIPA Request No.: 1401549-000
Subject: Emails Sent to and/or From James Comey

Dear Mr. Greenewald:

The FBI has completed its search for records subject to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) that are responsive to your request. The enclosed 1574 pages of records were determined to be responsive to your subject and were previously processed and released. Please see the selected paragraphs below for relevant information specific to your request as well as the enclosed FBI FOIPA Addendum for standard responses applicable to all requests.

☐ In an effort to provide you with responsive records as expeditiously as possible, we are releasing documents from previous requests regarding your subject. We consider your request fulfilled. Since we relied on previous results, additional records potentially responsive to your subject may exist. If this release of previously processed material does not satisfy your request, you may request an additional search for records. Submit your request by mail to Initial Processing Operations Unit; Record/Information Dissemination Section; Information Management Division; Federal Bureau of Investigation; 200 Constitution Drive; Winchester, VA 22602. You may also email your response to foipaquestions@fbi.gov. Please include the FOIPA Request Number listed above in your correspondence.

☑ Please be advised that additional records responsive to your subject exist. If this release of previously processed material does not satisfy your request, you must advise us that you want the additional records processed. Please submit your response within thirty (30) days to Initial Processing Operations Unit; Record/Information Dissemination Section; Information Management Division; Federal Bureau of Investigation; 200 Constitution Drive; Winchester, VA 22602. You may also email your response to foipaquestions@fbi.gov. Please include the FOIPA Request Number listed above in your correspondence. If we do not receive your decision within thirty (30) days of the date of this notification, your request will be closed.

☐ One or more of the enclosed records were transferred to the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA). Although we retained a version of the records previously processed pursuant to the FOIA, the original records are no longer in our possession.

If this release of the previously processed material does not satisfy your request, you may file a FOIPA request with NARA at the following address:

National Archives and Records Administration
Special Access and FOIA
8601 Adelphi Road, Room 5500
College Park, MD 20740-6001

Reference file number [INSERT FILE NUMBER] in your correspondence.

☐ Records potentially responsive to your request were transferred to the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA), and they were not previously processed pursuant to the FOIA. You may file a request with NARA using the address above. Please reference file number [INSERT FILE NUMBER] in your correspondence.

☐ One or more of the enclosed records were destroyed. Although we retained a version of the records previously processed pursuant to the FOIA, the original records are no longer in our possession. Record retention and disposal is carried out under supervision of the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) , Title 44, United States Code, Section 3301 as implemented by Title 36, Code of Federal Regulations, Part 1228; Title 44, United States Code, Section 3310 as implemented by Title 36, Code of Federal Regulations, Part 1229.10.

☐ Records potentially responsive to your request were destroyed. Since this material could not be reviewed, it is not known if it was responsive to your request. Record retention and disposal is carried out under supervision of the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) according to Title 44 United States Code Section 3301, Title 36 Code of Federal Regulations (CFR) Chapter 12 Sub-chapter B Part 1228, and 36 CFR 1229.10.

☐ Documents or information referred to other Government agencies were not included in this release.

Please refer to the enclosed FBI FOIPA Addendum for additional standard responses applicable to your request. "Part 1" of the Addendum includes standard responses that apply to all requests. "Part 2" includes additional standard responses that apply to all requests for records about yourself or any third party individuals. "Part 3" includes general information about FBI records that you may find useful. Also enclosed is our Explanation of Exemptions.

Additional information about the FOIPA can be found at www.fbi.gov/foia. Should you have questions regarding your request, please feel free to contact foipaquestions@fbi.gov. Please reference the FOIPA Request number listed above in all correspondence concerning your request.

Please be advised that if you are seeking a new search for records, you may wish to narrow the scope of your request based on material that you have already received, e.g., timeframe or locality. Additionally, be advised that "unusual circumstances" may apply. See 5 U.S.C. § 552 (a)(6)(B)(iii). These "unusual circumstances" will delay our ability to make a determination on your request within 20 days. See 5 U.S.C. § 552 (a)(6)(B). Additionally, the payment of pertinent fees may apply to your request. See 5 U.S.C. § 552 (a)(4)(A)(viii). The application of "unusual circumstances" is not a determination of how the FBI will respond to your substantive request.

If you are not satisfied with the Federal Bureau of Investigation's determination in response to this request, you may administratively appeal by writing to the Director, Office of Information Policy (OIP), United States Department of Justice, 441 G Street, NW, 6th Floor, Washington, D.C. 20530, or you may submit an appeal through OIP's FOIA STAR portal by creating an account following the instructions on OIP's website: https://www.justice.gov/oip/submit-and-track-request-or-appeal. Your appeal must be postmarked or electronically transmitted within ninety (90) days of the date of this response to your request. If you submit your appeal by mail, both the letter and the envelope should be clearly marked "Freedom of Information Act Appeal." Please cite the FOIPA Request Number assigned to your request so it may be easily identified.

You may seek dispute resolution services by emailing the FBI's FOIA Public Liaison at foipaquestions@fbi.gov. The subject heading should clearly state "Dispute Resolution Services." Please also cite the FOIPA Request Number assigned to your request so it may be easily identified. You may also contact the Office of Government Information Services (OGIS). The contact information for OGIS is as follows: Office of Government Information Services, National Archives and Records Administration, 8601 Adelphi Road-OGIS, College Park, Maryland 20740-6001, e-mail at ogis@nara.gov; telephone at 202-741-5770; toll free at 1-877-684-6448; or facsimile at 202-741-5769.

FBI FOIPA Addendum

As referenced in our letter responding to your Freedom of Information/Privacy Acts (FOIPA) request, the FBI FOIPA Addendum provides information applicable to your request. Part 1 of the Addendum includes standard responses that apply to all requests. Part 2 includes standard responses that apply to requests for records about individuals to the extent your request seeks the listed information. Part 3 includes general information about FBI records, searches, and programs.

Part 1: The standard responses below apply to all requests:

(i) 5 U.S.C. § 552(c). Congress excluded three categories of law enforcement and national security records from the requirements of the FOIPA [5 U.S.C. § 552(c)]. FBI responses are limited to those records subject to the requirements of the FOIPA. Additional information about the FBI and the FOIPA can be found on the www.fbi.gov/foia website.

(ii) Intelligence Records. To the extent your request seeks records of intelligence sources, methods, or activities, the FBI can neither confirm nor deny the existence of records pursuant to FOIA exemptions (b)(1), (b)(3), and as applicable to requests for records about individuals, PA exemption (j)(2) [5 U.S.C. §§ 552/552a (b)(1), (b)(3), and (j)(2)]. The mere acknowledgment of the existence or nonexistence of such records is itself a classified fact protected by FOIA exemption (b)(1) and/or would reveal intelligence sources, methods, or activities protected by exemption (b)(3) [50 USC § 3024(i)(1)]. This is a standard response and should not be read to indicate that any such records do or do not exist.

Part 2: The standard responses below apply to all requests for records on individuals:

(i) Requests for Records about any Individual—Watch Lists. The FBI can neither confirm nor deny the existence of any individual's name on a watch list pursuant to FOIA exemption (b)(7)(E) and PA exemption (j)(2) [5 U.S.C. §§ 552/552a (b)(7)(E), (j)(2)]. This is a standard response and should not be read to indicate that watch list records do or do not exist.

(ii) Requests for Records about any Individual—Witness Security Program Records. The FBI can neither confirm nor deny the existence of records which could identify any participant in the Witness Security Program pursuant to FOIA exemption (b)(3) and PA exemption (j)(2) [5 U.S.C. §§ 552/552a (b)(3), 18 U.S.C. 3521, and (j)(2)]. This is a standard response and should not be read to indicate that such records do or do not exist.

(iii) Requests for Confidential Informant Records. The FBI can neither confirm nor deny the existence of confidential informant records pursuant to FOIA exemptions (b)(7)(D), (b)(7)(E), and (b)(7)(F) [5 U.S.C.§ § 552 (b)(7)(D), (b)(7)(E), and (b)(7)(F)] and Privacy Act exemption (j)(2) [5 U.S.C.§ 552a (j)(2)]. The mere acknowledgment of the existence or nonexistence of such records would reveal confidential informant identities and information, expose law enforcement techniques, and endanger the life or physical safety of individuals. This is a standard response and should not be read to indicate that such records do or do not exist.

Part 3: General Information:

(i) Record Searches and Standard Search Policy. The Record/Information Dissemination Section (RIDS) searches for reasonably described records by searching systems, such as the Central Records System (CRS), or locations where responsive records would reasonably be found. The CRS is an extensive system of records consisting of applicant, investigative, intelligence, personnel, administrative, and general files compiled by the FBI per its law enforcement, intelligence, and administrative functions. The CRS spans the entire FBI organization, comprising records of FBI Headquarters, FBI Field Offices, and FBI Legal Attaché Offices (Legats) worldwide; Electronic Surveillance (ELSUR) records are included in the CRS. The standard search policy is a search for main entity records in the CRS. Unless specifically requested, a standard search does not include a search for reference entity records, administrative records of previous FOIPA requests, or civil litigation files.

a. Main Entity Records – created for individuals or non-individuals who are the subjects or the focus of an investigation
b. Reference Entity Records- created for individuals or non-individuals who are associated with a case but are not known subjects or the focus of an investigation

(ii) FBI Records. Founded in 1908, the FBI carries out a dual law enforcement and national security mission. As part of this dual mission, the FBI creates and maintains records on various subjects; however, the FBI does not maintain records on every person, subject, or entity.

(iii) Foreseeable Harm Standard. As amended in 2016, the Freedom of Information Act provides that a federal agency may withhold responsive records only if: (1) the agency reasonably foresees that disclosure would harm an interest protected by one of the nine exemptions that FOIA enumerates, or (2) disclosure is prohibited by law (5 United States Code, Section 552(a)(8)(A)(i)). The FBI considers this foreseeable harm standard in the processing of its requests.

(iv) Requests for Criminal History Records or Rap Sheets. The Criminal Justice Information Services (CJIS) Division provides Identity History Summary Checks – often referred to as a criminal history record or rap sheet. These criminal history records are not the same as material in an investigative "FBI file." An Identity History Summary Check is a listing of information taken from fingerprint cards and documents submitted to the FBI in connection with arrests, federal employment, naturalization, or military service. For a fee, individuals can request a copy of their Identity History Summary Check. Forms and directions can be accessed at www.fbi.gov/about-us/cjis/identity-history-summary-checks. Additionally, requests can be submitted electronically at www.edo.cjis.gov. For additional information, please contact CJIS directly at (304) 625-5590.

EXPLANATION OF EXEMPTIONS

SUBSECTIONS OF TITLE 5, UNITED STATES CODE, SECTION 552

(b)(1) (A) specifically authorized under criteria established by an Executive order to be kept secret in the interest of national defense or foreign policy and (B) are in fact properly classified to such Executive order;

(b)(2) related solely to the internal personnel rules and practices of an agency;

(b)(3) specifically exempted from disclosure by statute (other than section 552b of this title), provided that such statute (A) requires that the matters be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on issue, or (B) establishes particular criteria for withholding or refers to particular types of matters to be withheld;

(b)(4) trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential;

(b)(5) inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency;

(b)(6) personnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy;

(b)(7) records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information (A) could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings, (B) would deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or an impartial adjudication, (C) could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy, (D) could reasonably be expected to disclose the identity of confidential source, including a State, local, or foreign agency or authority or any private institution which furnished information on a confidential basis, and, in the case of record or information compiled by a criminal law enforcement authority in the course of a criminal investigation, or by an agency conducting a lawful national security intelligence investigation, information furnished by a confidential source, (E) would disclose techniques and procedures for law enforcement investigations or prosecutions, or would disclose guidelines for law enforcement investigations or prosecutions if such disclosure could reasonably be expected to risk circumvention of the law, or (F) could reasonably be expected to endanger the life or physical safety of any individual;

(b)(8) contained in or related to examination, operating, or condition reports prepared by, on behalf of, or for the use of an agency responsible for the regulation or supervision of financial institutions; or

(b)(9) geological and geophysical information and data, including maps, concerning wells.

SUBSECTIONS OF TITLE 5, UNITED STATES CODE, SECTION 552a

(d)(5) information compiled in reasonable anticipation of a civil action proceeding;

(j)(2) material reporting investigative efforts pertaining to the enforcement of criminal law including efforts to prevent, control, or reduce crime or apprehend criminals;

(k)(1) information which is currently and properly classified pursuant to an Executive order in the interest of the national defense or foreign policy, for example, information involving intelligence sources or methods;

(k)(2) investigatory material compiled for law enforcement purposes, other than criminal, which did not result in loss of a right, benefit or privilege under Federal programs, or which would identify a source who furnished information pursuant to a promise that his/her identity would be held in confidence;

(k)(3) material maintained in connection with providing protective services to the President of the United States or any other individual pursuant to the authority of Title 18, United States Code, Section 3056;

(k)(4) required by statute to be maintained and used solely as statistical records;

(k)(5) investigatory material compiled solely for the purpose of determining suitability, eligibility, or qualifications for Federal civilian employment or for access to classified information, the disclosure of which would reveal the identity of the person who furnished information pursuant to a promise that his/her identity would be held in confidence;

(k)(6) testing or examination material used to determine individual qualifications for appointment or promotion in Federal Government service the release of which would compromise the testing or examination process;

(k)(7) material used to determine potential for promotion in the armed services, the disclosure of which would reveal the identity of the person who furnished the material pursuant to a promise that his/her identity would be held in confidence.

Sessions orders Justice Dept. to end forensic science commission, suspend review policy

By Spencer S. Hsu

April 10 at 1:57 PM

Attorney General Jeff Sessions will end a Justice Department partnership with independent scientists to raise forensic science standards and has suspended an expanded review of FBI testimony across several techniques that have come under question, saying a new strategy will be set by an in-house team of law enforcement advisers.

In a statement Monday, Sessions said he would not renew the National Commission on Forensic Science, a roughly 30-member advisory panel of scientists, judges, crime lab leaders, prosecutors and defense lawyers chartered by the Obama administration in 2013.

A path to meet needs of overburdened crime labs will be set by a yet-to-be named senior forensic adviser and an internal department crime task force, Sessions's statement said.

The announcement came as the commission began its last, two-day meeting before its term ends April 23, and as some of its most far-reaching final recommendations remained hanging before the department.

Justice officials said, for example, that no decision has been made on a call for new, departmentwide standards for examining and reporting forensic evidence in criminal courts across the country. But the department has decided to suspend work on setting uniform standards for forensic testimony.

[U.S. to commit scientists and new commission to fix forensic science]

Sessions in his statement said the shifts were intended to build on the commission's work while also weighing other approaches to assessing forensic science findings now central to many crime investigations and court proceedings.

“The availability of prompt and accurate forensic science analysis to our law enforcement officers and prosecutors is critical to integrity in law enforcement, reducing violent crime, and increasing public safety,” Sessions said in the statement. “We applaud the professionalism of the National Commission on Forensic Science and look forward to building on the contributions it has made in this crucial field.”

The action marked the latest break by Sessions, a former federal prosecutor, with Obama-era priorities. The former Alabama senator last week announced top aides will review agreements reached with troubled police forces nationwide to ensure the pacts to overhaul departments do not counter the Trump administration's goals of combating violent crime and promoting police safety and morale.

Obama, a constitutional law scholar, had championed changes to forensic science.

In September, a White House science panel called on courts to question the admissibility of four heavily used techniques, including firearms tracing, saying claims about their reliability had not been scientifically proven. The Justice Department last year also announced a wider review of testimony by experts across several disciplines after finding that nearly all FBI experts for years overstated and gave scientifically misleading testimony about two techniques the FBI Laboratory long championed: the tracing of crime scene hairs based on microscopic examinations and of bullets based on chemical composition.

The wider review has been suspended pending review by the incoming administration and a strategy to be devised by the internal task force with input through public comments, Office of Legal Policy senior counsel Kira Antell said at the start of Monday's commission meeting in Washington.

“We plan to consider all options,” Associate Deputy Attorney General Andrew D. Goldsmith said, including using a different commission, a Justice Department office or a group composed of representatives from many agencies. Sessions has made clear that “good forensics is not only important because it enables us to convict the guilty, but also to clear the innocent” and prioritized “prompt access to high-quality forensics technology” to reduce “troubling” crime lab backlogs, Goldsmith told commissioners.

In his statement about the future of forensic sciences, Sessions highlighted the need to survey crime lab workloads, backlogs and equipment needs as a way to increase the labs' capacities to do work, and the need for reliability and “specificity” of results.

Even before the announcement not to renew the national commission, several commission members from outside the Justice Department warned against ending its work, saying the Trump administration has made several moves to reduce the role of science and independent scientists in policymaking.

[Scientists are conspicuously missing from Trump's government]

In a letter Thursday, six leading research scientists on the panel urged re-upping the commission for another two-years saying “for too long, decisions regarding forensic science have been made without the input of the research science community.”

“Limiting the ‘relevant scientific community' to forensic practitioners is a disservice to that field and to the criminal justice system,” they wrote, led by Thomas D. Albright, an internationally recognized neuroscientist specializing in vision and the brain at the Salk Institute for Biological Studies.

[Read letter from scientists here]

The full commission declined to recommend its renewal, on a 16 to 15 vote in January, the Justice officials noted.

The commission jointly led by the Justice Department and the Commerce Department's National Institute of Standards and Technology or NIST, has prompted several changes.

Following one recommendation, NIST launched a $20 million research effort to solidify understanding of whether techniques used more than 100,000 times a year in U.S. crime labs work as advertised — starting with the question of how often claimed matches of pattern-based evidence such as complex DNA profile mixtures may be in error, followed by studies of firearms and bitemark tracing.

Sessions's predecessor as attorney general, Loretta E. Lynch, also accepted commission recommendations to set new accrediting and ethical codes for forensic labs and practitioners.

Several commission members who have worked in criminal courts and supported the input of independent scientists said the department risks retreating into insularity and repeating past mistakes, saying that no matter how well-intentioned, prosecutors lack scientists' objectivity and training.

U.S. District Judge Jed S. Rakoff of New York, the only federal judge on the commission, said “it is unrealistic to expect that truly objective, scientifically sound standards for the use of forensic science … can be arrived at by entities centered solely within the Department of Justice.”

In suspending reviews of past testimony and the development of standards for future reporting, “the department has literally decided to suspend the truth,” said Peter S. Neufeld, co-founder of the Innocence Project, which has reported that nearly half of 349 DNA exonerations involved misapplications of forensic science. “As a consequence innocent people will languish in prison or, God forbid, could be executed,” he said.

However, the National District Attorneys Association, which represents prosecutors, applauded the end of the commission and called for it to be replaced by an Office of Forensic Science inside the Justice Department. Disagreements between crime lab practitioners and defense community representatives on the commission had reduced it to “a think tank,” yielding few accomplishments and wasted tax dollars, the association said.

The commission was created following critical reports by the National Academy of Sciences about a dearth of standards and funding for crime labs, examiners and researchers, problems it partly traced to law enforcement control over the system.

Although examiners had long claimed to be able to match pattern evidence — such as with firearms or bitemarks — to a source with “absolute” or “scientific” certainty, only DNA analysis had been validated through statistical research, scientists reported.

In one case, the FBI lab in 2005 abandoned its four-decade-long practice of tracing bullets to a specific manufacturer's batch through chemical analyses after its method were scientifically debunked. In 2015, the department and bureau reported that nearly every examiner in an elite hair analysis unit gave scientifically flawed or overstated testimony in 90 percent of cases for two decades before 2000.

The cases include 32 defendants sentenced to death. Of those, 14 have been executed or died in prison.

Separately on Monday, the national commission heard from Keith Harward, an ex-Navy sailor exonerated last year after serving 33 years of a life sentence for rape and murder in Newport News, Va. Harward was convicted after six separate experts including a leader in the field concurred that bite marks on a victim matched his teeth to a “medical certainty.” DNA testing identified a different sailor as the true, lone, perpetrator. No court in the United States has barred bite mark evidence, despite 21 known wrongful convictions, a proposed moratorium in Texas and research showing that experts cannot consistently agree even on whether injuries are caused by human teeth.

The Justice Department and commission's moves have had impact.

FBI Director James B. Comey last year asked U.S. governors to ask state and local crime labs to review their hair comparison cases, and reviews of past convictions are underway in at least a dozen states, according to the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers.

“We want to make sure there aren't other innocent people in jail based on our work,” Comey wrote in a June letter. “Unfortunately, in a large number of cases, our examiners made statements that went too far in explaining the significance of a hair comparison and could have misled a jury or judge.”

In backing the expanded Justice Department testimony review, then-deputy attorney general Sally Yates said last February that its goal was to determine whether “the same kind of ‘testimonial overstatement' … could have crept into other disciplines.”

“The authority afforded to scientific experts is second to none, and we must make sure that our statements are clearly supported by sound science,” Yates said.

In another example, the Defense Forensic Science Center, formerly called the U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Laboratory, has funded new research establishing error rates for firearms tracking and last month announced it would begin reporting fingerprint results using statistical probabilities instead of declaring one-to-one matches to individuals, a departure from FBI practice.

Subject: Monday coverage

Sir, Please see the coverage from today's major news outlets. I have not included an analysis of twitter coverage, as it would be impossible to ascertain any useable takeaway. However, much of the main stream coverage is centered around two themes: No charges, but Comey called her "extremely careless." The lead paragraphs in virtually all of the stories we've found today contain the same themes in the first graphs. The coverage, as of late this afternoon, is below. Please let me know if you have any questions. I will send another update tonight as coverage warrants.

1) Washington Post: FBI Recommends No Criminal Charges in Clinton Email Probe

FBI Director James B. Comey said Tuesday that his agency will not recommend criminal charges against Hillary Clinton for her use of a private email server as secretary of state but called Clinton and her staff "extremely careless" in handling sensitive material. The announcement means that Clinton will not have to fear criminal, legal liability as her campaign moves forward, though Comey leveled sharp criticism at the past email practices of the presumptive Democratic presidential nominee and called into question many of the defenses she has raised in recent weeks.

2) NY Times: FBI Recommends No Charges For Clinton

WASHINGTON — The F.B.I. director, James B. Comey, said on Tuesday that the bureau would not recommend criminal charges in Hillary Clinton's handling of classified information, lifting an enormous legal cloud from her presidential campaign, hours before her first joint campaign appearance with President Obama. But Mr. Comey rebuked Mrs. Clinton as being "extremely careless" in using a personal email address and server for sensitive information, declaring that an ordinary government official could have faced administrative sanction for such conduct.

3) NY Times (Sidebar Story): James Comey's Rebuke of Hillary Clinton Fits a 3-Decade Pattern

For 15 minutes on Tuesday morning, as the political world held its breath, the F.B.I. director, James B. Comey, laid out in clinical detail how the Democratic candidate for president had misused her private email account. He did not announce until the very end of his statement that he was recommending that Hillary Clinton, who could be his boss if she is elected in November, should not be subject to criminal charges. To those who know Mr. Comey, it was a classic performance. Throughout his three decades as a law enforcement official, Mr. Comey, 55, has refused to shy away from thorny issues, often clashing with White House and Justice Department officials about some of the most high profile national security matters.

4) WSJ: FBI Won't Recommend Criminal Charges Against Hillary Clinton (Paywall)

FBI Director James Comey said Tuesday that Hillary Clinton was "extremely careless" in handling classified information while secretary of state and added scores of emails on her personal server contained highly classified information—but he said the FBI won't recommend criminal charges against the presumptive Democratic presidential nominee.

5) WSJ (outside analysis) Takeaways from the FBI Director's Statement on Hillary Clinton's Use of Private Email

The good news for Democrats in FBI Director James Comey's statement Tuesday is that he isn't recommending criminal charges in the Hillary Clinton email saga. That said, this issue isn't going away anytime soon. Any Democrats who think the Clinton folks can now put this behind them need to get their heads examined. I am reasonably confident that, as I type this, the Republican National Committee and GOP super PACs are cutting ads based on Mr. Comey's remarks to the media–particularly the part when he said that the FBI investigation into the former secretary of state's use of private email found that Mrs. Clinton and her colleagues were "extremely careless in their handling of very sensitive, highly classified information." The next big gem for Republicans? Mr. Comey's suggestion that "hostile actors" probably gained access to Mrs. Clinton's personal e-mail account.

6) AP: No Charges Recommended in Clinton Email Probe, FBI Says

WASHINGTON (AP) — The FBI won't recommend criminal charges against Hillary Clinton for her use of a private email server while secretary of state, agency Director James Comey said Tuesday, lifting a major legal threat to her presidential campaign. But Comey called her actions "extremely careless" and faulted the agency she led for a lackadaisical approach to handling classified material. Comey's decision almost certainly brings the legal part of the issue to a close and removes the threat of criminal charges. Attorney General Loretta Lynch said last week that she would accept the recommendations of the FBI director and of career prosecutors.

7) LA Times: FBI Recommends No Prosecution in Hillary Clinton Email Case

The FBI is recommending that no charges be brought against Hillary Clinton in connection with her email use while secretary of State, FBI Director James Comey said Tuesday. “No reasonable prosecutor” would bring such a case, Comey said. Although the FBI is not recommending charges, the FBI director did strongly criticize Clinton’s handling of classified information in her email, calling it “extremely careless.”

8) LA Times/Analysis: Email Issue to Linger with Clinton Until Election Day

For months, Hillary Clinton’s foes — Republican and Democrat alike — hung their hopes on the prospect she would be indicted for using an unsecured home server to handle her emails as secretary of State. The threat was cited by backers of Donald Trump as a response to his myriad and many stumbles; however poorly he performed or whatever discouraging news turned up in opinion surveys, they suggested, a criminally charged Clinton would be in even worse political shape come November.

9) NPR: FBI Recommends No charges for Hillary Clinton in Email Server Case

Hillary Clinton and her staff were "extremely careless" in handling classified data over a private email server while she was secretary of state, FBI Director James Comey said Tuesday — but the FBI is recommending that no charges be brought against her. Comey said his agency found more than a hundred emails that contained information that was classified at the time they were sent and received — emails that should not have been on "any kind of unclassified system," Comey said. He also said the FBI considered it possible that Clinton's email domain had been hacked by a "hostile actor."

10) NBC News: FBI Recommends No Criminal Charges Against Hillary Clinton

Hillary Clinton was careless when she used a personal email server during her tenure in the State Department — but there is no evidence she committed a crime, the FBI chief announced Tuesday. The FBI "did not find clear evidence that Secretary Clinton or her colleagues intended to violate laws governing the handling of classified information," James Comey said. But "there is evidence that they were extremely careless in their handling of very sensitive, highly classified information. Although there is evidence of potential violations of the statutes regarding the handling of classified information, our judgment is that no reasonable prosecutor would bring such a case," Comey said.

11) CNN: FBI Director: Clinton "Extremely Careless," But No Charges Recommended

FBI Director James Comey said Tuesday that he would not recommend charges against Hillary Clinton over her use of private email servers while secretary of state, removing a huge shadow hovering over her presidential campaign. But Comey administered an extraordinary tongue-lashing to Clinton and her aides, rebuking them for being "extremely careless" in the handling of classified information and saying the presumptive Democratic nominee should have known an unclassified email system was no place to conduct sensitive government business.

12) ABC News: FBI Probe Contradicts Clinton's Claim She Never Sent Classified Emails

Today's bombshell announcement from FBI Director James Comey regarding Hillary Clinton's use of a private email server underscores discrepancies between what the agency found in its yearlong investigation and what Clinton has publicly said about her email use. Even though the FBI said it "cannot find a case that would support bringing criminal charges," there were several areas where Comey made it clear that Clinton and her team mishandled her email.

13) CBS News: FBI: No Charges Against Hillary Clinton Are Appropriate for Email Server Use

The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) is recommending to the Justice Department that no charges should be brought against Hillary Clinton for her use of private email servers as secretary of state, FBI Director James Comey announced Tuesday. "Our judgment is that no reasonable prosecutor would bring such a case," Comey said after detailing the FBI's findings in its investigation of Clinton's use of personal email servers.

"No charges are appropriate in this case." Comey announced that the FBI has completed its investigation of Clinton's use of a personal email server and is now referring the matter to the Justice Department to decide whether to prosecute. Comey made clear he didn't coordinate his statement with the Justice Department or any other part of the government.

THE 2016 POLITICO 50 UNVEILED TODAY

Ted Cruz and Bernie Sanders Top POLITICO's 3rd Annual List

"Do ideas still matter in the year of Donald Trump?" That's the question POLITICO Magazine grapples with in our third annual POLITICO 50 list of thinkers and doers changing American politics in 2016- and the answer we offer is a resounding yes.

In the midst of an often bizarre and sometimes downright depressing election, this list represents something altogether surprising: a collection of people who, no matter their widely divergent views, offer powerful examples of how and why ideas continue to make a difference in politics and policy. For our number one spot on this campaign-year edition of the list, we've chosen an unlikely pairing of ideological opposites: U.S. Senators Ted Cruz and Bernie Sanders, who most powerfully used the platform of a presidential race to remind America that actual ideas, shouted clearly, over and over, can build movements.

SEE THE FULL LIST:

http://politi.co/1KcgGfH

From U.S. Senators Ted Cruz and Bernie Sanders leading ideological movements- to Speaker Paul Ryan working to prove the GOP is still a party of ideas- to former Fox News host Gretchen Carlson holding TV news and her employer accountable- to DeRay Mckesson and Brittany Packnett leading the Black Lives Matter movement- to FBI Director James Comey being a straight shooter in a town that needs them - to Medium Founder and CEO Evan Williams cutting out the media middleman- to Hamilton composer, lyricist, and actor Lin-Manuel Miranda showing us how rap can rewrite history- the people on this year's POLITICO 50 list are transforming American politics.

Special Features from the POLITICO 50 Issue:

"Do Ideas Still Matter In the Year of Trump?"- Let's face the facts: 2016 has not been about ideas. Where will it leave the two parties when it comes to big ideas in politics? Michael Grunwald explores if ideas will ever shape our politics again. http://politi.co/2c979tO

What's Wrong With America's White People?- POLITICO's Susan B. Glasser and Glenn Thrush moderate an expert discussion on the question: Do poor white Americans suddenly feel more disgruntled than ever, or are the rest of us just now paying attention? Featuring POLITICO 50 members Carol Anderson, Anne Case, Angus Deaton, Nancy Isenberg and J.D. Vance. http://politi.co/2cawimQ

Trump Before Trump - If you're looking for an intellectual antecedent for Donald Trump, Pat Buchanan (No. 7 on our list) and his populist "America First" campaigns are a good place to start, says Jeff Greenfield. http://politi.co/2c8IFB3

Yes, Immigration Hurts American Workers- George Borjas (No. 17) says the problem with the current immigration debate is that neither side is revealing the whole picture. Trump overlooks that an influx of immigrants can potentially be a net good for the nation. Clinton ignores the hard truth that not everyone benefits when immigrants arrive. http://politi.co/2c9501e

How the Democrats Lost Touch on Trade - One of the most startling developments of this most peculiar campaign season has been the emergence of trade as an electrifying political issue. Author Thomas Frank (No. 15) explains how the American public grew furious over trade deals beloved by the political class. http://politi.co/2c94AYU

Conservatives Don't Own the GOP- To put it mildly, this election cycle has revealed serious fault lines and weaknesses on the right, and the Republican Party will be working to make sense of it all for years. Yuval Levin (No. 27) explores how conservatives lost Republican voters and how to win them back. http://politi.co/2cJ0Y3E

What's With Hillary Clinton's Woman Problem? - Does Hillary Clinton have a woman problem? With only a couple of months until a November election that could put the first woman in the White House, the answer, amazingly enough, is yes. Jill Filipovic explores why young female voters are wary of Clinton, and why feminists like Gloria Steinem, Madeleine Albright and Lena Dunham (No. 22) are still fighting for gender solidarity in the campaign. http://politi.co/2ca9ELh

Black Lives Matter Isn't Just a Hashtag Anymore - Activist Brittany Packnett (No. 3) writes about what happened when the Black Lives Matter movement met the cold realities of politics, and the challenge of bringing a spirit of protest to the realm of policy. http://politi.co/2c968SC

What Everyone Still Doesn't Get About the Islamic State - Journalist Rukmini Callimachi (No. 30) has become an indispensable guide to understanding the Islamic State, and cutting through the fog of misinformation from politicians. Reporter Graeme Wood talks with Callimachi about what it's like to try to penetrate one of the world's most dangerous and shadowy organizations-and what we're still getting wrong. http://politi.co/2caaMi8

American Growth Has Slowed Down. Get Used to It. - Growth has been our American mantra, but it might just prove to be an elusive slogan. Economist Robert J. Gordon (No. 16) says to beware of politicians bearing promises of a return to a vanished past. http://politi.co/2cmbNYR

The POLITICO 50 Reading List - What are the smartest minds in politics reading? We asked the members of The POLITICO 50 list to name the best books they've read this year. Here are their answers. http://politi.co/2cJia9h

POLITICO 50 Survey- What does our POLITICO 50 list think of Hillary Clinton vs. Donald Trump, President Obama's unfinished business and the biggest policy fights on deck for 2017? We asked. http://politi.co/2cmeFoT Boss - In anticipation of your remarks tomorrow at MCCA and MCSA, below are a few notes gathered from the meeting of the Encryption and Law Enforcement Working Group today. AD Sleeper and EAD Piehota participated in the morning session and STB staff remained through the day to capture the discussion. Please let us know if you would like additional information. Thanks, dawn.

- The Director of Government Affairs for MCSA suggested the organizations develop draft encryption legislation and asked if the FBI might be willing to provide legislative drafts to give them a starting point.

- Extensive discussion among participants about whether the political environment has changed given the new administration, particularly, the incoming AG.

- The Manhattan DA's office representatives indicated Cy Vance has spoken with President Trump and the President offered his support with regard to encryption matters (DA's office also provided WH a copy of their white paper at President's request)

Director Comey Remarks During May 11 'Pen and Pad' Briefing with Reporters

Director Comey: I'm not here, by the way, to talk about any pending investigation. To and including the investigation in connection with Secretary Clinton's use of a private e-mail server. You're welcome to ask me about that, but I promise you you're going to get the same answer which is that I'm not going to talk pending investigation. That I remain close to that investigation, to ensure that it's done well and has the resources that are needed.

As I've told you all before my goal in any investigation is to do it well and do it promptly. Especially investigations of intense public interest. All that remains true. It remains under investigation, and I have nothing else to say about that.

I actually came this morning from ... We did our memorial service 'cause police week is kicking off. It's always a good event for us, but always heartbreaking to see the families of people. One of the special agents who was killed in a terrible cold case [squad] shooting at [Washington], here in DC. One of the kids work for us, which is a wonderful thing.

The only thing else I wanted to hit at the outset with you is, I also got a briefing this morning on the quarterly stats for homicide, in the nation's largest cities. I've talked to you about this before and I was very worried about last fall. I am in many ways more worried, 'cause the numbers are not only going up they're continuing to go up in most of those cities faster than they were going up last year. I worry very much, it's a problem that most of American can drive around. From the Las Vegas trip you can't tell that more than 60 people have been murdered in Las Vegas this year. From the miracle mile in Chicago you can't hear the sounds of gunshots that have killed over 200 people so far this year. Lots of other cities, as I've said most of them ... I think it was 42 or 3 I got briefed on. Most of them have seen an increase. It's again, happening in certain parts of the cities. The people dying are almost entirely Black and Latino men. We can't drive around that problem.

I raise it with you all because I hope it's being reported on at local levels, but in my view, it's not in the attention of the national level it deserves. I don't know what the answer is, but holy cow do we have a problem. Obviously I continue to believe it's really important that law enforcement and communities, especially communities of color, continue to talk to each other. The bureau's still trying to be a part of that drive and that conversation. Mike has arranged for me to go down to the 16th street Baptist church in Birmingham, week after next, as part of trying to continue that conversation. Especially about race and law enforcement. I'm sure some of you will hear about that when I do it.

That's it. Now I'll be quiet. We'll try to do our usual organized way. I usually begin at my left hand.

Pete: On Apple, two questions if I may. First of all, was your on the spot math in London correct? Was it in fact 1.3 million or whatever we all figured out it was?

Director Comey: Mike loved that I was just winging that.

Pete: Secondly, with the two cases having collapsed for obvious reasons, aren't we left with a court order in Brooklyn that says that Apple doesn't have to respond to an All Writs act order? Is that where we still are? That Apple is not responding to All Writs act orders in the Federal Government?

Director Comey: First, I'm not going to get into ... I probably shouldn't have been cute trying to estimate for you how much it costs. It costs a lot of money. My wife discovered that many of you misreported my salary, which is $178,100.00. She wanted to know where the extra 4 grand was. It cost a lot of money. In my view it was well worth it.

So to your answer your question Pete, about the cases. Yeah, there is a court order that's not been vacated. The decision by the Magistracy Judge in Brooklyn, that I'm sure will be cited and discussed, certainly in cases if there are future cases in that jurisdiction. I have no doubt elsewhere. As I've said many times before, the San Bernardino case was about that phone.

Given the prevalence of devices that we can't unlock, in law enforcement investigations, I'm sure there's going to be other court cases. We're collecting data on ours. I think Amy has testified to this, first six months of this fiscal year, the number's about 4000 devices were examined by FBI experts. About 500 of 'em could not be unlocked. I expect that number just to grow as the prevalence of this technology grows with new models. We got to continue to grapple with this as a country. I'm sure there will be cases and cases where that decision will be a feature. I've said before, I think litigation is a poor place to try to resolve issues that involve values we all hold dear. In individual investigations, I'm highly confident that prosecutors are going to pursue court orders to try to get into devices, where they have a search warrant.

Pete: Can I just follow up on that and ask you? We understand why you wanted to get on the phone in San Bernardino, you've made that quite clear that you didn't think the investigation wouldn't be thorough without doing so. Having done that now, did you find any breakthrough evidence in it?

Director Comey: I'm not going to say. Even in hindsight I'm very glad we got into the phone. It was important.

[Shall I] give you a pen?

Speaker 3: Just piggy backing what Pete was asking, have you had to use that same tool that you used to get into the San Bernardino phone and other phones yet?

Director Comey: I don't think we have yet. We're trying to figure out a mechanism where we can use the tool to help in other investigations. Again, it's a narrow thing which is a 5C operating at on iOS 9 system.

We're trying to figure out how we can help state and local law enforcement, if they have a court order. How we can do that and still maintain the viability of the tool. That work is underway right now. I expect in the near future we'll have figured out how we're going to do it.

Then we'll tell local law enforcement, “If you send us a phone here are the rules”. Look, I want to make sure that if there are ways to use it in appropriate cases we do, but I don't think we've used it yet.

Speaker 4: In [inaudible]. Two very good questions. In terms of the basic narrative of San Bernardino. Is that still as you described it earlier a no information about direction from overseas, control from overseas, but simply inspired by [inaudible]?

Director Comey: Right. Nothing's changing in our assessment of it.

Speaker 4: Then, on the issue of the violence. Why do you think that this story hasn't gotten as much attention? Does the country truly understand the impact of what I call chronic plague play where you literally have hundreds of people being shot and killed in greater numbers maimed [inaudible].

Director Comey: I don't know. The answer to the first part of the question. The second part of the question is, I think because it hasn't been talked about on the national level a whole lot. I'm sure people don't fully appreciate what's going on. As I've said, there's been lots of local conversations and reporting. Chicago's has a ton of it. Chicago has generated some national attention, but I don't think there's been a whole lot of reporting looking at ‘What's going on?' and ‘Why does Dallas see a dramatic spike and Houston doesn't?'.

Remember I talked to you all about, last fall, the map in the calendar makes no sense. It's a complicated hard issue but the stakes couldn't be higher. A whole lot of people are dying, and I don't want to drive around it.

Sorry, go ahead.

Speaker 4: Can you elaborate please, on the public statement from Amy Hess a couple weeks ago about the VEP? I think you've heard some rumblings from the technologist community about how is it possible for the bureau to spend a lot of money on this device, this tool and not fully grasp the mechanics of how it works? Can you elaborate on how that's possible and why that decision was made in this particular situation?

Director Comey: Sure. Sometimes you can buy a tool that helps you accomplish something. Sometimes you can buy the guts of the tool, right? The software behind it, the code behind it. There's a difference between those two things. Our goal, I know you've all heard me say this many times, the goal in San Bernardino was to investigate the case and get into that phone. We bought what was necessary to get into that phone. We tried not to spend more money than we needed to spend, but we spent the money we needed to to get into that phone. We did not in any form or fashion, structure the transaction of the thing with an eye towards avoiding the VEP. I would be shocked if anybody even thought about the VEP or the VEP at the time this was going on. We bought what we needed to buy, to get into the phone.

Speaker 4: Why isn't it important to understand the certain mechanics and the basics of how it gets you into the phone, just for potential future purpose?

Director Comey: Why is it important?

Speaker 4: Why isn't it important? It seems like that might be desirable to know how it works from start to finish.

Director Comey: I suppose it could be, but it might cost you a whole lot money. If your interest is in investigating a particular terrorist attack [inaudible] phone, I don't know why you would spend that dough. The bureau is not in the interest of trying to purchase all kinds of vulnerabilities. We're in the business of trying to investigate cases in any way.

I was over here and now I'll go back across.

Speaker 3: Perfect set up. Thank you Eric. I wanted to ask a question right off the bat.

Given that some of the tech policy experts are saying that if you don't disclose the vulnerability to the software maker, that increases the security risks for consumers, companies, anyone who might be using the phone or running the software on their computers. Should there be a policy ... Do you think it would be wise, from a policy perspective to say, "When you are purchasing exploits you should at the same time try to get as much information about the underlying vulnerability? Make sure you have the technical details on the underlying vulnerability so that you can at least submit it to the VEP, so they can make a decision about the disclosure?". For the purposes of weighing security risks versus law enforcement equities.

Director Comey: I don't know. I don't think I've thought about that long enough to give you an intelligent answer. Among the things I'd want to ask, if folks were chewing on it as a policy matter is, if you can get it for free, okay. What if you have to spend multiples of the poor director's salary to get that? I just haven't thought about it well enough. It was not a consideration here. The goal was to get a tool to get us into the phone.

Speaker 3: Do you think you would have to spend much more money, in this case, to get that information from the-Director Comey: I don't know. My guess is we'd have to spend more, but I don't know. I don't know whether that was even part of the conversations with the private party. Again, our goal was, "You have a tool that you demonstrated to us to get us into the phone, how much does that cost? How do we get that quickly so we can get into the phone?". I don't even know if it was a consideration. As far as the policy question, I haven't thought about that well enough to give you a good answer.

Eric: Two different issues, just following up on Peter on the rising bylaws. In the last year you linked that issue to police possibly backing off, the so called Ferguson effect . Now seeing the increase continue, you've got crosswise with the White House on this last year, do you stand by that? That it could be a Ferguson effect? What do you think now?

Director Comey: I resist the term Ferguson effect, because to me I think that is still what I'm talking about, the viral video effect and changes in the way police may be acting and in the way communities may be acting, in terms on how much information they share with police. Could well be at the heart of this, or could well be an important factor in this. The reason I resist Ferguson effect is Ferguson, at least to my recollection, wasn't about videos. I think it is the potential effect of marginal pullbacks by lots and lots of police officers that is changing some cities. I continue to hear that privately from-

Eric: Did you hear anything in the briefings [to] say that made you more convinced of that or more questioning of that?

Director Comey: No, I just continue to hear. I've heard it from the folks who briefed me. I've heard it lots in conversations, privately, with police leaders. That they perceive lots of places in the country, a change in the way police are doing their work. As I said, and in the way communities are interacting with police. It's a perception, I don't know if it's true or not, that folks are less likely to tell police when they see things. There's a perception that police are less likely to do the marginal additional policing that's suppresses crime. The getting out of your car at 2 in the morning and saying to a group of guys, “What are you doing here?”. Instead doing your job, right? Responding to 911 calls, making arrests. What's continuing to be suggested to me in private is, there's lots of impacts to police departments at the margins and communities.

Again, I don't know for sure whether that's an answer. What I'm hopeful of and I've seen some signs of it is that academics will dive into this. The media will dive into this. Something has happened. Sometimes people say to me, “Wow, the increases of off of historic lows”. How does that make any of us feel any better, right? A whole lot of more people are dying this year, than last year. Last year, than the year before. I don't why for sure. [crosstalk]

Eric: I know you don't want to talk about the Hillary e-mails but I'm asking anyway.

Director Comey: [Are you ashamed?]

Eric: Yeah, I try not to. You've indicated publicly, in Niagara Falls and a few other places that you were going to finish this up on your own schedule. You were in no rush. The convention wasn't a factor, nothing else was a factor. Is there a concern in the director's office that this investigation is now the subject of so much scrutiny and speculation that you're affecting a presidential election, in a negative way?

Director Comey: All I would do Eric is repeat what I said before. In any investigation, especially one of intense public interest, and I felt this about San Bernardino. We want to do it well and we want to do it promptly. I feel pressured to do both of those things. What I said at some places, I don't tether to any particular external deadline. Look, I understand the interest in this particular investigation. I do feel the pressure to do it well and promptly. As between the two, we will always choose well. That's the same general answer I hope I've [been giving] before.

Speaker 6: Following up on the violent crime issue-

Director Comey: You screwed up my [bouncing].

Speaker 6: I'm sorry. I was curious, ‘cause the property crime was down according to some of the statistics, 4.2 percent. Is there a threat of over simplification in terms of blaming this on the viral video effect? If, when you're talking about the cities that are mostly responsible for the hike in homicides ... The hike in homicides, at least half are responsible or three cities are responsible for about half of that spike. Is there a way that there's an over simplification here? Given that we've seen a big drop in property crime numbers from last year.

Director Comey: I don't know. Anytime you talk about crime there's always a worry of over simplification. I'll say it again, I don't know what is driving this. It could be, it's simply a collection of individual factors in different cities. It's hard for me to believe that there isn't something broad that's affecting it. Maybe there could be. Maybe we're seeing a jump in homicide in different cities all over the country are driven by factors in those particular areas. Again, Chicago's had a huge increase. Again, when you see the numbers, I think you'll see a significant number of cities have seen a significant jump in their homicide rate. This quarter against last year, and last year was an increase. I don't know. There's always a danger of over simplification, these are really hard questions. Academics wrestle with it. I'm just urging, I think everybody's got to wrestle with it ‘cause something's going on. That's my message.

Speaker 7: If this really is trivial to viral video effect. What's the public policy solution there? Right? Private citizens have the right to report police officers operating in public?

Director Comey: Of course. There's nothing wrong with scrutiny. If that is a part of what's going on in these cities and I've said this publicly many times, it's incumbent upon leaders in the police organizations and in the communities to agree. We all want the same kind of policing. We want up close, respectful, appropriate policing. We want police officers to get out of their car, at midnight or 2 a.m., walk up to the 5 guys at the street corner and say, “Hey, do you guys live around here?”. Have a conversation with them up close. Everybody wants that. If there's something going on in the community where there's fewer and fewer of those conversations, leadership in the police needs to make sure that their officers understand that's what's expected. Leaders in the community need to say, “That's exactly what we want. We want you out of your cars talking to these people in an appropriate, respectful way”.

Sometimes what I've said I think has been misconstrued, I'm not against scrutiny of police, I think that's fabulous and has worked some important changes in the last couple years and I hope it continues to. What I'm worried about is, we all agree we want the same kind of policing, and if it's not happening we need to talk about why. That's it. I'm going to keep bouncing though, ‘cause I promise [inaudible].

Speaker 8: An issue related to that is the pledge to develop a database on police encounters with residents. Are you concerned that it's taking too long to get that up and going? The last we've heard that it's like a workable database won't be up and running for at least 2-3 years.

Director Comey: Yeah.

Speaker 8: What's your-

Director Comey: I'd love to do it tomorrow, but the good news is everyone in law enforcement agrees we've got to build it. The hard part is the execution of it, not the willingness. Actually the thing that you were worried about most is that folks don't want to do it, that's not the case. People want to do it. Big departments, small departments, at the federal level. There's good progress being made, but yeah, it's going to take ... I don't know exactly what the estimate would be. It's going to take us probably at least two years to get it up and running. That does frustrate me, because I think as I said to police organizations, there's nothing more inherently governmental than law enforcement's use of deadly force in encounters with citizens. We, in government, ought to be collecting that data and sharing in an transparent way with everybody. The good news is everybody agrees with that. The execution? We'll do it as fast as we can do it.

At the same time, we're also pushing to get better crime data for the country. Which will take ... I hope we can get it done in three years. Everybody in law enforcement is committed to five years, from this past fall. We will be in at NIBRS world, which is a richer data world for all of us. The country will be much better off.

Speaker 8: Isn't participation an issue, and then right now you don't get even total participation even in crime data collection?

Director Comey: Yeah, it's voluntary. Sure.

Speaker 8: Correct, and this case too. Aren't there departments out there who are hesitant to provide data on deadly encounters with residents?

Director Comey: No department has told me that yet. I've heard from all the police organizations and sheriff organizations that everybody's on board with this. We'll see as we get down to the delivery, but it is voluntary except we have an opportunity to talk about it publicly. You can imagine the circumstance that nearly everyone's doing it, and we can point out who's not doing it. Talk about it.

Catherine.

Catherine: On the e-mails director Comey, are you doing a security inquiry?

Director Comey: I'm sorry?

Catherine: On the e-mails are you doing a security inquiry?

Director Comey: I don't know what that means?

Catherine: So it's a criminal investigation?

Director Comey: We're conducting an investigation. That's the bureau's business. That's what we do. That's probably all I can say about it.

Catherine: The reason I ask is because Mrs. Clinton consistently refers to it as a security inquiry, but the FBI does criminal investigations. I just want to see if you can clear that up.

Director Comey: Right, it's in our name.

Catherine: Okay.

Director Comey: I'm not familiar with the term security inquiry.

Speaker 10: Three quick things. One, would it be possible to get the data you're referencing in terms of the last quarter? Just so we're all on the same page.

Director Comey: Sure, it's not my data I got it from the major city chiefs, but Mike will follow up to see if we can get you that data.

Speaker 10: Two, I think you used the words you were ‘too cute' perhaps talking about how much you spent on Apple. I know you're an advocate of transparency in government. It was tax payer money, I assume that was used to pay to crack the phone. Why not say how much it cost? Just flat out.

Director Comey: A variety of reasons that I don't want to get into. I'm not comfortable giving you the precise number.

Speaker 10: Okay.

Director Comey: What difference? Let's imagine-

Speaker 10: You already said that it's more 1.3 million if you just factor out my salary. Why not just clear that up and just be transparent about how much it actually cost?

Director Comey: I think I've been transparent enough that people understand it cost a lot of money. For a number of reasons I don't want to give [inaudible].

Speaker 11: You're worried about making it more expensive for the next time?

Director Comey: [crosstalk]

Speaker 10: A negotiating point.

Director Comey: A number of reasons.

Speaker 10: It's related-

Director Comey: I don't want to waste your tax payers money. Go ahead.

Speaker 10: [crosstalk] weighing an amendment to rule 41, so that you guys can remotely access computers not in an jurisdiction. What would you say to privacy advocates who are very concerned about this potential change?

Director Comey: Yeah, I'd want to correct your characterization of it. It does nothing to change any of the FBI's authorities. We still need to get a search warrant. Make a showing of probable cause. Explain to the court what we're doing and how. It's just the question is, what judge can issue a search warrant. In complex computer crime cases, given the nature of the dark web for example and given the nature of huge bot nets, it is problematic for some of our most important investigations. If we have to go to dozens of different magistrate judges in a bot net case, or if we're unable to go to a magistrate judge 'cause we can't say for sure where the computer is. Even if we have probable cause to believe that computer is involved in serious criminal activity. It's to solve that problem where the digital age has made physical location, a less of a determinant than it is in the pre-digital age.

That's what I worry about. If folks talk about it like it changes the FBI authorities. Not a teeny bit, not at all. It's question is what judge we can go and make the showing to.

Go to Paula.

Paula: First question, last night the stabbings in Massachusetts. Have you seen any link to terrorism in that case yet and the motives?

Director Comey: I don't know enough to say.

Paula: Following up on that, how was the status of the FBI's relationship with Apple and other tech companies? I know you've said that you want to continue to have a conversation. It basically seems that things are becoming increasingly acrimonious. You double down in the EDNY case, but then you guys pulled out cause he said that he would give you the password. Microsoft came out and sued you. Tech overwhelmingly sided with Apple. How are things specifically with Apple, and then generally the tech industry?

Director Comey: Actually pretty good. We have differences in litigation, but I think that's why litigation is not a productive place to discuss collision among values, [pre-values]. Overall, I'd say our relationship with Apple and the tech companies are productive and appropriate. Often times tech companies are victims, and we're investigating things people are trying to do to them. I hope the tech companies think we do that well. Often times, we're serving them with lawful process and they're cooperating with lawful process. I characterize it as overall well. It's not a monolith. With some, especially for litigation, it can be tenser than others. Not that folks would imagine, actually. Yeah, so that's my verdict on it.

I'll bounce over here, sir.

Speaker 13: Have you seen anything going on on the hill, on the encryption issues that Senator Burr Feinstein had a draft working proposal? Have you seen that? Is it something that you would support?

Director Comey: I've seen it. The bureau doesn't take position on legislation so I have nothing to offer there. One of the things I like about it, is it continues to drive the conversation that I think we need to have. How we, as a country want a govern ourselves. That's it. I have to stop there 'cause it's department of justice's job to take position on litigation.

I'll go across to you.

Speaker 14: Couple of questions. First on the iPhone case. Do you personally know yourself who the third party contractor was who unlocked the iPhone for the FBI?

Director Comey: Yeah. [crosstalk] personally know yourself. Yes.

Speaker 14: You have that knowledge?

Director Comey: I have a good sense of who the person.

Speaker 14: A good sense, or you know the identity of the contractor?

Director Comey: I have a good sense. I couldn't give you people's names.

Speaker 14: What's the name of the company let's say that they're with?

Director Comey: I don't want to answer that one.

Speaker 14: Another one, the FBI's shared responsibility committees were reportedly supposed to be rolled months ago. It seems like that has run into some delays. The pilot launch is still in process. What's the delay? Does it have to do with the criticism that those projects have received from civil rights advocates?

Director Comey: I don't think so. First of all, I don't have any reason to think it's connected to criticism. Last time I got briefed on it that we're trying to pilot it in ... I forget, 3 to 5 cities, I think. To see how it works. I hope that the folks who are concerned about it will engage, and dig into the details of it. I think if they dig into it they'll be like, "Oh that sounds pretty sensible". Unless I'm missing something, nothing about any criticism or controversy has delayed what we're trying to do.

Actually, explain to everybody, I think that you get this. What we're trying to do is, we're trying to use our good offices to connect providers. Social service providers, medical providers, counseling providers. Who may be in an appropriate situation able to take a referral from us of someone that we're looking at who we don't think we need to use the criminal justice system to incapacitate, and see if they can redirect. Especially that young person, troubled person. We see it as trying to foster some sort of off ramp. There won't be a lot of these cases, but in cases where we find someone we think, "Hope we don't have to lock that person up. Maybe we can get them the help that they need". That's the idea.

Not to be run by the bureau, but the reason we're driving it is because we know everybody. The idea is SAC in your community, pull that group together tell them, “When you have an appropriate referral you'll send somebody to them”.

Speaker 14: If not criticism, do you know why the delay?

Director Comey: I don't.

I'm going to keep bouncing. Bounce.

Speaker 15: I guess today the FBI agent association is going to be one of those law enforcement agencies on the Hill that's speaking out against the sentencing reform bill. Do you share a stance with them at all, or do you think that some of the issues that you were talking about with the homicides rising in cities, is it all playing into people speaking out against some of those issues in particular?

Director Comey: I don't know. I don't know what their concerns are. As I said, I wouldn't comment on specific legislation. What I've said publicly is, my general sense is that the ideas animating that the work in the Senate and the House seems sensible and general to me. I don't know what their particular concerns are. I don't connect the two to arise in to what they're talking about in the hill. Which, to my mind, my recollection focuses in a good way trying to reduce recidivism, trying to give people skills and drug treatment. Those kind of things in jail. Which I think is one of the few things people across the spectrum agree upon. I don't know if that.

Mam.

Speaker 16: Just a follow up on that actually. I wanted to ask about the criminal justice reform records as well. How much do you think the rising homicides rates should factor into those discussions on the hill? Do you think they should impact the course of these proposed reforms?

Director Comey: Yeah, to the extent that the conversations on the hill are trying to reduce recidivism and trying to get people skills and treatment or whatnot. I see them as in a way they're connected, because it's about trying to reduce repeat offense. That's probably what I would say about that. More generally, I don't know enough about the specifics beyond that kind of stuff to offer a reaction.

I got to keep bouncing. [crosstalk]

Mike: I got two questions. First on the e-mails, I know you don't want to talk about any details. Normally conduct investigations if it leads to criminal charges. We all learn what you found. In this case, given the scrutiny that you've acknowledged, regardless of whether this results in criminal charges, do you foresee a mechanism by which you can give a public accounting or report to tell us what you found?

Director Comey: I don't want to say at this point, Mike.

Number two.

Mike: Number two, right. Back in January when the Iran nuclear accord was signed, the White House said it had secured a commitment from the Iranians to provide information, assistance, on locating Bob Levinson who was not returned as part of the swap. It's now been 4 months. Have the Iranians provided any new information that would help you identify what had happened to Bob Levinson?

Director Comey: Not something I can comment on. Bob Levinson remains top of my mind. Literally every day, I think about Bob.

Go ahead.

Speaker 18: Thanks for doing this. I just wanted to clarify something that you said, that I thought you said at the top, that you're evaluating whether or not the iPhone hacking tool can be used in other cases? I just want to clarify that that's what you said. Then I have an additional question.

Director Comey: Yeah. We're trying to figure out, in theory it can be used in any case where there's a court order for a 5C running iOS9. We're trying to figure out what mechanism, what way should we build that accomplishes that goal. Allows law enforcement around the country, with court orders, to be able to use our tool.

The reason it's a little tricky is one of the great thing about our criminal justice system is discovery. If we use it in a criminal case in such a way that it becomes a feature of litigation, then the nature of the tool may be exposed and it's utility may be significantly decreased. We're trying to be thoughtful about how to do that. Is it enough to help our colleagues in state local law enforcement in such a way where we say, “Look we're never going to testify”. I'm just imagining this. “We're never going to testify. Send it to the lab. We'll open it, if we can. We'll send it back to you, but to the extent that you need to establish chain of custody or have witness testimony to use what's on that phone. You're not going to be able to”. That's one possibility.

Another is we'll say, “We'll take the risk and we will be prepared to testify and risk the tool being exposed”. Then it's utility diminishing. That's what we're sorting through right now. Does that make sense?

Speaker 18: Yes it does. Are you looking to see if they can be used beyond the 5C? If it can be used on other models?

Director Comey: I think we've already checked that out as part of our own work. My recollection is we're highly confident that it works only on a 5C, running on iOS9.

Speaker 18: I just wanted to ask one additional question just on the encryption issue. We've been talking about the data arrest issue. The data that resides on like a phone. What about the data in the motion side of things? How much is this a concern for you when you're dealing with surfaces like What's App, that's doing end to end encryption of text messages? How are you viewing that as being ... Is it as significant as data at rest or more significant? Are you looking at bringing court cases on that side of the equation?

Director Comey: Thank you for that. It's hugely significant. I would sort it this way. The data at rest problem affects non-national security law enforcement overwhelmingly. The data in motion, at least today, overwhelmingly affects our national security work. Terrorists and their fellow travelers are increasingly using end to end encrypted apps. What's happening is those two circles though, are slowly coming together. Increasingly drug gangs and carjacking gangs are using data in motion facilities that are encrypted. To over simplify, data in motion tends to affect national security work. Primarily, data at rest tends to affect criminal work primarily, but the two are coming together, because encryption of both data at rest and data in motion becoming ubiquitous.

You take What's App. What's App has over a billion customers. Overwhelmingly good people, but in that billion customers are terrorists and criminals. That now ubiquitous feature of all What's App products will affect both sides of the house.

Speaker 19: Including the Brussels attackers, right? They were using What's App?

Director Comey: Yeah, I don't want to say. It's a huge feature of criminal ... Excuse me, a terrorist trait craft. By its ubiquitousness, if that's even a word.

Pete: Ubiquity.

Director Comey: It's ubiquity? It's affecting the criminal work in huge ways.

Speaker 18: Are you thinking about bringing a case against What's App? Is this under consideration?

Director Comey: I'm not, but it's going to be inevitably. It will be an impediment to criminal wire tap orders. In criminal cases and national wire tap orders in national security cases. Whether there will be litigation cases down the road, I don't know. That collision is going to happen, just the way it's happening in data at rest.

Speaker 20: You spoke about the off ramp option earlier and these intervention groups. Can you describe a little bit more when you would foresee that being used? Is it the kind of option, had it been available, that that [PI] would've used in cases that it did bring through the criminal system?

Director Comey: Yeah, thank you. I don't of an example where we would have used it. So, no I don't. Which is why I imagine it's going to be of a marginally utility going down the road. The idea is, let's imagine we have a 16 year old that we've either encountered online or someone has reported to us is expressing affiliation for ISIL. We look at it and say, “Actually this kid hasn't moved towards trying to be a killer. He's actually just confused and screwed up, and he's looking for sources of meaning. It's early yet. What if we could introduce him to the share responsibility committee and see if they could help the kid as a possible off ramp”. That's the idea. I honestly don't imagine it happening a lot. Going backwards I can't think of a case where we would've used it.

Speaker 20: Can I ask you about some comments that were made by one of your predecessors up in New York City? The very reticent of mayor Giuliani. He mentioned that while he was running U.S. attorney's office there, a fair amount of information that they dealt with in certain types of investigations was classified. That, at least on occasion he was fairly confident that some lawyers in office probably took home some of the information that was classified, when they were feeling overworked or behind the 8 ball. You think that ever happened when you were in charge of that office?

Director Comey: The place got much better when I took over. I honestly don't know what he's talking about, but there's no doubt the government investigates it all the time. Administrative investigations, sometimes criminal investigations, of mishandling of classified information. I don't know of a case where it happened. The incidents of classified information are cases in SDNY were sufficiently unusual. I think people showed great care. That's my reaction.

Last bounce. You're bounced in early, but I'm going to bounce back.

Speaker 21: I'm taking another shot at the Clinton e-mails. It's impossible to separate this from the presidential race. We're only 6 months out at this point. Do you feel a personal responsibility to the American people to wrap this up or get it to a solution as quickly as possible here?

Director Comey: I'm going to stick with what I said earlier. Yeah, I couldn't have said it any better.

Mike: Just following up on that What's App-

Director Comey: So we're going to reverse bounce now, Mike.

Mike: On the What's App. To what extent did the conspirators in Paris and Brussels use encrypted apps such as that?

Director Comey: I'm not in a position where I feel comfortable giving you details. I'm going to avoid the particular investigation, and I'll just state it at the general. Highly confident that the use of encryption, both for data at rest and data in motion, is now a central trait craft of ISIL and other terrorist groups. Especially ISIL.

Speaker 23: Speaking of ISIS. The last time we talked you said you'd seen the leveling off of foreign traveler cases. Where does that stand? Backing up from just that isolated part of it, what is your sense now about the volume of ISIS recruitment in the United States? Is it still at the same level? Have you seen any change there?

Director Comey: I think the ISIL, so called Islamic state brand, has lost significant power in the United States. We are seeing that trend is continued since we talked about it in October, whereas-

Speaker 23: That trend you mean for travelers?

Director Comey: That is the drop in the numbers of people traveling or attempting to travel. I'll probably screw up the numbers but you'll get the idea. You imagine 14 in the first half of 2015, we were seeing 6, 8, 10 a month. People trying to travel or successfully travelling. Since last August, it's averaged about 1 a month. That trend is now sustained and it's gone on for ... Coming up on a year, this August. There's no doubt that has happened that is lasting in terms of the attractiveness of the nightmare, which is the Islamic state, to people from the United States. That's true.

Their ability to motivate troubled souls, to inspire them, remains a persistent presence in the United States. We have north of a thousand cases where we're trying to evaluate where somebody is on the spectrum of consuming to acting. That number continues to tick up slowly. We haven't seen a material change there. There's still a presence online and troubled people are still turning to this and at least being interested in it. They've lost their ability to attract people to their caliphate from the United States, in a material way.

Speaker 23: Just to be crystal clear, in terms of people trying to go physically you're seeing a steep decline in that?

Director Comey: Correct.

Speaker 23: In terms of people consuming the social media who might be at some point conspired to do something that's still a problem?

Director Comey: Yes, it still is a problem. I don't know the numbers well enough to characterize whether the rate of increase has changed. It's just ticks up slowly. We have not seen the diminution that we see in the traveler world, in the radicalizing online world.

Catherine.

Catherine: Yes, I have an ISIS related question. These kill lists have gone from military to government, now to the average Americans. How would you assess the credibility of this threat? Is it really down to local and state to notify people, or do you see a larger role for defense in this?

Director Comey: There's a we, often with our joint terrorism task force partners, in New York. We just recently did it with NYPD. We have a duty to warn, which we take very seriously. We go and try to find anybody on any list that's put out in the United States.

ISIL's been engaged in this so called doxxing since the beginning. Which is interesting is that their lists have gotten less specific and more like they just pulled it out of the phone book or found it on a website somewhere. Which is an interesting trend. I don't know exactly what that shows. You remember two years ago they were focused on particular lists of service members, now they're drifting towards just putting out hundreds of hundreds of people that they just pulled off some-

Catherine: Like municipal databases is what someone was talking about.

Director Comey: Yeah. Now they're sort of publishing portions of the phone book, but look, we take it very seriously. I'm sure it ruins a whole lot of people's days. We go find those folks and say, “Joe Smith, just want you to know that your name was on this list. We don't have any specific credible threat that's focused on you, but we want you to know this. If you see anything that concerns you please call us”. We do that with hundreds and hundreds of people.

Catherine: Given what you were just saying, that there's upwards of a thousand cases, right? Of people we're trying to figure out where they are on the spectrum as it relates to ISIS. How concerned are you about a Paris style or Brussels style attack happening in the United States? We haven't met since before that and now obviously a lot has changed.

Director Comey: It's something that we focus on every day. We've been doing this now for two years, and how long have I been in this job? 8 months? You remember way back, two years ago, we talked about how we the FBI see three strands to this thread. The effort to attract people to come to the caliphate. The effort to use social media and others to inspire people to act. The third is people who've traveled to the war zone, gotten the worst kind of training, coming back out to kill people. That terrorist Diaspora, I've talked about for a long time. Someday it's going to be much larger than the terrorist Diaspora out of Afghanistan by the Mujahedeen after the 1980s.

What we see in Paris and Brussels is a manifestation of that element of the threat. The killers who travel and then return to engage in acts of violence. We have far fewer people in real numbers and dramatically far fewer per capita from the United States that have gone there. That's not our only focus. We're focused on those people. We're also very much focused on people coming back to the EU and then making a hop over here.

We see no evidence of a plot like that in the United States. First of all we know that they acknowledge privately, the ISIL savages how hard it is to get into the United States, but they very much want to. We know that third prong of the thread is something that we have to worry about every single day.

Catherine: [Do you have] have a concern though? There is an ongoing issue with information sharing regardless of what officials say publicly. There's still behind the scenes issues there. Can you just elaborate on that and what your concerns are with the information sharing and with their lack of a comprehensive database of terrorists?

Director Comey: I've had lots of conversations with European colleagues about this. I worry when I talk to them about it that I sound arrogant, and I really don't mean to. Three thousand people were murdered in our country 15 years ago. We as a country then set out to change the way we approach counter terrorism dramatically. We've invested probably hundreds of billions dollars since then, in this country. That has bought us a capability that is really good. Not perfect, but really good. That took us 15 years of effort. Our European colleagues have not gone on that journey. Paris and Brussels is spurring them to move farther down that journey. What we're trying to do is help them in any way that we can. Show them what we've learned, what we've done over the last 15 years. That the answer has to be breaking down all silos that separate information and operations from each other. We've done it across cities. Think of the progress we've made in the relationship between NYPD and FBI in 15 years.

What they have to do in Europe is take that, and replicate it across over 20 countries, many different cultures. It's a very hard thing to do. I know they're motivated to do it. Our goal is to help them as much as we can. Without sounding like we know the world, but help them as much as we can make that journey and as fast as they can. It's hard. Think about what we've done in 15 years. It's really hard.

Catherine: It also affects us, it's not just them because you said your big concern is that someone from the EU zone could make it into the US. That there's not adequate information sharing with the US. Someone could hypothetically slip through, right?

Director Comey: Oh sure. That's why we spend so much time trying to build information sharing agreements with partners all over the world, not just in Europe. Why we spend so much time investing in our legal attaché operations, our relationships with our [characters 00:47:51] and partners. That's the answer. We have to. Europe is hours from here by an air flight. We think of it as part of the same thread environment. This is something else that I've shared with our European partners. One thing we've done in this country is decide to be safe as Americans. We have to understand any threat anywhere in the world.

I begin each morning with a briefing about terrorist related threats worldwide. If there's a threat in Madagascar, that isn't particularly aimed at Americans, I'm going to hear about it. Our theory is a threat anywhere could be a threat here or a threat to Americans overseas. What I've said to our European counterparts is that's the way we've approached the world now after the pain of 3000 people murdered in our country. We think about it worldwide, and please ask us. We will share with you what we know.

I'm picking on Madagascar ‘cause I don't know anyone in Madagascar. We may know something about Madagascar that you wouldn't have imagined that the FBI know about Madagascar, but it's because of the way America's decided to think about the terrorism threat. Think about it globally, so we can be safe, that allows us to help you in ways you might not expect.

Speaker 24: Mister Director, I have a question about something relating to crime in terms of law enforcement's ability to get information to protect people when they need help. The case of last week, involving the federal police officer who went on a shooting spree.

Director Comey: In Maryland, yeah.

Speaker 24: In Maryland. Turns out that there was a protective order issued. The order required him to turn in all weapons. As we reported the story out this week, we found out that there was basically an honors system. That he was to turn in the weapons that he had. There were two registered for the state of Maryland, but he had other weapons. He turned in 7 or 8. He withheld information about a gun that he bought legally, that they found out about after the fact. You have a situation where his wife went to the court and said, “I know he has these weapons”.

The court said, “You must turn in those weapons”. There was information out there about the weapon that was ultimately used to kill at least 2 people allegedly in Montgomery, Maryland that the law enforcement did not have access to. Does that strike you as a system that needs fixing? Where law enforcement can get the information that they need to protect people?

Director Comey: I don't know enough, certainly about the particulars to comment. It all depends on what policy judgments have been made, and what laws reflect those policy judgments, which is not my thing.

Then I'll go across there.

Speaker 25: Couple of questions. First on transparency. The section 702 of the FISA amendment [staff] as you know is coming up for pre-authorization next year. Yesterday there was a hearing on the hill. One of the points that was raised ... I think the major point of controversy is the U.S. person query. I believe that on the NSA and CIA have apparently tracked the rough number of U.S. person queries on the 702 data, the prison data. The FBI's cannot, correct? Can you tell me if you think why you can't do it? Are you thinking of changing that so that you can track the number of queries made? Why wouldn't you as the interest of transparencies, since other agencies are able to do so?

Director Comey: All I can say about this is at this point is that the DNI is driving an effort to see what we can accomplish in that regard. It's largely a system problem, can you build your system in such a way to track it without grinding the entire operation to a halt? I know that work is underway now, to figure out ... If we can't get a precise number is there an estimate that we can get that would be useful to people? I'm a huge fan of transparency. Especially around something like 702, which to me of the two things of we're discussed. Remember we had a little conversation about a 215 and 702. 702 is far more important. It's important to tell people as much as we possibly can about how it's used. I think more will come on that space is the answer.

Speaker 26: Just to clarify two of the answers you've given on the iPhones. You've said at the very beginning that there, it I'm sure, that there are roughly 500 phones in investigations that you cannot get into now. Is that right?

Director Comey: Correct. Our CART examiners, and Mike will get you the exact numbers, but it's something like 4000 phones in the first 6 months of this fiscal year. I think the number's about 500, it might be 480 or something. That couldn't be opened.

Speaker 26: You said you're looking, then you said separately you're looking now at the tool that you bought. That you won't tell us how much you paid for but that's separate. Whether or not that can be used to get into a phone. How many of those 500 are potentially can be upwards of those? How many are 5C iOS9s?

Director Comey: I think, and you can get the answer on this, I think the answer is none. I don't think any in that set ... I think that's right, but I could be wrong about that. You'll have to check that with the STD people.

Speaker 26: Then [separately] back on the Hillary e-mails for a second. The [portrays] investigation, what impact has that had on the current investigation into secretary Clinton's e-mails in terms of lessons learned, the visions that obviously came up with the [inaudible] FBI and across the street? The questions of what criminal charges should and would be brought? That has to be looming over you at this point.

Director Comey: I have no comment. What else ... All the way down the end.

Speaker 27: To go back to some of the issues that were race and diversity mentioned, at least passing at the beginning. It's been about a year, more than a year since you gave your speech February, I think last year. How's the FBI doing on recruiting African American and Latino agents? It seems like the numbers continue to mildly trend lower. Are you monitoring that? Can it be reversed? Maybe should it be reversed? Would the country be better off if people are interested in going into law enforcement to have them on the front lines of these police departments that are dealing with these hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of murders than necessarily coming to the FBI?

Director Comey: I hope both. First of all, yes it can be. Too early to say whether we're going to be able to change the inflection of the line. Lots going on in the FBI to try and change that. I'll probably have a better sense at the end of this year, as to whether we're seeing a change. Anecdotally I feel, change in that area, change in the people who are expressing interest ... I don't know whether that's our reference or the show Quantico? More to come at the end of the year. I think both are possible.

In fact, I went and spoke to the national organization of black law enforcement executives in Atlanta. I said, "I have to confess to you, our interests are not aligned, because what I want to have happen is you hire great people of color, give them some years of training. Our average age of entry is 29 for special agents. Then I want to steal them". I'm hoping both. That the people will be attracted to law enforcement and understand that it's a tremendous way to community service. I think both can be true. In a way the more successful local law enforcement is at attracting a diverse workforce, the better that will set us up to be fed by that talent. That's how I think about it.

I'll go here and then I'll go there.

Catherine I called on you.

Catherine: I'm hopeful that you can answer this one.

Director Comey: Is it Hillary Clinton related?

Catherine: Yeah, but this is a really important issue though.

Director Comey: I don't doubt that all of your questions are important. I'm just telling you I'm predicting the answer. As short as you can.

Catherine: I actually keep my questions very short. [crosstalk 00:56:06] I consistently hear from security clearance holders that if they had done a fraction of what had been done by Mrs. Clinton's team that they would already be in jail. Can you assure people that Mrs. Clinton and her team are being held to the same standard? That there isn't a special set of rules because they are powerful and politically connected?

Director Comey: I'm not going to comment, other than to say there are no special set of rules for anybody that the FBI investigates.

Go ahead.

Speaker 28: Just a really quick encryption related question. What is your stance for [inaudible] passage of the [Feinstein] legislation. Is that something that you think makes a lot of sense and ...

Director Comey:

Yeah, I don't want to comment on it for the reasons I said I think when Brian asked, because we don't comment on particular legislation. I think it's good that the conversation is staying alive. One of the things I worried about post San Bernardino litigation is, it would be a shame if we stopped talking about this. It's going to be a bigger and bigger feature of all of our lives. Both the way we live, outside of the criminal justice system and then the way in which we investigate.

Hold on I was going to go to him. Kevin.

Kevin: Speaking of Donald Trump, are you-

Catherine: Now you want another e-mail question right?

Director Comey: Yes, definitely. Go ahead.

Kevin: [crosstalk] That's not e-mail but are you comfortable with him getting security briefings as a nominee.

Director Comey: Yeah, I'm not going to comment on that.

Mam.

Speaker 30: To clarify that more than a thousand cases that are open we're trying to evaluate where someone is radicalizing. Are all of those Islamic state cases, potentially Islamic state sympathizers?

Director Comey: Sometimes we can't tell. I would estimate about 80 percent of them we know are Islamic state related.

Speaker 30: 80 percent?

Director Comey: Yeah.

Speaker 30: Then is there any equivalent scope-

Director Comey: Sometimes with people there's a mix that watching [Iraqi 00:58:01] videos, that kind of thing. It's harder to tell.

Speaker 30: Is there any equivalent scope you can give us for how many investigations you have open into domestic extremists? Anti government individuals. There's obviously been more indictments since the standoff in Oregon. Can you give a sense of how many investigations you have open into that type of group?

Director Comey: Yeah, I can't. We have a lot, but I don't know the number off the top of my head. I don't know, my instinct tells me it's less than a thousand, but Mike would have to check that for you.

Speaker 30: About Clinton ... No I'm just kidding. We we're just talking about travelers. The FBI has arrested several people who wanted to go fight with ISIS in Syria. Some of them have been sentenced 5, 7, eight years. How concerned are you that these people who wanted to go overseas will then get out of prison in the U.S. and be even more dangerous inside the US?

Director Comey: Optimistically, that after serving a long prison term they'll be older, less [unmoored] and then subject to a supervised release term. One of the strengths of the federal criminal justice system is a long supervised release terms by really good probation officers. I think there's a reasonable prospect that by virtue of their age, by virtue of their learning that lesson, by virtue of their supervision they will be materially different from a risk perspective. There's always a worry.

Speaker 30: Even given the radicalization in prison that we've seen in so many cases?

Director Comey: Yeah, we don't see a lot of radicalization though in the ISIL world, in American prisons. It's something we worry about and watch very carefully, but I actually do not sit here worrying a whole lot about people radicalizing in federal prisons, especially.

Speaker 31: May I ask you a question about San Bernardino?

Director Comey: Sure.

Speaker 31: Given the [inaudible] interest in some kind of an attack, well before ISIS came on the scene. Do you, as FBI director, put the San Bernardino attack in an ISIS inspired category or not? If so, why?

Director Comey: I do now, because having gone through all we've gone through it does appear that a dominant influence on them was the ISIL propaganda and ISIL poison. This comes back to the question earlier. Often times early in an investigation or even afterwards it's hard to untangle, because there will be [Iraqi] videos, al-Shabaab material, that kind of stuff in the mix. We make a judgment based on our assessment of what was the primary motivator for these people. Fairly typical path for people is they'll start with [Iraqi] videos, which live forever on the Internet. Then that'll be a gateway to particular interests in a particular group.

Speaker 31: Was that the fact here?

Director Comey: I don't remember clearly enough to tell you. I don't.

Speaker 32: Looking back do you think, “Gosh, we should have seen this, we missed something”, any of that?

Director Comey: Yeah, none of that yet. In San Bernardino, we've thought about it very hard, which highlights the challenge we face is, we cannot see something that we missed in these two killers. That obviously, sometimes you've asked me in the past what I worry about most. We're worried about most the ones that we can't see. That we built this very good counter terrorism in the United States over 15 years, but it can't see everything. Then you add to that the increasing ubiquity, if I may use Pete's word, of encryption both in motion and at rest. That makes it even tougher to see.

Speaker 30: Any indication they were using encryption?

Director Comey: I don't know what I want to say. I can't say at this point. I know the answer, but I don't want to say it.

Speaker 32: Last November [inaudible] one time close associate Vladimir Putin was found dead in the Washington hotel room, the DC [inaudible]. Found that it was a result of blunt force injuries to his neck and torso. DC police is still investigating. Is the FBI participating in that investigation?

Director Comey: We are monitoring it. The DC police have the lead, but we've been kept informed.

Speaker 32: Have you had reason to believe that his death was the result of actions by parties, directed by parties, outside the United States?

Director Comey: I don't want to comment until the DC police have finished their work.

Speaker 33: Director, just to follow up on the vulnerability equities process. Do you think the fact that the bureau can purchase and exploit, but not the underlying vulnerability and thus not be able to submit to the VEP amounts to a loophole in the process? Which is supposed to be ... Was set up to help [brokering], weighing of the equities amongst law enforcement intelligence agencies and cyber security interests to protect the public, to determine whether vulnerability used by the government should be disclosed? Secondly, has the bureau ever purchased an exploit before and still submitted the underlying flaws to the White House [to approve]?

Director Comey: The second part I'm not going to say. The first part, I don't think of it that way. This process is an informal process set up inside the government to help us figure out when we should share with companies vulnerabilities and not? We don't a vulnerability, is that a loophole? I wouldn't think of it that way. Maybe if you were shaping your investigative conduct to avoid triggering the VEP process. I don't know, That didn't happen here so I don't think of it that way. Yeah?

Speaker 34: To follow up briefly on Pete's question, is you conclusion that the San Bernardino killers were inspired by ISIL, informed by which you found on the phone in connection with the tool that allowed you in?

Director Comey: Yeah, I'm not going to say.

Speaker 35: One more question.

Director Comey: I've worn them out.

[crosstalk]

Speaker 36: Beyond what was publicly disclosed in terms of the couple swearing allegiance to an ISIS leader. Can you give us any sense of how you came to the conclusion that the dominant influence was ISIS propaganda in relation to San Bernardino?

Director Comey: I can't. A huge feature is exploiting their media and understanding their-

Speaker 36: From that? Came from that?

Director Comey: What they've been looking at, what they've been following.

Speaker 36: Did you just say the family can't, you can't assure people that it'll be wrapped up before the election?

Director Comey: No I said I can't answer that. I'm not going to answer questions like that.

Speaker 36: I think that seems just that it could last beyond the election.

Director Comey: No I'm not commenting is what I meant to say. You can squeeze any words you said on that one. I'm just not commenting.

All right everybody, we'll see you again in 9 months.

Russian government hackers penetrated DNC, stole opposition research on Trump By Ellen Nakashima June 14 at 11:30 AM

Russian government hackers penetrated the computer network of the Democratic National Committee and gained access to the entire database of opposition research on GOP presidential candidate Donald Trump, according to committee officials and security experts who responded to the breach.

The intruders so thoroughly compromised the DNC's system they also were able to read all e-mail and chat traffic, said DNC officials and the security experts.

The intrusion into the DNC was one of several targeting American political organizations. The networks of presidential candidates Hillary Clinton and Donald Trump were also targeted by Russian spies, as were the computers of some GOP political action committees, U.S. officials said. But details on those cases were not available.

A Russian Embassy spokesman said he had no knowledge of such intrusions.

Some of the hackers had access to the DNC network for about a year, but all were expelled over the past weekend in a major computer clean-up campaign, the committee officials and experts said.

The DNC said that no financial, donor or personal information appears to have been accessed or taken, suggesting that the breach was traditional espionage, not the work of criminal hackers.

The intrusions are an example of Russia's interest in the U.S. political system and its desire to understand the policies, strengths and weaknesses of a potential future president — much as American spies gather similar information on foreign candidates and leaders.

The depth of the penetration reflects the skill and determination of the United States' top cyber adversary as Russia goes after strategic targets from the White House and State Department to political campaign organizations.

“It's the job of every foreign intelligence service to collect intelligence against their adversaries,” said Shawn Henry, president of CrowdStrike, the cyber firm called in to handle the DNC breach and a former head of the FBI's cyber division. He noted that it is extremely difficult for a civilian organization to protect itself from a skilled and determined state such as Russia.

“We're perceived as an adversary of Russia,” he said. “Their job when they wake up every day is to gather intelligence against the policies, practices and strategies of the U.S. government. There are a variety of ways. [Hacking] is one of the more valuable because it gives you a treasure trove of information."

Russian President Vladimir Putin has spoken favorably about Trump who has called for better relations with Russia and expressed skepticism about NATO. But unlike Clinton, whom the Russians probably have long had in their spy sights, Trump has not been a politician for very long, so foreign agencies are playing catch-up, analysts say.

"The purpose of such intelligence gathering is to understand the target's proclivities," said Robert Deitz, former senior councillor to the CIA director and a former general counsel at the National Security Agency. "Trump's foreign investments, for example, would be relevant to understanding how he would deal with countries where he has those investments" should he be elected, Deitz said. "They may provide tips for understanding his style of negotiating. In short, this sort of intelligence could be used by Russia, for example, to indicate where it can get away with foreign adventurism."

Other analysts noted that any dirt dug up in opposition research is likely to be made public anyway. Nonetheless, DNC leadership acted quickly after the intrusion's discovery to contain the damage.

"The security of our system is critical to our operation and to the confidence of the campaigns and state parties we work with," said Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz (D-Fla.), the DNC chairwoman. "When we discovered the intrusion, we treated this like the serious incident it is and reached out to CrowdStrike immediately. Our team moved as quickly as possible to kick out the intruders and secure our network."

The Clinton campaign did not immediately respond to a request for comment. A spokeswoman for the Trump campaign referred questions to the Secret Service.

DNC leaders were tipped to the hack in late April. Chief executive officer Amy Dacey got a call from her operations chief saying that their information technology team had noticed some unusual network activity.

"It's never a call any executive wants to get, but the IT team knew something was awry," Dacey said. And they knew it was serious enough that they wanted experts to investigate.

That evening, she spoke with Michael Sussmann, a DNC lawyer who is a partner with Perkins Coie in Washington. Soon after, Sussmann, a former federal prosecutor who handled computer crime cases, called Henry, whom he has known for many years.

Within 24 hours, CrowdStrike had installed software on the DNC's computers so that it could analyze audit data that could indicate who had gained access, when and how.

The firm identified two separate hacker groups, both working for the Russian government, that had infiltrated the network, said Dmitri Alperovitch, CrowdStrike co-founder and chief technology officer. The firm had analyzed other breaches by both groups over the last two years.

One group, which CrowdStrike had dubbed Cozy Bear, had gained access last summer and was monitoring the DNC's email and chat communications, Alperovitch said.

The other, which the firm had named Fancy Bear, broke into the network in late April and targeted the opposition research files. It was this breach that set off the alarm. The hackers stole two files, Henry said. And they had access to the computers of the entire research staff — an average of about several dozen on any given day.

The computers contained research going back years on Trump. “It's a huge job” to dig into the dealings of somebody who has never run for office before, Dacey said.

CrowdStrike is not sure how the hackers got in. The firm suspects they may have targeted DNC employees with “spearphishing” emails. These are communications that appear legitimate — often made to look like they came from a colleague or someone trusted — but that contain links or attachments that when clicked on deploy malicious software that enables a hacker to gain access to a computer. “But we don't have hard evidence,” Alperovitch said.

The two groups did not appear to be working together, Alperovitch said. Fancy Bear is believed to work for the GRU, or Russia's military intelligence service, he said. CrowdStrike is less sure of whom Cozy Bear works for but thinks it might be the Federal Security Service or FSB, the country's powerful security agency, which was once headed by Putin.

The lack of coordination is not unusual, he said. “There's an amazing adversarial relationship” among the Russian intelligence agencies, Alperovitch said. “We have seen them steal assets from one another, refuse to collaborate. They're all vying for power, to sell Putin on how good they are.”

The two crews have “superb operational tradecraft,” he said. They often use previously unknown software bugs — known as “zero-day” vulnerabilities — to compromise applications. In the DNC's case, the hackers constantly switched tactics to maintain a stealthy presence inside the network and used built-in Windows tools so that they didn't have to resort to malicious code that might trigger alerts. “They flew under the radar,” Alperovitch said.

The two groups have hacked government agencies, tech companies, defense contractors, energy and manufacturing firms, and universities in the United States, Canada and Europe as well as in Asia, he said.

Cozy Bear, for instance, compromised the unclassified email systems of the White House, State Department and Joint Chiefs of Staff in 2014, Alperovitch said.

“This is a sophisticated foreign intelligence service with a lot of time, a lot of resources, and is interested in targeting the U.S. political system,” Henry said. He said the DNC was not engaged in a fair fight. “You've got ordinary citizens who are doing hand-to-hand combat with trained military officers,” he said. “And that's an untenable situation.”

Russia has always been a formidable foe in cyberspace, but in the last two years “there's been a thousand-fold increase in its espionage campaign against the West,” said Alperovitch, who is also a senior fellow at the Atlantic Council. “They feel under siege.”

Western sanctions, imposed after Russia's annexation of Crimea in Ukraine, have hurt the economy and led the government to increase its theft of intellectual property to limit the impact of import restrictions, he said. And Russia's growing isolation has increased the need for intelligence to understand and influence political decisions in other countries, he added.

CrowdStrike is continuing the forensic investigation, DNC lawyer Sussmann said. “But at this time, it appears that no financial information or sensitive employee, donor or voter information was accessed by the Russian attackers,” he said.

The firm has installed special software on every computer and server in the network to detect any efforts by the Russian cyber spies to break in again. “When they get kicked out of the system,” Henry predicted, “they're going to try to come back in.”

Are you guys on this? I can confirm that the Director was not with the DHS Sec and TSA Administrator.

Fox News (7/16, 10.55M) reports, "Homeland Security Secretary Jeh Johnson inspected the main venue, the Quicken Loans Arena, with FBI Director James Comey and Transportation Security Administrator Peter Neffenger, walking through aisles and looking over the main stage on which Donald Trump is expected to accept the GOP's presidential nomination."

All,

OPA is in contact with SL about proposed answers, in particular to those questions with a national nexus.

We will have refined talkers later tonight that can be shared with D in advance of his prep session at the office tomorrow.

Rich

Jim Salter (Associated Press)

1. Emails were hacked from the Democratic National Committee and Hillary Clinton's campaign has suggested that Russian hackers were to blame. Some have taken that a step further to say that Vladimir Putin is trying to help Donald Trump get elected. Is the FBI willing to publicly blame Russia?

2. At the GOP convention last week, Donald Trump made safety and security a top priority. Is there anything the FBI and the federal government can do to make Americans more secure, and to address the rash of violence?

3. Police have been under attack in recent weeks. What can be done to better protect police? Is there a need to revise best practices for officers to avoid being ambushed? What are some thoughts about changes police can make immediately (working in pairs, mandatory body armor, limiting protest sites, etc.)?

Andy Banker (Local FOX) wants to ask about progress on things since Director Comey spoke with St. Louis reporters 2 years ago:

1. People from US, including St. Louis area, traveling to become trained and radicalized -- to bring terror back home.

2. Also, any concerns about Syrian refugees and level of confidence in our ability to flag potential terrorists who may be using refugee status as "cover".

3. I think we've looked at terrorist as ISIS only -- Dallas & Baton Rouge have reminded us there's more to worry about; is there any way to stop these attacks -- the Baton Rouge killer left quite a social media trail prior to his shooting spree.

4. Also, worldwide targets seem to be on a smaller scale: Nice, Munich. What does that say to people in St. Louis?

5. Any regrets on Clinton case? How does he respond to critics in Missouri and elsewhere that if it John or Suzy Q public involved in something like this -- they would have been indicted? In other words, Clinton wasn't indicted because she was a major party's nominee for president. Is he at all comfortable with how this all looked: her husband meeting Attorney General on an airport tarmac a few days before her interview with investigators -- the timing of the interview (on the 4th of July weekend) -- and then his announcement just a couple of days later?

Mike Bush (Local NBC)

1. It seems there is a mass shooting or a mass casualty event either here or abroad every week. Those are the ones that happen, but how many are stopped before they happen?

2. How have things changed over the last few years. Is it more difficult to stop these events. Are terrorists getting smarter?

3. We see these police shootings on home video and that leads to protests, here in St. Louis and around the country. In your opinion, do we have a use of force problem in this country?

4. It's highly unusual for the FBI to make public their findings when investigators have decided no charges should be brought but that's what you did in the Hillary Clinton email scandal. You were criticized for doing it in some circles. Why did you think it was appropriate?

5. GOP Lawmakers said the "Average Joe" would have been led off in handcuffs had they done what Hillary Clinton had done. To that you say?

6. Donald Trump has said that he will be the law and order President and he alone can fix our problems. I'm just curious as someone whose job is law and order, how you react to that?

Rachel Lippmann (Local NPR radio)

1. The federal government has partnered with a number of cities, including St. Louis, to help charge individuals in federal rather than state court. Given that violent crime is up in many cities, including those partnering with the FBI, can this be considered a success? Why?

Obama puts FBI in charge of responding to cyber attacks

Gregory Korte, USA TODAY 4:07 p.m. EDT July 26, 2016

A presidential directive signed by President Obama Tuesday will put the FBI in charge of responding to all cyber threats and give the federal government a more active role in investigating, preventing and mitigating attempts to hack into U.S.-based computer networks.

Obama's homeland security adviser, Lisa Monaco, said the change was necessary because it's not always clear whether those responsible for a hacking incident are other countries, terrorists or criminals.

"This directive establishes a clear framework to coordinate the government's response to such incidents," Monaco told a cybersecurity conference at Fordham University in New York Tuesday. "It spells out which federal agencies are responsible. And it will help answer a question heard too often from corporations and citizens alike — 'In the wake of an attack, who do I call for help?'"

While in the works for months, the directive comes just days after the transparency organization Wikileaks revealed 20,000 e-mails stolen from the Democratic National Committee. Security experts suspect Russia was behind that attack, which roiled the Democratic National Convention by showing that the national party actively conspired to hurt Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders' presidential campaign. That, in turn, led to the resignation of DNC chairwoman Debbie Wasserman Schultz on the eve of the convention to nominate former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton for president.

Two other agencies will also have significant roles in helping to prevent and mitigate the effect of cyber intrusions: The Department of Homeland Security and the Cyber Threat Intelligence Integration Center, a multi-agency coordinating body in the intelligence community.

"We're harnessing all elements of national power, just as we do in dealing with other threats, like terrorism," Monaco said. "No tool is off the table."

The order will also attempt to define for the first time what constitutes a "significant cyber incident" triggering a federal response. It's an incident "likely to result in demonstrable harm to the national security interests, foreign relations, or economy of the United States or to the public confidence, civil liberties, or public health and safety of the American people."

Obama issued the guidance through a presidential policy directive, a form of executive order used in national security matters and usually kept secret. In fact, the issuance of the directive, numbered PPD-41, implicitly acknowledged the existence of 10 secret orders issued by Obama in the past year. The last known directive was PPD-31, which made changes in hostage policy in June 2015. Twenty-nine of Obama's 41 presidential policy directives remain classified.

By way of update for the Director's speech tomorrow, neither Jim Trainor nor Lisa Monaco addressed the DNC hack, save to confirm that FBI is investigating. Monaco named FBI in particular as lead responder in significant intrusion impacting national security, per PPD, as expected.

Much discussion on the impact of DNC hack during final panel today with Ted Koppel and Keith Alexander. Lots of media present and all focused on hack. All assume it is Russia and want to know what can be done about it.

There are index cards by each seat for questions for the Director so that seems to be the plan, as opposed to the free-for-all from today. Questions to be moderated by Father McShane and ADIC Rodriguez.

Cy Vance spoke about impact of encryption on state and locals, per his report of earlier this year. Proposed following solution: Tech companies should keep operating systems encrypted but still be able to answer lawful search warrants issued by neutral judges, as they did before September 2014. No back door for law enforcement. Only ability to respond.

Let me know if you need anything from me.

Director: In anticipation of your 9/27 and 9/28 hearings, attached is the transcript of your 7/7 testimony before House Government Reform. The 2nd doc (labeled "Overlapping Members") contains the portions of the transcript dealing with members who were present at the 7/7 hearing and are also members of House Judiciary (Chaffetz is a member of HJC but not included in this doc because he speaks throughout).

Your member and issue books for these hearings will be ready the week of 9/12.

House Oversight and Government Reform Committee - Hearing

CHAFFETZ: The Committee on Oversight and Government Reform will come to order.

Without objection, the chair is authorized to declare a recess at any time.

I want to thank Director Comey for being here, and doing so on short notice.CHAFFETZ: My -- I have the greatest admiration for the FBI. My grandfather was a career FBI agent.

I'd say I'm here because we're mystified and confused by the fact pattern that you laid out and the conclusions that you reached.

It seems that there are two standards. And there's no consequence for these types of activities and dealing in a careless way with classified information. It seems to a lot of us that the average Joe, the average American, that if they had done what you laid out in your statement, that they'd be in handcuffs and they might be on their way to jail and they probably should.

And I think there is a legitimate concern that there is a double standard. If your name isn't Clinton or you're not part of the powerful elite, that Lady Justice will act differently. It's a concern that Lady Justice will take off that blindfold and come to a different conclusion.

Hillary Clinton created this mess. Wasn't Republicans. It wasn't anybody else. She made a very conscious decision. On the very day that she started her Senate confirmation, she set up and got a domain name. And set up a system to avoid and bypass the safety, security, and the protocol of the State Department.

Classified information is classified for a reason. It's classified because if it were to get out into the public, there are nefarious actors, nation states, others that want to do harm to this country. And there are people who put their lives on the line protecting and serving our country. When those communications are not secure, it puts their lives in jeopardy.

This classified information is entrusted to very few, but there is such a duty and an obligation to protect that, to fall on your sword to protect that. And yet, there's -- there doesn't seem to be any consequence.

I was talking to Trey Gowdy and he made a really good point with us yesterday. Mr. Gowdy said, you know, in your statement, Mr. Director, you mentioned that there was no precedent for this. But we believe that you have set a precedent and it's a dangerous one.

The precedent is if you sloppily deal with classified information, if you're cavalier about it -- and it wasn't just a innocent mistake, this went on for years -- that there's going to be no consequence. We -- we're a different nation in the United States of America. We are self-critical. Most nations would never do this. But we do it in the spirit of making ourselves better. There will be all kinds of accusations about political this and political that.

I -- I have defended your integrity, every step of the way. You are the definitive voice. I stand by that. But I am mystified and I am confused because you listen to your fact pattern and come to the conclusion that there is no consequence, I don't know how to explain that.

We'll have constituents ask us, they'll get mad, they're -- you know, they're frustrated. They've seen this happen time and time again. I don't know how to explain it. And I hope that it -- through this hearing, we can stick to the facts and understand this because there does seem to be two standards, there does seem to be no consequence, and I want to understand that. And I want to be able to explain it to the person that's sitting at home. And that's where we're here.

And so I yield back. I now recognize the ranking member, Mr. Cummings.

CUMMINGS: Director Comey, thank you for being here today.

I want to begin by commending you and the public servants at the FBI for the independent investigation you conducted. You had a thankless task. No matter what recommendation you made, you were sure to be criticized.

There's no question that you were extremely thorough. In fact, some may even say you went too far in your investigation. But of course, that was your job. That is your job.

Secretary Clinton has acknowledged that she made a mistake in using a personal e-mail account. You explained on Tuesday that she and her colleagues at the State Department were extremely careless with their e-mails. But after conducting this exhaustive review, you determined that no reasonable prosecutor would bring a case based on this evidence. And you and the career staff recommended against prosecution.

Based on the previous cases you examined, if prosecutors had gone forward, they would have been holding the secretary to a different standard from everyone else. Amazingly, amazingly, some Republicans who were praising you just days ago for your independence, for your integrity, and your honesty, instantly turned against you because your recommendation conflicted with the predetermined outcome they wanted.

In their eyes, you had one job, and one job only: to prosecute Hillary Clinton. But you refused to do so. So now you are being summoned here to answer for your alleged transgressions. And in a sense, Mr. Director, you're on trial. Contrary to the claims of your critics, there is absolutely no evidence that you made your recommendation for political reasons; no evidence that you were bribed or coerced or influenced; no evidence that you came to your conclusion based upon anything but the facts and the law.

I firmly believe that your decision was not based on convenience, but on conviction. Today, House Republicans are doing what they always do, using taxpayers' money to continue investigating claims that have already been debunked just to keep them in the headlines one more day. When they hear a political siren, they rush towards it over and over again, even if the evidence is not there.

Exhibit A. Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy, who admitted on national television that Republicans established the Benghazi Select Committee to bring down Secretary Clinton's poll numbers. I didn't say that. McCarthy said it. The fact was confirmed by a Republican staffer on that committee who reported that he was fired in part for not going along with the hyper-focus on Secretary Clinton.

I give House Republicans credit. They certainly are not shy about what they are doing. They've turned political investigations into an art form. If our concerns here today are with the proper treatment of classified information, then we should start with a review of our previous hearing on General David Petraeus, who pled guilty last year to intentionally and knowingly compromising highly classified information.

The problem is, Mr. Director, we never had that hearing. This committee ignored that breach of national security because it did not match the political goals of House Republicans. If our concerns today were with finally addressing a broken classification system in which security levels are arbitrarily changed up and down, that would have been a legitimate goal. That would have been a valuable addition to reforming and improving our government. After all, we are the Government Reform Committee.

We could have held hearings here on Zika -- the Zika virus, preventing gun massacres like the one in Orlando, or a host of other topics that could actually save people's lives. But that's not why we're here. That is not why our chairman called this emergency hearing 48 hours after you made your recommendation.

Everyone knows what this committee is doing. Honestly, I would not be surprised and I say this with all seriousness, I would not be surprised if tomorrow Republicans set up a new committee to spend $7 million-plus on why the FBI failed to prosecute Hillary Clinton.

Director Comey, let me conclude with this request. Even with all that I have said, I believe that there is a critical role for you today. I've listened carefully to the coverage on this issue. And I've heard people say as recently as this morning, three hours ago, that they were mystified by your decision. As a matter of fact, the chairman repeated it a minute ago.

So there is a perceived gap between the things you said on Tuesday and your recommendation. There's a gap, Mr. Director. So in this moment, and this is a critical moment, I beg you to fill the gap. Because when the gap is not filled by you, it will be filled by others. Share with us, the American people, your process and your thinking. Explain how you examine the evidence, the law, and the precedent. Describe in clear terms how you and your team career professionals arrived at this decision.

If you can do that today, if you can do that, that could go a long way towards people understanding your decision.

Finally, I want to make it clear that I condemn these completely unwarranted political attacks against you. They have attacked you personally. They have attacked your integrity. They have impugned your professionalism. And they have even suggested that you were somehow bought and paid for because you made your recommendation based upon the law and the facts.

I know you're used to working in a world of politics, but these attacks have been beyond the pale.

So, you do not deserve this. Your family does not deserve it. And the highly skilled and dedicated agents of the FBI do not deserve it. I honor your professionalism and your service to our country. And again, even if it takes until hell freezes over, I beg you to close the gap. Tell us what happened between what you found and your decision so that not only the members of this panel and this Congress will understand, but so that Americans will understand.

And if you do that, if you do that, then it will be all worth it today.

With that, I yield back.

CHAFFETZ: I think -- hold on one second. With -- with your indulgence, to the ranking member, for which I have the greatest respect, you asked for a hearing on General Petraeus and how that was dealt with. You got it. We will have one in this oversight committee and the record will reflect that in the Judiciary Committee, I repeatedly questioned Attorney General Holder. I repeatedly questioned the FBI director about the disposition of that case, probably more than any member in the House or Senate. And if you want a hearing, we'll do that.

CUMMINGS: Does the gentleman yield?

CHAFFETZ: Yes.

CUMMINGS: Thank you.

CHAFFETZ: Number two, you complained that we haven't done a hearing on Zika. The Oversight and Government Reform Committee I believe was the very first committee to actually do a hearing on Zika that was chaired by Mr. Mica. And I'm proud of the fact that we did a Zika hearing and we did it first.

CUMMINGS: Does the gentleman yield?

CHAFFETZ: Sure.

CUMMINGS: Can we have another one? Because the problem is still there.

CHAFFETZ: Absolutely.

CUMMINGS: Big time. Thank you.

CHAFFETZ: Absolutely, absolutely.

MICA: Mr. Chairman, I just -- a unanimous consent request that we put the date of the hearing in the record at this time that I chaired, thank you, on Zika.

CHAFFETZ: Absolutely. And the ranking member knows that we have held multiple hearings on the criminal justice -- on criminal justice reform. You asked for it. You're passionate about it. And we did do that as well. So to suggest we haven't addressed some of those issues I think is inaccurate.

CUMMINGS: I don't think I did that, Mr. Chairman. But again, as late as yesterday with the problem in Minnesota, with an African American man being killed, I'd like to have some hearings still on the criminal justice system. Thank you.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the gentleman, without objection.

I'm going to work with you on that, as I have every step of the way.

CUMMINGS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.CHAFFETZ: Without objection, the chair is authorized to declare a recess at any time.

We'll hold the record open for five legislative days for any members who would like to submit a written statement.

We'll now recognize our distinguished witness for our first panel.

I am pleased to welcome the Honorable James Comey, the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigations. We welcome Director Comey, and thank him for being here.

Pursuant to committee rules, all witnesses are to be sworn before they testify. If you'll please rise and raise your right hand. Do you solemnly swear or affirm that the testimony you're about to give is the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth?

Thank you.

Let the record reflect that the witness answered in the affirmative.

Mr. Comey, the floor is yours. You can take as long or as short as you'd like. If you have a written statement that you would like to submit afterwards, we're happy to do that as well. It will be made part of the record. The time is now yours. Director Comey, you're recognized.

COMEY: Thank you Mr. Chairman, Mr. Cummings, members of the Committee.

I am proud to be here today representing the people of the FBI who did this investigation as they do all their work in a competent, honest, and independent way. I believe this investigation was conducted consistent with the highest traditions of the FBI. Our folks did it in an apolitical and professional way, including our recommendation as to the appropriate resolution of this case.

As I said in my statement on Tuesday, I expected there would be significant public debate about this recommendation. And I'm a big fan of transparency, so I welcome the conversation we're going to have here today. And I do think a whole lot of folks have questions about, "so why did we reach the conclusion we did and what was our thinking?" I hope to get an opportunity to address that and explain it. People can disagree, can agree, but they will at least understand that the decision was made and the recommendation was made the way you would want it to be, by people who didn't give a hoot about politics, who cared about what are the facts, what is the law, and how similar people, all people have been treated in the past.

Maybe I can say a few words at the beginning that would help frame how we think about this. There are two things that matter in a criminal investigation of a subject. What did the person do, and when they did that thing, what were they thinking? When you look at the hundred years plus of the Justice Department's investigation and prosecution of the mishandling of classified information, those two questions are present. What did the person do? Did they mishandle classified information? And when they did it, did they know they were doing something that was unlawful.? That has been the characteristic of every charged criminal case involving the mishandling of classified information.

I'm happy to go through the classifications in particular. In our system of law, there's a thing called mens rea. It's important to know what you did and when you did it. This Latin phrase "mens rea" means, "What were you thinking?"

We don't want to put people in jail unless we prove that they knew they were doing something they shouldn't do. That is the characteristic of all the prosecutions involving mishandling of classified information.

There was a statute passed in 1917 that on its face makes it a crime, a felony for someone to engage in gross negligence. So that would appear to say, well, maybe in that circumstance you don't need to prove they were doing something unlawful, maybe it's enough to prove they were really, really careless beyond a reasonable doubt. At the time Congress passed that statute in 1917, there was a lot of concern in the House and Senate about whether that was going to violate the American tradition of requiring that before you go and lock somebody up, you proved they knew they were doing something wrong. So there was a lot of concern about it.

The statute was passed. As best I can tell, the Department of Justice has used it once in the 99 years since reflecting that same concern. I know from 30 years with the Department of Justice, they have grave concerns about whether it's appropriate to prosecute somebody for gross negligence, which is why they've done it once that I know of in a case involving espionage.

When I look at the facts we gather here, as I said, I see evidence of great carelessness, but I do not see evidence that is sufficient to establish that Secretary Clinton or those with whom she was corresponding, both talked about classified information on e-mail and knew when they did it, they were doing something that was against the law. So given that assessment of the facts, my understanding of the law, my conclusion was and remains, no reasonable prosecutor would bring this case. No reasonable prosecutor would bring the second case in 100 years focused on gross negligence. I know that's been a source of some confusion for folks, that's just the way it is. I know the Department of Justice, I know no reasonable prosecutor would bring in the case. I know a lot of my former friends are out there saying, they would. I wonder where they were in the last 40 years because I'd like to see the cases they brought on gross negligence. Nobody would. Nobody did.

So judgment was, the appropriate resolution of this case was, not with a criminal prosecution. As I said, folks can disagree with that. I hope that they know that, that view, not just my view but of my team, was honestly held, fairly investigated, and communicated with unusual transparency because we know folks care about it.

So I look forward to this conversation. I look forward to answering as many questions as I possibly can. I'll stay as long as you need me to stay because I believe transparency matters tremendously. I thank you for the opportunity.

CHAFFETZ: Thank you, director. I'm going to recognize myself here.

Physically where were Hillary Clinton's servers?

COMEY: The operational server was in the basement of her home in New York. The reason I'm answering it that way, is that sometimes after they were decommissioned they were moved to other facilitates -- storage facilities, but the live device was always in the basement.

CHAFFETZ: Was that an authorized or unauthorized location?

COMEY: It was an unauthorized location for the transmitting of classified information.

CHAFFETZ: Is it reasonable or unreasonable to expect Hillary Clinton would receive and send classified information?

COMEY: As Secretary of State, reasonable that the Secretary of State would encounter classified information in the course of the Secretary's work.

CHAFFETZ: Via e-mail?

COMEY: Sure, depending upon the nature of the system. To communicate classified information, it would have to be a classified rated e-mail system.

CHAFFETZ: But you did find more than 100 e-mails that were classified that had gone through that server correct?

COMEY: Through an unclassified server correct.

CHAFFETZ: Yes. So Hillary Clinton did come to possess documents and materials that contained classified information via e-mail on these unsecured servers is that correct?

COMEY: That is correct. CHAFFETZ: Did Hillary Clinton lie?

COMEY: To the FBI? We have no basis to conclude she lied to the FBI.

CHAFFETZ: Did she lie to the public?

COMEY: That's a question I'm not qualified to answer. I can speak about what she said to the FBI.

CHAFFETZ: Did she -- did Hillary Clinton lie under oath?

COMEY: To the -- not to the FBI. Not in a case we're working.

CHAFFETZ: Did you review the documents where Congressman Jim Jordan asked her specifically and she said, quote, "there was nothing marked classified on my e-mails either sent or received," end quote?

COMEY: I don't remember reviewing that particular testimony, I'm aware of that being said, though.

CHAFFETZ: Did the FBI investigate her statements under oath on this topic?

COMEY: Not to my knowledge. I don't think there's been a referral from Congress.

CHAFFETZ: Do you need a referral from Congress to investigate her -- her statements under oath?

COMEY: Sure do.

CHAFFETZ: You'll have one. You'll have one in the next few hours. Did Hillary Clinton break the law?

COMEY: In connection with her use of the e-mail server, my judgment is that she did not.

CHAFFETZ: Are you just not able to prosecute it or did Hillary Clinton break the law?

COMEY: Both. I don't want to give an overly lawyerly answer. The question I always look at is, is there evidence that would establish beyond a reasonable doubt that somebody engaged in conduct that violated a criminal statute. And my judgment here there is not.

CHAFFETZ: The FBI does background checks. If Hillary Clinton applied for the job at the FBI, would the FBI give Hillary Clinton a security clearance?

COMEY: I don't want to answer a hypothetical.

The FBI has a robust process in which we adjudicate the suitability of people for employment in the bureau. CHAFFETZ: Given the fact pattern you laid out less than 40 hours ago, would that person who had dealt with classified information like that, would that person be granted a security clearance at the FBI?

COMEY: It would be a very important consideration and a suitability determination.

CHAFFETZ: You're kind of making my point, Director. The point being because I injected the word "Hillary Clinton," you gave me a different answer.

If I came up to you and said that this person was extremely careless with classified with classified information, the exposure to hostile actors, had used despite a warning -- created unnecessary burdens and exposure, if they said they had one device and you found out they had multiple devices, if there had been e-mail chains with somebody like Jake Sullivan asking for classification changes; you're telling me that the FBI would grant a security clearance to that person?

COMEY: I hope I'm giving a consistent -- I'm not saying what the answer would be.

I'm saying that would be an important consideration in a suitability determination for anybody.CHAFFETZ: It's -- personally, I think that sounds like a bit of a political answer, because I can't imagine that the FBI would grant a security clearance to somebody with that pattern. Do you agree or disagree with that?

COMEY: I say what I said before, again, it's very hard to answer a hypothetical. I will repeat it: It would be a very important consideration in a suitability determination.

CHAFFETZ: Did Hillary Clinton do anything wrong?

COMEY: What do you mean by wrong?

CHAFFETZ: I think it's self-evident.

COMEY: Well, I'm lawyer, I'm an investigator and I'm -- hope, a normal human being.

CHAFFETZ: Do you really believe there should be no consequence for Hillary Clinton and how she dealt with this?

COMEY: Well I didn't say, I hope folks remember what I said on Tuesday. I didn't say there's no consequence for someone who violates the rules regarding the handling of classified information. There are often very severe consequences in the FBI involving their employment, involving their pay, involving their clearances.

That's what I said on Tuesday. I hope folks walk away understanding that just because someone's not prosecuted for mishandling classified information, that doesn't mean, if you work in the FBI, there aren't consequences for it.

CHAFFETZ: So if Hillary Clinton or if anybody had worked at the FBI under this fact pattern, what would you do to that person?

COMEY: There would be a security review and an adjudication of their suitability and a range of discipline could be imposed from termination to reprimand and in between, suspensions, loss of clearance.

So you could be walked out or you could -- depending upon the nature of the facts -- you could be reprimanded. But there is a robust process to handle that.

CHAFFETZ: I've gone past my time. I yield back. I now recognize the ranking member Mr. Cummings.
CUMMINGS: Thank you very much. Director Comey, and I want to thank you very much for being here today, especially on such short notice. You and your staff should be commended for the thorough and dedicated review you conducted.

Unfortunately, some of my colleagues are now attacking you personally because your final recommendation conflicted with their preconceived political outcome in this case.

Some have tried to argue that this case is far worse than the case of General David Petraeus, who was convicted in 2015 of knowingly and intentionally compromising highly classified information.

In fact, one very vocal politician we all know said this, and I quote, "If she isn't indicted, the only reason is because the Democrats are protecting her. She is being protected 100 percent, because you look at General Petraeus, you look at all the other people that did a fraction of what she did, but she has much worse judgment than he had and she's getting away with it and it's unfair to him," end of quote.

Director Comey, you were the director of the FBI when General Petraeus pled guilty. Is that right?

COMEY: Yes.

CUMMINGS: If I understand that case correctly, General Petraeus kept highly classified information in eight personal notebooks at his private residence. Is that correct?

COMEY: That is correct.

CUMMINGS: According to the filings on that case, his notebook included the identities of covert officers. He also included war strategy, intelligence capabilities, diplomatic discussions, quotes and (inaudible) discussions from high level national security council meetings and discussions with the president.

General Petraeus shared his information with his lover and then biographer. He was caught on audio tape telling her, and I quote, "I mean, they are highly classified, some of them. They don't have it -- it on -- on it, but I mean, there's code word stuff in there," end of quote.

Director Comey, what did General Petraeus mean when he said he intentionally shared, quote, "code word" information with her? What does that mean?

COMEY: The Petraeus case, to my mind, illustrates perfectly the kind of cases the Department of Justice is willing to prosecute. Even there, they prosecuted him for a misdemeanor.

In that case, you had vast quantities of highly classified information, including special sensitive compartmented information. That's the reference to code words. Vast quantity of it. Not only shared with someone without authority to have it, but we found it in a search warrant hidden under the insulation in his attic and then he lied to us about it during the investigation.

So you have obstruction of justice, you have intentional misconduct and a vast quantity of information. He admitted he knew that was the wrong thing to do. That is a perfect illustration of the kind of cases that get prosecuted. In my mind, it illustrates importantly the distinction to this case.

CUMMINGS: And General Petraeus did not admit to these facts when the FBI investigators first interviewed him, did he?

COMEY: No, he lied about it.

CUMMINGS: But he did admit to these facts in a plea agreement. Is that correct?

COMEY: Yes.

CUMMINGS: Here's what the department filing said about General Petraeus, and I quote. "The acts taken by defendant David Howell Petraeus were in all respects knowing and deliberate and were not committed by mistake, accident or other innocent reason," end of quote.

Is that an accurate summary, in your view, Director Comey?

COMEY: Yes, it actually leaves out an important part of the case, which is the obstruction of justice.

CUMMINGS: Was he -- was he charged with obstruction of justice?

COMEY: No.

CUMMINGS: And why not?

COMEY: A decision made by the leadership of the Department of Justice not to insist upon a plea to that felony.

CUMMINGS: So the question is, do you agree with the claim that General Petraeus, and I quote, "got in trouble for far less," end of quote? Do you agree with that statement?

COMEY: No, it's the reverse.

CUMMINGS: And what do you mean by that?

COMEY: His conduct, to me, illustrates the categories of behavior that mark the prosecutions that are actually brought. Clearly intentional conduct, knew what he was doing was a violation of the law, huge amounts of information that even if you couldn't prove he knew it, it raises the inference that he did it, an effort to obstruct justice. That combination of things makes it worthy of a prosecution. A misdemeanor prosecution, but a prosecution nonetheless.

CUMMINGS: Sitting here today, do you stand by the FBI's recommendation to prosecute General Petraeus? COMEY: Oh, yeah.

CUMMINGS: Do you stand by the FBI's recommendation not to prosecute Hillary Clinton?

COMEY: Oh -- yes.

CUMMINGS: Director Comey, how many times have you testified before Congress about the General Petraeus case? Do you know?

COMEY: I don't think I've ever testified -- I don't think I've testified about it at all. I don't think so.

CUMMINGS: With that, I'll yield back.

CHAFFETZ: I have to check the record, but I believe I asked you a question about it at the time. But maybe not.

COMEY: You could have. That's why I was squinching my face. It could have been a Judiciary Committee hearing I was asked about it.

CHAFFETZ: Yeah. We'll now recognize the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. Gowdy, for five minutes.

GOWDY: Good morning, Director Comey. Secretary Clinton said she never sent or received any classified information over her private e- mail. Was that true?

COMEY: Our investigation found that there was classified information sent...

GOWDY: So it was not true?

COMEY: That's what I said.

GOWDY: OK. Well, I'm looking for a little shorter answer so you and I are not here quite as long. Secretary Clinton said there was nothing marked classified on her e-mails, either sent or received. Was that true?

COMEY: That's not true. There were a small number of portion markings on, I think, three of the documents.

GOWDY: Secretary Clinton said, I did not e-mail any classified material to anyone on my e-mail, there is no classified material. Was that true?

COMEY: There was classified material e-mailed.

GOWDY: Secretary Clinton said she used just one device. Was that true?

COMEY: She used multiple devices during the four years of her term as secretary of state.

GOWDY: Secretary Clinton said all work-related e-mails were returned to the State Department. Was that true?

COMEY: No. We found work-related e-mails, thousands that were not returned.

GOWDY: Secretary Clinton said neither she nor anyone else deleted work related e-mails from her personal account. Was that true?

COMEY: That's a harder one to answer. We found traces of work- related e-mails in -- on devices or in slack space. Whether they were deleted or whether when the server was changed out something happened to them. There's no doubt that the work-related e-mails that were removed electronically from the e-mail system.

GOWDY: Secretary Clinton said her lawyers read every one of the e-mails and were overly inclusive. Did her lawyers read the e-mail content individually?

COMEY: No.

GOWDY: Well in the interest of time, and because I have a plane to catch tomorrow afternoon, I'm not going to go through anymore of the false statements. But I am going to ask you to put on your old hat. False exculpatory statements, they are used for what?

COMEY: Either for the -- a substantive prosecution or for evidence of intent in a criminal prosecution.

GOWDY: Exactly. Intent and consciousness of guilt, right? Is that right?

COMEY: Right.

GOWDY: Consciousness of guilt and intent. In your old job, you would prove intent, as you just referenced, by showing the jury evidence of a complex scheme that was designed for the very purpose of concealing the public record and you would be arguing in addition to concealment the destruction that you and I just talked about or certainly the failure to preserve.

You would argue all of that under the heading of content (ph) -- intent. You would also be arguing the pervasiveness of the scheme, when it started, when it ended and the number of e-mails, whether they were originally classified or up-classified.

You would argue all of that under the heading of intent. You would also, probably, under common scheme or plan, argue the burn bags of daily calendar entries or the missing daily calendar entries as a common scheme or plan to conceal.GOWDY: Two days ago, Director, you said, "A reasonable person in her position should have known a private e-mail was no place to send and receive classified information." You're right. An average person does know not to do that.

This is no average person. This is a former first lady, a former United States senator, and a former secretary of state that the president now contends is the most competent, qualified person to be president since Jefferson. He didn't say that in '08, but he says is now.

She affirmatively rejected efforts to give her a state.gov account. She kept these private e-mails for almost two years, and only turned them over to Congress because we found out she had a private e-mail account.

So you have a rogue e-mail system set up before she took the oath of office, thousands of what we now know to be classified e-mails, some of which were classified at the time. One of her more frequent e-mail comrades was in fact hacked, and you don't know whether or not she was. And this scheme took place over a long period of time and it resulted in the destruction of public records.

And yet you say there is insufficient evidence of intent. You say she was extremely careless, but not intentionally so. You and I both know intent is really difficult to prove. Very rarely do defendants announced "on this date, I intend to break this criminal code section; just to put everyone on notice, I am going to break the law on this date." It never happens that way.

You have to do it with circumstantial evidence. Or if you're Congress and you realize how difficult it is to prove specific intent, you will formulate a statute that allows for gross negligence.

My time is out, but this is really important. You mentioned there's no precedent for criminal prosecution. My fear is there still isn't. There's nothing to keep a future secretary of state or president from this exact same e-mail scheme, or their staff.

And my real fear is this -- it's what the chairman touched upon, this double-track justice system that is rightly or wrongly perceived in this country, that if you are a private in the Army and you e-mail yourself classified information, you will be kicked out. But if you are Hillary Clinton and you seek a promotion to commander in chief, you will not be. So what I hope you can do today is help the average -- the reasonable person you made reference to, the reasonable person understand why she appears to be treated differently than the rest of us would be.

With that, I would yield back.

CHAFFETZ: I will now recognize the gentlewoman from New York, Ms. Maloney.

MALONEY: Director, thank you for your years of public service. You have distinguished yourself as the assistant U.S. attorney for both the Southern District of New York and the Eastern District of Virginia. That's why you were appointed by President Bush to be the deputy attorney general at the Department of Justice, and why President Obama appointed you as the director of the FBI in 2013.

Despite your impeccable reputation for independence and integrity, Republicans have turned on you with a vengeance immediately after you announced your recommendation not to pursue criminal charges against Secretary Clinton.

Let me give you some examples. Representative Turner said, and I quote, "The investigation by the FBI is steeped in political bias," end quote. Was your investigation steeped in political bias? Yes or no?

COMEY: No. It was steeped in no kind of bias.

MALONEY: Thank you.

The speaker of the House Paul Ryan was even more critical. He accused you of not applying the law equally. He said your recommendation shows, and I quote, "the Clintons are living above the law; they've being held to a different set of standards; that is clearly what this looks like," end quote.

How do you respond to his accusations that you held the Clintons to a different set of standards than anyone else? Did you hold them to a different standard or the same standard?

COMEY: It's just not -- it's just not accurate. We try very hard to apply the same standard whether you're rich or poor, white or black, old or young, famous or not known at all. I just hope folks will take the time to understand the other cases, because there's a lot of confusion out there about what the facts were of the other cases that I understand good people, reasonable people to have questions.

MALONEY: Senator Cruz also criticized you. He said that there are, and I quote, "serious concerns about the integrity of Director Comey's decision." He stated that you, quote, "you had rewritten a clearly worded federal criminal statute." Did you rewrite the law in any way or rewrite any statute?

COMEY: No. MALONEY: Now, I hesitate -- I truly hesitate to mention the next one. But Donald Trump took these conspiracy theories to a totally new level. He said, and I quote, "It was no accident that charges (inaudible) recommended against Hillary the exact same day as President Obama campaigned with her for the first time." So did you plan the timing of your announcement to help Secretary Clinton's campaign event on Tuesday?

COMEY: No. The timing was entirely my own. Nobody knew I was going to do it, including the press. I'm very proud of the way the FBI, nobody leaked that. We didn't coordinate it. Didn't tell. Just not a consideration.

MALONEY: Mr. Trump also claimed that Secretary Clinton bribed the attorney general with an extension of her job. And I guess this somehow affected your decision. I know it's a ridiculous question, but I have to ask it. Did you make your decision because of some kind of bribe to the attorney general?

COMEY: No.

MALONEY: I -- I tell you, are you surprised as I am by the intensity of the attacks from the GOP on you, after having made a decision, a thoughtful decision, an independent decision with the professional staff of the FBI?

COMEY: I'm not surprised by the intense interest and debate. I predicted it. I think it's important that we talk about these things. They inevitably become focused on individual people. That's OK. We'll just continue to have the conversation.

MALONEY: I believe that what we're seeing today is that if the GOP does not like the results of an investigation or how it turns out, and we saw they originally were lauding you. The minute you made your announcement, they're now attacking you -- the same people.

And now, I predict they'll be calling for more hearings, more investigations, all at the expense of the taxpayer. And they do this instead of working on what the American people really care about. They want Congress to focus on jobs, the environment, homeland security, the security of our nation, affordable childcare, affordable college educations, and an economy that works and helps all people.

I thank you for performing your job with distinction and the long history of your whole profession of integrity and independence. And thank you very much. My time is expired.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the gentlewoman.

We'll now recognize the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Jordan, for five minutes.

JORDAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Director, thank you for being with us. On Tuesday, you said, "any reasonable person in Secretary Clinton's position should have known that an unclassified system was no place for these conversations." You said on Tuesday, "some of her e-mails bore classified markings." And you also said on Tuesday there were potential violations of the appropriate statutes.

Now, I know a bunch of prosecutors back home would look at that fact pattern and look at that evidence -- you even referenced it in your opening statement, some of your prosecutor -- friends in the prosecution business have been on TV saying they would have looked at that same evidence and they would have taken it to a grand jury.

But on Tuesday, you said, and today in your opening statement, you said, "no reasonable prosecutor would bring such a case."

And then in your statement Tuesday, you cite factors that helped you make that decision and make that statement. And one of the factors you said was "consider the context of a person's actions." Typically, when I hear "context" in the course of a criminal investigation, it's -- it's from the defense side, not the prosecution side. It's at the end of the case after there's been a trial and a guilty verdict, and it's during the sentencing phase -- mitigating circumstances. That's the context we typically think about.

But you said it on the front end. You said "consider the context of the person's actions." And so I'm curious. What does "consider the context" mean? Because a lot of Americans are thinking just what the chairman talked about in his opening statement, that there are two standards: one for we the people, and one for the politically connected.

A lot of folks I get the privilege of representing back in Ohio think that when you said "consider the context," they think that's what Mr. Gowdy just talked about -- the fact that she is former first lady, former secretary of state, former senator, major party's nominee for the highest office in the land. And, oh by the way, her husband just met with the individual you work with at an airport in Arizona five days ago.

So, you said none of that influenced your decision. But tell us what "consider the context" means.COMEY: Thank you, Mr. Jordan.

What I was trying to capture is the fact that the exercise for prosecutorial discretion is always a judgment case. It is in every single case. Among the things you consider are, what was this person's background? What was the circumstances of the offense? Were they drunk? Were they inflamed by passion? Was it somebody who had a sufficient level of education, and training, and experience that we can infer certain things from that to consider the entire circumstances of the conduct and background? I did not mean to consider political context.

JORDAN: The entire circumstances, and Mr. Gowdy just talked about this scheme -- remember what she did, right? She sets up this unique server arrange. She alone controlled it.

On the server, on that system are her personal e-mails, her work related e-mails, Clinton Foundation information, and now we know, classified information. This gets discovered. We find out this arrangement exists. Then what happens? Her lawyers, her legal team decides which ones we get and which ones they get to keep.

They made the sort on the front end. And then we find out the ones that they kept and didn't give to us, didn't give to the American people, didn't give to Congress, the ones they kept, they destroyed them. And you don't have to take my word. I'll take what you said on Tuesday, "they deleted all e-mails they did not return to the State Department, and the lawyers cleaned their devices in such a way as to preclude complete forensic recovery." Now, that sounds like a fancy way of saying they hid the evidence, right? And you just told Mr. Gowdy thousands of e-mails fell into those categories.

Now, that seems to me to provide some context to what took place here. Did Secretary Clinton's legal team -- excuse me, let me ask it this way. Did Secretary Clinton know her legal team deleted those e-mails that they kept from us?

COMEY: I don't believe so.

JORDAN: Did Secretary Clinton approve those e-mails being deleted?

COMEY: I don't think there was any specific instruction or conversation between the Secretary and her lawyers about that.

JORDAN: Did you ask that question? COMEY: Yes.

JORDAN: Did Secretary Clinton know that her lawyers cleaned devices in such a way to preclude forensic recovery?

COMEY: I don't believe she did.

JORDAN: Did you ask that question?

COMEY: Yes.

JORDAN: Do you see how someone could view the context of what she did, set up a private system, she alone controlled it, she kept everything on it? We now know from Ms. Abedin's deposition they did it for that reason, so no one could see what was there based on the depositions Ms. Abedin gave. And then when they got caught, they deleted what they had and they scrubbed their devices. Is that part of the context in evaluating this decision?

COMEY: Sure, sure. And I understand what inferences can be drawn from that set of facts, of course.

JORDAN: Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the gentleman. We will now recognize the gentle woman from the District of Columbia, Mrs. Norton for five minutes.

NORTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Director Comey, I appreciate your conduct of this investigation in a nonpartisan way in keeping with the sterling reputation, which has led presidents of both parties to appoint you to highly placed law enforcement positions in our federal government.

I want to say for the record that this hearing where you call the prosecutor, Mr. Comey, stands in the place of the prosecutor, because the Attorney General has accepted entirely the FBI's recommendations. When you call the prosecutor to give account for the decision to prosecute or not a particular individual raises serious questions of separation of powers, and particularly when you're questioning the prosecutor's decision with respect to the decision, to prosecute or not a particular individual, it raises serious bill of attainder Constitutional questions.

These hearings are so often accusatory that they yield no guidance as to how to conduct business in the future. And that's the way it looks -- it looks as though that is how this hearing is going. Of course, now, everyone understands in the abstract, why it is important for security reasons to use official government mail or e- mail rather than private e-mail if security matters are involved. It's a very broad, wide proposition.

Now, there are no rules so far as I know, requiring members of Congress to use their -- as to how they use their official e-mail accounts, whether involving security or not. The Chairman of this Committee lists his personal account, for example, on his business card. No one says that's wrong. I don't know if it's wrong or right, because there's no guidance.

Federal agency employees, members of Congress, often have secure information or at least sensitive information that shouldn't be made public. Some of our members on the Intelligence Committee, or the Defense Committee or even this committee, and they have such matters -- some of these matters may concern national security issues. And I don't know if something is sensitive, as the itinerary -- if you're going to a hotel as to the route you're taking, and where you will be, all that could be on people's personal e-mails.

Of course, there's a legislative branch, and I spoke of separation of powers. I'm not indicating that there should be a government-wide sense that it is ordained from or hide (ph) -- but there ought to be rules that everybody understands about especially after the Clinton episode, about the use of personal e-mail. So I would like your insight for guidance as far as other federal employees are concerned or other members of Congress and their staff because I think we could learn from this episode.

So strictly from a security standpoint, do you believe that federal employees, staff, even members of Congress, should attempt guidance on the issue of the use of personal e-mails versus some official form of communication? What should we learn from the process the Secretary has gone through? I'm sure there will be questions about how there was even confusion, for example, in the State Department. But what should we learn when it comes to our own -- our own use of e-mail and the use of federal employees on this question?

COMEY: May I answer, Mr. Chairman?

The most important thing to learn is an unclassified e-mail system is no case for an e-mail conversation about classified matters. By that, I mean either sending a document as an attachment over unclassified e-mail that is classified, or having a conversation about something that is a classified subject on an unclassified e-mail system. That's the focus of the concern.

That's the focus of this investigation, that it was also a personal e-mail adds to the concern about the case because of the security vulnerabilities associated with a personal system. But the brute of the problem is people using unclassified systems to conduct business that is classified. So all of us should have access to, when we have access to classified information, classified communication systems.

The FBI has three levels an unclassified system, a secret system, and a top secret system. You can e-mail on all three, but you need to make sure you don't e-mail on the unclassified system, even if that's a government classified system about matters that are classified. That's the important lesson learned.

Everybody ought to be aware of it. Everybody ought to be trained on it. We spend a lot of time training on it in the fib to make sure folks are sensitive to the need of moving a classified discussion, even if it doesn't involve sending a document to the appropriate forum.

NORTON: Members of Congress included?

COMEY: Of course.

NORTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

CHAFFETZ: We'll now recognize the gentleman from Florida, Mr. DeSantis for five minutes.

DESANTIS: Director, the reason why that's so important is because of if top secret information is compromised, that could damage our national security, correct?

COMEY: Yes, by definition...DESANTIS: And American lives are at stake in some instances, correct?

COMEY: Yes.

DESANTIS: You mentioned, a lot of people are upset that there are no consequences for Secretary Clinton, but in your statement you pointed out that administrative and security consequences would be appropriate if someone demonstrated extreme carelessness for classified information. So for those consequences, that would include potentially termination of federal employment?

COMEY: Correct.

DESANTIS: It could include revocation of security clearance?

COMEY: Yes.

DESANTIS: It could include and ineligibility for future employment in national security positions?

COMEY: It could.

DESANTIS: Would you as the FBI Director allow someone, and employee of your agency to work in a national security capacity, if that person had demonstrated extreme carelessness in handling top- secret info?

COMEY: The answer to that is we would look very closely at that in a suitability determination. It's hard to answer in the abstract, "yes in all cases and no in all cases," but it would be a very important suitability scrub.

DESANTIS: So there would be instances where someone could be extremely careless and maintain competence? We have a lot of people who are competent in this country who would love to work for your agency, but yet, it would be potentially -- you would allow someone to be potentially careless and carry on?

COMEY: In the hypothetical, I can imagine if it was a long time ago, and it was a small amount of conduct or something -- that's why it's hard to say other than it would be a very important part...

DESANTIS: Let's put it this way. Would being extremely careless in handling top secret information expose an employee of the FBI to potential termination? COMEY: Yes.

DESANTIS: Why shouldn't U.S. officials use mobile devices when traveling to foreign countries, especially if they're discussing classifying or sensitive information?

COMEY: Because the mobile device will transmit its signal across networks that are likely controlled or at least accessed by that hostile power.

DESANTIS: That's the guidance that the FBI gives all officials when they're traveling overseas? That's still good guidance, correct?

COMEY: That's good guidance.

DESANTIS: How did top secret information end up on the private server, because your statement addressed Secretary Clinton. You did not address any of her aides in your statement. Attorney general Lynch exonerated everybody. That information just didn't get there on its own, so how did it get there? Were you able to determine that?

COMEY: Yes, by people talking about a top secret subject in an e-mail communication.

DESANTIS: So...

COMEY: Not about forwarding a top secret document, it's about having a conversation about a matter that is top secret.

DESANTIS: And those were things that were originated by Secretary Clinton's aides and sent to her, which would obviously be in her server, but it was also included Secretary Clinton originating those e-mails, correct?

COMEY: That's correct.

In most circumstances, it initiated with aides starting the conversation. In the one involving top secret information, Secretary Clinton not only received but sent e-mails talking about the same subject.

DESANTIS: And of that top secret information you found, would somebody who is sophisticated in those matters, should it have been obvious to them that was sensitive information?

COMEY: Yes.

DESANTIS: So I guess my issue about knowledge of what you're doing is, in order for Secretary Clinton to have access to top secret, SCI FBI information, didn't she have to sign a form with the State Department acknowledging her duties and responsibilities under the law to safeguard this information?

COMEY: Yes. Anybody who gets access to SCI, Sensitive Compartmented Information would sign a read-in form that lays that out. I'm sure members of Congress have seen the same thing. DESANTIS: And it stresses in that document and other training people would get, that there are certain requirements to handling certain levels of information. For example, a top secret document, that can't even be on your secret system at the FBI, correct?

COMEY: Correct.

DESANTIS: So you have to follow certain guidelines. And I guess my question is, is she's very sophisticated person, she did execute that document, correct?

COMEY: Yes.

DESANTIS: And her aides who were getting the classified information, they executed similar documents to get a security clearance, correct?

COMEY: I believe so.

DESANTIS: And she knowingly clearly set up her own private server in order to -- let me ask you that, was the reason she set up her own private server in your judgment was because she wanted to shield communications from Congress and the public?

COMEY: I can't say that.

Our best information is that she set it up as a matter of convenience. It was an existing system her husband had and she decided to have a domain on that system.

DESANTIS: So the question is, is very sophisticated, this is information that clearly anybody who had knowledge of security information would know that it would be classified? But I'm having a little bit of trouble to see, how would you not then know that that was something that was inappropriate to do?

COMEY: Well, I just want to take one of your assumptions about sophistication. I don't think that our investigation established she was actually particularly sophisticated with respect to classified information and the levels and treatment, and so far as we can tell...

DESANTIS: Isn't she in an original classification of authority?

COMEY: Yes, sir.

DESANTIS: Good grief.

Well, I appreciate you coming. I yield back the balance of my time.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the gentleman. I ask unanimous consent to enter into the record two documents that Mr. DeSantis referred to. One is the Sensitive Compartmented Information Nondisclosure agreement, the other one is the Classified Information Nondisclosure Agreement, both signed by Hillary Rodham Clinton. Without objection, so ordered. I now recognize the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Clay, for five minutes.

CLAY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Director Comey, for being here today and for the professionals whom you lead at the FBI.

Two years ago, after my urgent request to then Former Attorney General Eric Holder for an expedited Justice Department investigation into the tragic death of Michael Brown in Ferguson, Missouri, I witnessed first hand the diligence, professionalism, and absolute integrity of your investigators. And I have no doubt that was the case in this matter as well.

I did not think it was possible for the majority to exceed their unprecedented arrogant abuse of official channels and federal funds that we have witnessed over the past two years. As they have engaged in a partisan political witch hunt at taxpayer expense against Secretary Clinton. But I was wrong, this proceeding is just a sequel to that very bad act and the taxpayers will get the bill.

It's a new low, and it violates both house rules and the rules of this Committee. So with apologies to you and the FBI for this blatantly partisan proceeding, let me return to the facts of this case as you have clearly outlined them.

First question. Did Secretary Clinton or any member of her staff intentionally violate federal law?

COMEY: We did not develop clear evidence of that.

CLAY: Did Secretary Clinton or any member of her staff attempt to obstruct your investigation?

COMEY: We did not develop evidence of that.

CLAY: In your opinion, do the mistakes Secretary Clinton has already apologized for and expressed regret for, rise to a level that would be worthy of federal prosecution?

COMEY: As I said Tuesday, our judgment, not just mine, but the team's judgment at the FBI is that the Justice Department would not bring such a case. No Justice Department would under any --whether Republican or Democrat administration.

CLAY: Thank you for that response.

I know the FBI pays particular attention to groups by training agents and local law enforcement officers and participating in local hate crime working groups. Is that right?

COMEY: Yes, sir.

CLAY: Some of these organizations seem relatively harmless, but others appear to be very dangerous and growing. Some even promote genocide in their postings and rhetoric online. In your experience, how dangerous are these groups and have they incited violence in the past?

COMEY: I think too hard to answer, Congressman in the abstract, there are some groups that are dangerous, there are some groups that are exercising important protected speech under the First Amendment.

CLAY: Let me ask about it in a more direct question. A gentleman named Andrew England is the editor of a website called the Daily Stormer that is dedicated to the supremacy of the white race, as well as attacking Jews, Muslims, and others. The website features numerous posts with the hash #whitegenocide, to protest what they contend is an effort to eliminate the white race. Are you familiar with this movement?

COMEY: I'm not.

CLAY: Okay. Well, this hash tag has been promoted all over social media by a growing number of white supremacists. For example, one Nazi sympathizer tweeted repeatedly using the handle, @whitegenocidetm. Are you concerned that some groups are increasing their followers in this way, particularly if some of those followers could become violent?

COMEY: I don't know the particular enough to comment, Congressman.

We are always concerned when people go beyond protected speech, which we do not investigate, moving towards acts of violence. And so, our duty is to figure out when have people walked outside the First Amendment protection and are looking to kill folks or hurt folks.

I don't know enough to comment on the particular.CLAY: I see.

Well, one of my biggest concerns is that certain public figures are actually promoting these groups even further, and as you may know, one of our most vocal candidates for president retweeted @whitegenocidetm. Three weeks later, he did it again. Two days after that, he retweeted a different user whose image also included the term white genocide, and that's not even all of them.

Director Comey, don't these actions make it easier for these racist groups to recruit even more supporters?

COMEY: I don't think I'm in a position to answer that in an intelligent way sitting here.

CLAY: I appreciate you trying, and thank you, Mr. Director, for your exceptional principled service to our country.

I yield back.

CHAFFETZ: Thank you. We'll now recognize the gentlewoman from Wyoming, Ms. Lummis for five minutes.

LUMMIS: Welcome, Director. Thank you so much for being here.

My phone has been ringing off the hook in my Washington office, in my Wyoming office -- from constituents who don't understand how this conclusion was reached. So I appreciate you being here to help walk us through it.

And here's the issue that the people that are calling me from Wyoming are having, they have access to this statute, it's Title XVIII U.S. Code 1924. I'm going to read you the statute, it says, "whoever being an officer employee, contractor, or consultant to the United States and by virtue of his office, employment, position, or contract becomes possessed of documents or materials containing classified information of the United States knowingly removes such documents or materials without authority and with the intent to retain such documents or materials at an unauthorized location shall be fined under this title or imprisoned for not more than one year or both." Armed with that information, they're wondering how Hillary Clinton, who is also an attorney, and attorneys are frequently held to a higher standard of knowledge of the law, how this could not have come to her attention.

She was the Secretary of State. Of course, the Secretary of State is going to become possessed of classified materials. Of course, she was an attorney, she practiced with a prominent Arkansas law firm, the Rose Law Firm. She knew from her White House days with her husband, the President, that classified materials can be very dangerous if they get into the wrong hands.

She had to have known about this statute because she had to have been briefed when she took over the job as the Secretary of State. So how, given that body of knowledge and experience, could this have happened in a way that could have potentially provided access by hackers to confidential information?

COMEY: You know, it's a good question. A reasonable question.

The protection we have as Americans is that the government in general and in that statute in particular, has to prove before they can prosecute any of us, that we did this thing that's forbidden by the law. And when we did it, we knew we were doing something that was unlawful. We don't have to know the code number, but that we knew we were doing something that was unlawful. That's the protection we have, one I have worked for very hard.

When I was in the private sector, I did a lot of work with the Chamber of Commerce to stop the criminalization of negligence in the United States...

LUMMIS: Your know thought Mr. -- may I interrupt and suggest that, this statute says, "knowingly removes such documents or materials without authority and with the attempt to retain such documents or materials at an unauthorized location." The intent here in the statute is to retain the documents at an unauthorized location. It's not intent to pass them on to a terrorist or to someone out in Internet land, it's just the intent to retain the documents or materials at an unauthorized location.

COMEY: It's more than that, though.

You would have to show that and prove criminal intent both by law, that's the way the judgment would instruct the jury, and practice by the Department of Justice. They have reserved that statute, even though it's just a misdemeanor, for people who clearly knew they were breaking the law, and that's the challenge.

So should have known, must have know, had to know -- does not get you there. You have to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that they knew they were engaged in something that was unlawful. That's the challenge.

LUMMIS: Then may I turn to her attorneys? Did all of Secretary Clinton's attorneys have the requisite clearances at the times they received all of her e-mails, especially those that were classified at the time they were sent?

COMEY: No.

LUMMIS: They destroyed, as has been noted, 30,000 e-mails of Secretary Clinton's. Do you have 100 percent confidence that none of the 30,000 e-mails destroyed by Secretary Clinton's attorneys was marked as classified?

COMEY: I don't have 100 percent confidence.

I'm reasonably confident some of them were classified. There were only three in the entire batch we found that bore any markings to indicate they were classified. So that's less likely, but surely, it's a reasonable assumption some of the ones they deleted contained classified information.

LUMMIS: Thank you, Director. Thank you, I yield back.

CHAFFETZ: I now recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Lynch, for five minutes.

LYNCH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Director Comey, for appearing here to help the Committee with this work.

Director Comey, Secretary Clinton is certainly not the only Secretary of State to use a personal e-mail account with information later identified as being classified. I want to show you, this is a book that was written by Former Secretary of State Colin Powell. And in his book, he says, "to complement the official state department computer in my office, I installed a laptop computer on a private line. My personal e-mail account on a laptop allowed me to direct access to anyone online. So I started shooting e-mails to my principle assistants, to individual ambassadors, and increasingly, to my foreign minister colleagues who like me were trying to bring their ministries into the 186,000 miles per second world." Were you aware of this, that Secretary Colin Powell actually had a private server as well?

COMEY: Not a private server. I think he used a commercial e- mail account for state department business.

LYNCH: Private line? Unprotected?

COMEY: Correct. Not a State Department e-mail system.

LYNCH: Right.

COMEY: Right.

LYNCH: He went rogue, so to speak. Right?

COMEY: I don't know whether I would say that.

LYNCH: All right. I'm not going to put words in your mouth.

Do you think this was careless for him to do that, to start -- get his own system.? He installed a laptop computer on a private line. " My personal e-mail account was on a laptop and allowed me direct access to anyone. Anyone online." That's his own statement.

I'm just trying to compare Secretaries of State because Secretary Powell has never been here. As a matter of fact, when we asked him for his e-mails, unlike the 55,000 that we received from Secretary Clinton, he said, "I don't have any to turn over." This is a quote. This was on ABC this week. He explained, "I don't have any to turn over. I didn't keep a cache of them. I did not print them off. I do not have thousands of pages somewhere in my personal files." But he was Secretary of State and he operated, you know, on a private system. Were you aware of that?

COMEY: Not at the time 15 years ago, but I am now.

LYNCH: Yes, okay.

So recently, well, back in October 2015, the State Department sent Secretary Powell a letter requesting that he contact his e-mail provider, AOL, to determine whether any of his e-mails are still on the unclassified systems. Are you aware of that ongoing investigation?

COMEY: I don't know of an investigation...

LYNCH: Well, that request for information from Secretary Powell, the former Secretary?

COMEY: Yes. Yes, I am.

LYNCH: You're aware of that. Are you surprised that he has never responded?

COMEY: I don't know enough to comment. I don't know exactly what conversation he had with the State Department.LYNCH: I try to look at the -- where we have a lot of comparisons of other cases. And it seems like all the cases where prosecutions have gone forward, the subject of the investigation has demonstrated a clear intent to deliver classified information to a person or persons who were unauthorized to receive that.

So if you look at the, you know, PFC Bradley Manning, now Chelsea Manning, that was a court-martial, but he demonstrated a clear intent to publish that information, which was classified. Julian Assange, the WikiLeaks editor I guess and publisher, again a wide and deliberate attempt to publish classified information. General Petraeus, which we talked about earlier today, shared information with his biographer. Jeffrey sterling, of the New York times and Former CIA Officer Kiriakou who was interested in writing a book, so he hung on to his information. And even Former Director of the CIA, John Deutsche, who retains classified information on a couple of servers, one in Belmont, Massachusetts, and one in Bethesda, Maryland, now that is after he became a private citizen.

So in all those cases, there's a clear intent. As you said before, you look at what people did and what they were thinking when they did that. And I would just ask you, is there a clear distinction between what those people did and what Secretary Clinton did in her case?

COMEY: In my view, yes. The Deutsche case illustrates it perfectly. He took huge amount of documents, almost all of the TS-CIA level, had them in hard copy at his house, had them on an unclassed system attached to the Internet, attempted to destroy some when he got caught. Admitted, "I knew I wasn't supposed to be doing this," -- clear intent, obstruction of justice. Those are the kind of cases that get prosecuted.

That's what I said and I meant it when I said it. In my experience, which is three decades, no reasonable prosecutor would bring this case. I know that frustrates people, but that's the way the law is, and that's the way the practice is in the Department of Justice.

LYNCH: Thank you for your testimony and for your service. I yield back.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the gentleman. We'll go to the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. Meadows, for five minutes.

MEADOWS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Director Comey, thank you. There has been much said today about criticizing you and your service. And I want to go on record that even though many of my constituents would love for me to criticize your service because of the conclusion you reached, never have I, nor will I criticize your service. And we appreciate your service to this country and the integrity.

So I'm going to focus on the things that you said, not the conclusion that you drew. And Congressman Trey Gowdy and I talked a little bit about this. On February 4th, 2016, Secretary Clinton during a presidential debate said, "I never sent or received any classified material. They are retroactively classifying it. " Close quote.

And so in your statement on July 5th, you said that, "there were indeed 110 e-mails, 52 e-mail chains which there was classified information on it at the time it was sent or received." So those two statements, both of them cannot be true. Is that correct, your statement and her statement.?

COMEY: It's not accurate to say that she did not send or receive classified...

MEADOWS: So she did not tell the truth during that presidential debate that she never sent or received classified information, and it was retroactively classified?

COMEY: I don't think that's a question I should be answering of what was her in head.

MEADOWS: Well, either your statement is not true or hers is not true. Both cannot be true. Is your statement true?

COMEY: That I can speak to.

MEADOWS: OK, so your statement is true, so the American people will have to judge with her statement not being true.

So let me go on to another one. On October 22nd, she said, "there was nothing marked classified on e-mails either sent or received," and in your statement, you said ,a" very small number of e- mails contained classified information, bore markings indicating the presence of classified information at the time." So she makes a statement that says there was no markings. You make a statement that there was. So her statement was not true?

COMEY: That one I actually have a little insight into her statement because we asked her about that. There were three documents that bore portion markings where you're obligated when something is classified to put a marking on that paragraph.

MEADOWS: Right.

COMEY: There were three that bore "c" which means that's confidential classified information.
MEADOWS: So a reasonable person who has been a Senator, a Secretary of State, a First Lady, wouldn't a reasonable person know that that was a classified marking? As a secretary of state, a reasonable person? That's all I'm asking.

COMEY: Before this investigation, I probably would have said, yes. I'm not so sure. I don't find it incredibly...

MEADOWS: Director Comey, come on.

I mean, I have only been here a few years and I understand the importance of those markings. So you're suggesting that a long length of time that she had no idea what a classified marking would be? That's your sworn testimony today?

COMEY: No, no, not that she would have no idea what a classified marking would be, but it's an interesting question as to -- the question about sophistication came up earlier -- whether she was sophisticated enough to understand what a "c" means.

MEADOWS: So you're saying the former Secretary of State is not sophisticated enough to understand a classified marking?

COMEY: That's not what I said.

MEADOWS: That's a huge statement.

COMEY: That's not what I said. You asked me did I assume someone would know. Probably before the investigation, I would have, I'm not so sure of that answer any longer. I think it's possible -- possible that she didn't understand what a "c" meant when she saw it in the body of the e-mail like that.

MEADOWS: After years in the Senate and Secretary of State, I mean, that's hard for me and the American people to believe, Director Comey. And I'm not questioning your analysis of it, but wouldn't a reasonable person think that someone who has the highest job of handling classified information would understand that?

COMEY: I think that's the conclusion a reasonable person would draw. It may not be accurate...

MEADOWS: Let me go a little bit further, because that last quote actually came on October 22nd, 2015, under sworn testimony before the Benghazi Committee. So if she gave a sworn testimony, that a reasonable person would suggest is not truthful, isn't it a logical assumption she may have misled Congress, and we need to look at that further?

COMEY: Well, the reasonable person test is not what you look at for perjury or false statements. But like I said, I can understand why people would ask that question.

MEADOWS: All right.

So let me in the last little portion of this, in your three and a half-hour interview on Saturday, did she contradict some of these public statements in private? Because you said she didn't lie to the FBI, but it's apparent that she lied to the American people. So did she change her statements in that sworn testimony with you last Saturday?

COMEY: I haven't gone through that to parse that...

MEADOWS: Can you do that and get back to this Committee? It's important, I think to the American people and to transparency.

COMEY: I'm sure. And as the Chairman and I have talked about, I'm sure the Committee is going to want to see documents of our investigation and whatnot. And we'll work to give you whatever we can possibly give you under our law, but I haven't done that analysis at this point.

MEADOWS: Will you do that and get back to us?

CHAFFETZ: The gentleman's time has expired. We'll now recognize the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Cooper, for five minutes.

COOPER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Director Comey.

I hate to see one of America's most distinguished public servants pilloried before this Committee. We're all highly partisan here. We're a good back seat drivers. We're all today, apparently, armed chair prosecutors.

And you stated the truth when you said, "you didn't know of anyone who would bring a case like this". Some of the prosecutors have had the case to do that. I hope that this Committee's effort is not intended to intimidate you, or the FBI ,or law enforcement in general, or government employees. And I'm thankful at this moment that you have such a lifetime record of speaking truth to power because that's very important.

It's also very important that apparently you're a life-long Republican. You're just here to do your job, state the facts.

I think the key issue here is whether in fact there is a double standard, whether some Americans are being treated differently than others? I think I can rely on my Republican colleagues to make sure that Hillary Clinton is treated no better than anybody else. There should be some attention given to make sure she's not treated any worse than anybody else.

I think we all know that we wouldn't be having this hearing, especially on an emergency basis, unless she were running for President. My colleague from Massachusetts has just pointed out the previous Secretaries of State are not being called on the carpet, whether that be Condoleezza Rice, or Colin Powell, or others. But I think the grossest double standard here today is the fact that all of the members of this Committee, every member of Congress, is not subject to the same law that Secretary Clinton was subject to.

And as lawmakers, that means that we have exempted ourselves from the standard of other federal employees. My colleague from D.C., Ms. Norton, referred to this. Why did we exempt ourselves from the same rules? Apparently, our Chairman lists his private e-mail account on his business card. We all have access to classified information.COOPER: I would like to challenge my Republican colleagues here today. Let's work together and introduce legislation to make the same laws apply to us as applied to the executive branch and to Secretary Clinton.

I would be happy to join in such legislation to make sure that we're not being hypocritical on this panel, that we're holding ourselves to the same standards as Secretary Clinton and not trying to accuse her of things that we may be guilty of ourselves. I bet my colleagues would be the first to complain if, for example, e-mails were retroactively classified.

That's a situation most people in public service would object to pretty strongly. How did you know at the time if you had no idea? So I think it's very important, if we want as Congress to have the trust of the American people, to not be hypocritical. To uphold the same standards that we want to see upheld by others.

And I'm just thankful at this moment in our history that we have someone like you who's in charge of the FBI. Because too many things are highly politicized. The last thing we should do is criminalize our political system.

I didn't see any of my Republican colleagues complain when former Governor Bob McDonnell was exonerated by an eight to zero vote at the Supreme Court for having done certain things that I think most Americans would find object able.

But our court on a bipartisan, unanimous basis exonerated him just a week or two ago. So I think this is a moment for committee members reflect, to take a deep breath, to calm down and realize exactly what you said, that no reasonable prosecutor would have brought this case. And thank you for stating that so clearly and publicly.

I yield back the balance. I yield to the Ranking Member.

CUMMINGS: Mr. Director, lemme ask you this. First of all, I associate myself with everything the gentleman just said. You were talking about some markings a little bit earlier, is that right?

Can you describe what those markings are like -- markings on the documents? You said there were three documents with certain markings on them.

COMEY: Yeah. CUMMINGS: That indicated classified, go ahead.

COMEY: There were three e-mails that down in the body of the e- mail, in the three different e-mails, there were paragraphs and the beginning of the paragraph had a parenthesis, a capital "c" and then a parenthesis.

And that is a portion marking to indicate that.

CUMMINGS: That paragraph.

COMEY: That paragraph is classified at the confidential level, which is the lowest level of classification.

CUMMINGS: And so out of 30,000 documents, this is -- you found these three markings. Is that what you're saying?

COMEY: Three e-mails bore "c" markings down in the body. None of the e-mails had headers, which is at the top of a document that says it's classified. Three had -- within the body -- the portion marking for "c."

CUMMINGS: Thank you.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the gentleman.

I now recognize the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Duncan, for five minutes.

DUNCAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Meadows mentioned one instance in which Secretary Clinton said that she had -- that she did not mail any classified material to anyone. Actually, she said that several other times.

But it is accurate, Director Comey, that you found at least 110 instances of when she had mailed, e-mailed classified material?

COMEY: One hundred and ten that she either received or sent.

DUNCAN: Right. And it also is accurate that, quote, "Clinton's lawyers cleaned their devices in such a way as to preclude complete forensic recovery."

COMEY: Correct.

DUNCAN: And also, when she said -- when Secretary Clinton said that nothing she sent was marked classified and you said in your press conference, but even if information is not marked classified in an e-mail particularly, our participants who know or should know that the subject matter is classified are still obligated to protect it.

Do you -- do you feel that Secretary Clinton knew or should have known that she was obligated to protect classified information?

COMEY: Yes. DUNCAN: With her legal background and her long experience in government. Also, she said at one point that she has directed all e- mails, work-related e-mails, to be forwarded to the State Department.

Is it also accurate that you discovered thousands of other e- mails that were work-related other than the 30,000 she submitted?

COMEY: Correct.

DUNCAN: Before I came to Congress, I spent several years as a criminal court judge. I tried several -- presided (ph) over several hundred felony criminal cases. And I can assure you that I saw many cases where the evidence of criminal intent was flimsier than the evidence in this case.

But do you -- do you realize or do you realize that great numbers of people across this country felt that you presented such a strong -- such an incriminating case against Secretary Clinton in your press conference that they were very surprised or even shocked when you reached the conclusion to let her off?

Do you doubt that great numbers feel that way?

COMEY: No, I think so. And I understand the questions. And I wanted to be as transparent as possible. We went at this very hard to see if we could make a case. And I wanted the American people to see what I honestly believed about the whole thing.

DUNCAN: Well, do you understand as the chairman said earlier, that great numbers of people feel now that there's one standard of justice for the Clintons and another for regular people?

COMEY: Yeah, I've heard that a lot. It's not true, but I've heard it a lot.

DUNCAN: Well, even the Ranking Member who is here, who of course, as we understand had to defend Secretary Clinton as strongly as possible, he almost begged you to explain the gap between the incriminating case you presented and the conclusion that was reached.

Did -- did that surprise you, that he felt so strongly that there was this big gap?

COMEY: No, not at all. It's a complicated matter. It involves understanding how the Department Of Justice works across decades, how prosecutorial discretion is exercised. I get that folks see disconnections, especially when they see a statute that says gross negligence.

Well, the director just said she was extremely careless. So how is that not prosecutable? So it takes an understanding of what's going on over the last 99 years.

What's the precedent, how do we treat these cases -- I totally I get people's questions and I think they're in good faith. DUNCAN: Do you -- we talk about gross negligence here and you said that Secretary Clinton was extremely careless with this classified material and how dangerous it could be, how threatening to -- even to people's lives that it could be to disclose classified material.

Do you agree that there is a very thin line between gross negligence and extreme carelessness? And would you explain to me what you consider to be that difference?

COMEY: Sure, judge -- Congressman. As a former judge, you know there isn't actually a great definition in the law of gross negligence. Some courts interpret it as close to willful, which means you know you're doing something wrong.

Others drop it lower. My term (ph) extremely careless is trying to be kind of an ordinary person. That's a common-sense way of describing it; it sure looks real careless to me.

The question of whether that amounts to gross negligence frankly is really not at the center of this because when I look at the history of the prosecutions and see, it's been one case brought on a gross negligence theory.

I know from 30 years there's no way anybody from the Department Of Justice is bringing a case against John Doe or Hillary Clinton for the second time in 100 years based on those facts.

DUNCAN: You ended your statement to Congressman Cooper a while ago saying no -- saying once again that no reasonable prosecutor could have brought this case, yet you also mentioned earlier today that you had seen several of your friends and other prosecutors who have said publicly, many across this country, they would have been glad to prosecute this case.

COMEY: I smile because they're friends and I haven't talked to them I want to say, guys, so where were ya over the last 40 years?

Where were these cases? They just have not been brought for reasons that I said earlier. It's a good thing the Department Of Justice worries about prosecuting people for being careless. I don't like it.

As a citizen, I want people to show they knew they were breaking the law and then we'll put you in jail.

DUNCAN: Of course, you know many people have been prosecuted for gross negligence by the Federal Government, by the FBI.

CHAFFETZ: The gentleman's time has expired.

We'll now recognize the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Connolly, for five minutes.

CONNOLLY: Thank you.

And welcome, Director Comey and although our politics are different, I gather you're a Republican. Is that correct?

COMEY: I have been registered Republican for most of my adult life. Not registered any longer.

CONNOLLY: We don't register by party in Virginia but many have suspected my politics as being Democratic. And I thank you for your integrity. As my colleague said and I said in my opening statement, your career has been characterized as speaking truth to power.

And you're doing it again today.

Just to set the context, Director Comey, not that you're unaware of this, today's hearing is political theater. It's not even the pretense of trying to get at the truth. This is the desperate attempt under a -- an extraordinary set of circumstances, an emergency hearing.CONNOLLY: I don't know what the emergency is other than one side is about to nominate somebody who is a pathological narcissist who, you know, was talking about banning Muslims and Mexicans crossing who are all rapists and women who are pigs and terrified at the prospect of the consequences of that in the election, so let's grab onto whatever we can to discredit or try to discredit the other nominee. Putative nominee. And you took away their only hope.

And so the theater today is actually trying to discredit you. Subtly (ph), in some cases. My friend from South Carolina uses big words like "exculpatory" and kind of goes through what a prosecutor would do. The insinuation being you didn't do your job.

My friend from Wyoming is apparently flattered (ph) with citizens in her home state who are reading the statute that governs classification. A lot of time on the hands back there, I guess, but yeah, this is all designed to discredit your finding.

Now, the FBI interviewed Secretary Clinton, is that correct?

COMEY: Yes.

CONNOLLY: Did she lie to the FBI in that interview?

COMEY: I have no basis for concluding that she was untruthful with us.

CONNOLLY: Is it a crime to lie to the FBI?

COMEY: Yes, it is.

CONNOLLY: David Petraeus did lie to the FBI?

COMEY: Yes.

CONNOLLY: And he was prosecuted for that -- well, could have been.

COMEY: Could have been. Was not for that.

CONNOLLY: Right. That's always a judgment call.

COMEY: Correct.

CONNOLLY: Was she evasive?

COMEY: I don't think the agents assessed she was evasive.

CONNOLLY: Hmm. How many e-mails are we talking about, total, universe, that were examined by your team?

COMEY: Tens of thousands.

CONNOLLY: Tens of thousands. And how many are in a questionable category that maybe could have, should have been looked at more carefully because there could be some element of classification, apparently my friend from North Carolina assumes we're all intimately familiar with a fact if a "c" appears, it means a classification, though there seems to be some dispute about that because the State Department, as I understand it, has actually said some of those were improperly marked and shouldn't have had the "c."

Are you aware of that?

COMEY: Yes.

CONNOLLY: Yes. So could it be that in her hundred trip, four years, 100 overseas trips to 100 countries, as secretary of state trying to restore U.S. credibility that had been destroyed in the previous eight years overseas, and tens of thousands of e-mail communications, not including phone calls and classified conversation and skips and the like, that maybe the small percentage of e-mails she didn't pay as much attention to them as maybe in retrospect one would hope she would have.

Is that a fair conclusion? Could that be a fair conclusion?

COMEY: I don't usually deal in maybes. It's possible.

CONNOLLY: Well, you do deal in distinguishing between willful and inadvertent.

COMEY: Sure.

CONNOLLY: And in this case, you concluded it has to be in the latter category. It wasn't willful.

COMEY: We concluded there was not adequate evidence of willful conduct.

CONNOLLY: Right. So there's no obfuscation, here, unlike in the Petraeus case, and there's no evasion, there's no lying. There's no willful attempt to compromise classified material, despite the insinuations of my friends on the other side of the aisle.

And the only hope left in this political theater is to discredit you and your team in the hopes that therefore you won't have credibility and we can revisit this monstrous crime of using a private server, that server being the server of the former president of the United States, that maybe Mrs. Clinton thought would be more secure than the leaky system at the State Department.

I yield back. CHAFFETZ: I now recognize the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Hurd, for five minutes.

HURD: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Chairman, I'm offended. I'm offended by my friends on the other side of the political aisle saying this is political theater. This is not political theater. For me, this is serious.

I spent nine and a half years as an undercover officer in the CIA. I was the guy in the back allies collecting intelligence, passing it to lawmakers. I have seen my friends killed, I have seen assets put themselves in harm's way. And this is about protecting information, the most sensitive information the American government has, and I wish my colleagues would take this a little bit more seriously.

Mr. Comey -- Director Comey, excuse me. SAP. Special Access Program. You alluded to earlier that includes SCI information. Does SCI information include HUMINT and SIGINT?

COMEY: Yes.

HURD: HUMINT and SIGINT, Human intelligence information collected from people that are putting themselves in harm's way to give us information to drive foreign policy. Signals intelligence, some of the most sensitive things to understand what al Qaeda is doing, what ISIS is doing.

So, the former secretary of state had an unauthorized server. Those are your words. In her basement, correct?

COMEY: Correct.

HURD: Who was protecting that information? Who was protecting that server?

COMEY: Well, not much. There was a number of different people who were assigned as administrators of the server.

HURD: And at least seven e-mail chains or eight that -- was classified as TS/SCI?

COMEY: Correct.

HURD: So the former secretary of state, one of the president's most important advisers on foreign policy and national security, had a server in her basement that had information that was collected from our most sensitive assets, and it was not protected by anyone. And that's not a crime?

That's outrageous. People are concerned. What does it take for someone to misuse classified information and get in trouble for it?

COMEY: It takes mishandling it and criminal intent.

HURD: And so an unauthorized server in the basement is not mishandling?

COMEY: Well, no, there is evidence of mishandling here. This whole investigation at the end focused on is there sufficient evidence of intent.

HURD: Were -- was this unanimous opinion within the FBI on your decision?

COMEY: The whole FBI wasn't involved, but the team of agents, investigators, analysts, technologists, yes.

HURD: Did you take into any consideration the impact that this precedence can set on our ability to collect intelligence overseas?

COMEY: Yes. My primary concern is the impact on what other employees might think in the federal government.

HURD: And you don't think this sends a message to other employees that if a former secretary of state can have an unauthorized server in their basement that transmits top-secret information, that that's not a problem?

COMEY: Oh, I worry very much about that. That's why I talked about that in my statement, because an FBI employee might face severe discipline, and I want them to understand that those consequences are still going to be there.

HURD: Director Comey, do you have a server in your basement?

COMEY: I do not.

HURD: Does anybody in the FBI have a server in their basement? Or in their house?

COMEY: I don't know. Not to my knowledge.

HURD: Do you think it's likely?

COMEY: I think it's unlikely.

HURD: I would think so, too. I would think so, too. Because I'm proud -- always been proud to serve alongside the men and women that you represent.

So there was no dissenting opinion when you make this decision. It's your job to be involved in counterintelligence as well. Right?

COMEY: Yes.

HURD: So that means protecting our secrets from foreign adversaries collecting them. Is that correct?

COMEY: Correct.

HURD: Did this activity you investigated make America's secrets vulnerable to hostile elements? COMEY: Yes.

HURD: Do you think that pattern of behavior would continue?

COMEY: I'm sorry? I missed the...

HURD: Do you think that pattern of behavior would continue?

COMEY: Would continue...

HURD: By -- by our former secretary of state?

COMEY: I'm not following you. You mean if we hadn't -- if this had not come to light, you mean?

HURD: Right now. Based on what we see, do you think there's going to be other elements within the federal government that think it's OK to have an unauthorized server in their basement?

COMEY: They better not. That's one of the reasons I'm talking about it.

HURD: So but -- what is the ramifications of them doing that? What is the -- what is -- you know how is there going to be any consequences levered if it's not being levered here? Because indeed, this is -- you're setting a precedent.

COMEY: The precedent -- I want people to understand, again, I only am responsible for the FBI, that there will be discipline from termination to reprimand and everything in between for people who mishandle classified information.

HURD: Director Comey, I'm not a lawyer, and so I may misstate this. Is there such a thing as the case of first impression, and why was this not possibly one of those?

COMEY: There is such a thing, which just means the first time you do something. The reason this isn't one of those is that's just not fair. That would be treating somebody differently because of their celebrity status or because of some other factor that doesn't matter. We have to treat people -- the bedrock of our system of justice, we treat people fairly, we treat them the same based on their...HURD: And that person mishandling the most sensitive information that this government can collect is -- is not fair? It's not fair to punish someone who did that?

COMEY: Not on these facts. If would be fair -- if that person worked for me, it would be fair to have a robust disciplinary proceeding. It's not fair to prosecute that person on these facts.

CHAFFETZ: I thank -- thank...

HURD: Mr. Chairman, I yield back the time I do not have.

CHAFFETZ: Thank the gentleman. I will now recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Cartwright, for five minutes.

CARTWRIGHT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'd like to open by acknowledging my colleague from North Carolina, Mr. Meadows -- here he comes back in the room -- for -- for acknowledging your integrity, Director Comey.

I think bipartisan sentiments like that are few and far between around here and I appreciate Congressman Meadows' remark. You are a man of integrity, Director Comey. It is troubling to me that that remark from Congressman Meadows is not unanimous at this point. It used to be.

Just weeks ago our chairman, Representative Chaffetz, stated on national TV that Republicans, quote, "believe in James Comey," unquote. He said this, and I quote, "I do think that in all of the government, he is a man of integrity and honesty. His finger's on the pulse of this. Nothing happens without him. And I think he is going to be the definitive person to make a determination or a recommendation." But just hours after your actual recommendation came out, Chairman Chaffetz went on TV and accused you of making a, quote, "political calculation."

And then our speaker of the House weeks ago referring to you, Director Comey, said, "I do believe that his integrity is unequaled." So your integrity was -- it was unanimous about your integrity before you came to your conclusion, but after, not so much. That's troubling.

And I want to give you a chance, Director Comey, how do you respond to that? How important to you is maintaining your integrity before the nation? COMEY: I think the only two things I have in life that matter are the love of my family and friends and my integrity. So I care deeply about both.

CARTWRIGHT: All right. Now Director Comey, you discussed your team a little bit and they deserve a lot of credit for all of the hard work and effort that went into this investigation. And I think you just said that they were unanimous that everyone who looked at this agreed that no reasonable prosecutor would bring a case. Am I correct in that?

COMEY: Yes.

CARTWRIGHT: How many people were on this team?

COMEY: It changed at various times, but somewhere between 15 and 20. Then we used a lot of other FBI folks to help from time to time.

CARTWRIGHT: How many hours were spent on this investigation?

COMEY: We haven't counted yet. They -- they -- I said to them, they moved -- they put three years of work into 12 calendar months.

CARTWRIGHT: And how many pages of documents did the FBI review in this investigation?

COMEY: Thousands and thousands and thousands.

CARTWRIGHT: And the agents do the document review, were they qualified or were they unqualified?

COMEY: They were an all-star team. They are a great group of folks.

CARTWRIGHT: How about Secretary Clinton? Did she agreed to be interviewed?

COMEY: Yes.

CARTWRIGHT: Come in voluntarily without the need of a subpoena?

COMEY: Yes.

CARTWRIGHT: Was she interviewed?

COMEY: Yes.

CARTWRIGHT: Was she interviewed by experienced, critical, veteran agents and law enforcement officers or by some kind of credulous, gullible, newbies doing their on-the-job training, Director?

COMEY: She was interviewed by the kind of folks the American people would want doing the interview. Real pros.

CARTWRIGHT: All right. You were asked about markings on a few documents. I have the manual here. Marking classified national security information. And I don't think you were given a full chance to talk about those three documents with the little "c"s on them.

Were they properly documented? Were they properly marked according to the manual?

COMEY: No.

CARTWRIGHT: According to the manual, and I ask unanimous consent to enter this into the record, Mr. Chairman.

CHAFFETZ: Without objection...

CARTWRIGHT: According to the manual, if you're going to classify something, there has to be a header on the document. Right?

COMEY: Correct.

CARTWRIGHT: Was there a header on the three documents that we've discussed today that had the little "c" in the text someplace?

COMEY: No. They were three e-mails. The "c" was in the body, in the text, but there was no header on the e-mail or in the text.

CARTWRIGHT: So if Secretary Clinton really were an expert at what's classified and what's not classified and were following the manual, the absence of a header would tell her immediately that those three documents were not classified. Am I correct in that?

COMEY: That would be a reasonable inference.

CARTWRIGHT: All right. I thank you for your testimony, Director. I yield back.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the gentleman. Will now recognize the gentleman from Colorado, Mr. Buck, for five minutes.

BUCK: Good morning, Director Comey.

COMEY: Morning, sir.

BUCK: Thank you for being here. I also respect your commitment to law and justice and your career. And I -- first question I want to ask you, is this hearing unfair? Has it been unfair to you?

COMEY: No.

BUCK: Thank you. One purpose of security procedures for classified information is to prevent hostile information -- hostile nations from obtaining classified information. Is that fair?

COMEY: Yes.

BUCK: And do -- did hostile nations obtain classified information from Secretary Clinton's servers?

COMEY: I don't know. It's possible, but we don't have direct evidence of that. We couldn't find direct evidence.

BUCK: I want to -- without making this a law school class, I want to try to get into intent. There are various levels of intent in the criminal law, everything from knowingly and willfully doing something all the way down, to strict liability. Would you agree with me on that?

COMEY: Yes.

BUCK: And in Title 18, most of the -- criminal laws in Title 18 have the words "knowingly" and "willfully" in them and that is the standard typically that United States attorneys prosecute under.

COMEY: Most do. Unlawfully, knowingly, willfully is our standard formulation for charging a case.

BUCK: And there are also a variety of others between the knowingly and willfully standard and the strict liability standard. And in many, like environmental crimes, have a much lower standard because of the toxic materials that are at risk of harming individuals. Is that fair?

COMEY: That's correct.

BUCK: Okay. Let's talk about this particular statute, 18 U.S.C. 1924. I take it we could all agree -- you and I can agree on a couple of the elements. She, Secretary Clinton was an employee of the United States.

COMEY: Correct.

BUCK: And as a result of that employment, she received classified information.

COMEY: Correct.

BUCK: And there is no doubt about those two elements. Now I don't know whether the next element is one element or two, but it talks about knowingly removed such materials without authority and with the intent to retain such material at an unauthorized location.

So I'm going to treat those as two separate parts of the intent element. First of all, do you see the word "willfully" anywhere in this statute?

COMEY: I don't.

BUCK: And that would indicate to you that there is a lower threshold for intent?

COMEY: No, it wouldn't.

BUCK: Why?

COMEY: Because we often -- as I understand, the Justice Department's practice and judicial practice will impute to any criminal statute at that level with a knowingly also requirement that you know that you're involved in criminal activity of some sort. A general mens rea requirement.

BUCK: So -- and you would apply that same standard to environmental (inaudible)?

COMEY: No, if it specifically says it is a negligence-based crime, I don't think a judge would impute that.

BUCK: But -- but Congress specifically omitted the word "willfully" from this statute, and yet you are implying the word willfully in the statute. Is that fair?

COMEY: That's fair.

BUCK: Okay. So what this statute does say is "knowingly removed such materials without authority." Is it fair that she knew that she didn't have authority to have this server in her basement?

COMEY: Yes, that's true.

BUCK: And she knew that she was receiving materials, classified information, in -- in the e-mails that she received on -- on her BlackBerry and other devices.

COMEY: I can't answer -- I'm hesitating as a prosecutor because it's always -- to what level of proof. I do not believe there's evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that she knew she was receiving classified information in violation of the requirements.

BUCK: But that's not my question.

COMEY: (Inaudible) evidence of that.

BUCK: That's not my question. My question, in fairness, is did she know that she was receiving information on the servers at her location?

COMEY: Oh, I'm sorry. Of course, yes. She knew she was using her e-mail system.

BUCK: And as secretary of state, she also knew that she would be receiving classified information.

COMEY: Yes, in general.

BUCK: OK. And did she then have the intent to retain such material at an unauthorized location? She retained the material that she received as secretary of state at her server in her basement and that was unauthorized.

COMEY: You're asking me did she have the -- I'm going to ask you the burden of proof question in a second. But did she have the intent to retain classified information on the server or just to retain any information on the server?BUCK: Well, we've already established that she knew, as secretary of state, that she was going to receive classified information in her e-mails. And so did she retain such information that she received as secretary of state on her servers in her basement?

COMEY: She did in fact -- there is, in my view, not evidence beyond certainly probable cause. There's not evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that she knew she was receiving classified information or that she intended to retain it on her server.

There's evidence of that but when I said there's not clear evidence of intent, that's what I meant. I could not, even if the Department Of Justice would bring that case, I could not prove beyond a reasonable doubt those two elements.

BUCK: Thank you very much.

CHAFFETZ: Thank the gentleman.

Now, we'll go to the gentlewoman from Illinois, Ms. Duckworth for five minutes.

DUCKWORTH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. When I first entered Congress three years ago, like many freshmen members, I -- I'm like many freshmen members. I actually sought out this committee.

I wanted to be on this committee because I wanted to tackle the challenges of good government, like working to eliminate proper payments or prevent wasteful programs duplication. Before I joined Congress, I had the privilege of serving in the army for 23 years and I -- you know, and as I tackled those challenges and in the challenges of helping reduce veteran's homelessness, I witnessed firsthand the real world importance of improving and streamlining government operations.

How even the best policies in the world will not work without proper implementation. And so when it comes to implementing true and lasting reforms that will make sure that electronics records and other records and the history of our great nation are preserved for future generations, I've done my best to approach this goal seriously.

I'm focused on making sure that our nation sustains a long-term commitment to modernizing our federal records keeping (ph) system from improving the laws governing what needs to be collected to ensuring our civil servants across government have the necessary tools to achieve what should be nonpartisan and a shared goal.

With respect to examining the tough lessons learned from numerous record keeping incidents that our committee has dealt with which transcend any one agency or any single administration, my mission is clear. Make sure we here in Congress move beyond partisan politics and engage in the serious hard work of ensuring that the laws written in an era of pen and paper are overhauled to meet the digital challenges of the 21st century.

Dr. Comey, the Office of Management and Budget and the national archives and records administration released a memorandum known as "the managing government records directive" in 2012.

And this directive states, and I quote, "by December 31st, 2016, federal agencies will manage both permanent and temporary e-mail records in an accessible electronic format. Federal agencies must manage all e-mail records in an electronic format. E-mail records must be retained in an appropriate electronic system that supports records management and litigation requirements which may include preservation in place models, improving the capability to identify, retrieve and retain the records as long as they are need."

As a director of a bureau who deals with sensitive information on a daily basis, do you believe that this directive is necessary and attainable for agencies across the board within that four-year time frame from August 2012 to December 2016?

COMEY: I don't know enough to say both. I can say it's certainly necessary. I don't know whether it's achievable.

DUCKWORTH: OK are you familiar with the capstone approach? That's the federal -- it's approach it says that federal agencies should save all e-mails for select senior-level employees and that the e-mails of other employees will be archived for a temporary period set by the agency so that senior employees' e-mails are kept forever and those by other lower-level employees are actually archived for short period -- a shorter period.

COMEY: I'm aware generally. I know what applies to me and when I was Deputy Attorney General of the Bush Administration.

DUCKWORTH: Yes in fact, I understand that FBI is currently actively using this approach according to the agencies -- senior agency official for records for records management F.Y. '15 annual report.

My understanding that capstone approach is aimed at streamlining the record-keeping process for e-mails and reducing the volume of records that an agency has to maintain. Nearly all agencies will be required to comprehensively modernize their approach to managing federal records in the near future.

As the head of a component agency, Director Comey, within the Department of Justice which appears to be a leader in adopting the innovative capstone approach across the agency, would you agree with respect to instituting foundational reforms that will strengthen records preservation, the capstone approach used by DOJ should be accelerated and rode out across the Federal Government?

COMEY: I think we're doing it in a pretty good way. I don't know -- I'm not an expert enough to say whether anybody should do it the way we do it, honestly.

DUCKWORTH: Are you satisfied with the way that you're doing it?

COMEY: I am but I don't want to sound overconfident because I'm sure there's a why we can do it better but I think we're doing it in a pretty good way.

DUCKWORTH: Do you have any one person within the FBI that continually reviews the -- your record-keeping and also -- or do they report directly to you, as well as -- is there a periodic review of -- of how you're implementing this process?

COMEY: Yes. We have an entire division devoted to records management that assistant director reports up to the deputy director who reports to me. We have -- it's an enormous operation as you might imagine, requiring constant training.

And so I -- that's what I mean when I say I think we're doing it in a pretty good way. And we have record marking tools. We prompt with dialogue boxes requiring employees to make a decision, what's the nature of this record you're creating now and where should it be stored?

So I think we're doing it in a pretty good way. That's why I say that.

DUCKWORTH: Have you seen that in any of the other agencies that you have interacted with or have you had a chance -- an occasion to look at what some of the other agencies are doing with their sensitive and classified information?

Are they following the same technique as you are doing in the FBI?

COMEY: I don't know enough to say. I personally.

DUCKWORTH: OK. I am out of time but thank you.

CHAFFETZ: Thank the gentlewoman.

We'll now recognize the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Walberg, for five minutes.

WALBERG: I thank the chairman.

And thank you, Director Comey, for being here.

Mr. Chairman, thank you for holding this hearing.

And Director Comey for making it very clear that you believe we've done this respectfully with good intention. And I wish some of my colleagues that had instructed us on our intent were here. They have a great ability to understand intent better than I guess the director of the FBI.

But it is an intent that's important here, that we understand we are oversight and government reform committee. And if indeed, the tools aren't there to make sure that our country is secure and that officials at the highest levels in our land don't have the understanding on what it takes to keep our country secure, that we do the necessary government reform to put laws in place that will be effective and will meet the needs of distinguished agencies and important agencies like the FBI.

So thank you, Mr. Chairman, for doing this hearing. It's our responsibility to do oversight and reform as necessary.

Going back, Director Comey, to paraphrase the Espionage Act, people in the 7th district of Michigan understand it from this perspective and common sense. What it says, that whoever being entrusted with information related to national defense through gross negligence permits the information to be removed from its proper place in violation of their trust shall be fined or imprisoned under the statute.

There doesn't seem to be a double standard there. It doesn't express intent. You've explained your understanding of why intent is needed and we may agree or disagree on that.

But the general public looking at that statute says it's pretty clear. Question I would ask, Director Comey, what's your definition of extremely careless, if you could go through that?

COMEY: I intended it as a common-sense term. It's one of those kind of you know it when you see it sort of things. Somebody who is -- should know better, someone who is demonstrating a lack of care that strikes me as there's ordinary accidents and then there is just real sloppiness.

So I think of that as kind of real sloppiness.

WALBERG: So you stated you had found 110 e-mails on Secretary Clinton's server that were classified at the time they were sent or received. Yet Secretary Clinton has insisted for over a year, publicly, that she never sent or received any classified e-mails.

The question I have from that, would it be difficult for any Cabinet-level official -- specifically, any Cabinet official, let alone one who is a former White House resident or U.S. Senator, to determine if information is classified?

COMEY: Would fit be difficult?

WALBERG: Would it be difficult?

COMEY: That's hard to answer in the abstract. It would depend upon the context in which they are hearing it or seeing it. Obviously, if it's marked, which is why we require markings, it's easy.

It's too hard to answer because there are so many situations you might encounter it.

WALBERG: But with the -- the training that we receive and certainly a secretary Of state would receive or someone who lives in the White House, that goes a little above and beyond just the common sense individual out there trying to determine.

Knowing that classified information will be brought and to remove to an unauthorized site ought to cause a bit of pause applause there, shouldn't it?

COMEY: Yeah and if you're a government official, you should be attentive to it because you know that the matters you deal with could involve sensitive information. So sure.

WALBERG: So Secretary Clinton's revised statement she never knowingly sent or received any classified information is probably also untrue.

COMEY: Yeah, I don't want to comment on people's public statements.

We did not find evidence sufficient to establish that she knew she was sending classified information beyond a reasonable doubt to meet the intent standard.

Like I said, I understand why people are confused by the whole discussion. I get that. But you know what would be a double standard? If she were prosecuted for gross negligence.WALBERG: But your statement on Tuesday said there is evidence to support a conclusion that any reasonable person in secretary Clinton's position should have known that an unclassified system was no place for the conversation.

COMEY: I stand by that.

WALBERG: Now that's very clear.

COMEY: That's the definition of carelessness, of negligence.

WALBERG: Which happened.

COMEY: Oh, yeah.

WALBERG: As a result of our secretary of state's -- former secretary of state's decisions.

COMEY: Yes.

WALBERG: Is it your statement then before this committee that Secretary Clinton should have known not to send classified material, and yet she did?

COMEY: Certainly, she should have known not to send classified information. As I said, that's the definition negligent. I think she was extremely careless. I think she was negligent. That, I could establish. What we can't establish is that she acted with the necessary criminal intent.

WALBERG: Do you believe that the -- that since the Department of Justice hasn't used the statute Congress passed, it's invalid?

COMEY: No. I think they are worried that it is invalid, that it will be challenged on Constitutional grounds, which is why they've used it extraordinarily sparingly in the decades.

WALBERG: Thank you. I yield back.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the gentleman. We'll now go to -- I'll recognize Mr. Lieu of California for five minutes.

LIEU: Thank you, Mr. Chair. As I read some of my Republican colleagues' press statements and as I sit here today, I am reminded of that quote from Macbeth, "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." I've heard some sound and fury today from members of the committee. And the reason they largely significant nothing is because of two fundamental truths that are self-evident. The first of which, none of the members of this committee can be objective on this issue. I can't be objective. I've endorsed Hillary Clinton for president. As have the Democratic members of this committee.

My Republican colleagues can't be objective. They oppose Hillary Clinton for president. Which is why we have you. You are a non- partisan career public servant that's served our nation with distinction and honor. And not only can you be objective, it is your job to be objective to apply the law fairly and equally regardless much politics.

I think it would be important for the American people to get a fuller appreciation of your public service, so let me ask you, before your FBI director, how many years did you serve as a federal prosecutor?

COMEY: I think 15.

LIEU: For a period of time, you were at Columbia Law School as a scholar and you specialized in national security law. Is that correct?

COMEY: Sometimes I fantasize I still am.

LIEU: All right. Thank you. When you served in the Republican administration of President George W. Bush, you were then the second- highest ranking member of the Department of Justice. Is that right?

COMEY: Yes. President Bush appointed me to be U.S. Attorney in Manhattan and then the No. 2 in the Department of Justice.

LIEU: When you were confirmed for the FBI director position, the vote was 93-1. Is that correct?

COMEY: That's correct.

LIEU: With that strong bipartisan support, it is not surprising that Senator Grassley, a Republican, said during your confirmation, and I quote, "Director Comey has a reputation for applying the law fairly and equally regardless of politics."

In this case, did you apply the law fairly, equally regardless of politics?

COMEY: Yes.

LIEU: Did you get any political interference from the White House?

COMEY: None.

LIEU: Did you get any political interference from the Hillary Clinton campaign? COMEY: None.

LIEU: One of the reasons you are appointed to a fixed term of ten years, a very long term, is to help insulate you from politics. Isn't that right?

COMEY: That's correct.

LIEU: The second fundamental truth today about this hearing is that none of the members of this committee have any idea what we're talking about because we have not reviewed the evidence personally in this case.

When I served on active duty in the U.S. Air Force in the 1990s, one of my duties was a prosecutor. One of the first things I learned as a prosecutor is it is unprofessional and wrong to make allegations based on evidence that one has not reviewed.

So let me ask you, has any member of this committee, to the best of your knowledge, reviewed the 30,000 e-mails at issue in this case?

COMEY: I don't know. Not to my knowledge.

LIEU: Has any member of this committee sat through the multiple witness interviews that the FBI conducted in this case?

COMEY: No. That I know. No.

LIEU: Has any member of this committee received any special information about the files that you kept or other FBI agents kept on this case?

COMEY: Not to my knowledge.

LIEU: Now let's do a little bit of math here. 1 percent of 30,000 e-mails would be 300 e-mails. Is that right?

COMEY: I think that's right.

LIEU: 30 e-mails would be one-tenth of 1 percent. And three e- mails would be one one-hundredth of 1 percent of 30,000. Right?

COMEY: I think that's right.

LIEU: So of those three e-mails, one one-hundredth of 1 percent of 30,000, they bore these tiny little classified markings which is, as you describe, a "c" with parentheses. Correct?

COMEY: Correct.

LIEU: It's certainly (ph) possible that a busy person who has sent and received over 30,000 e-mails just might miss this marking of a "c" with parentheses. It is possible, correct?

COMEY: Correct. LIEU: So let me now just conclude by stating what some of my colleagues have, which is, there is just the strongest whiff of hypocrisy going on here. The American public might be interested in knowing that all members of Congress receive security clearances just for being a member of Congress.

We get to have private e-mail servers. We get to have private e- mail accounts. We can use multiple devices. We can take devices overseas.

And really, at the end of the day when the American people look at this hearing, they need to ask themself (ph) this question -- do they trust the bias partisan politicians on this committee who are making statements based on evidence we have not reviewed, or do they trust the distinguished FBI director? I would trust the FBI Director.

I yield back.

CHAFFETZ: Thank you. I will now recognize the gentleman from Florida, Mr. Mica, for five minutes.

MICA: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Director, how long did you investigate this matter?

COMEY: Just about a year.

MICA: A year. And do you believe you conducted a legitimate investigation?

COMEY: Yes, sir.

MICA: And -- it was a legitimate subject that was something that you should look into? You had that responsibility, is that correct?

COMEY: Yes.

MICA: We have a responsibility to hear from you on the action that you took. This weekend -- well, tomorrow, we'll go back to our districts and we have to explain to people, I'll be at (ph) a couple of cafes where I see folks and meetings and they're going to ask a lot of questions about what took place.

Have you seen the Broadway production Hamilton?

COMEY: Not yet. I'm hoping to.

MICA: I haven't either. But I understand it won the choreography Tony Award. I think you and others know that. The problem I have in explaining to my constituents in what's come down, it almost looks like a choreography.

Let me just go over it real quickly with you. Last Tuesday -- not this week -- one week ago, former President Clinton meets with the attorney general in Phoenix.

The next Friday, last Friday, Mrs. Lynch, the AG, says she's going to defer to the FBI on whatever you came up with.

On Saturday morning I saw the vans pull up. This is this past Saturday. And you questioned Secretary Clinton for three hours? Is that -- I guess that's correct?

COMEY: Three and a half.

MICA: OK. And then on Tuesday morning, the morning after July 4th, we watched in our office -- I had my interns, I said come in, we've got the FBI director, let's hear what he has to say. We're all kind of startled. You basically said you were going to recommend not to prosecute. Correct?

COMEY: Yes, sir.

MICA: And then Tuesday -- well, we had President Obama and Secretary Clinton arrive in Charlotte at 2:00 and shortly thereafter we had the attorney general as closing the case.

This is rapid fire. I mean, now, my folks think that there is something fishy about this. I'm not a conspiracy theorist, but there are a lot of questions on how this came down.

I have questions about how this came down. Did you personally interview the secretary on Saturday morning?

COMEY: I didn't personally, no.

MICA: How many agents did?

COMEY: I think we had five or six.

MICA: Did you talk to all of those agents after the interview?

COMEY: I did not speak to all of them, no.

MICA: Did she testify or talk to them under oath?

COMEY: No.

MICA: She did not. Well, that's a problem. But...

COMEY: No -- it's still a crime to lie to us.

MICA: I know it is. Do you have a transcript of that -- that..

COMEY: No, we don't record our...

MICA: Do you have a 302 -- I guess it's called...

COMEY: I do. I don't have it with me, but I do.

MICA: Did you read it?

COMEY: Yes.

MICA: You did? Can we get a copy of it since the case is closed?COMEY: I don't know the answer.

MICA: I would like a copy of that provided to the committee. I would like also for the last 30 days any communications between you or any agent or any person in the FBI with the attorney general or those in authority in the Department of Justice on this matter. Could you provide us with that?

COMEY: We'll provide you with whether we can under the law and under our policy. It would actually be easy in my case.

MICA: You see the problem that I have though, is I have to go back and report to people what took place.

COMEY: Sure.

MICA: Now, did you write the statement that you gave on Tuesday?

COMEY: Yes.

MICA: You did. And did you -- you said you didn't talk to all of the agents. But all of the agents, did they meet with you and then is that the group that said that we all vote to not recommend prosecution?

COMEY: I did not meet with all of the agents. I've met with -- I guess I've -- I've met with all of them...

(CROSSTALK)

MICA: But we're getting the word that it was like unanimous out of FBI that we don't prosecute.

COMEY: What's your question, Congressman?

MICA: Well, again, I want to know who counseled you. You read their summary. OK, you -- she was not under oath. And it appears -- members have cited here where she lied or misled to Congress which will lead now to the next step of our possibly giving you a referral on this matter. You're aware of that?

COMEY: Yes, we -- someone mentioned that earlier.

MICA: And that probably will happen. Thank you for shedding some light on what took place.

COMEY: Can I -- Mr. Chairman, can I respond just very briefly?

CHAFFETZ: Go ahead.

COMEY: I hope what you'll tell the folks in the cafe is, is look me in the eye and listen to what I'm about to say. I did not coordinate that with anyone. The White House, the Department of Justice, nobody outside the FBI family had any idea what I was about to say.

I say that under oath, I stand by that. There was no coordination, no --there was an insinuation what you were saying that I don't mean to get strong in responding but I want to make sure I was definitive about that.

MICA: Thank you, sir.

CHAFFETZ: Thank you.

We'll now recognize the gentlewoman from the Virgin Islands. Ms. Plaskett, for five minutes.

PLASKETT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you all for being here.

Director Comey, I would rather be here talking with you about the FBI's investigation and their resources to those individuals who are acting under color of law who've apparently committed egregious violations in the killings that we've seen in the recent days.

But instead, Mr. Chairman, I'm sitting here and I've listened patiently as a number of individuals have gone on national TV and made accusations against Director Comey, both directly and indirectly, because he recommended against prosecution based upon facts.

I've listened just very recently here in this hearing, as my esteemed colleague from Florida tries to insinuate the condensation of an investigation into a week that actually occurred over a much, much longer period of time.

And using that condensation and conspiracy theory to say that there's some orchestration. And that they have accused Mr. Director Comey of basing his decision on political considerations rather than the facts.

I've heard chuckles and laughter here in this hearing and I don't think there's anything to be smiling or laughing about. Because I want to say something to those individuals who are chuckling and laughing and making attacks on Director Comey for doing his job.

You have no idea who you're talking about. Your accusations are completely off base, utterly offensive to us as American people. I know this because I've had the honor of working for Director Comey during my own service at the Department Of Justice.

From 2002 to 2004, I served as Senior Counsel to the Deputy Attorney General. I worked with both director attorney -- the Deputy Attorney General, Larry Thompson, and Deputy Attorney General Jim Comey when he became deputy as a staff attorney.

And I know from my own experiences that Director Comey is a man of impeccable integrity. There are very few times when you as an attorney or as an individual can work with individuals or a gentleman who is completely that.

Someone who is above the fray. Anyone who suggests or implies that he made his recommendations on anything but the facts simply does not know James Comey. We've used the term no reasonable prosecutor. Well, I know that James Comey doesn't act as what a reasonable prosecutor would do because he is the unyielding prosecutor.

He is the prosecutor who does what is politically not expedient for himself, his staff, but for the law. And I'm not the only person in this hearing, in this committee, who's worked with Director Comey or for him.

Representative Gowdy himself also commended Director Comey and he said this, and I quote, "I used to work with him. I think Comey is doing exactly what you want. He's doing a serious investigation behind closed doors away from the media's attention and I'm going to trust him until I see a reason not to."

Representative Gowdy referred to Director Comey as honorable and apolitical. He said this is exactly what you want in law enforcement. Well, that's exactly what you want in law enforcement until the decision is not the decision that you want.

Director Comey, Chairman Chaffetz, as it was said by one of my colleagues, went on television and accused you of making quote a "political calculation." He said your recommendation was nothing more than quote, "a political determination in the end."

I'm gonna ask you, how do you respond to that? Were your actions in any way, shape or form governed by political consideration?

COMEY: No, not in any way.

PLASKETT: And did anyone with Secretary Clinton's campaign or the administration influence your recommendation for political reasons?

COMEY: No, they didn't influence it in any way.

PLASKETT: I'm going to take you at your word because I know and those who will go through the record of your long tenure as a career prosecutor and they look at examples, we'll see that you have taken decisions that have not been that.

Which your supervisors, which the president, which others have wanted you to take. As a fellow prosecutor who believed that the facts must come above politics, I'm thankful that we have you.

And Director Comey, I want to thank you for your service to our country. And you have our support. We would like to see as much documents and I'm grateful that you want to keep the transparency so that the American public can understand the difference between what they hear in the media and the elements of a crime necessary for criminal prosecution.

Thank you.

CHAFFETZ: Thank the gentlewoman.

We'll now recognize the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Farenthold, for five minutes.

FARENTHOLD: Thank you very much.

Director Comey, I want to talk a little bit about cyber security. State Department's Inspector General reported (ph) detailed instances of multiple attacks on Secretary Clinton's computer, as well as her replying to suspicious e-mail from the personal account of Under Secretary Of State.

Director, you said that hostile actors (ph) successful gained access to the commercial e-mail accounts of people Secretary Clinton regularly communicated with. In the case of the Romanian hacker Guccifer, according to accessing Sidney Blumenthal's account -- and you know that's been public, for some time.

During your investigation, were there other people in the State Department or that regularly communicated with Secretary Clinton that you can confirm were successfully hacked?

COMEY: Yes.

FARENTHOLD: And were these folks that regularly communicated with the secretary?

COMEY: Yes.

FARENTHOLD: And were you able to conclude definitively that the attempted hacks referenced in the I.G. report were not successful?

COMEY: We were not able to conclude that they were successful. I think that's the best way to say it.

FARENTHOLD: All right, well while you said that given the nature of Clinton's server, it would be unlikely to see evidence one way or the other whether or not it had been successful hacked.

How many unsuccessful attempts did you uncover, did you find any there?

COMEY: There were unsuccessful attempts. I don't know the number off top of my head.

FARENTHOLD: Do you have an idea -- were they from foreign governments? Where'd they come from?
COMEY: I want to be careful what I say in an open setting and so I -- we can give you that information but I don't want to give the -- any foreign governments knowledge of what I know, so there...

FARENTHOLD: But you -- would you be so far as to say if they probably weren't American high school students fooling around?

COMEY: Correct, it was not limited to criminal activity.

FARENTHOLD: During your investigation, did you or anyone in the FBI interview the hacker Guccifer?

COMEY: Yes.

FARENTHOLD: And he claimed he gained access to Sid Blumenthal's e-mail account and traced them back to Clinton's private server. Can you confirm that Guccifer never gained access to her server?

COMEY: Yeah he did not. He admitted that was a lie.FARENTHOLD: All right, well, at least that's good to hear.

All right, Section 793 of Title 18 in the United States Code makes it a crime to allow classified information to be stolen through gross negligence. Were you to discover that hostile actors had actually gotten into Secretary Clinton's e-mail, would that have changed your recommendation with respect to prosecuting her?

COMEY: Unlikely, although we didn't consider that question because we didn't have those facts.

FARENTHOLD: All right. I want to go back to the question of intent real quick, for just a second.

I'm a recovering attorney. It's been decades since I actually practiced law. But you kept referring to she had to know it was illegal to have the requisite criminal intent. I was always taught in law school, and I don't know where this changed, that ignorance of the law was no excuse. If I'm driving a long at 45 miles and hour and didn't see the 35 mile and hour speed limit, I was still intentionally speeding, even though I didn't know it.

Now, I might not have had the requisite criminal intent if maybe my accelerator were jammed or something like that, but even though I didn't know the law was 35, I was driving 45, I'm going to get a ticket. And I'm probably going to be prosecuted for that.

So, how can you say ignorance of the law is an excuse in Ms. Clinton's case?

COMEY: Well, the comparison to petty offenses, I don't think is -- you spoke about the question of -- ignorance of the law is no excuse, but here's the distinction. You have to have general criminal intent. You don't need to know what particular statute you're violating, but you must be aware of the generally wrongful nature of your conduct...

(CROSSTALK)

FARENTHOLD: We -- now, so Congress when they enacted that statute said "gross negligence." That -- that doesn't say intent. So what are we going to have to enact to get you guys to prosecute something based on negligence or gross negligence? Are we going to have to add, "and oh by the way, we don't mean -- we really do mean you don't have to have intent there"? COMEY: That's a conversation for you all to have with the Department of Justice. But it would have to be something more than the statute enacted in 1917. Because for 99 years, they've been very worried about its constitutionality.

FARENTHOLD: All right. Well, I think that's something this committee and Congress as a whole, the Judiciary Committee, that Mr. Chaffetz and I also sit on, will be looking at it.

And I was on television this morning. And I just want to relay a question that I received from a caller into that television commercial (sic). It's just real simple: Why should any person follow the law if our leaders don't? And we can argue about intent or not, but you laid out the fact that she basically broke the law, but you couldn't prove intent.

Maybe I'm putting words in your mouth, but I do want to know why -- why any person should follow the law if our leaders don't have to. Maybe that's rhetorical, but I'll give you an opportunity to comment on that.

COMEY: That's a question I'm no more qualified to answer than any American citizen. It's an important question. In terms of my work and my world, my folks would not be -- one of my employees would not be prosecuted for this. They would face consequences for this. So the notion that it's either prosecute or you walk around, you know, smiling all day long is just not true for those people who work for the government.

The broader question is one for a democracy to answer. It's not for me.

FARENTHOLD: And I guess the ultimate decision as to whether or not Mrs. Clinton works in government or not is not in -- is in everybody's hands.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the gentleman.

FARENTHOLD: I yield back.

CHAFFETZ: We'll now recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Boyle, for five minutes.

BOYLE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you, Director Comey, for appearing especially on such short notice.

I want to share with you actually something a friend of mine was expressing when watching your press conference 48 hours ago. And this is someone who's not in any way political. In fact, probably typical of most American citizens today in being depressed about the remarkable level of cynicism we have in our government, that specifically those of us who are in government make decisions first and foremost because of the party hat we wear and not necessarily based on the facts and the evidence. And he texted me after watching your 15-minute presentation, "Oh, it's nice to see a real pro; you can tell that he would make the decision based on the facts and the evidence and not what party he wears."

I think that's so important if we're ever going to get to a place in this country where we restore some of the faith that we had in government. If you look at the poll numbers from the 1940s and 1950s, and you look at faith in government among the American public, and you look at those numbers today, the numbers today are anemic. They're nowhere near the levels that they were decades ago.

So for that, I want to say thank you, and I think that many citizens have the same -- the same impression.

When I first met you a couple of years ago at a weekend session in Colonial Williamsburg, you might remember that we had a discussion about my biggest concern, frankly, facing the security of the American people. And that is the possibility of a lone-wolf terrorist, someone becoming self-radicalized and acting based on that. We had an exchange that I'll keep private, but I think I can characterize that you share my concern.

I'm just thinking for the last two-and-a-half hours that we've been here, we've had the FBI director asking questions on this matter, when frankly I would have much rather your time spent dealing with the potential lone-wolf terrorists and other coordinated facts that we face.

But since this is the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, trying to find something that we can now take and possibly use in a systemic way, not just the celebrity of Secretary Clinton and the fact because it involves her, let's face it, that's the reason why we're here.

But I want to try to take something out of this very expensive and long investigation and try to use it in a productive way toward reforming government that possibly we can get something good out of it. So toward that end, I'm really concerned about this issue of up- classification because it seems as if, and I was not aware of this until the investigation, there is quite a strong discrepancy between not just former Secretary Clinton, but even former Secretary Powell, what he thinks should be classified and then what is classified after the fact.

And I think you'd, if I'm right, there were some 2,000 e-mails that were up-classified. I was wondering if you could -- you could speak to that.

COMEY: It actually was not a concept I was real familiar with before this. It's the notion that something might not have been classified at the time, but that in hindsight, as a government agency considers releasing it, they raise the classification level to protect it, because it would -- it's a candid assessment of a foreign leader or something like that. I think it is largely a State Department thing because their diplomats will often be conversing in an unclassified way, that when they look at releasing it in response to a FOIA request, they think it ought to be protected in some fashion.

But honestly, those -- I kind of pushed those to the side. The important thing here was what was classified at the time. That's what matters.

BOYLE: Right. And that for a law enforcement official matters. But I'm just wondering if you could share with us any of your impressions about a system that exists where there is such gray area and discrepancy in what is classified and what's not. And if you or your agents had any suggestions for us either in Government Reform or I happen to be on the Foreign Affairs Committee that has oversight of State Department. Do you believe that this is a matter that we should take up where there is such discrepancy on what's classified and what's not classified?

I even -- I think of one example. Ambassador Ross put something in a book that wasn't classified, and then was up-classified after the book came out. What -- what good does that do us as a country in terms of trying to protect the intelligence of the United States?

COMEY: I'm not an expert in this up-classification business, but I do suspect it will be a fertile ground for trying to figure out whether there are ways to do it in a more predictable, reliable way.

BOYLE: Yeah. Well, thank you again for your service, and I yield back my time.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the gentleman.

I will now recognize the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. Hice, for five minutes.

HICE: Director Comey, your statement on Tuesday clearly showed that Secretary Clinton not only was extremely careless in handling classified information, but that also any reasonable person should have known better, and that also in doing so, she put our national security at risk with her reckless behavior.

So it seems to me that the American people are only left, based on your assessment, with just a few options. Either Secretary Clinton herself is not a reasonable person, or she is someone who purposefully, willfully exhibited disregard for the law, or she is someone who sees herself as above the law.

And to muddy the water even further after listening to you lay out the facts of the investigation, much of what you said directly contradicted her in previous statements that she had made.

I think that all this compiled, putting the -- connecting the dots -- that so many American people are irate that after all of this, there was not a recommendation for Secretary Clinton to be prosecuted.HICE: Now, I do greatly appreciate the fact that you came out with much more information on this than you would have in other cases. And I think that was the right thing to do. Undeniably, this is not a typical case. This is something of great public interest. Obviously, the subject of the investigation, a former secretary of state, former senator, and all those things that we have talked about, former first lady and so forth. And in addition to this, her husband who happens to be a former president of the United States is meeting privately with the attorney general right before all of this interview takes place.

Obviously, this is very suspicious. Just the optics of it all. And at the same time, that you're coming out or more or less the same time that you are announcing the decision, Secretary Clinton is flying around in Air Force One with the president doing a campaign event.

I mean there's nothing about this case that's ordinary. There's nothing about the subject that's ordinary. So let me ask you this. Director, did Secretary Clinton in fact comply with the department's policies or the Federal Records Act?

COMEY: I don't think so. I know you have the State Inspector General here, who's more of expert on all the department's policies but at least in some respects, no.

MICA: So keeping the servers at home and all these types of things obviously is not in compliance with the department's policies.

COMEY: Yes and I've read the Inspector General's report on that. So that's part of the reason I can answer that part with some confidence.

MICA: OK and yet she said publicly that she fully complied. So there again, is another issue. If you had the same set of facts but a different subject, a different individual involved say just an average, ordinary State Department employee or an anonymous contractor, what would have been the outcome?

COMEY: I'm highly confident there would be no criminal prosecution no matter who it was. There would be some range of discipline, they might get fired, they might lose their clearance, they might be suspended for 30 days, could be some discipline.

Maybe just a reprimand, I doubt it, I think it'd be higher on the discipline spectrum but some sort of discipline.

MICA: So is it your opinion there should likewise be some discipline in this case?

COMEY: That's not for me to say. I can talk about what would happen if it was a government employee under my responsibility.

MICA: Well, then what you're laying out is that there is a double standard for someone else, a different subject, an anonymous contractor or someone at the State Department.

There would absolutely be discipline but because of who the subject is, you're not willing to say there should be discipline. So there's again -- this whole issue -- this is what the American people are so upset about. Let me say that -- when you -- when you stated that no reasonable prosecutor would pursue this case, is that because the subject of this investigation was unique?

COMEY: No. There's no double standard there. And there's no double standard either in the sense that if it was John Doe, former government employee, you'd be in the same boat.

We wouldn't have any reach on the guy. He wouldn't be prosecuted.

MICA: But he would have some discipline.

COMEY: Well, not if he had -- not if he had left government service.

MICA: Had they lied about having servers, had they lied about sending and receiving classified e-mails, had they lied about not deleting those e-mails to the public, had they lied about not having any marked classified -- the statements are clearly documented.

And you're saying that this -- an average person would experience discipline by your own words, but Secretary Clinton does not deserve to be disciplined.

CHAFFETZ: The gentleman's time has expired but the director may answer if he wants to.

COMEY: An average employee still in government service would be subject to a disciplinary process. Now, if they'd left, you'd be in the same boat.

CHAFFETZ: Gentleman from Georgia yields back.

The chair now recognizes the gentleman from Vermont, Mr. Welch.

WELCH: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Director Comey. The prosecutor has really awesome power. The power to prosecute is the power to destroy. And it has to be used with restraint. You obviously know that.

You're being asked to -- you had to exercise that responsibility in the context of a very contested presidential campaign, enormous political pressure. You had to do it once before. And I go back to that evening of March 10, 2004, when the question was whether a surveillance program authorized after 9/11 by President Bush was going to continue despite the fact that the Justice Department had come to an independent legal conclusion that it actually violated our constitutional rights.

That's a tough call because America was insecure. The president was asserting his authority as Commander In Chief to take an action that was intended to protect the American people but you and others in the Justice Department felt that whatever that justification was, the Constitution came first and you were going to defend it.

As I understand it, you were on your way home and had to divert your drivers to go back to the hospital to be at the bedside of a very sick, at that time Attorney General. And you had to stand in the way of the White House Chief of Staff and the White House Council.

I'm not sure that was a popular decision or one that you could have confidently thought would be a career booster. But I want to thank you for that. Fast forward, we've got this situation of a highly contested political campaign. And there is substantive concern that's legitimate by Democrats and Republicans for independent political reasons.

But you had to make a call that was based upon your view of the law, not your view of how it would affect the outcome of who would the next Commander in Chief. Others have asked this for you, but I think I'm close to the -- close to the end.

I want to give you a chance to just answer I think the bottom line questions, here.

Had you, after your thorough investigation, found evidence that suggested that criminal conduct occurred, is there anything, anything or anyone that could have held you back from deciding to prosecute?

COMEY: No. I mean I -- I don't have the power to decide prosecution but I worked very hard to make sure that a righteous case was prosecuted.

WELCH: And you would have made that recommendation to the Attorney General?

COMEY: Yes.

WELCH: Was there any interference, implicit or explicit, from the President of the United States or anyone acting on his behalf to influence the outcome of your investigation and the recommendation that you made?

COMEY: No.

WELCH: Was there anyone in the Hillary Clinton campaign, or Hillary Clinton herself, who did anything directly or indirectly to attempt to influence the conclusion that you made to recommend no prosecution?

COMEY: No.

WELCH: At this moment, after having been through several hours of questioning, is there anything in the questions you've heard that would cause you to change the decision that you made?

COMEY: No, I don't -- I don't love this, but it's really important to do. And I understand the questions and concerns. I just want the American people to know we really did this the right way.

You can disagree with us but you cannot fairly say we did it in any kind of political way. We don't carry water for anybody. We're trying to do what the right thing is.

WELCH: I -- I very much appreciate that and I very much appreciate that it takes strong people of independent judgment to make certain that we continue to be a nation of laws.

Mr. Chairman, just one final thing and I'll yield to Mr. Cummings.

We've got a political debate where a lot of these issues that are going to be -- that have been raised are going to be fought on the campaign. And we've got Secretary Clinton who's going to have to defend what she did.

She's acknowledged it's a mistake; we've got that great constitutional scholar, Mr. Trump, who's going to be making his case about why this was wrong, but that's politics. That's not really having anything to do with the independence of prosecutorial discretion.

Thank you, Director Comey.

And I yield whatever additional time I have to Mr. Cummings.

CHAFFETZ: I think the gentleman's gonna yield back, I have spoken with Mr. Cummings, so.

We'll now recognize the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Massie, for five minutes.

MASSIE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you, Director Comey, for showing up and your willingness to be transparency and answer a lot of unanswered questions. A few hours before this hearing started I went on to social media and asked people to submit questions.

And I've got over 500 questions and I don't think I'll get to ask them all in these five minutes. But I'm sure you'll be willing to answer them. One of the common things that I came in here to ask but I realize it's not the right question now, is what's the difference between extremely careless and gross negligence?

But in the process of this hearing, what I'm hearing you say is, that's not what we -- that's not what your reluctance is based on. It's not based on the reluctance to prosecute.

Your reluctance to recommend a prosecution -- or an indictment is not based on parsing those words.

It's based on your concern for this statute with this -- this statute. Is that correct? From your opening statement?

COMEY: It's broader than that, actually. The statute -- and it fits within a framework of fairness and also my understanding of what the Department of Justice has prosecuted over the last 50 years.MASSIE: So when you say a reasonable prosecutor wouldn't take this case, it's not because you don't think she made -- that she lied in public or that maybe she was negligent, it's because you have concern with the prosecutorial history of this statute?

COMEY: Not just that statute, but also 1924, which is the misdemeanor. I also don't see cases that were prosecuted on facts like these. 793 (ph) and 1924...

MASSIE: ... But you did find one prosecution in -- has it been overturned by the Supreme Court?

COMEY: No, there was one time it was charged in an espionage case, and the guy ended up pleading guilty to a different offense so it was never adjudicated.

MASSIE: So, your concern is with the negligence threshold. You think it requires mens rea, or knowing the crime. But in all 50 states, isn't there negligent homicide statute, and aren't people prosecuted for that all the time? Doesn't the Supreme Court, and all the courts below that, uphold those prosecutions just on the basis of negligence?

COMEY: I don't know about all 50 states. I think negligent homicide and manslaughter statutes are relatively common.

MASSIE: OK, don't all 50 states have something like that, and aren't those sustained in the upper courts, those convictions?

COMEY: I don't know whether all 50 states have something like that, but again, I think it's very common and I think those are sustained.

MASSIE: Don't we have a history of -- you implied the American judicial system doesn't have a history of convicting somebody for negligence, but don't we in other domains of justice?

COMEY: We do. I know the federal system best. There are very few in the federal system. They're mostly, as you (ph) talked about earlier, in the environmental and Food and Drug Administration area.

MASSIE: Thank you. Now, I want to ask another question that's come up here. You've basically related to us that this information, this top secret or classified information got into these e-mail chains because of conversations people were having. They were relating what they heard before in other settings. Is that correct? COMEY: No. Maybe in some cases, but it was people having an e- mail conversation about a classified subject.

MASSIE: OK, so they were having an e-mail conversation, but how in this e-mail conversation did this bore (ph) marking show up? Like, if they're not sophisticated enough, as you said before, even Hillary Clinton wasn't sophisticated enough to recognize a bore (ph) marking to, the "C" with the parenthesis for confidential or classified. If they weren't that sophisticated, how did they recreate that bore marking in their e-mails when they're having these discussions?

COMEY: A lot of what ended up on Secretary Clinton's server were stuff that had been forwarded up the chain. It gets to her from her stack, a lot of that, forwarding. And, then she comments sometimes on it. Someone down in the chain, in typing a paragraph that summarized something put a portion marking "C", "paren", "C", "paren", on that paragraph.

MASSIE: Doesn't it take a lot of intent to take a classified document from a setting that's, you know, authorized and secure, to one that's not? Wouldn't it require intent for somebody to recreate that classification marking in an unsecure setting?

COMEY: I don't know. It's possible, but also, I could...

MASSIE: ... Could you accidentally type, "Open parenthesis", "C", "closed parenthesis", and indent the paragraph?

COMEY: Oh no, you wouldn't accidentally type...

MASSIE: ... Right...

COMEY: ... Someone actually down the chain...

MASSIE: ... OK, so this is my question is someone down the chain being investigated? Because they had the intent clearly if they had the sophistication -- which Hillary Clinton, you insinuate, may have lacked. If they had the sophistication to know what this bore marking was, they had to have the intent to recreate it, or the intent to cut, copy, paste from a secure system to an unsecure system. Wouldn't that be correct?

COMEY: Potentially, but we're not -- there's not an open criminal investigation of that person way down the chain...

MASSIE: ... Shouldn't there be?

COMEY: A criminal investigation?

MASSIE: An investigation if there's intent, which is what you -- I mean, and I think you may be reasonable in requiring that threshold. Don't we treat everybody the same whether they're the top of the chain or the bottom of the chain?

COMEY: Sure, you want to if the conduct is the same. We did not criminally investigate whoever started that chain and put the "C" on that -- those paragraphs. We didn't.

MASSIE: OK, I would suggest maybe you might want to do that, and I will yield back to the Chairman.

CHAFFETZ: OK, I thank the gentleman. I now recognize the gentlewoman from Michigan, Mrs. Lawrence for five minutes.

LAWRENCE: Director Comey, how many years have you been the director?

COMEY: Two -- three years. I don't know the exact day count at this point.

LAWRENCE: How many cases have you investigated, approximately, that you had to render a decision?

COMEY: The Bureau investigates tens of thousands of cases. The Director only gets involved in a very small number of them.

LAWRENCE: About how many?

COMEY: I think I've been deeply involved in probably 10 to 20.

LAWRENCE: Have you even been called before Congress on any of those other decisions?

COMEY: No, this is the first time.

LAWRENCE: Thank you. There are some Republicans who support you. Not surprisingly, they're the ones who actually know you. I have a letter here, and I would like to enter it into the record, from Richard Painter, he was President Bush's Chief Ethics lawyer. May it be entered into the record?

CHAFFETZ: She's asking unanimous consent, without objection, so ordered.

LAWRENCE: Mr. Painter refers to Mr. Comey as a man of, and I quote, "the man of the utmost integrity who calls the shots as he saw them, without regard to political affiliation or friendship." He states, and I quote, "throughout the FBI investigation of Secretary Clinton's e-mail server, I have been convinced that the Director would supervise the investigation with being impartial, and strict adherence to the law, as well as procedural."

He also adds, although I'm aware of very few prosecutions for carelessness in handling classified information as opposed to intentional disclosure, I knew that the Director would recommend prosecution in any and all circumstances where it was warranted. I can not think of someone better suited to handle such a politically sensitive investigation."

Finally, and I quote, "I urge all members of the United States Congress to stop from inferring in specific decisions, particularly those involving political allies, or opponents. During my tenure in the White House there were very unfortunate allegation that power Senators sought politically motivating firing of United States attorney. Whether or not such allegations were true, it is imperative," and I'm still quoting, "that members of the Senate or the House never again conduct themselves in a manner where such interference could be suspected."

And, I want to be on the record, I wholeheartedly agree with Mr. Painter.

Director, you have demonstrated yourself, you sat here and asked (ph) the questions, and I would never oppose to finding the answers to any situation that is directly related to federal agencies which we, on this committee, are responsible for. But, I want to be clear that Congress has no business, no business interfering with these types of decisions that are coming in this -- in your responsibility.

These type of attacks are not only inappropriate, but they're dangerous. They're dangerous because they could have a chilling effect on the future investigations. And, I ask that question, how long have you been this position? How many times have you made decisions, and it were knocked, pulled in 24 before this committee? How many times? And, then we say it's not political.

And, you have said repeatedly, regardless of who it was you would have conducted the investigation as required under your responsibility. And, here you have Republicans who are saying you are an honorable man. Until this day, I have not heard any complaints of your judgment. So, I sit here today as a member of Congress on the record that the slippery slope that we're seeing today in this hearing, I want every member to be cautious of what we're saying. That in America when we have investigation that we will allow our own elected Congress and Senate to make this a political agenda to attack, but only if it's in their agenda. This goes for Democrats and Republicans, we are not here to do that.

Thank you, and I yield back my time.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the gentlewoman.

Will now recognize the gentleman, Mr. Blum.BLUM: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Director Comey for being here today, and thanks for hanging in there until every last question is answered.

I'm not a lawyer, that's the good news. I'm a career businessman. I spent most of my career operating in the high high- tech industry.

Today, I heard words such as common sense, reasonable person, carelessness, judgment, or lack thereof. I like these words. I understand these words. I think the average American does as well. I'd like to focus on that.

Last Tuesday, Director, you said, and I quote, "none of these e- mails should have been on any kind of unclassified system, but their presence is especially concerning because all these e-mails were housed on unclassified personal servers not even supported by full- time security staff like those found at agencies of the United States government or even with a commercial e-mail service such as Gmail." Director Comey, my small Iowa business doesn't even use Gmail for our e-mail because it's not secure enough.

I know some security experts in the industry. I check with them. The going rate to hack into somebody's Gmail account, $129. For corporate e-mails, they can be hacked for $500 or less. If you want to hack into an IP address, it's around $100. I'm sure the FBI can probably do it cheaper. This is the going rate.

Director Comey, are you implying in that statement that the private e-mail servers of Secretary Clinton's were perhaps less secure than a Gmail account that is used for free by a billion people around this planet?

COMEY: Yes. And I'm not looking to pick on Gmail. Their security is actually pretty good, the weakness is individual users. But, yes, Gmail has full-time security staff and thinks about patching, and logging, and protecting their systems in a way that was not the case here.

BLUM: I would like to ask you, what kind of judgment -- we talked a lot about judgment today -- does this decision to potentially expose to hackers classified information on e-mail service that's less secure than Gmail, your words -- what does that suggest to you?

COMEY: It suggests the kind of carelessness I talked about. BLUM: In August of last year, Secretary Clinton was asked by Ed Henry of Fox News whether she had wiped her entire server, meaning that, did she delete all the e-mails on here server? Her response, "you mean with a cloth?" March of 2015, during a press conference, Secretary Clinton assured us that her private e-mail server was secure saying, "the server was on private property guarded by the Secret Service."

Now, this would have laughable if it wasn't so serious. I know, you know, my constituents in eastern Iowa know, you don't need to be a cat burglar to hack into an e-mail server and you don't need a cloth to wipe a server clean. One would think that a former United States Senator, one would think that a Former Secretary of State would know this as well. Would you agree with that statement?

COMEY: You would think, although as I said before, one of the things I learned in this case is that the Secretary may not have been as sophisticated as people assumed.

She didn't have a computer in her office at the State Department for example. I don't think -- so I would assume the same thing about someone who had been a Senator and a high-ranking official. I'm not sure it's a fair assumption in this case.

BLUM: In your opinion, did Secretary Clinton know that a server could in fact be wiped clean electronically and not with a cloth?

COMEY: Well, I assume -- I don't know...

BLUM: Would you assume she knows that?

COMEY: I would assume it was a facetious comment about a cloth. I don't know a particular on that one.

BLUM: Would you also assume Director, that Secretary Clinton knew that a server could be wiped clean electronically, that it could be hacked electronically, not physically? You don't need a cat burglar to hack a server. Would you assume -- is reasonable to assume she knows that?

COMEY: To some level she would know that. To some level of understanding.

BLUM: Then once again, for someone who knew these things or we assume to some level she knew these things, what kind of judgment does a decision to expose classified material on personal servers suggest to you? What type of judgment?

COMEY: It's not my place to assess judgment. I talk in terms of state of mind, negligence in particular. I think there was carelessness here. In some circumstances, extreme carelessness.

BLUM: Was her server hacked?

COMEY: I don't know. I can't -- can't prove that it was hacked.

BLUM: That answer says to me it could have been hacked.

COMEY: Sure.

BLUM: And if it was hacked, potentially damaging material, damaging to American secrets, damaging to American lives, could have been hacked, could have been exposed, correct? Lives could have been put at risk if that server was indeed hacked?

COMEY: I'm not prepared to say yes as to that last piece. That would require me going into a way -- I can't here due to the nature of the classified information. But there is no doubt that it potentially would have exposed information that's classified -- information that was classified because it could damage the United States of America.

BLUM: So it could I have happened, the FBI just isn't aware?

COMEY: Correct.

BLUM: Thank you very much.

I yield back the time I do not have.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the gentleman.

I now recognize the gentlelady from New Jersey, Ms. Watson Coleman, for five minutes.

WATSON COLEMAN: Thank you.

And thank you, Director. I've got a number of questions so I'm going to zip through these.
This is a question I'm going to ask you and you may not even have the answer to it because you may not have known this. This is about the classification marking issue that you've been asked about earlier. According to the State Department which addressed the issue yesterday, a spokesman said that, "the call sheets appear to bear classified markings -- but this was actually a mistake." To quote, "generally speaking, there's a standard process for developing call sheets for the Secretary of State. Call sheets are often marked, but it's not untypical at all for them to be marked at the confidential level prior to the decision of the Secretary that he or she will make that call. Often times, once it is cleared, the Secretary intends to make a call, the department will then consider the call sheet SBU, Sensitive But Unclassified or unclassified altogether, and then marked appropriately."

The classifications of a call sheet therefore is not necessarily fixed in time and staffers in the Secretary's office who are involved in preparing and finalizing these call sheets, they understand that. Given this context, it appears that markings in the documents raised in the media reports were no longer necessary or appropriate at the time they were sent as an actual e-mail. Those markings were human error. They didn't need to be there. Did you know this?

COMEY: No. WATSON COLEMAN: Thank you, Mr. Director.

Can you tell me based upon your information has there been and is there any evidence that our national security has been breached or at risk as a result of these e-mails and their being on this server? Is there any evidence?

COMEY: There's no direct evidence of an intrusion.

WATSON COLEMAN: Thank you very much.

I have to tell you that while I think that this should conclude this discussion, I know we're going to hear this issue ad nauseam. But I am concerned about another issue that I think really is resonating with the people in this country. That issue has to do with experiences that we had just the last two days.

Mr. Director, I want to bring this up for your consideration because I want to ask you, what can the FBI do in this issue? This morning, we woke up to another graphic and deeply disturbing video that actually brought me to tears when my staff played it for me, where a Minnesota woman's boyfriend has been shot as her young child sat in the back-seat after apparently telling the officer he was licensed to carry a weapon. He had it on him, and was going to reach for his identification.

Just the other day, there was a -- an incident in Baton Rouge involving a Mr. Alton Sterling, an African-American man who was shot while pinned to the ground by police officers in Baton Rouge. An interaction taped by two bystanders with cell phones captured this. So I think that we've got an issue here, an issue of real national security.

And I want to ask you, Mr. Director, do we have an opportunity to direct our time and resources in your department to those issues? Is it -- is it not important that we save their names to remind people of the loss of a Tamir Rice, to an Eric Garland, to an Alton Sterling, to a John Crawford III, to a Michael Brown, to a Walter Scott, and even a Sandra Bland? Deaths in the hands of police custody or by police happening -- are these not happening at an alarming rate and is this not a legitimate space for the FBI to be working in?

COMEY: Yes, is the emphatic answer. Those are incredibly important matters.

As you know, the FBI spends a lot of time on them because they're very, very important. We have an investigation open on the Baton Rouge case. I was briefed this morning on the Minnesota case and I would expect we'll be involved in that as well. It's an important part of our work.WATSON COLEMAN: Do you feel that you have the resources from the legal imperative to the funding to address these cases and what seems to be a disturbing pattern in our country today?

COMEY: I'm a bad bureaucrat, but I have -- I believe I have sufficient resources and we are applying them against those situations. because I believe the individual cases matter enormously, but also the people's confidence in law enforcement is one of the bedrocks of this great country of ours. I have the resources and we're applying them too.

WATSON COLEMAN: And in addition, we believe that our law enforcement is by in large of high integrity and have the desire to keep us protected and safe. But when we find out that there are these occasions, and when there's an indication that there's a pattern that is taking place in this country, we have a responsibility to ensure that everyone in this country is safe. And simply because you're a black man or a black woman does not make you a target.

Thank you. I yield back my time.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the gentlewoman. We'll now recognize the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. Walker.

WALKER: Thank you Mr. Chairman. Thank you Director Comey for being here.

There are a few things in this town that people agree on both sides of the aisle, one is your reputation. I'm reminded of the passage in James: Swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath.

I am a little disappointed in some of the things I've heard from my colleagues about some of the attacks on your character and integrity. I haven't heard those. And I hope that we have not -- you've not experienced that.

I also struggle with a change of heart that we're hearing today. I have a list of elected officials who have questioned your investigation, even attacked it. In fact, former President Clinton said, "This is a game." In fact, last Friday, Congresswoman Wasserman Schultz said, "Secretary Clinton is not the target of this investigation, or whatever you want to call it."

My question to you today: Do you feel like this has been a Republican witch hunt, this hearing? COMEY: No. I said from the beginning, I understand people's questions and interest. I'm a huge fan of transparency. I think that's what makes our democracy great.

WALKER: I think that is one of the reasons as to why you are so respected.

To me, this hearing is about understanding and disseminating the facts, and how you saw them, and how the American public sees them. And specifically in the areas of where there was wrongdoing admitted under your investigation, where there was obviously breaking the law, but also some cover-ups. Did Congress ask you to pursue this investigation?

COMEY: No. It was a referral from the Inspector General of the intelligence community.

WALKER: So it wasn't Republicans either was it?

COMEY: No.

WALKER: How did you go about collecting the evidence?

COMEY: We used the tools we normally use in a criminal investigation.

WALKER: Did or do you receive a congressional referral for all the information you collected?

COMEY: Not to my knowledge.

WALKER: One of the things I'm struggling with or what I would like to know specifically is, under oath Ms. Clinton made these three comments that we now know are untrue in the Benghazi hearing.

Number one, she's turned over all her work related e-mails. Number two, telling the committee that her attorneys went through every single e-mail. And finally, and probably the one that continues to stick the most, there was, and I quote, "nothing marked classified on my e-mails," end quote.

Now, earlier when the chairman questioned you about this, you said something about needing a congressional referral, recommendation. My question is something of this magnitude, why -- can you help me understand why didn't it rise to your investigation or someone bringing that to your knowledge as far as saying this is a problem, here she is, again, Secretary Clinton lying under oath specifically about our investigation?

COMEY: We out of respect for the legislative branch being a separate branch, we do not commence investigations that focus on activities before Congress without Congress asking us to get involved. That's a long-standing practice of the Department of Justice and the FBI. So we don't watch on TV and say we ought to investigate that, Joe Smith said this -- in front of the committee. It requires the committee to say, "We think we have an issue here; would you all take a look at it?"

WALKER: With all due respect, if you have the Secretary Clinton under oath speaking about your very investigation, and you've talked about your wonderful staff, and certainly have no reason to deny it; why wouldn't that rise to the level of suspicion that -- here she is saying this under oath. Lying under oath is a crime is it not?

COMEY: Yes.

WALKER: What's the penalty on that? That's considered perjury right?

COMEY: Perjury, it's a felony, I forget the exact -- it's potentially years in prison.

WALKER: I don't understand -- would you help me understand why somebody wouldn't have tipped you off that she's talking about the specific case under oath that you're investigating?

COMEY: There's a difference between us being aware of testimony and us opening a criminal investigation for potential perjury.

Again, it's not this case in particular, but all cases. We don't do that without the committee saying, "We think there was an issue in testimony given in this separate branch of the government."

WALKER: You also mentioned earlier, and it's been quoted several times, that no reasonable prosecutor would move forward with some of the facts. Is there any room at all that somebody would differ on the opinion? I know that former United States Attorney General Michael Mukasey said that an illegal server disqualifies her from holding any federal office. So there are people of highest esteem that may differ obviously not privy to the exact facts.

Can you make any room? You said no reasonable person. Do you understand why American people or would understand why other people may say that she has stepped across a line or broke enough laws here that you would come to a different conclusion?

COMEY: Sure, I respect different opinions.

My only point -- as I said earlier, I smile because those folks are my friends, I've worked with them for a long time. None of those guys in my position I believe knowing what I know, would think about it differently. But I also respect that they have a different view from the outside.

WALKER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I yield back.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the gentleman. I now recognize the gentleman from California, Mr. DeSaulnier.

DESAULNIER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Director, I just want to thank you as others have, and I know you don't need this but I think the American people clearly need to hear it, you've done a wonderful job today. There are moments in my political life and as an American I despair for the future of this country, not often but -- in those moments comes an individual like yourself, be it by providence or good fortune or framework of the U.S. constitution, I really believe you served this country and all Americans well irrespective of their party affiliation.

So really two questions. Two lines of questions, I should say. One is I -- another colleague brought this up, but you mentioned in just previous testimony about the bedrock and the importance of public confidence and public safety institutions, yours and all. So I just want to give you an opportunity, I think you have responded to this multiple times -- but given you had little opportunity tonight -- because I think it's important for the American public to know that the system isn't rigged, that there are people such as yourself and the 15 individuals who worked on this case and others that do their job and believe in the Constitution of the United States. And if you have any further comments about -- comments that would say that the system's rigged and Americans should give up on the system.

COMEY: One of the reason I welcome this opportunity to have this conversation, is I was raised by great parents who taught me, you can't care what other people think about you. In my business, I have to and deeply do, that people have confidence that the system's not fixed, against black people, for rich people, for powerful people.

It's very, very important that the American people understand that there really are people that you pay for with your tax dollars who don't give a rip about Democrats or Republicans, or this or that, who care about finding out what is true. And I am lucky to lead an organization that is that way to its core.

I get a ten-year term to ensure that I stay outside of politics, but in a way that it's easy. I lead an organization that is resolutely apolitical. We are tough aggressive people. If we can make a case, we'll make a case. We do not care what the person's stripes are or what their bank account looks like. I worry very much when people doubt that.

It's the reason I did the press conference two days ago. I care about the FBI's reputation, I care about the Justice Department, I care about the whole system deeply. And so I decided I'm going to do something no Director's ever done before. I'm not going to tell the Attorney General or anybody else what I'm going to say or even I'm going to say it. They didn't know nor did the media know until I walked out what I was going to talk about and then I offered extraordinary transparency, which I'm sure confused and bugged a lot of people.

It's essential that people see as much as they can so they can make their judgment. Again, they may conclude I'm an idiot and that I should reason different, but what I hope they will not conclude is that I'm a dishonest person. I'm here trying to do the right thing in the right way.

I lead 36,000 people who have that as their spine. That's what I want them to know. I don't care that people agree or disagree about our democracy, but at its core, you need to know there are good people trying to do the right thing all day long. You pay for them and we'll never forget that.DESAULNIER: I appreciate that.

Within context of these are human institutions -- pretty clear to me as non-lawyer that you had a bright line in terms of your decision about pursuing prosecution. But you did spend an extended period of time talking about, what I think I take from you as being a fairly objective analysis of what was careless in terms of handling of it, either ascribed to the former secretary of state or to the department.

You said, and I quote, during your comments, "while not the focus of our investigation, we also developed evidence that a security culture of the State Department in general with respect to the use of unclassified e-mail systems in particular was generally lacking in the kind of care classified information found elsewhere in the government."

That's accurate, isn't it?

COMEY: Yes, sir.

DESAULNIER: So struggling with this, and this is in the context of this hearing, oversight in State Department in this committee, as to how do we go from here, and be clearer about how the State Department -- we'll talk about this with the I.G., and some of the comments former Secretary Powell has made including that the absurdity of the retroactive classification.

And now we have 1,000 of these e-mails from Secretary Clinton that's out in the public and are being spread even further. So there are other people involved.

Sitting there, how does this committee go forward to make sure the State Department can still function in the way it does with human beings and have conversations that are both transparent, but also national security?

What are the things we need to do to make sure that this doesn't happen again?

COMEY: Well, I think a good start -- I think the reason the chairman has the I.G. from the State Department here is to start that conversation. The I.G. knows deeply the culture of a department and is far better equipped than I to say, you ought to focus here, you ought to focus there to make it better.

So I think that's the place to start. DESAULNIER: Thank you, Mr. Director. I yield back.

CHAFFETZ: Thank you. We'll now recognize the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. DesJarlais, for five minutes.

DESJARLAIS: Director Comey, thank you for appearing so quickly on short notice. I think it's really important that you're here because of the way you laid out the case on Tuesday, there is a perception that you felt one way and then came to another conclusion.

I, like many of my colleagues, put a post up back in my district and let them know you were coming. And in less than 24 hours, I had 750 questions sent to ask you. So again, thank you for being here.

But a common theme, just to summarize a lot of those concerns, were that in this case Clinton was above the law, that there was a double standard and a lot of that was based on the way you presented your findings.

Now, your team, you said you did not personally interview her on Saturday, but your team did for about three-and-a-half hours, correct?

COMEY: Yes.

DESJARLAIS: OK. Do you know, in reading the review or the summary, did they ask Hillary Clinton about her comment that she had never sent or received classified information over private e-mail?

COMEY: I think so, but I can't -- I can't remember specifically.

DESJARLAIS: OK.

COMEY: It's a very long, 302. I'd have to check and then get back to you.

DESJARLAIS: OK. And we'll get access to that.

Do you know if they asked her when she said that there was nothing marked classified on my e-mails sent or received?

COMEY: Same answer. I'm not sure.

DESJARLAIS: OK. And so the same answer then when she said, I did not e-mail any classified material to anyone on my e-mail, there was no classified material, you don't know whether they asked her that?

COMEY: I don't know whether they asked her that question. The entire interview was going to be -- was focused on, so what did you know, what did you see, what is this document, that kind of thing.

DESJARLAIS: OK. Do you know if she asked her whether she stands by the fact she that said she just used one device and that was for her convenience?

COMEY: I don't know. I know they established, in talking to her, she used many devices during her four years. So I don't know whether they asked her specifically about that statement. That's easy to check, though.

DESJARLAIS: OK. I guess my point is, you're trying to get inside the head of Hillary Clinton in this investigation and know whether there was intent. And so we all know what she told the people. That has been well-documented.

She said that she did not do those things, that she did not send or receive classified e-mails, that she used one server and one device for her convenience.

And since then, I think even in your statement, you recognize that those were not correct. Is that fair?

COMEY: I really don't want to get in the business of trying to parse and judge her public statements. And so I think I've tried to avoid doing that sitting here.

DESJARLAIS: Why do you feel that's important?

COMEY: Because what matters to me is what did she say to the FBI. That's obviously first and foremost for us.

DESJARLAIS: Right.

(CROSSTALK)

DESJARLAIS: Honest people don't need to lie, is that right?

COMEY: Honest people don't need to lie? I hope not.

DESJARLAIS: OK. Well, in this case, for some reason, she felt the need to misrepresent what she had done with this server all throughout the investigation. You guys after a year, brought her in on Saturday and in three-and-a-half hours came out with a conclusion that she shouldn't be prosecuted because there was no intent, is that right?

COMEY: No.

DESJARLAIS: OK. So I don't want to put words in your mouth. But is it fair to say that your interpretation of Hillary Clinton's handling of top secret information, classified documents was extremely careless?

COMEY: Yes.

DESJARLAIS: And is it fair to say that you said that -- you went on to define "extremely careless," that Hillary Clinton's handling of top secret information was sloppy or represents sloppiness?

COMEY: Yes. That's another way of trying to express the same concept.

DESJARLAIS: OK. And then just a few minutes ago, you also stated that you now believe that Hillary Clinton is not nearly as sophisticated as people thought, is that correct?

COMEY: Yes, I think that's fair, actually -- no, not as people thought, but as people would assume about somebody with that background.

DESJARLAIS: OK. So...

COMEY: I'm sorry. I should be clear about this. Technically sophisticated. I'm not opining on other kinds of sophistication.

DESJARLAIS: All right. In the last minute, Director, I want to talk a little bit about precedent, because I think my colleague Trey Gowdy made a great point that there still is really no precedents in terms of punishment for this type of behavior.

Are you particular with Bryan Nishmura's case.

COMEY: Yes.

DESJARLAIS: OK. He's a naval reservist, for those who don't know, and he was prosecuted. What is the difference between his case and Hillary Clinton's case in terms of extremely carelessness and gross negligence, because we're dealing with Statute 793 Section F where it does not require intent, is that correct?

COMEY: I'm sorry, 793-F is the gross negligence standard.

DESJARLAIS: Right.

(CROSSTALK)

DESJARLAIS: Right, and is that why Bryan Nishimura was punished?

COMEY: No. Nishimura was prosecuted under the misdemeanor Statute 1924 on facts that are very different -- if you want me to go through them, I'll go through them, but very different than...

(CROSSTALK)

DESJARLAIS: Well, OK, I think that there has been a review of this case, and they're very similar. And that's why people feel that there's a double standard...

(CROSSTALK)

COMEY: What they're reading in the media is not a complete accounting of the facts in that case.

DESJARLAIS: Well, would you agree then with Representative Gowdy that there still is really no precedents for punishing someone like Hillary Clinton, and she could really go in -- potentially be elected president and do this again without fear of being punished?

COMEY: I don't think I'm qualified to answer that question.

DESJARLAIS: All right. My time has expired. Thank you for your time.

CHAFFETZ: Thank the gentleman.

Now recognize the gentlewoman from New Mexico, Ms. Lujan Grisham.

LUJAN GRISHAM: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I've had the benefit of -- when you're last to -- or nearly last, to really have both the benefit and then to question the kinds of statements and the dialogue back and forth.

And where I'm settled at this point in time is in a couple of places, but particularly, I don't think there's any member in this committee, or quite frankly any member in Congress who doesn't both want and expect that the FBI and the Department of Justice to be -- to operate in a fair, unbiased, and highly independent manner.

Otherwise, you can't appropriately uphold or enforce federal law. And while we've all -- this has been stated in a couple of different ways, I'm going to see if we can't -- I want to get direct answers.

So, Mr. Comey, is there any evidence, given that that's the standard that we all want, desire, and expect, to suggest that Hillary Clinton was not charged by the Department of Justice due to inappropriate political influence or due to her current or previous public positions?

COMEY: Zero. And if there is such evidence, I'd love folks to show it to me.

LUJAN GRISHAM: And in that regard, was there a double standard?

COMEY: No. In fact, I think my entire goal was to avoid a double standard, to avoid what sometimes prosecutors call "celebrity hunting," and doing something for a famous person that you would never do for an ordinary Joe or Jane.

LUJAN GRISHAM: Thank you. And I really appreciate that you're here today and explaining the process in great detail, frankly. And I've -- this committee works at getting specific detail about a variety of reviews, investigations, policies, concepts throughout federal government.

And I think I can say that this committee often finds that we don't get very much clarity or specific responses to the majority of questions that we ask. So I really appreciate that, and that in explaining that what led the FBI to conclude that Hillary Clinton should not be charged.

Saying that, however, I'm still concerned, frankly, that the use of this hearing and some of the public statements made by the elected officials accusing the Department of Justice of using a double standard, without any evidence at all to support that statement, leaning on accusations of such, in fact jeopardizes the very thing we want the most, which is an apolitical and independent Department of Justice. And we have every right to ask these tough questions and to be clear that the process that you use for everyone, including elected officials, works, and that there's a responsibility not to substitute your own political preferences for the outcome of an independent and apolitical Department of Justice investigations on any level, whether it involves Hillary Clinton or anybody else.

Do you agree with that general statement?COMEY: Yes.

LUJAN GRISHAM: For me, that's a really important ethical line that I believe should never be crossed. I worry that some of what we did today, could be frankly interpreted as violating that very standard.

And for that I certainly want the American people and my constituents who are watching to understand that very important line and to be sure that our responsibility is better served making sure that we do have, in fact, an independent body, whose aim it is to bring about truth and justice and uphold the federal law.

And, sir, based on everything that you said today, I don't see any reason to disagree with your statements, your assessments or the explanation of that process. With the little time I do have left, I do want to say that given that some of the classified material that we've both debated and talked about today can be classified later or up classified.

Or that other agencies have different determinations of what constitutes classified and not. I do think that's a process that warrants refining. And if something can come out of this hearing about making sure that we do something better in the future, for everyone, not just appointed or elected officials that, that ought to be something that we do.

I'm often confused by some of the things that are clearly told to us in a classified briefing that appear to be different or -- or already out in the public in some way, and I'm not sure who's making those decisions. I honor my responsibility to the highest degree, but I think that's a process that could use some significant refining, and that's my only suggestion, sir.

Thank you for being here today.

COMEY: Thank you.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the -- I thank the gentlewoman. We'll now recognize the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. Carter for five minutes.

CARTER: Thank you Mr. Chairman. And Director Comey, thank you for being here today. I appreciate it. I'm over here.

COMEY: Oh, sorry.

CARTER: I'm over here. And I'm gonna -- I'm gonna be real quick and -- and try to be succinct. I -- I want to clarify some things that you said, and -- and look, I -- I don't want to go over everything that everybody's been through today. I mean, we've had some great questions that have -- have asked you about, you said this, she said that.

Representative Gowdy made a great case of, you know, this is what she said under oath, and -- and publicly, and yet, you dispute that and say, no, this is the case. But, look I'm just -- just got a couple of questions. OK?

First of all, did I understand you correctly that your decision, that this decision was made within 3 and 1/2 hours of -- of an interview, and that was all?

COMEY: No, we investigated it for a year.

CARTER: You investigate, but you interviewed her for 3 and 1/2 hours last week and then came to the conclusion?

COMEY: Correct. We interviewed her on Saturday for 3 and 1/2 hours, the last step in a year-long investigation.

CARTER: OK. Now, as I understand that Hillary Clinton has testified that -- that the servers that she used were always safe and secure. Yet, you refute that and say, no, that is not the case at all. Were they ever secure? Were the servers that she would use, were they ever secure?

COMEY: The challenge of security is not binary, it's just degrees of security. It was less secure than one at the State Department, or as I said, even one at a private commercial provider like a Gmail.

CARTER: Well, let me ask you this, she's got staff, and she's got people around her. Did they know she was doing this? Did they know that she was using these other devices? Did anybody ever bring it to her attention and say, hey, you don't suppose to be doing that?

COMEY: I think a lot of people around the secretary understood she was using a private personal email set...

CARTER: Than why didn't they say something? Don't they have a responsibility as well?

COMEY: That's an important question that goes to the culture of the State Department that's worth asking.

CARTER: I -- you -- I mean, look we all surround ourselves, we get people and we depend on to help us. I don't -- should they be held responsible for that? For not bringing that to someone's attention? If I see someone who's breaking -- who's not following protocol, is it my responsibility to report them?

COMEY: Yes. Yeah.

CARTER: Well, I certainly...

COMEY: Especially when it comes to security matters. Obligation to report a security violation that you may witness, whether it's involving you or one of your co-workers. But this is about -- so if someone...

CARTER: What about Bryan Pagliano? Did -- did he ever know? Do you know if he knew that she was -- she was not following proper protocol here?

COMEY: He helped set it up.

CARTER: He helped set it up? So obviously he knew.

COMEY: Yeah. Obviously he knew that...

CARTER: OK, is anything going to be done to him? Any -- any prosecution, or any discipline, any...

COMEY: I don't know about discipline, but there's not going to be any prosecution of him.

CHAFFETZ: Will the -- will the gentleman yield?

CARTER: I yield.

CHAFFETZ: My understanding, Director, is that you offered him immunity. Why did you offer him immunity and what did you get for it?

COMEY: You know, that I have to -- I'm not sure what I can talk about in open setting about that.

CHAFFETZ: Well, he's not going to be prosecuted, so...

COMEY: Right, but I -- I want to be careful. I'm doing this 24 hours after the investigation closed. I want to be thoughtful, because we're -- we're as you know, big about the law, that I'm following the law about what I disclose about that. So I'll have to get back to you on that one. I don't want to answer that off the cuff.

CARTER: Director Comey, I -- I am not a lawyer. I'm not an investigator. I'm a pharmacist, but I'm a citizen. And citizens are upset. I watched with great interest last -- earlier this week when you laid out your case. And -- and I'm telling you, you laid it out, bam, bam, bam, here's what she did wrong, wrong, wrong, wrong.

And then all of a sudden you used the word, however. And -- and it was like you could hear a gasp throughout the country of people saying, ah, here we go again. Do you regret presenting it in a way like that?

COMEY: No, I -- I'm highly -- I think I didn't use the word "however." I try never to use that in speaking, but I did lay it out, I thought in the way that made sense and that I hoped was maximum transparency for people. And I know...

CARTER: But that's the point -- I'm sorry, but that's the point it didn't make sense. The way you were laying it out, it would have made sense in the way that the questions have been asked here and -- and we've made all these points of where -- where she was obviously told lies underneath -- under oath that it would have been OK, we -- we finally got one here.

COMEY: Yeah, I think it made sense. I just hope folks go back, maybe with a cup of tea and open their minds and read my statement again, carefully. But again, if you disagree, that's OK.

CARTER: But it -- but it -- but when we -- look, I've only been here 18 months. And I'm gonna tell ya, it -- this "inside the beltway" mentality, no wonder people don't trust us.

COMEY: Well, I -- I have no -- I don't know who you're talking about. I have no kind of "inside the beltway" mentality.

CARTER: But this is an example of what I'm talking about here. It -- it -- it -- just was as a non-lawyer, as a non-investigator, it would appear to me, you have got a hell of a case.

COMEY: And I'm telling you do, and I hope people take the time to understand why.

CARTER: Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

CHAFFETZ: Thank the gentleman. I will now recognize the gentleman from Arizona, Mr. -- Mr. Goshar. Oh, let's go ahead and go to the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. Mulvaney first.

MULVANEY: Thank you gentleman. Director Comey, earlier today you heard a long list of statements that Ms. Clinton has made previously, both to the public and to Congress that were not factually accurate.

I think you went down the whole long list. When she met with you folks on Saturday last week, I take it she didn't say the same things at that interview?

COMEY: I'm not equipped sitting here without the 302 in front of me to answer in that broad...

MULVANEY: But it's your -- it's your testimony...

COMEY: But I have no basis -- we do not have a basis for concluding she lied to the FBI.

MULVANEY: Gotcha. Did anybody ask her on Saturday, why she told y'all one thing and told us another?

COMEY: I don't know as I sit here. I mean, I can -- I'll figure that out.

MULVANEY: Would that have been of interest to you in helping to establish intent?

COMEY: It could have been, sure.

MULVANEY: More importantly I think, did anybody ask her why she set up the email system as she did in the first place?

COMEY: Yes.

MULVANEY: And the answer was convenience?

COMEY: Yeah, it was already there. It was a system her husband had and so she just jumped on to it.

MULVANEY: Were you aware that just earlier this week, her -- her assistant actually said it was for an entirely different reason? It was to -- it was to keep emails from being accessible, and that it was for concealment purpose. So she was -- Huma Abedin was asked in her deposition why it was set up.

And it was said, to keep her personal emails from being accessible. To the question, to whom? To anybody. Where you aware of that testimony?

COMEY: Generally, yes.

MULVANEY: OK. So here's -- here's sort of the summary I take from what we've done today, which is that over the course of the entire system, what she did, she intentionally set up a system. According to your -- to your testimony, your findings, she was careless regarding its technical security.

I think you said, that even a basic free account, a Gmail account had better security than she had. And she did that according to her own staffer's sworn deposition, "For the purpose of preventing access to those emails." As a result of this, she exposed top secret information to potential hack by foreign actors. You've seen the emails. We have not.

I think you said earlier that the emails could be of the sort that would put national security at risk. And I think we had testimony earlier that -- and got you to -- to acknowledge that it might even put our agents overseas at risk.COMEY: Yeah, I don't think I agree with that. But, it's still important.

MULVANEY: Okay, all right. She kept all of that secret until after she left the State Department. She lied about it, or at least made untrue statements about it, after it finally came to light. She thereafter ordered the destruction of evidence, evidence that was destroyed so thoroughly, that you folks could not do an adequate recovery.

Yet she receives no criminal penalty. So I guess this is my question to you, are we assume, as we sit here today, that if the next President of the United States does the exact same thing on the day he or she is sworn into office, sets up a private email service for the purpose of concealing information from the public or from anybody, that as a result of that, potentially exposes national security level information to our enemies, lies about it and then destroys the evidence during an investigation, that there be no criminal charges, if you're the FBI Director, against that person?

COMEY: Yeah, that's not a question the FBI Director should answer. I mean, I ...

MULVANEY: No, I'm asking you, I'm asking you if, if she does the exact same thing as President as she's done today, your result would be the exact same as it was 40 hours ago. There would be no criminal findings, right?

COMEY: If the facts were exactly the same?

MULVANEY: Right.

COMEY: And the law was exactly the same?

MULVANEY: Right.

COMEY: Yeah, the result would be the same.

MULVANEY: And I guess under the theory that if there's, the law is to be equally applied to everybody. That if a White House staffer does the exact same thing, for the exact same purpose and exposes the exact same risks, that there'll be no criminal action against that person.

It could be, as you've mentioned administrative penalties, there are no administrative penalties as I understand it, by the way, against the President, correct?

COMEY: I don't think so, but I'm not at ...

(CROSSTALK)

MULVANEY: I don't think there are either. I don't think, I don't think you can take away the President's top security clearance and I'm pretty sure you can't fire the President, because we've tried.

Not only would a staffer not have any criminal charges brought against them, but it, I suppose a summer intern could do the exact same thing under the theory that, we're going to apply the law equally regardless of who the people are.

My question to you is this, and it's not a legal question, it's, I guess it's a common-sense ordinary question that folks are asking me, from a national security standpoint, somebody who used to lecture on that, does that bother you?

COMEY: The mishandling of classified information bothers me no matter what circumstance it occurs in, because it has national security implications.

MULVANEY: Does it bother you that the precedent that you are setting today, may well lead to a circumstance where our top secret information continues to be exposed to our potential enemies?

COMEY: No, in this sense, the precedent that I'm setting today is my absolute best effort to treat people fairly without regard to who they are. If that continues to be the record of the FBI and Justice Department, that's what it should be.

The rest of the implications in your question, are beyond that.

They're important, but they're not, they're not for the FBI to answer. We should, we should aspire to be apolitical, facts in the law, treat Joe the same as Sally as Secretary so-and-so. That's my goal.

MULVANEY: If you would come to a different decision, I, by the way, I, I tend to (inaudible) agree everything you just said, if you'd come to a different decision, do you think it would have a different precedential value, that would keep our information more safe?

COMEY: If we decided to recommend criminal ...

MULVANEY: Yes Sir.

COMEY: Charges here? I don't know, that's a good question. I don't know. I could, I could argue it both way, I guess I'm a lawyer, I can argue everything both ways, but I could argue that both ways.

MULVANEY: All right, thank you Director Comey. Thank you Mr. Chairman.

COMEY: Yeah.

CHAFFETZ: Thank you Gentlemen. Now recognize the gentlemen from Arizona, Mr. Gosar, for five minutes.

GOSAR: Thanks Mr. Chairman. Thank you Mr. Comey for being here. My, my colleague alluded to Brian Pagliano, the IT advisor and were you made aware of the deal of immunity with him?

COMEY: I am aware.

GOSAR: Now that Attorney General Lynch has stated there'll be no charges, there's many that suspect that in his (inaudible) that he failed to answer questions in his congressional deposition, that he had something to hide. Why did your investigators at the DOJ decide it was necessary to offer Mr. Pagliano immunity?

COMEY: As I said in response to your earlier question, I need to be more thoughtful about what I say about an immunity deal in public. May be totally fine, just don't want to screw up because we're doing this quickly.

GOSAR: Okay.

COMEY: In general I can answer, because I've done it many times as a Prosecutor. You make a grant of immunity in order to get information that you don't think you could get otherwise.

GOSAR: But you know that there maybe something there in hindsight, right? You're looking, you're looking ahead because of the pertinent information this person possesses?

COMEY: Right, they may have, they, you believe they have relevant information to the investigation.

GOSAR: So, did the investigators draft an interview report known as a 302 with Mr. Pagliano?

COMEY: Yes.

GOSAR: Do you have any importance of this case where you commit to voluntary disclosing the 302's for review of Brian Pagliano and other witnesses interviewed on, as part of your investigation?

COMEY: I'll commit to giving you everything I can possibly give you under the law, and to doing it as quickly as possibly. That's said then, that means I got to go back and sort it out. For example, the 302 of Secretary Clinton, it's classified at the TSSCI level, so we got to sort through all that, but we'll do it, we'll do it quickly.

GOSAR: Yeah, I know you've done this, because you've done this for Lois Learner and other cases, so we would expect that. Now, Director Comey, Hillary Clinton testified before Congress and told the American people multiple times that she never emailed any classified information to anyone on her private email servers. Your investigation revealed a 110 of Clinton's emails, 52 email chains contained classified information. Clinton told the American people, and I quote, "The laws and regulations in effect when I was Secretary State, allowed me to use my email for work. This is undisputed." Your investigation revealed that that also wasn't true. Clinton claimed she turned over all her work related emails.

Your investigator, investigation revealed that this wasn't also true. Clinton claimed that there was no security breaches and her private servers had numerous safeguards. Your investigation revealed eight email chains on Clinton's private servers containing top secret information. And that it was possible, hostile, "Hostile actors gained access to sensitive information."

Further, multiple people she emailed with regularity were hacked by hostile actors and her private servers are less secure than a Gmail account, making a security breach all the more likely. Director Comey, it's a federal crime, as you know, to mishandle classified information in a grossly negligent way, and you stated Clinton and her colleagues were extremely careless.

Clinton was publicly, has publicly stated she was well aware of the classification requirements. Then she broke the law anyway. Multiple people have been prosecuted for less and there's a growing trend of abuses in senior level employees.

The only difference between her and others, is her total resistance to acknowledge, to acknowledge her irresponsible behavior, that jeopardized our national security and the American people. I think you should have recommended Clinton be prosecuted under Section 793, or Section 1024 or Title 18.

If not who, if not now, when? Your recommendation deprived the American people of their opportunity for justice in this matter.

There shouldn't be a double standards for the Clintons and they shouldn't be above the law. With that, I'm going to yield the rest of my time, gentlemen from South Carolina, Mr. Gowdy.

GOWDY: Thank you Doctor Gosar. Director Comey, I want to go back to the issue of intent for just a second. We could disagree on whether or not it's an element of the offense, let's assume for the sake of argument, that you're right and I'm wrong and that it is an element of the offense.

Secretary Clinton said that she was, "Well aware of classification requirements". Those are her words, not mine and not yours. So if she were, "Well aware of classification requirements", how did that impact your analysis of her intent? Because I've heard you this morning, describe her as being less than sophisticated. She disagrees with that.

COMEY: Well, I was talking about technical sophistication. The question is, I would hope everybody who works in the Government is aware of classification requirements. The question then is, if you mishandle classified information, when you did that thing, did you know you were doing something that was unlawful? That's the intent question.

GOWDY: All right, well you and I are going to have to get together some other time and discuss all the people we prosecuted who were unaware that they were breaking the law. That, there are lots of really dumb defendants out there, who don't know that what they're doing is against the law. But let's go with what you say ...

COMEY: I disagree. I, you may have prosecuted a lot of those folks. I did not prosecute all those folks.

GOWDY: I was a gunner prosecutor and you were a white collar prosecutor. Trust me, there, there are lots of people who don't know you can't kill other people. Let me ask you this, on the issue of intent, you say it was convenience, okay? You're a really smart lawyer, if it were convenience Director, she wouldn't have waited two years to return the documents and she wouldn't have deleted them four years after they were created.

So you can't really believe that her intent was convenience when she never turned them over until Congress started asking for them, could you?

COMEY: Yeah my focus, and I hope I made this clear, my focus is on, what was the thinking around the classified information. I mean it's relevant why the system was set up and the thinking there. But she didn't, I don't understand her to be saying, we'll I think I've said it already, that, that's my focus.

GOWDY: So, I know I'm out of time, but, but it just strikes me, you are reading a specific intent element into a gross negligence statute, not even general intent?

CHAFFETZ: Gentlemen's time.

GOWDY: A specific intent ...

CHAFFETZ: Gentleman's time has expired.

GOWDY: Element.

COMEY: Yeah. Is that? Oh, sorry.

CHAFFETZ: Go, the Director can answer. COMEY: I enjoyed, I enjoyed talking with him. The, the question you've got to ask is, why is it that the Department of Justice, since 1917, has not used that gross negligence statute for charging at once in an espionage case. And whether their decision was smart or not, that is the record of fairness.

And so you have to decide, do I treat this person against that record? And if I do, is that a fair thing to do? Even if you're not worried about the constitutionality of it, and my judgment is, no reasonable prosecutor would do that. That would be celebrity hunting. That will be treating this person differently than John Doe.

MULVANEY: Director, I want to follow up on that.

Why did you do what you did? My interpretation of what the FBI is supposed to be doing, is to come to a determination of the facts and then turn it over to a prosecutor. You were a prosecutor but you are not a prosecutor now.

COMEY: Right.

MULVANEY: It is unprecedented that an FBI Director gave the type of press conference that he did and took a position that an unreasonable prosecutor would only take this case forward. Why would do you that?

COMEY: Yes, it's a great question.

Everything I did would have been done privately in the normal course. We have great conversation in the FBI, as prosecutors we make recommendations, we argue back and forth. What I decided to do was offer transparency to the American people about the "whys" of that, what I was going to do because I thought it was very, very important for their confidence in the system of justice. And within that their confidence in the FBI.

I was very concerned that if I didn't show that transparency, that in that lack of transparency people would say, "what is going on here -- something seems squirrely here? So I said I would do something unprecedented because I think it is unprecedented situation.

Now, the next Director who is criminally investigating one of the two candidates for president may find him or herself bound by my precedent. OK, if that happens in the next 100 years, they will have to deal with what I did. I decided it was worth doing.

CHAFFETZ: Mr. Cummings.

CUMMINGS: Director, I have just one question.

I'm sitting here listening to this and I really -- this is something that bothered me in the Lois Lerner case and in this case. I'm wondering of what your opinion -- Ms. Lawrence talked about this -- the chilling effect of your having to come here and justify your decisions.

I know that you have been really nice and you explained why you did what you did and I'm glad you are doing it, but -- you know, do you at all -- taking off -- I'm talking about -- here you have people making decisions and then being pulled here in the Congress to then say - OK, to be questioned about the decisions. At what point, or do you even think about it becoming a chilling effect? Because most people when their decision is made, they don't get this kind of opportunity.

As you well know, there are no statements. They either get indicted or they are not. I know you see this as a special case. I'm wondering whether you agree with Ms. Lawrence that we may be just going down a slippery slope? That's all I want to know.

COMEY: My honest answer is I don't think so.

When I talked to the Chairman, I agreed to come because I think the American people care deeply about this. There's all kinds of folks watching this at home or being told, "well, lots of other cases are being prosecuted and she wasn't." I want them to know that's not true.

I want to have this conversation. I welcome the opportunity. Look, it's a pain. I have had to go to the bathroom for about an hour but is...

CHAFFETZ: Don't worry, we're half way done.

COMEY: It is really important to do because this is an unprecedented situation.

Transparency is the absolute best thing for me and for democracy. And I realize Mr. Chairman, my folks told me I screwed up one fact that I should fix. I was mis-remembering, in the Petraeus case, we didn't find the note books in the attic, we found it in his desk. So I wanted to make sure I was fair to him about that.

I really don't think it has a chilling effect. Again, if there is another presidential candidate being investigated by the FBI, maybe they will be bound by this. Lord willing it will not happen again ,certainly, my 2,619 days left on this job. It won't happen on my term but if it does, I won't be chilled.

CHAFFETZ: If we need a humanitarian break just give me a cue.

COMEY: I feel like we are almost done.

CHAFFETZ: We're on the right trajectory, yes.

We would like to recognize the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Palmer for five minutes.

PALMER: Thank you Mr. Chairman.

Director Comey, your statement on Tuesday indicated that Secretary Clinton and her colleagues sent or received e-mails marked classified on an unsecured private e-mail server that may or may not have been hacked by foreign power. Are you aware that teenage hackers hack personal accounts of CIA Director John Brennan, the Director of U.S. National Intelligence, James Clapper and FBI deputy director Mark F. Giuliano?

COMEY: I am intensely aware. They didn't hack in the way we normally think of it, but they got there by treachery, got access to their accounts.

PALMER: The point I want to make that is that these were personal - commercial protected personal e-mail accounts that contained no classified information. Yet, Ms. Clinton used her personal e-mail, not a commercial account, on a server in her basement without even this basic protection, and transmitted classified information through that account.

If teenagers in England were able to hack personal e-mail accounts of the Director of the CIA, the Director of the U.S. National Intelligence, and the Deputy Director of the FBI, does it concern you that sophisticated hackers or hackers working for foreign interest never attempted? I mean, does it seem reasonable that they never attempted or were never successful in hacking Mrs. Clinton's personal e-mail accounts or one of her devices?

COMEY: It concerns me a great deal. That is why we spent so much time trying to see if we could figure out -- see finger prints of that.

PALMER: You said in your statement regarding your recommendation not to prosecute - to be clear, this is not to suggest that in similar circumstances a person who engaged in this activity would face no consequences. To the contrary, these individuals are often subject to security or administrative sanctions, that is not what we are deciding here. Do you stand by that?

COMEY: Yes.

PALMER: I thought you would.

You also said, "you could not prove intent." I want to touch on a couple things here. One, a reasonable person would not have compromised classified information by keeping that information on inadequately secured private devices. In other words, such a person would be viewed as unreasonable and unsuitable for any position in our government that included any responsibility for handling and protecting classified information. Would you agree? COMEY: I would agree it would be negligent. I can't prejudge a suitability determination but it would be definitely be stared at very hard.

PALMER: Let me tell you why I bring this up.

I sat up here next to Mr. Hurd who served our country valiantly, put his life on the line. I don't know if you can sense the passion and intensity of his questions, because he knows people whose lives are on the line right now. In regard to his questions, if someone -- a U.S. intelligence agent had mission compromised or worse, had been killed, or injured, or captured because of carelessness of someone responsible for protecting classified information, would intent matter at that point?

COMEY: In deciding whether to prosecute the person, of course. Yes, that's the answer. Of course, it would - the matter would be deadly serious, but the legal standards would be the same.

PALMER: What we are dealing with in this hearing is not the lack of due diligence in handling routine government data or information, but the lack of due diligence by Secretary Clinton and her carelessness in handling classified information that could have compromised American national security - as Mr. Hurd pointed out, the missions and personal safety of our intelligence agents. That troubles me greatly.

And I think the issue here -- I do respect you. I have spoken in your defense many times, at this point to my detriment. I do believe that your answers are honest and factual.

Based on your answers regarding plus Mrs. Clinton's use of e-mail and based on what we know, it seems to me that she is stunningly incompetent in understanding of basic technology of e-mail and stunningly incompetent in handling classified information. I mean, you should never associate the Secretary of State and classified information with the word careless. It doesn't matter.

I mean, we have to exercise the utmost due diligence. All of us in this Committee do in handling this. You do in prosecuting cases and I see that in what you are trying to do. I just think we need to leave here with this understanding that there is more to this story than we know.

If a foreign hacker got into this I can assure you that they know what was in those e-mails that were deleted. They read them all. They know what is in the e-mails that we never received.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the gentleman. We will now go to the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. Grothman for five minutes. GROTHMAN: Thank you. Thanks for coming on over to the Rayburn building.

As I understand it your testimony today, is that you have not brought criminal charges against Hillary Clinton in part because you feel you can't prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, and in part because she didn't understand the laws with regard to e-mails, and servers, and that sort of thing. Question for you. When she erased these e-mails -- you, however, did say that if somebody did this under you there would be consequences.

If somebody did exactly what Mrs. Clinton did or was one of your lieutenants or you think (ph) one of the lieutenants under the CIA or some other agency that deals with top secret documents, what would you do to those underlings (ph)?

COMEY: I would make sure that they were adjudicated through a security disciplinary proceeding to figure out what are all circumstances and what punishment discipline is appropriate that could range from being terminated to being reprimanded and a whole spectrum between suspensions, loss of clearance, it's a bunch of different options.

GROTHMAN: OK but somehow let's say one of your top two or three lieutenants you find out that they've had this separate server out there and they're keeping secret documents, flipping them around, do you think they should be fired? Not criminally charged but fired?

COMEY: Yeah, I don't think it's appropriate to say. I think it should go through -- we have a very robust process. There ought to be a very intense suitability review of that person.

Maybe there's something we're missing that would mitigate the punishment we would impose but it would have to go through our system.

GROTHMAN: OK next question. Just for the listening audience, here. At first when I hear about erasing e-mails I think it's like you know, like on my phone where I might erase an auto insurance solicitation.

The erasers here, however, were not just Mrs. Clinton pressing delete. Or they -- there was a much greater effort made to make sure that these e-mails would never be recovered. Do you want to comment on what was done to erase the e-mails?

COMEY: I think what you're referring to is after her lawyers -- her lawyers say -- although I don't -- I'm not able to verify this. There were 60,000 or so left at the end of 2014.

They went through them in a way I described in my statement two days ago and then they produced the ones that were work related and then they erased from their system the ones that were not work related. That was done using technical tools basically to remove them from lawyers -- from the servers to wipe them away.

GROTHMAN: OK so in other words, the effort was not just Mrs. Clinton, where somebody went delete, delete, delete. They went above and beyond that so that your top technical experts could not get back at these e-mails, correct?

COMEY: Right, not fully. We were able to...

GROTHMAN: You recovered a few.

COMEY: Yeah, we can go up through the lawyer's laptops and see some traces but not fully -- not fully recover them.

GROTHMAN: OK now, the information that I have and you can correct me if I'm wrong implies that these erasers were done in December of 2014 after the Benghazi scandal broke, after there were questions about the Clinton Foundation.

Did you ever come across why she allowed these e-mails to sit out there even for years after she stopped being Secretary of State but all of a sudden as these other scandals began to bubble up she felt -- or her lawyers felt -- that she had to erase them?

COMEY: Yeah I think the way the process worked is she had e- mails that were just on her system. She actually had deleted some I think over time as an ordinary user would. And then the State Department contacted her and other former secretaries and said we have a gap in our records, we need you to look and see if you have e-mails and give them back.

She then tasked her lawyers to engage in this review process of that 60 some thousand and make that cut and then was asked by her lawyers at the end, do you want us to keep the personal e-mails. And she said I have no use for them anymore.

It's then that they issued the direction that the technical people delete them.

GROTHMAN: Do you think Mrs. Clinton knew that the technical people were erasing these e-mails so that even your top technical experts could recover them?

COMEY: Based on my sense now for technical sophistication, I -- I -- I don't think so.

GROTHMAN: You don't think the lawyers told her that that's what they were doing? Erasing all these e-mails that everybody on this committee wanted to look at?

COMEY: Yeah -- and I'm sure we've asked this...

GROTHMAN: What type of lawyer wouldn't tell their client they were doing that? But...

COMEY: I don't think -- I think -- I think our evidence -- our investigation is they did not. That they asked her, do you want to keep them and they said no and they said wipe them away.

GROTHMAN: OK. Now, as I understand it, the goal was just to erase personal e-mails but you have recovered e-mails that wouldn't be considered personal e-mails at all.

COMEY: Correct.

GROTHMAN: OK I don't know that you didn't recover them (ph) but based upon the e-mails that you recovered presumably, her lawyers or somebody was going well beyond personal e-mails. Is it possible we'll never be able to recover e-mails that dealt with the Clinton Foundation or dealt with the Benghazi scandal?

Is it possible because of what her lawyers did that they were erasing things that were incriminating, maybe involving items that you were not particularly investigating but these have now been destroyed forever?

COMEY: If it's possible -- as I said in my statement on Tuesday, we did not find evidence to indicate that they did the eraser to conceal things of any sort. But it's possible, as I said on Tuesday, that there are work related e-mails that were in the batch that were deleted.

GROTHMAN: I'm sorry, when you go to this length to make sure you can never recover the e-mails who are erased, wouldn't you think the intent is to make sure nobody looks at them again?

Why -- why -- otherwise, couldn't you just (inaudible).

CHAFFETZ: I thank the gentleman. We'll give the director time to -- if he wants to respond.

COMEY: I guess it's a bit circular. You delete because you want to delete. But that -- that -- what I mean is we didn't find any evidence of evil intent and intent to obstruct justice.

GROTHMAN: You wouldn't haven able to because you don't know what was deleted.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the -- we'll now recognize Mr. Russell of Oklahoma, for five minutes.

RUSSELL: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Director Comey, thank you for your long service and your long suffering. I think we're toward the end of the line, here. I want to say for the record with regard to national security, I sleep a little easier at night knowing that you're at the helm of the FBI. And thank you for your dedicated service and your integrity. You have stated in your statement and also multiple times here, that there should be consequences for the mishandling of state secrets. If I hold a top secret SCI in the bureau and I did hold one when I was in the United States Army in a career of service.

I handle classified information here, if I -- if I held that in the FBI and you discover that I mishandled state secrets on a private server in my basement, would I be trusted by the bureau to further handle top secret information?

COMEY: Maybe not. You would go immediately through a security process to review whether you should continue working for us and if you do what clearances you should retain.

RUSSELL: If I violated the handling of state secrets in the FBI, would you consider me the best suitable candidate for promotion and higher responsibility?

COMEY: It would be a serious concern and we would stare at it very hard in a suitability review.

RUSSELL: Although you have recommended to the Department of Justice that no criminal charges be brought to bear (ph), are you recommending to the Department of Justice that there be no consequences for mishandling of state secrets?

COMEY: No, my recommendation was solely with respect to criminal charges.

RUSSELL: What would you recommend?

COMEY: I don't think it's for me to recommend.

RUSSELL: But you do -- you've been very open and even stated why you felt that these were unique sets of circumstances that called for greater transparency. You do make recommendations routinely, as you've stated here today.

We're talking top secret SCI information that's been mishandled. You would take a dim view to that if I were an agent. What consequence -- this is what the American people feel exasperated about. There seems to be no consequence.

So in a case like this, if it's not going to be criminal charges recommended, what are the American people to do to hold their officials accountable if maybe they shouldn't be trusted for further promotion and higher responsibility?

COMEY: And what I -- and what I meant earlier is that's not a question that the American people should put to FBI director. I can answer about things within my remit but that -- I understand the question but it's not one for me to answer in my role.

RUSSELL: Well, I hope it's one that the American people answer in the future because we do have a choice about those that would mishandle information. And while we're all fallible human beings and we all make mistakes, in a case like this, for decades of my service in the army infantry and handling top secret SCI information and then as a member of Congress, we know those responsibilities.

Is it your view and others that have interviewed Mrs. Clinton that she would not have known what those responsibilities were?

COMEY: No, I think in a -- in a way, you would expect she understood the importance of protecting classified information.RUSSELL: Well, I would agree with that and there's been a breach. I think that the American people demand a consequence, that they demand an accountability. And I think it's important to uphold the form of our Republican government that we have a consequence. And with that, thank you for your appearance here today.

And I would like to yield the remainder of my time to Chairman Chaffetz.

CHAFFETZ: Thank you, I think if you yield back, through mutual agreement Mr. Cummings and I have agreed that I do have about a dozen or so quick follow up questions.

You have been most generous with your time but I would like to get through this last bit and again, we'll do so with equal time. How did the Department of Justice, or how did the FBI view the incident in which Hillary Clinton instructed Jake Sullivan to take the markings off of a document that was to be sent to her?

COMEY: Yes, we looked at that pretty closely. There was some problem with their secure fax machine and there was an e-mail in which she says in substance, take the headers off of it and send it as a non-paper and as we've dug into that more deeply, we've come to learn that at least this one view of it that is reasonable, that a non-paper in State Department parlance (ph) means a document that contains things we could pass to another government.

So essentially take out anything that's classified and send it to me. Now it turned out that didn't happen, we actually found that the classified fax was then sent, but that's our best understanding of what that was about.

CHAFFETZ: So this was a classified fax?

COMEY: Correct.

CHAFFETZ: So Hillary Clinton sends to Jake Sullivan, Jake -- well let me go back, Jake Sullivan says they say they had issues sending secure fax, they're working on it. Hillary Clinton sends to Jake Sullivan, if they can't, turn into non-paper with no identifying heading and send non-secure. So you're telling me it's a classified piece of information, she's taking off the header and she's instructing them to send it in a non-secure format. Is that not intent?

COMEY: Well that actually caught my attention when I first saw it and what she explained to us in her interview was, and other witnesses too as well, is what she meant by that is make it into a non-classified document, that's what a non-paper is in their world, and send it to us because I don't need the classified stuff I just need the...

CHAFFETZ: Then why take off the heading if it's going to be turned into a non-classified document, why take off the heading?

COMEY: I assume because it would be non-classified anymore so you wouldn't have a classified header on it. Because what she said during her interview...

CHAFFETZ: Because she wanted to be technically correct, is that what you're saying, that you're...

COMEY: No, I think what she said during the interview is I was telling him in essence, send the unclassified document, take the header off, turn it into a non-paper, which is a term I had never heard before but I'm told by people I credit that in diplomatic circles something we can pass to another government...

CHAFFETZ: You are very generous in your accepting of that. Did any unclear individuals receive any classified information over Hillary Clinton's server?

COMEY: Did any uncleared (ph) people receive classified information? I don't think any of the correspondents on the classified e-mails were uncleared people. These were all people with clearances working, doing State Department business, on the unclassed (ph) system.

CHAFFETZ: Did Mr. Pagliano have the requisite security clearance?

COMEY: As I sit here, I can't remember. He was not a participant on the classified e-mail exchanges though.

CHAFFETZ: But he was running the server, he set it up...

COMEY: That's a different question. That's -- I'm sorry I misunderstood your question then. Yes, there's no doubt that uncleared people had access to the server because even after Pagliano there were others who maintained the server who were private sector folks.

CHAFFETZ: So there are hundreds of classified documents on these servers, how many people, without a security clearance had access to that server?

COMEY: I don't know the exact number as I sit here, it's probably more than two, less than ten.

CHAFFETZ: I appreciate your willingness to follow up with this. Did Secretary Clinton's attorneys have the security clearances needed?

COMEY: They did not.

CHAFFETZ: Does that concern you?

COMEY: Oh yes, sure.

CHAFFETZ: Is there any consequence to an attorney rifling through Secretary Clinton's, Hillary Clinton's e-mails without a security clearance?

COMEY: Well, not necessarily criminal consequences but there's a great deal of concern about an uncleared person not subject to the requirements we talked about in the read (ph) in (ph) documents potentially having access. That's why very, very important for us to recover everything we can back from attorneys.

CHAFFETZ: So what's the consequence? I mean here Hillary Clinton gave direction to her attorneys without a security clearance to go through documents that were classified.

COMEY: I think that's what happened in fact, whether that was the direction is a question I can't answer sitting here.

CHAFFETZ: See -- you're parsing (ph) that one a little bit...

COMEY: No, no you were just asking me -- I don't...

CHAFFETZ: What's the consequence? They don't work for the government, we can't fire them so is there no criminal prosecution of those attorneys, should they lose their bar license, what's the consequence to this?

COMEY: But they acted with criminal intent or active with some mal-intent...

CHAFFETZ: What you're telling us is it doesn't matter if you have a security clearance or not because I may be innocent enough, hello I'm just an attorney, I like the secretary, I'm trying to help Hillary Clinton, I'm not trying to give it to the Chinese or the Russians, I'm just trying to help her. So there's no intent? It doesn't matter if these people have security clearances?

COMEY: Of course it matters, that's why I said...

CHAFFETZ: But there's no consequence, Director, there's no consequence.

COMEY: Well, I don't know what consequence you'd have in mind, very...

CHAFFETZ: Prosecute them.

COMEY: An attorney for receiving from his client information that ends up being classified.

CHAFFETZ: I asked you at the very beginning, does Hillary Clinton, is there a reasonable expectation that Hillary Clinton would send and receive if not day -- hourly if not daily, classified information. That's reasonable to think that the Secretary of State would get classified information every moment. She's not the head of Fish and Wildlife so the idea that she would turn over her e-mails, her system, her server to, what it sounds like, up to ten people without security clearances and there's no consequence. So why not do it again?

COMEY: That's a question I don't think you should put to me, you're asking -- I'm talking about my criminal investigation.

CHAFFETZ: But how can that -- there's no intent there, does she not understand that these people don't have security clearances?

COMEY: Surely she understands at least some of them don't have security clearances.

CHAFFETZ: So she understands they don't have security clearances and it's reasonable to think she's going to be in (ph) classified information. Is that not intent to provide a non-cleared person access to classified information?

COMEY: You're mixing it up though. I don't think it's reasonable to assume -- mixing me up, sorry, not your fault -- that someone who is maintaining your server is reading your e-mails, in fact I don't think that's the case here. There's a separate thing which is when she is engaging counsel (ph) to comply with the State Department's request, are her lawyers then exposed information that may be on there that's classified, so...

CHAFFETZ: And did they see any classified information? Did Hillary Clinton's attorneys, without security clearances, see classified information?

COMEY: As (ph) I sit here, I don't know the answer to that.

CHAFFETZ: It has to be yes Director, you came across 110 and they said they went through all of them.

COMEY: Well, they didn't read them all they just looked at headings (ph)...

CHAFFETZ: So their excuse is we saw the e-mails but we didn't read them?

COMEY: You know I think I said this in my statement on Tuesday, they sorted the e-mails by using headers and search terms to try and find work related e-mails, we read them all.

CHAFFETZ: I know that you read them all. Do you think it's reasonable or unreasonable to think that her attorneys, under her director, did or did not read those e-mails? Because there were -- let me go back to this, yes or no, were there or were there not classified e-mails that her -- that Hillary Clinton's attorneys read?

COMEY: I don't know whether they read them at the time.

CHAFFETZ: They -- did Hillary Clinton give non-cleared people access to classified information?

COMEY: Yes. Yes.

CHAFFETZ: What do you think her intent was?

COMEY: I think then was to get good legal representation and to make the production to the State Department. That can be a very tall order, in that circumstance (ph) I don't see the evidence there to make a case that she was acting with criminal intent in her engagement with her lawyers.

CHAFFETZ: And I'd just -- I guess I read criminal intent as the idea that you allow somebody without a security clearance access to classified information. Everybody knows that Director, everybody knows that. I've gone way past my time, let me recognize Mr. Cummings for an equal amount of time.CUMMINGS: Director thank you for your patience. I wanted to clear up some things. I want to make sure I understand exactly what you testified to on the issue of whether Secretary Clinton sent or received e-mails that were marked as classified.

On Tuesday you stated, and I quote, "only a very small number of the e-mails containing classified information bore markings, and I emphasis bore markings, indicating the presence of classified information."

Republicans have pounced on this statement as evidence that Secretary Clinton lied. But today we learned some significant new facts and I hope the press listens to this. First you clarify that you were talking about only three e-mails out of 30 thousand. Your office is reviewed. Is that right?

COMEY: Three, yes.

CUMMINGS: Three out of 30 thousand, is that right?

COMEY: Yes at least 30 thousand.

CUMMINGS: At least 30 thousand. Second, you confirmed that these three e-mails were not properly marked as classified at the time based on Federal guidelines and manuals.

They did not have a classification header; they did not list the original classifier, the agency, officer of origin, reason for classification, or date for declassification. Instead these e-mails included only a single quote see parenthesis, end parenthesis and then end of quotation mark for confidential on one paragraph lower down in the text, is that right?

COMEY: Correct.

CUMMINGS: Third, you testified that based on these facts it would have been a quote "reasonable inference for Secretary Clinton to" quote "immediately" end of quote conclude that these e-mails were not in fact classified. So that was also critical new information. But there's one more critical fact that these e-mails were not in fact, and that is this Director, and to the press these e-mails were not in fact classified.

The State Department explained to us yesterday -- they reported that these e-mails are not classified and that including the little C on these e-mails was a result of a human error. The bottom line is that those little Cs should not have been on those documents because they were not in fact classified.

When Representative Watson Coleman asked you a few minutes ago about this you testified that you had not been informed. And I understand that, I'm not beating up on you I promise you. But can you tell us why Director Comey -- because I want -- because republicans are pouncing saying the Secretary lied and I want to make sure we're clear on this. Can you tell us why Director Comey did you consult, and we're just curious, did you consult about these three e-mails out of the more than 30 thousand or did this just not come up? What happened there?

COMEY: Yes I'm not remembering for sure while I'm here. I'm highly confident we consulted with them and got their view on it. I don't know about what happened yesterday. Maybe their view has changed or they found things out that we didn't know. But I'm highly confident we consulted with them about it.

CUMMINGS: So this is solely different than what we understood yesterday. Today we learned that these e-mails were not in fact classified, they should not have been included in those -- they should not have included those straight (ph) markings. They were not properly marked as classified and the Director of the FBI believes it was reasonable for Secretary Clinton to assume that these documents were not classified. Chairman, you raised a question about whether Secretary Clinton's attorneys have security clearances.

It is my understanding that they did. We can double check that, but that is my understanding. And we'll double check that. Let me move to the next topic. You explained on Tuesday that you were providing quote an update on the FBI's investigation of Secretary Clinton's use of a personal e-mail system during her time as Secretary of State. You explained that you received a referral on this matter from Inspector General of Intelligence Community on July 6th, 2016. Is that right?

COMEY: Yes.

CUMMINGS: Today 10s of thousands of Secretary Clinton's e-mails are probably available on the State Department's website. And our staff have been reviewing the e-mails that were retroactively determined to include classified information. Based on this review, it appears that these e-mails included more than one thousand individuals who sent or received the information that is not redacted as classified. Let me make that clear. About one thousand people sent or received the same information that was contained in Secretary Clinton's e-mails and retroactively classified. Were you aware of that?

COMEY: No, the number doesn't surprised me though.

CUMMINGS: Why not?

COMEY: Because this was -- they were doing the business of the State Department on this e-mail system, so I don't know how many thousands of people work in the State Department. But it doesn't surprise there'd be lots of people on these chains. CUMMINGS: And would you agree that something needs to be done with regard to this classification stuff because classified things are classified then they're not classified, then they are retroactively classified. I mean does that go into your consideration when looking at a case like this?

COMEY: Yes I don't pay much attention to the up classified stuff because we're focused on intent. So if someone classifies it later, it's impossible that you formed intent around that because it wasn't classified at the time. I know that's a process -- I wasn't familiar with it before this investigation, but I don't spend a lot of time focused on it in the course of a criminal investigation.

CUMMINGS: I understand. We also reviewed who these people are and they include a host of very experienced career diplomats with many years of experience. So let me ask you this. When you received this referral from the Inspector General about Secretary Clinton's e-mails, did you also receive any referrals for any of the other one thousand people who sent and received those e-mails? Did you?

COMEY: No.

CUMMINGS: I understand that...

COMEY: Well I should stop there. Within the scope of our investigation was a group of people closer to the Secretary. We looked at their conduct. I forget what the number is -- four or five of them, but then the hundreds of others that may have been on the chain were not the subjects of the investigation.

CUMMINGS: OK, I have 30 more seconds. I understand that Secretary Clinton is the only one running for President, but it does not make sense that she was singled out for a referral to the FBI. Do you agree with that?

COMEY: I don't think I agree with that.

CUMMINGS: So let's go back to Colin Powell; do you think you ought to look at his situation or Condoleezza Rice?

COMEY: Well there's been no referral on them. I know only brief (ph) of service (ph) superficial (ph) level of their circumstances this case strikes me as very different from those and not an inappropriate referral from the Inspector General.

CHAFFETZ: Thank you gentlemen. Who was Hillary Clinton e- mailing that was hacked?

COMEY: Yes I don't want to say in open forum. We can get you that information, but again, I don't want to give any hostile adversaries insight into who -- what we figured out.

CHAFFETZ: Fair enough.

COMEY: So I know the names, but...

CHAFFETZ: Understood, understood. Was there any evidence of Hillary Clinton attempting to avoid compliance with the Freedom of Information Act?

COMEY: That was not the subject of our criminal investigation, so I can't answer that sitting here.

CHAFFETZ: It's a violation of law, is it not?

COMEY: Yes, my understanding is there are civil statutes that apply to that. I don't know...

CHAFFETZ: So let's put the boundaries on this a little bit. What you didn't look at. You didn't look at whether or not there was an intention or the reality of non-compliance with the Freedom of Information Act?

COMEY: Correct.

CHAFFETZ: You did not look at testimony that Hillary Clinton gave in the United State Congress, both the House and the Senate.

COMEY: To see whether it was precarious in some respect?

CHAFFETZ: Yes.

COMEY: No we did not.

CHAFFETZ: Did you review and look at those transcripts as to the intent of your recommendation.

COMEY: I'm sure my folks did. I did not.

CHAFFETZ: So OK, and this is an important point because I think those of us in Congress, knowing that you got a criminal referral from an Inspector General, thought that you were also looking at whether or not Hillary Clinton had provided false testimony, which is a crime, to the Congress, but you didn't look at that.

COMEY: Correct. As I said, I'm confident my folks looked at the substance of the statements, try to understand the circumstances around the entire situation...

CHAFFETZ: Can you confirm that? I just want to make sure.

COMEY: Yes we'll confirm that. Also, again, maybe I'm missing this, but I don't think we got a referral from Congressional Committees -- a perjury referral.

CHAFFETZ: No it was the Inspector General that initiated this. Did the fact that Hillary Clinton refused to be interviewed by the Inspector General, what did that say to you about intent?

COMEY: At least for our criminal investigation, not particularly germane.CHAFFETZ: Are you familiar -- you're familiar there's a website, I mean lots of government agencies have a website. The State Department has a website; state.gov<http://state.gov/>. And they have a YouTube site. Videos that are uploaded to a YouTube site, would those be considered Federal Records?

COMEY: I don't know.

CHAFFETZ: So they're paid for by federal dollars. They're maintained by federal employees. Would that not be a federal record?

CHAFFETZ: Yeah I just don't know. I'm sure there's an expert who can answer that in two seconds but I'm not that expert.

CHAFFETZ: OK we've kept you here a long time. I want to follow up on that. Is the FBI still investigating Hillary Clinton's aides?

COMEY: No is the answer. The Department of Justice declined on all of those who were subjects communicating her through that e-mail system.

CHAFFETZ: What recommendations did you make about her aides?

COMEY: Same, same. We didn't recommend that anybody be prosecuted on those facts.

CHAFFETZ: And if you can help us understand who precisely had been ruled out for prosecution that would be.

COMEY: Sure.

CHAFFETZ: Did you look at the Clinton Foundation?

COMEY: I'm not going to comment on the existence or nonexistence of any other investigations.

CHAFFETZ: Was the Clinton Foundation tied into this investigation?

COMEY: Yeah I'm not going to answer that.

CHAFFETZ: The server that was set up in her home was originally set up by, you said, former President Bill Clinton.

COMEY: Correct.

CHAFFETZ: Do you know who paid for that?

COMEY: I don't sitting here.

CHAFFETZ: OK. I'll have equal time for my colleague and friend, Mr. Cummings.

CUMMINGS: I'm going to yield two minutes of my 3.43 to Mr. Lynch.

LYNCH: Thank you, Mr. Director. We're talking about hacking. And so on this committee, we -- we -- we're very much interested in cyber security. And we review a lot of the major hacks that are going on.

So just recently, I would say in the last 18 months, we've had a major hack February of 2016 at the Department Of Homeland Security and the FBI. We had a hacking group; the Site Intelligence Group reported that a group called crackers with attitude had hacked 9,000 employees' data from Department Of Homeland Security including names, e-mail addresses, locations, and telephone numbers.

Also, 20,000 FBI workers. We had another hack direct evidence obviously of those, another hack at OPM of 4.2 million current and former federal government employees. Their information had been stolen including social security numbers which are not redacted.

We had IRS in May 2015, millions -- no, I'm sorry 200,000 attempted and 100,000 were successful. We had State Department announced a breach of its computer systems after an infiltration forced the agency to temporarily shut down its classification system.

We had the United States Postal Service, 800,000 postal employees, 2.9 million customers. The White House, Washington Post reported back in -- this is back in 2014, that the White House computer was hacked.

National Oceanic Atmospheric Administration; we had -- I'm on another committee for financial services we had Verizon, USCLA health systems, thousands and thousands and thousands of employees, Anthem Health Care, Sony Pictures, Staples, Home Depot, JP Morgan -- it gets into the millions.

Community health systems, Target, TJX, all of these we have direct evidence, millions and millions and million of people their accounts being hacked. Any direct evidence that Hillary Clinton's e- mails were hacked?

COMEY: No.

LYNCH: OK.

I have no further questions. I yield back.

CUMMINGS: Mr. Director, we are about at the end. I'm gonna do a concluding statement and then I think the chairman will. I wanna -- first of all, I want to go back to something that Ms. Watson Coleman said a little earlier. As an African-American man in this country, 66 years old, moving towards the twilight of my life, we cannot allow black men to begin -- to continue to be slaughtered.

This morning I woke up to my wife literally crying, watching the tape of this guy Anton Sterling in Baton Rouge and then she looked at the one the Philandro Castle near Minneapolis.

And I hope you watch them. There's something wrong with this picture. And don't get me wrong, I am all for -- I supported police, I am a lawyer. And I know how important police are and I know there are so many great folks.

But Mr. Director, if you do nothing else in your 2,000 plus days left, you have got to help us get a hold of this issue. It is so painful. I can't even begin to tell you. And so I don't want -- I've been fortunate in my life.

I've been very fortunate that I have not been harmed by the police, but I've been stopped 50 million times. Now, with regard to this hearing I want to thank you again. You know, as I listen to you, you said something that I will never forget. And for some reason it gave me a chill.

You said there are two things that are most important to me, two things. You said my family and my reputation. My family and my reputation. And I -- I don't know whether your family is watching this but I hope that they are as proud of you as I am.

Because you are the epitome of what a public servant is all about. Sacrificing over and over and over again, trying to do the right thing, sometimes coming under ridicule, but yet still doing the right thing. And so I hope that they are proud of you.

The second thing I hope is that no matter what has happened in this hearing, I hope that you know that your reputation is still in tact. And so I conclude by summarizing that I think some of our key findings today, first the director testified that his entire team of 15 to 20 FBI investigators and analysts unanimously agree on the recommendation not to prosecute Secretary Clinton.

Second, Director Comey made crystal clear that Republican claims, some of the talking heads claims of bias are completely false. Testified that he would treat John Doe the same way he would treat Hillary Clinton, that he was forceful on that point.

Third, on the claim that Secretary Clinton sent or received e- mails that were marked as classified, that claim has now been significantly under cut. Those documents were not classified and those markings were not proper.

Finally, Republicans have repeatedly cried foul about a double standard when it comes to Secretary Clinton's e-mails. But Director Comey testified the real double standard would have been to prosecute her with this completely -- with this completely inadequate evidence. Again, director, I thank you. But I thank somebody else. I thank and having practiced law for many years and having dealt with the FBI on many cases, I want to thank the people who work with you because it's not just -- this is not just about you.

This is not just about Secretary Clinton. When we are addressing you the whole cad ray of people who give their blood, their sweat and their tears to protect us as Americans. And I just want to thank them because sometimes I think they are forgotten, unseen, unnoticed, unappreciated and unapplauded.

But today I applaud them and I thank you.

Thank you very much and I yield back.CHAFFETZ: And I thank the gentleman. And I concur with the idea that every FBI agent I have ever met has just been above reproach and they make us proud and they work hard, they put their lives on the line.

They serve overseas, they serve domestically. Can't thank them enough for what they do. And I hope that is part of the message that we carry back.

I cannot thank you personally enough, you, on a personal level, for your accessibility, your ability to get on the phone with me the same day that you make your announcement, and then in rapid fire when I said to you, what day is best -- we're going to have to do this so which day is best for you. And you said Thursday, and here we are and doing it.

I can't thank you enough. I wish all of the government employees would have that attitude and approach. And I really do. And I can't thank you enough. I look forward to working with you and your staff as we move forward in getting this documentation, things that you can't share publicly and others.

It is the intention of the committee to -- I told Mr. Cummings here that we would come back after votes. Votes have been pushed back now a bit. So what I would like to do is to go into recess for five minutes and then we will start with our second panel.

Committee stands in recess until five minutes from now.

Thank you, again, Director Comey.

REP. JORDAN

CHAFFETZ: Did you review the documents where Congressman Jim Jordan asked her specifically and she said, quote, "there was nothing marked classified on my e-mails either sent or received," end quote?

COMEY: I don't remember reviewing that particular testimony, I'm aware of that being said, though.

CHAFFETZ: Did the FBI investigate her statements under oath on this topic?

COMEY: Not to my knowledge. I don't think there's been a referral from Congress.

CHAFFETZ: Do you need a referral from Congress to investigate her -- her statements under oath?

COMEY: Sure do.

JORDAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Director, thank you for being with us. On Tuesday, you said, "any reasonable person in Secretary Clinton's position should have known that an unclassified system was no place for these conversations." You said on Tuesday, "some of her e-mails bore classified markings." And you also said on Tuesday there were potential violations of the appropriate statutes.

Now, I know a bunch of prosecutors back home would look at that fact pattern and look at that evidence -- you even referenced it in your opening statement, some of your prosecutor -- friends in the prosecution business have been on TV saying they would have looked at that same evidence and they would have taken it to a grand jury.

But on Tuesday, you said, and today in your opening statement, you said, "no reasonable prosecutor would bring such a case."

And then in your statement Tuesday, you cite factors that helped you make that decision and make that statement. And one of the factors you said was "consider the context of a person's actions." Typically, when I hear "context" in the course of a criminal investigation, it's -- it's from the defense side, not the prosecution side. It's at the end of the case after there's been a trial and a guilty verdict, and it's during the sentencing phase -- mitigating circumstances. That's the context we typically think about.

But you said it on the front end. You said "consider the context of the person's actions." And so I'm curious. What does "consider the context" mean? Because a lot of Americans are thinking just what the chairman talked about in his opening statement, that there are two standards: one for we the people, and one for the politically connected.

A lot of folks I get the privilege of representing back in Ohio think that when you said "consider the context," they think that's what Mr. Gowdy just talked about -- the fact that she is former first lady, former secretary of state, former senator, major party's nominee for the highest office in the land. And, oh by the way, her husband just met with the individual you work with at an airport in Arizona five days ago.

So, you said none of that influenced your decision. But tell us what "consider the context" means.COMEY: Thank you, Mr. Jordan.

What I was trying to capture is the fact that the exercise for prosecutorial discretion is always a judgment case. It is in every single case. Among the things you consider are, what was this person's background? What was the circumstances of the offense? Were they drunk? Were they inflamed by passion? Was it somebody who had a sufficient level of education, and training, and experience that we can infer certain things from that to consider the entire circumstances of the conduct and background? I did not mean to consider political context.

JORDAN: The entire circumstances, and Mr. Gowdy just talked about this scheme -- remember what she did, right? She sets up this unique server arrange. She alone controlled it.

On the server, on that system are her personal e-mails, her work related e-mails, Clinton Foundation information, and now we know, classified information. This gets discovered. We find out this arrangement exists. Then what happens? Her lawyers, her legal team decides which ones we get and which ones they get to keep.

They made the sort on the front end. And then we find out the ones that they kept and didn't give to us, didn't give to the American people, didn't give to Congress, the ones they kept, they destroyed them. And you don't have to take my word. I'll take what you said on Tuesday, "they deleted all e-mails they did not return to the State Department, and the lawyers cleaned their devices in such a way as to preclude complete forensic recovery." Now, that sounds like a fancy way of saying they hid the evidence, right? And you just told Mr. Gowdy thousands of e-mails fell into those categories.

Now, that seems to me to provide some context to what took place here. Did Secretary Clinton's legal team -- excuse me, let me ask it this way. Did Secretary Clinton know her legal team deleted those e-mails that they kept from us?

COMEY: I don't believe so.

JORDAN: Did Secretary Clinton approve those e-mails being deleted?

COMEY: I don't think there was any specific instruction or conversation between the Secretary and her lawyers about that.

JORDAN: Did you ask that question? COMEY: Yes.

JORDAN: Did Secretary Clinton know that her lawyers cleaned devices in such a way to preclude forensic recovery?

COMEY: I don't believe she did.

JORDAN: Did you ask that question?

COMEY: Yes.

JORDAN: Do you see how someone could view the context of what she did, set up a private system, she alone controlled it, she kept everything on it? We now know from Ms. Abedin's deposition they did it for that reason, so no one could see what was there based on the depositions Ms. Abedin gave. And then when they got caught, they deleted what they had and they scrubbed their devices. Is that part of the context in evaluating this decision?

COMEY: Sure, sure. And I understand what inferences can be drawn from that set of facts, of course.

JORDAN: Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

Rep. Gowdy

CHAFFETZ: Yeah. We'll now recognize the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. Gowdy, for five minutes.

GOWDY: Good morning, Director Comey. Secretary Clinton said she never sent or received any classified information over her private e- mail. Was that true?

COMEY: Our investigation found that there was classified information sent...

GOWDY: So it was not true?

COMEY: That's what I said.

GOWDY: OK. Well, I'm looking for a little shorter answer so you and I are not here quite as long. Secretary Clinton said there was nothing marked classified on her e-mails, either sent or received. Was that true?

COMEY: That's not true. There were a small number of portion markings on, I think, three of the documents.

GOWDY: Secretary Clinton said, I did not e-mail any classified material to anyone on my e-mail, there is no classified material. Was that true?

COMEY: There was classified material e-mailed.

GOWDY: Secretary Clinton said she used just one device. Was that true?

COMEY: She used multiple devices during the four years of her term as secretary of state.

GOWDY: Secretary Clinton said all work-related e-mails were returned to the State Department. Was that true?

COMEY: No. We found work-related e-mails, thousands that were not returned.

GOWDY: Secretary Clinton said neither she nor anyone else deleted work related e-mails from her personal account. Was that true?

COMEY: That's a harder one to answer. We found traces of work- related e-mails in -- on devices or in slack space. Whether they were deleted or whether when the server was changed out something happened to them. There's no doubt that the work-related e-mails that were removed electronically from the e-mail system.

GOWDY: Secretary Clinton said her lawyers read every one of the e-mails and were overly inclusive. Did her lawyers read the e-mail content individually?

COMEY: No.

GOWDY: Well in the interest of time, and because I have a plane to catch tomorrow afternoon, I'm not going to go through anymore of the false statements. But I am going to ask you to put on your old hat. False exculpatory statements, they are used for what?

COMEY: Either for the -- a substantive prosecution or for evidence of intent in a criminal prosecution.

GOWDY: Exactly. Intent and consciousness of guilt, right? Is that right?

COMEY: Right.

GOWDY: Consciousness of guilt and intent. In your old job, you would prove intent, as you just referenced, by showing the jury evidence of a complex scheme that was designed for the very purpose of concealing the public record and you would be arguing in addition to concealment the destruction that you and I just talked about or certainly the failure to preserve.

You would argue all of that under the heading of content (ph) -- intent. You would also be arguing the pervasiveness of the scheme, when it started, when it ended and the number of e-mails, whether they were originally classified or up-classified.

You would argue all of that under the heading of intent. You would also, probably, under common scheme or plan, argue the burn bags of daily calendar entries or the missing daily calendar entries as a common scheme or plan to conceal.GOWDY: Two days ago, Director, you said, "A reasonable person in her position should have known a private e-mail was no place to send and receive classified information." You're right. An average person does know not to do that.

This is no average person. This is a former first lady, a former United States senator, and a former secretary of state that the president now contends is the most competent, qualified person to be president since Jefferson. He didn't say that in '08, but he says is now.

She affirmatively rejected efforts to give her a state.gov account. She kept these private e-mails for almost two years, and only turned them over to Congress because we found out she had a private e-mail account.

So you have a rogue e-mail system set up before she took the oath of office, thousands of what we now know to be classified e-mails, some of which were classified at the time. One of her more frequent email comrades was in fact hacked, and you don't know whether or not she was. And this scheme took place over a long period of time and it resulted in the destruction of public records.

And yet you say there is insufficient evidence of intent. You say she was extremely careless, but not intentionally so. You and I both know intent is really difficult to prove. Very rarely do defendants announced "on this date, I intend to break this criminal code section; just to put everyone on notice, I am going to break the law on this date." It never happens that way.

You have to do it with circumstantial evidence. Or if you're Congress and you realize how difficult it is to prove specific intent, you will formulate a statute that allows for gross negligence.

My time is out, but this is really important. You mentioned there's no precedent for criminal prosecution. My fear is there still isn't. There's nothing to keep a future secretary of state or president from this exact same e-mail scheme, or their staff.

And my real fear is this -- it's what the chairman touched upon, this double-track justice system that is rightly or wrongly perceived in this country, that if you are a private in the Army and you e-mail yourself classified information, you will be kicked out. But if you are Hillary Clinton and you seek a promotion to commander in chief, you will not be. So what I hope you can do today is help the average -- the reasonable person you made reference to, the reasonable person understand why she appears to be treated differently than the rest of us would be.

With that, I would yield back.

GOWDY: Thank you Doctor Gosar. Director Comey, I want to go back to the issue of intent for just a second. We could disagree on whether or not it's an element of the offense, let's assume for the sake of argument, that you're right and I'm wrong and that it is an element of the offense.

Secretary Clinton said that she was, "Well aware of classification requirements". Those are her words, not mine and not yours. So if she were, "Well aware of classification requirements", how did that impact your analysis of her intent? Because I've heard you this morning, describe her as being less than sophisticated. She disagrees with that.

COMEY: Well, I was talking about technical sophistication. The question is, I would hope everybody who works in the Government is aware of classification requirements. The question then is, if you mishandle classified information, when you did that thing, did you know you were doing something that was unlawful? That's the intent question.

GOWDY: All right, well you and I are going to have to get together some other time and discuss all the people we prosecuted who were unaware that they were breaking the law. That, there are lots of really dumb defendants out there, who don't know that what they're doing is against the law. But let's go with what you say ...

COMEY: I disagree. I, you may have prosecuted a lot of those folks. I did not prosecute all those folks.

GOWDY: I was a gunner prosecutor and you were a white collar prosecutor. Trust me, there, there are lots of people who don't know you can't kill other people. Let me ask you this, on the issue of intent, you say it was convenience, okay? You're a really smart lawyer, if it were convenience Director, she wouldn't have waited two years to return the documents and she wouldn't have deleted them four years after they were created.

So you can't really believe that her intent was convenience when she never turned them over until Congress started asking for them, could you?

COMEY: Yeah my focus, and I hope I made this clear, my focus is on, what was the thinking around the classified information. I mean it's relevant why the system was set up and the thinking there. But she didn't, I don't understand her to be saying, we'll I think I've said it already, that, that's my focus.

GOWDY: So, I know I'm out of time, but, but it just strikes me, you are reading a specific intent element into a gross negligence statute, not even general intent?

CHAFFETZ: Gentlemen's time.

GOWDY: A specific intent ...

CHAFFETZ: Gentleman's time has expired.

GOWDY: Element.

COMEY: Yeah. Is that? Oh, sorry.

CHAFFETZ: Go, the Director can answer. COMEY: I enjoyed, I enjoyed talking with him. The, the question you've got to ask is, why is it that the Department of Justice, since 1917, has not used that gross negligence statute for charging at once in an espionage case. And whether their decision was smart or not, that is the record of fairness.

And so you have to decide, do I treat this person against that record? And if I do, is that a fair thing to do? Even if you're not worried about the constitutionality of it, and my judgment is, no reasonable prosecutor would do that. That would be celebrity hunting. That will be treating this person differently than John Doe.

Rep. Farenthold

FARENTHOLD: Thank you very much.

Director Comey, I want to talk a little bit about cyber security. State Department's Inspector General reported (ph) detailed instances of multiple attacks on Secretary Clinton's computer, as well as her replying to suspicious e-mail from the personal account of Under Secretary Of State.

Director, you said that hostile actors (ph) successful gained access to the commercial e-mail accounts of people Secretary Clinton regularly communicated with. In the case of the Romanian hacker Guccifer, according to accessing Sidney Blumenthal's account -- and you know that's been public, for some time.

During your investigation, were there other people in the State Department or that regularly communicated with Secretary Clinton that you can confirm were successfully hacked?

COMEY: Yes.

FARENTHOLD: And were these folks that regularly communicated with the secretary?

COMEY: Yes.

FARENTHOLD: And were you able to conclude definitively that the attempted hacks referenced in the I.G. report were not successful?

COMEY: We were not able to conclude that they were successful. I think that's the best way to say it.

FARENTHOLD: All right, well while you said that given the nature of Clinton's server, it would be unlikely to see evidence one way or the other whether or not it had been successful hacked.

How many unsuccessful attempts did you uncover, did you find any there?

COMEY: There were unsuccessful attempts. I don't know the number off top of my head.

FARENTHOLD: Do you have an idea -- were they from foreign governments? Where'd they come from?
COMEY: I want to be careful what I say in an open setting and so I -- we can give you that information but I don't want to give the -- any foreign governments knowledge of what I know, so there...

FARENTHOLD: But you -- would you be so far as to say if they probably weren't American high school students fooling around?

COMEY: Correct, it was not limited to criminal activity.

FARENTHOLD: During your investigation, did you or anyone in the FBI interview the hacker Guccifer?

COMEY: Yes.

FARENTHOLD: And he claimed he gained access to Sid Blumenthal's e-mail account and traced them back to Clinton's private server. Can you confirm that Guccifer never gained access to her server?

COMEY: Yeah he did not. He admitted that was a lie.FARENTHOLD: All right, well, at least that's good to hear.

All right, Section 793 of Title 18 in the United States Code makes it a crime to allow classified information to be stolen through gross negligence. Were you to discover that hostile actors had actually gotten into Secretary Clinton's e-mail, would that have changed your recommendation with respect to prosecuting her?

COMEY: Unlikely, although we didn't consider that question because we didn't have those facts.

FARENTHOLD: All right. I want to go back to the question of intent real quick, for just a second.

I'm a recovering attorney. It's been decades since I actually practiced law. But you kept referring to she had to know it was illegal to have the requisite criminal intent. I was always taught in law school, and I don't know where this changed, that ignorance of the law was no excuse. If I'm driving a long at 45 miles and hour and didn't see the 35 mile and hour speed limit, I was still intentionally speeding, even though I didn't know it.

Now, I might not have had the requisite criminal intent if maybe my accelerator were jammed or something like that, but even though I didn't know the law was 35, I was driving 45, I'm going to get a ticket. And I'm probably going to be prosecuted for that.

So, how can you say ignorance of the law is an excuse in Ms. Clinton's case?

COMEY: Well, the comparison to petty offenses, I don't think is -- you spoke about the question of -- ignorance of the law is no excuse, but here's the distinction. You have to have general criminal intent. You don't need to know what particular statute you're violating, but you must be aware of the generally wrongful nature of your conduct...

(CROSSTALK)

FARENTHOLD: We -- now, so Congress when they enacted that statute said "gross negligence." That -- that doesn't say intent. So what are we going to have to enact to get you guys to prosecute something based on negligence or gross negligence? Are we going to have to add, "and oh by the way, we don't mean -- we really do mean you don't have to have intent there"? COMEY: That's a conversation for you all to have with the Department of Justice. But it would have to be something more than the statute enacted in 1917. Because for 99 years, they've been very worried about its constitutionality.

FARENTHOLD: All right. Well, I think that's something this committee and Congress as a whole, the Judiciary Committee, that Mr. Chaffetz and I also sit on, will be looking at it.

And I was on television this morning. And I just want to relay a question that I received from a caller into that television commercial (sic). It's just real simple: Why should any person follow the law if our leaders don't? And we can argue about intent or not, but you laid out the fact that she basically broke the law, but you couldn't prove intent.

Maybe I'm putting words in your mouth, but I do want to know why -- why any person should follow the law if our leaders don't have to. Maybe that's rhetorical, but I'll give you an opportunity to comment on that.

COMEY: That's a question I'm no more qualified to answer than any American citizen. It's an important question. In terms of my work and my world, my folks would not be -- one of my employees would not be prosecuted for this. They would face consequences for this. So the notion that it's either prosecute or you walk around, you know, smiling all day long is just not true for those people who work for the government.

The broader question is one for a democracy to answer. It's not for me.

FARENTHOLD: And I guess the ultimate decision as to whether or not Mrs. Clinton works in government or not is not in -- is in everybody's hands.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the gentleman.

FARENTHOLD: I yield back.

Rep. DeSantis

CHAFFETZ: We'll now recognize the gentleman from Florida, Mr. DeSantis for five minutes.

DESANTIS: Director, the reason why that's so important is because of if top secret information is compromised, that could damage our national security, correct?

COMEY: Yes, by definition...DESANTIS: And American lives are at stake in some instances, correct?

COMEY: Yes.

DESANTIS: You mentioned, a lot of people are upset that there are no consequences for Secretary Clinton, but in your statement you pointed out that administrative and security consequences would be appropriate if someone demonstrated extreme carelessness for classified information. So for those consequences, that would include potentially termination of federal employment?

COMEY: Correct.

DESANTIS: It could include revocation of security clearance?

COMEY: Yes.

DESANTIS: It could include and ineligibility for future employment in national security positions?

COMEY: It could.

DESANTIS: Would you as the FBI Director allow someone, and employee of your agency to work in a national security capacity, if that person had demonstrated extreme carelessness in handling top- secret info?

COMEY: The answer to that is we would look very closely at that in a suitability determination. It's hard to answer in the abstract, "yes in all cases and no in all cases," but it would be a very important suitability scrub.

DESANTIS: So there would be instances where someone could be extremely careless and maintain competence? We have a lot of people who are competent in this country who would love to work for your agency, but yet, it would be potentially -- you would allow someone to be potentially careless and carry on?

COMEY: In the hypothetical, I can imagine if it was a long time ago, and it was a small amount of conduct or something -- that's why it's hard to say other than it would be a very important part...

DESANTIS: Let's put it this way. Would being extremely careless in handling top secret information expose an employee of the FBI to potential termination? COMEY: Yes.

DESANTIS: Why shouldn't U.S. officials use mobile devices when traveling to foreign countries, especially if they're discussing classifying or sensitive information?

COMEY: Because the mobile device will transmit its signal across networks that are likely controlled or at least accessed by that hostile power.

DESANTIS: That's the guidance that the FBI gives all officials when they're traveling overseas? That's still good guidance, correct?

COMEY: That's good guidance.

DESANTIS: How did top secret information end up on the private server, because your statement addressed Secretary Clinton. You did not address any of her aides in your statement. Attorney general Lynch exonerated everybody. That information just didn't get there on its own, so how did it get there? Were you able to determine that?

COMEY: Yes, by people talking about a top secret subject in an e-mail communication.

DESANTIS: So...

COMEY: Not about forwarding a top secret document, it's about having a conversation about a matter that is top secret.

DESANTIS: And those were things that were originated by Secretary Clinton's aides and sent to her, which would obviously be in her server, but it was also included Secretary Clinton originating those e-mails, correct?

COMEY: That's correct.

In most circumstances, it initiated with aides starting the conversation. In the one involving top secret information, Secretary Clinton not only received but sent e-mails talking about the same subject.

DESANTIS: And of that top secret information you found, would somebody who is sophisticated in those matters, should it have been obvious to them that was sensitive information?

COMEY: Yes.

DESANTIS: So I guess my issue about knowledge of what you're doing is, in order for Secretary Clinton to have access to top secret, SCI FBI information, didn't she have to sign a form with the State Department acknowledging her duties and responsibilities under the law to safeguard this information?

COMEY: Yes. Anybody who gets access to SCI, Sensitive Compartmented Information would sign a read-in form that lays that out. I'm sure members of Congress have seen the same thing. DESANTIS: And it stresses in that document and other training people would get, that there are certain requirements to handling certain levels of information. For example, a top secret document, that can't even be on your secret system at the FBI, correct?

COMEY: Correct.

DESANTIS: So you have to follow certain guidelines. And I guess my question is, is she's very sophisticated person, she did execute that document, correct?

COMEY: Yes.

DESANTIS: And her aides who were getting the classified information, they executed similar documents to get a security clearance, correct?

COMEY: I believe so.

DESANTIS: And she knowingly clearly set up her own private server in order to -- let me ask you that, was the reason she set up her own private server in your judgment was because she wanted to shield communications from Congress and the public?

COMEY: I can't say that.

Our best information is that she set it up as a matter of convenience. It was an existing system her husband had and she decided to have a domain on that system.

DESANTIS: So the question is, is very sophisticated, this is information that clearly anybody who had knowledge of security information would know that it would be classified? But I'm having a little bit of trouble to see, how would you not then know that that was something that was inappropriate to do?

COMEY: Well, I just want to take one of your assumptions about sophistication. I don't think that our investigation established she was actually particularly sophisticated with respect to classified information and the levels and treatment, and so far as we can tell...

DESANTIS: Isn't she in an original classification of authority?

COMEY: Yes, sir.

DESANTIS: Good grief.

Well, I appreciate you coming. I yield back the balance of my time.

CHAFFETZ: I thank the gentleman. I ask unanimous consent to enter into the record two documents that Mr. DeSantis referred to. One is the Sensitive Compartmented Information Nondisclosure agreement, the other one is the Classified Information Nondisclosure Agreement, both signed by Hillary Rodham Clinton. Without objection, so ordered. I now recognize the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Clay, for five minutes.

Rep. Buck

BUCK: Good morning, Director Comey.

COMEY: Morning, sir.

BUCK: Thank you for being here. I also respect your commitment to law and justice and your career. And I -- first question I want to ask you, is this hearing unfair? Has it been unfair to you?

COMEY: No.

BUCK: Thank you. One purpose of security procedures for classified information is to prevent hostile information -- hostile nations from obtaining classified information. Is that fair?

COMEY: Yes.

BUCK: And do -- did hostile nations obtain classified information from Secretary Clinton's servers?

COMEY: I don't know. It's possible, but we don't have direct evidence of that. We couldn't find direct evidence.

BUCK: I want to -- without making this a law school class, I want to try to get into intent. There are various levels of intent in the criminal law, everything from knowingly and willfully doing something all the way down, to strict liability. Would you agree with me on that?

COMEY: Yes.

BUCK: And in Title 18, most of the -- criminal laws in Title 18 have the words "knowingly" and "willfully" in them and that is the standard typically that United States attorneys prosecute under.

COMEY: Most do. Unlawfully, knowingly, willfully is our standard formulation for charging a case.

BUCK: And there are also a variety of others between the knowingly and willfully standard and the strict liability standard. And in many, like environmental crimes, have a much lower standard because of the toxic materials that are at risk of harming individuals. Is that fair?

COMEY: That's correct.

BUCK: Okay. Let's talk about this particular statute, 18 U.S.C. 1924. I take it we could all agree -- you and I can agree on a couple of the elements. She, Secretary Clinton was an employee of the United States.

COMEY: Correct.

BUCK: And as a result of that employment, she received classified information.

COMEY: Correct.

BUCK: And there is no doubt about those two elements. Now I don't know whether the next element is one element or two, but it talks about knowingly removed such materials without authority and with the intent to retain such material at an unauthorized location.

So I'm going to treat those as two separate parts of the intent element. First of all, do you see the word "willfully" anywhere in this statute?

COMEY: I don't.

BUCK: And that would indicate to you that there is a lower threshold for intent?

COMEY: No, it wouldn't.

BUCK: Why?

COMEY: Because we often -- as I understand, the Justice Department's practice and judicial practice will impute to any criminal statute at that level with a knowingly also requirement that you know that you're involved in criminal activity of some sort. A general mens rea requirement.

BUCK: So -- and you would apply that same standard to environmental (inaudible)?

COMEY: No, if it specifically says it is a negligence-based crime, I don't think a judge would impute that.

BUCK: But -- but Congress specifically omitted the word "willfully" from this statute, and yet you are implying the word willfully in the statute. Is that fair?

COMEY: That's fair.

BUCK: Okay. So what this statute does say is "knowingly removed such materials without authority." Is it fair that she knew that she didn't have authority to have this server in her basement?

COMEY: Yes, that's true.

BUCK: And she knew that she was receiving materials, classified information, in -- in the e-mails that she received on -- on her BlackBerry and other devices.

COMEY: I can't answer -- I'm hesitating as a prosecutor because it's always -- to what level of proof. I do not believe there's evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that she knew she was receiving classified information in violation of the requirements.

BUCK: But that's not my question.

COMEY: (Inaudible) evidence of that.

BUCK: That's not my question. My question, in fairness, is did she know that she was receiving information on the servers at her location?

COMEY: Oh, I'm sorry. Of course, yes. She knew she was using her e-mail system.

BUCK: And as secretary of state, she also knew that she would be receiving classified information.

COMEY: Yes, in general.

BUCK: OK. And did she then have the intent to retain such material at an unauthorized location? She retained the material that she received as secretary of state at her server in her basement and that was unauthorized.

COMEY: You're asking me did she have the -- I'm going to ask you the burden of proof question in a second. But did she have the intent to retain classified information on the server or just to retain any information on the server?BUCK: Well, we've already established that she knew, as secretary of state, that she was going to receive classified information in her e-mails. And so did she retain such information that she received as secretary of state on her servers in her basement?

COMEY: She did in fact -- there is, in my view, not evidence beyond certainly probable cause. There's not evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that she knew she was receiving classified information or that she intended to retain it on her server.

There's evidence of that but when I said there's not clear evidence of intent, that's what I meant. I could not, even if the Department Of Justice would bring that case, I could not prove beyond a reasonable doubt those two elements.

BUCK: Thank you very much.

U.S. intelligence officials are seeking to determine whether an American businessman identified by Donald Trump as one of his foreign policy advisers has opened up private communications with senior Russian officials — including talks about the possible lifting of economic sanctions if the Republican nominee becomes president, according to multiple sources who have been briefed on the issue.

The activities of Trump adviser Carter Page, who has extensive business interests in Russia, have been discussed with senior members of Congress during recent briefings about suspected efforts by Moscow to influence the presidential election, the sources said. After one of those briefings, Senate minority leader Harry Reid wrote FBI Director James Comey, citing reports of meetings between a Trump adviser (a reference to Page) and "high ranking sanctioned individuals" in Moscow over the summer as evidence of "significant and disturbing ties" between the Trump campaign and the Kremlin that needed to be investigated by the bureau.

Some of those briefed were "taken aback" when they learned about Page's contacts in Moscow, viewing them as a possible back channel to the Russians that could undercut U.S. foreign policy, said a congressional source familiar with the briefings but who asked for anonymity due to the sensitivity of the subject. The source added that U.S. officials in the briefings indicated that intelligence reports about the adviser's talks with senior Russian officials close to President Vladimir Putin were being "actively monitored and investigated."

A senior U.S. law enforcement official did not dispute that characterization when asked for comment by Yahoo News. "It's on our radar screen," said the official about Page's contacts with Russian officials. "It's being looked at."

Page is a former Merrill Lynch investment banker in Moscow who now runs a New York consulting firm, Global Energy Capital, located around the corner from Trump Tower, that specializes in oil and gas deals in Russia and other Central Asian countries. He declined repeated requests to comment for this story.

Trump first mentioned Page's name when asked to identify his "foreign policy team" during an interview with the Washington Post editorial team last March. Describing him then only as a "PhD," Trump named Page as among five advisers "that we are dealing with." But his precise role in the campaign remains unclear; Trump spokeswoman Hope Hicks last month called him an "informal foreign adviser" who "does not speak for Mr. Trump or the campaign." Asked this week by Yahoo News, Trump campaign spokesman Jason Miller said Page "has no role" and added: "We are not aware of any of his activities, past or present." Miller did not respond when asked why Trump had previously described Page as one of his advisers.

The questions about Page come amid mounting concerns within the U.S. intelligence community about Russian cyberattacks on the Democratic National Committee and state election databases in Arizona and Illinois. In a rare public talk this week, former undersecretary of defense for intelligence Mike Vickers said that the Russian cyberattacks constituted meddling in the U.S. election and were "beyond the pale." Also, this week, two senior Democrats — Sen. Dianne Feinstein, ranking minority member on the Senate Intelligence Committee, and Rep. Adam Schiff, ranking minority member on the House Intelligence Committee — released a joint statement that went further then what U.S. officials had publicly said about the matter.

"Based on briefings we have received, we have concluded that the Russian intelligence agencies are making a serious and concerted effort to influence the U.S. election," they said. "At the least, this effort is intended to sow doubt about the security of our election and may well be intended to influence the outcomes of the election." They added that "orders for the Russian intelligence agencies to conduct such actions could come only from very senior levels of the Russian government."

Page came to the attention of officials at the U.S. Embassy in Moscow several years ago when he showed up in the Russian capital during several business trips and made provocative public comments critical of U.S. policy and sympathetic to Putin. "He was pretty much a brazen apologist for anything Moscow did," said one U.S. official who served in Russia at the time.

He hasn't been shy about expressing those views in the U.S. as well. Last March, shorty after he was named by Trump as one of his advisers, Page told Bloomberg News he had been an adviser to, and investor in, Gazprom, the Russian state-owned gas company. He then blamed Obama administration sanctions — imposed as a response to the Russian annexation of Crimea — for driving down the company's stock. "So many people who I know and have worked with have been so adversely affected by the sanctions policy," Page said in the interview. "There's a lot of excitement in terms of the possibilities for creating a better situation."

Page showed up again in Moscow in early July, just two weeks before the Republican National Convention formally nominated Trump for president, and once again criticized U.S. policy. Speaking at a commencement address for the New Economic School, an institution funded in part by major Russian oligarchs close to Putin, Page asserted that "Washington and other West capitals" had impeded progress in Russia "through their often hypocritical focus on ideas such as democratization, inequality, corruption and regime change."

At the time, Page declined to say whether he was meeting with Russian officials during his trip, according to a Reuters report.

But U.S. officials have since received intelligence reports that during that same three-day trip, Page met with Igor Sechin, a longtime Putin associate and former Russian deputy prime minister who is now the executive chairman of Rosneft, Russian's leading oil company, a well-placed Western intelligence source tells Yahoo News. That meeting, if confirmed, is viewed as especially problematic by U.S. officials because the Treasury Department in August 2014 named Sechin to a list of Russian officials and businessmen sanctioned over Russia's "illegitimate and unlawful actions in the Ukraine." (The Treasury announcement described Sechin as "utterly loyal to Vladimir Putin — a key component to his current standing." At their alleged meeting, Sechin raised the issue of the lifting of sanctions with Page, the Western intelligence source said.

U.S. intelligence agencies have also received reports that Page met with another top Putin aide while in Moscow — Igor Diveykin. A former Russian security official, Diveykin now serves as deputy chief for internal policy and is believed by U.S. officials to have responsibility for intelligence collected by Russian agencies about the U.S. election, the Western intelligence source said

U.S. intelligence officials are seeking to determine whether an American businessman identified by Donald Trump as one of his foreign policy advisers has opened up private communications with senior Russian officials — including talks about the possible lifting of economic sanctions if the Republican nominee becomes president, according to multiple sources who have been briefed on the issue.

The activities of Trump adviser Carter Page, who has extensive business interests in Russia, have been discussed with senior members of Congress during recent briefings about suspected efforts by Moscow to influence the presidential election, the sources said. After one of those briefings, Senate minority leader Harry Reid wrote FBI Director James Comey, citing reports of meetings between a Trump adviser (a reference to Page) and "high ranking sanctioned individuals" in Moscow over the summer as evidence of "significant and disturbing ties" between the Trump campaign and the Kremlin that needed to be investigated by the bureau.

Some of those briefed were "taken aback" when they learned about Page's contacts in Moscow, viewing them as a possible back channel to the Russians that could undercut U.S. foreign policy, said a congressional source familiar with the briefings but who asked for anonymity due to the sensitivity of the subject. The source added that U.S. officials in the briefings indicated that intelligence reports about the adviser's talks with senior Russian officials close to President Vladimir Putin were being "actively monitored and investigated."

A senior U.S. law enforcement official did not dispute that characterization when asked for comment by Yahoo News. "It's on our radar screen," said the official about Page's contacts with Russian officials. "It's being looked at."

Page is a former Merrill Lynch investment banker in Moscow who now runs a New York consulting firm, Global Energy Capital, located around the corner from Trump Tower, that specializes in oil and gas deals in Russia and other Central Asian countries. He declined repeated requests to comment for this story.

Trump first mentioned Page's name when asked to identify his "foreign policy team" during an interview with the Washington Post editorial team last March. Describing him then only as a "PhD," Trump named Page as among five advisers "that we are dealing with." But his precise role in the campaign remains unclear; Trump spokeswoman Hope Hicks last month called him an "informal foreign adviser" who "does not speak for Mr. Trump or the campaign." Asked this week by Yahoo News, Trump campaign spokesman Jason Miller said Page "has no role" and added: "We are not aware of any of his activities, past or present." Miller did not respond when asked why Trump had previously described Page as one of his advisers.

The questions about Page come amid mounting concerns within the U.S. intelligence community about Russian cyberattacks on the Democratic National Committee and state election databases in Arizona and Illinois. In a rare public talk this week, former undersecretary of defense for intelligence Mike Vickers said that the Russian cyberattacks constituted meddling in the U.S. election and were "beyond the pale." Also, this week, two senior Democrats — Sen. Dianne Feinstein, ranking minority member on the Senate Intelligence Committee, and Rep. Adam Schiff, ranking minority member on the House Intelligence Committee — released a joint statement that went further then what U.S. officials had publicly said about the matter.

"Based on briefings we have received, we have concluded that the Russian intelligence agencies are making a serious and concerted effort to influence the U.S. election," they said. "At the least, this effort is intended to sow doubt about the security of our election and may well be intended to influence the outcomes of the election." They added that "orders for the Russian intelligence agencies to conduct such actions could come only from very senior levels of the Russian government."

Page came to the attention of officials at the U.S. Embassy in Moscow several years ago when he showed up in the Russian capital during several business trips and made provocative public comments critical of U.S. policy and sympathetic to Putin. "He was pretty much a brazen apologist for anything Moscow did," said one U.S. official who served in Russia at the time.

He hasn't been shy about expressing those views in the U.S. as well. Last March, shorty after he was named by Trump as one of his advisers, Page told Bloomberg News he had been an adviser to, and investor in, Gazprom, the Russian state-owned gas company. He then blamed Obama administration sanctions — imposed as a response to the Russian annexation of Crimea — for driving down the company's stock. "So many people who I know and have worked with have been so adversely affected by the sanctions policy," Page said in the interview. "There's a lot of excitement in terms of the possibilities for creating a better situation."

Page showed up again in Moscow in early July, just two weeks before the Republican National Convention formally nominated Trump for president, and once again criticized U.S. policy. Speaking at a commencement address for the New Economic School, an institution funded in part by major Russian oligarchs close to Putin, Page asserted that "Washington and other West capitals" had impeded progress in Russia "through their often hypocritical focus on ideas such as democratization, inequality, corruption and regime change."

At the time, Page declined to say whether he was meeting with Russian officials during his trip, according to a Reuters report.

But U.S. officials have since received intelligence reports that during that same three-day trip, Page met with Igor Sechin, a longtime Putin associate and former Russian deputy prime minister who is now the executive chairman of Rosneft, Russian's leading oil company, a well-placed Western intelligence source tells Yahoo News. That meeting, if confirmed, is viewed as especially problematic by U.S. officials because the Treasury Department in August 2014 named Sechin to a list of Russian officials and businessmen sanctioned over Russia's "illegitimate and unlawful actions in the Ukraine." (The Treasury announcement described Sechin as "utterly loyal to Vladimir Putin — a key component to his current standing." At their alleged meeting, Sechin raised the issue of the lifting of sanctions with Page, the Western intelligence source said.

U.S. intelligence agencies have also received reports that Page met with another top Putin aide while in Moscow — Igor Diveykin. A former Russian security official, Diveykin now serves as deputy chief for internal policy and is believed by U.S. officials to have responsibility for intelligence collected by Russian agencies about the U.S. election, the Western intelligence source said

House Judiciary Committee Holds Hearing on FBI Oversight

GOODLATTE:

Good morning. The Judiciary Committee will come to order. Without objection, the chair is authorized to declare a recess of the committee at any time. We welcome everyone to this morning's hearing on oversight of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Before I begin this hearing, I want to take a few minutes to recognize the chief counsel of the Subcommittee on Crime, Terrorism, Homeland Security and Investigation, Caroline Lynch.

After 15 years working on Capitol Hill, Caroline has decided to move back to her home state of Arizona be close to her family and to pursue the next steps in her career. Needless to say, we are very sad to see Caroline go. During her time in Washington, D.C., Caroline worked for Representative John Shadegg both in his personal office and as chief counsel of the House Republican Policy Committee.

In 2006, Caroline came to work for the House Judiciary Committee and in 2008 she became chief counsel of the Judiciary Committee's Crime Subcommittee. At the committee, Caroline has had an enormous impact on the reform of our criminal and national security laws. Few people in Washington have done as much to promote the safety of our communities.

Caroline has overseen the drafting, negotiation and passage of critical legislation regarding the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, the Electronic Communications Privacy Act and the most sweeping set of reforms to government surveillance practices in nearly 40 years, the USA Freedom Act among many other priority legislative initiatives.

Anyone who has met Caroline knows she is immensely intelligent, hard working, loyal and a discerning chief counsel. And of course, those people she has negotiated with have found her to be a skillful and formidable but fair advocate. Her team at the subcommittee know her to be a determined leader and a steadfast friend. I have appreciated Caroline's deep knowledge of criminal laws, the strength of her convictions and her courage to speak the truth in a place where it is rarely convenient to do so.

We wish Caroline well in her new endeavors and I thank her for her years of dedicated service to this committee, the U.S. House of Representatives and the American people.

(APPLAUSE)

And I know the ranking member, Mr. Conyers, would like to say a few words as well.

CONYERS:

Thank you very much, Chairman Goodlatte.

This is a -- indeed a unique moment in our history. And on behalf of the Democratic staff and Democratic members of the committee, I want to recognize Caroline Lynch for her hard work and her dedication for the past 10 years.

As chief crime counsel for the Republicans during this time, she worked collegiately with her Democratic colleagues on a broad range of criminal justice issues. The Crime Subcommittee is legislatively the busiest subcommittee, to me, in all of Congress and every crime- related bill that has been enacted during her time here has had the benefit of her expertise.

There are many examples of this, but I will cite her role in helping members find common ground on Section 215 of the PATRIOT Act so that we could enact important reforms in the USA FREEDOM Act. This important law will both safeguard our national security and our civil liberties and it set a precedent for how we can proceed on such issues in the future. Her work on this legislation was essential to its ultimate success.

CONYERS:

We'll miss her insight on these issues as well as her friendship and her friendliness as she leaves the committee for other endeavors in her home state of Arizona. We wish you all the best.

(APPLAUSE)

GOODLATTE:

I think you would agree with me in saying that while her work is not quite done, today and the rest of the week, she has also been very critical to the bipartisan work that we have been doing here the past few years culminating in 11 bills so far passing out of this committee dealing with criminal justice reform and we thank you for the contribution you made for that.

And that work has been indeed very bipartisan and thank you all. We now welcome Director Comey to your fourth appearance before the House Judiciary Committee since your confirmation as the seventh director of the FBI. Needless to say, the past year since our last oversight hearing has been challenging for the FBI on a number of fronts that we hope to review with you today.

I want to begin by commending the men and women of the FBI and the NYPD and the New Jersey Police Department for their swift action in identifying and apprehending Ahmad Khan Rahami, who's cold and cowardly acts of terrorism last week injured 29 American citizens. This was the latest in a string of attacks stretching back to the 2013 Boston Marathon bombing and continuing through the terror attacks in San Bernardino, Orlando and Minneapolis.

They all share one common thread, namely radical Islam. This administration however, including the FBI, has coined this cancer with the euphemism of countering violent extremism. If the FBI and the rest of our national security apparatus continues its myopia about focusing on ethereal issues of extremism, their mission to protect the American people will always be one of following up on terrorism aftermath.

I look forward to hearing from you about how the FBI is working to proactively combat radical Islamic terrorism and put an end to this string of violence. While terrorism is a malignancy which must be purged, other events at home have called into question the confidence that Americans have historically held in a blind and impartial justice system. Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and the FBI's investigation into her seemingly criminal conduct is a case in point.

It seems clear that former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton committed multiple felonies involving the passing of classified information through her private e-mail server. The FBI however, declined to refer the case for prosecution on some very questionable bases. This past Friday afternoon, the FBI released additional investigative documents from the Clinton investigation which demonstrate, among other things, that more than 100 of the e-mails on Secretary Clinton's private server contained classified information and that e-mails required to be preserved under federal law were in fact destroyed.

Even more alarming, we have recently learned that President Obama used a pseudonym to communicate with Secretary Clinton on her e-mail server. Why is this relevant? As Secretary Clinton's top aide, Huma Abedin acclaimed (ph), when informed by the FBI of the existence of an e-mail between her boss an the president, how is that not classified?

Armed with knowledge of the president's now known to be false claim that he only learned of Clinton's private e-mail account quote, "the same time everybody else learned it through news reports," did the FBI review why the president was also sending classified information over unsecure means. In effect, this president and the former secretary of state improperly transmitted communications through non-secure channels placing our nation's secrets in harm's way.

Secretary Clinton's decision to play fast and loose with our national security concerned not simply her daughter's wedding planning or yoga routine, but instead quoting you Director Comey quote, "seven e-mail chains concerned matters that were classified at the top secret special access program level when they were sent and received." Top secret special access programs contain some of the most sensitive secret information maintained by our government. This is a truly remarkable fact.

Were anyone of lesser notoriety than Hillary Clinton guilty of doing this, that person would already be in jail. For Americans unsure what a special access program, or SAP is, it is the kind of information that a war planner would use to defeat an enemy or even clandestined (ph) intelligence operation. The Wall Street Journal explained that a SAP usually refers to highly covert technology programs, often involving weaponry. Knowledge of these programs is usually restricted to small groups of people on a need-to-know basis.

For those wondering whether this kind of information on an unsecure server is a problem, you need read no further than the Huffington Post, which reported Hillary Clinton's private e-mail server, containing tens of thousands of messages from her tenure as Secretary of State was the subject of hacking attempts from China, South Korea and Germany after she stepped down in 2013. To conclude, let me ask everyone to engage in a thought experiment.

One of this nation's signature accomplishments in the war on terror was the raid on Abbottabad, Pakistan on May 2, 2011 that resulted in the killing of Osama bin Laden. That operation, which was conducted an elite team of U.S. Navy special operators was of course, highly classified. Now imagine if you will, that classified information relating to the raid was passed through a non-secure e- mail server and was accessed by nations or individuals hostile to the United States.

Rather than a highly successful covert operation, we might have had a team of dead U.S. servicemen. Hillary Clinton chose to send and receive top secret information over a personal, unsecure computer server housed in her various homes and once reportedly placed in a bathroom closet. These actions, without a doubt, opened these communications to hostile interception by our enemies and those who wish America harm.

These facts, and not the imagined history I have asked you to contemplate, were the basis of the investigation by the FBI and these are the facts that you, Director Comey, chose to hold unworthy of a recommendation to prosecute, saying that no reasonable prosecutor would bring such a case. We, as Congress and the American people, are troubled how such gross negligence is not punished and why there seems to be a different standard for the politically well connected, particularly if your name is Clinton.

Mr. Director, I look forward to your testimony today.

And at this time I'm pleased to recognize the ranking member of the committee, the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Conyers, for his opening statement.

CONYERS:

Thank you, Chairman Goodlatte.

Welcome again, Director Comey, for your appearance here today.

The FBI's mission is a complex undertaking to protect the United States from terrorism, to enforce our criminal laws and to lead the nation's law enforcement community. That mission ought to mirror our own priorities in this committee. In the past few days for example, we have witnessed near fatal terrorist attacks in Minnesota, New York and New Jersey. These attacks underscore the growing fear that individuals can be moved to violence at home by the propaganda by ISIS and other terrorist groups abroad even though they have no direct connection to those organizations.

To me, this threat is dire. We should be doing all we can within our communities and within our constitutional framework to mitigate the danger. But will our majority here in the House use their time today to discuss these attacks? I suspect that they will not be in their focus in this campaign season. In Charlotte, in Tulsa, in Dallas, right here in Washington and in other cities across this country, our citizens demand answers to questions about race and policing and the use of lethal force by law enforcement.

Our police are under siege, often under-resourced and in some cases, hard pressed to build trust with the communities they serve. Director Comey, your continued work to foster lines of communication between police officers and the general public is commendable and necessary if we are to keep our citizens safe from harm. But will my colleagues discuss this pressing issue with the director of the FBI, for his leadership in the law enforcement community is paramount? I hope so.

I'm almost afraid their focus may be elsewhere. The FBI is the lead agency in the investigation of cyber-based terrorism. Computer intrusions. Online sexual exploitation and major cyber fraud. We've known for some years about the persistent cyber threat to our critical infrastructure. Now we hear reports of a new cyber threat to the very basis of our democratic process. Twice this summer, Director Comey, I wrote to you with my fellow ranking members to ask you to look into reports that Russian state actors are working to undermine our election process.

Without objection Mr. Chairman, I ask that both these letters be placed in the record.

GOODLATTE:

Without objection, they will be made a part of the record.

CONYERS:

Thank you. It is now the clear consensus of the intelligence community that the Russian government was behind the hack of the Democratic National Committee and not, as some suggested, somebody sitting on their bed that weights 400 pounds. Our -- on Friday we learned that from one report that the United States intelligence officials are seeking to determine whether an American businessman, identified by Donald Trump as one of his foreign policy advisers, has opened up private communications with senior Russian officials.

Including talks about the possible lifting of economic sanctions if the Republican nominee becomes president. The report cites to an unnamed quote, "senior U.S. law enforcement official," end quote, which I presume means someone in your orbit, Mr. Director. Without objection, I ask that this article, Mr. Chairman, be placed into the record as well.

GOODLATTE:

Without objection it will remain part of the record.

CONYERS:

Thank you. Let me be clear. If true, this allegation represents a danger to our national security and a clear violation of federal law, which expressly prohibits this type of back channel negotiation. And I'm not alone in describing the nature of this threat. Speaker Ryan himself has said that, "Russia is a global menace led by a devious thug, Putin should stay out of this election." end quotation

But will our majority join us in press you on this problem today, Director Comey? Instead I believe that the focus of this hearing will be more of the same, an attack on you and your team at the Department of Justice for declining to recommend criminal charges against Secretary Hillary Clinton.

In recent weeks, this line of attack has been remarkable only for its lack of substance. Your critics dwell in character assassination and procedural minutia like the proper scope of immunity agreements and your decision to protect the identities of individuals wholly unrelated to the investigation.

They want to investigate the investigation, Director Comey, and I consider that an unfortunate waste of this committee's time. With so many actual problems confronting this nation and so many of those challenges within your jurisdiction and ours, you would think my colleagues would set their priorities differently. I hope that they do and they listen to our conversation today. I thank the Chairman and I yield back.

GOODLATTE:

Thank you Mr. Conyers and without objection, all other member's opening statements will be made a part of the record. We welcome our distinguished witness and if you would please rise, I'll begin by swearing you in.

Do you solemnly swear that the testimony that you are about to give will be the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, so help you God? Thank you, let the record reflect that the witness answered in the affirmative.

FBI Director James Comey is a graduate of the College of William and Mary and the University of Chicago Law School. Following law school, Director Comey served as an assistant United States attorney for both the Southern District of New York and the Eastern District of Virginia.

GOODLATTE:

He returned to New York to become the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York and in 2003, he served as the deputy attorney general at the Department of Justice.

Director Comey, we look forward to your testimony. Your written statement will be entered into the record in its entirety and we ask that you summarize your testimony in five minutes. You may begin. Welcome.

COMEY:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Conyers, members of the Judiciary Committee. It's good to be back before you, as the chairman said, for the fourth time. I have six more to go and I look forward to our conversations each time. I know that this morning there will be questions about the e-mail investigation and I'm happy to answer those to the absolute best of my ability.

In July when we closed this case, I promised unusual transparency and I think we've delivered on that promise in frankly an unprecedented way and I will do my absolute best to continue to be transparent in every way possible. But what I thought I would do, because I know we'll talk about that quite a bit, I want to just focus on some of the other things the FBI has been doing just in the last couple of weeks.

And my objective is to make clear to you and the American people the quality of the people who have chosen to do this with their lives, to do something that's not about money, that's not about the living, it's about the life that they make. And I just picked four different examples of things we've been working on to illustrate the quality of the folks, the scope of the work, which is extraordinary, and the importance of partnerships because it is true that the FBI does nothing alone.

So just to tick off four from four different parts of our organization, obviously as the chair and Mr. Conyers both mentioned, in the last couple of weeks, our folks in the New York area have been working in an extraordinary way with their partners at federal, state and local organizations of all kinds to bring to justice very quickly the bomber in New Jersey and New York attacks.

That work was done in a way, frankly, that would have been hard to imagine 15 years ago in a time of turf battles and worries about my jurisdiction, your jurisdiction, they should you how it should be done, how it must be done and I think we should all be very proud of them.

Second, within the last week, a hacker from Kosovo who worked for the so-called Islamic State, in hacking in and taking the identities and personal information of American military employees and then giving it to the Islamic State so they could target these people.

He was sentenced to 20 years in jail for that hacking, his name is Ardit Ferizi. Our great folks, together with lots of partners around the world, found this Kosovar in Malaysia and our Malaysian partners arrested him, brought him back to Virginia where he was just sentenced to 20 years for his hacking on behalf of the Islamic State. Terrific work by our cyber investigators and obviously as you know, we are doing an awful lot of work through our counter-intelligence investigators to understand just what mischief is Russia up to in connection with our election.

That is work that goes on all day every day, about which I'm limited in terms of answering questions but I wanted you to note that's a part of our work we don't talk about an awful lot but it's at the core of the FBI.

And the last one I want to mention is, two weeks ago a six year old girl was kidnapped off her front lawn in Eastern North Carolina in a stranger kidnapping. And all of law enforcement in North Carolina surged on that case, we rolled out Child Abduction Rapid Deployment Team, which is a capability we built around the country to help in just these kinds of situations.

These are agents and analysts who are expert at doing what has to be done in that golden 24 hours you have to try and save a child. And so we rolled those resources, we worked with our partners at state and local levels in North Carolina and overnight we found that little girl. We found that little girl chained by her neck to a tree in the woods alive, thank God, and she was rescued.

The picture that they showed that morning of that little girl with wide eyes and her long hair around her shoulders with still a thick chain around her neck connecting her to that tree is one I will never be able to get out of my own head because it's both terrible and wonderful. It's terrible because of what happened to this little girl, it's wonderful because together we found her and saved her. So I called the sheriff in North Carolina, I called our key team members who worked on that to thank them, and they told me that they were relieved and exhausted.

And that they are all hardened investigators but they stood that early morning in the command center and cried together because it almost never ends this way. So I said to the sheriff and our people, I wish we didn't live in a world where little girls were kidnapped off of their front lawns, where we had to do this kind of work but unfortunately we live in that world and because we do, I am so glad that those people and the rest of the people that work for the FBI are in that world. Because we are safer, we're better, because they have chosen to do this with their lives.

The best part of my job is the people I get to watch. To see their work, to admire their work, to support their work in any way that I can. They are doing extraordinary work for the American people across an incredible array of responsibilities. I know you know that and we're very grateful for the support you give to the men and women of the FBI and I look forward to our conversation about their work Mr. Chairman, thank you.

GOODLATTE:

Thank you Director Comey. We will now begin questioning under the five minute rule and I'll begin by recognizing myself.

You testified that the FBI did not investigate the voracity of Secretary Clinton's testimony to the Select Benghazi Committee under oath. We referred the matter to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia. Is the FBI now investigating the voracity of Secretary Clinton's testimony to the Select Benghazi Committee?

COMEY:

Thank you Mr. Chairman. The department has the referral, I think there were two referrals, has the referrals. Now it's pending and so there's -- I'm not going to comment on a pending matter at this point but the matter has been received by the Department of Justice. They have the letters from the committee.

GOODLATTE:

And you cannot tell us whether or not you are indeed investigating?

COMEY:

I can't.

GOODLATTE:

When do you expect that you'll be able to tell us more about this pending matter before the FBI?

COMEY:

I don't know, sir.

GOODLATTE:

Paul Combetta with Platte River Networks posted to Reddit asking, "how to strip out a VIP's very VIP e-mail address from a bunch of archived e-mail," end quote. He went on, quote, "the issue is that these e-mails involve the private e-mail address of someone you'd recognize and we're trying to replace it with a place folder address as to not expose it," end quote. This clearly demonstrates actions taken to destroy evidence by those operating Secretary Clinton's private server and by her staff.

Certainly Combetta did not take it upon himself to destroy evidence but had been instructed to do so by Secretary Clinton or her staff. My first question to you is was the FBI aware of this Reddit post prior to offering Mr. Combetta immunity on May 3, 2016?

COMEY:

I'm not sure. I know that our team looked at it, I don't know whether they knew about it before then or not.

GOODLATTE:

Isn't this information evidence of obstruction of justice and a violation of Mr. Combetta's immunity deal?

COMEY:

Not necessarily, no.

GOODLATTE:

Why not?

COMEY:

It depends on what his intention was, why he wanted to do and I think our team concluded that what he was trying to do was when they produced e-mails, not have the actual address, but have some name or placeholder instead of the actual dot-com address in the "from" line.

GOODLATTE:

Last week the American people learned that Cheryl Mills, Secretary Clinton's long-time confidant and former State Department chief of staff, and Heather Samuelson, counsel to Secretary Clinton in the State Department, were granted immunity for production of their laptops.

Why were they not targets of the FBI's criminal investigation?

COMEY:

Well target is someone on whom you have sufficient evidence to indict. A subject is someone who's conduct at some point during the investigation falls within the scope of the investigation. So certainly with respect to Ms. Mills, at least initially, because she was an e-mail correspondent, she was a subject of the investigation.

GOODLATTE:

Did the FBI find classified information on either of their computers?

COMEY:

I think there were some e-mails still on the computer that were recovered that were classified, is my recollection.

GOODLATTE:

Is that a crime?

COMEY:

Is what a crime sir?

GOODLATTE:

Having classified information on computers that are outside of the server system of the Department of State unsecured?

COMEY:

No, it's certainly something, without knowing more you couldn't conclude whether it was a crime. You'd have to know what were the circumstances, what was the intention around that? But it's certainly something, it's the reason we conducted a year long investigation to understand where e-mails had gone on an unclassified system that contained classified information.

GOODLATTE:

And what did you determine with regard to the e-mails found on her computer?

COMEY:

I hope I'm getting this right and my troops will correct me if I'm wrong, but they were duplicates of e-mails that had been produced because the e-mails had been used to sort before our production.

GOODLATTE:

Now both Cheryl Mills and Heather Samuelson were granted immunity for production of these computers, these laptops. Why were they then allowed to sit in on the interview with Secretary Clinton?

COMEY:

Might be -- the Department of Justice reached a letter agreement with the two lawyers to give them what's called act of production immunity, meaning nothing that's found on there -- the laptop they turn over -- will be used against them directly and which is a fairly normal tool in investigations.

They were -- Ms. Mills in particular was a member of the -- Secretary Clinton's legal team and so Secretary Clinton decides which of her lawyers come to voluntary interviews with the FBI.

GOODLATTE:

Is it usual to allow a witness or potential witness in a subsequent prosecution had one been undertaken to be present in the room when the FBI interviews another witness and potential target of an investigation?

COMEY:

The FBI has no ability to exclude or include any lawyer that a subject being interviewed chooses to have there.

GOODLATTE:

Even if the lawyer is a witness in the case? Can you cite any other instance in which a witness to a criminal investigation who has already been interviewed by the FBI has been allowed to accompany and server as legal counsel to the target of that investigation?

COMEY:

I can't from personal experience. It wouldn't surprise me if it happened. The Department of Justice -- excuse me, the FBI has no ability to decide who comes to an interview in a voluntary interview context. If it was a judicial proceeding, a judge could police who could be there. Obviously lawyers are governed by canons of ethics to decide what matters they can be involved in but it doesn't fall to us to say you can be in, you can't be in.

GOODLATTE:

But wouldn't you agree that it is a conflict of interest for them to serve as attorney for Secretary Clinton in this matter having been interviewed by the FBI as witnesses?

COMEY:

That's a question a lawyer has to answer for him or herself.

GOODLATTE:

You're a lawyer, Director Comey. What's your opinion of that?

COMEY:

Oh, I don't want to offer an opinion on that but that's something a lawyer has to decide for themselves. I assume with counsel and consulting our canons of ethics what matters you can be involved in and what you can't. But again, the bureau's role in conducting a voluntary interview is to interview the subject. Who they bring is up to them.

GOODLATTE:

How can you trust the voracity of Secretary Clinton's answers knowing that witnesses previously interviewed by the FBI were allowed to participate in the interview?

COMEY:

We assessed the answers based on what's said and all the other evidence we've gathered. It...

GOODLATTE:

Consultation with her quote, "attorneys who are also witnesses to what was previously done early and may have in fact themselves violated the law for which they requested and were granted immunity."

COMEY:

The answer's the same. We make the assessment based on what the witness says and the other evidence we've gathered in the case. Who's sitting there, to me, is not particularly germane.

GOODLATTE:

Thank you. My time has expired. The chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Conyers for his questions.

CONYERS:

Thank you. Thank you so much. Director James Comey, twice this past week, the city of Charlotte, North Carolina has been shaken by the shooting deaths of black men. It's only one city out of many in this country looking for answers about the use of force by police. We on this committee are looking for answers too. You are a vocal advocate for better collection of information about violent encounters between police and civilian.

Has the FBI's ability to collect this information improved in the years since we have last discussed it and why are these statistics so important to our current discussion on the use of force by police?

COMEY:

Thank you Mr. Conyers. We're having passionate, important conversations in this country about police of use force in connection with encounters with civilians especially with African Americans. All of those conversations are uninformed today.

They're all driven by anecdote because as a country we simply don't have the information to know, do we have an epidemic of violence directed by law enforcement against black folks, do we have an epidemic involving brown folks, white folks, we just don't know.

And in the absence of that data, we're driven entirely by anecdote and that's a very bad place to be. I don't know whether there's an epidemic of violence. My instincts tell me there isn't but I don't know. I can't tell you whether shootings involving people of any different color are up or down or sideways and nor can anybody else in this country.

And so to discuss the money important things that are going on in this country, we need information and the government should collect it -- I can't think of something that's more inherently governmental than the need to use deadly force in an encounter during law enforcement work.

And so what's changed in the last year, which is really good news, is that everybody in leadership in law enforcement of the United States has agreed with this, and they've agreed the FBI will build and maintain a database where we collect important information about all such encounters involving the use of deadly force.

That will allow us to know what's going on this country so we can have a thoughtful conversation and resist being ruled by individual anecdotes. That's why it matters so much.

We're making progress. We will have this done, I'd like to have it done in the next year. Certainly in the next two years, this database will be up and running because everybody gets why it matters so much.

CONYERS:

Thank you. On August 30th, I wrote to you regarding Donald Trump's extensive connections to the Russian government. The letter cites to a number of troubling reports, some that suggest mere conflicts of interests, others that might suggest evidence of a crime.

Last Friday, we read a new report suggesting that Mr. Trump's foreign policy advisor has been meeting with high ranking sanctioned officials in Moscow to discuss lifting economic sanctions.

If Mr. Donald Trump becomes president, the same report quotes -- quote, "a senior United States law enforcement official who says that this relationship is being quote "actively monitored and investigated" end quotation.

Is the FBI investigating the activities of Mr. Trump or any advisor to the Trump campaign with respect to any line of communication between the campaign and the Russian government?

COMEY:

I can't say sir. As I said in response to a different question from the Chairman, we don't confirm or deny investigation.

CONYERS:

Well, more generally then, is it lawful for a private citizen to enter into official government negotiations with a foreign nation?

COMEY:

I don't think it's appropriate for me to answer that hypothetical.

CONYERS:

Well, in my view our research shows that it is not. The Logan Act 18 USC section 953 prohibits this conduct in my view. And finally, does Mr. Trump currently receive intelligence briefings from the FBI?

COMEY:

Both candidates and their running mates are offered on a regular basis briefings from the entire intelligence community. Some portion of the first briefing included an FBI segment, so yes.

CONYERS:

Does his staff attend those meetings as well?

COMEY:

No, just the candidate and the vice presidential candidate.

CONYERS:

And finally, if a member of either...

COMEY:

OK, no I'm wrong. I'm sorry, I've got to correct what I said. Each was allowed to bring two people and as I recall, Mr. Trump did bring two individuals with clearances to the briefing. Secretary Clinton did not. I'm sorry, I misstated that.

CONYERS:

All right. Finally, if a member of either campaign were engaged in secret back channel communications with a foreign adversary, could that line of communication pose a threat to national security?

COMEY:

Mr. Conyers, I don't think it's appropriate given that I'm not commenting on whether we have an investigation to answer hypotheticals that might make it look like I'm commenting on whether we have an investigation so I'd prefer not to answer that sir.

CONYERS:

Well, thank you for being here today and I thank the Chairman and yield back.

GOODLATTE:

The chair thanks the gentleman and recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. Sensenbrenner for five minutes.

SENSENBRENNER:

Thank you Mr. Chairman. Director Comey welcome.

Who authorized granting Cheryl Mills immunity?

COMEY:

I'm sorry?

SENSENBRENNER:

Who authorized granting Cheryl Mills immunity?

COMEY:

It's a decision made by the Department of Justice. I don't know at what level inside. In our investigations, the -- anything -- any kind of immunity comes from the prosecutors not the investigations.

SENSENBRENNER:

OK. Did she request immunity?

COMEY:

I don't know for sure what the negotiations involved. I believe her lawyer asked for act of production immunity with respect to the production of her laptop. That's my understanding but again the FBI wasn't part of those conversations.

SENSENBRENNER:

Now, its been a matter of public record that Secretary Clinton brought nine people into the room where two FBI agents were questioning her. Is that normal practice?

COMEY:

No, there is no normal practice. I've been in -- done interviews with a big crowd and some with just the subject. It's unusual to have that large a number but it's not unprecedented in my experience.

SENSENBRENNER:

Now, Cheryl Mills you know, also stated that she was an attorney.

I'm very concerned that when a fact witness represents a client who might be the target of an investigation, there's a conflict of interest and rather than letting Ms. Mills make a determination, would the FBI be willing to refer the matter of fact witness, Ms. Mills in this case representing a target, Secretary Clinton in this case, to the appropriate bar association for investigation?

COMEY:

That's not a role for the FBI. We're investigating -- even though I happen to be a lawyer, we're not lawyers, we're investigators. So that's a question for the legal part of the Department of Justice.

SENSENBRENNER:

OK, why did Ms. Mills request immunity? Was she hiding something or was she afraid that something would incriminate her that was on her laptop?

COMEY:

I don't know. That's a -- I'm sure that's a conversation she and her lawyer had and then her lawyer had with lawyers at the department. I just don't know.

SENSENBRENNER:

Well, there was an op-ed by Professor Jonathan Turley that appeared in the media that said that there are a lot of good cases scuttled by granting immunity and there was lots of immunity that was granted here.

Doesn't it concern you as an investigator that your chiefs in the Justice Department decided to become an immunity producing machine for many people who would have been very key witnesses should there have been a prosecution?

COMEY:

I don't think of it that way. Doesn't strike me there was a lot of immunity issued in this case. I know it's a complicated subject but there's all different kinds of immunity. There's probably three different kinds that featured in this case. Fairly typical in a complex white collar case especially as you try and work your way up towards your subject. So my overall reaction is, this looks like ordinary investigative process to me.

SENSENBRENNER:

Well, the target was not an ordinary target. I think we all know that and since you announced that there would be no prosecution of Secretary Clinton in July, there have been several very materially issues that are troubling and would this not require a re- opening of the investigation to sole those issues?

COMEY:

I haven't seen anything that would come near to that kind of situation. I know there's lot's of questions, lot's of controversy, I'm very proud of the way this was done.

SENSENBRENNER:

Well, you know -- come on now, with all due respect, since you made this announcement there have been many more issues that came out that were not on the table prior to your announcement that the investigation against Secretary Clinton had been dropped and I think the American public is entitled to answers on this particularly since we have to know the extent of the classified information which ended up being on the private e-mail server.

All of us on this committee have got security clearances of some kind or another and I'm kind of worried that if I got some classified information and went back to my office and used an unsecured server to send it to somebody who may also have had classified information, I would be in big trouble. And I should be in big trouble if I did something like that.

SENSENBRENNER:

There seems to be different strokes for different folks on this and that's what Americans are concerned about, particularly when we're looking to elect someone to the highest office of the land and the leader of the free world. I don't think your answers are satisfactory at all, Mr. Comey. I do have a great deal of respect for you but I think that there's a heavy hand coming from some place else and with that I yield back.

GOODLATTE:

The chair thanks the gentleman and recognizes the gentleman from New York, Mr. Nadler for five minutes.

NADLER:

Thank you Mr. Chairman. First let me express my admiration and thanks to the FBI for their professional manner and excellent work they did in the bombings that occurred in New York about a block out of my district to apprehend this suspect within what, 48 hours and do everything was a very good indication of team work and professionalism and I congratulate on that.

Secondly, let me say that I think that the mud that is being thrown from the other side of this table here continually only because of the ongoing presidential elections in a case in which the FBI decided there was nothing to prosecute, it's over and we all know nobody would even be talking about it if Hillary Clinton weren't the presidential candidate. This is pure political maneuvering.

But let me talk about a case that may pose a current national security threat to the United States and ask you a few questions about that. In his earlier remarks, Mr. Conyers referenced an August 30th letter from the ranking members of a number of House committees.

That letter asked whether the FBI was investigating troubling connections between Trump campaign officials and Russian interests and whether they contributed to the illegal hacking of the Democratic National Committee and the Democratic National Campaign Committee. You're familiar with that letter, I think?

COMEY:

Yes, I'm familiar with the letter.

NADLER:

If I could ask you a few questions. The letter said this and I quote, "on August 8th, 2016, Roger Stone, a Donald Trump confidant revealed that he has communicated with WikiLeaks founder, Julian Assange about the upcoming release of additional illegally hacked Democratic documents. Mr. Stone made this statements during a Republican campaign event while answering a question about a potential October surprise.

Obviously if someone stating publicly that he's in direct communication with the organization that obtained these illegally hacked documents, I assume the FBI would want to talk to that person. Has the FBI interviewed Roger Stone about his communications with Julian Assange for his knowledge of how WikiLeaks got these illegally obtained documents?

COMEY:

I can't comment on that.

NADLER:

Mr. Stone stated that he has knowledge about upcoming leaks of additional illegally hacked documents. Has the FBI asked him about those communications?

COMEY:

I also can't comment on that.

NADLER:

Because it's an ongoing investigation?

COMEY:

I don't want to confirm whether there is or is not an investigation. That's why -- that's the way I answered Mr. Conyer's questions as well.

NADLER:

Director Comey, the FBI acknowledged in private -- in public statements and testimony that it was -- acknowledged that it was investigating Secretary Clinton's use of a private e-mail server and that was while the investigation was still ongoing. Now you can't comment on whether there's an investigation. Is there a different for Secretary Clinton and Donald Trump? If not, what is the consistent standard?

COMEY:

No, our standard is we do not confirm or deny the existence of investigations. There's an exception for that when there is a need for public to be reassured, when it's obvious, it's apparent given our activities, public activities that the investigation is ongoing but our overwhelming rule is we do not comment except in certain exceptional circumstances.

NADLER:

I know, aren't there exceptional circumstances when close officials to a candidate of a major political party for the United States says publicly that he's in communication with foreign officials and anticipates further illegal activity?

COMEY:

I don't think so.

NADLER:

Mr. Trump's campaign chairman, Paul Manafort resigned after failing to disclose his role in assisting a pro-Russian party in Ukraine. The Associated Press reported, and I quote, "Donald Trump's campaign chairman helped a pro-Russian party in Ukraine secretly route $2.2 million in payments to two primary Washington lobbying firms in 2012 and did so in a way that affectively obscured the foreign political party's efforts to influence U.S. policy.

Has the FBI interviewed Mr. Manafort about his failure to disclose his work for this foreign government as federal law requires?

COMEY:

I have to give you the same answer Mr. Nadler.

NADLER:

Has the FBI interviewed Rick Gates, who reported that he still works for the Trump campaign about his involvement in this thing (ph)?

COMEY:

Same answer sir.

NADLER:

Director Comey, after you investigated Secretary Clinton, you made a decision to explain publicly who you interviewed and why. You also disclosed documents including those from those interviews. Why shouldn't the American people have the same level of information about your investigation with those associated with Mr. Trump?

COMEY:

I'm not confirmed that we're investigating people associated with Mr. Trump. In the matter of the e-mail investigation, it was our judgment, my judgment and the rest of the FBI's judgment that those were exceptional circumstances where the public needed...

NADLER:

OK my final question is the following, you investigated Secretary Clinton's e-mails and so-forth, everything we've been talking about. You concluded, I believe quite properly, that there was nothing to prosecute and you announced, in my opinion quite properly, that you had investigated it and there was nothing there, there was nothing to prosecute. That was proper.

But having announced that a prosecutorial agency announced that we've investigated so and so and we've decided to prosecute because, or we've investigated so and so and we've decided not to prosecute because.

Why is it appropriate for that prosecutorial agency to go further and say, even though we decided not to prosecute, we still think this person did this, that or the other thing and it was proper, improper, why is it proper for a prosecutorial agency to characterize your opinion of the propriety of the actions of someone who you have announced that you have decided there's nothing criminal and shouldn't be prosecuted?

COMEY:

It's a very hard decision, that's why it's the exception to the rule. It -- you do risk damaging someone who isn't convicted. The judgment I made in this case is given the unusual, in fact I hope unprecedented, nature of this investigation that it was appropriate to offer that transparency. Not an easy call, I really wrestled with it but I think I'm balancing...

NADLER:

Let me just say before my time expires that I think, and I'm just talking to myself, that that was highly inappropriate. That having determined that there was nothing to prosecute and having announced that quite properly, the prosecuting agency, the Department of Justice to comment with comments that will be looked upon as authoritative.

That what she did was right or wrong or good or bad is not the appropriate role of a prosecuting agency and risks, not in this case perhaps, but risks -- and I talk really now because of the future, I don't want to see that happen again.

With regard to anybody because it puts anybody, who did not commit a crime, who you have -- you or the Justice Department, whoever's determined, did not commit a crime and there's no evidence that's sufficient to prosecute isn't at the mercy of the opinion of an individual or individuals within the prosecuting agency and that's just not right under our system. I yield back.

GOODLATTE:

Time of the gentleman has expired. The chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Smith for five minutes.

SMITH:

Thank you Mr. Chairman. Director Comey thank you for those examples of the FBI's good work in your opening statement. I think we all appreciate what the FBI has done. My first question is this, would you re-open the Clinton investigation if you discovered new information that was both relevant and substantial?

COMEY:

It's hard for me to answer in the abstract. We would certainly look at any new and substantial information.

SMITH:

In general, and less impartializing (ph), in general if you discovered new information that was substantial and relevant, you would re-open an investigation, would you not?

COMEY:

Again, even in general, I don't think we can answer that in the abstract. What we can say is if any investigation of people have new and substantial information, we'd like to see it so we can make an evaluation.

SMITH:

OK, let me give you some examples and mention several new developments that I think have occurred and ask you if you have become aware of them. The first example is what the chairman mentioned a while ago.

An employee at a company that managed Former Secretary Clinton's private e-mail server said quote, "I need to strip out ABIP's (ph), bury BIP e-mail address from a bunch of archived e-mails. Basically they don't want the BIP's e-mail address exposed to anyone." I assume you're aware of that?

COMEY:

I'm aware of that.

SMITH:

OK, the same employee called a new retention policy designed to delete e-mails after 60 days a quote, "Hillary cover-up operation," and you saw that did you not?

COMEY:

Say the last, I'm sorry Mr. Smith, I couldn't hear the last...

SMITH:

Same employee called a new retention policy designed to delete e-mails after 60 days a Hillary cover-up operation. You saw that?

COMEY:

I don't know that particular language.

SMITH:

Oh, OK. We'll get you the source but you can take my word for it that that's what he said.

COMEY:

I will.

SMITH:

Another examples, a former Clinton Foundation employee who also managed the Clinton server destroyed devices used by Former Secretary Clinton by smashing them with a hammer. You're aware of that?

COMEY:

Yes.

SMITH:

OK. Two employees of the company that managed Former Secretary Clinton's server recently plead the fifth amendment to Congress to avoid self-incrimination. You're aware of that?

COMEY:

Yes.

SMITH:

OK, and then lastly, 15,000 more work related e-mails were discovered though there had been an attempt to wrongly delete them. And you're aware of that?

COMEY:

I think we discovered them.

SMITH:

Right. To me, Director Comey, what I cited are not the actions of innocent people. There is a distinct possibility that Mrs. Clinton or her staff directed others to destroy evidence in a government investigation which of course is against the law. So I would urge you to re-open your investigation. Do you want to comment on that?

COMEY:

I don't.

SMITH:

OK. I know you can't tell us whether you have or have not, but I believe I have given evidence of new information that is relevant and substantial that would justify re-opening the investigation. My next question is this, I know you have granted immunity to a number of individuals but if you had new information that is relevant and substantial, you would be able to investigate them further wouldn't you?

COMEY:

Not to quibble, the FBI doesn't grant immunity to anybody, the Department of Justice is able to grant very different kinds of immunity. Yes (ph) an immunity -- if new and substantial evidence develops either that a witness lied under a grant of use immunity or under any kind of immunity, of course the Department of Justice can pursue it.

SMITH:

OK.

COMEY:

Nobody gets lifetime immunity.

SMITH:

Right, OK. Thank you Director Comey. Last question is, as chairman of the Science Committee, I issued the FBI a subpoena on September 19th, 2016. The due date for a response was two days ago, September 26th. Your all (ph) staff has still not provided the requested information and documents.

Yesterday we pointed out to them that the Science Committee has jurisdiction over the National Institute of Standards and Technology, which sets standards for the Federal Information Security Modernization Act of 2014. I trust you intend to comply with the subpoena?

COMEY:

I intend to continue the conversations we've been having about the subpoena. As you know we've made a lot of documents available to at least six committees and the question of whether we should make additional -- to available to another committee is something that we're struggling with but talking to your folks about.

SMITH:

And to me there's no struggle if we have clear jurisdiction which we can demonstrate it, I think obligates you to comply with this subpoena.

COMEY:

Yes sir, we're not trying to be disrespectful. We're just not sure we see the jurisdictional issue the way that your folks do but we're continuing to talk about it.

SMITH:

OK, thank you Director Comey.

GOODLATTE (?):

The gentleman -- did the gentleman yield?

SMITH:

I'll yield to the gentleman from California.

ISSA:

Thank you, the chairman of full committee had asked something earlier and I just want to point out and ask to be placed in the record. According to the Maryland Code of Ethics, 19301.11, it specifically prohibits a former or current government officer and employee from acting as a counsel to someone that they represented in government. I'd like that to be placed in the record.

GOODLATTE:

Without objection, it will be made a part of the record.

ISSA:

In light of the fact that the Maryland Bar has this prohibition, would that have changed your view of allowing her in and saying you had no authority?

COMEY:

I'm not qualified nor am I going to answer questions about legal ethics in this forum. The FBI has no basis to exclude somebody from an interview who the subject of the interview says is on their legal team.

ISSA:

OK.

SMITH:

And thank you Director Comey, thank you Mr. Chairman. I yield back.

GOODLATTE:

The chair thanks the gentleman, recognizes the gentlewoman from California, Ms. Lofgren for five minutes.

LOFGREN:

Thank you Mr. Chairman and thank you Director Comey for once again appearing before this committee as you appear before so many committees here on the House. Sometimes I wonder how you get any work done at all that you are called up here so frequently. You know there's been a lot of focus on the private e-mail that Secretary Clinton used just as her predecessor Colin Powell used.

So far as I'm aware from the public comments, there's no forensic evidence that there was a breach of that service although theoretically you could intrude and not leave evidence. But there's been very little focus on the breach at the State Department e-mail system. Now its been reported in the press that this breach of the State Department e-mail system was one of the largest ever of a federal system and was accomplished by, according to the press, either China or Russia.

I'm wondering if you are able to give us any insight into whether it was in fact the Russians who hacked into the State Department e- mail system or whether that's still under investigation.

COMEY:

Not in this open forum I can't.

LOFGREN:

All right, I'm hoping that we can get some insight in an appropriate classified setting on that. Now we have watched with some concern, and I know you are also concerned, about the Russian intrusion into our election system.

The -- its been reported to us that the Russians hacked into the Democratic National Committee database. They also hacked into the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee and it seems that they are making an effort to influence the outcome of this election.

We've been warned that the information stolen might not just be released but also be altered and forged and then released in an effort to impact the election here in the United States.

Yesterday there were press reports, and I don't know if they're accurate and I'm interested if you are able to tell us, that the Russians have also hacked the telephones of Democratic staffers and that there was a request for Democratic staffers to bring their cell phones into the FBI to have them mirrored. Can you tell us anything about that?

COMEY:

I can't at this point but I can say in response to the first part of your question, any hacking is something we take very seriously. Any hacking in connection with this nation's election system is something we take extraordinarily seriously.

The whole of government and so it is something the FBI is spending a lot of time on right now to try and understand, so what are they up to and what does it involve and what's the scope of it, to equip the president to decide upon the appropriate response. And so that's one of the reasons I have to be very careful about what I say about it. That work is ongoing.

I should make clear to folks, when we talk about our election system, there's been a lot of press reporting about attempts to intrude into voter registration databases. Those are connected to the internet, that's very different than the electoral mechanism in this country...

LOFGREN:

No I -- we have actually a hearing and I had the chance to talk to Alex Pedilla, who's the secretary of state in California. Number one they encrypt their database. Number two, even if you were to steal it, there's back ups that you couldn't steal so they can't really manipulate that but you could cause a lot of damage.

I mean you could create chaos on election day that would -- and you could target that chaos to areas where voters had a tendency to vote for one candidate over another in an attempt to influence the outcome.

So it's not a benign situation certainly and one that we want to worry. I want to just quickly touch on a concern I have also on cyber on Rule 41 and how the FBI is interpreting that. I'm concerned that the change as understood by the FBI would allow for one warrant for multiple computers but would include allowing the FBI to access victims' computers in order to clean them up.

The cyber security experts that I've been in touch with have raised very strong concerns about that provision, especially using malware's own signaling system to disable the malware.

The cyber experts who have talked to me and expressed concern believe that that ultimately could actually trigger attacks and so I'm wondering if you have any comments on how the FBI intends to use Rule 41 vis a vis malware on victims' computers.

GOODLATTE:

Thank you, the time of the gentlewoman has expired. The witness will be permitted to answer the question.

COMEY:

Thank you Mr. Chairman. I'm not an expert but one of the challenges we face especially in dealing with these huge criminal bot- nets, which have harvested and connected lots of innocent people's computer is, how do we execute a search warrant to try and figure out where the bad guys are and get them away from those innocent people and the challenge that we've been facing is to go to every single jurisdiction and get a warrant would take literally years.

And so we're trying to figure out, can we use Rule 41 to have one judge issue that order and give us that authority?

LOFGREN:

But -- Mr. Chairman, I know my time is expired, I'd just like to close my expressing the hope that the FBI might seek the guidance of some of the computer experts at our national labs on this very question of triggering malware attacks and I yield back.

GOODLATTE:

The point is well taken. The chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Chabot for five minutes.

CHABOT:

Thank you Mr. Chairman. Director Comey, Chairman Goodlatte in his introduction of you mentioned that you're a graduate of the College of William and Mary and as you may well know, I'm a graduate of William and Mary as well.

Anyway, you may remember that our alma mater is very proud of something called the honor code. And I checked out the wording of the honor code to make sure that I was correct on it and I'll tell you exactly what it says.

It says, "as a member of the William and Mary community, I pledge on my honor not to lie, cheat or steal either in my academic or my personal life." Well, one of the people who's behavior you investigated, Hillary Clinton, didn't have the good fortune to attend the College of William and Mary but she did attend Wellesley and I wondered whether they had an honor code and I found out, I looked it up, they do and they did.

And here's what it says, "as a Wellesley college student, I will act with honesty, integrity and respect. In making this commitment, I am accountable to the community and dedicate myself to a life of honor." Let me repeat part of that again, "I will act with honesty."

Now, I'm sure the young women attending Wellesley today, and those that have attended it in the past, are proud that one of their own could be the next president of the United States.

But a majority of the American people have come to the conclusion that Hillary Clinton is not honest and cannot be trusted, it's about two to one who say that she's dishonest.

In the latest Quinnipiac Poll for example, the question being, would you say that Hillary Clinton is honest or not, 65 percent said no and only 32 percent said yes, she is honest. Republican and Democrats not surprisingly were overwhelmingly one way or another, but Independents, 80 percent of them said no, she's not honest and only 19 percent of them said she is.

So, Director Comey, since you and your people were the ones who investigated Hillary Clinton's e-mail scandal, I'd just like to ask a couple of questions. First, Hillary Clinton claimed over and over that none of the e-mails that she sent contained classified information. Was she truthful when she said that?

COMEY:

As I said when I testified in July, there were -- I'm forgetting now, two, two and a half months, the exact number but there were 80 or so e-mails that contained classified information.

CHABOT:

OK, so she said they didn't contain classified information and they did so that sounds like not being truthful. Not trying to put words into your mouth but I think that's what that means. Hillary Clinton then came up with a fall-back position saying, well, none of the e-mails I sent were marked classified but that wasn't true either, was it?

COMEY:

There were three, as I recall, three e-mails that were within the body of the text portion marking that indicated they were classified confidential.

CHABOT:

And again, not putting words in your mouth but I think that means that no, she didn't tell the truth in that particular instance. Hillary Clinton said she decided to use a personal e-mail server system for convenience and that she had only had to carry around one Blackberry. Was she being truthful when she said she just used one device?

COMEY:

She used during her tenure as secretary of state, multiple devices, not at the same time but sequentially.

CHABOT:

OK again I'm going to take that as she said one and it was more. So therefore, not honest. And in fact, some of the devices were destroyed with a hammer as its already been mentioned. Is that the type of behavior that you would expect from someone who is being fully cooperative with an investigation, destroying devices containing potential evidence with hammer?

COMEY:

Well, we uncovered no evidence that devices were destroyed during the pendency of our investigation and so why people destroyed devices when there's no investigation is a question I'm not able to answer.

CHABOT:

OK, thank you and Mr. Director, a little less than two months Hillary Clinton, in talking about her e-mails, claimed that you said and I quote, "that my answers were truthful." PolitiFact by the way gave this claim a pants on fire rating. Did you say that she was telling the truth with respect to her e-mail claims?

COMEY:

I did not. I never say that about anybody. Our business is never to decide whether someone, whether we believe someone, our business is always to decide what evidence do we have that would convince us not to believe that person. It's an odd way to look at the world but it's how investigators look at the world.

CHABOT:

Thank you. Director Comey, it must have been, and I'm almost out of time, it must have been very awkward for you.

You're tasked with investigating a person who could be the next president of the United States and the current president of the United States has already pre-judged the case and telegraphed to you and the entire Justice Department that he, your boss, has come to the conclusion that there is not even smidgen of corruption.

His own words, before you've even completed your investigation. You were aware that he'd said that, weren't you?

COMEY:

Yes I saw those, they were reported in the press.

CHABOT:

OK and finally it just seems to me here that there was clearly a double standard going on, by for example, if anybody else had done this like a soldier or a serviceman who did virtually the same thing, they would've been prosecuted and were, but not Hillary Clinton. And that's a double standard and that's not the way it's supposed to work in America and I'm out of time, I yield back.

COMEY:

I disagree with that characterization but...

GOODLATTE:

The gentleman is permitted to respond.

COMEY:

I don't think so. I actually if I -- if we were to recommend she be prosecuted, that would be a double standard because Mary and Joe at the FBI or some other place, if they did this, would not be prosecuted. They'd be disciplined, they'd be in big trouble. In the FBI if you did this, you would not be prosecuted, that wouldn't be fair. OK.

GOODLATTE:

The time of the gentleman has expired, the chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Texas, Ms. Jackson Lee for five minutes.

JACKSON LEE:

Chairman thank you so very much. Many Americans have come to trust Hillary Clinton as a dedicated, committed public servant but I believe it's important as we address these questions, let me make one or two points. My colleagues have already made it and I look forward maybe to coming back to Washington to dealing with the potential Russian intrusion on the election system.

I'm not asking you Director at this time, and also the issue of connecting the dots as we deal with terrorism across America.

But I do want to acknowledge Eric Williams (ph), an outstanding detailee (ph) to this Judiciary Committee, thank him for his service and I want to thank the sack (ph) in Houston, Mr. Turner for helping us in the shooting that occurred in Houston as you well know that gave us a great deal of fear and scare just a couple of days ago.

But Director Comey, my Republican colleagues have questioned, second guessed and attacked you and your team of career FBI agents.

They disagree with the results of your investigation, they want you to prosecute or to ask the DOJ to prosecute Secretary Clinton regardless of the facts. So they've engaged in an almost daily ritual of holding hearings definitely trying to tear down the investigation and your recommendation.

I believe you testified previously that your recommendation in that case was unanimous and your investigation was carried out by what you called an all star team of career agents and prosecutors. Is that right?

COMEY:

Yes, these were some of our very best. And sometimes because I'm lucky enough to be the person who represents the FBI, people think it's my conclusion. Sure it's my conclusion but I'm reporting what the team thought and their supervisors and their supervisors. As I said, this was, as painful as it is for people sometimes, this was not a close call.

JACKSON LEE:

Let me continue. You have written that the case itself was not a cliffhanger. Is that right?

COMEY:

Correct, correct.

JACKSON LEE:

Recently Republicans have attacked the decision to provide limited immunity to individuals during the investigation.

For example, when Congressman Chaffetz learned about this he stated and I quote, "no wonder they couldn't prosecute a case, they were handing out immunity deals like candy." I understand that the FBI does not make the final call on immunity agreements, that was the DOJ, you made that clear.

So his statement was just wrong. But did you consult closely with DOJ before these immunity agreements were concluded by giving, by having facts?

COMEY:

Right, our job is to tell them what facts we'd like to get access to. The prosecutor's job is to figure out how to do that and so they negotiate, I think there were five limited immunity agreements. There are different kinds that they negotiated.

JACKSON LEE:

Did you or anyone at the FBI ever object to these decisions to grant immunity, did you think they made sense?

COMEY:

No, it was fairly ordinary stuff.

JACKSON LEE:

Was the FBI or DOJ handing out immunity agreements like candy?

COMEY:

That's not how I saw it. I didn't see it.

JACKSON LEE:

Congressman Gowdy, a good friend, also objected to granting immunity to Brian Pagliano and Mr. Combetta at Platte River networks.

He quoted, these are the two people that FBI decides to give immunity to, Brian and the guy at Platte River -- if it happened, those are the two that you would want to prosecute so you're giving immunity to the trigger people and everybody goes free. Do you agree with this assessment? Did the FBI screw up here and let everyone go free because of these limited immunity deals?

COMEY:

No I don't think so. The goal in an investigation like this is to work up and if people have information that their lawyers are telling you that you're not going to get without some limited form of immunity and they're lowered down, you try to get that information to see if you can make a case against your subjects.

JACKSON LEE:

Congressman Gowdy also said this about the FBI and I quote, I've been underwhelmed by an agency that I once had tremendous respect for.

Let me just say sitting on this Judiciary Committee for many, many years, going through a number of investigations, I have never been proud of an agency that has always been there when vulnerable people are hurting and when there is a need for great work. But my question to you is, what is your response to that, Director Comey? Do you believe these criticisms are fair?

COMEY:

I think questions are fair. I think criticism is health and fair. I think reasonable people can disagree about whether I should have announced and how I should have done it. What's not fair is any implication the bureau acted in any way other than independently, competently and honestly here.

That's just not true. I knew this going to be controversial, I knew there'd be all kinds of rocks thrown but this organization and the people who did this are honest independent people.

We do not carry water for one side or the other. That's hard for people to see because so much of our country, we see things through sides. We are not on anybody's side. This was done exactly the way you would want it to be done. That said, questions are fair. Feedback is fair.

JACKSON LEE:

Absolutely but the foot soldiers, we use that term in the civil rights movement, your agents on the ground, you take issue with whether or not they were compromised or they were adhering to somebody's message. Is that what you're saying?

COMEY:

Absolutely. You can call us wrong but don't call us weasels. We are not weasels, we are honest people and we did this in that way. Whether your disagree or agree with the result, this was done the way you want it to be done.

JACKSON LEE:

You were able to learn that Mr. Pagliano and Mr. Combetta, you learned what they had to say and if anyone provided statements to the FBI had actually provided evidence that Secretary Clinton had committed a crime, would you then have recommended prosecution to the DOJ?

COMEY:

Oh yes, if the case was there, very aggressively.

JACKSON LEE:

You sure you wouldn't have been a little nervous about doing so, a little intimidated?

COMEY:

No, I really don't care.

JACKSON LEE:

You don't look like it, you're kind of tall and that's...

COMEY:

I have a 10 year term, that's the beauty of this -- while there's a lot of challenging things about this job, one of the great things is I have a certain amount of job security and so no, either way we would have done what the facts told us should be done.

JACKSON LEE:

So are you now second guessing your decision regarding Hillary Clinton?

COMEY:

No.

(CROSSTALK)

JACKSON LEE:

Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the director and ask my colleagues to give the respect that this agency in this instance deserves. Thank you so very much for your service, I yield back.

GOODLATTE:

The chair thanks the gentlewoman, recognizes the gentleman from California, Mr. Issa for five minutes.

ISSA:

Thank you Mr. Chairman. Director, I've got a lot of concerns but one of them refers to Reddit.

At the time that the Department of Justice at your behest or your involvement gave Paul Combetta immunity, did you do so knowing about all of the posts he had on Reddit and capturing all of those posts in correspondence where he was asking where to wipe or completely erase on behalf of a very, VVIP so to speak?

COMEY:

I'm not sure sitting here. My recollection isn't -- and I'll check this and fix it if I'm wrong, that we had some awareness of the Reddit post. I don't know whether our folks had read them all or not. We had a pretty good understanding of what we thought he had done but that's my best recollection.

ISSA:

OK in the last week, en masse he's been deleting them from Reddit post. Is that consistent with preserving evidence? And I said that because there's still an ongoing interest by Congress and only in spite of Reddit's own senior, what they call flack team, trying to hide it only because a few people caught it, do we even know about and is this and other committees interested in getting the backups that may exist on these deletions.

I guess my question to you is, is he destroying evidence relevant to Congressional inquiries? And I'll answer it for you, yes he is and what are you going to do about it?

COMEY:

That's not something I can comment on.

ISSA:

Let me go into something that concerns this body in a very specific way. As a former chairman issuing subpoenas, I issued a subpoena and additionally I issued preserved letters in addition to that. Now Chairman Chaffetz issued whatever effectively preserved letters.

Some of them were directly to Hillary Rodham Clinton while she was still secretary. Others, the subpoena in the 2013 was to Secretary Kerry. These individuals destroyed documents pursuant, or took it out of federal custody, pursuant to our subpoena and our discovery.

As a result, they committed crimes. My question to you is, when I was a chairman and I wanted to grant immunity to somebody, I had to notice the Department of Justice and you were consulted, isn't that correct?

COMEY:

In a particular matter?

ISSA:

In any matter.

COMEY:

I don't know whether the FBI is consulted in that circumstance.

ISSA:

OK, for the record yes, the Department of Justice does not grant immunity without checking with federal law enforcement to see whether it will impact any ongoing investigation. That's the reason we have a requirement to give notice.

When the reverse was occurring, you were granting, handing out like candy according to some, immunity. Did you, or to your knowledge, Department of Justice confer with Chairman Goodlatte, Chairman Chaffetz, Chairman Smith or any of the other chairmen who had ongoing subpoenas and investigations?

COMEY:

Not to my knowledge.

ISSA:

So isn't there a double standard that when you granted immunity to these five individuals, you took them out of the reach of prosecution for crimes committed related to destruction of documents or withholding or other crimes pursuant to Congressional subpoenas?

COMEY:

I don't think anybody was given transactional immunity.

ISSA:

Oh really? Now we have not allowed to make your immunities public but I'm going to take the privilege of making one part of it public. I read them. You gave immunity from destruction to both of those attorneys, not just turning them, the documents over, specifically destruction. You did the same thing with these other two individuals, Brian and Paul Combetta. You gave them immunity from destruction.

COMEY:

Yes I don't think -- again, I could always be wrong but I don't have them in front of me...

ISSA:

Well, because you don't let us take them out of the skiff, it's a little hard for us too but the fact is when you read them...

(CROSSTALK)

COMEY:

... my answer -- I'm pretty sure that what was granted was use immunity. In the case of those two people coextensive with 18 USC 6001, which means no statement you make can be used against you directly or indirectly. Transactional immunity is sometimes given also by prosecutors, says you will not be prosecuted in any event for this set of facts. I don't think there was any transactional immunity.

ISSA:

Well, when I read for both of the attorneys that immunity was granted, it in both cases said destruction in addition to the turning over. Why was that -- why would you believe that was necessary or do you believe that would be necessary?

You wanted the document -- you wanted the physical evidence, why did you have to give them immunity from destruction of materials and because my time is expiring, when you look into it and hopefully get back to this committee, I'd like to know does that immunity apply only to destruction on the computers delivered so that other destructions by Cheryl Mills could still be prosecuted?

COMEY:

Yes, again my recollection is no transactional immunity was given. A protection of statements was given to the Combetta guy and Mr. Pagliano.

ISSA:

Thank you Mr. Chairman.

GOODLATTE:

The chair thanks the gentleman, recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Cohen.

ISSA:

Mr. Chairman. I would ask unanimous consent quickly that a group of documents be included and I'll summarize them. They're basically the letters and subpoenas that led up to the destruction of documents that were previously held for preservation. Additionally, the blog post from Reddit if those could all be placed in the record.

GOODLATTE:

Without objection, they will be a part of the record.

ISSA:

Thank you Mr. Chairman.

GOODLATTE:

Gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

COHEN:

Thank you sir. Director Comey, would you consider the FBI's most important job presently fighting terrorism and threats to the homeland?

COMEY:

Yes, that's our top priority.

COHEN:

How much time do you think the FBI and you have spent responding to Congressional inquiries and on this particular e-mail investigation? Could you give me an idea how many man, months or years have been expended on responding to the different committees that have called you in time after time after time and repetitiously accused you of doing politics rather than being an FBI director.

COMEY:

I can't, I don't have any sense.

COHEN:

Could it be, would it be months of cumulative man hours or would it be years of cumulative man hours?

COMEY:

You know I don't know. A lot of folks have done a lot of work to try and provide the kind of transparency that we promised. Its been a lot by a lot of people. I just don't have a sense of the...

COHEN:

How many hours have you spent before Congress on this?

COMEY:

Testimony? Four hours and 40 minutes, without a bathroom break, I want a note for the record and whatever today is. Those would be the two main appearances. I was asked questions at Senate Homeland yesterday about this and then House Homeland in July I think. I'm guessing 10 hours or so.

COHEN:

And you prepared for this though and the 10 hours is just like the iceberg.

COMEY:

Oh, sure.

COHEN:

Could your time and the FBI's time better be used fighting terrorist threats here in America?

COMEY:

You know we're still doing it all so no one should think that we've taken a play off because we're also doing oversight. We do both.

COHEN:

In the case in New York where Mr. Rahami tried to detonate some bombs, did detonate a bomb, his father had accused him of being a terrorist at one time and he'd stabbed his brother and was in jail. Did the FBI interview him when he was in jail about his possible terrorist tendencies and his trips to Pakistan or Afghanistan?

COMEY:

I'll answer that -- I'm trying to be very circumspect in how I answer questions about the case because the guy's alive and is entitled to a fair trial and so I don't want to do anything that would allow him to argue he lost the ability to have a fair trial. The answer is we did not interview him when he was in jail in 2014.

COHEN:

Fourteen. And why would that be? You interviewed the father I believe, you might have talked to the brother, you might have talked to a friend. The best evidence was him. He's in jail, you didn't have to -- why did they not go and talk to him?

COMEY:

Yes, sitting here I don't want to answer that question yet. I've commissioned as I do in all of these cases a deep look back. We're trying to make the case now. We will go back very carefully, try to understand what decisions the agents made who investigated that and why and whether there is learning from that. So I don't want to answer it just now because I'd be speculating a bit.

COHEN:

Thank you sir. Some people have suggested you made a political calculation in your recommendation dealing with Secretary Clinton and the e-mails. Did you make a political calculation in your recommendation dealing with Secretary Clinton and the e-mails? Did you make a political calculation in coming to your ultimate decision?

COMEY:

None.

COHEN:

Some said that the -- on national television that Secretary Clinton's e-mails were destroyed after a direct implement (ph) Clinton campaign. You announced your decision, you stated publicly and I quote, "we found no evidence that Secretary Clinton's e-mails were intentionally deleted in efforts to conceal them." Is that not correct?

COMEY:

That's correct.

COHEN:

Others have said they lost confidence in the investigation and question the genuine effort in which it was carried out. Did the FBI make a genuine effort to carry out a thorough investigation?

COMEY:

Oh yes, very much.

COHEN:

And did you take some hits from the position you took when you announced your decision?

COMEY:

A few, yes.

COHEN:

Difficult.

COMEY:

Difficult but I just thought it was the right thing to do. I'm not loving this but I think it's important that I come and answer questions about it. As long as people have questions, I will try to answer them.

COHEN:

You're not loving this. Do you need a bathroom break?

COMEY:

No, no I'm good.

COHEN:

Setting a record?

COMEY:

I'll let you know at 4:40.

COHEN:

Thank you sir. And FBI billings (ph), we know what they shouldn't be named and you know my position on that and I hope you keep that well in mind. You're a credit to the FBI, you're a credit to government service and to your alma mater and I yield back the balance of my time.

GOODLATTE:

Chair thanks the gentleman and recognizes the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. King, for five minutes.

KING:

Thank you Mr. Chairman. I thank you Director for your testimony here before this committee. Again, listening in the exchange between yourself and Mr. Issa, I'd just like to confirm that you were confirming that Mr. Combetta made the Reddit posts?

COMEY:

No one (ph) confirming it. I think he did is my understanding but -- yes, that's my understanding. I think he did. I haven't dug into that myself. I've been focused on a lot of other stuff as we've talked about but I think that's right.

KING:

I certainly can accept that and I'd like to just go back to the interview with Hillary Clinton and how that all came about on that July 2nd date but first I'm looking at the dates of the conditional immunity documents that I've reviewed and I see that Mr. Pagliano had one dated December 22nd and another one dated December 28th.

Can you tell me what brought about that second agreement, why the first one wasn't adequate and if there was an interview with Mr. Pagliano in between those dates of December 22nd and 28th of 2015?

COMEY:

I think what it is and Mr. Gowdy and Mr. Marino will recognize this term, the first one is what we call a Queen For a Day Agreement, which was to govern an interview, so limited use immunity for an interview.

And I believe the second one is the agreement for use immunity in connection with the investigation. So it's sort of a try out for him to get interviewed for the prosecutors and investigators to poke at him and then the second one is the agreement they reached. I think that's right.

KING:

And so they said, if we're going to go any further we'll go off of the December 28th agreement. That'd be how I would understand that, your description.

COMEY:

I think they're both important to him and his lawyer but the first is an intermediate step to the second.

KING:

OK, thank you. Then were you aware of the president's statement on October 9th, 2015 when he has reported to -- and this what they reported on October 9th of 2015, that he said that Hillary Clinton would not have endangered national security?

COMEY:

Obviously, I don't know the dates but I remember public reporting on a -- on a statement like that.

KING:

And -- and the fall (ph) October -- and I'll state it as (inaudible) the report I have is October 9th. Then again on April 10th, 2016, it was reported that the president had said that Hillary Clinton was careless but not intentionally endangering national security.

Were you aware of that statement as well?

COMEY:

Yes.

KING:

And then I'd like it if you could characterize the interview sometime around, I believe, May 16th, it was reported that you said you intended to interview Hillary Clinton personally?

COMEY:

I never said that because I never intended that. I'm sure I didn't say that publicly.

KING:

Were you aware of the report that that was your public statement?

COMEY:

Yes. I think I read it and smiled about it. People imagine the FBI Director does things that the FBI -- doesn't do.

KING:

In fact, and I'm not disputing your answer, I've just simply, for the record, this is -- this is a record that is dated September 28th, 2016. "Buffalo News" (inaudible) your picture on it, and takes us back to -- that's when it was printed, excuse me -- takes us back to a document, May 16th, 2016, has a picture of you on the front of it, and I will ask to introduce it in the record.

It says, FBI director James Comey told reporters that he would personally interview Hillary Clinton, quote, "in coming days," close quote. And I would ask unanimous consent to introduce this article into the record.

GOODLATTE:

Without objection, it will be made a part of the record.

KING:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And -- and not as a matter, and I don't dispute your word on this, it's what the public expectation was hanging out there, is my real point. And then with that public expectation, I think the public was surprised to learn about who was or was not in that room.

Can you tell us who was in the -- who was in the room involved in either listening to or conducting the interview of Hillary Clinton on that date of July 2nd (ph), 2016?

COMEY:

I cannot tell you for sure. I can give you a general sense. The witness and her legal team and then on our side of the table, our agents, prosecutors from the Department of Justice, I don't know if (ph) any of our analysts were in there or not. But sort of our team, their team.

KING:

And how many of your team? How many FBI investigators?

COMEY:

I do not know for sure sitting here. I think we probably had 8 to 10 people on our side, prosecutors and agents. That is a noble fact. I just do not know it sitting here.

KING:

Prosecutors, did Loretta Lynch have her people in there?

COMEY:

If you mean Department of Justice lawyers, yes, sure.

KING:

So how many Department of Justice lawyers would have been there?

COMEY:

I do not know for sure. Again, I think it was probably about eight people, probably about four lawyers, about four from the FBI. But again, I could be wrong.

KING:

OK. I think I -- I think I got it (ph). So about around four investigators, around four potential prosecutors from the DOJ, a couple of attorneys for Hillary Clinton, Hillary Clinton herself. That would set the scene fairly closely?

COMEY:

I think the -- Secretary Clinton's team was bigger than that. I do not know the exact number.

KING:

OK. And then when you receive (ph) the counsel as to the recommendation you were to make to Loretta Lynch, I'm just going to just say -- go through this quickly. You did not review a videotape, an audiotape, or a transcript, so you would have had to rely upon the briefings from the people that were in the room who would have been your investigative team.

COMEY:

Yes, the agents -- the agents who conducted the interview, yes.

KING:

Uh-huh. And they were briefing off of notes that they had taken, which are now in the skiff, but (ph) redacted.

COMEY:

Right. They write them up in what is called an FBI 302 (ph).

KING:

And so Loretta Lynch had her people in the room and they would have had access to your investigators in the room and out of that came a piece of advice to you that she had already said she was going to hand that responsibility over to you as director of the FBI as to making the recommendation, which turned out to be the decision, on whether or not to indict Hillary Clinton.

GOODLATTE:

The time of the gentleman has expired. The director -- will answer the question.

COMEY:

I'm not sure I'm following entirely. There was no advice to me from the Attorney General or any -- any of the lawyers working for her. My team formulated a recommendation that was communicated to me and the FBI reached its conclusion as to what to do, uncoordinated from the Department of Justice.

KING:

Even though a justice was in the room with your investigators and I -- make that final comment and I yield back. Thank the Chairman.

GOODLATTE:

Chair thanks the gentleman. Recognize the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. Johnson, for five minutes.

JOHNSON:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Russian hacking into the databases of the Democratic National Committee and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, as well as Russian hacks into the voter registration systems of Illinois (ph) and Arizona, serve as ominous warnings to the American people about the risks that our electoral processes face in this modern era.

Unfortunately, Trump Republicans in the House are as obsessed with Hillary Clinton's damn e-mails as Trump has been about President Obama's birth certificate. Just like the Donald closed his birth certificate investigation after five years of fruitless investigation, however, I predict that the Trump Republicans will at some point close this e-mail persecution.

The American people are sick of it. The attention of the American public is increasingly focused on the security of this nation's election infrastructure.

On Monday the ranking members of the House and Senate Intelligence Committees, Senator Dianne Feinstein and Congressman Adam Schiff, issued a joint statement setting forth the current status of this investigation.

It said this, and I quote, "Based on briefings we have received, we have concluded that the Russian intelligence agencies are making a serious and concerted effort to influence the U.S. election. They work closely with intelligence community individuals to be able to put that statement out to the American public."

Director Comey, I do not want to ask you about any classified information, but is their statement accurate?

COMEY:

I do not -- I cannot comment on that in this forum. As I said in my opening, we are investigating to try to understand exactly what mischief the Russians might be up to in connection with our political institutions and the election system, more broadly. But I do not want to comment on that at this point.

JOHNSON:

Free and fair elections are the linchpin of our society. A compromise or disruption of our election process is something that this Congress certainly should be looking into. Would you agree with that?

COMEY:

I cannot speak, sir, to what Congress should be looking into, but the -- the FBI is looking into this very, very hard for the reasons you say. We take this extraordinarily seriously.

JOHNSON:

Thank you. In June, the FBI's cyber division issued a flash alert to state officials warning that hackers were attempting to penetrate their election systems. The title of the flash alert was, and I quote -- quote, "targeting activity against State Board of Election systems," end quote.

JOHNSON:

The alert disclosed that the FBI is currently investigating cyber attacks against at least two states. Later in June, the FBI warned officials in Arizona about Russian assaults on their election system and hackers also attacked the election system in Illinois, where they were able to download the data of at least 200,000 or up to 200,000 voters.

In August, the Department of Homeland Security convened a conference call warning state election officials and offering to provide federal cyber security experts to help scan for vulnerabilities and yesterday it was announced that at least 18 states have already requested election cyber security help to defend their election systems.

Director Comey, since these flash alerts and warnings went out over this summer, I'd appreciate you letting us know whether or not there have been any additional attacks on state operations or databases since June.

COMEY:

There have been a variety of scanning activities, which is a preamble for potential intrusion activities as well as some attempted intrusions at voter registration databases beyond those we knew about in July and August. We are urging the states just to make sure that their deadbolts are thrown and their locks are on and to get the best information they can from DHS just to make sure their systems are secure.

And again, these are the voter registration systems. This is very different than the vote system in the United States which is very, very hard for someone to hack into because it's so clunky and dispersed. It's Mary and Fred putting a machine under the basketball hoop at the gym.

Those things are not connected to the internet but the voter registration systems are so we urge the states to make sure you have the most current information and your systems are tight because there's no doubt that some bad actors have been poking around.

JOHNSON:

All right and with that I will yield back the balance of my time and thank you sir.

GOODLATTE:

The chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Gohmert for five minutes.

GOHMERT:

Thank you Mr. Chairman and Director Comey thanks for being here. I was a bit astounded when you said the FBI is unable to control who a witness coming in voluntarily brings into an interview. I've seen a lot of FBI agents tell people who could come into an interview and who could not.

And in this case, and I'm sure you've heard some of the questions raised by smart lawyers around the country about providing immunity to people like Cheryl Mills in return for her presenting a laptop that you had every authority to get a subpoena.

And if you had brought a request for search warrant, based on what we now know, I would have had no problem signing that warrant so you could go get it anywhere you want. And in fact I've talked to former U.S. attorneys, AUSA's, who have said if an FBI agent came in and recommended that we give immunity to a witness to get her laptop that we could get with a subpoena or a warrant, then I would ask the FBI not to ever allow this agent on a case.

Can you explain succinctly why you chose to give immunity without a proffer of what was on the laptop, give immunity to Cheryl Mills while she was an important witness and you could have gotten her laptop with a warrant or a subpoena?

COMEY:

Sure, I'll give it my best shot. The immunity we're calling about here, and the details really matter that we're talking about, is Act of Production Immunity, which says, we want you to give us a thing. We won't use anything we find on that thing directly against you. Right, it's a fairly...

GOHMERT:

And I understand that and I understood that from reading the immunity deal and that's what's so shocking because she was working directly with Hillary Clinton and therefore it's expected since the evidence indicates she was pretty well copied on so many of the e-mails that Hillary Clinton was using that pretty much anything in there would've been usable against her. And you cleaned the slate before you ever knew.

Now, some of the immunities you gave, the last paragraph mentions a proffer. Was there a proffer of what the witness would say before the immunity deals were given to those that those immunities?

COMEY:

Can I answer first though your question about why I think it made sense to have active production immunity for Cheryl Mills' laptop?

GOHMERT:

I'd rather -- my time is so limited. Please.

COMEY:

OK, all right -- it's an important question and I think there's a reason why I answer it but I'll give it another time. The -- I think in at least one of the cases, and I'm mixing up the guys but with Mr. Combetta maybe also with Mr. Pagliano, no I got that reversed...

GOHMERT:

It's yes or no. Did you have a proffer from them as to what they would say before you gave them immunity?

COMEY:

I believe there was a proffer session governed by what I just referred to, is called a Queen for a Day Agreement, with at least one of them to try and understand what they would say but...

GOHMERT:

Because the deals that I have seen back 30 years ago before I went to the bench, the FBI would say, you in the DOJ, of course we know FBI can't give immunity, it has to come from DOJ just like it's not the FBI's job to say what a reasonable prosecutor should do or not do.

You give them the evidence and then you let them decide but a proffer is made saying this is what my client will say, then the DOJ decided based on that proffer, here's the plea we'll offer, here's the immunity we'll offer and if your client deviates from that proffer, the deal's off.

You got really nothing substantial. It's as if you went into the investigation determined to give immunity to people instead of getting a warrant. You gave immunity to people that you would need to make a case if a case were going to be made. And I know we have people across the aisle that are saying, well it's only because she's a presidential candidate.

It happens to be in my case, I wouldn't care whether she was a presidential candidate or not. What is important to maintaining a civilization with justice and fairness is a little righteousness where people are treated fairly across the board and it does not appear that in this case, it comports with anything that FBI agents with centuries of experience have told me, they'd never seen anything like this.

So one other thing, I know this happened before your watch, but under Director Mueller, Kim Jensen, who prepared 700 pages of training material for those who would go undercover and try to embed with Al- Qaeda.

It was wiped out because CAIR (ph) and some of the people that were unindicted co-conspirators named in your Holy Land Foundation trial, they said we don't like them. They do not allow agents to know what Kim Jensen put in that 700 pages that was so accurate, so good about Islam that we could embed people in Al-Qaeda and they wouldn't suspect them.

GOHMERT:

I would encourage you to start training your FBI agents so whether they're in San Bernardino, Orlando, New Jersey, wherever, they can talk to a radicalized Islamist and determine whether they're radicalized. Without Kim Jensen's typed (ph) material, you'll never be able to spot them again and we'll keep having people die. Thank you, my time's expired.

GOODLATTE:

The time of the gentleman has expired.

The director is permitted to respond if he chooses to do so.

COMEY:

I don't think I have anything at this point.

GOODLATTE:

The chair recognizes the gentlewoman from California, Ms. Chu, for five minutes.

CHU:

Thank you.

Director Comey, during this committee's oversight hearing last year, I asked you about the cases of Sherry Chen and Shao-jung Chi (ph), both U.S. citizens who were arrested by the FBI accused at different crimes related to economic espionage for China, only to have those charges dropped without explanation.

Since you last testified before the committee, both cases have been closed. Now, I know they may not be personally familiar with the individuals' cases or may not be inclined to comment on the facts of these cases to the committee today, however, would you be willing to provide a written explanation or possibly a summary of the investigations to clarify how and why the FBI handled the cases the way they did?

COMEY:

I don't want to commit to that sitting here. We would certainly consider what we can supply consistent with things like the Privacy Act. But we'll certainly consider it.

I'm familiar with the case. I remember our -- your questions about it last year. And so we'll take a look at what we can share with you. We can't obviously do it in an open forum in any event.

CHU:

I understand that, but I appreciate the consideration.

Now, I'd like to address a different topic. Director Comey, your agency recently introduced an online initiative aimed at promoting education and awareness about violent extremism called Don't be a Puppet. This program was designed to serve as a tool for teachers and students to prevent young people from being drawn toward violent extremism.

However, national education groups, faith groups and community organizations have raised serious concerns about the way in which the program presents the problem of violent extremism. Particularly troublesome is the website's charge that teachers and students should look for warning signs that a person may be on a slippery slope of violent extremism and to report activity that may -- may or may not be indicative of radicalization.

For instance, the website encourages students and teachers to report when others use unusual language or talk about traveling to suspicious places. The user of the website, however, is left to draw inferences about what constitutes a suspicious place or what language is unusual enough to be reported to a trusted authority.

For example, a trip to France or Germany, which hosts many far- right extremist groups, may not sound suspicious to many users, but a trip to Saudi Arabia or Iraq, home to various Muslim holy sites, possibly would.

So on August 9th, the American Federation of Teachers led a number of national groups in a letter written to you -- and Mr. Chair, I'd like to submit this for the record. And among the many concerns they raise is the potential for such initiatives to exacerbate the profiling and bullying of students of Middle Eastern background that -- that -- and what they -- over and above what they already experience.

So how do you respond to the concerns expressed by the American Federation of Teachers about the impact of the FBI's Don't be a Puppet program and the effect it may have on schools (ph) in immigrant communities?

COMEY:

Thank you for that. I'm glad they shared their feedback. Boy, I hope either before or after the feedback they go on and actually go through the Don't be a Puppet because I've done it. I honestly can't understand the concerns. It's a very common sense thing.

One of our big challenges is how -- if a kid starts to go sideways towards violence, the people closest to him are going to see something likely.

How do we get folks to a place where they're sensitized to make common sense judgments that this person may be headed in a very dangerous direction? It's never going to be perfect, but I actually think a lot of thought went into this, including faith groups, all kinds of civic groups to make sure we got something that was good common sense education for kids and for teachers.

And so I'm a -- I'm a little bit at a loss. Maybe we (ph) ought to meet with them, they can show me which parts of it they actually think are problematic. But I think it's a pretty darn good piece of work is my overall reaction.

CHU:

So -- so Director Comey, you've gone to the website and -- and looked at it. So what then would you consider to be a place that sounds suspicious or what would you consider to be an unusual language that somebody is speaking, so much so that a student should report them to the authorities?

COMEY:

I think what it says is speaking -- using unusual language not -- not -- not speaking Pesh (ph) to or French or German. I think it means speaking in an unusual way about things. And suspicious place -- Syria leaps to my mind.

If someone is talking to classmates about thinking about traveling to Syria, the classmates ought to be sensitized to that, the teacher ought to be sensitized to it so we can try and intervene with that kid before we have to lock them up for most of their life.

CHU:

But do you have evidence to show that this program is actually countering recruiting efforts by violent extremists?

COMEY:

I don't, but it sure makes a lot of sense to me. It seems like a common sense way to equip kids to resist the siren song that comes from radical Islamists or skinhead groups or hate groups of different kinds.

And so look, it's not -- I'm sure it's not perfect because nothing in life is. We'd welcome feedback, but the general idea makes a lot of sense to me.

CHU:

I yield back.

GOODLATTE:

The chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio. Mr. Jordan, for five minutes.

JORDAN:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Director, in your opening comments, you said this was an unusual case. I would say that's the understatement of the year.

Husband of the subject meets with the attorney general three days before Secretary Clinton is interviewed by the FBI. Nine people get to sit in with Secretary Clinton during that interview. One of those was her Chief of Staff Cheryl Mills, who was a subject of the investigation. Five people get some kind of immunity.

Five people get some kind of immunity, yet no one is prosecuted. Three of those people who get immunity take the Fifth in front of Congress and one of them doesn't even bother to show up when he's subpoenaed. Supposed to have been at that very chair you're sitting at.

And of course, the attorney general announces that she's going to follow your recommendations, even though she doesn't know what those recommendations are. The only time she's ever done that. So of course this was unusual. We've never seen anything like this.

Which sort of brings me to the post. I'd like to put up the post that some have talked about, which is the post by Mr. Combetta on Reddit. And you said earlier that you don't know if you examined this during your investigation, so let's examine it now. "I need to strip out a VIP's address from a bunch of archived e-mail. Basically, they do not want the VIP's e-mail address exposed to anyone."

Director, when I hear the term strip out e-mail address, I think somebody's trying to hide something, somebody's trying to cover up something. And this sort of raises an important question from these two sentences. Who's the they who wants something said hid? And who's the VIP who also wants something hid?

Director Comey, is it likely the VIP (inaudible) just the VIP, it's a very, very important person according to Mr. Combetta. Is it likely that person is Secretary Clinton?

COMEY:

Yes, sure.

JORDAN:

OK. And is it also likely that the "they" refers to her -- Secretary Clinton's staff and specifically Cheryl Mills?

COMEY:

I don't know that. Either her lawyers or some staff that had tasked him with the production.

JORDAN:

So one other thing that's important on that -- if we could put that back up. One other thing that's important is the date. The date at the top says July 24, 2014. So whenever I see a date -- I'm sure you do the same thing -- I always look at what's happening about that same timeframe, what may have happened directly before that and maybe directly after that.

JORDAN:

So I went back to your reports that you guys had given to us. The first report back last month, August 18, 2016, page 15. On page 15 it says, during the summer of 2014, State Department indicated to Cheryl Mills a request for Clinton's work related e-mails would be forthcoming.

State Department gives Cheryl Mills a heads up that she's got to go round up all of Secretary Clinton's e-mail. On that same page, it says the House Select Committee on Benghazi had a recent agreement with the Statement regarding production of documents on July 23rd, 2014.

Just the day before, which I find kind of interesting. Then from your report that we got just last week, after reviewing several documents dated in and around July 23rd, 2014, Paul Combetta had a conversation with Cheryl Mills and after reviewing a July 24th, there's that date again, 2014 e-mail from Brian Pagliano, Paul Combetta explains, Cheryl Mills was concerns (ph), Clinton's then current e-mail address would be disclosed publicly.

So, sure looks to me like it's Secretary Clinton, as you said, but also that it's Cheryl Mills and Brian Pagliano who are urging Mr. Combetta to cover this stuff up. Do you agree?

COMEY:

With what you read it sure sounds like they're trying to figure out a way to strip out the actual e-mail address from what they produce.

JORDAN:

Well, they're actually trying to strip it all out, PSD file, everything. Here's the takeaway in my mind. Mills gets a heads up, Cheryl Mills gets a heads up in mid-summer of 2014.

July 23rd, the day before Mr. Combetta's Reddit post, the Benghazi Committee and the Senate Department reach an agreement on production of documents. Cheryl Mills has a conversation with Paul Combetta. He goes on Reddit then and tries to figure out how he can figure out how he can get rid of all this e-mail.

Even though he's not successful then, he has to do it later down the road with BleachBit, and then the clincher. The clincher, just last week, he's gone online and trying to delete these Reddit posts. He's trying to cover up his tracks, he's trying to cover up the cover- up. So I guess the question is, and someone's asked it earlier, in light of all this, are you thinking about re-opening the investigation?

COMEY:

I may have misunderstood what you said during the question. I don't understand that to be talking about deleting the e- mails. I understand it to be talking about removing from the from line, the actual e-mail address. And but anyhow, maybe I misunderstood you but...

JORDAN:

Well, this same guy later BleachBit, to Bleachbit, and did delete e-mails.

COMEY:

Sure, yes. That's...

JORDAN:

My question is, the guy you gave immunity to, the guy who took the fifth in front of us, is online trying to figure out how to remove e-mail addresses, change evidence, later uses BleachBit.

That guy, who won't testify in front of Congress, and he has correspondence with Cheryl Mills. Cheryl Mills, a subject of the investigation, Cheryl Mills who also got some kind of immunity agreement, Cheryl Mills who walked out for part of the questions during the interview with the FBI. Seems to me that's pretty compelling and the timeline's pretty compelling as well.

COMEY:

I'm not following compelling of what? There's no doubt that Combetta was involved in deleting e-mails.

JORDAN:

After conversations with Cheryl Mills.

COMEY:

He had the oh, S-H-I-T moment, as he told us, and that's why it was very important for us to interview this guy to find out who told you to do that, why did you do that, that's why he was giving you...

JORDAN:

Did you know about the Reddit post when you interviewed him?

COMEY:

As I said earlier, I think we did, I mean -- I think our investigators did. I'm not positive as I sit here.

JORDAN:

Mr. Chairman I -- I mean the guy is trying to cover up the Reddit post where he's trying to figure out how he can cover up the e-mail addresses and I find that compelling, particularly in light of the fact that just the day before he's talking with Cheryl Mills and the State Department is on notice that the Benghazi Committee wants these very documents.

JORDAN:

I find that compelling. Obviously, the FBI didn't, and this is just one more -- one more on that list of things that make this case highly unusual.

I yield back.

GOODLATTE:

The director is permitted to respond, if he chooses to do so.

COMEY:

No, I don't think so.

GOODLATTE:

The chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida, Mr. Deutch, for five minutes.

DEUTCH:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Director Comey, the FBI is tasked with a very serious responsibilities. You're on the front lines trying to prevent terrorist attacks. You're investigating public corruption. And as I told your agents on a recent visit to your Miami field office, I'm grateful to you and your agents, all of the women and men of the FBI, for your dedication to and commitment to the pursuit of justice. We're most grateful.

Now, one critical responsibility of the FBI is to investigate when American citizens violate federal laws involving improper contacts with foreign governments.

Director Comey, if an American national goes outside government channels to negotiate with a foreign government on behalf of the United States, that's a very serious crime, one that would violate the Logan Act, which as you know, is the law the prohibits unauthorized people from negotiating with foreign governments in the place of the United States government.

Director Comey, would the FBI take allegations of Logan Act violations seriously? Is that within your jurisdiction?

COMEY:

Yes, it's within our jurisdiction.

DEUTCH:

And if you had credible evidence that someone had violated the Logan Act, would the FBI investigate that alleged violation of law?

COMEY:

I think we have done many Logan Act investigations over the years and we certainly will in the future.

DEUTCH:

And am I correct in assuming that you're familiar with publicly quoted comments from various intelligence sources that have said that Russia has targeted the United States with illegal state- directed hacking?

COMEY:

I'm aware of the published reports.

DEUTCH:

If an American citizen, Director Comey, conducted meetings with a Russian individual who has been sanctioned by the United States about potential weakening of U.S. sanctions policy, in violation of the Logan Act, would the FBI investigate?

COMEY:

I don't think it's appropriate to answer that. That gets too close to confirming or denying whether we have an investigation. It seems too close to real life. So I'm not going to commment.

DEUTCH:

OK. But there are -- you have investigated Logan Act violations? It's something that's clearly within your jurisdiction.

I appreciate, Director Comey, your confirming that the FBI would treat these potential violations of law both seriously and urgently. Because everything that I just outlined that you said the FBI would investigate, has apparently happened already.

Public reports suggest that the Logan Act may have been violated by Carter Page, one of the men Donald Trump singled out as a top foreign policy adviser, who now the campaign appears eager to revise Mr. Page's role, given the attention rightly being given to his illicit negotiations with a sanctioned Russian official.

I've read reports from Yahoo News from last week that law enforcement may already be looking into this issue and I assume we all agree that the allegations are very serious.

Russia, a nation that hacks America, a nation that continues to enable Assad -- the Assad regime to slaughter the Syrian people, a nation that threatens and violates the territorial integrity of its neighbors and our European allies -- it is a dangerous violation of federal law if Donald Trump's adviser, Carter Page, is engaging in freelance negotiations with Russia.

And here's what we know. In March, Donald Trump named Carter Page as a foreign policy adviser. In July, Mr. Page traveled to Moscow to give a speech that was harshly critical of the United States.

And during that trip, Mr. Page is reported to have also met with a Russian official named Igor Sechin, a member of Vladimir Putin's inner circle and the president of the petroleum company, Rosneft, who was sanctioned by the United States under executive order 13361 prohibiting him from traveling to the United States or conducting business with U.S. firms.

So, Mr. Sechin has a clear and personal interest in lifting U.S. sanctions against him and other top Russian officials put in place by President Obama after Russia's military action in Ukraine.

Now, if these two men met to discuss sanctions policy or lifting of sanctions under a potential Trump administration, this would be enormously concerning. Just last week, the press reported that U.S. intelligence officials are seeking to determine whether an American businessman identified by Donald Trump as one of his foreign policy advisers has opened up private communications with senior Russian officials, including talks about possible lifting of sanctions.

Mr. Comey, it is illegal if Trump's adviser met with Russians who have been sanctioned by the United States about lifting these sanctions. And I am grateful for your reassurances this morning that the FBI would investigate potential violations of the Logan Act by any individual who engages in unauthorized negotiations with a foreign government.

I remind my colleagues that Donald Trump invited Russia to hack the United States. I remind my colleagues that Donald Trump suggested breaking America's longstanding commitment to our NATO allies and weakening U.S. sanctions against Russia.

Is there a connection between these reckless and dangerous policy proposals and the potential violation of the Logan Act by Donald Trump's Russia adviser?

Mr. Comey, we appreciate very much the FBI's vigilance in pursuing justice.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

GOODLATTE:

The witness is permitted to respond if he chooses to do so.

The chair now recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Marino, for five minutes.

MARINO:

Thank you, Chairman.

Thank you, Director, for being here. I think we worked on a couple of cases together in our districts.

Would you clarify something for me on active production immunity? Does active production immunity go beyond the scenario that I'm going to state?

You ask for a computer from a witness. You give that witness act of production immunity that, in my interpretation, is that the agent who has that now in his or her hand, the witness is immune from the agent getting on the stand and saying that person -- this is that person's computer because they gave it to me.

Does it go beyond that? And -- or was there additional immunity for Ms. Mills stating that anything on that computer cannot be used against her?

COMEY:

As I recall it, Congressman, the act of production immunity for Ms. Mills was you give us this computer; we will not use -- "we" the Justice Department -- anything we find on the computer directly against you in connection with investigation or prosecution for mishandling of classified information.

I think that's how they defined it.

MARINO:

But that goes beyond act of production. Doesn't act of production simply state that I'm the agent; I can't get on the stand and say that belongs to that individual because they simply gave it to me. It sounds like more additional immunity was given that says "and what is on this we cannot hold against you."

COMEY:

I think of it as -- I still think of it as an act of production immunity. From my experience, that's what I would characterize that agreement. I guess you're right, there could be a more limited form of act of production immunity which simply says "your fact of giving us this object will not be used against you directly." I have to think through whether it can be parsed that way.

But I think I take your point.

MARINO:

So that's why I'm saying additional immunity was given. And I don't think it was warranted at that point.

Let me ask you this, we have both impaneled many grand juries, investigative grand juries. Why not impanel an investigative grand jury whereby you have reasonable suspicion that a crime may have been committed, and then you have the ability to get warrants, subpoenas, (inaudible) information, subpoena witnesses before the grand jury under oath.

And if they take the Fifth, if it's not the target, if they take the Fifth, they simply -- and say "I'm not going to talk to you," you can give them, whether it's use immunity, the A.G. can give them that, and you had that authority, and then transactional has to come from the judge.

And if they refuse to testify then, then you can say, fine, we're going to take you before a judge, hold you in contempt, and then you're going to sit in jail until you answer our questions.

Wouldn't that have been much simpler and more effective than the way this has gone about? I know that I've done it many, many times. And sometimes we find a situation where there isn't enough evidence, and most of the time we find there is enough evidence.

COMEY:

It's a reasonable question. The -- and I don't want to talk about grand jury in connection with this case or...

(CROSSTALK)

MARINO:

That's why I posed it the way I did.

COMEY:

Right. From our training, we know we're never supposed to talk about grand jury publicly.

MARINO:

Yes.

COMEY:

But I can answer more generally than that. Anytime you're talking about the prospect of subpoenaing a computer from a lawyer, it involves the lawyer's practice of law, you know you're getting into a big magilla.

MARINO:

Please let me interrupt here.

COMEY:

Sure.

MARINO:

I understand that clearly. Why did you not decide to go to an investigative grand jury? It would have been cleaner. It would have been much simpler. And you would have had more authority to make these witnesses testify -- not the target, but the witnesses testify.

That seems the way to go, Director. We've done it thousands of times. This just was too convoluted.

COMEY:

Again, I need to steer clear of talking about grand jury use in a particular matter. In general, in my experience, you can often do things faster with informal agreements, especially when you're interacting with lawyers.

In this particular investigation, the investigative team really wanted to get access to the laptops that were used to sort these e- mails. Those are lawyers' laptops. That is a very complicated thing. I think they were able to navigate it pretty well to get us access.

MARINO:

The media says that Mrs. Clinton repeated -- the media says -- 41 times that "I do not recall" or "I do not remember" or variations of that. Is that a fact?

COMEY:

I don't know. I have not counted. I have read the 302, obviously.

MARINO:

Wouldn't that have been taken into consideration?

COMEY:

I'm sorry?

MARINO:

Wouldn't that selective memory be taken into consideration?

COMEY:

Sure. The nature and quality of a subject's memory is always a factor.

MARINO:

My time is expired. Thank you, sir.

GOODLATTE:

The chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Washington state, Ms. Delbene, for five minutes.

DELBENE:

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

And thank you, Director Comey, for spending all this time with us today.

In 2010, the White House set up the vulnerabilities equities process, the VEP, and implemented it in 2014. So if you give the government a process for determining whether, how, and when to disclose vulnerabilities to technology companies so that they would be able to address those vulnerabilities and patch them.

And in a couple of situations, I know there was disclosure from the FBI. In April of this year, the FBI informed Apple of a security flaw in older versions of IOS and OS-10 -- its first vulnerability to Apple under the vulnerability equities process.

DELBENE:

In May of this year, the FBI Cyber Division warned the private sector about a fake USB device charger that can log the keystrokes of certain wireless keyboards. And that was 15 months after the FBI discovered the vulnerability.

In the warning, the FBI stated quote, "If placed strategically in an office or other location where individuals might use wireless devices, a malicious cyber actor could potentially harvest personally identifiable information, intellectual property, trade secrets, passwords or other sensitive information," end quote.

Other instances of the FBI using the VIP are scarce and indeed, there have been reports that it's rare for the FBI to use this process. And so I wanted to you know, ask you why this is and what's your view of the process?

COMEY:

Thank you for that question. The process seems to me to be a reasonable process to -- to in a structured fashion, bring everybody who might have an optic on this in the government together to talk about how do we think about disclosing a particular vulnerability to the private sector as against the equities that may be at stake in terms of national security, in particular.

So I think it makes sense to have such a process. The FBI participants in it -- when we come across a vulnerability that we know the vulnerability and it falls within the VIP's jurisdiction. I don't know the particulars of the case (ph) you said there was a 15 month delay in disclosing a particular vulnerability.

I don't know enough to react to that probably wouldn't react in an open forum in any event. But that's my overall reaction.

DELBENE:

And does every vulnerability discovered go through this process in terms of understanding whether or not you would disclose?

COMEY:

I think there's a definition of what falls under the process. You have to know the vulnerability so we have to have knowledge so what is it that allows it, the vulnerability to be exploited.

We didn't for example, in the San Bernardino case. We bought access but we didn't know the vulnerability, what was behind it. But I forget the definitions I sit (ph) here of which vulnerabilities have to be considered.

DELBENE:

And so is there another process that you might use that's different from the VEP or when you're looking at vulnerabilities and whether or not they...

COMEY:

For the VIP, I know our folks would routinely have made a disclosure to private entities. But I don't think there's a -- I don't know of a process outside of VIP.

DELBENE:

And so that -- but you're not sure if in every situation, the VIP is used whenever you discover a vulnerability?

COMEY:

Sounds like a circular answer but if it's a -- and obviously, I didn't read the VIP before coming here today. I -- we can get smart on it very quickly and have somebody talk to you about it.

But if it falls under the definition of things that have to be discussed at the VIP of course we do. I just can't remember what that definition is, exactly.

DELBENE:

OK I'm trying to understand if a vulnerability is discovered, if there's always a standard process that you would go through to understand whether or not that's -- that information would be disclosed and if that process is the VIP, that's the.

COMEY:

Yeah that's a great question, I don't know the answer to that whether there's a set of vulnerabilities that would fall outside of the VEP process. And if that's the case, how do we deal with it I -- I don't know sitting here.

DELBENE:

Thanks, if you have other feedback on that I'd appreciate that another time. In August, you said that stakeholders needed to take some time to collect information on the going dark issue and come back afterward to have an adult conversation.

And I agree with you and so I wondered if you had agreed that there's room for us to work together on ways to help law enforcement that don't include mandating a back door.

COMEY:

Totally. I keep reading that I'm an advocate of back doors, I wanna mend these back doors -- I am not. I have never advocated we have to have back doors. We have to figure out how we can solve this problem together and it has to be everybody who cares about it coming together to talk about it.

I don't know exactly what the answer is, frankly. I can see the problem which I think is my job is to tell people the tools you're counting on us to use to keep you safe. You're (ph) less and less effective, that's a big problem.

But what to do and how to do it is -- is a really complicated thing and I think everybody has to participate.

DELBENE:

Thank you. Thank you so much for that.

And I yield back, Mr. Chair.

GOODLATTE:

Chair thanks the gentlewoman.

Recognize the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. Gowdy for five minutes.

GOWDY:

Well, thank you Mr. Chairman.

I wanna start by acknowledging progress, I think it's important that we do so. This morning, we've had nine straight Democrats talk to the FBI about e-mails without asking for immunity. That's a record.

And I suspect the reason that they have not asked for immunity from Director Comey is they would say they've done nothing wrong. I find that interesting because that's exactly what Heather Samuels said and Cheryl Mills attorneys said.

In fact, they said it just a few days ago and I'll -- I'll quote it, "The FBI considered my clients to be witnesses and nothing more." And then Ms. Mills and Ms. Samuels's attorney said this, I think this is the most interesting part, "The Justice Department assured us, my clients, that nothing wrong."

Well, Mr. Chairman if you're assuring subjects or targets or witnesses whatever you wanna call them that they've done nothing wrong, it does begs to the question, what are you seeking and receiving immunity from? I mean if you've done nothing wrong -- laptops don't go to the Bureau of Prisoners, Mr. Chairman, people do.

So the immunity was not for the laptop. The immunity was for Cheryl Mills. And if the Department of Justice says you've done nothing wrong, it does beg the question of why you are seeking or receiving immunity.

And it could be, Mr. Chairman, for a couple of different -- it could be for the classified information that was the -- the genesis of the investigation. It would be for the destruction of federal records which came from that initial investigation.

Or it could be both. Mr. Comey, I wanna -- I wanna ask you this. Did the bureau interview everyone who originated an e-mail that ultimately went to Secretary Clinton that contained classified information?

COMEY:

I don't think so, nearly everyone but not everyone.

GOWDY:

Well, you and I had a discussion the last time about intent. You and I see the statute differently. My opinion doesn't matter. Yours does, you're the head of the bureau.

But -- but in my judgment, you read an element into the statute that does not appear on the face of the statute. And then we had a discussion about intent. So why would you not interview the originator of the e-mail to number one, determine whether or not that originator had a conversation with the secretary herself?

COMEY:

We're a handful of people who we -- that the team decided it wasn't a smart use of resources to track down. One was a civilian in Japan as I recall who had forwarded something that somehow got classified as it went up.

And the other were a group of low level State Department people deployed around the world who had written things that ended up being classified. Nearly everyone was interviewed, but there was a small group that the team decided it isn't worth the resources.

GOWDY:

Well, to that extent, if you interviewed the overwhelming majority of the originators of the e-mail, will you make those 302s available to Congress because I counted this morning, 30-something 302s that we do not have.

COMEY:

OK I'll go back and check. My goal is maximum transparency consistent with our obligations under the law. I'll check on that.

GOWDY:

Well, I -- and I'll appreciate it for this reason, intent is awfully hard to prove. Very rarely do defendants announce ahead of time I intend to commit this crime, on this date, go ahead and check and code section, I'm gonna do it. That rarely happens.

So you have to prove it by circumstantial evidence, such as whether or not the person intended to set up an e-mail system outside the State Department, such as whether or not the person knew or should've known that his or her job involved handling classified information.

Whether or not the person was truthful about the use of multiple devices, whether or not the person knew that a frequent e-mailer to her had been hacked and whether she took any remedial steps after being put on notice that you're e-mail or someone who's been e-mailing with you prolifically had been hacked.

And whether or not -- and I think you would agree with this, director -- false exculpatory statements are gold in a court room. I would rather have a false exculpatory statement than a confession.

I would rather have someone lie about something and it be provable that that is a lie, such as that I neither sent nor received classified information. Such as, that I turned over all of my work- related e-mails.

All of that to me goes to the issue of intent. So I got two more questions then I'm gonna be out of time. For those who may have to prosecute these cases in the future, what would she have had to do to warrant your recommendation of a prosecution?

If all of that was not enough, because all of that's what she did. If all of that's not enough, then surely you cannot be arguing that you have to have an intent to harm the United States to be subject in this prosecution.

I mean that -- that's treason. That's not a violation of the statute.

COMEY:

No I think we'd have to be able to prove beyond a reasonable doubt a general awareness of the -- of the unlawfulness of your conduct. You knew you were doing something you shouldn't do.

And then, obviously that's the -- on the space (ph) of the statute itself, then you need to consider so who else has been prosecuted and what circumstances because it's all about prosecutorial judgment. But those two things would be the key -- key questions.

Can you prove that the person knew they were doing something they shouldn't do, a general criminal intent, general mens rea?

GOWDY:

But the -- but the way to prove...

(CROSSTALK)

COMEY:

...treated other people similarly?

GOWDY:

The way to prove that is whether or not someone took steps to conceal or destroy what they've done. That is the best evidence you have. That they knew it was wrong. That they lied about it.

COMEY:

It's awful -- it's very good evidence, always wanna look at that the subject said about their conduct.

GOWDY:

Well, and there's a lot, there's a lot. If you saw her initial press conference, it all falls under the heading of false exculpatory statement.

I'm out of time, Mr. Chairman.

But the director -- you started off by giving us examples of things the bureau has done. And -- and everyone of us who's worked with the FBI, that is -- that is the FBI that I know, the one that went and saved that girl in North Carolina. That is the FBI that I know.

What concerns me director, is when you have five immunity agreements and no prosecution. When you are allowing witnesses who happen to be lawyers, to happen to be targets, to sit in on an interview; that is not the FBI that I used to work with.

So I've been really careful to not criticize you, in fact I said it again this morning. They wanted to know was he gotten to (ph), did somebody corrupt him? No I just disagree with you. But it's really important to me that the FBI be respected.

And you -- you gotta help us understand because it looks to be like some things were done differently that I don't recall being done back when I used to work with them.

And with that, I will yield back to the chairman.

COMEY:

Can I respond to that?

GOODLATTE:

Yes you may.

COMEY:

I hope some day when this political craze is over, you will look back on this. Because this is the FBI you know and love. This was done by pros in the right way. That's the part I have no patience for.

Sorry, sir.

GOODLATTE:

The chair recognizes the gentleman from Rhode Island Mr. Cicilline for five minutes.

CICILLINE:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you Director Comey for your extraordinary service to our country and please convey to the professionals at the FBI my gratitude for their exemplary service to the people of this country.

And particularly, I want to acknowledge the extraordinary prompt and effective response to the recent bombings in New Jersey and New York.

It's just another example of this extraordinary agency and your extraordinary leadership. Director Comey, many of us have expressed a concern about the growing incidence of gun violence in this country.

We expressed condolences and concern following the recent mass shootings in Burlington, Washington where five people lost their lives. We shared the same sentiments after incidents in Aurora and Newton and Charleston but as more Americans lose their lives to senseless gun violence, this Congress has been absolutely silent and inactive on this issue.

So I'd like to really turn to you and your career in public service and both as U.S. attorney and now as the FBI director, with so much experience in dealing with the consequences of gun violence and ask you to kind of share with us what you think might be some things Congress could do to help reduce gun violence in this country?

I know -- if I recall correctly in 2013 during confirmation hearings, you at least alluded to your support for universal background checks, bans on illegal trafficking of guns, assault weapons and high capacity magazines. So I'm wondering what you think would be effective for us to do to help reduce the incidence of gun violence in this country.

COMEY:

Thank you Congressman. And you're exactly right, we do spend a lot of time thinking, investigating and mourning the deaths in mass shootings. I think it's really important though the bureau not be in the policy business and be in the enforcement business. And so I'm going to respectfully avoid your question honestly, because I think we should not be in the place of -- we should be a factual input to you, we should not be suggesting particular laws with respect to guns or anything else.

CICILLINE:

So let me ask you Director about a very specific enforcement challenge. I introduced a piece of legislation called the Unlawful Gun Buyer Alert Act to get at this issue of a default (ph) process. This is where people buy a gun, they purchase a gun but they are not permitted to buy one under law but the three day time period has elapsed and between 2010 and 2014, 15,729 sales to prohibited persons occurred.

That means people who are not lawfully permitted to buy a gun got a gun 15,000 times. So my legislation would require that when that happens that local enforcement is notified. They can then make a decision, should we go prosecute this person who's now in possession of a gun illegally, should we execute a search warrant but they would at least be put on notice.

In your community, a person who should not have a gun bought one, so they can take some action. Would that make sense in terms of your enforcement responsibilities?

COMEY:

It might. I know ATF is notified in those circumstances.

CICILLINE:

Which of course is a very different set of priorities for ATF. Do they go and actually execute a warrant and charge somebody? But there are state and local prohibitions on that, that could be acted upon. So would it also make sense to notify local law enforcement?

COMEY:

It might. I'd want to think through and ask ATF how do they think through the de-confliction issues that might arise there but it's a reasonable thing to look at.

CICILLINE:

The second -- my next question, Director, is there has been a recent discussion about implementing stop and frisk in cities to address crime even at the national level.

And although the data shows that this disproportionately targets people of color, and just to give you some context, in 2011 when stop and frisk activity reached an all-time high in New York City, police stopped 685,000 people. Fifty-three percent of those individuals were black, 34 percent were Latino and nine percent were White.

More than half were aged 14 to 24 years old and of the 685,000 people that were stopped and frisked, 88 percent were neither arrested nor received any sort of citation. Do you believe this stop and frisk policy is an effective tactic to address crime in our nation's cities?

What would a federal implementation look like that Mr. Trump has called for and how can Congress minimize racial profiling and discriminatory ineffective techniques like stop and frisk and instead promote activities that build trust and confidence between the police and the community?

COMEY:

I don't know what a federal program would look like because we're not in the policing business. We're investigative agencies at the federal level. But the Terry stop, the stop and frisk is not a term we use in the federal system, the Terry stop, which is the stop of an individual based on reasonable suspicion that they're engaged in criminal activity, is a very important law enforcement tool. To my mind, its effectiveness depends upon the conversation after the stop.

When it's done well, someone has stopped, then they are told, I stopped you because we have a report of guy with a gray sweatshirt who matches you. That's why I stopped you sir, I'm sorry.

Or I stopped you because I saw you do this behavior. Because the danger is, what's an effective law enforcement technique can become a source of estrangement for a community and you need the help of the community. So it's an important tool when used right and what makes the different between right and wrong is what's the nature of the conversation with the person you've stopped.

CICILLINE:

Thank you Director. Mr. Chairman I would just like to finally associate myself with the remarks of Congressman Deutch regarding the Logan Act violations and the remarks of many of colleagues regarding the attempts by the Russians to interfere with our democracy and electoral process and take great comfort in the director's commitment to continue to understand this as an important responsibility of the agency to protect the integrity of our democracy and with that I yield back.

GOODLATTE:

The chair thanks the gentleman. The chair recognizes the gentleman from Utah, Mr. Chaffetz, and as I do so I want to thank him for making, as chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, this very nice hearing room available to us while the Judiciary Committee hearing room is under renovation so gentleman is recognized for five minutes with my thanks.

CHAFFETZ:

Well, and I appreciate the extra five minutes of questioning for doing so, so thank you very much. Director thank you for your accessibility, you have been very readily available and we do appreciate that.

This investigation started because the inspector general found classified information in a non-secure setting and the FBI went to a law firm and found this information. They seized at least one computer and at least one thumb drive, did you need an immunity agreement to get those?

COMEY:

It was not -- I don't think there was -- in fact, I'm certain there was no immunity agreement used in connection with that.

CHAFFETZ:

So, did it really take the FBI a full year to figure out that Cheryl Mills and Heather Samuelson also had computers with classified information on them?

COMEY:

No, it took us to that point in the investigation to insist that we try to get them.

CHAFFETZ:

Were you getting them because they had classified information or because there was some other information you wanted?

COMEY:

No, we thought those tools, as we understood it, that had been used to sort the e-mails and the investigative team very much wanted to understand if they could, whether there was an electronic tale of how that had been done because the big issue was, what did they delete, what did they keep...

CHAFFETZ:

But why did you need an immunity agreement? Why didn't they just cooperate and hand them over? The law firm did, didn't they?

COMEY:

Well, yes. That's a question really I can't answer. That's between a lawyer and her client and the Justice Department lawyers. For whatever reason, her lawyer thought it was in her interest to get an active production immunity agreement with the Department of Justice.

CHAFFETZ:

The FBI interviewed David Kendall's partner but did not interview David Kendall. Why didn't you interview David Kendall?

COMEY:

I don't remember. I don't remember that decision.

CHAFFETZ:

Going back to this Reddit post, this was put up on July 24th of 2014. You believe this to be associated with Mr. Combetta, correct?

COMEY:

Yes, I think that's right.

CHAFFETZ:

This is the one that Mr. Jordan put up about the need to strip out a VIP's very VIP e-mail address and a bunch of archived e-mails. This is a -- he's referring to a federal record, isn't he?

COMEY:

I don't know what exactly which records he's referring to.

CHAFFETZ:

How is this not a conscious effort to alter federal records? I mean the proximity to the date is just stunning.

COMEY:

Sorry, what's the question?

CHAFFETZ:

How is this not a conscious effort to alter a federal record?

COMEY:

Well, depending upon what the record was and exactly what he was trying to do and whether there would be disclosure to the people they were producing it to saying we changed this for privacy purposes. I just don't know sitting here.

CHAFFETZ:

These are documents that were under subpoena. These federal records were under subpoena, they were under a preservation order. Did Mr. Combetta destroy documents?

COMEY:

I don't know whether that was true in July of 2014 they were under subpoena.

CHAFFETZ:

Did he ultimately destroy federal records, Mr. Combetta?

COMEY:

No. I have no reason to believe he destroyed federal records.

CHAFFETZ:

He used BleachBit, did he not?

COMEY:

Yes, the question is what was already produced before he used the BleachBit. He definitely -- the reason he wanted immunity was he had done the BleachBit business after there was publicity about the demand from Congress for the records. That's a potential...

CHAFFETZ:

Not just publicity. There was a subpoena.

COMEY:

Right, that's...

CHAFFETZ:

And there was communication from Cheryl Mills that there was a preservation order, correct?

COMEY:

Yes.

CHAFFETZ:

And he did indeed use BleachBit on these records?

COMEY:

Sure.

CHAFFETZ:

So he...

COMEY:

That's why the guy wouldn't talk to us without immunity.

CHAFFETZ:

And so when you got him immunity, what did you learn?

COMEY:

We learned that no one had directed him to do that. That he had done it...

CHAFFETZ:

You really think that he just did this by himself?

COMEY:

I think his account, again I don't, I never affirmatively believe anybody except my wife but the question is do I have evidence to disbelieve him and I don't.

His account is credible that he was told to do it in 2014, screwed up and didn't do it. Panicked when he realized he hadn't and then raced back in and did it after Congress asked for the records and the New York Times wrote about them. That was his oh, S-H-I-T moment.

That was credible, again I don't believe people, but we did not have evidence to disbelieve that and establish someone told him to do that. No e-mail, no phone call, nothing. The hope was, if he had been told to do that, that'd be a great piece of evidence. If we give him immunity, maybe he'll tell us so and so told me so, so and so asked me to and then we're working up the chain.

CHAFFETZ:

But he did indeed destroy federal records and he was told at some point to do this, correct? Who told him to do that initially? When he was supposed to do it in December and he didn't do it, who told him to do that?

COMEY:

One of Secretary Clinton's staff members. I can't remember sitting here, we know that. One of her lawyers, it might have been Cheryl Mills. Someone on the team said, we don't need those e-mails anymore, get rid of the archived file.

CHAFFETZ:

This is what's unbelievable about this because there is classified information, there are federal records that were indeed destroyed and that's -- that's just the fact pattern. Let's go back to -- let's go back to this -- here's the other thing that I'll draw to your attention that is new.

September 15th of this year, I issued a subpoena from the Oversight and Government Reform Committee on these Reddit posts. Four days later they were destroyed, or taken down. They were deleted.

I would hope the FBI would take that into consideration. Again, we're trying under a properly issued subpoena to get to this information. Let's go to Heather Mills real quick.

CHAFFETZ:

How does the -- in the 2016 interview with Cheryl Mills, she says quote, "Mills did not learn" -- in the interview report that you -- the interview summary from the FBI, "Mills did not learn Clinton was using a private e-mail server until after Clinton's tenure."

Back -- also, you have this interview with Mr. Pagliano, who said he approached, quote, "Pagliano then approached Cheryl Mills in her office and relayed a State Department employee's concerns regarding federal records retention and the use of a private server. Pagliano remembers Mills replying that former secretaries of state had done similar things to include Colin Powell."

It goes then on to a page 10 -- and this is what I don't understand -- the FBI writes, "Clinton's immediate aides, to include Mills, Abedin, Sullivan," and - a redacted name - "told the FBI they were unaware of the existence of a private server until after Clinton -- Clinton's tenure at State or when it became public knowledge."

But if you look back at the email from -- from Heather Mills, if you go back to 2010, this is to Justin Cooper, OK, Mills to Cooper, who does not -- which you were -- he works for Clinton's. He doesn't work for the State Department.

"FYI, HRC email coming back. Is server OK?" Cooper writes back, "You are funny. We're on the same server." She knew there wasn't (ph) a server. When there was a problem with Hillary Rodham Clinton's e- mail, what did they do? She called the person, who has no background in this, who is not a State Department employee, no security clearance, and then tells the FBI, well, I never knew about that.

CHAFFETZ:

But there's direct evidence that contradicts this. How do you come to that conclusion and write that in the summary statement that she had no knowledge of this?

COMEY:

That's a question?

CHAFFETZ:

Yes.

GOODLATTE:

The time of the gentleman has expired, but the director will answer the question.

COMEY:

I don't remember exactly sitting here (ph) -- having done many investigations myself, there is always conflicting recollections of facts, some of which are central, some of which are peripheral. I don't remember sitting here (ph) about that one.

GOODLATTE:

The chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida, Mr. DeSantis, for five minutes.

DESANTIS:

Director Comey, violent crime is up in this country, isn't it?

COMEY:

Our UCR stats we just released show a rise in homicide and other violent crime -

DESANTIS:

Violent crime, I think, was about 4 percent. But the homicides were up 10 percent, is that correct?

COMEY:

10.8 percent.

DESANTIS:

And that's a pretty startling, concerning increase, do you agree?

COMEY:

Yes, it is concerning.

DESANTIS:

Now, I don't know if you have data on 2016, but is your sense that 2016 is going to look closer to 2015 or will it be - is there any indication that the rate's going to go back down?

COMEY:

No, we continue to see spikes in -- in some big cities in a way we can't quite make sense of. There's no doubt that's -- that some 15 to 30 cities are continuing to experience a spike. Whether that will drive the whole number up, I don't know.

DESANTIS:

Now the FBI has now assumed control of the - Dahir Adan, the Minnesota stabbing terrorist investigation. Is that confirmed that that was a terrorist attack at this point?

COMEY:

We're still working on it. It -- it does look like, at least in part, he was motivated by some sort of inspiration from radical Islamic groups. Which groups and how, we're not sure of yet.

DESANTIS:

But he was - he was praising Allah, was asking at least one of the potential victims whether they were Muslim, and I know ISIS did take the responsibility for it, correct?

COMEY:

They claimed responsibility, that is an - a dispositive for us, because they will claim responsibility for any savagery they can get their name on. But we're going through his entire electronic record and history of -- of all of his associations to try and understand that.

DESANTIS:

Now there was a report from the House Homeland Security last year that said that Minnesota was actually the number one source for ISIS fighters in the United States. One - do you acknowledge that that, or do you agree that that's true? And if so, why is Minnesota churning out so many jihadists?

COMEY:

I don't know for sure whether that's true, but it sounds about right. We have very few ISIL fighters from the United States, even - over the last two years, there have been a number of Somali American heritage young men who've gone to fight with Al-Shabaab in Somalia and -- and with ISIL.

I suspect the reason is that's one of the few areas in the United States where we have a large concentration that is susceptible to that recruiting. The great thing about America is everybody's kind of dispersed.

That's one of the areas where there's an immigrant Muslim community that seems to be susceptible for some reason. In -- in small measure, again, we're talking about eight people, I think the number is. But that -- that's my reaction to that.

DESANTIS:

But what's the FBI doing a deal with -- with the problem? You have an insular community that -- that -- that may make this problem more -- more significant. So how's the FBI combating that?

COMEY:

Oh, in a bunch of different ways. With (ph) lots of partners to make sure we know the folks in - in -- especially the Somalia-American community in Minneapolis. U.S. attorney there has done a great job -

DESANTIS:

have they been helpful with the FBI?

COMEY:

Very. Very. Because they don't want their sons or daughters involved in this craziness anymore than anybody else does.

DESANTIS:

Now with - with Paul Combetta, I'm just trying to figure out what happened here. He never said that he remembered anything from that March 25th phone conversation with the Clinton people. Of course, that was days before he BleachBitted the e-mails.

He never said he had any factual knowledge of anything that happened on that call. Is that his basic statement? Because I read the 302s (ph), he didn't really provide any information.

COMEY:

I can't remember for sure. It would be in the 302. You've probably seen it more recently than I have.

DESANTIS:

Well, I saw one 302 said that he pled the fifth, obviously, he was given immunity. Another said that there was an invocation of attorney-client privilege at one time in one of the other summaries. So I'm just trying to figure out, you know, what happened - with Combetta? Why was he not able to provide information?

He had immunity, this was something that was much more fresh in his mind than previous conversations with Clinton people would've been. And yet you said he was credible.

To me, feigning ignorance, that is not credible given the timeline where you have the time - "New York Times" saying that the server existed. The House immediately sends a subpoena. He has this conversation and then lo and behold a few days later all the e-mails are BleachBitted.

COMEY:

he told us that, with immunity, that no one directed him to do it, instructed him to do it. We developed no evidence to contradict that. Again, we're never in the business of believing people. The question is always what evidence do we have that establishes disbelief. We don't have any contrary evidence. His account is uncontradicted by hard facts.

DESANTIS:

Well it's -- it's -- he's in a situation where he has these things are now under a subpoena and he has conversations with people who they -- they potentially could implicate. Then he takes this - this action.

So I guess the question is, is it more reasonable to think that he just would have said, oh, you know what, I just need to all of a sudden BleachBit this stuff without any direction at all? I just find that to be something that is -- that is difficult to square.

Let me ask you this. In September, you sent a memo to your employees at the FBI basically defending the way the bureau handled this investigation. Why did you send that?

COMEY:

It was about how we were doing transparency, because it was all kinds of business about whether we were trying to hide stuff by putting it out on a Friday and I wanted to equip our workforce with transparency about how we were doing, our productions to Congress, so they can answer questions from their family and friends. I want them to know we're conducting ourselves the way they would want us to.

DESANTIS:

And you have -- because you mentioned former agents and people in the community, I mean, this has provoked some controversy within -- within the ranks of current and former agents?

COMEY:

Not within the FBI. Again, who knows what people don't tell the director, but I should've -- I should've asked Mr. Gohmert (ph).

If there are agents in the FBI who are concerned or confused about this, please contact me. We will get you the transparency you need to see that your brothers and sisters did this the way you would want them to.

DESANTIS:

All right. I'm out of time, but I will say just - when I was in the military, you had said no one would be prosecuted. I mean - and maybe that was just for civilian, but I can tell you that people, if you had compromised top-secret information, there would've been a court-martial in your future. And I yield back

GOODLATTE:

Would the director care to respond to that?

COMEY:

No. Fine (ph).

GOODLATTE:

It's a direct comparison to the finding of yourself that, as you test -- as you stated in your news conference, that no prosecutor could (ph) prosecute somebody under similar (ph) circumstances.

COMEY:

I understand Mr. DeSantis to be expressing a personal opinion. I -- I accept that at face value. I just haven't seen the cases that show me on the public record that that's true. But I accept - I accept his good faith.

GOODLATTE:

The chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Ratcliffe, for five minutes.

RATCLIFFE:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Director, did you make the decision not to recommend criminal charges relating to classified information before or after Hillary Clinton was interviewed by the FBI on July the 2nd?

COMEY:

After.

RATCLIFFE:

OK, then I'm going to need your help in trying to understand how that's possible.

I think there's a lot of prosecutors or former prosecutors that are shaking our heads in (ph) how that could be the case, because if there was ever any real possibility that Hillary Clinton might be charged for something that she admitted to on July the 2nd, why would two of the central witnesses and the (ph) potential prosecution against her be allowed to sit in the same room to hear the testimony?

Now I've heard your earlier answers today. You said that, well, it was because the interview was voluntary and -- and they were her lawyers. But I think you're skirting the real issue there, Director.

First of all, the fact that it was voluntary, it didn't have to be, right? You could've impaneled an investigative grand jury. She could've been subpoenaed. And I know you've said that you can't comment on that. And I don't really care about the decision about whether or not there should've been a grand jury here.

But since you didn't have one, it -- it goes to the issue at hand about whether or not this interview should've ever taken place. With - (inaudible) respect to the answers that you've given, the FBI and the Department of Justice absolutely control whether or not the interview is going to take place with other witnesses in the room.

Because the simple truth is -- under the circumstances, as you've described, those interviews never take place.

If there was ever any possibility that something Hillary Clinton might've said on July 2nd could have possibly resulted in criminal charges, that might possibly resulted in a trial against or relating to this classified information, well then to use your words, Director, I don't think that there's any reasonable prosecutor out there who would've allowed two immunized witnesses central to the prosecution approving the case against her to sit in the room with the interview -- the FBI interview of the subject of that investigation.

And if I heard you earlier today, in your long career I heard you say that you've never had that circumstance. Was that - did I hear you correctly?

COMEY:

That's correct, but -

RATCLIFFE:

OK. And I never have either, and I've never met a prosecutor that's ever had that. So to me, the only way that an interview takes place with the two central witnesses and the subject of the investigation is if the decision has already been made that all three people in that room are not going to be charged.

COMEY:

Can I respond?

RATCLIFFE:

Yes, please.

COMEY:

I know in our political life (ph) sometimes people casually occur - accuse each other of being dishonest, but if colleagues of ours believe I am lying about when I made this decision, please urge them to contact me privately so we can have a conversation about this.

All I can do is tell you again, the decision was made after that because I didn't know what was going to happen in that interview. She maybe lied during the interview in a way we can prove (ph) - let me finish.

I would also urge you to tell me what tools we have, as prosecutors and investigators, to kick out of an interview someone that the subject says is their lawyer.

RATCLIFFE:

That's not my point. The interview never should've taken place if you were going to allow the central witnesses that you needed to prove the case to sit there and listen to the testimony that the subject was going to give. It never happens. It never happened to you and it's never happened to me or any other prosecutor that I've met.

And I know you've defended the people that were involved of this of being great (ph), but if it's never happened, I wonder why this is a case of precedent with respect to that practice that you and I have never seen in our careers.

COMEY:

You and I don't control the universe of what's happened. I suspect it's very unusual. A key fact, though, that maybe is leading to some confusion here, is we had already concluded we didn't have a prosecutable case against Heather Samuelson, or Cheryl Mills at that point. If they were targets of our investigation, maybe we would've canceled the interview, but frankly, our focus was on the subject. The subject at that point was Hillary Clinton.

RATCLIFFE:

All right. Let me move on.

According to the FBI's own documents, Paul Combetta was in his first interview on February the 18th, told FBI agents that he had no knowledge about the preservation order for the Clinton e-mails. Correct?

COMEY:

I don't know the dates of that, but I'm sure it's in the 302.

RATCLIFFE:

OK. But then two and a half months later on May the 3rd, his second interview, he made a 180 degree turn and he admitted that in fact he was aware of the preservation order and he was aware of the fact that that meant that he shouldn't disturb the Clinton e- mails. Correct?

COMEY:

Yes.

RATCLIFFE:

OK. Well, then, I need your help again here because when I was at the Department of Justice, your reward for lying to federal agents was an 18 USC 1001 charge or potential obstruction of justice charge, it wasn't immunity.

COMEY:

It depends on where you're trying to go with the investigation. It's a low-level guy, you're trying to move up in the chain, you might think about it differently.

RATCLIFFE:

Well, you -- he lied to an FBI agent. You don't think that's important?

COMEY:

It's very important. Happens all the time unfortunately. It's very, very important. Sometimes, you prosecute that person and end their cooperation. Sometimes, you try and sign them up.

RATCLIFFE:

But if they lie to an FBI agent after they're given immunity, they violated the terms of their immunity agreement.

COMEY:

Oh sure. After -- after the agreement.

RATCLIFFE:

And so that's my point. If -- he shouldn't have immunity anymore.

COMEY:

I'm sorry. I may have misunderstood you. He lied to us before he came clean under the immunity agreement and admitted that he had -- had deleted the e-mails.

RATCLIFFE:

No, not according to the FBI's documents. He had an immunity agreement in December of 2015. These interviews took place in February and March and May of this year, 2016.

COMEY:

Combetta?

RATCLIFFE:

Combetta.

COMEY:

OK. I'm -- then I'm -- I'm confused and misremembering. But I don't think that's right.

RATCLIFFE:

OK. Well, let me -- my time's expired, but I have one last question and I think that's important. At this point, based on everything, do you think that any laws were broken by Hillary Clinton or her lawyers?

COMEY:

Do I think that any laws were broken?

RATCLIFFE:

Yeah.

COMEY:

I don't think there's evidence to establish that.

RATCLIFFE:

OK. Well, I think you're making my point when you say there's no evidence to establish that. Maybe not in the way she handled classified information, but with respect to obstruction of justice -- and you've got a pen (ph) here, I just want to make sure the record's clear about the evidence that you didn't have that you can't use to prove.

So this comes from the FBI's own report. Says that the FBI didn't have the Clinton's personal Apple server used for Hillary Clinton work e-mails. That was never located, so the FBI could never examine it. An Apple Macbook laptop and thumb drive that contained Hillary Clinton's e-mail archives was lost, so the FBI never examined that. Two Blackberry devices provided to the FBI didn't, have SIM cards or SD data card. Thirteen Hillary Clinton personal mobile devices were lost, discarded or destroyed with a hammer, so the FBI clearly didn't examine those.

Various server backups were deleted over time, so the FBI didn't examine that. After the State Department and my colleague, Mr. Gowdy here, notified Ms. Clinton that her records would be sought by the Benghazi Committee, copies of her e-mails on the laptops of both of her lawyers, Cheryl Mills and Heather Samuelson, were wiped clean with BleachBit, so the FBI didn't review that.

After those e-mails were subpoenaed, Hillary Clinton's e-mail archive was also permanently deleted from the Platte River Network with BleachBit, so the FBI didn't review that. And also after the subpoena, backups of the Platte River server were manually deleted.

Now, Director, hopefully that list is substantially accurate because it comes from your own documents. My question to you is this. Any one of those in that very, very long list to me says obstruction of justice. Collectively, they scream obstruction of justice. And to ignore them, I think, really allows not just reasonable prosecutors but reasonable people to believe that maybe the decision on this was made a long time ago not to prosecute Hillary Clinton.

And with that, I yield back.

GOODLATTE:

Director, do you care to respond?

COMEY:

(inaudible), to ignore that which we don't have -- we're in a fact-based world, so we make evaluations based on the evidence we're able to gather using the tools that we have. So I -- it's hard for me to react to these things that you don't have. So that's my -- that's my reaction to it.

GOODLATTE:

The chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Farenthold, for five minutes.

FARENTHOLD:

Thank you very much.

Director Comey, thank you for being here. I know this is -- there are a lot of things you would probably much rather be doing than sitting on the hot seat, so to speak.

And here's where I'm coming from on this. You've been asked a lot of questions today about the Clinton investigation, and what I'm hearing from folks back in Texas -- and I'm just going to take (ph) a big picture view of this -- is this stuff just simply doesn't pass the smell test on a lot of -- a lot of (inaudible).

You just had my colleague from Texas, Mr. Ratcliffe, list a long list of things that y'all didn't have in the investigation. You've been asked earlier today, well, you know, would you re-open the investigation, what would it take to get you to re-open the investigation.

We've had five people given immunity, which basically we got nothing, when perhaps a plea (ph) agreement or something else might have worked. You have your interpretation in your -- in your previous testimony before Congress that Section 793F required intent, when in fact, the standard is -- is gross negligence. And it's just a long list of things that just have people scratching their heads going, "If this were to happen to me, I would be in a world of hurt, probably in jail."

And the -- how do you respond to people who are saying that this is not how average American would be treating (sic), this is only how Hillary Clinton would be treated?

COMEY:

Look, I've heard that a lot, and my -- my response is demand -- when people tell you that, that others have been treated differently, demand from a trustworthy source the details of those cases because I -- I'm a very aggressive investigator, I was a very aggressive prosecutor.

I have gone back through 40 years of cases, and I'm telling you under oath that to treat (ph), to prosecute on these facts would be a double standard, because Jane and Joe Smith would not be prosecuted on these facts.

Now, you'd be in trouble. That's the other thing I've had to explain to the FBI workforce. You use our -- an unclassified e-mails system to do our business, and in the course of doing our business talk about classified topics, you will be in big trouble with the FBI. I'm highly confident of that. I'm also highly confident, in fact certain, you would not be prosecuted. That's what folks tend to lump together.

So I care deeply about what people think about the justice system and that it not have two standards. It does not and this demonstrates it.

FARENTHOLD:

But you look at General Petraeus and his handling of classified information. You look at -- and I'll go back to what you're saying...

COMEY:

But when you look at it, demand to know the facts. I don't want to dump on General Petraeus because the case if over, but I would be happy to go through how very different that circumstance is than this circumstance.

FARENTHOLD:

And you talk about -- you tell your FBI agents if you do what we're investigating here with material from the FBI, you'll be in a world of trouble. I would assume that could potentially be fired. Is Hillary Clinton in -- she didn't get in any trouble at the State Department. The only trouble she's got now is trying to explain it to the American people.

COMEY:

She's not a government employee, so the normal range of discipline that would be applied to FBI employees if they did something similar doesn't apply. And I gather -- I think that's some of the reason for people's confusion, lumping these two together and their frustration, but it is what it is. And all I can tell people is demand the facts. When people tell you so and so's been treated differently, demand the facts on that.

FARENTHOLD:

All right. So if somebody were to -- let's just do a hypothetical. Let's say somebody here in Congress were to e-mail my personal e-mail some classified information and I -- I'm on my -- I get my phone -- it comes to my cell phone too, my personal e-mail comes to my personal cell phone. I look at it, go "Wow, that probably shouldn't be on there," and don't do anything.

I mean, to me, that's being grossly negligent with classified information and I should -- and that's a violation of 793F. And that's exactly what Hillary Clinton did I think. At what point -- at what point do you get to intent? The classified information was on an unsecure server, you knew it was there and you didn't do anything about it. To me, that's gross negligence period. I would think -- I would be prosecuted for that.

COMEY:

I'm confident that you wouldn't, but we'd just have to agree to disagree.

FARENTHOLD:

All right, if I ever get trouble...

COMEY:

Don't do it.

FARENTHOLD:

... I'll just (inaudible).

COMEY:

Don't do it. But I guess I can't control Congress. If you work for us, don't do it.

FARENTHOLD:

No, I have absolutely no intention of doing it.

So again, I -- I just want to say don't -- don't get frustrated when we continue to ask these questions because we're not badgering you because we want to badger you. We are talking to you because the American people are upset about this and don't think it was handled appropriately, and that's the basis at least of my questioning. And I thank you for appearing here.

COMEY:

And I totally understand that. I think there are lots of questions people have, which is why I've worked so hard to try and be transparent. There's never been this kind of transparency in a criminal case ever, but because I understand the questions and the importance of it, I've tried.

And I hope people will separate two things; questions about facts and judgment from questions and accusations about integrity. As I said before, you can call us wrong, you can call me a fool. You cannot call us weasels, OK? That is just not fair. And I hope we haven't gotten to a place in American public life where everything has to be torn down on integrity basis just to disagree. You can disagree with this. There is just not a fair basis for saying that we did it in any way that wasn't honest and independent. That's when I get a little worked up. Sorry.

FARENTHOLD:

I'm out of time.

GOODLATTE:

The chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Bishop, for five minutes.

BISHOP:

Thank you.

Thank you, Director Comey. I appreciate your testimony here today. Just to follow up to all this discussion regarding the Clinton investigation, specifically with regard to the interview of Secretary Clinton, I'm holding in my hand a memorandum from Deputy Attorney General James Cole. It's dated May 12, 2014. This memorandum was issued to you and others on the policy concerning electronic recording of statements. Are you familiar with this...

COMEY:

Yes.

BISHOP:

... memorandum?

COMEY:

Mhm.

BISHOP:

The policy established a -- establishes a presumption that the FBI will electronically record statements made by individuals in their custody. Now, I know that Secretary Clinton was not technically in custody, but the policy also encourages agents and prosecutors to consider electronic recording in investigative or other circumstances where that presumption does not exist.

BISHOP:

The policy also encourages agents and prosecutors to consult with each other in such circumstances, and given the magnitude of what we've been talking about today and the -- and the huge public interest in demand for information with regard to the public trust, I -- I think this is specifically important to this discussion. Now, you're aware of this policy, correct?

BISHOP:

Right, that applies to people that are in handcuffs. But not -- it also applies to -- the policy also encourages agents and prosecutors consider electronic recording in investigative matter -- in other matters where that presumption does not exist. Does it not?

COMEY:

Sure. The FBI doesn't do it, but sure I understand the -- they encouraged us to talk about it.

BISHOP:

So did -- did the agents then did not consider to conduct the interview in -- in a recorded situation then?

COMEY:

We do not record non-custodial interviews. Now, maybe someday folks'll urge us to change that policy, but we don't. And we sure wouldn't want to change it in one particular case.

BISHOP:

Well, that's the policy. I'm just reading the policy that's issued by the Deputy Attorney General, James Cole, that is to you and to others in the Department of Justice that establishes the policy. So I -- if you don't do it, I -- I assume that you're doing it against the policy of the Department of Justice.

COMEY:

No, that -- that policy only governs custodial interrogations. So people who have been locked up. We do not, and it is not inconsistent with Department of Justice policy, record non- custodial -- that is voluntary interviews where someone's not in our custody.

BISHOP:

Well, I'm reading this differently then because it does say that there's an exception that -- that it is within your discretion to -- to record such...

COMEY:

You could and, I don't know, maybe some other federal investigative agencies do. The FBI's practice is we do not record non-custodial interviews.

BISHOP:

OK, thank you, Director. I -- I want to pivot, if I can and build off Representative's Desantis' question with regard to the refugees attempting to enter the United States, and specifically with regard to Syrian refugees.

Wondering if you could tell me, we've -- we've talked about this -- this process and the fact that we do not have a process in place that we can rely upon. Even the kid (ph) before, when you testified and asked the question that it's -- we simply don't have enough information to ensure that we have the information that we need to ensure that these people are not a threat to our country.

Can you -- can you expand upon that now after a year? Can you tell me whether or not we've got more information, more capabilities to vet these refugees? And I say this because, in my district in Michigan, in this fiscal year Michigan has taken the fourth most refugees of all states, 4,178, and we're the -- we've taken the third most for Iraq, the second most from Syria.

Michigan has absorbed enormous number of refugees, and I think you can understand our concern with regard to the fact that we don't have information necessary to identify whether or not they're a threat.

Can you assuage my concern, the concerns of my constituents, that we have a system in place that we can vet these individuals and they don't pose a threat to our country?

COMEY:

I can assuage in part and restate my concern in part. The -- our process inside the United States government has gotten much better at making sure we touch all possible source of information about a refugee.

The interview process has gotten more robust, so we've gotten our act together in that respect. The challenge remains, especially with respect to folks coming from Syria, we're unlikely to have anything in our holdings.

That is, with people coming from Iraq, the United States government was there for a very long period of time. We had biometrics, we had source information. We're unlikely to have that kind of picture about someone coming from Syria, and that's the piece I just want folks to be aware of.

BISHOP:

Has anything change in your vetting process? Have you updated it? Do you have any concerns with regard -- now we've seen an increased terrorist activity in the last six months, including New York, New Jersey, and Minneapolis.

Has anything changed in the vetting process? Can you be confident that foreign fighters or other refugees entering the country are not planning future attacks on our country?

COMEY:

Well, as I said, over the last year since I was last before you, the vetting process has gotten more effective in the ways I described. I'm in the business where I can't ever say there's no risk associated with someone.

So we wake up every day in the FBI worrying about who might have gotten through in any form or fashion to the United States or who might be getting inspired while they're here. So I can't ever give a blanket assurance.

BISHOP:

Director, I respect your opinion. And this is not a policy question, I'm asking you based on your personal opinion as a law enforcement officer that we rely upon to keep this country safe. Is there anything that you would do to ensure, as you said, that our country is safe with regard to this -- this refugee process?

COMEY:

Anything that I would do?

BISHOP:

Anything that you'd do, any recommendations you have for Congress, for this country that would ensure our safety.

COMEY:

I -- I'd (ph) shy away from assurances of safety given the nature of the threats we face. I do think that there may be opportunities to do more in the social media space with refugees in particular. And I -- and I talked to Jeh Johnson yesterday about it. I know there's (ph) a work in progress.

So much of people's lives, even if we don't have in our holdings, may be in the -- in digital dust that they've left in different places, are we harvesting that dust on people who want to come into this country in the best way. And I think there may be ground for improvement there.

BISHOP:

Thank you, Director.

And -- and I will yield back, but Mr. Chairman, I'd ask unanimous consent to enter the memorandum that I referenced earlier from -- dated May 12, 2014 into the record.

GOODLATTE:

Without objection, it will be made part of the record.

The chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. Collins, for five minutes.

COLLINS:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Director Comey, I -- I appreciate you being here. You are, I believe, forthright, much more so (inaudible) you said as any criminal case we've had. But I'm also still in the military. I'm still in the Air Force Reserve. I went to my drill (ph) back in July.

I was hit by an amazing amount of questions from different servicemembers on this issue of how the secretary -- former secretary of State get to do this, and yet, we have members of the military who are prosecuted all the time.

Your statements earlier were fairly startling when you said, "I don't know of anybody else that's been (inaudible) this." Just since 2009, Department of Justice prosecuted at least seven people under the Espionage Act all for very similar cases. Now, you said go look at the facts. Well, we're looking at the facts in these cases.

The interesting one, and you know, you said that in looking back at your investigation, the (ph) mishandling or removal of classified information, we cannot find a case that will support bringing criminal charges on these facts. All right. Well, it didn't take nothing but a simple legal search to find a Marine -- the following. Now, I guess their name is not Jane or Joe, so they did get prosecuted, OK?

And this is the issue. Under 18 USC 793F, gross negligence. This is what the Marine did. Out of -- they took classified information that was put into a gym bag (inaudible) and took, all right? Simple mishandling.

Court of Appeals actually upheld this case, and is what they said, that the purpose of federal espionage statutes (ph) to protect classified documents from unauthorized procedures such as removal from proper place of custody, which would mean how you deal with this, regardless of means of removal, it was (inaudible) gross and was (ph) approximate cause of the document's removal.

It is -- and they quote United States vs. (inaudible), said it is clear the Congress' (ph) intent to create a hierarchy of offenses against national security ranges from (inaudible) to merely losing classified materials through gross negligence or the mishandling of.

COLLINS:

It was sort of also ironic for me that when I had to go back in July and this past month when I went back, I had to do my annual information assurance training.

They went through everything that we have to do with handling classified information.

I have been in a war zone, I've been in -- this is just common knowledge among most everybody in the world, obviously not to the secretary. How can you then explain to me this Marine's mistake in taking classified documents, or mishandling them, is more severe than the secretary of state who sent and received classified e-mails on a regular basis?

Including those that were originally classified, not those that were classified later, but were originally classified.

COMEY:

I'm familiar with the case and I'm quite certain it's not a 793F case. It was prosecuted...

COLLINS:

His conviction was under 793F.

COMEY:

Yes, I don't think -- I mean I'll go back and check again and I'd urge you to too. I'm pretty sure it's not under the gross negligence prong (ph) of 793F but it's a uniform court of military justice prosecution, not by the Department of Justice, am I remembering correctly?

COLLINS:

This was from and has appealed at in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces of the United States...

COMEY:

OK, OK, but regardless. I think even -- I don't think this is under the same provision but even there, that's a case involving someone who actually stole classified information, hard copies.

What people need to remember, and I don't say this to make little of it, I think it's a very matter, what happened here is, the secretary used an unclassified e-mail system, her personal system, to conduct her business.

COLLINS:

And let's just stop right there. That in and of itself, and I understand as an (inaudible), you've been through a lot of questions, I apologize. But let's just come back to the basics here. We're trying to parse that I didn't have such a sandy burger or all these others who confronted you, they took a hard copy.

In today's society and even understanding if you go through any insurance class or anything else, they tell you it cannot be on a personal laptop (ph). In fact, there was another chief petty (ph) officer who had classified information on a personal computer and went back and forth to work (ph).

That is not physical documents, it's on a -- to parse words like that is why the American people are fed up. They're fed up with the IRS commissioner when he does it, they're fed up here. I'm not attacking your -- I think you're one of the more upright people I've met. I think you just blew it. I think the attorney general blew it, I shared this with her, and I think when we come to this thing, there's no other way that you can say that there's no others that resemble this.

As a lawyer, you're taught all the time to take facts and put them -- they may not be exact, but they fit under the law. You can -- I mean, so I guess maybe I'm going to change the question because we're going to go down to a dead end. You're going to say...

(CROSSTALK)

COLLINS:

Now let me ask you this. I want to change the questions.

Do you honestly believe that a lady, a woman of vast intelligence, who was the first lady of the United States, who was a senator, who had access to classified information, all the members here do, who was secretary of state who had even further classification ability even beyond what we have here, do you believe that in this case, honestly she was not grossly negligent or criminal in her acts?

COMEY:

First of all, I don't believe anyone, other than my wife. My question is what evidence do I have to establish that state of mind and I don't believe I have evidence to establish it beyond a reasonable doubt.

COLLINS:

Then really what we're saying here is this, if she is -- and this is in essence to what you're saying, you said I can't prove it and I understand. There's a lot of folks out there in the law that they come to us all the time. I'm an attorney as well and they come to us, say this, it's not what we know, it's not what we think, it's what we can prove.

I get it but here's the problem with this and this is the person who's asking to lead this country. If she can hide behind this and gleamily (ph) get approval from the FBI through an investigation which has been covered here thoroughly, then I just do not understand.

She is either the most arrogant, which probably so, or the most insanely naive person we've ever met. Because when I actually show evidences of basically the same thing which you can take fact and correlate to law. This is why the Armed Forces right now have the term called the Clinton Defense.

I didn't know, I didn't mean to, it's on my -- it's the Clinton Defense. With questions like this, Director, we have (ph) give the ability now to where nobody takes this seriously and this is why people are upset.

When it was originally classified, she can tell all the stories she wants. She can have the back up from you that no prosecutor, which is again amazing to me, that a law enforcement would tell the prosecutor because how many times I've been on both sides of this, where the law enforcement agent said, I'm not sure we have a case here but when the prosecutor looks at it, the prosecutor says, yes there's a case here.

I don't really frankly, no offense, care if I'm in prosecuting, what the law enforcement -- if I can see the case and I can make it, that's my job, not yours. And yet now we have a whole system that has been turned upside down. Not because I don't believe your honesty of your people but I believe you blew it because you frankly didn't have the whole situation into effect where the FBI wouldn't look political and unfortunately, that's all you've become in this and it's a sad thing because y'all do great work.

You have done great work and you will do great work. But I think it's time to start bringing down the curtain. There's a wizard behind the thing, Mrs. Hillary Clinton, who is playing all of us because she's not that naive, she's not stupid.

She knew what she was doing because she was simply too bored. If she, God forbid, gets into 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue and just gets bored with the process, then God help us all. Mr. Chairman, I yield.

COMEY:

Mr. Chairman, there's two...

GOODLATTE:

The director is permitted to respond.

COMEY:

Yes, two pieces that I need to respond to. First, he said, hiding behind something. This case was investigated by a group of professionals. So if I blew it, they blew it too. Career FBI agents, the very best we have were put on this case and career analysts.

We are a team. No one hid behind anything. American citizens should insist that we bring criminal charges if we're able to investigate and produce evidence beyond reasonable doubt to charge somebody.

That should be true whether you're investigating me, or you or Joe Smith on the street. That's the way this case was done. It's about evidence and the rest of it I'll let go.

COLLINS:

Mr. -- I would and I apologize, if (inaudible) -- I'm not -- this is the problem though. When you take it as a whole, its been setup here this is a unique case. You talked about it being a unique case.

Director, this is a unique case because I truly, and I don't think you convinced hardly anybody except your own group, that I don't think you ever said they couldn't blow it, they blew it. Anybody else would have been prosecuted under this. In my humble opinion...

COMEY:

You're just wrong. You're just wrong. We'll just have to agree to disagree.

COLLINS:

Well, unfortunately there's a lot to disagree on this one, thank you Mr. Chairman.

GOODLATTE:

The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Idaho, Mr. Labrador is recognized for five minutes.

LABRADOR:

Thank you Mr. Chairman and Director Comey, I've always appreciated your testimony before this committee and I respect the work that you do for the FBI. When you made your recommendations to the Department of Justice to not prosecute Hillary Clinton, I actually disagreed with your decision but I appreciated your candor in explaining to the American people and to us those recommendations.

Since that decision I continued to view you as honorable and a strong leader for the critical federal agency. In fact, I did 20 town hall meetings over the recess and I was lambasted at every one of them, in fact I think I lost votes because I defended your integrity at every one of those town hall meetings. And I told them why, even though I disagreed with your conclusions, I thought you came from an honorable place.

LABRADOR:

However, as more and more information has come to light, I question the thoroughness and I'm not questioning your integrity, but the thoroughness and the scope of the FBI's investigation. In the past week, we have learned of the granted immunity to several key witnesses in the Clinton investigation including Hillary Clinton's former chief of staff and one of the individuals responsible for setting up her server.

And I'm really disappointed by this revelation, and confused as to why these immunity grants were necessary and appropriate given the circumstances.

It appears to me that the FBI was very early in this investigation -- too willing to strike deals and ensure that top officials could never be prosecuted for their role in what we now know was a massive breach of national security protocol. We have a duty to ensure that our FBI is still in the business of investigating criminal activity.

So at what point in the investigation was Cheryl Mills offered immunity?

COMEY:

Cheryl Mills was never offered immunity -- not to quibble, but she was given letter (ph) immunity to govern...

LABRADOR:

At what point?

COMEY:

June of 2016, so June of this year. So about 11 months into the investigation.

LABRADOR:

So to be clear, was she offered immunity for an interview and potential (ph) testimony or for turning over the laptop as evidence?

COMEY:

Turning over the laptop as evidence. It governed what could be done -- in terms of using it against her -- that laptop.

LABRADOR:

To you knowledge, was Cheryl Mills an uncooperative witness prior to the immunity deal?

COMEY:

I think our assessment was, she was cooperative -- I forget the month she was interviewed -- but she was interviewed fully before that.

LABRADOR:

And she always cooperated?

COMEY:

I think our assessment was -- again, this is the odd I look at the world -- we had no reason to believe that she was being uncooperative.

LABRADOR:

So could this investigation have been completed without these grants of immunity in place?

COMEY:

In my view, it couldn't be concluded professionally without doing our best to figure out what was on those laptops. So getting the laptops was very important to me and to the investigative team.

LABRADOR:

So in your vast experience as investigator, as a DOJ attorney, now as an FBI director; how many times have you allowed a person who is a material witness to a crime you're investigating to act as the lawyer in that same investigation?

COMEY:

"To let," is what I'm stumbling on. The FBI has no power to stop someone in a voluntary interview...

LABRADOR:

No, no, you're speaking -- let's just be honest. You allowed -- the FBI allowed Cheryl Mills to act as the attorney in a case that she was a material witness. How many times...

COMEY:

In the same sense that I'm allowing you to question me.

LABRADOR:

How many times...

COMEY:

I can't stop you from questioning me.

LABRADOR:

How many times have you done that prior?

COMEY:

I have not had an experience where the subject of the interview was represented by a lawyer who was also a witness in the investigation.

LABRADOR:

OK, so you have never had that experience?

COMEY:

Not in my experience.

LABRADOR:

You prosecuted terrorists and mobsters, right?

COMEY:

Correct.

LABRADOR:

And during your time in Justice, how many times did you allow a lawyer who was a material witness to the case that you were prosecuting to also act as the subject of -- as the attorney to the subject of that investigation?

COMEY:

As I said, I don't think I've encountered that situation where a witness -- a lawyer for the subject of the investigation was also a witness to the investigation.

LABRADOR:

So this was highly unusual to have...

COMEY:

In my experience, yes.

LABRADOR:

OK.

In your answer to Chairman Chaffetz, you indicated that you had no reason to disbelieve Paul Combetta when he told you that he erased the hard drive on his own, is that correct?

COMEY:

Correct.

LABRADOR:

However, in the exchange on Reddit, he said, "I need to strip out a VIP's e-mail address from a bunch of archived e-mails. Basically they don't want the VIP's e-mail address exposed to anyone." Those two statements are not consistent.

How can you say that he was truthful when he told you, nobody told him to act this way. But yet, you saw this Reddit account where it says where "they" told him that he needed to act in this way.

COMEY:

I think the assessment of the investigative teams --- those are two very -- about two different subjects. One is a year before about -- in the summer of 2014 -- about how to produce e-mails and whether there's a way to remove or mask the actual e-mail address, the HRC, whatever it is, dot com and the other is about actually deleting the content of those e-mails sitting on the server.

LABRADOR:

It seems like, in your investigation, you found time after time evidence of destruction, evidence of breaking iPhones and other phones -- all these different things -- but yet, you find that there's no evidence of intent.

And I'm a little bit confused as to your interpretation of 18 U.S.C. 793 (f). On the one hand you've said that Secretary Clinton couldn't be charged because her conduct was extremely careless, but not grossly negligent, correct?

COMEY:

That's not exactly what I said.

LABRADOR:

That is what you said today. But you have also said there was no evidence of her intent to harm the United States.

So -- but you will agree that a person can act with gross negligent or even act knowingly without possessing some additional specific intent? So which is it? Is it a lack of gross negligence that she had or a lack of intent?

COMEY:

In terms of my overall judgment about whether the case was worthy of prosecution, it is the lack of evidence to meet what I understand to be the elements of the crime, one. And two, a consideration of what would be fair with respect to how other people have been treated. Those two things together tell me, and I'm -- nothing has happened that's changed my view on this -- that no reasonable prosecutor would bring such a case.

The -- the specific intent question, yes, I agree that harm -- specific intent to harm the United States is a different thing than a gross negligence or a willfulness.

LABRADOR:

So just one last question.

You have talked about Mary and Joe. Now Mary and Joe would be disciplined at the FBI if they did what Hillary Clinton did. If Mary and Joe came to you and asked for a promotion immediately after being disciplined, would you give them that promotion?

COMEY:

It's tough to answer that hypothetical. It would depend upon the nature of the conduct and what discipline have been imposed.

LABRADOR:

And what if they ever ask for a promotion that would give them management and control of cybersecurity of your agency and the secrets of your agency after they had done these things? Would you give them that promotion?

COMEY:

That's a question I don't want to answer.

LABRADOR:

All right.

GOODLATTE:

The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from California, Ms. Walters, for five minutes.

WALTERS:

Hi, Director Comey.

Despite the absence of an intent Mens Rea, standard in 18 U.S.C. Section 79 - 793 (f) , you have said that there has never been a prosecution without evidence of intent. Thus, the standard has been read into the statute despite the specific language enacted. What exactly are the legal precedents that justify reading intent into the statute?

COMEY:

Well, my understanding of 793 (f) is governed by a couple of things. Three things, really.

One, the legislative history from 1917, which I've read and the one case that was prosecuted -- in the case. And those two things combined tell me that when Congress enacted 793 (f), they were very worried about the gross negligence language, and actually put in legislative history -- we understand it to be something very close to willfulness.

Then the next hundred years of treatment of that actually tell me that the Department of Justice for a century has had that same reservation because they've only used it once. And that was in a case involving an FBI agent who was -- in an espionage context. So those things together inform my judgment of it.

WALTERS:

Considering the important of protecting classified information for national security purposes, a lot of people disagree that an intent standard should be read into that statute. What specific language would you recommend we enact to ensure gross negligence is the actual standard for the statute and not intent?

COMEY:

I don't think that's something the Bureau ought to give advice on. It's a good question as to what the standard should be. I could imagine federal employees being very concerned about how you draw the line for criminal liability, but I don't think that is something that we ought to advise on, the legislation.

WALTERS:

OK. Should we enact a Mens Rea standard for extreme carelessness for the statute?

COMEY:

Same answer, I think, is appropriate.

WALTERS:

Should we enact a civil fine?

COMEY:

A civil fine for mishandling classified information? I don't know, actually, 'cause it's already subject to discipline, which is suspension, or loss of clearance, or loss of job, which is a big monetary impact to the people disciplined. So I don't know is (ph) whether it's necessary.

WALTERS:

OK. I want to change subjects...

COMEY:

OK.

WALTERS:

...for my next question. As you know, the number of criminal background checks for non-criminal purposes, such as for employment decisions, continues to increase annually. I don't expect that you have this information on hand.

However, would you be willing to provide the committee and my staff with the number of criminal history record checks for fingerprint-based background checks that the FBI has conducted over each of the past five years? And what are your thoughts regarding whether the FBI has the capacity to process the increasing number of background check requests?

COMEY:

I'm sure we can get you that number, 'cause I'm sure we track it. So I'll make sure my staff follows up with you. I do believe we have the resources. Where we've been strained is on the background checks for firearms purchases.

The other background check processes we, my -- overall sense is we have enough troops to do that. We're able to -- we charge a fee for those and I think we're able to generate the resources we need.

WALTERS:

OK. Thank you. I yield back my time.

ISSA:

Could the gentlelady yield to me?

WALTERS:

Sure. I'd be happy to yield to you, Mr. Issa.

ISSA:

Thank you. Thank you. Director, some time ago you appeared before this committee and you -- you told us that you had exhausted all of the capability to unlock the San Bernardino iPhone, the 5C. Did that turn out to be true?

COMEY:

Still true.

ISSA:

That you had exhausted all of your capability?

COMEY:

That -- that the FBI had? Yes.

ISSA:

So shouldn't we be concerned from a cyber standpoint that you couldn't unlock a phone that, in fact, an Israel company came forward and unlocked for you? And a -- basically a Cambridge professor or student for 90 bucks has shown also to be able to do -- unlock and mirror or duplicate the memory.

Should - I mean, and this is purely a question of, you apparently do not have the resources to do that which others can do. Isn't that correct?

COMEY:

I'm sure that's true in a whole bunch of respects. But first I've got to correct you. I'm not confirming, you said an Israeli company? I'm not...

ISSA:

Well, OK. A -- a contractor for you reported to be for a million dollars unlocked the phone. So I would ask you to confirm. The phone got unlocked, right?

COMEY:

Yes, it did.

ISSA:

OK. So the technology could be created outside of ordering a company to essentially clandestine -- or, you know, reengineer their -- their software for you. Correct?

COMEY:

In this particular case, yes.

ISSA:

OK. And so you lack that capability. How can this committee know that you're in the process of developing that sort of technology, the equivalent of the Cambridge $90 technology?

COMEY:

How can the committee know?

ISSA:

Yeah. I mean in other words, where are the assurances that you're going to get robust?

And, if we have an encryption working group that was formed between multiple committees, to no small extent because of your action of going to a magistrate and getting an order because you lacked that capability, and -- and were trying a new technique of ordering a company to go invent for you, the question is how do we know that won't happen again?

That you will go to the court, ask for something, when, in fact, the technology exists or could exist to do it in some other way? A technology that you should have at your disposal, or at least some federal agency should, like the NSA.

COMEY:

Well, first of all, it could well happen again, which is why I think it's great that people are talking about what we might do about this problem. It's an interesting question as to whether we ought to invest in us having the ability to hack into people's devices, whether that's the best solution.

It doesn't strike me as the best solution. But we are -- and I've asked for more money in the -- in the '17 budget, trying to invest in building those capabilities so when we really need to be able to get into a device, we can. It's not scalable and I'm not sure it will be thrilling to companies like Apple we're investing money, trying to figure out how to hack into their stuff.

ISSA:

Well isn't it, and I'll be brief, isn't it - isn't it true that we have clandestine organizations who have the mandate to do just that? To look around the world and to be able to find information that people don't know you can find, keep it secret, get it out there?

And my question to you is, shouldn't we, instead of giving you the money, simply continue to leverage other agencies who already have that mandate, and then ask you to ask them to be your conduit for that, when you have an appropriate need?

COMEY:

That's a reasonable question, maybe part of the solution. Real challenges in using those kinds of techniques in the bulk of our work, because it becomes public and exposed; that has to be an important part of the conversation.

ISSA:

Thank you. I yield back.

GOODLATTE:

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arizona, Mr. Franks for five minutes.

FRANKS:

Thank you Mr. Chairman. And thank you for being here Director Comey. Director Comey, I - the last thing I want to do is to - to lecture you on anything related to the law because I think you've given your whole life to that effort and I guess in the face of so many things already having been said here in the past, that all I can do is to try to sort of re-associate this in a reference of why there is a rule of law.

You know, we - we had that little unpleasantness in this (ph) late 1770's with England over this rule of law, because we realize there's really only two main ways to govern, and that is by the rule of men or the rule of law, and sometimes it's important for all of us just to kind of reconnect what this whole enterprise of America is all about, and I - again, don't seek to lecture you in that regard.

And I know, and -- and you'll have to forgive me for being a Republican partisan here, because I am very biased in this case, but I know that when you interviewed Mrs. Clinton, you were up against someone that - that really should have an earned Doctorate of duplicity and deception hanging on her wall.

I don't know that you probably could have interviewed a more gifted prevaricator, so I know you were up against the best. But having said that, when I - when I read the law here, that I know so many have already referenced, I think I maybe - that's the best way for me to do that, 18 U.S.C. 1924 provides that any federal official who quote "becomes possessed of documents or materials containing classified information of the United States, and knowingly removes such documents or materials without authority, and with the intent to retain such documents or materials at an unauthorized location shall be fined under this title or imprisoned for not more than one year or both."

Now I didn't - didn't miss one word there. It does not require - that section does not require an intent to profit, it doesn't require harm to the United States or other wise to - to act in any manner disloyal to the United States, it only requires intent to retain, classified documents at an unauthorized location.

And - and I believe sir, in all sincerity to you - person to person-I believe that some of your comments reflected that that's what occurred. Over the last several months, I believe that's the case, and so I have to - it's my job to ask you again, why the simple clarity of that law was not applied in this case?

Because the implications here are so profound, for your children and mine, for this country, they are so profound.

And - and I - again, I don't envy your job, but I want to give you the reminder of the time to -- to help me understand why a law like this that any - any law school graduate, if we can't apply this one in this case, how in God's name can apply it in any case in the world, why does it - why is it even written? So, I'm going to stop there and ask your forbearance and just go for it.

COMEY:

Sure, no it's a reasonable question. That is the -- 18 U.S.C. 1924 is the misdemeanor mishandling statute that is the basis on which most people have been prosecuted for mishandling classified information -- have been prosecuted, it is not a strict liability statute.

I was one of the people, when I was in the private sector, who argued against strict liability criminal statutes. It requires, in the view of the Department of Justice and over long practice, proof of some criminal intent - not specific intent to harm the United States, but a general awareness that you're doing something that's unlawful, so you have to prove criminal intent.

So there's two problems in this case: one is developing the evidence to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that Secretary Clinton acted with that criminal intent, and second, even if you could do that, which you can't, looking at the history of other cases, what would be the right thing to do here, has anybody ever been prosecuted on anything near these facts?

And again, I keep telling the folks at home, when people tell you lots of people have been prosecuted for this, please demand the details of those cases, because I've been through them all.

So that combination of what the statute requires and the history of prosecutions told me, and again people can take a different view and it's reasonable to disagree, that no reasonable prosecutor would bring that case - that's - that in a nutshell is what it is.

FRANKS:

You said it was a reasonable question, it was a reasonable answer, but I - I can't find that in the statute. Thank you sir.

GOODLATTE:

The Chair recognizes the gentlemen from Louisiana, Mr. Richmond for five minutes.

RICHMOND:

Thank you - thank you Mr. Chairman. Director Comey, and I'm - I'm going down a completely path, our law enforcement in this country have a consistent enemy in a group called Sovereign Citizen and what I have seen in my district, we lost two officers in St. John Parish about four years ago and we just lost another three officers in Baton Rouge with another couple injured.

In the case in St. John Parish, we actually had the perpetrators on the radar in North Louisiana and at some point they moved to South Louisiana in my district, and we lost contact.

So, when St. John Parish deputies went to their trailer park, they had no idea what they were walking into, and they walked into an ambush with AR-15s and AK-47s, and the unimaginable happened.

RICHMOND:

So through (inaudible) and other things, are you all focused on making sure -- and I think there are about a hundred thousand of them, but are you all focused on making sure that our law enforcement has the best information when dealing with whether it's sovereign citizen or terrorist cells or other bad actors, that that information gets to the locals so they're not surprised and ambushed?

COMEY:

Well, we sure -- we sure are. And I don't know the circumstances of that case, but I -- I will find out the circumstances, in -- in two respects. We want, obviously, people to know when someone's wanted.

But, more than that, we have a known or suspected terrorist file that is -- should have information in that about people we are worried about so that if an officer's making a stop or going up to execute a search warrant, and they run that address of that person, they'll get a hit on the -- what we call the KST file. So that's our objective and, if there are ways to make it better, we want -- we want to.

RICHMOND:

Now let's switch lanes a little bit because this is one of -- I think an issue, when we start talking about criminal justice reform and we start talking about the FBI in my community and communities of -- of color and with elected officials, there seems to be two standards.

One for low-level elected officials, and then one for other people. So I guess the facts I will give you in -- in some of our cases, and you tell me if it sounds inconsistent with your knowledge of the law and your protocol.

But non-profit organizations where elected officials have either been on boards or had some affiliation with, when those funds are used in a manner that benefits them personally, they have been prosecuted. And I mean for amounts that range from anywhere from $2,000 upwards to $100,000.

Your interpretation of the law that, if a non-profit funds are used to benefit a person and not the organization, that that is a theft of funds. Because I believe that those are a lot of the charges that I have seen in my community. Would you agree with that?

COMEY:

Sure, could be, and I know from personal experience, having done these cases, that's often -- that's at the center of a case involving a corrupt official.

RICHMOND:

Now, let's take elected official out, and just take any foundation director or board director or executive director who would use the funds of a non-profit to pay personal debts or bills, or just takes money. You would agree that that would constitute a violation of the law? Criminal statute?

COMEY:

Potentially. On the federal side, potentially of wire fraud, mail fraud, or a tax charge. Potentially.

RICHMOND:

The -- the other thing that I would say is that, in our community we feel that it's selective prosecution. That if you're rich, you have another standard. That if you're an African-American, you have another standard.

And there are a number of cases that I will give you off line, but it appears that, and my concern, is the authority of your agents to decide that a person is bad, and then take them through holy hell to try to get to the ultimate conclusion that the agent made, and they don't let the facts get in their way.

RICHMOND:

And at the end of the day, you have business people who spend hundreds of thousand dollars to protect their reputation and to fight a charge that they ultimately win. But now they are broke, they're defeated, because when it comes out it says the United States of America versus you.

So I would just ask you to create a mindset within the department that they understand the consequences of leaks to the press, charges, and what happens if - when those charges are really not substantiated, you still break a person.

And I think that you all have a responsibility to be very careful with the awesome power that you all are given.

And with that, Mr. Chairmen, I think back - I yield back.

GOODLATTE:

Thanks, gentlemen. The director is welcome to respond if he...

COMEY:

I very much agree with what you said, congressman, at the end of that. The power to investigate is the power to ruin. Obviously charging people is -can also be ruinous.

So, it's when we have to be extraordinarily prudent in exercising fair, open minded and careful. So, I - I very much agree with that.

GOODLATTE:

The Chairman recognizes the gentlemen from Michigan, Mr. Trott for five minutes.

TROTT:

Thank you Mr. Chairman, and thank you Director for being here. And thank you for your service to our country.

And you - when you made your statement at the press conference on July 5, you said, "I have not coordinated or reviewed this statement in any way with the Department of Justice or any part of the government. They do not know what I'm about to say."

I have no reason to question your integrity, but is there any chance that someone working in your office or as part of this investigation knew what you were going to decide and recommend, and maybe told one of the Attorney General's staff what was about to - to happen on July 5?

COMEY:

Look, anything's possible. I - I would - I think I'd be willing to bet my life that didn't happen just because I know my folks.

TROTT:

So, here's why I ask. The facts give me pause. Investigation started in July of '15, many of us in Congress, including myself, suggested that the Attorney General should recuse herself because of her friendship with the Clinton's and because of her desire to continue on as Attorney General on a Clinton Administration.

Then she had the fortuitous meeting on the airplane with former President Clinton on June 30. Then on July 2 give or take, she came out and said, "You know, I've created an appearance of impropriety. And so I'm going to just follow whatever the FBI Director's recommendation is."

And then three days later, you had your press conference. And in your press conference you said, "In our system of justice, the prosecutors make the decisions about what charges are appropriate based on the evidence."

That's not what happened in this case. Ultimately you made the decision. Is that what happened?

COMEY:

I made public my recommendation. The decision to decline the was made at - at the Justice Department.

TROTT:

But - but before - before you had that press conference, you knew based on the Attorney General's public comments that she was going to follow whatever you recommended.

So, ultimately you made the decision in this case as to whether or not charges should be filed - filed against Secretary Clinton. Isn't - isn't that the reality of what happened?

COMEY:

I think that's a fair characterization. The only thing I'd add to that is I think she said - I don't remember exactly - that she would defer to the FBI and the career prosecutors at the Department of Justice.

But look, I knew that once I made public the FBI's view, that this wasn't a prosecutable case, that there was virtually zero chance that the Department of Justice was going to go in a different direction. But part of my decision was based on my prediction that there was the Department of Justice would prosecute on these facts in any event.

So, I think your characterization is fair, but I just wanted to add that - that color to it.

TROTT:

But see how some of us would look at the - the dates and the facts leading up to your press conference. And - and think OK, for a year we've been suggesting she's not the appropriate person to make the ultimate decision as to whether charges should be filed. She won't recuse herself.

And then three days before you come out with your recommendation, which she's already said she's going to follow, she basically decides to recuse herself. Those facts give me pause.

COMEY:

Yeah, I get why folks would ask about that. But I actually think it's - there are two dates that matter.

I think but what generated that was the - the controversy around her meeting with President Clinton, not - not the - the interview with Secretary Clinton.

TROTT:

That's - that's a whole 'nother discussion. So, let's - let's talk about Cheryl Mills.

So, you've said earlier today that it really wasn't up to you to weigh in on whether there's a conflict for Ms. Mills to act as Secretary Clinton's lawyer in the interview. But again, you're kinda taking your attorney hat on and off whenever it's convenient.

TROTT:

You - you - you decided that at the beginning of that interview, it was appropriate for you weigh in as a lawyer suggesting there was a conflict.

But then again, your recommendation is ultimately as a lawyer what's being done in this case. You see a little bit of inconsistency there or no?

COMEY:

No, I see the point about - look, I'd rather not have an attorney hat on at any time. I put it on because I thought that was what was necessary at the conclusion of this investigation but I stand by that. The agents of the FBI, it's not to them to try and kick out someone's lawyer.

TROTT:

What would've happened if you'd said Ms. Mills, because of the history here, you can't be in this interview?

COMEY:

I don't know. I don't know.

TROTT:

Could you have said that to her?

COMEY:

I guess you could. It would be well outside our normal role.

TROTT:

So, a number of times today you've said it really is no double standard and so now I'm just asking you as a citizen and not even in your capacity as director FBI.

Can you sort of see why a lot of Americans are bothered by a perceived double standard because if any of the gentlemen sitting behind you this morning, I assume (ph) are with the department, had done some of the things Ms. Clinton did and told some of the lies that she told, you said in your statement that this is not just under similar circumstances, there wouldn't be consequences.

In fact, there would be - they'd be subjected to administrative sanctions.

And now we have an election going on where she's seeking a pretty big promotion so maybe your point is she wouldn't be charged under similar facts but can you sort of see why so many people are bothered by the facts in this case given that really nothing happened to her and now she's running for president of the United States? I mean, just - can you see the - the optics on that are troubling?

COMEY:

Oh, I totally get that. That's one of the reasons I'm trying to answer as many questions as I can because I get that question but again, folks need to realize in the FBI if you did this you'd be in huge trouble. I'm certain of that. You'd be disciplined in some serious way, you might be fired. I'm also certain you would not be prosecuted criminally on these facts. Those are two different things.

TROTT:

And you've said that. I appreciate that tell me (ph) just as one quick question because I'm out of time, but Mr. Bishop started to talk about this and his district is affected as well in Michigan but my district in southeast Michigan has the third largest settlement of Syrian refugees of any city in the country behind San Diego and Chicago. That's Troy, Michigan.

And you said last Fall in front of a homeland security committee hearing that you really didn't have the data to properly vet the Syrian refugees that are trying to come in and you said that again this morning but, you know, last weekend I'm at a grocery store and a Starbucks and two different constituents walked up to me and said "can't you stop the president's resettlement of Syrian refugees into Troy Michigan? We're all afraid."

And they're based on, largely, your comment that we don't have the database to really vet these folks. Anything I can tell the folks back in Michigan that we're doing other than - all I say now is "we just have to wait for a new president because this president has increased the number of refugees by 60 and 30 percent year over year the last two years. We just have to wait for a new president."

I'd like to be able to say "the FBI is doing something different than they were doing last year when you made those comments."

COMEY:

Well, as I said earlier, they can know that we are - if there is a whiff about this person, somewhere in the U.S. government's vast holdings, we will find it. And the second thing they can know is if we get a whiff about somebody once they're in, we're going to cover that in a pretty tight way. What I can't promise people is that if - I can't query what's not in our holdings. That's the only reservation I offer to people.

TROTT:

Thank you, sir. I yield back.

GOODLATTE:

Director Comey, during questioning earlier there was a dispute that arose over the contents of one or more of the immunity letters that were issued particularly with regard to the issue of whether or not it contained immunity for destroying documents, e- mails.

The individual who was questioning you about that was chairman - former Chairman Issa of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee and I want him to be able to clarify because we have contacted the Department of Justice and asked them to read the immunity letters to us.

So, the gentleman's recognized briefly.

ISSA:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'll try to be very brief. Under the immunity agreement with one or more individuals, we'll use Cheryl Mills as, clearly, one of the individuals. She negotiated a very, very good deal from what we can discover.

She did not just receive immunity related to the production of the drive, the computer, and the contents but in fact received immunity under 70 - 793, 18 USC 793 E and F. 1924 - USC 19 - 18 USC 1924 and, so called, David Petraeus portion 18 USC 2071.

And I'll focus on 2071. Her immunity is against any and all taking, destruction, or even obstruction, the way we read it, of documents classified or unclassified.

Now, the only question I have for you is - and I know you're going to put this to Justice and we may have to ask them separately - for the purposes of what you needed as an investigator because you were the person that wanted access to the computer, is that deal make any sense to in return for things which she could have objected to as an attorney and held back, but which had no know proffer of leading to some criminal indictment of somebody else.

She received complete immunity, as we read it, from obstruction or destruction of documents classified and unclassified and that's based on a re-review of the immunity agreement.

COMEY:

I think you're right. This is a question best addressed to Justice but I think you're misunderstanding it. As I understand it, this was a promise in writing from the Department of Justice if you give us the laptops, we will not use anything on the laptops directly against you in a prosecution for that list of offenses.

It's not immunity for those offenses if there's some other evidence. Now, that said, I'm not exactly sure why her lawyer asked for it because by that point in the investigation we didn't have a case on her to begin with.

ISSA:

Well, I understand that but based on the read it (ph) discovery and others, the they asked me to do it and you said so yourself it was probably Cheryl Mill, the they. You have a - an immune witness who has to tell you who they were.

If the they were told me to delete and that's Cheryl Mills then, in fact, you have evidence from an immune witness of a crime perpetrated by Cheryl Mills, the ordering of the destruction of any document classified or unclassified which clearly she seems to have done.

COMEY:

She wouldn't be protected from that. If we developed evidence that she had obstructed justice in some fashion, all she's protected from is we can't use as evidence something that's on the laptop she gave us.

ISSA:

So, with the...

COMEY:

...We can still prosecute her.

ISSA:

Right, so the information put into the record today which included these read it (ph) discoveries show that there is a they who asked to have the destruction of information under 18 USC 2071.

If she doesn't have immunity for that order, she could and, by definition, should be charged because ordering somebody else to destroy something as an attorney well after there were subpoenas in place that were very specific, that's clearly a willful act, isn't it?

JACKSON LEE:

Mr. Chairman, would you yield?

ISSA:

Of course.

JACKSON LEE:

Your line of questioning. First, let me show my cards. I believe that Cheryl Mills has an impeccable character as my line of questioning suggested that Director Comey and his staff have impeccable character. But my good friend, there's immunity given.

I don't think this applies to Ms. Mills and I looked at the sections that you're speaking of. If you take local, criminal, and state actions given to the worst of characters for variety of reasons, that was not the reason given to Ms. Mills.

I am assured that it is a lawyer that was trying to be the most effective council to Ms. Mills as possible.

ISSA:

Reclaiming my time, Gentle lady's point may be true. I'm only speaking to the director based on things were done that should not have been done. We now have evidence in front of this committee in the record of people destroying records of activities as late as a few days ago.

So, the fact that there still should be an open question, first of all, is could she be prosecuted and if in fact the they have told me to destroy this under the exact same statute that included David Petraeus' who was no longer on active duty, 18 USC 2071, there's at least a case to be made.

Now, the problem we have is the lawyer negotiated a set of terms which hopefully doesn't mean that she gets a free pass even if she willfully ordered the destruction of documents which it does appear she did.

And look, I'm - my job is not to - to be judge, jury, or hangman. My job is to look at what's been presented to us, ask the highest law enforcement officer in the land to, in fact, look into it because it does appear as though it is there.

JACKSON LEE:

A brief yield, my good friend.

ISSA:

Of course.

JACKSON LEE:

Certainly, we have a oversight responsibility of the director, I think he's been very forthright. But none of the actions of destruction can be attributed - I don't think we have anything in evidence to suggest that Ms. Mills contributed to the dictating or directing any destruction --

ISSA:

-- Well the gentle lady - the gentle lady may not have been here...

JACKSON LEE:

-- We can't speculate here.

ISSA:

The gentle lady may not have been here at the time but the director himself, when asked who would the they would have been in that order to destroy, at least said it probably was or likely could have been Cheryl Mills. We're not saying it is. What we're saying is you have an immune witness.

GOODLATTE:

The gentlemen will suspend.

ISSA:

Of course.

GOODLATTE:

The purpose of this was to set the record straight as to what the content of the document was. That has been accomplished and the debate will continue on -

JACKSON LEE:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

GOODLATTE:

Will continue on outside of this hearing room.

JACKSON LEE:

I only state (ph) we cannot speculate...

ISSA:

-- And I would only ask (ph) - and I would only ask that the director be able to review those documents at Justice (ph) and follow up with the committee, would be very helpful to all of us. I thank the chairman.

GOODLATTE:

The director has answered in the affirmative that he will do that.

COMEY:

Yes. We'll follow up.

GOODLATTE:

First of all, I want to thank Diretor Comey. We didn't make four hours and 40 minutes but we did almost make four hours and I know you've been generous with your time.

However, I will also say that I think a lot of the questions here indicate a great deal of concern about the manner in which this investigation was conducted, how the conclusions were drawn, and the close proximity to that and the meeting of the attorney general with former President Clinton on a tarmac at the same time she then said, well, I'm going to recuse myself and then shortly after that, you took over and announced your conclusions in this case which are hotly disputed as you can tell.

The committee and the oversight of government reform (ph) committee have referred to the United States attorney for the eastern district of - for the District of Columbia.

Referral based upon her testimony before the select committee on Benghazi suggesting that your statement at your press conference and your testimony before the oversight and government reform (ph) committee very clearly contradicted a number of statements she made under oath before that committee and I want to stress to you how important I think it is that we made that referral for the purpose of making sure that no one is above the law.

And in many cases regarding investigations, it is not just the underlying actions that are important but they are the efforts of people to cover those up through perjury, through obstruction of justice, through destruction of documents and so I would ask that this matter be taken very, very seriously as you pursue whatever actions the department chooses to take making sure that no one is above the law.

COMEY:

Thank you, sir.

GOODLATTE:

With that, that concludes today's hearing and I thank our distinguished witnesses for attending. Without objection, all members will have five legislative days to submit additional written questions for the witness or additional materials for the record and the hearing is adjourned.

The U.S. Intelligence Community (USIC) is confident that the Russian Government directed the recent compromises of e-mails from US persons and institutions, including from US political organizations. The recent disclosures of alleged hacked e-mails on sites like DCLeaks.com and WikiLeaks and by the Guccifer 2.0 online persona are consistent with the methods and motivations of Russian-directed efforts. These thefts and disclosures are intended to interfere with the US election process. Such activity is not new to Moscow—the Russians have used similar tactics and techniques across Europe and Eurasia, for example, to influence public opinion there. We believe, based on the scope and sensitivity of these efforts, that only Russia's senior-most officials could have authorized these activities.

Some states have also recently seen scanning and probing of their election-related systems, which in most cases originated from servers operated by a Russian company. However, we are not now in a position to attribute this activity to the Russian Government. The USIC and the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) assess that it would be extremely difficult for someone, including a nation-state actor, to alter actual ballot counts or election results by cyber attack or intrusion. This assessment is based on the decentralized nature of our election system in this country and the number of protections state and local election officials have in place. States ensure that voting machines are not connected to the Internet, and there are numerous checks and balances as well as extensive oversight at multiple levels built into our election process.

Nevertheless, DHS continues to urge state and local election officials to be vigilant and seek cybersecurity assistance from DHS. A number of states have already done so. DHS is providing several services to state and local election officials to assist in their cybersecurity. These services include cyber "hygiene" scans of Internet-facing systems, risk and vulnerability assessments, information sharing about cyber incidents, and best practices for securing voter registration databases and addressing potential cyber threats. DHS has convened an Election Infrastructure Cybersecurity Working Group with experts across all levels of government to raise awareness of cybersecurity risks potentially affecting election infrastructure and the elections process. Secretary Johnson and DHS officials are working directly with the National Association of Secretaries of State to offer assistance, share information, and provide additional resources to state and local officials.

McConnell, Schumer elected to top spots in Senate ahead of battles with Trump

By Ted Barrett and Tom LoBianco, CNN

Updated 10:49 AM ET, Wed November 16, 2016

http://www.cnn.com/2016/11/16/politics/senate-republican-democratic-leaders/index.html

Washington (CNN)Republicans re-elected Mitch McConnell as Senate Majority Leader Wednesday while Democrats tapped Chuck Schumer as their leader as both sides prepare for critical battles with the incoming Trump administration.
McConnell was formally nominated by Sen. Marco Rubio and freshman Sen. Todd Young of Indiana -- a nod to his extensive efforts in both states which helped him keep their majority.

McConnell, the Kentucky Republican, led the successful effort to hold the Senate Republicans and was rewarded with an easy victory in a private meeting with his caucus.

Schumer's ascension was coordinated well before the election, but some veteran Democrats moved into new roles that will prove critical as Trump plies lawmakers next year. He will serve as Trump's chief antagonist in the new Congress.

Democrats also formally added Vermont independent Bernie Sanders to their ranks — a clear nod to his success in the campaign and the strains within the party moving forward.
"We are ready to go toe to toe with Republicans," Schumer told reporters, noting that Democrats "can't flinch and can't ignore" results of election.

Senate Democrats picked up two seats last week, but it was just shy of enough to win the majority.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a long-serving California Democrat, will take over her party's top seat on the Judiciary Committee -- putting her in place to lead the fight against any Trump nominee for the Supreme Court. Veteran Judiciary member Patrick Leahy, of Vermont, will head to the Senate Appropriations Committee.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON INTELLIGENCE
WASHINGTON, DC 20510-6475

November 21, 2016

The Honorable James Comey
Director
Federal Bureau of Investigation
935 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW
Washington, DC 20535-0001

Dear Director Comey,

As you know, the Office of the Director of National Intelligence and the Department of Homeland Security released the following statement on October 7th:

> "The U.S. Intelligence Community (USIC) is confident that the Russian Government directed the recent compromises of e-mails from US persons and institutions, including from US political organizations. The recent disclosures of alleged hacked e-mails on sites like DCLeaks.com and WikiLeaks and by the Guccifer 2.0 online persona are consistent with the methods and motivations of Russian-directed efforts. These thefts and disclosures are intended to interfere with the US election process."

Furthermore, earlier this week, Admiral Mike Rogers, Director of the NSA, said that,

> "There shouldn't be any doubt in anybody's minds, this was not something that was done casually, this was not something that was done by chance, this was not a target that was selected purely arbitrarily. This was a conscious effort by a nation-state to attempt to achieve a specific effect."

This is profoundly troubling for obvious reasons. However, the above is even more concerning in light of recent comments made by Russia's Deputy Foreign Minister Sergei Ryabkov about extensive contacts, during the campaign, between the Russian Government and the Trump campaign team:

> "There were contacts. We are doing this and have been doing this during the election campaign. Obviously, we know most of the people from [Trump's] entourage. Those people have always been in the limelight in the United States and have occupied high-ranking positions. I cannot say that all of them, but quite a few have been staying in touch with Russian representatives."

Press reporting from CNN indicates that, "The FBI has been conducting multiple investigations of alleged connections between Russia and Donald Trump, his presidential campaign or its backers."

In turn we are writing to formally ask you:

- What is, or has been, the extent of the FBI investigations into the Trump campaign's connection to, or communications with, the Russian government?

- What is the FBI's current assessment of the connections between the Trump campaign and the Russian government?

We request a written response, appropriately classified, before your roundtable meeting with the Intelligence Committee on December 1st. We look forward to discussing this, and other relevant issues, with you at that time.

Thank you for your attention to this matter.

Sincerely,

Senator Dianne Feinstein
Vice Chairman

Senator Mark Warner

I've attached a news article below for SA, also.

This is from the Senate bill (Cotton proposal). Note FBI role:

TITLE V--MATTERS RELATING TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES

SEC. 501. COMMITTEE TO COUNTER ACTIVE MEASURES BY THE RUSSIAN FEDERATION TO EXERT COVERT INFLUENCE

OVER PEOPLES AND GOVERNMENTS.

(a) Definitions- In this section:

(1) ACTIVE MEASURES BY RUSSIA TO EXERT COVERT INFLUENCE- The term `active measures by Russia to exert covert influence' means activities intended to influence a person or government that are carried out in coordination with, or at the behest of, political leaders or the security services of the Russian Federation and the role of the Russian Federation has been hidden or not acknowledged publicly, including the following:

(A) Establishment or funding of a front group.

(B) Covert broadcasting.

(C) Media manipulation.

(D) Disinformation and forgeries.

(E) Funding agents of influence.

(F) Incitement and offensive counterintelligence.

(G) Assassinations.

(H) Terrorist acts.

(2) APPROPRIATE COMMITTEES OF CONGRESS- The term `appropriate committees of Congress' means--

(A) the congressional intelligence committees;

(B) the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate; and

(C) the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives.

(b) Establishment- There is established within the executive branch an interagency committee to counter active measures by the Russian Federation to exert covert influence.

(c) Membership-

(1) IN GENERAL-

(A) APPOINTMENT- Each head of an agency or department of the United States Government set out under subparagraph (B) shall appoint one member of the committee established by subsection (b) from among officials of such agency or department who occupy a position that is required to be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

(B) HEAD OF AN AGENCY OR DEPARTMENT- The head of an agency or department of the United States Government set out under this subparagraph are the following:

(i) The Director of National Intelligence.

(ii) The Secretary of State.

(iii) The Secretary of Defense.

(iv) The Secretary of the Treasury.

(v) The Attorney General.

(vi) The Secretary of Energy.

(vii) The Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

(viii) The head of any other agency or department of the United States Government designated by the President for purposes of this section.

(d) Meetings- The committee shall meet on a regular basis.

(e) Duties- The duties of the committee established by subsection (b) shall be as follows:

(1) To counter active measures by Russia to exert covert influence, including by exposing falsehoods, agents of influence, corruption, human rights abuses, terrorism, and assassinations carried out by the security services or political elites of the Russian Federation or their proxies.

(2) Such other duties as the President may designate for purposes of this section.

(f) Staff- The committee established by subsection (b) may employ such staff as the members of such committee consider appropriate.

(g) Budget Request- A request for funds required for the functioning of the committee established by subsection (b) may be included in each budget for a fiscal year submitted by the President pursuant to section 1105(a) of title 31, United States Code.

(h) Annual Report-

(1) REQUIREMENT- Not later than 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, and annually thereafter, and consistent with the protection of intelligence sources and methods, the committee established by subsection (b) shall submit to the appropriate committees of Congress a report describing steps being taken by the committee to counter active measures by Russia to exert covert influence.

(2) MATTERS INCLUDED- Each report under paragraph (1) shall include a summary of the following:

(A) Active measures by Russia to exert covert influence during the previous year, including significant incidents and notable trends.

(B) Key initiatives of the committee.

(C) Implementation of the committee's initiatives by the heads of the agencies and departments of the United States Government specified in subsection (c)(1)(B).

(D) Analysis of the success of such initiatives.

(E) Changes to such initiatives from the previous year.

(3) SEPARATE REPORTING REQUIREMENT- The requirement to submit an annual report under paragraph (1) is in addition to any other reporting requirements with respect to Russia.

US legislation proposes new committee to counteract Russian 'covert influence'

Congress set to review bills to authorize intelligence body to oppose Russian interference and propaganda, which could be at odds with Trump administration

The Guardian

Spencer Ackerman in New York and Julian Borger in Washington

https://www.theguardian.com/us-news/2016/nov/30/sweeping-us-laws-targeting-russian-interference-could-ensnare-trump?CMP=Share_AndroidApp_Gmail

A provision in intelligence legislation that is going through Congress would create a new high-level body aimed at thwarting covert Russian political interference around the world, potentially placing it at odds with the incoming Donald Trump administration.

The measure, tucked into the fiscal 2017 House and Senate bills authorizing US intelligence operations, would create a powerful new committee across the security services to oppose Russian destabilization measures and propaganda domestically and worldwide.

Its mission – defined broadly and without geographic limitation – is to “counter active measures by the Russian Federation to exert covert influence over peoples and governments”, according to the texts of both the House and the Senate bills, both of which have won the approval of their intelligence committees.

It was first published in June – long before Trump's election, and his tilt toward Moscow, seemed likely. Such a broad brief could in theory lead to a probe into allegations of ties between Trump's circle and Moscow, and of Russian attempts to skew the outcome of the presidential vote by hacking Democratic party headquarters and leaking emails, and helping spread fake news.

"If indeed there are ties between the Russian government – and in particular intelligence agents – and people who have worked for Trump or continue to work for Trump, an investigation of this breadth could conceivably pick up information regarding Russia's attempts or success in influencing American citizens working for Donald Trump," said Evelyn Farkas, who from 2012 to 2015 was US deputy assistant secretary of defense for Russia, Ukraine and Eurasia.

However, after 20 January, the proposed committee would be staffed largely by Trump appointees. As framed in the legislation it would consist of representatives handpicked by the leadership of the FBI, State Department, Pentagon, office of the director of national intelligence, Justice Department, Treasury Department, the 16 intelligence agencies and any other agency the president designates.

Specifically, the high-level committee would be tasked with "exposing falsehoods, agents of influence, corruption, human rights abuses, terrorism and assassinations carried out by the security services or political elites of the Russian Federation or their proxies".

Yet its work would not be necessarily limited to exposing such activity. It can be broadened to include "such other duties as the president may designate", a vague and potentially expansive mandate.

Capitol Hill sources said the House version could receive a floor vote as soon as Wednesday, with the Senate version likely to follow in a matter of weeks, before the current legislative session expires. Intelligence authorization bills rarely fail to pass when brought up for votes.

Obama administration officials declined to comment on the bill, but the White House is known to have expressed opposition to the provision on the grounds it would require the president to establish a committee that would duplicate the work of other agencies. It is unclear if the White House would veto a bill that blesses a plethora of other intelligence activities over the measure.

The Trump transition team did not respond to requests for comment.

Congressional sources, who were not cleared to speak for the record, indicated that the measure originated with Richard Burr, the North Carolina Republican who chairs the Senate intelligence committee. Burr, who won re-election earlier this month after a tight contest, said during his campaign: "There's not a separation between me and Donald Trump." A spokeswoman, Rebecca Glover Watkins, said she did not know if Burr's office authored the provision and declined further comment.

Trump has signaled a new warmth toward Russia's President Vladimir Putin.

During the campaign Trump withstood repeated criticism for being a Kremlin "puppet", in rival Hillary Clinton's phrase, susceptible to former KGB agent Putin's flattery.

His surrogates excised a measure from the Republican party platform that called for the US to arm Ukraine against Russian and Russian-backed separatist forces. Trump's former campaign manager, Paul Manafort, had earlier helped elect a pro-Russian Ukrainian as president.

After Trump's election, the Kremlin said "a strong and enduring relationship with Russia and the people of Russia" was anticipated after a 14 November phone call between the two leaders. Putin's spokesman, Dmitry Peskov, said Putin and Trump hold "phenomenally similar" foreign policy perspectives.

John McCain, the Arizona Republican who chairs the Senate armed services committee, has warned Trump against believing Putin is open to a substantive US partnership.

"We should place as much faith in such statements as any other made by a former KGB agent who has plunged his country into tyranny, murdered his political opponents, invaded his neighbors, threatened America's allies and attempted to undermine America's elections," McCain said on 15 November.

The bill would also restrict Russian diplomats from traveling more than 50 miles from official embassies and consulates without the effective permission of the FBI director. Apart from a report in Buzzfeed, the provisions in the bill attracted little media attention in the spring when they won committee approval.

Capitol Hill sources said it was highly unlikely the GOP would strip the anti-Russian provision from the intelligence authorization bill when it came to the floor.

Farkas, now a non-resident senior fellow at the Atlantic Council, said an administration hostile to the provision might bury the committee in the bureaucracy where it could be neutralized.

"They can neutralize the legislation by taking a broad interpretation of what is required to meet the language in the statute," Farkas said.

The legislation, though, provides alerts for Congress should the Trump administration marginalize the committee. It requires an annual report to key congressional panels on anti-Russian efforts stemming from the committee – including McCain's – as well as a public report on "active measures by Russia to exert covert influence over the previous year, including significant incidents and notable trends".

Mike: This is a strange article.

The next FBI headquarters, a $2 billion project, could be built by a Trump associate

By Jonathan O'Connell

December 2 at 9:00 AM

Two billionaire New York City developers bidding to build a new headquarters for the FBI — maybe the largest government development since the CIA moved to Langley in Northern Virginia in 1961 — have deep ties with President-elect Donald Trump, whose victory injects new intrigue into the jockeying for the more than $2 billion project.

One, Steven Roth, served as an economic adviser to Trump's presidential campaign and co-owns a building with him in Manhattan. Another, Larry Silverstein, has been referred to by Trump as a "friend of mine."

Roth and Silverstein have both known Trump for more than 30 years. They have been rivals on some projects and cheerleaders on others.

Trump considered bidding on the FBI project himself before running for the presidency; the current FBI headquarters on Pennsylvania Avenue is near his new Washington hotel.

And then there's this wrinkle: The man who has lobbied hardest for a new campus, FBI Director James B. Comey, had his own role in the presidential campaign in publicly extending the investigation into Hillary Clinton's use of a private email server as secretary of state less than two weeks before Election Day.

FBI officials are nearing the finish line on a decade-long push for a secure campus in the Washington suburbs. The contract attracted some of the most prominent developers on the East Coast. And the winning development team not only would receive more than $1 billion in federal appropriations to foot the cost of a new campus but also would win control of the current FBI headquarters property, considered a once-in-a-generation development opportunity in downtown Washington.

Trump is the first commercial real estate mogul turned U.S. president. Federal real estate experts say the president does not typically get personally involved in specific projects even of this magnitude, leaving such decisions to contracting officials. It would be unusual for Trump to play a role.

A Trump spokeswoman declined to comment.

Roth is founder and chairman of Vornado Realty Trust, which acquired a mutual stake with Trump in a 2 million-square-foot Manhattan building in 2007 and has partnered in multiple commercial properties with Trump's son-in-law Jared Kushner.

Trump named Roth as an economic advisers on his campaign. During his victory speech after winning the New York presidential primary in April, Trump gestured to Roth from the stage and said he had recently called Roth to congratulate him on one of his projects, 220 Central Park South.

"It's a tremendous success," Trump said. "I said, 'Steve, congratulations on the building.' He said, 'Donald, it's nothing compared to what's happening with you.'"

Silverstein, who founded his development company in 1957, has developed, owned or managed 40 million square feet of commercial real estate.

Trump proposed building two office towers with Silverstein at the former World Trade Center site four years after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

At the time, Trump called Silverstein "a great guy, a good guy ... a friend of mine" in an interview on MSNBC, though they have also feuded on occasion.

For years, FBI leaders have argued that their current headquarters, the dated J. Edgar Hoover Building on Pennsylvania Avenue NW, falls short of the security and operational needs of a modern crime-fighting agency.

As a precaution, most of the entrances were sealed after the 1995 bombing of a federal building in Oklahoma City. The FBI building is in such rough shape that netting hangs on the building's east facade to prevent pieces of concrete from falling onto the sidewalk.

In response to Republican spending constraints, the Obama administration has proposed an unconventional trade: offer the Hoover site to a builder as a way of helping to pay for a new campus in Greenbelt or Landover in Maryland or in Springfield, Va. The location will be selected at the same time as the developer.

Congress, led by House Republicans, is slated to consider the property swap in coming weeks as part of a $1.7 billion appropriation request for the FBI headquarters from the Obama administration. That is in addition to $390 million that was previously appropriated.

The General Services Administration, which manages federal real estate, is scheduled to choose a development team and campus location in March. The bidding process calls for a panel of government officials with relevant expertise to make the selection.

It would be highly unusual for a president to intervene, said Robert A. Peck, a GSA official who oversaw the Public Buildings Service when Trump was selected for the hotel project.

"The FBI needs a new headquarters, " he said. "Presumably these guys are pro-law-enforcement and, whatever Comey did, these guys are interested in security, and that's what they will focus on."

The GSA has not disclosed the names of a list of approved bidders for the project, but officials and executives say four teams are finalists – those backed by the two New Yorkers and teams headed by Boston Properties of Massachusetts and the Peterson Cos. of Fairfax.

Each is permitted to offer proposals for multiple sites. Officials at those companies declined to comment.

Before running for office, Trump considered pursuing the project. After he won the deal to develop Washington's Old Post Office Pavilion into a luxury hotel in 2013, he told The Washington Post that he and his daughter Ivanka would be "watching the FBI as to what's going to happen" with the deal.

"When I talked with him, he wanted to talk about the FBI building. That was what was on his mind," said Dorothy Robyn, a former real estate official at the Pentagon and the GSA, recalling a conversation at the time. "He talked about how he might submit a proposal to be the developer. I didn't know if it was bluster or not, but he was definitely thinking about it."

Comey has made his case on Capitol Hill for the headquarters project and keeps a piece of broken concrete from the Hoover building's facade in his office as a reminder of the need to upgrade.

During the campaign, Comey first drew Trump's ire for not pursuing criminal charges over Clinton's use of a private email server. But Trump later praised him when he eschewed Justice Department guidelines in disclosing a new review of her email just over a week before Election Day.

FBI spokeswoman Samantha Shero declined to speculate on Comey's relationship with the president-elect.

In a statement about the project, she said: "GSA and FBI have made significant progress on the procurement for the FBI's new Headquarters Consolidation Project. The teams have been working diligently together to meet the expected March date to select an awardee. If Congress provides the resources requested in the President's fiscal year 2017 budget request, we will be in a position to deliver a secure, consolidated headquarters for the FBI."

Because the Hoover building is across the street from Trump's new D.C. hotel, he could benefit financially from its redevelopment. Trump owns about three-quarters of the hotel project personally, but he has said that he will step away from his business interests when he takes office.

"Anything that moves redevelopment quickly could only help the area around it," said Neil O. Albert, president of the Downtown D.C. Business Improvement District, an association of downtown developers.

Roth supported Trump in the campaign. His firm, Vornado, is bidding in tandem with the JBG Cos. of Chevy Chase (which is also merging with Vornado's Washington unit). W. Matthew Kelly, who is slated to become chief executive of the new company, said in October that the firms' FBI proposal was a 50-50 split between Vornado and JBG.

Trump's history with Silverstein, chairman of Silverstein Properties and one of New York's most prolific developers, appears to have had its ups and downs.Four years after the 9/11 attacks, Trump proposed building two office towers at the site, where Silverstein owned development rights. He called the Silverstein-backed design for the site "the worst pile of crap architecture I have ever seen in my life."

Silverstein supported Clinton for president, but the day after the election, speaking at a New York real estate conference, he complimented Trump's leadership qualities. For the FBI project, Silverstein is bidding in partnership with Lerner Enterprises, headed by Washington Nationals owner Theodore N. Lerner.

Trump "works hard. He is highly focused when he wants to be," Silverstein said at the conference, according to Commercial Property Executive, a trade publication. "Knowing his determination, his drive, his commitment once he makes it ... will propel him to be the best president he can possibly be."

Robyn, who left the GSA two years ago, said that for the most part the FBI project has been "insulated from politics" and is moving forward.

"The FBI building is a train very, very far down the track," she said. "I think there's a lot of momentum and it's going to happen."

FOR YOUR SITUATIONAL AWARENESS, USE, and PREPARATION

Sirs,

The DOJ has confirmed the initial meeting with President-Elect's Transition Team (PETT) members will occur on Tuesday, December 6 from 2:30pm – 4:30pm at FBIHQ.

Attending will be [redacted] and [redacted] (NOTE: At the bottom of this email is a quick reminder of their respective backgrounds). We will work with FBI Security Division to ensure they are greeted at the Visitor entrance and escorted to the Director's Office area for the meeting. b6 b7C

DOJ has advised the meeting is anticipated to be more of a give-and-take discussion and not a formal one-way presentation. The expectation is they will meet with the Director and the senior "front office" management team (i.e., DD, ADD, CFO or other budget person). Additional meetings are anticipated in the future with senior staff about specific programs and activities.

DOJ encouraged us to be prepared to discuss at minimum the following during the meeting:

1. A high level overview of the organizational structure, budget, and hiring outlook/key vacancies
2. A copy of the organizational chart
3. Cover the primary mission roles and responsibilities, and where most of management time is focused
4. Reminder that the organization is all career except for the Director
5. Provide a high level picture of the budget and any key budget stresses
6. Mention any major upcoming work the FBI is anticipating
7. Any significant issues or challenges the incoming Administration will encounter or need to be aware of when they assume office
8. Use this time to let the PETT know what major issues FBI leadership sees for the organization

To support and prepare, we have worked with DADD Castor, RPO and the Finance. The 11x17 "FBI: At a Glance" handout has been proposed for use during this meeting along with a new 11x17 front and back handout prepared by Finance/RPO which contains high level budget and staffing information and the top 8 challenges on the one side and a copy of the FBI organizational chart on the other. Hard copies have been delivered to DADD Castor. Soft copies of each are included below. b6 b7C

Tech giants to huddle with Trump transition

By Tony Romm
| 12/06/16 06:20 PM EST

NEW YORK — President-elect Donald Trump's senior advisers have invited executives from tech giants including Apple, Facebook and Google to Trump Tower for a meeting next week to discuss the issues facing their industry, according to multiple sources familiar with the matter.

The Dec. 14 gathering – the most prominent outreach between Trump and Silicon Valley since the election – will bring the nascent administration face-to-face with an industry that Trump himself often skewered on the 2016 campaign trail.

Representing Trump will be Peter Thiel, the venture capitalist serving on Trump's transition team; Reince Priebus, the former head of the Republican National Committee and the incoming White House chief of staff; and Jared Kushner, Trump's son-in-law and adviser, according to a source with knowledge of the meeting, which was first reported Tuesday by POLITICO.

A spokesman for Thiel declined to comment, and a spokesman for Trump's transition effort did not respond to a request for comment.

A full list of tech participants has not been made public, but multiple sources indicated that top executives from Apple, Amazon, Facebook and Google have been invited. Oracle CEO Safra Catz – who met personally with the president-elect last month – will attend the meeting, another source said.

Spokespeople for Apple, Facebook and Oracle declined to comment. Spokespeople for Google, Amazon, Microsoft and Twitter did not immediately respond to requests.

A spokeswoman for Uber declined to say whether the ride-hailing app had received an invite. In a statement, she said that Uber is "not sending a representative to this particular meeting but of course, we will be engaging the Administration on issues that matter for our business."

For Trump, the outreach marks a dramatic shift from his approach to the tech industry during the 2016 campaign, when he frequently slammed companies like Apple and Amazon and their chief executives in strikingly harsh terms. Unlike his Democratic opponent, Hillary Clinton, Trump didn't cozy up to the Valley's elite, instead railing against major economic shifts -- like free trade, globalization and the movement of manufacturing jobs overseas -- that have fueled the tech sector's economic success.

Now that he's preparing to enter the White House, however, Trump is reaching out to the tech industry. Already, the president-elect has spoken with Apple CEO Tim Cook, he revealed in an interview with The New York Times last month.

As president, Trump will inherit a thicket of unresolved tech issues, like internet regulation, surveillance reform and the government's own use of technology -- and Thiel is handling much of that work in the transition. Spokespeople for some of Thiel's biggest investments, like SpaceX and Palantir, did not respond to questions as to whether they'd attend the meeting.

"At present, I think [Thiel] is the only person on the transition team with any real tech connections or tech credibility," said Garrett Johnson, the co-founder of SendHub who also runs the Lincoln Initiative, a Bay Area group that works with Republicans in the industry. "I would say he is the best gateway at present if anyone in the tech world wants to have a conversation with the transition or eventually the administration."

Trump: I don't believe Russia interfered with the election

By POLITICO Staff
| 12/07/16 09:01 AM EST

President-elect Donald Trump is freshly casting doubt on the idea that Russia was behind the election-related hacks into Democratic entities, and said the conclusion by U.S. agencies that the Kremlin paid a role was politically driven.

“I don't believe it. I don't believe they interfered,” Trump said in an interview with Time magazine, which named him person of the year.

Trump has steadfastly refused to say that Russian President Vladimir Putin or his agencies played any role in the hack of the Democratic National Committee and the private email account of John Podesta, Hillary Clinton's campaign chairman.

When asked by Time if the conclusion reached by U.S. officials was motivated by politics, Trump responded, “I think so.”

While it's unclear how much of an impact the intrusions had on the election outcome, the revelations proved embarrassing for the Democratic Party and cost DNC Chairwoman Debbie Wasserman Schultz her job at the top of the committee.

U.S. agencies in October formally accused Russia of hacking into American computers and meddling with the election process, but Putin pushed back against the notion and said discovering the actual culprit was “unimportant.”

Democrats are continuing to press for more information about the hacks. Party leaders are urging the Obama administration to provide a briefing on the matter, while Reps. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.) and Eric Swalwell (D-Calif.) plan to introduce legislation on Wednesday "to take action on evidence of foreign interference in the 2016 U.S. elections."

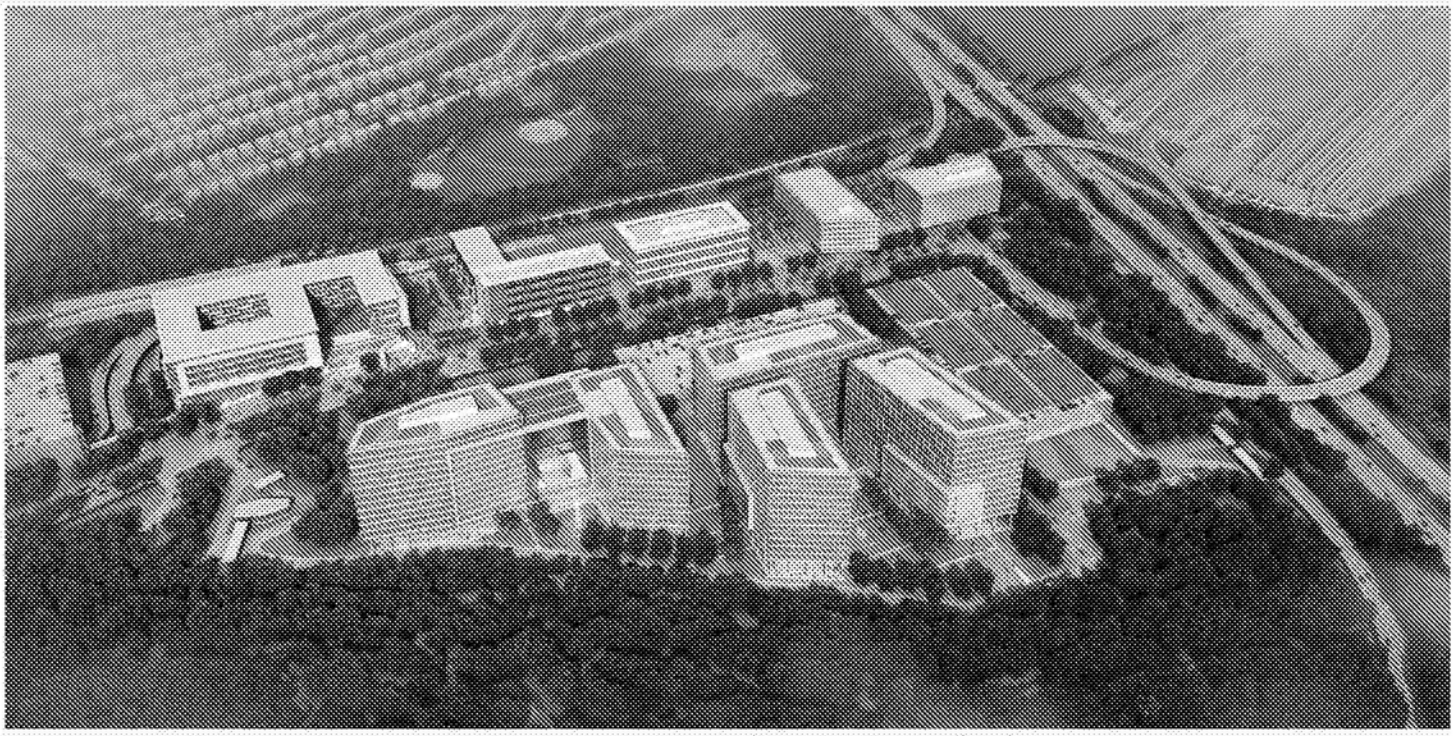
House panel approves FBI headquarters with focus on costs, Metro access



A proposed design for a new FBI headquarters in Greenbelt, one of three locations under consideration for the project. (Courtesy Penard Development/Gensler)

The FBI's effort to build a new 2.1 million-square-foot headquarters advanced Wednesday when members of the House approved the project, paving the way for Congress to fully fund it next year.

For more than a decade, the bureau has been pushing for a new campus in the Washington suburbs to replace the dilapidated J. Edgar Hoover Building in downtown D.C. Three sites are being considered, in Greenbelt, Springfield and Landover — with a decision expected in March.

A measure approved Wednesday by the House Transportation and Infrastructure Commmittee, chaired by Rep. Bill Shuster (R-Pa.), authorized $834 million for the project, part of $1.7 billion in appropriations requested by the Obama administration.

If approved by the full Congress, those dollars would add to $390 million that was previously appropriated.

The committee also reshaped the project with an eye on reducing costs and ensuring the project be accessible to public transit.

The committee capped appropriations for the project at $2.11 billion, not counting the costs of outfitting the new building or decommissioning the current one. The $2.11 billion also doesn't include the value of the Hoover Building, which the agency overseeing the project, the General Services Administration, has proposed trading to the company selected to build the project in an effort to offset the cost.

The GSA has not disclosed a list of approved bidders for the project, but officials and executives say four teams are finalists, including two associates of President-elect Donald Trump.

[The next FBI headquarters, a $2 billion project, could be built by a Trump associate]

The committee added two other stipulations to the funding measure. One requires that the administration consider the traffic impact of bringing the FBI's 11,000 headquarters employees from around the region to one location.

Transportation to the new headquarters became a top concern for locals after the GSA dramatically increased parking requirements and failed to prioritize Metro access, over the objections of federal planning officials at the National Capital Planning Commission. The measure specifically requires the GSA to consider NCPC's "recommendations on parking and proximity to Metro rail."

Another stipulation could dent the chances of the project moving to Springfield, where the site being considered is currently occupied by a secure CIA facility. Moving that would cost an estimated $210 million, and other site preparation to bring the FBI there would total $18 million, according to GSA estimates.

Under the resolution, the GSA would have to "consider the total costs to the government for relocations, site preparation and site acquisition" in making its selection.

Both changes were celebrated by Maryland officials, who chafed in particular at the possibility of Virginia gaining what they considered an unfair cost advantage for the Springfield site.

House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) said in a statement that the cost provision "requires GSA to consider the significant cost of relocation and site preparation of the Springfield site, which ought to be a serious concern for taxpayers."

"I advocated strongly for these provisions, and their inclusion ensures that the resolution is favorable for Maryland," he said.

No representative at the hearing raised Trump's potential conflict-of-interest in the project, given his closness with two of the bidders. But there remain concerns about whether the GSA ought to trade away the Hoover Building rather than sell it separately.

"I think pairing the two is stupid," said Rep. Peter A. DeFazio (D-Ore.) "It's certainly going to limit the number of people who are interested in constructing and bidding on the FBI headquarters. We will not get the full value for the downtown property."

Why law enforcement can't get ahead of 'Pizzagate' and other online conspiracy theories

By Matt Zapotosky

December 8 at 5:43 PM

The North Carolina man who took an assault rifle to a popular D.C. pizza joint to investigate a fictitious online rumor demonstrates a problem that has long vexed the FBI.

The Internet — a breeding ground for radical ideologies and bizarre conspiracy theories — can quickly move troubled souls to violence. And in an age when fake news is magnified by those with political and financial interests, the problem is getting harder to stop.

The bureau has in recent years made a priority of preventing Islamic State-inspired attacks, developing informants who can tip agents to plots before they happen and connecting the often Internet-radicalized plotters with people actually working for the FBI.

But the bizarre conspiracy theory that a child sex ring was operating underneath D.C.'s Comet Ping Pong restaurant — which spurred 28-year-old Edgar Maddison Welch to drive from North Carolina to launch his own violent investigation — would probably have registered as "barely a blip" on the bureau's radar, said Ron Hosko, a former FBI assistant director.

"There is so much to do that is tangible and real and fitting squarely within the bureau's jurisdiction and priorities," Hosko said. "There's not a lot of bandwidth for sort of these one-offs."

That is not to say online radicalization, in all its forms, is not a concern for federal law enforcement. Research has shown people who believe in conspiracy theories are more prone to violence. On Wednesday, for example, federal authorities in Florida announced they had indicted a Florida woman who they alleged threatened the parent of a child killed in the massacre at Sandy Hook Elementary School in Newtown, Conn.

The woman, 57-year-old Lucy Richards, was motivated to make her threats because she believed, incorrectly, "that the school shooting was a hoax and never happened," according to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Florida.

At an event earlier this year to mark the 10th anniversary of the Justice Department's National Security Division, FBI Director James B. Comey said agents were focused on a "much more disparate threat" that was "hard to see, unpredictable, motivated, and driven by people who are just disturbed and unpredictable even to those who would motivate them."

“Our daily job is finding needles in a haystack,” he said. “As I like to say, it's harder than that even. It's finding pieces of hay that may become a needle.”

The FBI declined to make an official available for an interview for this article.

The false theory that spurred Welch to action — that a child sex ring tied to Democratic presidential nominee Hillary Clinton and campaign chairman John Podesta was operating beneath Comet Ping Pong — spread through Twitter, 4chan and Reddit, and was magnified on Infowars by talk-show host Alex Jones. People came to refer to it by the hashtag “Pizzagate.”

The FBI and D.C. police assessed the claims and determined them to be false, according to a D.C. police spokesman and a federal law enforcement official. But the rumor nonetheless prompted threats and harassment of tthe shop and neighboring businesses on Connecticut Avenue, and some business owners said they were frustrated by law enforcement's response. A D.C. police spokesman said he was unaware of any threats Welch made himself.

There are several well-known examples of conspiracy theorists carrying out acts of violence. Robert Dear, who allegedly killed three people and wounded nine others in an attack on a Planned Parenthood facility in Colorado, told a neighbor that he believed the government was “trying to kill everybody.” A Twitter account linked to one of the Boston Marathon bombers seemed to espouse the view that the terrorist attack of Sept. 11, 2001, was an “inside job.” In a more recent case, the FBI arrested a Milwaukee man, Samy Mohamed Hamzeh, who the agency alleged was plotting a mass shooting at a Masonic temple and believed Masons were “playing with the world like a game.”

Joseph Uscinski, an associate professor at the University of Miami and a co-author of “American Conspiracy Theories,” said research has shown “people who have a very conspiratorial mind-set tend to be more accepting of violence than people who don't have a conspiratorial mind-set, but it's not by much.”

Fake news and conspiracy theories have other pernicious effects. The Russian government, for example, reportedly tried to spread false materials online to affect the election. At the National Security Division event earlier this year, Comey said he was concerned that Twitter in particular allowed people to reinforce their own views, irrespective of facts, and that this eroded trust in government institutions.

“It used to be that the person who's now on Twitter would be down at the end of the bar late at night shouting at the television, and the only people he could shout with would be the other people who were down at the end of the bar,” Comey said. “Now he can shout with 600 other people who are at their own metaphorical bars, and it's a constant reinforcement of their view of the world.”

The First Amendment prevents law enforcement agencies from policing free speech. Cass Sunstein, a Harvard professor and former White House official, proposed controversially in 2008 that the government engage in “cognitive infiltration of extremist groups,” by enlisting government agents to enter chat rooms and raise doubts about conspiracy theorists' ideas. In one variant, he wrote, “government officials would participate anonymously or even with false identities.”

The proposal was criticized by those on the right and the left, and even Sunstein and his co-author acknowledged that it came with the risk that the government might inadvertently legitimize bad information. Sunstein declined to be interviewed for this article.

Justice Department guidelines say that agents can surf the Internet in search of possible terror plots, though a former federal national security official said agents have little time to randomly browse the Web to generate leads. Generally, the former official said, the FBI foils plots because would-be plotters reveal their intentions to the bureau's informant network, or from concrete tips they run down.

“You can't monitor 330 million Twitter [users] and their traffic, nor would you want to do that,” the former official said, speaking on the condition of anonymity to discuss FBI methods. “That's the beauty of living in a free society. You're allowed to be crazy.”

Law enforcement has occasionally drawn criticism for taking an overly aggressive approach — particularly with surveillance of the Muslim community. The New York Police Department, for example, was sued over its surveillance of Muslims in a case in which settlement discussions are ongoing. The FBI was accused of going too far in using an informant to infiltrate a mosque in California.

Some Islamic State-inspired terrorists have slipped through the cracks — such as Omar Mateen, the 29-year-old who killed 49 people in an Orlando nightclub. The FBI had scrutinized Mateen for 10 months beginning in 2013, even using surveillance and recording his calls after he talked of dying as a martyr, though they ultimately closed the matter without charges.

The threshold to take action on even a threat, Hosko said, is fairly high. The matter is generally left to local authorities unless the threat comes from across state lines, and incendiary rhetoric usually cannot be investigated. Given the volume of such cases, Hosko said, agents generally assess even in real threat cases whether the person was willing and able to follow through.

“The question for the FBI is, ‘Is there a case we can prosecute?' ” Hosko said. “Is this serious enough? Do we devote the resources?”

Uscinski, the University of Miami professor, said conspiracy theories are generally directed at those in power, and he expected more in the coming years would come from the left, rather than the right. But Trump, he said, has in some ways flipped the normal logic, raising conspiracy theories about the powerless — such as Mexico sending its rapists over the border — that could lead to attacks on those with little ability to stop them.

“To see those sorts of conspiracy theories sort of worries me,” Uscinski said, “because if Trump doesn't act, you could see someone sort of act on his behalf, against people who are unprotected.”

Reid: FBI director's letter cost Democrats the election, Senate By Eric Bradner, CNN

Updated 12:40 PM ET, Mon December 12, 2016

(CNN) — Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid said Monday FBI Director James Comey was "heavily involved as a partisan" in the weeks leading up to the election and that Comey's actions handed the presidency to Donald Trump.

The retiring Nevada Democrat said Democrats "would have won the majority in the Senate and would have won the presidency but for Comey."

"It's obvious he was a partisan in all this," Reid told CNN's Manu Raju in an interview. "There's information out there. He had it, I'm confident. And he ignored it."

He said Comey "significantly" helped make Trump the President-elect, faulting his failure to condemn Russian hacking of Democratic operatives and his handling of the investigation into Democratic presidential nominee Hillary Clinton's email server.

McConnell, senators unite behind investigation into Russian hacking

Reid said he urged Comey to address the hacking, which intelligence agencies have concluded was the result of Russian efforts to tilt the election toward Trump.

"I am saying the FBI did nothing -- did nothing. All the information that we've heard in the last couple weeks, it was available to the FBI. He just ignored it. He did not make it public. We asked him to more than once and he didn't do it," Reid said.

He also pointed to Comey's letter to lawmakers less than two weeks from the election announcing that -- as part of the FBI's investigation into sexting allegations against Anthony Weiner, the husband of Clinton aide Huma Abedin -- it had discovered emails potentially relevant to its investigation into Clinton's handling of classified information on her private email server.

"In fact, to show how awful this situation is, this man ignored precedent that had been going on for decade after decade after decade. The FBI does not get involved in politics -- except Comey did," Reid said.

"Had he not written that letter a week or so before the election, she would have won; we would have picked up at least two more Senate seats," he said.

Gap on Russia hacking conclusions between intelligence, FBI

Reid's comments came less than two hours after Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Kentucky, said he supports a Senate investigation into Russian hacking.

"I think we ought to approach all of these issues on the assumption the Russians do not wish us well," McConnell said.

Trump has brushed off the CIA's conclusion that Russia hacked the Democratic National Committee and Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta in a bid to help the Republican nominee.

The President-elect on Sunday morning blasted the Intelligence Community anew, calling its assessment that Russia interfered in the election "ridiculous."

"I think it's just another excuse. I don't believe it," Trump said in an interview on "Fox News Sunday."

FBI backs CIA view that Russia intervened to help Trump win election

By Adam Entous and Ellen Nakashima

December 16 at 2:20 PM

FBI Director James B. Comey and Director of National Intelligence James Clapper have backed a CIA assessment that Russia intervened in the 2016 election in part to help Donald Trump win the presidency, according to U.S. officials.

Comey's support for the CIA's conclusion suggests that the leaders of the three agencies are in agreement on Russian intentions, contrary to suggestions by some lawmakers that the FBI disagreed with the CIA.

“Earlier this week, I met separately with (Director) FBI James Comey and DNI Jim Clapper, and there is strong consensus among us on the scope, nature, and intent of Russian interference in our presidential election,” CIA Director John O. Brennan said in a message to the agency's workforce, according to U.S. officials who have seen the message.

“The three of us also agree that our organizations, along with others, need to focus on completing the thorough review of this issue that has been directed by President Obama and which is being led by the DNI,” Brennan's message read.

Trump has consistently dismissed the intelligence community's findings about Russian hacking.

The CIA and FBI declined to comment.

The CIA shared its latest assessment with key senators in a closed-door briefing on Capitol Hill about two weeks ago in which agency officials cited a growing body of intelligence from multiple sources. Specifically, CIA briefers told the senators it was now “quite clear” that electing Trump was one of Russia's goals, according to the officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss intelligence matters.

CIA and FBI officials don't think Russia had a “single purpose” by intervening during the presidential campaign. In addition to helping Trump, intelligence officials have told lawmakers that Moscow's other goal included undermining confidence in the U.S. electoral system.

A separate House intelligence briefing by a senior FBI counter-intelligence official last week left some Republican and Democratic lawmakers with the impression that the bureau wasn't on the same page as the CIA, according to officials present.

“The truth is they were never all that different in the first place,” an official said of the FBI and CIA positions.

In his message to the CIA's workforce, Brennan said the administration has provided detailed briefings to lawmakers and their aides since the summer.

“In recent days, I have had several conversations with members of Congress, providing an update on the status of the review as well as the considerations that need to be taken into account as we proceed,” Brennan wrote. “Many - but unfortunately not all - members understand and appreciate the importance and the gravity of the issue, and they are very supportive of the process that is underway.”

Priebus: Trump wants to hear hacking evidence direct from FBI
Published: Dec 18, 2016 5:12 p.m. ET President-elect has been slow to accept reports of Russian interference

By Damian Paletta

Incoming White House chief of staff Reince Priebus said Sunday that President-elect Donald Trump wanted to hear directly from the Federal Bureau of Investigation before forming an opinion on Russia's alleged interference in the November election.

"He would accept the conclusion if these intelligence professionals would get together, put out a report, show the American people that they are actually on the same page," Priebus said on Fox News Sunday. He suggested the FBI has been slow to accept the Central Intelligence Agency's recent view that Russian officials wanted to help Trump win the presidency by carrying out a hack-and-leak campaign before the election.

According to a new WSJ/NBC News poll, 68% of Americans believe that Donald Trump will change the way business is conducted in Washington, but are divided over what kind. A majority in the poll also said they were significantly bothered by reports of Russian hacking aimed at influencing the election.

U.S. intelligence officials in October reached an assessment that the Russian government launched a cyber operation to steal emails and other documents from Democratic Party officials and then selectively leak thousands of records to interfere with the presidential election.

Trump and his top aides have dismissed Russian involvement in the email leaks, and Trump has reacted angrily to suggestions that the Russians wanted to help him win. Priebus, though, said Trump wanted to hear from the FBI before he settled his opinion on what transpired. "We haven't heard from [FBI Director James] Comey," Priebus said Sunday. "These guys should be straight with the American people and come out and say it. I don't think they've been clear about it."

FBI director under pressure to explain Clinton bombshell

Six weeks since Hillary Clinton's surprise loss in the presidential election, FBI Director James Comey is under pressure to justify the bombshell announcement that rocked the final days of the campaign.

Democrats, still smarting from the Nov. 8 loss, have lashed out at Comey as the architect of the Democratic nominee's defeat.

"James Comey cost her the election," former president Bill Clinton

Now, speculation has begun to swirl that Comey will publicly address the charges of partisanship.

Several former FBI officials told The Hill that they have heard Comey is now weighing a possible press appearance after Trump is inaugurated on Jan. 20 to tell his side of the story.

The FBI declined to comment for this report.

Eleven days before the election, Comey shocked the political world with a letter informing Congress that investigators had discovered new emails that could be relevant to its probe, then considered completed, of Hillary Clinton's use of a private email server while she was secretary of State.

Comey for months defended the integrity of the probe — first against Republicans when he declined to recommend charges against Clinton in the first place, and more recently against Democrats and internal critics who said his eleventh-hour disclosure unfairly damaged Clinton.

The former prosecutor has made few media appearances over the course of his career — he did sit for a "60 Minutes" interview in 2014 — but he has been forced into the harsh glare of camera lights throughout the past year.

He was thrust into the spotlight after Attorney General Loretta Lynch sparked outrage by meeting with Bill Clinton before the conclusion of the investigation this summer — a meeting they described as social — forcing her to announce that she would abide by whatever recommendation Comey made in the case.

Comey was then open publicly with the FBI's reasoning in declining to recommend charges against Hillary Clinton, holding a detailed press conference announcing its conclusion and later appearing before Congress in an open setting multiple times.

But he has been notably silent since his Oct. 28 letter to Congress.

Democrats, appalled by the fallout from his letter to Congress, have argued that Comey's disclosure in the final days leading up to the election was a massive break from bureau policy that blunted Clinton's path to the White House. They say that although the FBI announced two days before the election that the new emails would not change its conclusion in Clinton's case, the damage was done.

Critics hammered Comey's vague letter for igniting a firestorm of speculation that the new emails contained a "smoking gun" — without providing any substantive information for voters to judge.

"Today's disclosure might be worst abuse yet. DOJ goes out of its way to avoid publicly discussing investigations close to election," former Department of Justice spokesman Matthew Miller said in a tweetstorm at the time. "This might be totally benign & not even involve Clinton. But no way for press or voters to know that. Easy for opponent to make hay over."

Trump did in fact run with Comey's announcement on the campaign trail, repeatedly telling supporters that the emails must contain something truly damning.

"I have a feeling those emails are going to be — whoa, there are going to be some beauties in there. Can you imagine? She's been deleting all the time, deleting," he said at a Florida rally shortly after the announcement.

Clinton herself has since told donors that she believes Comey's disclosure raised "doubts that were groundless, baseless, proven to be, stopped our momentum."

It's unclear how much of an effect the last-minute news had at the ballot box, but Trump's narrow win in a number of battleground states and Clinton's lead in the popular vote tally are giving fuel to those who say her loss could have been avoided.

One of Trump's pollsters, veteran political strategist Tony Fabrizio, said just five counties made the difference: four in Florida and one in Michigan.

And post-election analysis from data guru Nate Silver and others has suggested that some voters shifted to Trump in the final weeks of the election, though he notes that the analysis is not cause-and-effect.

Comey himself was aware of the risks associated with the late October missive. In an internal memo to FBI employees, he acknowledged that "there is significant risk of being misunderstood."

"We don't ordinarily tell Congress about ongoing investigations, but here I feel an obligation to do so given that I testified repeatedly in recent months that our investigation was completed," Comey wrote. "I also think it would be misleading to the American people were we not to supplement the record."

Comey has a reputation as an independent and principled lawman — which some critics say has led him to operate outside of important institutional norms.

Others say Comey had no choice but to inform Congress of the existence of the emails — when he chose to go public with the details of the investigation's findings over the summer, he pinned himself in a corner when the bureau realized it might have more work to do.

But throughout, Comey has been strident in his defense of the probe.

"You can call us wrong, but don't call us weasels. We are not weasels," Comey said during a House Judiciary Committee hearing during which Republicans suggested he had caved to political pressure from above.

"We are honest people and … whether or not you agree with the result, this was done the way you want it to be done."

Pressure to speak out is mounting as more details emerge about the circumstances surrounding the discovery of the new emails.

The search warrant used to go through the emails, unsealed Tuesday, confirmed that Comey delivered his letter to Congress two days before the warrant was granted — meaning that investigators didn't yet know what was in them.

Investigators found emails they thought might be pertinent to Clinton's investigation when they sorted and scanned the header information of messages stored on a laptop seized as part of an investigation into former Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-N.Y.).

The former New York congressman was under investigation for allegedly sending sexually explicit messages to a minor. Weiner is married to longtime Clinton aide Huma Abedin, though the two are separated.

Some of the accounts used on the seized computer correlated with those used by Clinton and her aides during her tenure at Foggy Bottom — accounts that investigators previously concluded had been used inappropriately, the newly released documents show.

The FBI told a federal judge it believed that was sufficient to show there was probable cause that the computer contained classified information pertinent to the Clinton probe.

James Comey's year of unintended — and ruinous — consequences

By Dana Milbank Opinion writer
December 21 at 5:06 PM

What a year it has been for James Comey!

At the start of 2016, the FBI director enjoyed a reputation as a public servant of high integrity, earning bipartisan acclaim for his stewardship of the nation's preeminent law enforcement agency.

A year later, the FBI, after a series of blows to its credibility, seems increasingly partisan. Comey has shown himself to be an inconsistent leader. And an ugly conclusion is becoming difficult to escape: He singlehandedly caused Donald Trump to win the presidency.

Doubt on that last point should have been dispelled this week, after court documents were released Tuesday that showed the justification for Comey's decision — announced to the nation just 11 days before the election — that he was reopening his investigation into Hillary Clinton's emails. We now know Comey's bombshell was based on nothing: The FBI had no evidence of wrongdoing in the newly discovered emails, found on Huma Abedin's laptop, and no reason to suspect there was anything on the laptop that the FBI hadn't already dismissed as insufficient to mount a prosecution.

Yet that was the flimsy basis for Comey's letter to Congress reopening the Clinton probe. The new emails were irrelevant or redundant. But by the time Comey said, just two days before the election, that the FBI found nothing new, the damage to Clinton was done.

When an election is this close — Clinton, in the final tally, won the popular vote by 2.8 million votes — any number of factors could have shifted the outcome: Russia's hacking, Jill Stein's Green Party candidacy, Clinton's weaknesses as a candidate, her ill-advised message of continuity in times that demanded populist change.

But Comey's intervention is one thing that almost certainly changed the result. Nationwide, voters who decided in the last week — the time when Comey's announcement dominated the news — overwhelmingly went for Trump. Late-deciders went for Trump by 17 points in Florida and Pennsylvania, by 11 points in Michigan and 29 points in Wisconsin.

I doubt Comey meant to give the presidency to Trump. All along, I maintained that he was a man of integrity. But he demonstrated poor judgment. So protective was he of his above-the-fray reputation that his attempts to guard it caused a series of bad decisions. Ironically, his attempts at preserving his reputation were what hurt him.

In June, before Comey's July statement on the Clinton email issue, 48 percent of Americans expressed confidence in the FBI and 16 percent lacked confidence, according to an NBC-Wall Street Journal poll. Now, six months later, 37 percent have confidence in the FBI, while 27 percent don't — and Republicans and Democrats are almost identical in their views.

Comey's trouble began with his announcement, on the eve of the national political conventions, that no reasonable prosecutor would bring charges against Clinton over the emails. His no-prosecution recommendation infuriated congressional Republicans. This criticism must have stung, since Comey, a former George W. Bush administration official, then took a series of actions that seemed designed to repair his reputation with Republicans.

First, he refused to join an administration statement on Oct. 7 naming Russia as the perpetrator of hacks of American political organizations. He reasoned that the FBI shouldn't be seen as injecting itself into politics so close to an election.

Comey made a mockery of such considerations when he delivered his October Surprise later that month, defying warnings from the Justice Department and ignoring long-standing guidelines by announcing that he was reopening the Clinton probe.

It probably wasn't done to torpedo Clinton, though that was the result. The most convincing explanation: Comey feared that already irate congressional Republicans, if they were to learn that he didn't disclose the new discovery of Clinton emails, would have trashed his integrity. And Republicans were certain to find out. The Trump campaign's Rudy Giuliani, the recipient of leaks apparently originating with anti-Clinton agents in the FBI's New York office, had already signaled that big news was about to break.

Since the election, Comey has continued to protect his reputation — at considerable cost. Earlier this month, news broke that the CIA had concluded Russia intervened in the election to help Trump. But FBI officials resisted joining the conclusion.

Perhaps Comey was again trying to keep his agency and himself above the fray, but the FBI's mush helped Trump dismiss the CIA's findings. The matter turned into a partisan fight rather than the national-security concern it should be. After several days, and the intervention of the director of national intelligence, Comey finally acknowledged the obvious: that the FBI, too, believes the Russians tried to help Trump.

Did Comey mean to become Trump's elector, and now his protector? Probably not. But in the end, motives count for less than outcomes. And Comey's have been ruinous.

All - Please review below.

Based upon the tone of such articles as provided below and the reported public positions held by law makers (provided further below break lines in the email narrative), it appears that it may be time to take a look at where we currently stand with our Going Dark vision, objectives, methodologies, and metrics as we move into the next year.

Our previous objectives and methodologies have brought us to current levels of achievement and accomplishment; however, with the change in administration and the most current positions on encryption (which is a part of the overall issue of technical relevancy that frames the Going Dark initiative) we are now in a place to determine if our current business model is still on point and how we will move forward if it is or is not.

The partnership across the FBI's Going Dark initiative has been impressive to date. I hope that we continue to pool our collective skills, knowledge, resources, and abilities to assess and adress the growing gap in our abilities to slow or mitigate Going Dark-related impacts to our capacity to conduct operations and investigations against crime problems or national security threats.

The holidays will provide us with a natural break to gather our thoughts on the upcoming year. So, I wanted to thank everyone for what we have accomplished to this point and ask for your renewed determination and commitment to address Going Dark issues and the challenges that are or can be associated with our general technical relevancy in criminal investigative activities and national security matters.

As [redacted] I would like to thank her for her time, effort, and dedication in bringing the Going Dark initiative to its current state of achievement. Upon [redacted] departure, [redacted] (Counsel to the Director) has agreed to support STB to keep Going Dark matters on line and on point until we establish a more permanent organizational solution. Thanks to [redacted] for filling the large shoes left by [redacted]. We will have more information forthcoming on [redacted] Going Dark roles and responsibilities. b6 b7C

b7C

On a side note, I know there are people who directly and indirectly supported Going Dark activities who were not direct recipients of this message. Please pass my personal regards to such folks as their inadvertent exclusion is my fault alone for not having enough time on station to have worked directly with them.

I look forward to a group discussion when we all return from the holiday break. As always, I look forward to feedback and suggestions.

I wish everyone a safe, enjoyable, happy holiday season. Thank you.

Congressional report: We shouldn't bother with encryption backdoors

Share

Written by

Patrick O'Neill Dec 20, 2016 | CyberScoop

A new report from House lawmakers rejected the notion of Congress inserting backdoors into encryption, asserting that weakening encryption runs contrary to national interest. While lawmakers acknowledged that popular encryption impacts law enforcement and intelligence work, the group emphasized encryption's importance for national defense, individual privacy, freedom of speech, human rights and protection against government intrusion abroad and at home.

Responding to law enforcement assertions that popular encryption was leading to a problem of data "going dark," the congressional group countered that "the challenge appears to be more akin to 'going spotty.'"

"Congress should not weaken this vital technology because doing so works against the national interest. However, it should not ignore and must address the legitimate concerns of the law enforcement and intelligence communities," the report reads.

The bipartisan report comes exactly one month before President-elect Donald Trump takes office. Trump touted his support for backdoors on the campaign, including calling for a boycott of Apple if they didn't help the FBI unlock an iPhone tied to the San Bernardino shooter. The report is a direct result of the fight between Apple and the FBI, as well as the wider fight over encryption that was fought on Capitol Hill earlier this year.

Proponents of strong encryption were quick to applaud the report.

"Today's report from the bipartisan Congressional working group on encryption supports what OTI has been saying for the past two years: forcing U.S. companies to refrain from offering strongly encrypted products or to introduce surveillance "backdoors" into those products would not make us safer but would instead threaten everyone's cybersecurity as well as America's economic security," said Kevin Bankston, Director of New America's Open Technology Institute. "We hope that this report sends a strong signal to Sens. Burr and Feinstein and anyone else on Capitol Hill considering legislation that would undermine encryption: the House committees that have jurisdiction over this issue are not interested in moving forward with any wrongheaded backdoor bill."

The group encouraged Congress to explore new options like "opportunities for collaboration between the law enforcement community and the technology sector and information sharing between different elements of the law enforcement community."

Quiet cooperation is indeed the preferred method of collaboration between Silicon Valley and Washington D.C. The report highlights the willingness of private sector firms to assist law enforcement and intelligence efforts with access to information but it fails to address specifics. In fact, that's one of the advantages of "quiet" cooperation. At the heart of the 2016 conflict between the FBI and Apple was FBI director James Comey's decision to go public, forcing Apple to emphatically defend their position.

The congressional group also points to metadata analysis as a necessary next step. Legal hacking to circumvent encryption was also posed as a potential solution to be explored although almost all both law enforcement and private sector representatives had qualms: Cops said hacking only applied to a small subset of cases where officers know of an exploit and, even then, it's resource-intensive. Others assert that "a legal hacking regime creates the wrong incentives for government agencies that should be working with private companies to patch vulnerabilities and improve cybersecurity."

The group still urged Congress to explore the option.

The report also suggests Congress look at compelled disclosure and how law enforcement can force suspects to open devices without breaking the law.

Encryption Working Group Releases Year-End Report

The report contains key observations and opportunities for progress

Washington, D.C. –Members of the bipartisan encryption working group – established in March 2016 by House Judiciary Committee Chairman Bob Goodlatte (R-VA), Ranking Member John Conyers, Jr. (D-MI), House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Fred Upton (R-MI), and Ranking Member Frank Pallone, Jr. (D-NJ) – today released a year-end report laying out key observations and next steps.

For nearly a year, the Encryption Working Group has held numerous meetings with a variety of federal, state, and local government entities, former government officials, private industry and trade associations, civil society organizations, consultants and legal experts, academia, and cryptographers. These meetings have produced critical information, culminating in a year-end report that lays out four key observations and identifies several areas for future discussion next Congress.

The report concludes:

"Encryption is inexorably tied to our national interests. It is a safeguard for our personal secrets and economic prosperity. It helps to prevent crime and protect national security. The widespread use of encryption technologies also complicates the missions of the law enforcement and intelligence communities. As described in this report, those complications cannot be ignored. This is the reality of modern society. We must strive to find common ground in our collective responsibility: to prevent crime, protect national security, and provide the best possible conditions for peace and prosperity.

"That is why this can no longer be an isolated or binary debate. There is no 'us versus them,' or 'pro-encryption versus law enforcement.' This conversation implicates everyone and everything that depends on connected technologies—including our law enforcement and intelligence communities. This is a complex challenge that will take time, patience, and cooperation to resolve. The potential consequences of inaction—or overreaction—are too important to allow historical or ideological perspectives to stand in the way of progress."

Below are key observations of the report.

1. Any measure that weakens encryption works against the national interest.
2. Encryption technology is a global technology that is widely and increasingly available around the world.
3. The variety of stakeholders, technologies, and other factors create different and divergent challenges with respect to encryption and the "going dark" phenomenon, and therefore there is no one-size-fits-all solution to the encryption challenge.
4. Congress should foster cooperation between the law enforcement community and technology companies.

Based on these observations, the report has identified several areas for future discussion by the committees next Congress, such as exploring opportunities to help law enforcement agencies navigate the process of accessing information from private companies; examining options to improve law enforcement's ability to leverage metadata; reviewing the circumstances, resources and legal framework necessary to help law enforcement agencies exploit existing flaws in digital products; considering the implications of alternative legal strategies such as compelling individual consumers to decrypt their devices, and the role of encryption in fostering greater data security and privacy.

The full report can be viewed here.

The members of the working group issuing the report are House Judiciary Committee Chairman Bob Goodlatte (R-VA), House Energy and Commerce Chairman Fred Upton (R-Mich.), Ranking Member John Conyers, Jr. (D-Mich.), Ranking Member Frank Pallone, Jr. (D-N.J.), and Representatives Jim Sensenbrenner (R-WI), Darrell Issa (R-CA), Zoe Lofgren (D-CA), Suzan DelBene (D-WA), Bill Johnson (R-OH), and Yvette D. Clarke (D-NY).

Hey there--
I'm writing because a very strange document has crossed my desk that may--or may not--have implications for investigations you guys are conducting. Under normal circumstances, I would simply assume that the document is either a fraud or that you guys already know all about it. (Both may well be true, as it is.) The wrinkle here is that the document--which purports to be a series of reports/dispatches by a private British intel company on Trump and Russia and the hacking and contains a number of highly-detailed accounts stuff that would be explosive if alleged publicly--is being furiously investigated by, at a minimum, the Wall Street Journal (the document was given to me by [redacted]. What's more, it seems to already be in the hands of the SSCI. I wouldn't be surprised if it's also in the hands of other congressional committees.

WASHINGTON—President-elect Donald Trump, a harsh critic of U.S. intelligence agencies, is working with top advisers on a plan that would restructure and pare back the nation's top spy agency, people familiar with the planning said, prompted by a belief that the Office of the Director of National Intelligence has become bloated and politicized.

The planning comes as Mr. Trump has leveled a series of social media attacks in recent months and the past few days against U.S. intelligence agencies, dismissing and mocking their assessment that the Russian government hacked emails of Democratic groups and individuals and then leaked them last year to WikiLeaks and others in an effort to help Mr. Trump win the White House.

One of the people familiar with Mr. Trump's planning said advisers also are working on a plan to restructure the Central Intelligence Agency, cutting back on staffing at its Virginia headquarters and pushing more people out into field posts around the world. The CIA declined to comment on the plan.

“The view from the Trump team is the intelligence world [is] becoming completely politicized,” said the individual, who is close to the Trump transition operation. “They all need to be slimmed down. The focus will be on restructuring the agencies and how they interact.”

In one of his latest Twitter posts on Wednesday, Mr. Trump referenced an interview that WikiLeaks editor in chief Julian Assange gave to Fox News in which he denied Russia had been his source for the thousands of emails stolen from Democrats and Hillary Clinton advisers, including campaign manager John Podesta, that Mr. Assange published.

Mr. Trump tweeted: “Julian Assange said ‘a 14 year old could have hacked Podesta'—why was DNC so careless? Also said Russians did not give him the info!”

Mr. Trump has drawn criticism from Democratic and Republican lawmakers and from intelligence and law-enforcement officials for praising Russian President Vladimir Putin, for attacking American intelligence agencies, and for embracing Mr. Assange, long viewed with disdain by government officials and lawmakers.

"We have two choices: some guy living in an embassy on the run from the law…who has a history of undermining American democracy and releasing classified information to put our troops at risk, or the 17 intelligence agencies sworn to defend us," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.). "I'm going with them."

But for Mr. Trump and some of his supporters, the accusations of Russian hacking and the criticism of WikiLeaks are seen as an effort to delegitimize the president-elect's victory.

Since his November election, Mr. Trump has published close to 250 Twitter posts. Of those, 11 have focused on Russia or the election-related cyberattacks. In each of those tweets, Mr. Trump either has flattered Russian President Vladimir Putin—last month calling him "very smart"— or disparaged the investigation into the hacks.

This stands in contrast to his posts on other issues and countries, such as North Korea or China, where his views on national security risks line up more squarely with U.S. spy agencies.

The Office of the Director of National Intelligence was established in 2004 in large part to boost coordination between intelligence agencies following the Sept. 11, 2001 terror attacks.

Many Republicans have proposed cutting the ODNI before, but this has proven hard to do in part because its mission centers are focused on core national security issues, such as counterterrorism, nuclear proliferation, and counterintelligence.

"The management and integration that DNI focuses on allows agencies like the CIA to better hone in on its own important work," said Rep. Adam Schiff (D., Calif.), the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, who believes dismantling the ODNI could lead to national security problems.

Mr. Trump's advisers say he has long been skeptical of the CIA's accuracy, and the president-elect often mentions faulty intelligence in 2002 and 2003 concerning Iraq's weapons programs. But he has focused his skepticism of the agencies squarely on their Russia assessments, which has jarred analysts who are accustomed to more cohesion with the White House.

Top officials at U.S. intelligence agencies, as well as Republican and Democratic leaders in Congress, have said Russia orchestrated the computer attacks that hacked and leaked Democratic Party emails last year. President Barack Obama ordered the intelligence agencies to produce a report on the hacking operation, and he is expected to presented with the findings on Thursday.

Russia has long denied any involvement in the hacking operation, though Mr. Putin has said releasing the stolen emails served a public service.

The heads of the CIA, Federal Bureau of Investigation, and Director of National Intelligence James Clapper are scheduled to brief Mr. Trump on the findings on Friday. Mr. Trump tweeted late Tuesday that this meeting had been delayed and suggested that the agencies still needed time to "build a case" against Russia.

White House officials said Mr. Trump will be briefed on the hacking report as soon as it is ready. White House officials have been increasingly frustrated by Mr. Trump's confrontations with intelligence officials.

“It's appalling,” the official said. “No president has ever taken on the CIA and come out looking good.”

Among those helping lead Mr. Trump's plan to restructure the intelligence agencies is his national security adviser, Lt. Gen. Michael Flynn, who had served as director of the Defense Intelligence Agency until he was pushed out by DNI James Clapper and others in 2013. Also involved in the planning is Rep. Mike Pompeo (R., Kan.), who Mr. Trump selected to be his CIA director.

Lt. Gen. Flynn didn't respond to a request for comment and Mr. Pompeo declined to comment.

Mr. Trump shares the view of Lt. Gen. Flynn and Mr. Pompeo that the intelligence community's position that Russians tried to help his campaign is an attempt to undermine his victory or say he didn't win, the official close to the transition said.

Mr. Flynn will lead the White House's National Security Council, giving him broad influence in military and intelligence decisions throughout the government. He is also a believer in rotating senior intelligence agencies into the field and reducing headquarters staff.

Current and former intelligence and law-enforcement officials have reacted with a mix of bafflement and outrage to Mr. Trump's continuing series of jabs at U.S. spies.

“They are furious about it,” said one former senior intelligence official, adding that a retinue of senior officials who thought they would be staying on in a Hillary Clinton administration now are re-evaluating their plans following Mr. Trump's election.

Current and former officials said it was particularly striking to see Mr. Trump quote Mr. Assange in tweets.

“It's pretty horrifying to me that he's siding with Assange over the intelligence agencies,'' said one former law-enforcement official.

Paul Pillar, a 28-year veteran of the CIA who retired in 2005, said he was disturbed by Mr. Trump's tweets and feared much of the intelligence community's assessments could be filtered through Lt. Gen. Flynn, chosen by Mr. Trump as his national security adviser.

“I'm rather pessimistic,” he said. “This is indeed disturbing that the president should come in with this negative view of the agencies coupled with his habits on how he absorbs information and so on that don't provide a lot of hope for change.”

Addressing Email Controversy and Other Challenges, FBI Director Still Stands By Decisions

By Mike Levine

In his first publicly-revealed comments since Donald Trump was elected president of the United States, FBI Director James Comey said he stood by his controversial decisions in the midst of what he called a "contentious election cycle."

"I would be lying if I said the external criticism doesn't bother me at all, but the truth is, it doesn't bother me much because of the way we made the decision," Comey said in a New Year's message to FBI personnel this week. "At every turn last year, we were faced with choosing among bad options and making decisions we knew would bring a torrent of criticism."

Comey's lengthy message was intended to telegraph the agency's mission and "vision" for the coming year, noting the FBI's vast cyber-related work, its extensive criminal efforts fighting corruption and violence, and its unending counterterrorism operations, particularly related to what he called "the collapsing 'Islamic State.'" The message also described advances in hiring and technology, and the hardships facing FBI personnel.

2016 was, to put it mildly, a challenging year," Comey wrote, alluding to the deadly shooting of a militia member who helped take over a federal wildlife refuge in Oregon; the deadly terrorist attack inside a nightclub in Orlando, which was carried out by someone previously on the FBI's radar; and the heavily-scrutinized investigation into Hillary Clinton's private email server.

As it always is, our work was subject to a fair amount of second-guessing ... [but] I am very proud of the way we approached the work," Comey said in his message, echoing sentiments in previous notes to his workforce.

While Comey did not specifically cite his decision to publicly detail the FBI's conclusions in the Clinton email probe, or his decision to disclose new steps in the investigation just days before the election, he likely had those moves in mind when writing the message this week.

"People often ask me what we should do to respond to those who have questions or concerns about the FBI in the wake of a contentious election cycle. 'Do great work' is my answer," Comey told FBI personnel. "Actions speak so much louder than words ... Just stay at it and be your honest, competent, and independent selves."

"When you know you have made decisions thoughtfully and consistent with your values, it is freeing, in a way," Comey added.

Many Trump critics have accused Comey of throwing the election to Republicans. And just days after the election, Hillary Clinton said Comey's letter to Congress disclosing new steps and newly-discovered messages in the email investigation blunted her presidential campaign's growing momentum.

Even before the letter became public, Attorney General Loretta Lynch and other senior Justice Department officials implored Comey not to send the letter, telling FBI counterparts that doing so would violate long-standing tradition and could potentially influence the outcome of the election, sources familiar with the matter told ABC News at the time.

Comey later said he felt compelled to notify Congress because he had previously assured lawmakers and the public that the FBI investigation was "completed." Nevertheless, a review of the newly-discovered emails found most of them to be duplicates, and no charges were filed.

While "the media focused" on such matters, FBI agents worked "in so many other places and in so many other ways to protect America," Comey wrote in his message this week.

"[It's] hard to capture all the good we have done, both for innocent people and to make ourselves better as an organization," he added.

He also noted the tough environment facing law enforcement officers across the country.

"As we look back at our work, we should always remember our people are in harm's way," he said, noting that 19 FBI agents were "shot or severely injured in line of duty in 2016."

"We also lost far too many of our state and local partners in the line of duty," and "each incident serves as a reminder that our agent colleagues do very dangerous work," according to Comey.

In his message, Comey did not mention FBI work on election-related hacks that the FBI and others in the U.S. intelligence community have attributed to the Russian government.

Trump has questioned that conclusion, and Comey is expected to participate in a briefing tomorrow in New York laying out classified details of the U.S. government's findings pointing to Russia.

Comey ended his New Year's message with this: "Whatever challenges 2017 brings, we will be ready, protecting the American people and upholding the Constitution of this extraordinary country."

James Comey to Brief Donald Trump on Russian Hacking Friday

Meeting will be first between FBI director and president-elect, who has been skeptical of intelligence community's claims

By Devlin Barrett
Jan. 6, 2017 5:00 a.m. ET

Missing from the current public debate over Russian hacking, the presidential election and U.S. intelligence has been the man who was often at the center of it all: James Comey, director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

On Friday, Mr. Comey will join Director of National Intelligence James Clapper, as well as the heads of the Central Intelligence Agency and National Security Agency, in giving President-elect Donald Trump a classified briefing about what U.S. agencies have concluded about alleged Russian hacking efforts aimed at influencing the presidential election. Mr. Trump has already publicly indicated he is skeptical of such claims, even poking fun at the intelligence agencies for making them.

Friday's meeting will take place at Trump Tower, not in a secure compartmented information facility, or SCIF, which is typically used to discuss classified information. The meeting will be in a private space with some surveillance-defeating technology, according to people familiar with the matter.

Mr. Comey was excoriated by Democrats for his decision to tell Congress 11 days before the election that the FBI was examining newly discovered emails related to a previously closed probe of Democratic presidential nominee Hillary Clinton's email server. Two days before polls closed, the FBI said a review of the new evidence gave it no reason to reverse its earlier recommendation that Mrs. Clinton not face charges related to her email practices while secretary of state.

Mrs. Clinton and others have blamed those announcements, in large part, for her defeat, saying it resurfaced voters' doubts about her at a critical moment. Republicans, in turn, have blamed Mr. Comey for the decision not to prosecute Mrs. Clinton.

U.S. intelligence officials briefed members of Congress on the alleged Russian hacking findings on Thursday. Several officials testified publicly before the Senate Armed Services Committee before the briefing. Mr. Comey didn't, though he did join the subsequent, classified briefing behind closed doors, according to officials.

Mr. Comey has said he doesn't plan to speak publicly before the new president takes office and that he is reluctant to do so before meeting with Mr. Trump, according to people familiar with the discussions. Mr. Comey, who took office as FBI director in September 2013, serves a 10-year term, though he can be dismissed by the president at any time. Since Mr. Trump's election, he has repeatedly signaled to FBI employees that he has every intention of serving the entire term, according to people familiar with the discussions.

For much of 2016, Mr. Comey was a larger-than-life public presence, testifying in Congress, speaking at universities and holding occasional sit-downs with groups of reporters. The most intense spotlight came in July, when he announced that the email probe would be closed without any recommendation of charges.

While there was evidence of extreme carelessness in the email setup, Mr. Comey said, no reasonable prosecutor would file criminal charges over it. Following that unusually detailed announcement, Mr. Comey spent hours testifying before Congress explaining his reasoning.

Since the unexpected victory of Mr. Trump two months ago, however, the director hasn't made any public appearances. Just before the election, he spoke at a memorial service inside the Justice Department for one of its most highly regarded employees, David Margolis.

People close to Mr. Comey noted that he began scaling back his public schedule weeks before the election, and while he may not have given any speeches in the last two months, they say that is because none had been scheduled. He hasn't canceled any appearances, they add.

Since Nov. 8, the director has visited FBI field offices and spoken to small groups of employees, as well as gatherings of current and former agents. In those talks, he has defended his decisions to sometimes skeptical FBI veterans, including at least one event over the holidays, according to people familiar with those meetings.

Within the FBI workforce and among former agents, there are still significant pockets of skepticism and concern about the decisions he made, according to people familiar with the discussions. Some fault his July announcement as saying too much and creating a political dynamic in which he felt compelled to continue speaking publicly about the case.

Other former FBI personnel remain angry about the decision not to pursue charges in the email case. And still other agents grew irate after they concluded that a separate probe into the Clinton Foundation was sharply curtailed by the Justice Department and FBI leadership.

The director, according to people familiar with the discussions, has decided not to speak publicly about such matters until after Mr. Trump is sworn in as president, and will probably do so first before Congress.

“He was in the eye of a political hurricane, with forces on both sides not wasting time to examine the validity or credibility of what he was saying—they just knew it didn’t match their political agenda,’’ said Ron Hosko, a former senior FBI official. “Because those winds were whipping him so strongly, perhaps more strongly than he would have guessed, I think it’s more judicious for him to hold down, get out of the glare of the klieg lights put on him, and go about the business of the FBI with a lower profile, if he can do it.”

Mr. Hosko said that if an external event, such as a fresh terror attack on U.S. soil, had forced his hand, Mr. Comey likely would have spoken publicly.

In an internal New Year’s message to FBI staff sent earlier this week, Mr. Comey wrote, “I would be lying if I said the external criticism doesn’t bother me at all. But the truth is, it doesn’t bother me much because of the way we made the decision.” He added, “At every turn last year, we were faced with choosing among bad options and making decisions we knew would bring a torrent of criticism.” The message was first reported by ABC News.

Trump Says Focus on Russian Hacking Is a 'Political Witch Hunt'

By MICHAEL D. SHEARJAN. 6, 2017

WASHINGTON — President-elect Donald J. Trump said in an interview Friday morning that the storm surrounding Russian hacking during the presidential campaign is a political witch hunt being carried out by his adversaries, who he said were embarrassed by their loss to him in the election last year.

Mr. Trump spoke to The New York Times by telephone three hours before he was set to be briefed by the nation's top intelligence and law enforcement officials about the Russian hacking of American political institutions. In the conversation, he repeatedly criticized the intense focus on Russia.

"China, relatively recently, hacked 20 million government names," he said, referring to the breach of computers at the Office of Personnel Management in late 2014 and early 2015. "How come nobody even talks about that? This is a political witch hunt."

He noted that there have been prior successful hackings of the White House and Congress, suggesting it was unfair that those attacks on American institutions have not received the attention that the Russian cyberintrusions have. But none of the information from those intrusions was made public as it was in the case of the hacking of the Democratic National Committee and John Podesta, Hillary Clinton's campaign chairman.

"With all that being said, I don't want countries to be hacking our country," Mr. Trump said. "They've hacked the White House. They've hacked Congress. We're like the hacking capital of the world."

Mr. Trump, who has consistently expressed doubts about the evidence of Russian hacking during the election, did so again on Friday. Asked why he thought there was so much attention being given to the Russian cyberattacks, the president-elect said the motivation was political.

"They got beaten very badly in the election. I won more counties in the election than Ronald Reagan," Mr. Trump said during an eight-minute telephone conversation. "They are very embarrassed about it. To some extent, it's a witch hunt. They just focus on this."

The president-elect also noted reports this week that the D.N.C. had refused to give the F.B.I. access to its computer servers after they were hacked.

"The D.N.C. wouldn't let them see the servers," Mr. Trump said. "How can you be sure about hacking when you can't even get to the servers?" The D.N.C. has previously said that the law enforcement agency had not asked to examine the computers.

A senior law enforcement official said the F.B.I. had repeatedly emphasized to the D.N.C. the necessity of obtaining direct access to servers and data. The F.B.I. was rebuffed and had to rely upon a third party — a computer security firm brought in by the D.N.C. — for information.

He also said that the hacking of emails from the D.N.C. and top campaign officials for Mrs. Clinton had revealed that Mrs. Clinton received advance notice of debate questions and "many, many other things that were horrible." "How come nobody complains about that?" Mr. Trump said, referring to a tip that a CNN commentator and Clinton supporter, Donna Brazile, gave to Mr. Podesta ahead of a Democratic Party presidential debate in Flint, Mich.

Mr. Trump said he was looking forward to his meeting Friday afternoon about the hacking by James R. Clapper Jr., the director of national intelligence; James B. Comey, the F.B.I. director, and other intelligence officials. He said that Mr. Clapper "wrote me a beautiful letter a few weeks ago wishing me the best."

But he said that "a lot of mistakes were made" by the intelligence community in the past, noting in particular the attacks on the World Trade Center and saying that "weapons of mass destruction was one of the great mistakes of all time."

The president-elect said that he was eager to work with the intelligence community as president, and he praised the people he selected to lead the intelligence agencies, in particular Representative Mike Pompeo, Republican of Kansas, who is his pick to lead the C.I.A.

He said that Mr. Pompeo was "first in his class" at West Point.

"We have great people going into those slots," Mr. Trump said in the interview. "I expect to have a very, very good relationship with them."

It's misleading in at least two respects. First, all agencies thought it should be included. Second, one of the reasons all thought it should be included is that it's source was credible and much of it was corroborative of rest of report. Another reason was the need to alert leadership but that was not only reason.

SUBJECT: Organization of the National Security Council and the Homeland Security Council

As President, my highest priority is to ensure the safety and security of the American people. In order to advise and assist me in executing this solemn responsibility, as well as to protect and advance the national interests of the United States at home and abroad, I hereby direct that my system for national security policy development and decision-making shall be organized as follows:

A. The National Security Council, the Homeland Security Council, and Supporting Staff

The National Security Act of 1947, as amended, established the National Security Council (NSC) to advise the President with respect to the integration of domestic, foreign, and military policies relating to the national security. There is also a Homeland Security Council (HSC) -- established through Executive Order 13228 of October 8, 2001, and subsequently codified in the Homeland Security Act of 2002 -- that has the purpose of advising the President on matters pertaining to homeland security. Each Council is also responsible for the effective coordination of the security-related activities and functions of the executive departments and agencies.

The security threats facing the United States in the 21st century transcend international boundaries. Accordingly, the United States Government's decision-making structures and processes to address these challenges must remain equally adaptive and transformative. Both Councils are statutory bodies that the President will continue to chair. Invitations to participate in specific Council meetings shall be extended to those heads of executive departments and agencies, and other senior officials, who are needed to address the issue or issues under consideration. When the President is absent from a meeting of either Council, the Vice President may preside at the President's direction.

The Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs (National Security Advisor) and the Assistant to the President for Homeland Security and Counterterrorism (Homeland Security Advisor) shall be responsible, as appropriate and at the President's direction, for determining the agenda for the NSC or HSC, respectively, ensuring that the necessary papers are prepared, and recording Council actions and Presidential decisions in a timely manner. When international economic issues are on the agenda of the NSC, the National Security Advisor and the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy shall perform these tasks in concert.

The NSC and HSC shall have as their regular attendees (both statutory and non-statutory) the President, the Vice President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Energy, the Secretary of Homeland Security, the National Security Advisor, the Homeland Security Advisor, and the Representative of the United States to the United Nations. When international economic issues are on the agenda of the NSC, the NSC's regular attendees will include the Secretary of Commerce, the United States Trade Representative, and the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy. The Director of National Intelligence and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as statutory advisers to the NSC, shall also attend NSC meetings. The Assistant to the President and Chief of Staff, the Assistant to the President and Chief Strategist, the Counsel to the President, the Deputy Counsel to the President for National Security Affairs, and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget are invited as attendees to any NSC meeting.

In addition to the NSC and HSC, there is also a single NSC staff within the Executive Office of the President that serves both the NSC and HSC. The staff is composed of regional, issue-focused, and functional directorates and headed by a single civilian Executive Secretary, pursuant to 50 U.S.C. 3021, who is also the Chief of Staff. All policy and staff activity decisions will be transmitted to the Executive Secretary for appropriate distribution and awareness. The purpose of the NSC staff is to advise me, the National Security Advisor, the Homeland Security Advisor, the NSC members, the HSC members, and others in the White House; to facilitate the implementation of Administration policy; and to help coordinate the national-security-related activities of the executive departments and agencies.

B. The Principals Committee

The Principals Committee (PC) shall continue to serve as the Cabinet-level senior interagency forum for considering policy issues that affect the national security interests of the United States. The PC shall be convened and chaired by the National Security Advisor or the Homeland Security Advisor, as appropriate, in consultation with the appropriate attendees of the PC. The Chair shall determine the agenda in consultation with the appropriate committee members, and the Executive Secretary shall ensure that necessary papers are prepared and that conclusions and decisions are communicated in a timely manner. Invitations to participate in or attend a specific PC shall be extended at the discretion of the National Security Advisor and the Homeland Security Advisor, and may include those Cabinet-level heads of executive departments and agencies, and other senior officials, who are needed to address the issue under consideration.

The PC shall have as its regular attendees the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Homeland Security, the Assistant to the President and Chief of Staff, the Assistant to the President and Chief Strategist, the National Security Advisor, and the Homeland Security Advisor. The Director of National Intelligence and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff shall attend where issues pertaining to their responsibilities and expertise are to be discussed. The Counsel to the President, the Deputy Counsel to the President for National Security Affairs, and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget may attend all PC meetings.

The Assistant to the President and Deputy National Security Advisor (Deputy National Security Advisor), the Deputy Assistant to the President and National Security Advisor to the Vice President, and the Executive Secretary (who shall serve as the Executive Secretary of the PC) shall attend all of the meetings of the PC, and the Representative of the United States to the United Nations and the Assistant to the President for Intragovernmental and Technology Initiatives may attend as appropriate.

When international economic issues are on the agenda of the PC, the Committee's regular attendees will include the Secretary of Commerce, the United States Trade Representative, and the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy (who shall serve as Chair for agenda items that principally pertain to international economics).

C. The Deputies Committee

The Deputies Committee (DC) shall continue to serve as the senior sub-Cabinet interagency forum for consideration of, and where appropriate, decision-making on, policy issues that affect the national security interests of the United States. The DC shall be convened and chaired by the Deputy National Security Advisor or the Deputy Assistant to the President and Deputy Homeland Security Advisor (Deputy Homeland Security Advisor), as appropriate. The Chair shall determine the agenda in consultation with the regular DC members, and the Executive Secretary shall ensure that necessary papers are prepared and that conclusions and decisions are communicated in a timely manner. Invitations to participate in or attend a specific DC meeting shall be extended by the Chair to those at the Deputy or Under Secretary level of executive departments and agencies, and to other senior officials, who are needed to address the issue under consideration.

The DC shall have as its regular members the Deputy Secretary of State, the Deputy Secretary of the Treasury, the Deputy Secretary of Defense, the Deputy Attorney General, the Deputy Secretary of Homeland Security, the Deputy Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Deputy Director of National Intelligence, the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Deputy Assistant to the President and National Security Advisor to the Vice President, the Deputy National Security Advisor, the Deputy Homeland Security Advisor, and the Administrator of the United States Agency for International Development.

The Executive Secretary shall attend the DC meetings. The Deputy Counsel to the President for National Security Affairs may attend all DC meetings. The relevant Deputy Assistant to the President for the specific regional and functional issue under consideration shall also be invited to attend. Likewise, when and where appropriate, the Deputy Assistant to the President for Strategic Planning, the Deputy Assistant to the President for Strategic Communication, the Deputy Assistant to the President for International Economic Affairs, the Deputy Assistant to the President for Transnational Issues, and the Deputy Representative of the United States to the United Nations, shall also be invited to attend. Other senior officials shall be invited where appropriate.

The DC shall review and monitor the work of the interagency national security process, including the interagency groups established pursuant to section D below. The DC shall help to ensure that issues brought before the NSC, HSC, and PC have been properly analyzed and prepared for decision. The DC shall also focus significant attention on monitoring the implementation of policies and decisions and shall conduct periodic reviews of the Administration's major national security and foreign policy initiatives. The DC is responsible for establishing Policy Coordination Committees (PCCs) and for providing objectives and clear guidance.

D. Policy Coordination Committees

Management of the development and implementation of national security policies by multiple executive departments and agencies typically shall be accomplished by the PCCs, with participation primarily occurring at the Assistant Secretary level. As the main day-to-day fora for interagency coordination of national security policies, the PCCs shall provide policy analysis for consideration by the more senior committees of the national security system and ensure timely responses to the President's decisions.

Regional and issue-related PCCs shall be established at the direction of the DC. Members of the NSC staff (or National Economic Council staff, as appropriate) will chair the PCCs; the DC, at its discretion, may add co-chairs to any PCC. The PCCs shall review and coordinate the implementation of Presidential decisions in their respective policy areas. The Chair of each PCC, in consultation with the Executive Secretary, shall invite representatives of other executive departments and agencies to attend meetings of the PCC where appropriate. The Chair of each PCC, with the agreement of the Executive Secretary, may establish subordinate working groups to assist that PCC in the performance of its duties.

An early meeting of the DC will be devoted to establishing the PCCs, determining their memberships, and providing them with mandates and strict guidance. Until the DC has established otherwise, the existing system of Interagency Policy Committees shall continue.

E. General

The President and the Vice President may attend any and all meetings of any entity established by or under this memorandum.

This document is part of a series of National Security Presidential Memoranda that shall replace both Presidential Policy Directives and Presidential Study Directives as the instrument for communicating relevant Presidential decisions. This memorandum shall supersede all other existing Presidential guidance on the organization or support of the NSC and the HSC. With regard to its application to economic matters, this document shall be interpreted in concert with any Executive Order governing the National Economic Council and with Presidential Memoranda signed hereafter that implement either this memorandum or that Executive Order.

The Secretary of Defense is hereby authorized and directed to publish this memorandum in the Federal Register.

DONALD J. TRUMP

COUNTER-TERRORISM

NYTimes Analysis Examines FBI "Shadowy" Efforts To Identify Islamic Extremists.

The New York Times (1/28, Lichtblau, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) examined the prosecution of veteran Washington transit officer Nick Young for helping ISIL, as a review "offers a revealing look at the FBI's shadowy cat-and-mouse efforts to identify possible Islamic extremists." The Times cautioned that his case also "poses a challenge to the FBI's expanding use of undercover operations to identify Islamic State sympathizers inside the United States." Young, the article said, was charged with provided the ISIL with "material support" by giving $245 in Google Play gift cards to a Muslim friend named Mo, who was "in reality, an undercover informant," to support recruitment efforts. His lawyers, however, argue the FBI has "entrapped him, with undercover operatives popping in and out of his life for at least six years."

Authorities Investigate Threat To "Blow Up" Colorado Refugee Center.

Reuters (1/27, Coffman) reported that the FBI and local authorities are probing anonymous notes found in and around a Colorado refugee center threatening to "blow up" the facility. "The two identical, typewritten notes were left on Thursday in the parking lot and stairwell of the Mango House in the Denver suburb of Aurora, both with the message: 'WERE GONNA BLOW UP ALL OF YOU REFUGEES,'" Reuters said, citing police. "This is an ongoing investigation and is a top priority for us," said Aurora Police Department spokesman Chris Amsler. "The FBI is now assisting us in our efforts to solve this bias-motivated crime." The Council for Islamic-American Relations has called upon authorities to treat the letters as "a terroristic threat and act accordingly." The Denver Post (1/27, Worthington, 778K) reported similarly.

Continuing Coverage: Wife Of Man Charged In San BernardIno Attack Pleads Guilty To Marriage Fraud.

Reuters (1/26, Gorman) reports in continuing coverage that Mariya Chernykh, the Russian born wife of the man accused of supplying the San Bernardino terrorists with guns, pleaded guilty Thursday to immigration fraud charges. Chernykh admitted to paying Enrique Marquez Jr. to marry her to enable her to stay in the United States. She pleaded "guilty to charges of conspiracy, perjury and making false statements, and now faces a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison and a $1 million fine when she is sentenced in November," Reuters says. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Hamilton, 4.52M) reported that Chernykh had originally come to US on a temporary visa in 2009. NBC News (1/27, 2.67M) reported that in addition to charges related to the San Bernardino attackers, Marquez also faces charges in the sham marriage case.

My News LA (CA) (1/26) and the New York Daily News (1/27, Schroeder, 4.45M) also reported on this story.

Draft Order Shows Trump Will Keep Guantánamo Open, Resume Broader Detention Policies.

The New York Times (1/27, Goldman, Weiser, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reported President Trump is expected to issue "an executive order keeping Guantánamo open and then fill it with 'bad dudes,'" which the Times said is a formal endorsement of the view held by Attorney General-designate Sen. Jeff Sessions that "the Obama administration sacrificed valuable intelligence by bringing terrorism cases in federal court." The Times said that by doing so, Trump will challenge "a founding principle of [former President] Obama's national security strategy" that an alternative legal system is not needed to keep America safe from terrorism. However, the Times highlighted the prosecution of Somali terrorist Ahmed Abdulkadir Warsame in federal court, which Justice Department and FBI officials believed was a success that proved Obama's strategy worked. In fact, a look at Mr. Warsame's case "suggests it could again become a flash point in a debate over which system – civilian or military – is best to handle terrorism cases."

The AP (1/27, Fox) said Trump is expressing an interest in not only keeping Guantánamo open, but also "resuming the broader detention and interrogation policies that made the detention center a focus of global protest over human rights." Though Trump's plans for Guantanamo "are unclear," the draft executive order says the Administration believes keeping the facility open will serve "as a critical tool in the fight against international radical Islamist groups." The AP said that during his presidency, Obama reduced Guantanamo's population from 242 to 41 – including 15 men designated "high-value detainees" – but failed to shut it down. Now, it "would not be hard to again load up Guantanamo, which at its height in 2003 held around 680 prisoners."

At Least Five Killed By Gunmen At Quebec City Mosque.

The Washington Post (1/29, Hawkins, 11.43M) reports that "multiple people were killed and others injured Sunday after gunmen opened fire on worshipers at a Quebec City mosque during evening prayers," police said. Witnesses said "as many as three gunmen" fired at the Quebec City Islamic Cultural Center, according to the Montreal Gazette, which reported that "about 100 people were inside." The AP (1/29) reports five people were killed, Quebec City Islamic Cultural Center President Mohamed Yangui confirmed, and USA Today (1/29, Toppo, 5.28M) reports Quebec City police spokesman Constable Pierre Poirier "said two suspects were arrested."

Reuters (1/29, Dougherty) reports Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau said on Twitter: "Tonight, Canadians grieve for those killed in a cowardly attack on a mosque in Quebec City. My thoughts are with victims & their families." The New York Times (1/29, Austen, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Philippe Couillard, the premier of Quebec, said on Twitter that the province "categorically rejects this barbaric violence."

Judge Refuses To Toss Lawsuit On Harsh CIA Interrogation.

The AP (1/27, Geranios) reports a federal judge on Friday "refused to dismiss a lawsuit against two psychologists who designed the CIA's harsh interrogation methods used on terror detainees, pushing them closer to a trial that is expected to include secret information." The ACLU had sued James Mitchell and John "Bruce" Jessen "on behalf of three former detainees, Gul Rahman, who died in custody, and Suleiman Abdullah Salim and Mohamed Ahmed Ben Soud, who claim they were tortured in CIA prisons in Afghanistan." Trial is currently set for June in the lawsuit.

Trump Signs Executive Order Expediting Conflict Against ISIS.

The Washington Post (1/28, Rucker, Ryan, 11.43M) reports President Trump issued a directive order to the Joint Chiefs on Saturday, in which he established a 30-day deadline to submit a strategy to defeat ISIS. The measure highlights Trump's commitment to combating global terrorism more aggressively than former President Obama, as Trump pledged during the campaign. On condition of anonymity, a defense official said the extent of the Administration's campaign "would depend upon the political risk that the president is willing to take when we do certain things that could exacerbate things with Russia or Turkey or the PMF," or the Iranian-backed militias in Iraq. The official added that new proposals will ensure battlefield commanders "have the wherewithal and the leeway to do what they have to do to successfully prosecute the campaign."

Reuters (1/28, Stewart) says Trump predicted that the executive order is "going to be very successful. That's big stuff." Defense Secretary Mattis has rallied for a more forceful approach to ISIS, but the implementation of that goals is not yet clear. Furthermore, military officials "have long acknowledged" that the US "could more quickly defeat" the group by committing its own troops instead of using local fighters, but the measure is not likely to garner much support, would likely result in more American lives lost, and would not likely secure a long-term solution. Reuters adds that the Administration has yet to decide "whether to directly provide weapons to Kurdish fighters in Syria as they push toward Raqqa, despite fierce objections from NATO ally Turkey." On Friday, Trump met with military officials at the Pentagon for about an hour, during which they discussed not only how to defeat ISIS, but also "other hot-button issues, including the threat from North Korea."

Navy SEAL Killed, Three Others Wounded In Yemen Raid.

Reuters (1/29, Ghobari, Stewart) reports that a "US commando" died and three others were wounded on Sunday while "carrying out a deadly dawn raid on the al Qaeda militant group in southern Yemen," the "first military operation authorized by President Donald Trump." The US military said 14 militants were killed in a raid targeting Yemen's al Qaeda branch. "Two more US servicemen were injured when an American military aircraft was sent to evacuate the wounded commandos," but came under fire and had to be "intentionally destroyed in place," the Pentagon said.

According to the New York Times (1/29, Schmitt, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), a brother-in-law of Anwar al-Awlaki was believed to have been killed in the raid, and "after initially denying that there were any civilian casualties," US officials "said they were assessing reports that women and children had died in the attack." The AP (1/29, Colvin, Al-Haj) reports that "nearly 30 others" were killed in the raid.

Bloomberg Politics (1/29, Carey, 201K) reports President Trump "was kept informed of the operation, White House press secretary Sean Spicer said" Sunday on ABC's This Week  . In a statement, the AP (1/29) reports the President issued a statement saying, "brave US forces were instrumental in killing" an estimated 14 militants and capturing "important intelligence that will assist the US in preventing terrorism against its citizens and people around the world."

ABC World News Tonight  (1/29, story 6, 1:05, Llamas, 14.63M) said it "has learned the raid was being planned while President Obama was still in office, but it was President Trump who gave it the green light." The CBS Weekend News  (1/29, story 3, 1:30, Quijano) likewise said the "high stakes and risky raid was planned during the Obama Administration and authorized by President Trump." Commandos from the Navy SEAL Team 6 targeted the "headquarters for Al

Qaeda's branch in Yemen, believed to contain vital intelligence inside that warranted a ground operation."

CRIMINAL INVESTIGATIONS

FBI Agent Testifies At Hearing For Malheur Refuge Takeover Defendant.

The Oregonian (1/27, Bernstein, 894K) reported that FBI Special Agent Troy Nicoll testified Friday at a hearing in the case of Malheur National Wildlife Refuge occupier Darryl Thorn, who was arrested by Nicoll and several other agents in a motel on Feb. 11. Thorn has sought to suppress statements he made to agents, arguing they had used excessive force to take him into custody. During Thorn's arrest, agents slapped a cup of coffee out of his hand and forced him to the ground. Nicoll testified that agents acted as they did in the interest of "officer safety." According to the Oregonian, "U.S. District Judge Anna J. Brown agreed with the government, finding no facts to support Thorn's position and denied his motion to suppress his statements." Thorn will face trial next month on felony charges of possession of a firearm in a federal facility and conspiracy to impede federal workers.

Prosecutors To Interview De Blasio Next Month In Fundraising Probe.

The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Orden, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reported federal prosecutors will interview New York Mayor Bill de Blasio in early February as part of a corruption investigation related to the mayor's fundraising operations, according to those familiar with the case. The Journal says de Blasio is not expected to be interviewed under oath and that it still is not clear what aspect of the fundraising operation prosecutors will focus on. A spokesman for the mayor, Eric Phillips, said, "We've been fully cooperative all along, and we will continue to be." WNBC-TV New York (1/27, Russo, 338K) reported online that de Blasio "plans to answer the questions without the protection of immunity."

US Charges Nevada Man In Killing Of San Francisco Gang Leader.

The AP (1/27) reports from San Francisco that "a Las Vegas man has been charged with taking part in the 2006 murder of the leader of an organization with criminal ties in San Francisco's Chinatown." Wen Bing Lei was indicted by a federal grand jury "on a charge of murder in the death of Allen Leung during racketeering activity." The AP notes that Raymond "Shrimp Boy" Chow was convicted last year "and sentenced to life in prison in Leung's killing and on racketeering charges." Chow "has denied involvement in the killing."

Data Shows Human Trafficking Cases Rising.

The Bristol (VA) Herald Courier (1/28) reports data released from the UN Office on Drugs and Crime "reveals that the number of human trafficking victims and convictions has increased every year since 2010 in the United States." Tennessee Bureau of Investigation Special Agent in Charge Margie Quin "said law enforcement officers have received better training on the difficult and clandestine subject," and "authorities are more likely these days to recognize human trafficking during investigations, she added." The Herald Courier also focuses on organized trafficking "that is conducted or perpetrated by gangs and organized crime groups," such as MS-13.

Tennessee Armory Shooting Leaves Ten Wounded.

Reuters (1/28, Dobuzinskis) reported a Friday shooting at the National Guard Armory in western Tennessee has left 10 wounded, three of whom were still hospitalized on Saturday, according to a Tennessee Bureau of Investigation spokeswoman. Reuters said that an arrest has not yet been made, but noted the armory had been rented out for a party and that fighting erupted shortly before midnight. Eight of the wounded are underage, the piece said. Fox News' (1/29, 11.07M) website reported similarly.

Investigators Looking Into Texas Mosque Fire.

ABC World News Tonight (1/28, story 5, 0:10, Vega, 14.63M) reported that investigators are looking into a fire that destroyed a Texas mosque overnight. Coverage noted that no one was hurt and that a cause has not yet been released.

Ex-Police Officer Sentenced To Eight Years In Prison For Illegal Narcotics Distribution.

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (1/27, Pulkkinen, 666K) reports ex-police officer Juan Gallinal – who was "swept up in a Drug Enforcement Administration operation targeting an online pharmacy ring he helped build into a leading illicit supplier of pain medication" – was sentenced Friday at US District Court in Seattle to eight years in prison for "illegally distributed thousands of doses of prescription narcotics." Annette Hayes, US attorney for Western Washington, is quoted saying, "This defendant is one of the 'founding fathers' of this internet pharmacy business that exploited the drug addiction of people across the country for his own gain. ... Using a sham owner, shell corporations and databases hidden on a server in Switzerland, Mr. Gallinal tried to hide his business and his role from the law."

Florida Teens Accused Of Planning "Columbine-Style" Shooting.

ABC World News Tonight (1/27, story 6, 1:25, Muir, 14.63M) reported two Florida teenagers arrested on Friday were "accused of plotting a Columbine-style attack at their middle school," which authorities say was supposed to take place Friday. Police reports reveal "chilling details, including their signal that would begin the attack and their plan to tell fellow students to wear white." Sumter County Sheriff's Office Captain Chris Hayworth said the suspects told other students to either wear white to school "if they didn't want to get shot," which "was serious enough to the point that the other children were scared."

Businessman Accused Of Attacking Muslim Airport Worker At JFK.

The AP (1/27, Long) reports Robin Rhodes, the president of Nitrofreeze Cryogenic Solutions, a metals company based in Massachusetts, attacked a Muslim employee at a Kennedy Airport lounge on Wednesday, "kicking her, shouting obscenities at her and saying that President Donald Trump 'will get rid of all of you,'" authorities said. The employee recalled Rhodes saying, "Trump is here now. He will get rid of all of you. You can ask Germany, Belgium and France about these kinds of people. You see what happens," prosecutors said. Rhodes appeared in court Thursday night "on charges of assault and menacing as hate crimes and is being held on $30,000 bail."

Reuters (1/27, Cherelus) identifies the victim as Rabeeya Khan, "who was wearing a hijab...while she was working at Delta Airlines' Sky Lounge on Wednesday evening, Queens District Attorney Richard Brown said in a statement on Thursday." Rhodes approached the door where Khan was working and said, "Are you sleeping? Are you praying? What are you doing?" Then he punched the door, threatened her, and kicked her in the right leg.

New Jersey Prosecutor: State Won't Pursue Misconduct Charge Against Christie.

The AP (1/27) reports New Jersey prosecutors "said Friday they will not pursue a criminal misconduct case against Republican Gov. Chris Christie in the George Washington Bridge lane-closing scandal," in part because the state "does not believe it can prove official misconduct beyond a reasonable doubt," according to release from Bergen County assistant prosecutor John Higgins. The AP characterizes the letter as dealing "a blow to the misconduct case stemming from a complaint filed by" former Teaneck firefighter and Democratic candidate for governor William Brennan. Meanwhile, Christie's office "said in a statement that the governor was 'gratified' the 'baseless fiasco' has ended."

Familial Searching Could Surface Suspects In New York Killing.

The New York Times (1/27, Rosenberg, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports on the unsolved killing "of a young woman in Queens during a jog last summer." While tips about potential suspects have gone nowhere, authorities say that the DNA recovered from the victim's body "could hold the key to solving the case if state officials authorize what is called familial searching, which allows investigators to search criminal databases to identify likely relatives of the offender." The technique has been used "more than a dozen times in the United States over the last 10 years," but the method "raises some complicated ethical issues" and "is not immune from human error."

Prosecutors Drop Felony Charges Against Reporter Covering Pre-Inauguration Riot.

U.S. News & World Report (1/27, Nelson, 1.02M) reports prosecutors announced Friday afternoon "that they are dropping a felony rioting charge against" Vocativ Senior Producer Evan Engel, who was "one of the journalists arrested after covering a violent confrontation outside President Donald Trump's inauguration." Spokesman for the District of Columbia US Attorney's Office Bill Miller "was unable to comment on the status of felony charges facing the remaining six journalists, including Alex Rubinstein of RT and freelancer Aaron Cantu, who has written for Vice and Al-Jazeera America." USA Today (1/27, Craig, 5.28M) says the arrests of Engel and several other reporters "outraged journalism organizations, which quickly condemned the actions of the police."

Former Gymnast Alleges Sexual Abuse By Coach, Doctor.

The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Brazil, 4.52M) reported that a lawsuit filed by a former Team USA gymnastics member in California state court on Tuesday alleges that the woman was sexually abused as a minor by coach Don Peters and physician Larry Nassar. "Nassar is currently being held without bail after being arrested on child pornography charges in December," the Times said. Dozens of people have accused him of sexual assault. The lawsuit names the SCATS gym in Huntington Beach, where Peters and Nassar formerly worked.

Continuing Coverage: FBI "Most Wanted" Fugitive Surrenders At Texas Border.

Fox News (1/28, 11.07M) reported in continuing coverage that Robert Van Wisse, a man on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted Fugitive list, surrendered at the Texas border on Thursday. He is suspected of killing 22-year-old Laurie Stout on the University of Texas campus in 1983.

Former Classics Professor Sentenced On Child Porn Charges.

The New York Post (1/27, Miller, 3.82M) reported, "A former professor in Ohio who specialized in the sexuality of ancient Greece and Rome was sentenced to four years in prison after admitting his addiction to child pornography." Former University of Cincinnati professor Holt Parker was arrested last Match after investigators found he traded and downloaded child pornography using the email account daddy.cruel@yahoo.com. FBI agents raided his home and seized a computer and a damaged thumb drive Parker admitted he had tried to destroy. "Child pornography is dangerous contraband, and possessing it is a serious crime," Acting US Attorney Benjamin Glassman said last August. "Prosecuting cases like this reflects our commitment to using all the tools at our disposal to protect the most vulnerable."

DC Police Searching For Suspect Who Kidnapped Georgetown Student.

ABC World News Tonight  (1/28, story 8, 1:25, Vega, 14.63M) reported that a Georgetown University student was abducted at gunpoint by a man in a suit and that a manhunt is now underway to find him. Correspondent Gloria Riviera said "The police report claims the suspect asked the student for money, and then he grabbed him by the arm and pulled him into the car. Police say he tried to force the student to take out money from several ATMs before entering those stores."

FBI Launches Social Media Campaign In Search Of Missing Child.

The Ventura County (CA) Star (1/27, 163K) reported that the FBI has launched a social media campaign to help find a missing 4-year-old California girl. "On Wednesday, the FBI posted Kimberly's missing-child flier on Twitter, garnering hundreds of retweets and likes," the Star said. "At this point, we hope someone will come forward with information that we're not getting from family members and will lead us to her," said FBI spokeswoman Laura Eimiller.

Taxi Driver Helped Authorities Nab Alleged Bank Robber.

The Chicago Daily Herald (1/27, 375K) reported, "An alert taxi driver – and a bit of luck – helped the FBI nab a suspect accused of robbing" two Illinois banks. According to the FBI, Jeremy C. Wood hailed a taxi en route to a bank and asked the driver for a piece of paper and a pen before arriving. The same driver was dispatched to drive Wood to the second bank later that week , but recognized him as a suspected bank robber and arranged to have authorities alerted. Police officers arrested Wood as he left the scene.

FBI Offers Reward For California Serial Bank Robber.

The Napa Valley (CA) Register (1/27, 67K) reported that the FBI is offering a $20,000 reward for a man suspected of carrying out nine Northern California bank robberies. "The suspect is described as a young, white male in his 20s or 30s, standing at about 5 feet, 8 inches with a slender build and dark hair," the Register said. The man, who brandishes a weapon during his heists, began his spree in 2013 and last stuck late last year.

FBI Arrests Tennessee Bank Robber In Seattle.

The AP (1/27) reported that FBI agents in Seattle have arrested Tony Allen Barnes, "a man charged with robbing a credit union in Tennessee." Barnes was arrested on a federal charge of unlawful flight to avoid prosecution and will be sent back to Tennessee to face the robbery charge. The Memphis (TN) Commercial Appeal (1/27, 229K) reported similarly.

Men Facing Charges In Pair Of Louisiana Bank Robberies.

The AP (1/27) reported that 22-year-old Dwayne Anthony "Butter" Winans Jr. and 21-year-old Bryson Tuesno have been charged with robbing two Louisiana banks on Aug. 15. "Winans is also accused of another New Orleans bank robbery that occurred Aug. 4 in which the FBI says he disguised himself as a woman, and two Aug. 12 carjackings," the AP says.

Trump Inherits Clemency Bid For Blagojevich.

The Chicago Sun-Times (1/27, Seidel, 798K) reports Obama's decision to ignore a clemency request from former Illinois governor Rod Blagojevich has left Blagojevich's bid for a sentence reduction "in the hands of the more unpredictable President Donald Trump – with whom Blagojevich also has a connection." After appearing on Trump's TV show, "Celebrity Apprentice," Blagojevich was "fired" for poor performance. But Trump described Blagojevich as a "guy with great courage" and says he "was very nice on the show." After Blagojevich's conviction, Trump indicated his "punishment shouldn't be too harsh." The article notes that days before Christmas the Justice Department "confirmed that Blagojevich had asked for a presidential commutation."

Emmett Till Accuser Recants Statement From Lynching Case.

Reporting for CBS Evening News (1/27, story 7, 2:20, Pelley, 11.17M), Jim Axelrod covers a new book by author Tim Tyson that includes an interview with Carolyn Bryant – the woman whose "lie set...in motion" the lynching of 14-year-old Emmett Till in 1955 – during which she recants her story. Axelrod said that Till's murder trial, Bryant "testified Till made lewd advances, verbal and physical." In his book, Tyson said, "In court she testified to something that was tantamount to attempted rape. What she said was, 'that part's not true.'" The New York Times (1/27, Pérez-Peña, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reported on Bryant's "broken silence," saying she has "acknowledged that the most incendiary parts of the story she and others told about Emmett – claims that seem tame today but were more than enough to get a black person killed in Jim Crow-era Mississippi – were false."

New York City Settles Lawsuit Over Shooting By Off-Duty Officer For $8.2 million.

The New York Times (1/27, Mele, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports the city of New York has agreed to pay more than $8 million to settle a lawsuit leveled by a man who was hit by gunfire six times from a drunken, off-duty police officer. The Times says the man, Joseph Felice, will receive $6.9 million while his friend, Robert Borrelli, who was with him but was not hit, will receive $1.3 million. The city's Law Department said that it was "in the best interests of the city" to settle the case.

FINANCIAL CRIME & CORPORATE SCANDALS

Two Men Accused Of Running Ponzi Scheme, Swindling Ticket-Reselling Business Investors.

Reuters (1/27, Stempel, Raymond) reported on the unveiling of criminal charges for two men who allegedly operated "a hedge fund as a Ponzi scheme and of swindling investors in a ticket-reselling business for popular events, including the smash Broadway musical 'Hamilton.'" Sideris Capital Partners alternative investments head Steven Simmons and Joseph Meli, "who ran the ticket business...were arrested on Friday on securities fraud and wire fraud charges brought by Manhattan federal prosecutors." The Boston Globe (1/27, Healy, 1.08M) reported, "According to a complaint filed Friday in New York, Joseph Meli and Matthew Harriton raised about $81 million from at least 125 investors in 13 states. They allegedly told investors the money would be used to finance the buying and reselling of tickets to high-profile events." The defendants instead "diverted at least $51 million of the incoming investor funds to perpetuate a Ponzi scheme and to enrich themselves," according to SEC investigators.

The AP (1/27, Neumeister) reported that each of the men were released on $1 million bail after a federal magistrate rejected the government's request to have them held without bail. "When fraudsters think they're going to get away with scheming investors out of money, they tend to forget that at some point the money will run out. It's the way a Ponzi scheme ends," said FBI New York Assistant Director in Charge William F. Sweeney Jr. The defendants, he added, had joked about the alleged scheme, calling it a "shell game." The AP quotes Deputy US Attorney Joon H. Kim as saying, "Meli allegedly made up out of whole cloth purported deals to buy Broadway tickets that he could later sell at a profit. ... But as alleged, Meli was just robbing Peter to pay Paul."

The New York Times (1/27, Rosenberg, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reported that Meli allegedly falsely told some investors that he had negotiated a deal "with the producer of "Hamilton" to buy large blocks of tickets to the show that would then be resold." No such agreement ever existed. "Separately," Bloomberg News (1/27, Berthelsen, 2.41M) reported, "the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission charged Meli and a third man, Matthew Harriton, in the same scheme, telling investors they had a deal to buy and resell 35,000 tickets to the show."

USA Today (1/27, McCoy, 5.28M), the Christian Science Monitor (1/29, Glascock, 387K), the Los Angeles Times (1/27, Masunaga, 4.52M), and the Wall Street Journal (1/27, Steele, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reported similarly. The New York Daily News (1/28, 4.45M) and Billboard Magazine (1/29, 589K) posted the AP's coverage to their websites.

Georgia Couple Plead Guilty To Fraud Scheme.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/29, 1.41M) reports that an Alpharetta, GA couple "has admitted helping to defraud office supply company Staples of more than $1.4 million in a complex scheme involving customer loyalty rewards and rebates." John Douglas "and a conspirator created more than 1,100 fake customer loyalty accounts using fictitious names, then used a computer program to claim rewards for purchases they did not make, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Massachusetts, where the case was prosecuted." Douglas and his wife, Analyn, "along with others, then used the rewards to obtain merchandise from Staples and sell it on eBay." John Douglas, 46, "pleaded guilty last week to conspiracy to commit wire fraud and mail fraud," and Analyn Douglass, 41, "was given a deferred prosecution agreement after admitting to her involvement in the conspiracy to ship stolen Staples goods through interstate commerce."

Wal-Mart, Feds Still Dispute Terms In Settlement Over Bribery Allegations.

The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Lublin, Viswanatha, Nassauer, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that after having spent $820 million over five years, Wal-Mart failed to settle a foreign-bribery probe by the Justice Department and Securities and Exchange Commission, which includes allegations that Wal-Mart violated the FCPA by bribing foreign government officials, according to people familiar with the investigation. The Journal says that Wal-Mart and the government failed to strike a deal in part because their settlement terms were very far apart. In addition to disagreement over the size of monetary penalties, the people familiar with the probe said some of the sticking points were Wal-Mart's concern over its ability to continue accepting food stamps in the US as well as the government's desire to assign an independent monitor, which Wal-Mart executives have said is unnecessary because it ramped up its compliance efforts.

Warren Asks Labor Department To Reinstate "Dismantled" Whistleblower Website.

Reuters (1/27, Lynch) reports Sen. Elizabeth Warren on Friday accused the US Labor Department "of dismantling a website designed to" help Wells Fargo workers "file whistleblower retaliation and other complaints against the bank." Warren asked the department to reinstate it, writing in a letter to Acting Labor Secretary Edward Hugler that she "noticed on Tuesday that the site (www.dol.gov/wellsfargo) was gone and contained the words 'Page Not Found.'" Labor Department spokesman Steve Barr "told Reuters the site was removed on January 9, but did not comment further on the reasons why it was taken down."

CYBER DIVISION

Twitter Discloses Two National Security Letters From FBI.

The Hill (1/27, Neidig, 1.25M) reported that Twitter on Friday disclosed two national security letters (NSLs) that had been issued by the FBI in the past two years. The letters, which sought information on Twitter users, had previously been protected by gag orders. "The FBI's letters ordered the social media company to provide the name, address, length of service and records of message transactions of the specific users. The letters added, however, that Twitter should not turn over the contents of any communications," The Hill says. The Verge (1/28, Liptak, 1.25M) reported that the letters also instructed that Twitter was not to "disable, suspend, lock, cancel or interrupt service" to either account, for fear that the targets would become aware that they were being investigated.

Reuters (1/27, Volz) reported that the newly released orders "bolster the belief among privacy advocates that the FBI has routinely used NSLs to seek internet records beyond the limitations set down in a 2008 Justice Department legal memo, which concluded such orders should be constrained to phone billing records." According to Electronic Frontier Foundation staff attorney Aaron Crocker, "This is an ongoing practice and it is significantly beyond the scope of what is intended." Crocker's organization is disputing the constitutionality of NSLs in federal court. The Christian Science Monitor (1/29, Williams, 387K) reports similarly.

Hackers Infect DC Surveillance System With Ransomware.

WTOP-FM Washington (1/28, Foley, 282K) reported in continuing coverage on its website that hackers infected up to 70 percent – or 123 of 187 – of the surveillance cameras in Washington, DC with ransomware ahead of the inauguration. According to the article, "officials said this was a localized hack that neither affected the city's network nor impacted ongoing investigations," though they refused to say whether they have any suspects in the attacks. WTOP added that officials with "the Secret Service and D.C. police said no one's safety was ever in jeopardy," and the city's CTO said no ransom has been paid.

WPost: Trump To Order Sweeping Review Of US Cybersecurity In Executive Order.

A Washington Post (1/26, Deyoung, Rucker, 11.43M) article last week that claimed to feature a draft executive order calling for a review of national cybersecurity continued to generate coverage throughout the weekend, largely centered on whether the reputed order will have greater implications for cybersecurity in the US.

The Hill (1/27, Uchill, 1.25M) reported a forthcoming executive order from President Trump is expected to call "for a large-scale review of national cybersecurity, The Washington Post reported Friday." Quoting a document the Post "said was a draft of the order," The Hill reported the White House believes "free and secure use of cyberspace is essential to advancing U.S. national interests.

... Cyberspace must be an environment that fosters efficiency, innovation communication, and economic prosperity without disruption, fraud, theft or invasion of privacy." According to the document provided by the Post, the Trump Administration "will task a team headed by the secretary of Defense – and including the heads of the Department of Homeland Security and the Office of the Director of National Intelligence – with generating reports on the security of defense systems and critical infrastructure" within 60 days. The team will also be tasked with assembling a report on the "'principle cyber adversaries' on the same timeline, with National Intelligence taking the lead."

C4ISR & Networks (1/27, Pomerleau) offered a brief breakdown of the order's "three-pronged approach toward addressing cyberspace," which includes reviews of the United States' cyber vulnerabilities, cyber adversaries, and cyber capabilities.

Federal Computer Week (1/27, Rockwell, 263K) reported the order is "aimed at strengthening civilian agency networks' cybersecurity capabilities," including asking DHS to "report on 'enhanced protections' for the most critical federal government, public and private infrastructure." The EO says "the executive departments and agencies tasked with protecting civilian government and infrastructure are not currently organized to act collectively/collaboratively, tasked or resourced, or provided with legal authority adequate to succeed in their missions," which FCW speculated "might be good news for DHS' stalled plan to reorganize and rename the National Protection and Programs Directorate the Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Protection Agency and bind cyber and physical security capabilities more closely to better reflect the links between security threats."

Vox (1/27, 1.15M) contributor Timothy B. Lee argued the leaked order "looks innocuous," consisting largely of "asking various agencies to gather information relevant to cybersecurity and report back within 60 to 100 days." Lee said the question should be "what the administration will do once those reports come back." He claimed the rumored order features "sensible first steps to prevent more disasters like the 2015 attack on the Office of Personnel Management." Lee concluded the Trump Administration's challenge will be to "figure out how to change the culture at government agencies to make security more of a priority – without imposing rigid policies that prevent agencies from getting their work done," which is an issue "that's not...explored in the draft executive order."

Foreign Policy (1/27, 359K) contributor Elias Groll wrote that the order "lacks any sweeping measures and avoids controversy by creating review panels to examine cybersecurity issues," unlike Trump's previous efforts to "[court] controversy, [make] enemies, and [excite] his base with executive orders aimed at strengthening the U.S. border and upending American trade policy." Groll argued Trump's advisers have generally taken a "more hawkish approach to the use of American power in cyberspace," but the order includes "no concrete mention of how the United States might deter its adversaries in cyberspace." It states only that the US "is 'committed' to 'employing the full spectrum of capabilities to defend U.S. interests in cyberspace; and identifying, disrupting and defeating malicious cyber actors.'"

FBI Releases Report From "Gamergate" Controversy.

Digital Trends (1/27, Wagner, 463K) reported that the FBI recently released its report on the so-called "Gamergate" controversy, in which "a mob of online bullies decided to harass a number of game developers and social critics" who criticized "the video game industry's handling of gender roles and sexism." The FBI investigated the controversy amid reports of death threats. "The investigation report details a number of emails sent to unnamed recipients which threaten bombings, shootings, and all sorts of violence," Digital Trends said. Though the FBI seemingly took the investigation seriously, individual agents may not have, the website observed. "The report contains emails and filings from individual FBI agents who refer to Twitter as 'Tweeter' and TOR as 'Thor.'" Additionally, the FBI seemingly let some of those connected the death threats off with "little more than a warning."

The Verge (1/27, Robertson, 1.25M) reported that the 173-page report released by the FBI "primarily seems to cover harassment of against critic Anita Sarkeesian and game developer Brianna Wu." The investigation, the Verge said, eventually "petered out" when "the FBI wasn't able to identify the people behind some of the threats, apparently declined to prosecute others, and appears to have struggled with jurisdictional issues." Venture Beat (1/29, Takahashi, 126K) reported that Wu, who is running for Congress, voiced displeasure at the FBI's efforts to investigate the controversy. She wrote, "We sent the FBI an entire hard drive full of information. We had multiple meetings with them. What makes me want to pull my hair out with the report is only a fraction of a fraction of the information we gave them was ever looked into." Engadget (1/27, Seppala, 659K) and Slashdot (1/29, 46K) reported similarly.

Keeper Security CEO Says Cybersecurity Seems To Be "Top Initiative" For Trump.

Venture Beat (1/27, Johnson, 126K) interviewed Keeper Security CEO Darren Guccione about his assertion "that the United States needs to treat the nation's cybersecurity as if we were at war" and his expectation that "President Trump will have a positive impact on the nation's growing talent shortage in cybersecurity." Guccione said he feels the shortage of cybersecurity talent in the US is "a pervasive issue and action item" that must be addressed "because there's a cyber war going on right now, and the United States is the main target of that war, without a doubt." He also said that he believes cybersecurity is "a top initiative for" President Trump and called for the US government to be "reformed in a very large sense, not just with state of the art military aircraft but with cybersecurity protection and safeguards."

Different Rhetoric For China, Russia Hacking Suggests Potential Shift In US Cybersecurity Strategy.

Politico (1/28, Bennett, 2.46M) reported President Trump has been "showing sharply different reactions to countries that hack the United States," calling out China's efforts to pilfer US data while "giving Russia a pass." Although Trump "took three months" to accept the Intelligence Community's "conclusions that the Russian government was behind hacks of Democratic Party emails that helped undermine Hillary Clinton's campaign," Politico said he "has repeatedly blamed China for a pair of massive hacks that pilfered highly sensitive documents on more than 20 million current and former federal workers." Sen. Ben Cardin (MD), the ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, says the discrepancy is a sign the Administration's response to foreign government-sponsored cyberattacks could be influenced by his domestic political goals, while Cybersecurity Initiative at New America co-director Ian Wallace said Trump's commentary "certainly suggests that the strategy is going to be different" from the previous Administration.

NYTimes A1: Russia Prosecutes Cybersecurity Expert With Possible Link To Election Hacking.

The New York Times (1/27, Shane, Sanger, Kramer, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reported Russian authorities "are prosecuting at least one cybersecurity expert for treason, a prominent Russian criminal defense lawyer confirmed on Friday, while a Russian newspaper reported that the case is linked to hacking during the United States presidential election." The Times said the developments will "surely touching a nerve in American politics," even though they have "left a still muddled picture of what, exactly, a series of arrests by the security services here signifies." The "virtually simultaneous appearance of at least four prominent news reports" on the arrests "suggests that the normally opaque Russian government intends to reveal more information about the matter, though it is unclear why."

McClatchy (1/27, Johnson, 74K) reported the "mystery surrounding the recent arrests in Moscow of several high-level Russian cybersecurity figures" has sparked speculation "from two former employees of the National Security Agency" that one of the suspects "may have been an informant who provided crucial information to the United States about Russian meddling in the U.S. election campaign." McClatchy added that those arrested reportedly included Sergei Mikhailov, deputy chief of the FSB's cyber intelligence department, FSB officer Maj. Dmitry Dokuchayev, and Ruslan Stoyanov, a cybersecurity manager of well-known cybersecurity firm Kaspersky Lab.

According to the Washington (DC) Times (1/27, Blake, 272K), the case against Stoyanov and Mikhailov "were filed in a secret military tribunal under Article 275 of the country's constitution, which defines treason as 'espionage, disclosure of state secrets, or any other assistance rendered to a foreign organization, or their representatives in hostile activities to the detriment of the external security of the Russian Federation committed by a citizen of the Russian Federation.'" The accused face "a maximum punishment of 20 years imprisonment."

Hoover Institution research fellow and University of Houston energy fellow and Cullen Professor of Economics Paul Roderick Gregory argued in a Forbes (1/28, 15.17M) article Russian President Vladimir Putin's claim that the CIA hacked the Kremlin is an "uncharacteristically late" application of the Russian President's "rule Number 1," which is to "accuse your enemies – falsely – of doing to you what you are doing to them." Putin claims "it was U.S. intelligence that hacked his entire government," pointing to "proof in the form of high-level FSB cyber officers incarcerated in Moscow's legendary Lefortovo prison under Article 27." Gregory debates NYTimes (1/25, Kramer, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) author Andrew Kramer assertion that "the detention of an official who would have been in a position to engage in the election hacking in America could indicate a good-will gesture to the United States." Gregory concludes the "Lefortovo Four" will probably "stand trial in a public Moscow courtroom" – in which "they will confess – if that is necessary – to being American spies, just as Stalin's political enemies confessed to being Nazi spies and planned assassins of Stalin and his inner circle."

Russian Security Service: Hackers Attacked Major Banks In November 2016.

Reuters (1/27, Ostroukh) reported major commercial banks in Russia, including "Sberbank, Rosbank, Alfa Bank, Bank of Moscow, as well as the Moscow Exchange and other institutions," were targets of cyberattacks last November, according to Russia's Federal Security Service. Russian Security Service Deputy Head Dmitry Shalkov said Friday, "Analysis shows that the number of information attacks at Russian official information resources is on the rise. There were 70 million (such attacks) in 2016," including the "massive attack" that affected the banks between November 8 and November 14.

Rudy Giuliani Details "Passion" For Cybersecurity.

The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Wolfe, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) profiled former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani and explained his hopes for his new role as Trump's informal adviser on cybersecurity, which Giuliani said "is a passion of mine." He said the US hasn't "made this enough of a national priority, either for the federal government or for the private sector." Giuliani explained, "Of course, I'm more worried about national security, but the thing that's going to happen more often is the criminal activity, and that's going to affect more and more people." The Journal says Giuliani listed protecting the US electrical grid from cyberattacks as one of his highest priorities, but said also that he plans to address other government officials' top cybersecurity concerns by connecting them with private-sector security tech and experts who have experience with similar issues.

D-Wave To Use Quantum Computers To Fight Hackers.

Wired (1/27, Newman, 3.98M) reported quantum computing leader D-Wave last week unveiled its latest machine, the D-Wave 2000Q, and "its first customer: a cybersecurity firm called Temporal Defense Systems." The announcement represents "the first time quantum has been used to fight cyber crime" and, if successful, "could reshape how security analysts protect their networks from harm" in the future. Wired explained that quantum computing deviates from the normal computer language "by using quantum-mechanical properties, like entanglement and superposition, to store a 1 or 0 simultaneously in a unit called a 'qubit,'" which theoretically allows quantum machines to "compute exponentially faster than current systems." However, Wired pointed out "Quantum computing is far from a proven tool at this point, and it's just one of a handful of next-generation computing solution being applied to thorny cybersecurity issues."

CA Assemblyman's Website Hacked.

The Sacramento (CA) Bee (1/27, Miller, 574K) reported an unknown hackers group has attacked CA Assemblyman Evan Low's campaign website, with a motive apparently "linked to Low's leadership of the Legislature's Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender Caucus." The group "Shadows Team Hackers" claimed credit for the attack on its Facebook page, along with listing "other websites and social media handles for the lawmaker" and featuring "an image of fire burning the rainbow flag that symbolizes gay pride and diversity." The page was blocked as a security risk as of Friday afternoon.

Bankston: "Adult" Encryption Conversation Must Move Beyond Backdoors.

Slate (1/27, 1.83M) picked up an op-ed originally carried by New America Weekly (1/26) in which Policy Director for New America's Open Technology Institute Kevin Bankston blasted FBI Director James Comey's understanding of what an "'adult' conversation about encryption means." According to Bankston, Comey thinks "being 'adult' about encryption...means agreeing with his conclusion that the existence of unbreakable encryption – for example, the full-disk encryption that protects your iPhone against anyone who doesn't have your passcode... – poses an unacceptable threat to law and order." Bankston pointed out "the key committees in the House that have jurisdiction over the encryption issue have sent a clear signal to Comey and to his allies" that "the House is definitely not interested in legislating to require backdoors," which "essentially everyone but the FBI agrees are a bad idea." Bankston mentioned the House working group looking at the encryption issue indicated in a new report that "having the 'adult' conversation about encryption means talking about how law enforcement can adapt to a world where encryption is more common."

Koppel To Discuss Book About Cyberattacks On US Infrastructure.

My Central Jersey (1/29, Vanderhoof, 30K) reports "veteran journalist" Ted Koppel is scheduled to speak at NJPAC in Newark, New Jersey on March 23, when he will discuss the potential impact of a cyberattack on a US electrical grid – the subject of his latest book, "Lights Out: A Cyberattack, A Nation Unprepared, Surviving the Aftermath." The book reportedly is "the result of 18 months of in-depth research and interviews with scores of top people at every level of government" and includes "conversations with the last four heads of Department of Homeland Security, and Department of Defense." According to the article, "Koppel asked them" how the US is "prepared in the event of a cyberattack and long-term loss of our power grid." Their response was "we're not" and there are no "protocols are in place for the aftermath in the absence of our infrastructure." My Central Jersey interviews Koppel about his research and findings.

US, Russia Face Off Over Alleged Hacker Held In Prague.

The Guardian (UK) (1/27, Tait, Borger, 4.07M) reported alleged computer hacker and Russian citizen Yevgeniy Nikulin, 29, is "being held in the Czech Republic" and is now "at the centre of an international legal tussle between the United States and Russia amid lingering disquiet over Moscow's alleged interference in the recent US presidential election." Nikulin is facing "faces extradition requests from both countries," after he was detained by "Czech police on an Interpol arrest warrant issued by US authorities." A US federal court "followed up with an indictment charging him with offences relating to the hacking of computer networks belonging to LinkedIn, Dropbox and Formspring," for which he "faces a maximum 30 years in prison and up to $1m in fines." Meanwhile, Russian authorities issued an extradition order of their own, "demanding that he be returned to face allegations dating back to 2009 that he hacked another person's bank account and stole 111,000 roubles (£1,465)."

Professor: Web-Connected Medical Devices Have Benefits, Risks.

In an opinion piece for USA Today (1/28, 5.28M), Steve Weisman, a lawyer and professor at Bentley University, wrote about the benefits and risks of web-connected medical devices, including the risk of being compromised by hacking. Weisman noted a 2015 warning from the FBI that stated: "Once criminals have breached such devices, they have access to any personal or medical information stored on the devices and can possibly change the coding controlling the dispensing of medicines or health data collection." Weisman also provided readers with tips on how to protect their medical devices from cybersecurity risks.

Geography No Longer Defense For US Against Cyberthreats.

The AP (1/28, Abdollah) reports that the US has "long relied on its borders and superior military might" to protect itself against "foreign aggressors," but that there are no such boundaries or rulebooks in cyberspace, which "has increased the threat and leveled the playing field today." The article says that it's not clear how President Trump "will respond to cyberspace threats, which transcend traditional borders and make it easier and cheaper than ever for foreigners to attack the US." However, the approach Trump does take, the AP states, "will set the tone and precedent for global policies during a critical time when the ground rules are still being written."

Delta's Domestic Flights Grounded By Computer Glitch.

Bloomberg News (1/30, Sasso, 2.41M) reports Delta Air Lines joined United Continental Holdings as the second major US domestic airline to ground flights this week because of computer glitches. The Federal Aviation Administration issued a statement on its website in which it explained that Delta's domestic flights were grounded because of "automation issues," but confirmed its international flights were exempt from the grounding. The issue emerged shortly after Delta and other airlines struggled to adhere to the new travel restrictions implemented by President Trump's executive order blocking travelers from seven predominately-Muslim countries. USA Today (1/29, Toppo, Solis, 5.28M) reports the disruptions impacted airports in a number of cities, including Atlanta, Houston, and New York City, were reported on social media networks.

Professor: FBI Data Shows "Sanctuary" Cities Generally Safer Than Other Cities.

In an analysis of FBI crime data published by the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank, University of California at San Diego political science professor Tom Wong says that the "sanctuary cities" that President Trump has "repeatedly characterized as incubators of crime are generally safer than other cities," the Washington Post (1/27, Ingraham, 11.43M) reported. While Trump "often characterized these locales as dangerous hotbeds of criminal activity and promised to suspend all federal funding to them," Wong's study "finds that counties designated as 'sanctuary' areas by ICE typically experience significantly lower rates of all types of crime, including lower homicide rates, than comparable non-sanctuary counties."

Chicago Police Department Opens Data Centers In Hopes To Solve Murder Spike.

USA Today (1/27, Madhani, 5.28M) reports the Chicago Police Department – after opening its first two data-driven nerve centers on Friday – is "hoping a data-driven tech surge can help it stem its murder problem." The centers "will use hyper-local video and data in two of the city's most violent neighborhoods to help officers more quickly respond to shootings and help police predict where the next incident may occur."

Emanuel Seeking To Counter Trump Narrative On Violence In Chicago. The Chicago Tribune (1/27, Ruthhart, Gorner, Dardick, 2.54M) reports Chicago Mayor Rahm Emanuel held a "carefully orchestrated new conference" to discuss the city's "smart policing strategy" in response to President Trump's criticism that he needed to "smarten up and toughen up" on gun violence. The Tribune says Emanuel highlighted "new police cameras and gunshot tracking technology," as well as an order delivered to the Police Department officials "to flood the city's most violent neighborhoods with extra officers this weekend." The Tribune says the current number of homicides for January stand at 42 and that in January 2016 it was 54. Coming in lower than last year's rate would afford Emanuel the ability "to counter Trump's narrative of this year being off to an even worse start."

Chicago Police Department Releases Video Of Officer Involved Shooting. ABC World News Tonight (1/28, story 4, 1:45, Vega, 14.63M) reported on newly released police body cam video showing a chase and confrontation involved a shoot-out in Chicago. Correspondent Marci Gonzalez said that officers "rush[ed] towards a building, scaling fences, some taking cover" after a suspect, Richard Grimes, who "shot his pregnant girlfriend in the abdomen, killing their unborn baby." Grimes shot at officers, who killed him while returning fire. The incident, Gonzalez noted, the release of the video is part of the city's "new commitment to transparency after a Justice Department investigation found a pattern of excessive force following the city's most violent year in two decades."

NYTimes Analysis: Trump's "Grim Vision" Of Violence Misses Complex Realities In Cities. A New York Times (1/28, Eligon, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) analysis says President Trump's "broad and cutting rhetoric" on the problem of violence in American cities, which the Times says he has referred to as "carnage," does not "capture the complicated reality of urban America." The Times says that when he "speaks about cities' problems, he focuses almost exclusively on these pockets of entrenched social ills," which includes segregation, wealth gaps, disproportionate numbers of poor black and Latino families, poor schools and violence. The article notes that by "generalizing conditions in cities," Trump is "sowing fears and solidifying stereotypes, which serves to divide the country."

Police Departments Easing Grooming Standards For New Recruits.

The AP (1/28, Long) reports police departments are starting to relax traditional grooming standards for recruits in an effort to counter the hiring crisis as well as to attract a "more diverse applicant pool." The article says there are now more officers who have tattoos, beards, or religious head coverings. Departments have noted how increasingly difficult it is to recruit new officers given low rates of pay and intense public scrutiny.

Continuing Coverage: FBI Offers Reward In Illinois Woman's Disappearance In Belize.

ABC News (1/27, 3.09M) reported in continuing coverage that the FBI has offered an up to $10,000 reward "in its investigation into the death of an ABC producer who was murdered last year while on vacation at an eco-resort in Belize." Anne Swaney, 39, worked for Chicago-based WLS-TV. She disappeared on Jan. 14, 2016 and her body was found in a river the next day. The FBI believes that someone in Belize may be able to help solve Swaney's murder, said FBI Special Agent Paul Clark. AdWeek (1/27, Eck, 398K) also continued coverage.

Administration Defends Executive Orders Amid Worldwide Outrage.

Coverage of President Trump's executive orders barring refugees and travelers from seven predominantly Muslim nations continues to be extensive and extremely negative toward the Administration. Reports cast the policy as hastily implemented, leading to chaos at airports, and highlight condemnation from around the world and from prominent members of both parties. Feature stories on detained children, divided families, and Iraqis who provided support to the US during the war being refused entry also reflect negatively on the White House. Other pieces examine why those seven countries in particular were selected and others omitted, and on Rudy Giuliani's statement that the President had sought a legal means to impose a "Muslim ban."

On ABC World News Tonight  (1/29, story 3, 2:25, Llamas, 14.63M), David Wright reported, "As the outrage reached the White House doorstep today, the Trump Administration is pushing back. A new statement tonight: 'This is not about religion, this is about terror and keeping our country safe.' ... Until today, the battle over the borders has been fiercely partisan, the Democrats voicing loud opposition." But "now, a growing number of Republicans taking issue, too, some of them agreeing with the Democrats that the new executive order could be counterproductive, making America less safe." Sen. John McCain: "I think the effect will probably, in some areas, give ISIS some more propaganda." On the CBS Weekend News  (1/29, story 2, 2:10, Quijano), Errol Barnett reported that the President "said Saturday it is something that should have been in place for a long time."

The AP (1/29) reports that the President defended the order, saying "in a statement Sunday amid widespread protests that 'America is a proud nation of immigrants.' He says the country 'will continue to show compassion to those fleeing oppression,' but 'while protecting our own citizens and border.'" Reuters (1/29, Holland, Chiacu) reports that Trump, "trying to quell a backlash," said the US would resume issuing visas "to all countries once secure policies are put in place" over the next 90 days.

USA Today (1/29, Jackson, 5.28M) says Trump and aides "spent Sunday defending their ban on refugees...as a counter-terrorism measure, all in the face of lawsuits, congressional criticism, and mass protests." The Washington Post (1/29, Dennis, Markon, 11.43M) reports under the headline "Trump Defends Executive Order: 'This Is Not A Muslim Ban'" that Trump "compared his order to action taken by then-President Obama in 2011 to give new scrutiny to visas for Iraqi refugees, though by almost any measure Trump's order was far more sweeping."

Politico (1/29, Toosi, Kim, 2.46M) says Trump "doubled down" on his policy, though Chief of Staff Priebus "walked back one major element of the order, signaling a growing sense of confusion and fissures within the 10-day-old administration." Politico says the Administration's "mixed messages were abundant as global outrage grew over the order. ... Thousands gathered outside the White House to demand Trump rescind what they called the 'Muslim ban,'" and "prominent Republicans and foreign leaders chided Trump, warning the order could backfire by inspiring terrorists." Bloomberg Politics (1/29, Brody, 201K) and The Hill (1/29, Savransky, 1.25M) also cover Trump's statement.

On  CBS' Face The Nation (1/29, Dickerson, 4.61M), Priebus said, "What people need to understand is 325,000 foreign travelers came into the United States. About 109 of those people were detained for further questioning. They came from the identified seven countries that harbor and train terrorists. They were asked questions. The vast majority of the people were released." On  NBC's Meet The Press (1/29, Todd, 157K), Priebus said, "As far as green card holders moving forward, it doesn't affect them."

The New York Times (1/29, Shear, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says Priebus "appeared to reverse a key part" of the order by saying green card holders from the affected countries would not be prevented from returning to the US, but "also said that border agents had 'discretionary authority,'" which "seemed to add to the uncertainty" over the continued enforcement of the order. The Washington Post (1/29, Phillip, Snell, 11.43M) also says Priebus "appeared to pull back one of the most controversial elements of the order." The Los Angeles Times (1/29, Parsons, 4.52M) headlines its report on Priebus' comments "White House Seems To Back Down On Part Of New Vetting Policy."

The AP (1/29, Colvin) writes that Trump senior adviser Kellyanne Conway called the problems caused by the visa ban "'a small price to pay' to keep the nation safe, but it's unclear whether the order...will accomplish that," since it "does not address homegrown extremists already in America," and omits Saudi Arabia, "where most of the Sept. 11 hijackers were from." Mic (1/29, Durkee, 554K) reports that Conway "sharply dismissed the decision of the federal judge who granted a stay." Conway said, "The stay of order doesn't really affect the executive order at all, because the executive order is meant to be prospective, it's preventing, not detaining."

On  Fox News Sunday (1/29, Wallace), Conway said, "If they're not dangerous, if they are not a threat, then they will be disposed of – their situations will be handled on a case-by-case basis. I was stopped many times after 9/11, weren't you? I didn't resemble, or share a name with any kind of conspiracy, but this is what we do to keep the nation safe. I mean, this whole idea that they're being separated and ripped from their families, it's temporary."

USA Today (1/29, 5.28M) says in an editorial, "In President Trump's dark view of America, thousands of shadowy foreigners from the Middle East are infiltrating our neighborhoods and waiting for an opportunity to kill us. ... This kind of indiscriminate fear-mongering is bad enough as campaign rhetoric. It's outright harmful to innocent people when ham-handedly translated into White House policy." The order is also "strangely arbitrary. The 9/11 terrorists were from Egypt, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, all of which were exempted from the order. And since 9/11, no one has been killed in the USA as a result of a terrorist attack by an emigrant from the seven targeted nations." The Wall Street Journal (1/29, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) is also critical, saying in an editorial that the policy was rushed and overly broad, and seemed designed to create chaos.

Kelly: Entry Of "Lawful Permanent Residents" Is In National Interest. Reuters (1/29, Raymond, Rosenberg, Stempel) reports that federal judges in at least five states have blocked enforcement of the order, and ABC World News Tonight  (1/29, story 2, 2:10, Llamas, 14.63M) added that the "attorneys general of more than a dozen states [are] condemning the order." The Washington Times (1/29, Dinan, 272K) reports that DHS said early Sunday that it is "following through on the executive order" despite the courts' actions. However, The Hill (1/29, Master, 1.25M) reports that DHS Secretary Kelly "declared 'the entry of lawful permanent residents to be in the national interest' in a Sunday evening statement."

Giuliani Says Trump Wanted A "Muslim Ban." The Washington Post (1/29, Wang, 11.43M) reports that Rudy Giuliani, appearing on Fox News on Saturday evening, "said President Trump wanted a 'Muslim ban' and requested he assemble a commission to show him 'the right way to do it legally.'" Giuliani said, "So when [Trump] first announced it, he said, 'Muslim ban.' He called me up. He said, 'Put a commission together. Show me the right way to do it legally.' ... We focused on, instead of religion, danger – the areas of the world that create danger for us. Which is a factual basis, not a religious basis. Perfectly legal, perfectly sensible." Mic (1/29, Durkee, 554K) reports on the comments under the headline "Rudy Giuliani Admitted Trump's 'Extreme Vetting' Is Actually Just A Muslim Ban."

On  CBS' Face The Nation (1/29, Dickerson, 4.61M), Rep. Keith Ellison (D-MN), a Muslim and candidate for Democratic National Committee chair, said, "We've never have had a religious-based ban before. This is a Muslim ban, they can't deny it. On the campaign trail he said he wanted a Muslim ban. He said on national television there would be other religious groups receiving priority. This is a Muslim ban. Rudy Giuliani, who helped him write it said they started with a Muslim ban, and then sort of languaged it up to avoid that label."

Confusion Abounds In Wake Of Executive Orders And Court Responses. On its website, CNN (1/29, Perez, Brown, Liptak, 29.79M) examines the "confusion" surrounding the executive order, writing that when it was announced, "Administration officials weren't immediately sure which countries' citizens" would be affected, and DHS "was left making a legal analysis on the order after Trump signed it." CNN says the confusion exposed "the pitfalls of an administration largely operated by officials with scant federal experience." The Wall Street Journal (1/29, Jordan, Hughes, Peterson, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) headlines a front-page report "Donald Trump's Immigration Ban Sows Chaos," writing that the policy was being followed differently at different airports, and that the court orders were being treated differently in different places as well.

The New York Times (1/29, Shear, Nixon, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) writes, "The global confusion that has since erupted is the story of a White House that rushed to enact, with little regard for basic governing, a core campaign promise that Mr. Trump made to his most fervent supporters." Customs and border control officials "got instructions at 3 a.m. Saturday and some arrived at their posts later that morning still not knowing how to carry out the president's orders." Even Defense Secretary Mattis "did not see a final version of the order until Friday morning, only hours before Mr. Trump arrived to sign it at the Pentagon." The Wall Street Journal (1/29, A1, Nicholas, Paletta, Barrett, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) says on its front page that the policy was in the works even before Election Day, but remained a close-held secret within Trump's inner circle.

The Washington Post (1/29, Selk, 11.43M) profiles Judge Ann Donnelly of the US District Court for the Eastern District of New York, who "after a year and a week on the federal bench...became known across the world as the first judge to block Trump's order." The Daily Caller (1/29, Pfeiffer, 898K) says Donnelly was appointed by President Obama in 2015.

NYTimes Analysis: Litigation Could Last For Years. Adam Liptak of the New York Times (1/29, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) writes that though the judicial branch responded "with what by legal standards was lightning speed," the court orders "were just the initial steps in litigation that may last for years." The courts "did not rule on the larger question of whether Mr.

Trump's executive order was lawful" and "gave only the most preliminary hints" about whether the courts will strike down the order. But the ACLU and other civil liberties groups "were savoring their victories in these early skirmishes."

Senate Democrats To Introduce Legislation To Reverse Executive Orders. The Washington Post (1/29, O'Keefe, 11.43M) reports that Senate Minority Leader Schumer said Democrats will introduce legislation to reverse the executive orders. Schumer "choked up as he described the chaos the orders had caused" and said, "We will fight this. Many of you may not know this – my middle name is Ellis. I was named after Uncle Ellis who was named after Ellis Island. This fight's in my bones. It's on my birth certificate." Sen. Christopher Murphy suggested that the President's action violate the 1965 Immigration and Nationality Act, and said Democrats "must now 'force a debate' this week on Trump's orders by slowing the consideration of all of his remaining Cabinet nominees, especially" Secretary of State-designate Tillerson.

The Hill (1/29, Shelbourne, 1.25M) reports that Sen. Dianne Feinstein, ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, said via Twitter that she will introduce two bills today to rescind the order and limit Trump's authority on the matter. Politico (1/29, Kim, Romm, 2.46M) reports on the coming legislation.

Senate Minority Whip Durbin said on Fox News Sunday (1/29, Wallace), "First, it was an impulsive move by the President, without follow-through to the Department of Homeland Security. ... Number two, going after these refugees, these are the most carefully vetted visitors to anyone who comes to our airports, including this ban on Syrian refugees when we have had no examples, not one, of a Syrian refugees engaging in terrorism in the United States. And the third point...was the suggestion by the President that somehow we are going to favor Christians, and in some cases banning Muslims in the future. That is exactly the opposite message we will send to our allies and those who want to do us harm around the world."

Some "Top Republicans" Criticize Policy. The New York Times (1/29, Fandos, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports, "Some top Republicans stepped up their criticism of President Trump's newly enacted refugee policy," though "party leaders in Congress continued to show restraint." In addition to McCain, Sens. Susan Collins, Lindsey Graham, Orrin Hatch, Rob Portman, and Ben Sasse have been somewhat critical. Senate Majority Leader McConnell "did not criticize the order itself but said the country needed to 'be careful' with how it is carried out."

On ABC's This Week (1/29, Raddatz, 6.61M), McConnell said, "To the extent they're trying to improve the vetting process, I think that's in order. We need to bear in mind that we don't have religious tests in this country and we also need to remember that some of our best allies in the war against Islamic terrorism are Muslims." The Washington Post (1/29, Snell, Phillip, 11.43M) says McConnell "strongly opposed the concept of a Muslim ban when Trump touted the idea during the campaign."

Reuters (1/29, Cornwell) reports that McCain and Graham said the order "may do more to help recruit terrorists than improve US security." In a joint statement, they said, "This executive order sends a signal, intended or not, that America does not want Muslims coming into our country. That is why we fear this executive order may do more to help terrorist recruitment than improve our security." McCain said on CBS' Face The Nation (1/29, Dickerson, 4.61M), "It is a confused process, which the good news is it's only got to do with a pause. The bad news is, obviously this process and conclusions were not vetted." The Daily Caller (1/29, Collins, 898K) reports that Trump criticized McCain and Graham, tweeting that they "are sadly weak on immigration."

Reuters (1/29, Wroughton) reports that Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Bob Corker said in statement, "We all share a desire to protect the American people, but this executive order has been poorly implemented, especially with respect to green card holders." USA Today (1/29, Singer, 5.28M) reports that Rep. Charlie Dent (R-PA) said of the order, "This is ridiculous. I guess I understand what his intention is, but unfortunately the order appears to have been rushed through without full consideration." Even Rep. Raúl Labrador (R-ID), who "strongly supported the intent of Trump's order," criticized its implementation, saying, "The Administration...could have done a better job of implementing this executive order." McClatchy (1/29, Lightman, 574K) and Politico (1/29, Everett, Bresnahan, 2.46M) also report on the GOP response.

Protesters Turn Out In Large Numbers Across Nation And At Airports. Both ABC and CBS – NBC did not air – led their Sunday evening newscasts with demonstrations against the ban across the nation. ABC World News Tonight  (1/29, lead story, 3:30, Llamas, 14.63M) reported on the "major backlash" and "outrage," with "large demonstrations" in Boston, Los Angeles, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and other cities. ABC's Eva Pilgrim: "Protests erupting from coast to coast over President Trump's immigration crackdown. ... At airports, so many emotional scenes; in Dallas, a five-year-old boy back with his mother after being detained for hours." The CBS Weekend News  (1/29, lead story, 5:35, Quijano) reported that the President's "travel and immigration crackdown on people from seven Muslim majority countries has caused chaos and confusion and sparked intense protests. The ACLU says 4,000 attorneys are working in shifts at the airports to get people released." CBS' Kenneth Craig: "At airports across the country, international travelers detained by authorities received a warm welcome as they stepped on to US soil. For some, there were tears, like this Iraqi woman who was reunited with her son, a US Army Ranger, after hours of uncertainty at JFK."

The AP (1/29, Hajela, Tarm) says the "immigration order sowed more chaos and outrage across the country Sunday, with travelers detained at airports, panicked families searching for relatives and protesters registering opposition to the sweeping measure." Demonstrators "gathered outside the White House," and "more than 100 protesters also gathered at the international terminal at Dulles International Airport outside Washington, cheering people arriving from Muslim countries. At the main Dallas-Fort Worth airport, some 200 people held signs and chanted, 'Let them go!'"

The Washington Post (1/29, Siddiqui, Laris, Chandler, 11.43M) quotes Shohreh Rahnama, whose young son was detained for several hours at Dulles. She said, "How can a five-year old be banned? Just because his parents are Iranian? We are American too." She joined the demonstration at the White House, and said to Trump, "You cannot do this. You are our servant. The people elected you. Other countries are thirsty for the rights we have in America. We can't become a dictatorship."

The New York Times (1/29, Martin, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports, "The swelling anger over Mr. Trump's week-old administration is fueling a surge of spontaneous activism that some Democrats say they have not seen since the Vietnam War." Senators including Cory Booker, Bob Casey, and Elizabeth Warren joined protests at airports, as did candidates to lead the Democratic National Committee. The Times says the "growing and seemingly organic energy offers Democrats a prime opportunity to ride a backlash to electoral success this year and next, the same way Republicans capitalized on Tea Party rage" against President Obama seven years ago.

The Los Angeles Times (1/29, Queally, Panzar, Hamilton, 4.52M) says "thousands of protesters converged on Los Angeles International Airport," while the Boston Globe (1/29, Wangsness, 1.08M) reports that some immigration lawyers are advising green card holders from the affected countries to fly back to the US through Boston "because a Massachusetts judge's order blocking the enforcement of President Trump's executive order offers them more protection than similar judicial orders elsewhere." The New York Times (1/29, Bromwich, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that lawyers have also been presenting themselves at airports to offer emergency legal assistance; the Chicago Tribune (1/29, Clair, Wong, 2.54M) profiles some Chicago-area attorneys who have done so.

The Huffington Post (1/29, Gordts, Miller, Abbey-Lambertz, Wing, 237K) headlined its lead story "RELENTLESS RESISTANCE," later updated to "AMERICA ON THE BRINK."

Policy Comes Under Harsh International Criticism. Reuters (1/29, Chmaytelli, Noueihed) reports that the "global backlash...gathered strength on Sunday as several countries including long-standing American allies criticized the measures as discriminatory and divisive. Governments from London and Berlin to Jakarta and Tehran spoke out" against Trump's policy. German Chancellor Angela Merkel's spokesperson said she believes that "the global fight against terrorism was no excuse for the measures and 'does not justify putting people of a specific background or faith under general suspicion.'" British Foreign Minister Boris Johnson tweeted, "Divisive and wrong to stigmatize because of nationality."

The New York Times (1/29, Smale, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that after British Prime Minister Theresa May's "response to a question about the issue on Saturday at a news conference in Turkey prompted sharp criticism of her unwillingness to criticize Mr. Trump, her spokesman said that the British government did 'not agree with this kind of approach and it is not one we will be taking.'" USA Today (1/29, Hjelmgaard, 5.28M) reports that French President François Hollande said, "When [Trump] refuses the arrival of refugees, while Europe has done its duty, we have to respond." The Wall Street Journal (1/29, Troianovski, Douglas, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that German Foreign Minister Sigmar Gabriel and Dutch counterpart Bert Koenders were also among the European critics.

The Washington Post (1/29, Raghavan, 11.43M) headlines a feature on the impact of people around the world "Nations Condemn Trump's Travel Ban, As The Fallout Infects People's Lives." ABC World News Tonight  (1/29, story 5, 1:40, Llamas, 14.63M) reported on the global "ripple effect from the executive order is only starting to make some impact." ABC's Jim Avila reported that the US Olympic Committee is "worried that its bid to host 2020 game could be jeopardized by President Trump's immigration policies." NBA player Thon Maker "is a Sudanese refugee, concerned that he won't be able to get back after games in Canada. And the Academy Award-nominated Iranian director for 'The Salesman' saying he won't come [to the Oscars] because there are too many questions about his ability to return, condemning what he calls 'unjust conditions' in President Trump's order."

The New York Times (1/29, Walsh, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that while the response for Europe was loud, "in Cairo and Riyadh, in the heart of the Muslim world," Trump's policy "was met with a conspicuous silence." The Times says "the silence in the capitals of Muslim-majority countries unaffected by the order reflected a lack of solidarity and an enduring uncertainty" about Trump's foreign policy. The Washington Post (1/29, Miller, Ryan, 11.43M) writes, "Through inflammatory rhetoric and hastily drawn executive orders, the administration has alienated allies, including Iraq, provided propaganda fodder to terror networks that frequently portray US involvement in the Middle East as a religious crusade, and endangered critical cooperation from often hidden US partners." ISIS has already "claimed the travel ban as a victory."

On  ABC's This Week (1/29, Raddatz, 6.61M), White House press secretary Sean Spicer said, "We are working through all the diplomatic channels necessary to make sure our friends and allies around the globe understand that our position is to protect our borders and to make sure – again, this is about slowing the process down. Those 109 people are being processed through the system to make sure that the vetting is applied, that they didn't do anything nefarious when they were overseas."

In a Washington Post (1/29, 11.43M) op-ed, Hadi Ghaemi of the International Campaign for Human Rights in Iran calls the travel ban on Iranians "a gift to the Islamic republic and its hard-line rulers. It will not deter terrorism on US soil...and will ironically serve the purposes of Iran's hard-line rulers." Bloomberg Politics (1/29, Geimann, 201K) also covers the international response.

CREW: Ban Does Not Affect Countries Where Trump's "Company Has Done Business." Norman Eisen and Richard Painter of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington write in the New York Times (1/29, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) that "overlooked in the furor is another troubling aspect of the situation: President Trump omitted from his ban a number of other predominantly Muslim nations where his company has done business," which "adds further illegitimacy to one of the most arbitrary executive actions in our recent history." Some Muslim countries like Saudi Arabia "are not on the list, even though some of their citizens pose just as great a risk – if not greater – of exporting terrorism to the United States." But these "are ones where Donald Trump has done business."

Christian Leaders Reject Giving Preference To Christian Immigrants. The New York Times (1/29, Goodstein, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports under the headline "Christian Leaders Denounce Trump's Plan To Favor Christian Immigrants" that though "over the last decade, Christians in the United States have grown increasingly alarmed about the persecution of other Christians overseas, especially in the Middle East," if Trump "had hoped for Christian leaders to break out in cheers" about his executive orders, that is "not what he has heard so far. A broad array of clergy members has strongly denounced Mr. Trump's order as discriminatory, misguided and inhumane," with religious leaders saying that "by giving preference to Christians over Muslims," Trump is pitting "one faith against another."

Koch Network Calls Policy "The Wrong Approach." The Washington Post (1/29, Gold, Hohmann, 11.43M) reports, "Leaders of the influential Koch network on Sunday expressed opposition" to the policy, "saying the executive order is not in keeping with their aims to build a free and open society." Charles Koch Foundation President Brian Hooks said, "The travel ban is the wrong approach and will likely be counterproductive. Our country has benefited tremendously from a history of welcoming people from all cultures and backgrounds." While Charles Koch himself did not comment, he last year "called the suggestion that Trump might require Muslims to register 'reminiscent of Nazi Germany.'" USA Today (1/29, Schouten, 5.28M) adds that Charles Koch "did not refer to either Trump or his immigration order during public remarks Sunday afternoon to the more than 550 ultra-wealthy donors" attending "the network's annual winter summit."

Veterans "Dumbfounded And Furious" Over Exclusion Of Military Interpreters. McClatchy (1/29, Bergengruen, 74K) reports, "Military veterans were dumbfounded and furious when it became clear over the weekend" that the policy "keeps out interpreters who'd risked their lives helping US forces in Iraq." Former Marine Sgt. Andrew Biggio, who voted for Trump, said, "They better make a damn exception, because we are here because of them." Scott Cooper, also a Marine veteran, said, "We asked them to risk their lives for us and they're being threatened because they worked alongside us."

The Washington Post (1/29, Raghavan, 11.43M) profiles Fuad Sharef, who "once worked for a US government subcontractor in post-invasion Iraq as a translator and a program manager." He and his family got valid visas "after two years of vetting, through a special US resettlement program for Iraqi employees of the American government" before being taken off their plane this weekend while on their way to New York. His family is being sent back to Iraq, where they have sold their house and property. He said, "Donald Trump destroyed my life. How can he do this to people who risked their lives to help America?"

Sen. Tim Kaine said on  NBC's Meet The Press (1/29, Todd, 157K), "It does affect green card holders and they're being caught up in it. It affects people on special immigrant visas like interpreters who helped the US military in foreign countries and now their lives are at risk and we've given them a special status to come to this country. Who would help the United States if they knew we would abandon them when they're trying to come here?"

Silicon Valley, Previously Ambivalent About Trump, Heads "To The Barricades." The New York Times (1/29, Streitfeld, Isaac, Benner, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) writes that as of Friday morning, "Silicon Valley was largely ambivalent about President Trump," but "by Saturday night, much of that optimism had yielded to anger and determination." The executive orders "struck at the heart of Silicon Valley's cherished values," and "a significant part of the tech community went to the barricades." Google co-founder Sergey Brin, who came to the US from the Soviet Union as a child, joined protesters at San Francisco International Airport, saying, "I'm here because I'm a refugee." The heads of Airbnb, Facebook, and Netflix were also among the critics. Business Insider (1/29, Heath, 3.42M) samples some of the reaction.

Starbucks To Hire 10,000 Refugees Over Next Five Years. The AP (1/29, Boak) reports that Starbucks CEO Howard Schultz said in a letter to employees on Saturday that the company will hire 10,000 refugees over the next five years. Schultz said the hiring "would apply to stores worldwide and the effort would start in the United States where the focus would be on hiring immigrants 'who have served with US troops as interpreters and support personnel.'"

Michigan Muslims Cope With New Policy. On its front page, the Washington Post (1/29, A1, Friess, 11.43M) looks at the ban from Dearborn, Michigan, which has one of the largest Muslim populations in the US. Nearby Hamtramck "has the country's only majority-Muslim city council. Over the past two years, Michigan has taken in more refugees from war-torn Syria than any state except California." Many are now worried about the safety of family members who had hoped to join them in the US.

DeBlasio Defends New York's Sanctuary City Status. On CNN's State Of The Union  (1/29, Tapper, 420K), New York Mayor Bill DeBlasio explained his city's definition as a sanctuary city. He said, "There are 170 offenses that list serious and violent crimes that lead to automatic cooperation between the City of New York and the federal partners. So any serious and violent crime, we're going to work with them. Someone commits a minor offense, for example, right now if you don't have clear definitions like we have, someone went through a stop sign and they could be deported for that. ... We are not going to see with half a million undocumented people here...the vast majority are law-abiding, we are not going to see families torn apart over a minor offense."

New Citizens Take Oath Amid National Uproar. The Washington Post (1/29, A1, McCrummen, 11.43M) has a front-page feature on a citizenship ceremony in Fairfax County, Virginia on Saturday, "where the official photo of former president Barack Obama had been taken down and that of President Trump had yet to go up." The President's executive orders were a prime topic of discussion.

ACLU Raised Nearly Five Times As Much Online On Saturday As It Usually Does In A Year. USA Today (1/29, Dastagir, 5.28M) reports, "The American Civil Liberties Union shattered fundraising records this weekend after taking the White House to court" over the executive orders. The ACLU "received roughly 290,000 online donations totaling $19.4 million since Saturday morning." It "typically raises about $4 million online in a year, according to Executive Director Anthony Romero."

In Last-Minute Change, 60 Minutes Re-Airs Piece On Syria. The Hill (1/29, Shelbourne, 1.25M) reports that CBS changed its lineup for 60 Minutes on Sunday to "re-air an October story about refugees form the war-torn country of Syria." The change was announced late Sunday afternoon.

Speculation Grows Over DOJ's Role In Executive Order Review.

Will Baude writes in a Washington Post (1/29, Baude, 11.43M) blog that "for the past 24 hours, my feeds have been awash with speculation that the order was never even reviewed by the Office of Legal Counsel or other DOJ lawyers," and "if true – and I have also heard some second-hand reports that it is not true – that is surprising and potentially troubling." Baude adds that "it will also be important to watch a different form of review that is likely to occur over the next 24-48 hours, as the acting Solicitor General has to decide whether to try to immediately appeal any of today's various judicial rulings cutting back on the order's application to green card holders and other lawfully admitted arrivals." Baude notes that if the Justice Department "has been cut out of the loop until now, the court orders might provide a welcome opportunity to refine the administration's position to something more defensible."

Jonathan H. Adler writes in another Washington Post (1/29, Adler, 11.43M) blog that "during the campaign, then-candidate Trump told The Post's Robert Costa: 'I'm going to surround myself only with the best and most serious people. . . . We want top of the line professionals,'" and "whether or not this was true at the time, it is hard to believe that this was the Trump Administration's modus operandi in developing this week's controversial Executive Order on refugees and others from specified countries." Adler adds that "while some good folks have been tapped for important legal positions in the Administration, it does not appear that they are being utilized – and that's a problem." Adler continues, "whatever one thinks of the underlying policy, the degree of administrative incompetence in its execution is jaw-dropping."

In a piece for Lawfare (1/29, Wittes), Benjamin Wittes writes that "the malevolence of President Trump's Executive Order on visas and refugees is mitigated chiefly – and perhaps only – by the astonishing incompetence of its drafting and construction." Wittes adds that "this order reads to me, frankly, as though it was not reviewed by competent counsel at all." Wittes argues that "in the short term, the incompetence is actually good news for people who believe in visa and refugee policies based on criteria other than – let's not be coy about this – bigotry and religious discrimination." President Trump "has created a target-rich environment for litigation that will make his policies, I suspect, less effective than they would have been had he subjected his order to vetting one percent as extreme as the vetting to which he proposes to subject refugees from Bashar al-Assad and the bombing raids of Vladimir Putin."

Trump Could Announce Supreme Court Nominee Monday.

The AP (1/29, Pace) cites "a White House official" who said President Trump could announce his nominee to fill the vacancy on the Supreme Court as soon as Monday. While Trump "originally said the announcement would come on Thursday," the official said that "timeframe could be sped up."

On Fox News Sunday  (1/29, Wallace), White House senior adviser Kellyanne Conway said of the pending nomination, "I can guarantee that the promise that candidate Trump made will continue as President, that he is a pro-life President, and he has promised that he will appoint pro-life judges including to the Supreme Court."

On ABC's This Week (1/29, Raddatz, 6.61M), Senate Majority Leader McConnell said of the nomination, "Let me tell you what I do think we'll get. A really outstanding nominee who will be very hard to argue against because the President has been working on this for some time. I'm privy to some of the information about what's been happening and I think we're going to get a great nominee who will be very difficult to explain to the American people we're not even going to let them have an up-or-down vote in the Senate."

In an op-ed for the Washington Post (1/29, 11.43M), Ron Klain, who served as chief counsel for the Senate Judiciary Committee, an associate counsel to former President Bill Clinton, and an assistant to former President Barack Obama, writes that "to win the real battle for the future of the high court, the nomination and the messaging around it should be aimed" at Justice Anthony Kennedy. Klain argues that while the current nomination "will probably not change the court's balance of power," the balance could be changed if Trump is able to select another justice. Klain says Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer are unlikely to retire during the Trump presidency, so "the question of whether a court-shifting pick is willingly handed to Trump rests with Kennedy" and the current battle "could influence Kennedy's decision." Klain concludes that "as this nomination battle unfolds, all players should keep an eye on the even more significant fight that could lie ahead – and the man who will decide whether it comes or not."

Republican Lawmakers Happy With Trump's Shortlist Of Supreme Court Contenders. The AP (1/28, Sherman) reports that conservative lawmakers are generally happy with President Trump's shortlist of candidates for Supreme Court Justice. The AP says conservatives have had one wish, which is to avoid nominating another David Souter to the court, who the AP says was thought to be "a 'home run' for conservatives" but who turned out to be "a liberal vote for most of his 18 years on the court." Trump's list contains 21 contenders, the leading contenders from which are "Neil Gorsuch, Thomas Hardiman and William Pryor." Conservative activist and former law clerk to Justice Clarence Thomas, Carrie Severino, said, "They all would be excellent, excellent choices. They were all specifically chosen with the president's commitment in mind."

CSMonitor Analysis: Supreme Court's Diversity Make-Up Could Shift With Trump Nominee. The Christian Science Monitor (1/28, Rosen, 387K) says the current Supreme Court Justices "attended either Harvard or Yale Law School," were born or lived their lives either on the northeast or in California, "and none are evangelical Christians or Protestants, which comprise nearly half of the American public." The Monitor says Trump's top three contenders are "from 'flyover country,' one is known for his facile and colloquial writing style, and one is a graduate not of Harvard, Yale, or Columbia, but Tulane Law School in Louisiana." They are also white men, which it says stands in contrast to Justice Antonin Scalia's criticism of the Roberts court in his dissenting opinion on same-sex marriage, in which he noted "no social transformation without representation."

WPost Examines Hardiman's Working-Class Roots, Volunteer Ethic. A Washington Post (1/28, Horwitz, 11.43M) analysis reports one of President Trump's contenders for the Supreme Court, Federal appeals court judge Thomas Hardiman, "has not followed the typical path to the Supreme Court," and notes that "he was the first in his family to graduate college, did not attend an Ivy League law school and helped pay for his education by driving a taxi." He is reportedly a favorite of President Trump's sister, Judge Maryanne Trump Barry, who serves with him in the 3rd Circuit. The Post highlights how Hardiman "worked his way up from a working-class background" and "has a really strong volunteer ethic," having "done a lot of pro bono work."

WPost Analysis: Pryor "Perhaps Most Polarizing" Of Supreme Court Contenders. A Washington Post (1/28, Kindy, 11.43M) analysis reports that Judge William Pryor of the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals, if selected as President Trump's nominee, "would be the only member of the Supreme Court who did a stint as a politician." The Post says that he took "notable positions on civil rights and discrimination cases," which included defending the "practice of handcuffing prison inmates to hitching posts in the hot sun if they refused to work on chain gangs." The article says he would be "perhaps the most polarizing figure of the potential nominees, with some groups thinking he leans too far right while other groups view him as leaning too far left."

Morell: Trump Shuns The Truth "With Alarming Frequency."

In an op-ed for the Washington Post (1/29, 11.43M), former acting CIA Director Michael Morell writes that while the CIA's Memorial Wall "drew so much negative commentary about President Trump's visit to the CIA this month," another wall in the agency's lobby "carries almost as much significance as the Memorial Wall." On it "is a verse from the Gospel of John that reads, 'And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free.'" Morell says it is "a deep irony that Trump chose the CIA lobby, with its quote from John's Gospel, as the location of his first official act as president" because he "seems to shun the truth and he alters it with alarming frequency."

Ex-CIA Officer: It Will Take More Than One Speech For Trump To Mend Relationship With Agency. In a Washington Post (1/27, 11.43M) op-ed, Steven Hall, who worked for the CIA for more than 30 years, also criticized the nature of President Trump's speech at the CIA, writing that the "problem is that two and a half minutes of praise wrapped in an ad hoc stump speech is not enough to repair the damage caused by months of lambasting the CIA while praising Putin. It will take much more than that, and it will be difficult for Trump."

Author On CIA History: Trump Feuding With IC At "Unchartered" Time For US National Security. In a Reuters (1/27) op-ed, Tim Weiner, author of "Legacy of Ashes: The History of the CIA," criticized President Trump's speech at the CIA and notes that CIA veteran Yael Eisenstat recently wrote that the speech was "a terrifying display of the dangerous way in which he will govern." Weiner says the CIA and FBI are both "embattled with the White House" at a time when American national security is in "uncharted waters, the unknown depths where medieval mapmakers warned: Here Lie Monsters."

INTERNATIONAL NEWS

US-Backed Iraqi Forces Prepare Advancement Into Western Mosul.

Charlie D'Agata of the CBS Weekend News  (1/29, story 4, 3:50, Quijano) reported Iraqi military forces, backed by US airstrikes, "only recaptured the eastern side" of Mosul from ISIS control since the operation launched more than a hundred days ago, but the recapture of Mosul University, specifically, served as "a strategic and symbolic victory." With Iraqi special forces troops, D'Agata toured the recently-recaptured neighborhoods, the university, and school buildings. D'Agata reported, "Morale is high as Iraqi forces," backed by the US military, "prepare for the final assault against ISIS in Mosul," but "what no one knows is what ISIS has left."

Iraqi Provincial Authorities Targeting Sunnis Under Collective Punishment Policy.

The New York Times (1/29, Zucchino, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) assesses the humanitarian impact of the conflict between Iraq's government and ISIS militants, specifically under a recently-enacted collective punishment policy in the northern Salahuddin Province. Under that policy, provincial authorities evicted 345 predominately-Sunni families suspected of having ties to ISIS and confined them to the Al Shahama camp, near Tikrit, in early January. According to officials, an additional 200 families were evicted and held at the Rubaidha camp. Deputy governor Amar Hekmat justified the collective punishment as a means "to defy the terrorists and send a stern message to the families," and that authorities are "under great pressure to rebuild our city and impose civil order" after nearly a year under ISIS occupation. Yet, some of the detainees told the Times that they were interrogated, abused, and specifically targeted as Sunnis under the policy.

Human Rights Group Accuses Kurdish Forces In Iraq Of Child Torture.

Citing a Human Rights Watch report released Sunday in which researchers interviewed 19 of the 183 children detained by Kurdish security forces in northern Iraq, USA Today (1/29, Kossov, 5.28M) reports that the security forces, known as Asayish, allegedly tortured the child detainees. According to the report, Asayish held 17 of the 19 boys "in stress positions, burned them with cigarettes, punched and kicked them, beat them with plastic pipes and cables, and shocked them with electricity." Furthermore, the researchers claimed, "none knew the content of the confessions they confirmed with fingerprints – some were illiterate or blindfolded, and others said that they were not allowed to read them and could not have because they were written in Kurdish." The researchers also alleged that some of the boys were temporarily forced to work with ISIS.

Syrian Rebels Begin To Leave Barada Valley.

The AP (1/29) reports Syrian state TV said rebels have "begun to evacuate Barada Valley as part of an agreement to surrender." Media reports said "four buses carrying 160 rebels and family members departed the Barada Valley on Sunday for the rebel-held Idlib province," marking the "end of a nearly six-week-long standoff between rebels and pro-government forces that led to severe water cuts" to Damascus.

Aleppo Hosts First Soccer Match In Nearly Five Years.

The CBS Weekend News  (1/29, story 9, 0:35, Quijano) reported, "For the first time in nearly five years, two soccer teams from Aleppo, Syria played in front of their hometown fans this weekend." Much of Aleppo remains damaged from the nation's civil war, but the destruction around the stadium was cleared and the game was hosted "under tight security."

Afghan Government Struggles To Resolve Taliban's Income Diversification Efforts.

The New York Times (1/28, Mashal, Rahim, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Taliban militants in Afghanistan have routinely collected utility bills from residents in Helmand and in Kunduz. Afghanistan's government provides the electricity, often from neighboring countries, but if it terminates power then it risks further angering the already-disenchanted populations. According to the UN, the utility payment seizures are the Taliban's latest efforts to diversify their income streams, which also include crop levies and narcotics.

Rogin: Gabbard Acting As Assad's "Mouthpiece" In Washington.

In his column for the Washington Post (1/29, 11.43M), Josh Rogin examines Rep. Tulsi Gabbard's lobbying on behalf of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad and says the "influence campaign's clearest triumph came only this month," when Gabbard returned from Damascus with "her parrot Assad's propaganda." Gabbard credited ACCESS Ohio, an extension "of the Michigan-based Arab Community Center for Economic and Social Services," for financing her trip, but Rogan writes, "The problem is, ACCESS Ohio hasn't existed for several years" and "there's no doubt the Assad regime facilitated" her visit. Rogin calls Gabbard "a tool of a mass murderer's propaganda," says her "cooperation with the Syrian regime damages her effort to promote herself as a legitimate foreign policy voice." Rogin concludes that "the entire affair proves that Assad's Washington influence campaign is alive and well and now has a sitting congresswoman for a mouthpiece, whether she realizes it or not."

AP Analysis: Return Of Former Afghan Warlord Could Inject "Political Uncertainty."

Amin Karim, the chief negotiator to Afghanistan's former warlord Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, recently told the AP (1/29, Gannon) that Hekmatyar intends to return to Kabul in "a matter of weeks, not months." Hekmatyar battled American forces after the 2001 invasion of Afghanistan and his return is expected to "shake up Afghan politics and complicate the much wider war against the Taliban." Hekmatyar is viewed as a potential rival to both President Ashraf Ghani and Chief Executive Abdullah Abdullah, who came to power "through a shaky, US-brokered power-sharing agreement." Thus, Hekmatyar's return could elicit "political uncertainty," potentially "divide the government at a critical time," and intensify violence between the Taliban and Hekmatyar's Hezb-e-Islami party, which the US, United Nations, Canada, and Great Britain classify as a terrorist organization.

Trump, Saudi King Pledge To Work Together On Counter-Terrorism, Iran.

Reuters (1/29) reports President Trump and Saudi King Salman spoke "for over an hour by telephone on Sunday, agreeing to step up counter-terrorism and military cooperation and enhance economic relations, a senior Saudi source said." Bloomberg Politics (1/29, Sink, 201K) reports the two leaders also agreed to tackle Iran's "destabilizing regional activities" and work "jointly to address challenges to regional peace and security, including the conflicts in Syria and Yemen," the White House said.

The CBS Weekend News (1/29, story 2, 2:10, Quijano) briefly noted the President "had phone calls with the King of Saudi Arabia and the Crown Prince of the United Arab Emirates," two "majority-Muslim countries not impacted by the immigration and refugee crackdown."

After Putin Call, Republicans Warn Trump Over Lifting Sanctions.

The AP (1/29, Berry) reports that a day after Trump's "first call as president with Russia's Vladimir Putin, leading congressional Republicans made clear they oppose any attempt by the new administration" to lift sanctions on Moscow. "I'm absolutely opposed to lifting sanctions on the Russians," Senate Majority Leader McConnell said on ABC's This Week (1/29, Raddatz, 6.61M). He added, "If anything, we ought to be looking at increasing them." Sen. Rob Portman said on CNN's State of the Union (1/29, Tapper, 420K) that it would be a "huge mistake for American foreign policy" to remove the sanctions "until the reasons those sanctions were put in place are resolved."

On ABC's This Week (1/29, Raddatz, 6.61M) White House press secretary Sean Spicer said, "We have not made any decisions on sanctions. The President will continue to have conversations and our team will continue to liase with Russian officials. But no decisions were made, that really wasn't brought up in the call yesterday."

On CBS' Face the Nation (1/29, Dickerson, 4.61M), White House chief of staff Priebus said of Trump's call with Putin, "It was a positive call. It was a call where President Putin and President Trump talked to work together, number one to eradicate ISIS and terrorism. To work together to resolve problems around the world including Syria. There wasn't anything not positive about the call. It was an initial call, more of a congratulatory call."

Netanyahu: US Embassy "Needs To Be" In Jerusalem.

The New York Times (1/29, Fisher, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who "had been closemouthed on the contentious question" of moving the US Embassy to Jerusalem, said Sunday that the embassy "needs to be here." However, he "pointedly did not demand that President Trump immediately follow through on his campaign promise to move the embassy." Speaking at his weekly cabinet meeting, Netanyahu said, "Jerusalem is the capital of Israel, and it is proper that not only should the American Embassy be here, but all embassies should come here. And I believe that over time, most of them will indeed come here, to Jerusalem." The CBS Weekend News (1/29, story 5, 0:25, Quijano) briefly reported his remarks, which the AP (1/29, Heller) says "appeared aimed at countering reports that Israel was concerned about the fallout of such a move."

Duterte Warns US Against Storing Weapons Arsenal In Philippines.

Reuters (1/29, Petty) reports Philippine President Rodrigo Duterte accused the US on Sunday of threatening regional stability by "unloading arms in the Philippines." He cautioned, "I'm serving notice to the armed forces of the United States. Do not do it, I will not allow it." Duterte warned that if the US follows through on the Pentagon's approval of new warehouse, barrack, and runway construction in Philippine military camps, he would review existing treaties "and maybe abrogate, since it is an executive order." The AP (1/29) notes that on Thursday, Philippine Defense Secretary Delfin Lorenzana discussed the Pentagon's plans to begin the construction as early as this year inside at least three Philippine military camps, including one in the Palawan province near the disputed South China Sea.

Hamon Wins French Socialist Party's Presidential Primary.

Reuters (1/29, Rose) reports France's ex-education minister, Benoit Hamon, defeated former prime minister Manuel Vails and won the Socialist presidential primary election on Sunday. The victory of

Hamon, a traditional leftist, over his more centrist, pro-business rival highlights "the deep fractures in the Socialist camp," which is believed to have "no chance of getting beyond the first round of the election in April."

The AP (1/29, Leicester, Corbet) says Hamon's signature campaign pledge to enact a "universal income" and his proposed $320 billion in taxes have been labeled Utopian and unrealistic, but many voters seemingly supported Hamon in an effort to simply eliminate Valls and reject the unpopular President François Hollande. The outcome of the two-round presidential election now "looks increasingly uncertain," with the leading conservative candidate, former prime minister Francois Fillon, entangled in a financial investigation, and far-right candidate Marine Le Pen viewed critically for her "anti-Europe, anti-immigration and anti-Islam themes."

According to analysts, Hamon's victory could signal "something far more seismic: the likely demise of the French left, and specifically, the Socialist Party," the Washington Post (1/29, McAuley, 11.43M) reports. Hamon's "unrealistically utopian vision of French society" is not expected "to sway voters from the now-global appeal of populism and its emphasis on national identity and national security." The New York Times (1/29, Rubin, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) similarly says Hamon's "wide margin" victory is "the clearest sign yet that voters on the left want a break with the policies of President François Hollande," but his "strong showing is unlikely to change widespread assessments that left-leaning candidates have little chance of making it into the second round of voting in the general election."

Despite Recent Judicial Decision, Populist Government In Italy Still Possible.

The Wall Street Journal (1/29, Nixon, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that last week, an Italian constitutional court struck down a proposed change from a one-stage to a two-stage lower parliamentary house electoral process; the decision has been viewed as the Italian establishment's latest step to insulate itself against the emergence of a future populist government under the anti-euro 5 Star Movement. Despite this latest effort, the Journal says 5 Star could realistically garner the required 40 percent of votes and secure control anyway, because the movement has benefited from the public's growing disapproval of the Italian government and the EU.

Prominent Burmese Human Rights Lawyer Fatally Shot.

The New York Times (1/29, Moe, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports U Ko Ni, leader of the ruling National League of Democracy and legal adviser to Burmese leader Daw Aung San Suu Kyi, was fatally shot at close range on Sunday. Ko Ni was leaving the Yangon International Airport after returning from Indonesia with a 20-person team of government officials and civic leaders. Burmese police identified the assailant as U Kyi Lin of Mandalay. One of the people who had traveled with Ko Ni said the assailant seemingly "knew the exact time of his arrival and was waiting to shoot him." Josef Benedict of Amnesty International condemned the "appalling act that has all the hallmarks of an assassination" and called for a "thorough, independent and impartial investigation."

A spokesman for President Htin Kyaw, Zaw Htay, told Reuters (1/29, Lone, Myint, Lewis) that Ko Ni's assailant was detained and authorities "are questioning the gunman to find out why he killed him, and who is behind it or paid him to do it." Reuters notes Ko Ni was "a prominent member" of Burma's Muslim minority, an outspoken voice against "the powerful role the military retains in governing," and, according to Ko Ni's daughter Yin New Khine, the frequent target of threats. His homicide constitutes "a rare outbreak of what appeared to be political violence" and "comes amid heightened tensions in Buddhist-majority" Burma.

Princes William, Harry Announce Plans To Commemorate Princess Diana's Death.

The CBS Weekend News  (1/29, story 10, 0:20, Quijano) reported briefly Britain's Prince William and Prince Harry announced their plans to unveil a statue honoring their mother, Princess Diana, later this year. The statue will be placed in the public gardens of Kensington Palace, Diana's former home, to commemorate the 20th anniversary of her death.

Japanese Official Accuses South Korea Of Threatening Critical Partnership.

In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/30, Subscription Publication, 6.37M), Japan's parliamentary vice minister for foreign affairs, Kiyoshi Odawara, writes that Japan and South Korea signed a 2015 agreement that "resolved finally and irreversibly" the dispute over the comfort-women issue, but denounces South Korea for not yet removing two comfort-women statues installed in front of Japanese government buildings. Odawara says South Korea's refusal to comply with the agreement threatens to undermine the two nations' relations at a time when that partnership is necessary to address the more critical threat posed by North Korea's nuclear program.

Trump Launches Global Democracy Efforts Without "Seasoned Support."

Politico (1/28, Crowley, 2.46M) reports President Trump is "pushing ahead with a global democracy" without a confirmed Secretary of State and with "relatively little guidance from seasoned diplomatic advisers." Trump scheduled a series of phone calls with foreign leaders "despite the continued gaps" in his diplomatic team, Politico says, noting that National Security Adviser Flynn "has no traditional diplomatic experience," and calling the State Department "a work in progress" where "confusion lingers" in some of its "key parts." Furthermore, Secretary of State-designate Rex Tillerson is not expected to be confirmed until at least Monday. Politico says Trump's approach mirrors his campaign style but "contrasts with the one adopted by President Obama." Trump's "lack of seasoned support" did not, however, prevent him "from pulling off a seemingly smooth meeting with" British Prime Minister Theresa May.

Administration Delays Issuance Of UN Funding, Multilateral Treaty Draft Orders.

The New York Times (1/28, Fisher, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports an executive order to reduce the US' funding of the United Nations and another aimed at reviewing and possibly canceling certain multilateral treaties have been delayed, according to current and former US officials briefed on the issue. The Administration submitted both draft orders to the National Security Council but offered the NSC's advisers less than an hour and a half to review them. Some officials "balked" at the draft orders' content and warned that they necessitated legal vetting. The draft orders will remain withheld until the State Department and other agencies can conduct a more complete review of the orders' content.

Trump, Putin Discuss Fight Against ISIS, Repairing US-Russian Relations.

Bloomberg Politics (1/28, Rudnitsky, 201K) reports that in President Trump's first formal phone call to Russian President Vladimir Putin, both Trump and Putin agreed to cooperate against ISIS and reverse bilateral tensions. Vice President Pence, senior counselor Stephen Bannon, National Security Adviser Flynn, White House Chief of Staff Priebus, and press secretary Sean Spicer also participated in the phone call. In a statement, the White House commented, "The positive call was a significant start to improving the relationship between the United States and Russia that is in need of repair." The Kremlin described the phone call as "positive and businesslike" and said "both sides demonstrated a desire for active joint efforts to stabilize and develop Russia-American relations on a constructive, equitable and mutually beneficial basis." In their statements, neither the White House nor the Kremlin mentioned the US' sanctions against Russia.

The Wall Street Journal (1/28, Razumovskaya, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) notes Russia and the past Administration disagreed over the Syrian conflict, with Russia backing Syrian President Bashar al-Assad and former President Obama backing Assad's removal. The Journal suggests the statements from the White House and the Kremlin indicated that Trump could more closely align with Russia in Syria against ISIS and other militant groups.

The Washington Post (1/28, Rucker, Filipov, 11.43M) reports Russian Security Council head Nikolai Patrushev praised the two leaders' first official discussion and commented, "We will await the results, but I believe everything will be positive." Prior to Saturday's phone call, the Kremlin cautioned against "excessive optimism" over Trump's presidency and what it will mean for Russia. On Friday, Putin's spokesman, Dmitry Peskov, told reporters, "One can hardly expect substantive contacts on the entire range of affairs from this call," and recommended, "Let us wait and see. Let us be patient." The Post adds that from Russia's perspective, "lifting the sanctions imposed by the Obama administration for interference in the presidential election and Russia's intervention in Ukraine would be a good start" to improved US-Russian relations, and, "On a grander scale, the Kremlin seems to hope the Trump administration will relax" and allow Putin's Russia to "have greater influence in world affairs."

The Los Angeles Times (1/28, Parsons, Wilkinson, 4.52M) predicts that Trump's emerging relationship with Putin will likely be among "the most closely watched of his administration, both at home and around the world." European leaders and US lawmakers have been "alarmed" by Trump's "praise and unusually friendly overtures toward the Russian leader," and their concerns were "further cemented" by the ties to Russia that Secretary of State-designate Rex Tillerson "has acknowledged." Trump's supporters, however, have maintained that Trump's "outreach toward Russia was intended to curb Putin's aggressive behavior."

Trump, Merkel Discuss NATO In Phone Conversation.

The AP (1/28, Jordans) reports President Trump spoke with German Chancellor Angela Merkel by telephone on Saturday. According to Merkel's spokesman, Steffen Seibert, the two leaders "expressed their intention to further deepen the already excellent bilateral relations in the coming years," and agreed on the "fundamental importance that the NATO alliance has for trans-Atlantic relations." Seibert also claimed Trump accepted Merkel's invitation to the G-20 meeting in July, which Germany is hosting, and Trump said he looked forward to Merkel's visit to Washington "soon."

Reuters (1/28, Shalal) reports the two leaders also discussed the situation in North Africa and the Middle East, their nations' ties to Russia, the eastern Ukrainian conflict, and NATO. In a joint statement, Trump and Merkel wrote that they "recognized that NATO must be capable of confronting 21st century threats and that our common defense requires appropriate investment in military capabilities to ensure all allies are contributing their fair share to our collective security." The statement did not indicate whether the two leaders discussed Trump's recent executive order restricting immigration or efforts to cancel free-trade agreements, both of which German officials have criticized.

Trump, Abe Plan For Meeting, Discuss Economic And Security Issues.

The Wall Street Journal (1/28, Nakamichi, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports President Trump and Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe discussed "the importance" of a mutual alliance in "areas such as the economy and national security" in a Saturday telephone call, according to Abe in remarks after the conversation. Abe said he and Trump also agreed to meet on Feb. 10 in Washington for another "frank, meaningful exchange of opinions."

In their upcoming meeting, Trump and Abe will focus on "affirming the importance of bilateral ties while setting the stage for potentially sensitive trade talks," Reuters (1/28, Takenaka, Rampton) reports. During the telephone conversation, Abe and Trump discussed the automotive industry, according to Japanese senior government spokesman Koichi Hagiuda, and the importance of US-Japanese economic ties. In a statement, the White House also noted, "President Trump and Prime Minister Abe said they would consult and cooperate on the threat posed by North Korea."

The White House also commented, "President Trump affirmed the ironclad U.S. commitment to ensuring the security of Japan," and both Trump and Abe "also committed to deepen the bilateral trade and investment relationship," Reuters (1/28, Rampton, Wroughton) reports in a second article. The White House also confirmed that the two leaders discussed Defense Secretary Mattis' upcoming visit to Japan.

Trump Holds Phone Call With Australian Prime Minister.

An Australian government official, on condition of anonymity, told Bloomberg News (1/29, Johnson, 2.41M) that in a 25-minute phone conversation with Australian Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull on Saturday, President Trump pledged to uphold the US' commitment under former President Obama to potentially resettle about 1,600 asylum seekers. The asylum seekers are currently detained in camps on Manus Island and Nauru. The agreement "appeared in jeopardy" on Friday, when Trump issued an executive order to temporarily prohibit refugees from entering the US. In a statement, the White House did not mention the refugee agreement but said Trump and Turnbull "emphasized the enduring strength and closeness of the US-Australia relationship that is critical for peace, stability, and prosperity in the Asia-Pacific region and globally."

Jewish Leaders Denounce Netanyahu's Praise Of Proposed Mexican Border Wall.

Reuters (1/28, Graham) reports Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu praised President Trump's proposed Mexican border wall on Saturday and, on his official Twitter account, explained, "President Trump is right. I built a wall along Israel's southern border. It stopped all illegal immigration. Great success. Great idea." Mexico's Jewish community "swiftly rejected" Netanyahu's remark, including the nation's Foreign Ministry, which expressed "profound astonishment, rejection and disappointment." The ministry added that its Foreign Minister Luis Videgaray reiterated Mexico's deep affection for Israel on Friday, which is recognized as a Holocaust memorial day.

The Wall Street Journal (1/28, Jones, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) says that Mexico's Jewish community also issued statement that read, "As Mexicans and Jews we support the actions taken by President Enrique Peña Nieto in negotiations with the U.S.," and former US ambassador to Israel, Daniel Shapiro, remarked, "Hard to explain this intervention on a hotly debated issue." Israel's ambassador to Mexico, Jonathan Peled, attempted to clarify Netanyahu's comment and stated that he was "referring to our experience in security that we want to share, it does not express a position on the U.S.-Mexican relationship."

Israeli Settlement Residents Express Optimism About Administration. The Washington Post (1/29, Morris, Eglash, 11.43M) reports some of President Trump's close associates have ties to a "right-wing Zionist community" of a Beit El settlement in the occupied West Bank. The US' ambassador to Israel, David Friedman, is president of American Friends of Bet El Institutions, which raises about $2 million annually to protect the community. White House senior adviser Jared Kushner has contributed "tens of thousands" to the organization, and "Trump himself made a $10,000 donation in 2003, his foundation's tax filings show." Settlement residents expressed optimism about the settlement's future and about Friedman's appointment, but one resident, Hillel Manne, commented that "if you want change you'll need big change at the State Department." Hanan Ashrawi of the Palestinian Liberation Organization, however, called upcoming settlement expansion plans "disastrous."

Rice Criticizes Trump's Statement On International Holocaust Remembrance Day. The Hill (1/28, Vladimirov, 1.25M) reports former National Security Adviser Susan Rice published a Twitter message on Saturday in which she chastised President Trump for issuing a statement on International Holocaust Remembrance Day but failed to recognize Jewish victims. "What sickness enables a statement on [Holocaust Memorial Day] that ignores 6 million Jews! Just imagine the response if Pres. Obama did that," Rice wrote. Specifically, Rice objected to Trump's use of the phrase "innocent people" on grounds that the phrase did not adequately reflect the genocide committed against Jews.

Trump, May Display "Special Relationship" Despite Criticisms.

A source on British Prime Minister Theresa May's team told Reuters (1/28, Piper) that May and President Trump engaged in a "warm, free-flowing and unscripted" conversation on Friday during lunch to reiterate the "special relationship" between the US and UK. The source revealed, "They talked a lot about Thatcher and Reagan, and both agreed it was one of the most successful political relationships ever," and that "Trump went on to say that he always looked up to Reagan and said that he wanted their relationship to be even better than that one." The source said Trump and May also discussed Russia, Brexit, and the NATO alliance.

The AP (1/28, Lawless) similarly says May and Trump's friendship was evidenced by "front-page photos of the two leaders touching hands as they walked at the White House before a strikingly collegial news conference." The two leaders' mutual affection was seemingly resistant to their starkly different positions on a variety of matters. May's office described Trump's offer of his hand as a chivalrous gesture and confirmed that the two leaders' conversation flowed easily. May's apparent rapport with Trump is "delighting those who think Trump's presidency will be good for Britain but alarming others who loathe the brash Republican populist." Britain's Labour Party leader Jeremy Corbyn accused May for having "failed to challenge Trump and stand up for our values," and Liberal Democrat leader Tim Farron said she "clearly spent her time with Trump dodging his despicable comments on torture, on women, on Muslims and on Mexicans."

Bloomberg Politics (1/29, Hutton, 201K) says that the two leaders' amicability failed to resonate in Britain, and "May's refusal to publicly disagree with" Trump on his executive order limiting immigration "unleashed a flood of criticism," especially from her Conservative Party colleagues. In Turkey, where May traveled to after departing the US, she "was asked three times what she thought of the ban, and three times she ignored the question." May finally responded to heckling journalists, saying, "The United States is responsible for the United States' own policy on refugees."

NYPost Praises "Special Relationship" Between Trump, May. In an editorial, the New York Post (1/28, 3.82M) praises President Trump and British Prime Minister Theresa May for establishing their "special relationship" and adds that the US and Britain "seem to be in step again — as in the days of Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher, or Bill Clinton and Tony Blair." The Post points to "Trump's remarkable Election Day win" and Britons' vote to leave the European Union, which prompted May's predecessor, David Cameron, to resign, as "twin populist surprises" to which the two leaders "owe their offices." The Post concludes, "For the new president's first face-to-face with a fellow world leader, it couldn't have gone better."

Hollande Urges Trump, European Leaders To Reject Populism.

Reuters (1/28, Rose) reports French President Francois Hollande, in a Saturday phone call, urged President Trump to resist adopting a protectionist approach because of the economic and political ramifications of "turning inward." Hollande also reiterated his country's commitment to the UN, the indispensable value of NATO, and importance of keeping the EU intact.

Before reporters, Hollande urged EU members to unite against the threat of populist movement and accused the US of encouraging "populism and even extremism," the AP (1/28, Hatton) reports. He accused the US of "saying that Europe should not take immigrants, shouldn't stay together, not believe in climate change," and called on bloc leaders to "engage in discussions (with the U.S.) that sometimes should be very firm." Hollande asserted that "as long as there are statements from the U.S. president about Europe, when he speaks about the model of Brexit for other countries, when the U.S. president talks about climate change...saying he's not convinced of it, we should respond to him. When he takes protectionist measures, we should respond to him. When he destabilizes the economies of other countries, not only European ones, we should respond to him. When he rejects the arrival of refugees, while Europe has done its duty, we should respond to him."

Jordanian King To Visit US On Monday.

The Wall Street Journal (1/28, Paletta, Nicholas, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports King Abdullah II of Jordan will visit Washington, DC on Monday, although it is unclear whether he will meet with President Trump. A statement from King Abdullah II's office claimed he will meet with members of Congress and other US officials; King Abdullah II's visit may be the first visit from an Arab leader since Trump issued an executive order limiting the US' refugee program and blocking the entry of people from various Muslim nations.

Europe's Future Expected To Hinge On Resolutions Of Key Uncertainties.

The New York Times (1/28, Gladstone, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) highlights the uncertainties that face Europe in 2017, such as "terrorism, borders, migration, economics and President Trump's new America First message booming from across the Atlantic." The Times profiles Britain's exit from the European Union, Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan's potential withdrawal of Turkey's bloc membership application, and the economic troubles in Greece and Italy as key issues. The Times also points to Trump's uncertain position on US-Russian relations and NATO as well as his possible impact on key European elections this year.

NYTimes A1: Dispute Over Kings Of Malta Reflects Deep Divisions In The Vatican.

On its front page, the New York Times (1/28, A1, Horowitz, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports the medieval Roman Catholic order known as the Kings of Malta agreed on Saturday to Pope Francis' demand to replace its leader with a papal delegate. The "intra-Catholic squabble" erupted into "a full-scale proxy war between Pope Francis and the Vatican traditionalists who oppose him," however, when the conservatives denounced Francis' order as "an illegal annexation and ideological purging by a power-obsessed pontiff." The conflict, says the Times, indicates that the Vatican is not immune to the "political tensions rippling across the globe."

WPost A1: Japan Addresses Growing Aging Population.

In a front-page article, the Washington Post (1/28, A1, Fifield, 11.43M) reports more than a quarter of Japan's population is over the age of 65, and that figure is expected to reach 40 percent by 2050. The nation's birthrate, however, is well below the level required to maintain its current population of 128 million. The Japanese government is preemptively addressing anticipated elderly care labor shortages and exploring how to keep the rising number of seniors healthy and active. In one measure, to be implemented next year, the government will loosen elderly caregiver licensing regulations and establish a technical intern program.

WPost Denounces Russia's Decriminalization Of Domestic Battery.

In an editorial about Russia's lower parliamentary house, the State Duma, vote Friday to approve the decriminalization of domestic battery for first-time offenders, the Washington Post (1/28, 11.43M) calls the move "wrong-headed" and says it "sends a message that brutality in a family is legitimate." The Post contends that the "most objectionable" aspect of the measure "is the broader message it sends: that a domestic assault that doesn't break bones or result in a concussion" should not be penalized, even if the assault results in humiliation or deeply damages the victim emotionally.

Trump adding CIA chief back to National Security Council

By Eric Geller
| 01/30/17 03:45 PM EST

President Donald Trump is adding the director of the CIA back to the National Security Council.

The move amends Saturday's memorandum establishing the NSC, which did not list the CIA director as a "regular attendee" of NSC meetings.

"The president has such respect for [CIA] Director [Mike] Pompeo and the men and women of the CIA that today the president is announcing that he will amend the memo to add the CIA back into the NSC," White House press secretary Sean Spicer told reporters on Monday.

The elevation could create friction between the CIA and the Office of the Director of National Intelligence.

The DNI replaced the CIA director on the NSC when Congress created the position in 2005 to oversee the entire intelligence apparatus.

The CIA is considered the most powerful member of the intelligence community, and prior to the creation of the DNI, the CIA director coordinated the other agencies' activities.

Obama's CIA director and his DNI clashed early in his first term over participation in the meetings.

Trump team building a wall inside National Security Council

There are fears of an even more insular decision-making process than reigned during the Obama administration.

By Gregory Hellman and Bryan Bender

| Updated 02/02/17 11:23 AM EST

President Donald Trump's national security adviser is relying on a new layer of hand-picked aides on the National Security Council that some professional staffers worry will serve as a "barrier" between them and top officials.

The moves by retired Lt. Gen. Michael Flynn are stoking fears of an even more insular decision-making process than reigned during the Obama administration, which was roundly criticized for micromanaging national security and eroding the influence of the Pentagon, State Department and other agencies. And it is prompting some frustrated career staffers in the primary policymaking body inside the White House, who had been asked to stay on under Trump, to consider departing instead, say multiple sources with direct knowledge.
On Thursday, Flynn announced he has hired four top new deputies, all holding the title of deputy assistant to the president and responsible for broad portfolios — from economics to regional affairs and strategic planning.

"You will not have the experts in the room when the principals are having these discussions," worries one NSC veteran who has heard complaints from White House officials this week. The person, like others, agreed to speak on condition of anonymity.

"They are not being used," added another source with direct knowledge of the developments, who similarly expressed concern that the Trump team is "doubling down on cutting out the professional experts."

"They have been emasculated and have no authority," the source added. "But they are still getting hammered by agencies and allies and don't know what to tell them. … Many are heading for the exits."

The concerns come after Trump granted his political strategist, Steve Bannon, who is separately constructing his own power center inside the West Wing, membership on the highest rung of the National Security Council, traditionally reserved for Cabinet chiefs. Permitting a political operative to participate in the high-level meetings was seen by many as a dangerous break with tradition and prompted at least one member of Congress to recommend that the 1947 law that created the body be changed.

The staffing deliberations also come after reports that the president and his senior aides did not fully consult with his secretaries of Homeland Security and Defense before issuing a controversial executive order temporarily banning travel to the United States from seven majority-Muslim countries.

The small coterie of advisers fall under Flynn — and above the senior directors of the NSC staff who are organized around regions of the world and security threats such as terrorism or weapons of mass destruction.

Joining the inner circle are David Cattler, a former Defense Intelligence Agency official who will oversee regional affairs; John Eisenberg, a former Justice Department official who will be the NSC's top legal adviser; longtime Commerce and State Department official Kenneth Juster, who will steer economic policy; and Kevin Harrington, most recently the managing director and head of research for Thiel Macro LLC, a San Francisco-based global macro hedge fund. Harrington will be responsible for strategic planning.

The White House declined to address questions about the new layer of personnel at the top levels of the NSC structure — and none was identified in an executive order that Trump signed on Saturday laying out its overall makeup and membership.

But a spokesman told POLITICO that Flynn intends to rely on a smaller staff and "run a very precise and orderly and quick process." The spokesman cited the fact that there is now one executive secretary for both the NSC and the companion Homeland Security Council, which includes many of the same members and relies on much of the same staff.

Officials regularly criticized the Obama administration for ballooning the size of the NSC and shutting out Cabinet-level departments. In last year's defense bill, Congress passed a provision limiting future NSC staffs to 200 people to prevent overreach — although scholars have questioned whether such a limit is constitutional.

There is wide bipartisan support for shrinking the NSC.

"Everybody has been saying for years that the NSC was too big and too micro-managerial," said Steve Sestanovich, a top State Department official in the 1990s who served on the NSC in the administration of President Ronald Reagan. "If the new administration is willing to take that problem on, more power to them."

Flynn said at a think tank discussion last month that “our mission is to ensure the president and the national security community is committed to carrying out necessary reforms." And in a brief memo to Cabinet departments this week he pledged that he and his team "will be working closely with you and your teams."

But longtime participants on the NSC deliberations from both parties expressed concern that the early signs portend the same type of micromanagement under Trump as under Obama — or worse.

“What you're seeing here is two things: one, a total politicizing of the national security apparatus, and two, a second power center being created," said another Obama NSC veteran. “It's the place policy will get made, and it will push aside career NSC staffers.”

Indeed, in terms of the day-to-day operations, the Trump order issued on Saturday outlining the basic structure of the National Security Council is viewed by many as failing to address the Obama White House's management problems.

For example, it similarly mandates that members of the NSC staff chair regional and issue-related policy coordination committees, sometimes known as interagency working groups, and can invite representatives from executive departments where they deem appropriate.

“It means you've got the White House in the room the whole time,” said Vikram Singh, who previously served as deputy assistant secretary of defense for South and Southeast Asia during the Obama administration. “This sounds like a continuation, ironically.”

Coupled with the rise of political influence in the body, the continuation of NSC control of policy coordination committees demonstrates that Republicans are casting aside previous criticisms now that they are in the White House, said Loren Schulman, who served as senior adviser to Obama's last national security adviser, Susan Rice. "It tells me they want to increase the amount of coordination through the White House,” she said. "They haven't put their money where their mouth is."

Stephen Hadley, who served as national security adviser for President George W. Bush, said the overall structure as laid out in the executive order "won't fix that problem" of micromanagement. "It depends on how it is used. But I know Flynn and company want to bring things back to the more strategic level and get out of the micromanaging detail."

Sestanovich, however, warned that a smaller organization could create its own problems. "If the NSC staff is smaller, does that mean other bureaucracies do what they want with less oversight, or that the White House calls the shots from a smaller knowledge base and with less consultation?"

For others, the unfolding setup is even more concerning given the slow pace at which the Trump administration has staffed top security and intelligence posts in the Pentagon, State Department and other key agencies.

"What do you have to coordinate if you're having trouble staffing?” asked Heather Hurlburt, who previously served on President Bill Clinton's NSC. “It kind of gives another meaning to micromanage.”

Coordinating more with Cabinet departments than was the case with the immigration ban will also make for better decisions, advises Nicholas Burns, who served on the NSC under presidents George H.W. Bush and Clinton.

"I would like to believe these are just the operational mistakes of the first 10 days in office and they will do better,” Burns said. "The system works best when the president trusts its leading secretaries and delegates to them.”

US Agencies Investigate Flynn's Contacts With Russian Diplomats.

Revelations regarding National Security Adviser Michael Flynn's contacts with Russia prior to President Trump taking office dominated coverage over the weekend, with widespread reporting from print and online media, as well as both network and cable news outlets. The Washington Post notably had seven articles dedicated to the matter. On Friday and Saturday, many outlets questioned Flynn's truthfulness in reports focused on how intelligence gathered by US agencies contradicted past claims by Flynn and other White House officials. Many outlets centered on reactions from leading Democratic lawmakers, some of whom called for Flynn to resign or have his security clearance revoked. Sunday's coverage included several stories suggesting that Flynn is on thin ice within Trump's inner circle following White House senior aid Stephen Miller's appearance on several Sunday talk shows in which he declined to defend Flynn or offer President Trump's position on the matter.

The CBS Evening News (2/10, story 2, 2:25, Pelley, 11.17M) reported the FBI and other intelligence agencies are investigating National Security Adviser Flynn to determine whether he discussed US sanctions against Russia in his December phone call with Russian ambassador Sergey Kislyak, as alleged by the Washington Post on Thursday. Correspondent Jeff Pegues said the agencies allegedly "gathered the information through ongoing electronic surveillance of Russian officials and suspected spies." Vice (2/12, Owen, 2.28M) says the fact "Flynn can't seem to get his story straight" is "raising concerns that Trump's trusted advisor may have unlawfully interfered in U.S. foreign policy interactions with Russia and then tried to cover it up."

The Hill (2/10, Seipel, 1.25M) reports in its "Blog Briefing Room" blog, "President Donald Trump on Friday told his press pool that he didn't know about reports that his national security adviser Michael Flynn discussed sanctions with Russia before he was sworn in." In video footage broadcast by the CBS Weekend News (2/11, story 2, 0:55, Ninan), President Trump was shown telling reporters, "I don't know about it. I haven't seen it. What report is that?" A spokesperson to Flynn "now says the national security adviser simply cannot remember whether he discussed sanctions. A switch from his earlier denials," ABC World News Tonight (2/10, story 2, 3:40, Muir, 14.63M) reported. White House press secretary Sean Spicer defended Flynn's conversation and previously described it as a precursor to a possible meeting between President Trump and Russian President Vladimir Putin. Vice President Pence claimed last month that Flynn's conversations "happened to occur around the time that the United States took action to expel diplomats had nothing whatsoever to do with those sanctions."

Bloomberg Politics (2/10, Sink, 201K) reported Pence claimed that his assertion was based on what Flynn told him, according to an Administration official. Bloomberg notes Flynn's spokesman told the Post that while Flynn "had no recollection of discussing sanctions, he couldn't be certain that the topic never came up." The Washington Post (2/10, Hohmann, 11.43M) says "one takeaway" from the revelations on Flynn is that, "Either the national security adviser misled the vice president, or the vice president knowingly misled the American people."

The Washington Post (2/10, Miller, 11.43M) says Flynn spoke privately with Pence on Friday "in an apparent attempt to contain the fallout." One senior Administration official "disputed that Flynn was in jeopardy" of losing his job. "He's in every meeting he's supposed to be doing, fulfilling his job as national security adviser. He's seeing the president constantly," the official said of Flynn.

Writing for the Washington Post (2/12, 11.43M), Chris Cillizza argues, "What's worse for Flynn is that not only did he get caught not telling the truth but that he apparently passed along that falsehood to Vice President Pence, too." In another piece for the Washington Post (2/10, 11.43M), Cillizza said, "It strains credulity that on Wednesday, Flynn could issue a flat denial about conversations he had with Kislyak, but on Thursday, suddenly his memory of those conversations changed." Cillizza adds that "it's hard to see how Flynn or Trump will be able to simply dismiss it as 'fake news' produced by a biased media given the depth and breadth of the sourcing on the Post story."

The Kremlin also denied that Flynn and Kislyak addressed the issue of sanctions before Trump's inauguration, the AP (2/10, Pace, Salama) reported. The AP writes, "It's not unusual for incoming administrations to have discussions with foreign governments before taking office," but the timing and frequency of the contacts elicited "questions about whether Trump's team discussed--or even helped shape--Russia's response." The AP explains "Putin unexpectedly did not retaliate against the U.S. for the expulsions, a decision Trump quickly praised."

NBC Nightly News (2/10, story 2, 2:20, Holt, 16.61M) Andrea Mitchell reported, "The timing of Flynn's calls and texts with the Russian is critical: just as the Obama White House was expelling 35 Russian diplomats for the election year hacking." Mitchell clarified that "intelligence sources say no one has concluded that Flynn broke any laws."

Miller Declines To Defend Flynn As Questions About Contact With Russia Continue. The AP (2/12, Colvin) reports that "top White House aide" Stephen Miller "sidestepped repeated chances" to defend "embattled" NSA Flynn during appearances on several Sunday morning political talk shows. President Trump has yet to comment on reports that Flynn "engaged in conversations with a Russian diplomat about US sanctions before Trump's inauguration."

On ABC's This Week  , Miller said, "I don't have any information to change anything that has previously already been said by the White House on this matter. Gen. Flynn has served this country admirably and with distinction." Host George Stephanopoulos repeatedly pressed Miller on the issue, asking why he was representing the White House on the show if he did not have anything substantive to say on the issue. On NBC's Meet The Press  , Miller said, "Gen. Flynn has served this country admirably...and I look forward to having more discussions about this in the future." According to the Washington Post (2/12, O'Keefe, 11.43M), when Chuck Todd asked Miller if Trump still had confidence in Flynn, "Miller said he did not know. He said his colleagues at the White House 'did not give me anything to say.'"

The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Lauter, 4.52M) says Miller's "silence on Flynn was significant because the White House had booked him on several of the major Sunday television interview programs." Miller appears to have been "deliberately chosen...in part to avoid having to give a definitive answer about Flynn."

The Washington Post (2/12, A1, Rucker, Entous, O'Keefe, 11.43M) reports that Flynn "is under increasing political pressure and risks losing the confidence of some colleagues. ... 'The knives are out for Flynn,' said one administration official who, like others interviewed for this report, spoke on the condition of anonymity in order to speak candidly." The Wall Street Journal (2/12, A1, Borak, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) says in a headline that Flynn's position is growing "tenuous," and that Miller declined to say whether the President still has faith in Flynn. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Lauter, 4.52M) says that the "ominous silence" around Flynn "deepened" with Miller's appearances.

Reuters (2/12, Holland) headlines a summary of the Flynn controversy "Trump's National Security Adviser Flynn Trying To Survive Crisis."

NYTimes Analysis: NSC "Chaotic And Anxious." The New York Times (2/12, A1, Sanger, Schmitt, Baker, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that even beyond the Flynn situation, "these are chaotic and anxious days inside the National Security Council," where "staff members get up in the morning, read President Trump's Twitter posts and struggle to make policy to fit them. Most are kept in the dark about what Mr. Trump tells foreign leaders in his phone calls." Some now use "encrypted communications to talk with their colleagues, after hearing that Mr. Trump's top advisers are considering an 'insider threat' program that could result in monitoring cellphones and emails for leaks." Deputy NSA K.T. McFarland "acknowledged that career officials were on edge." McFarland told the Times, "I think it would be a mistake if we didn't have consternation about the changes – most of the cabinet haven't even been in government before."

Democratic Lawmakers Call For Investigation Into Flynn.  ABC World News Tonight (2/11, story 3, 1:10, Llamas, 14.63M) on Saturday reported that Democratic members of Congress have called for an investigation into National Security Adviser Michael Flynn and whether he discussed the possibility of loosening sanctions imposed under former President Obama with Russian diplomats.

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Wire, Lauter, 4.52M) reported, "Democrats on the House intelligence committee demanded Friday that President Trump address" the revelations about Flynn. House Intelligence Committee Ranking Member Adam Schiff said the allegations against Flynn raise "serious questions of legality and fitness for office." Another Los Angeles Times (2/10, 4.52M) article reported that Schiff said in a statement that if Flynn did speak to Russia about the sanctions, "and then he and other administration officials misled the American people, his conduct would be all the more pernicious, and he should no longer serve in this administration or any other." Meanwhile, Rep. Eric Swalwell, the ranking Democrat on the Intelligence Committee's CIA subcommittee, "said Flynn should be suspended until the allegations are investigated." Swalwell told the Daily Beast (2/10, 1.11M) that Flynn "was undermining the [Obama] administration's... policy, to punish Russia for interfering in our elections. ... Until we get to the bottom of it, I don't think he should have access to classified information." Democratic Rep. Mike Quigley, a member of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence Committee, told the Beast Flynn "needs to step down. The credibility of the White House with the American public and international community is at stake." Other senior Democrats echoed Quigley and Schiff, including Eliot Engel, the top Democrat on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, who said Flynn should resign if the allegations are true.

The Washington Examiner (2/10, Feldscher; Klimas, 400K) reported Sens. Ed Markey and Chris Murphy, both members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, released a joint statement expressing their concerns regarding Flynn. Markey specifically said Flynn may have to resign. He added, "I hope federal law enforcement professionals investigate this matter immediately. Any effort to undermine our nation's foreign policy – even during a transition period – may be illegal and must be taken seriously."

The Washington Times (2/12, Howell, 272K) reports that Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-MD), "the House's top Democratic investigator" as ranking member of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, says Flynn "needs to explain whether he discussed sanctions with Russia's ambassador." On ABC's This Week  , Cummings said it would be "an appropriate action" to suspend Flynn's security clearance pending an investigation, adding, "There's something else that needs to be asked. That is, did the President instruct Gen. Flynn to talk to the Ambassador? And did he know about it? If he knew about this conversation, when did he know it?" Politico (2/12, Strauss, 2.46M) notes that Cummings' response came after host George Stephanopoulos asked him if he agreed with House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who believes "Flynn's security clearance should be revoked, pending the completion of an investigation into the matter."

The Hill (2/10, Greenwood, 1.25M) reported that Sen. Claire McCaskill, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, demanded an FBI briefing "as soon as possible" on communications between Flynn and Kisylak. In a letter Friday to FBI Director Comey, McCaskill wrote, "Given the significant implications that any such communications may have had for the nation's homeland and national security, I request that you provide a closed briefing for the Committee as soon as possible regarding the scope and status of any current FBI investigation related to General Flynn's contacts with the Russian government."

On Fox News Sunday  (2/12, Wallace), Senate Foreign Relations Committee ranking Democrat Sen. Ben Cardin said, "We need to get to the bottom of this. ... The relationship between Russia and our elections is something that needs to be independently investigated. I would call for an independent investigation like we had a 9/11. We need to have an independent investigation, and Gen. Flynn's comments add to our concern about the relationship with Russia."

On CNN's State Of The Union  , Sen. Al Franken agreed, saying, "Either he was lying about not having discussed that had or forgot. ... There's going to be have to be investigations...an independent investigation into the Trump campaign and the Trump Administration's relationship to Russia."

Meanwhile, The Guardian (UK) (2/10, Borger, 4.07M) mentioned that Republican Sen. Mike Rounds told CNN that if the country had been misled, "we would expect the president to take appropriate actions."

Christie: Flynn Needs To Have "Candid" Conversation With Trump, Pence. The Huffington Post (2/12, Wilkie, 237K) reports that New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie joined Miller in trying to "insulate the White House" from the revelations about Flynn. Appearing on CNN's "State of the Union," Christie argued that Flynn needs to give Trump and Pence a "candid conversation" to "make sure that everybody gets the accurate story on this matter and that it's cleared up."

Ignatius: To Reestablish Trust, Flynn Must Truthfully Disclose Contacts With Russia. In his column for the Washington Post (2/11, 11.43M), David Ignatius said the investigation into whether Flynn discussed sanctions with Russian Ambassador Sergey Kislyak should not focus on Flynn's possible violation of the "obscure and probably unenforceable" Logan Act, but on whether he "sought to hide" the nature of the discussion and whether he "was open about his conversations." Ignatius said, "A national security adviser's success depends on maintaining trust, especially with his White House colleagues," and Flynn can only fill his trust deficit "with a full accounting of what happened" that is consistent with US intelligence agencies' records of his calls.

Cartoon Shows Flynn As Soviet Soldier. Washington Post (2/12, 11.43M)cartoonist Ann Telnaes, in a piece titled, "Michael Flynn's Russian Connection," drew Flynn wearing a Ushanka hat featuring what appears to be the symbol for a Soviet soldier. A small man who looks like Putin is shown emerging from the top of the hat.

Pompeo Reportedly Refuses Clearance To Flynn Aide Townley. Politico (2/10, Nussbaum, Cheney, 2.46M) reported "a top deputy" to National Security Adviser Michael Flynn, senior director for Africa Robin Townley, was informed Friday "that the Central Intelligence Agency had rejected his request for an elite security clearance required for service on the NSC, according to two people with direct knowledge of the situation." The decision, which a source said was approved by CIA Director Mike Pompeo, "forced Townley...out of his NSC post" and "infuriated Flynn and his allies." The sources "said that the CIA did not offer much explanation for why Townley's request for so-called 'Sensitive Compartmented Information' clearance was rejected," but "said that Flynn and his allies believe it was motivated by Townley's skepticism of the intelligence community's techniques – sentiments shared by Flynn." The New York Daily News (2/11, Sommerfeldt, 4.45M) said one source told Politico that Flynn and his deputies "believe this is a hit job from inside the CIA on Flynn and the people close to him. .. Townley believes that the CIA doesn't run the world." A second source reportedly "said a number of Trump administration officials are critical of Flynn, and view him as actively waging a 'jihad against the intelligence community.'" That source claimed officials blame Flynn for Trump's "fraught relationship" with intelligence community leaders.

Putin Spokesman Comments On Leaked Allegations Of Trump-Putin Call. The Washington Post (2/10, Roth, 11.43M) reported details of President Trump's telephone conversation with Russian President Vladimir Putin were leaked on Thursday. According to the leaked details, Trump allegedly denounced the New START treaty, which limits both countries' nuclear weapons deployments to no more than 1,550, as favoring Russia. Trump also allegedly said "nuclear weapons should be way down and reduced very substantially, that's part of it," and that the sanctions against Russia are hurting the nation "very badly right now," but that "something can happen that a lot of people are going to benefit." Putin's spokesman, Dmitri Peskov, said he could not confirm the leaked information, and also denied that nuclear reduction negotiations were in any way tied to the loosening of sanctions.

COUNTER-TERRORISM

Questions Arise About Undercover FBI Agent Near Gunman Before Texas Terror Attack.

The AP (2/10, Billeaud) reported that questions have arisen as to how much more authorities could have done to stop two Arizona men from opening fire "outside a Prophet Muhammad cartoon contest in suburban Dallas in 2015." The AP said court documents show that an undercover FBI agent drove past the two men before they opened fire, which drew criticism from defendant Abdul Malik Abdul Kareem's lawyer and the lawyer for two security guards, who argued the "government has not been forthcoming about the agent's role in the plot and have questions why the agency didn't break up the plot." Lawyer Trenton Roberts said, "We are convinced that there is much more to this story than the FBI has admitted." The Dallas Morning News (2/10, 1.12M) posts the AP's coverage to its website.

Man Pleads Guilty To Planning Bomb Attack With Islamic State.

The AP (2/10, Hays) reported that Munther Omar Saleh of New York City on Friday pleaded guilty to charges that he was in communication with an Islamic State recruiter "who was killed in a US drone strike in Syria in 2015, according to a federal prosecutor." In his plea, Saleh admitted that he sought contact with the group "knowing that it was involved in terrorism."

Reuters (2/10, Raymond) reported that prosecutors said Saleh was planning a pressure-cooker bomb attack in conjunction with one of the Islamic State's top hackers and that he pleaded guilty to four counts, including "conspiring to provide material support to Islamic State and assaulting a federal officer by charging at a law enforcement vehicle." He is one of six men arrested in connection with "a group of individuals who had pledged allegiance to Islamic State, or ISIS, and discussed traveling to join the group." The New York Times (2/10, Mele, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reported that New York City man Fareed Mumuni also recently pleaded guilty in the plot to join ISIL. FBI New York Assistant Director in Charge William F. Sweeney Jr. said the men's guilty pleas "show just how close the threat of homegrown terrorism exists for New York City."

FBI JTTF Investigating Dakota Access Pipeline Protesters.

The Guardian (UK) (2/10, 4.07M) reported that an FBI joint terrorism task force is investigating activists who are protesting against the Dakota Access pipeline. "Multiple officers," The Guardian said, "have attempted to contact at least three people tied to the Standing Rock 'water protector' movement in North Dakota." The nature of the investigation is unknown, but some attorneys believe the FBI's actions are unconstitutional. "The idea that the government would attempt to construe this indigenous-led non-violent movement into some kind of domestic terrorism investigation is unfathomable to me," said civil rights attorney Lauren Regan. "It's outrageous, it's unwarranted ... and it's unconstitutional." In a piece based on The Guardian's coverage, the Daily Caller (2/10, White, 898K) reported that more than 600 arrests have taken place as a result of protests of the pipeline.

Former National Guardsman Sentenced To Prison For Trying To Join ISIL.

The AP (2/10) reported that 27-year-old former National Guardsman Mohamed Jalloh of Sterling, Virginia was sentenced on Friday to 11 years in prison after pleading guilty last October to "attempting to provide material support to" ISIL. The AP said Jalloh admitted that he traveled to Africa and boarded a truck to join ISIL before "bailing out." The charge against Jalloh "originated from an FBI sting operation." The Washington Post (2/10, Weiner, 11.43M) reported that Joseph Flood, a lawyer for Jalloh, blamed his client's actions on heavy drug use and childhood trauma, rather than radical sentiment. Jalloh's attachment to ISIL was "superficial" and he was confused, Flood said. "He's clearly a follower," he added. Jalloh, the Post noted, also claimed to have been in search of a wife when an FBI operative contacted him about pursuing terrorism. "For two months, Flood wrote, the informant 'hounded' Jalloh with 'nearly constant entreaties' to engage in a violent attack," the Post reported. Jalloh was arrested after attempting to buy an assault rifle.

FBI Asked To Investigate Release Of Pheasants, Possibly By Eco-Terrorists.

The Portland (OR) Tribune (2/12, Rendleman, 104K) reports that the Clackamas County Sheriff's Office in Oregon has asked the FBI to investigate the release of some 50 pheasants from an aviary, purportedly by eco terrorists. The Animal Liberation Front lauded the release of the animals online, the Tribune reports. The pheasants were valued at approximately $1,000.

Trump Administration Delivers CIA Torture Report To Federal Court.

The Miami Herald (2/10, Rosenberg, 856K) reported the Trump Administration on Friday said it had delivered the Justice Department's copy of the "so-called Torture Report on the CIA's secret prison network during the George W. Bush administration" to a Federal court in DC. The Herald says Acting Assistant Attorney General Chad Readler notified the court that a redacted copy of the report had been deposited for secure storage with the Court Information Security Officers.

House Report Calls For Better Screening Of "Insider Threats" At Airports.

The Washington Post (2/11, Kunkle, 11.43M) says a new Congressional report released by the House Homeland Security Committee this week indicates a need for the "Transportation Security Administration, airport operators and airlines" to improve screening procedures for "workers such as baggage handlers or cleaning crews for possible security threats." The report notes cases going back to 2008 of "aviation workers, former employees or contractors" being "recruited to fight for ISIS or other terrorist groups" or "engag[ing] in efforts to smuggle firearms or other contraband aboard aircraft." Moreover, the report says that "approximately 450 airports remain vulnerable to insider attacks" given inadequate employee background checks and rechecks.

Bomb Scare In Los Angeles Creates "Commuter Nightmare."

Breitbart (2/11, Marlow, 2.02M) reports the Los Angeles County Sheriff's bomb squad was called to investigate a package, which resulted in the temporary shut down of the Hollywood, Universal/Studio City and Hollywood/Western stations. A "black backpack" was ultimately determined to not be a threat. The scare, according to Breitbart, "set off a commuting nightmare for those on the Metro Line as well as surrounding freeways."

WSJournal Analysis: In The Wake Of A Terror Attack In The US, Trump Should Not Round Up Muslims.

A Wall Street Journal (2/10, Benjamin, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) analysis reports that a terror attack will eventually take place against the US by jihadists and how the Trump Administration responds will affect not only national security but the national psyche. The Journal concedes that an attack may occur in the US, noting that while a 9/11 style attack is unlikely given aggressive counterterrorism efforts, it cannot be ruled out. Following any attack, the Journal says it is critical to avoid the post-9/11 round-up of Muslims as either suspects or witnesses.

Kristof: "Husbands Are More Deadly In America Than Jihadist Terrorists."

Nicholas Kristof writes in his New York Times (2/11, Kristof, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) column that between the years 1975 and 2015, terrorists from the seven nations listed in President Trump's travel ban "killed zero people in America," according to the Cato Institute. However, the number of people killed by guns in the same period was 1.34 million, which he says "includ[es] murders, suicides, and accidents." Citing University of North Carolina professor Charles Kurzman, Kristof says Americans last year were more likely to be killed for being Muslim rather than to be killed by Muslim terrorists. Kristof also notes "Husbands are incomparably more deadly in America than jihadist terrorists," being more "deadly in part because in America they have ready access to firearms."

Slate Analysis: Career Intel Officials Killed Order To Bring Back Black Sites, Enhanced Interrogation.

In an analysis, Slate (2/10, Carter, 1.83M) reported the Trump Administration withdrew language in a draft executive order that "would have resurrected the torture regime that existed immediately after 9/11" after career officials within the CIA and Defense Department rejected the order "from the moment it left the White House." Slate says those officials didn't oppose the order because of their political views. They did so, the article says, because "torture...doesn't work, corrodes their integrity, makes it harder to work with allies, and carries enormous risk for strategic blowback."

Gitmo Commander: No Input Into Trump Policies.

The Miami Herald (2/12, Rosenberg, 856K) reports Rear Adm. Peter J. Clarke, the commander of the prison at Guantánamo Bay, said he has not been consulted President Trump's policy for the prison, adding, "I don't need to provide my input to policy decisions." While the New York Times obtained a draft executive order authorizing adding ISIL captives to Guantánamo Bay, Clarke said he has not been ordered to prepare to receive new captives. Defense lawyers warn that some detainees are fearful of ISIS. While the prison currently has no female prisoners, there is speculation that they may be among new detainees, and Clarke would not provide clear assurance "that male soldiers would not be supervising female detainee showers."

California Islamic School Marks Fourth Group To Reject CVE Grant Under Trump Administration.

The AP (2/11, Abdollah) reports the Bayan Claremont Islamic school in California has rejected an $800,000 federal grant awarded as part of the "Countering Violent Extremism" program. This marks the fourth organization to do so under the Trump Administration. The AP says the Bayan Claremont grant was the second largest "among the first 31 federal grants for CVE awarded to organizations," but that the schools president, Jihad Turk, said that to accept the money would ultimately "do more harm than good." Turk stated, "if we're compromised, even if only by perception in terms of our standing in the community, we ultimately can't achieve that goal."

French Authorities Arrest Four People Suspected Of Plotting "Imminent" Terror Attack.

The New York Times (2/10, Breeden, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Paris prosecutors on Friday arrested three men and one 16-year-old girl in southern France. France's Interior Ministry explained that a two-week investigation led Paris prosecutors to believe that the suspects were preparing an "imminent" terror attack, although authorities "do not know where or how" it was to be implemented. Police officers discovered bomb-making materials in a raid of one of the suspect's homes.

The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Bisserbe, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that in the raid, police discovered the same explosive that ISIS suicide bombers used in attacks in Paris and in Brussels. The arrests are the latest in a string of raids across Europe, including in Germany, Belgium, and Britain, against suspected ISIS operatives.

"No Evidence" Of Terrorism As Likely Pepper Spray Causes Closure Of Hamburg Airport.

The Washington Post (2/12, Kirchner, 11.43M) reports that in response to 68 people experiencing eye irritation and breathing difficulties from the likely dissemination of pepper spray through the air-conditioning system, German authorities evacuated hundreds and closed Hamburg Airport between 11 a.m. and 2 p.m. Sunday. Hamburg police spokesman Rene Schönhardt insists there was "no evidence" the incident was part of a terror attack, but officials are investigating to determine how the spray from a lipstick-sized cartridge entered the ventilation system.

WPost A1: Children Targeted In ISIS' Latest Recruitment Strategy.

In a more than 2,000-word front-page article, the Washington Post (2/11, Faiola, Mekhennet, 11.43M) reports ISIS' threat "is taking on a new form: child terrorists either directly in contact with or inspired by the militant group." In Germany alone, at least 10 minors were involved in five terror plots within the last 12 months. Most of the minors were German-born homegrown threats, highlighting authorities' concerns "that the intelligence community is often blind to the threat posed by these teens and preteens." Furthermore, German authorities are prohibited from monitoring children to the extent that they track suspected adults. European intelligence officials also said ISIS' tactics to radicalize children now involve "propaganda tailor-made for youths" and meticulous scouting online. Many targeted children have psychological disorders or live in broken or violent households, enabling recruiters to "groom" them "through flattery and attention" and perceived friendship.

European Parents Of Foreign Fighters Worry Coalition Forces Will Kill Their Children. French and Belgian parents of children recruited by ISIS told USA Today (2/11, Vidon, 5.28M) that they want to see the militant group's destruction in Iraq and Syria, but worry that coalition forces will kill their radicalized children. A think tank in The Hague estimated that about 4,000 people have traveled from Europe to fight alongside ISIS in Iraq and Syria since 2012. Psychologist Patrick Amoyel, who founded the anti-extremism Entr'Autres Association in Nice, said many child recruits initially try to reconnect with their Arabic and North African heritages, and then reclaim Islamic identities as a means of redemption for the contempt and marginalization their ethnic communities face in European societies. Amoyel said many parents are also consumed with guilt and often deny that their children have been radicalized.

Suspect In Istanbul Nightclub Attack Formally Charged.

The AP (2/11) reports Turkish prosecutors formally arrested Abdulkadir Masharipov, accused of killing 39 people in an Istanbul nightclub on New Year's Day. Turkish authorities claimed Masharipov trained in Afghanistan and conducted the attack on behalf of ISIS.

The Turkish court charged Masharipov, an Uzbek citizen, with attempting to overthrow the constitutional order, multiple counts of murder and weapons possession, and for being a member of an armed terror group, Reuters (2/11, Tattersall, Dikmen) reports. Prior to his formal arrest, Masharipov was at large for 17 days before Turkish authorities apprehended him in a "massive operation," AFP (2/11) reports. He is believed to have entered the country in January last year.

COUNTER-INTELLIGENCE

Former US-Based KGB Agent To Release Book.

The Guardian (UK) (2/11, 4.07M) profiled Jack Barsky, a former US-based KGB agent who has authored a new book based upon his experiences. The book, which will be released on March 21, discusses Barsky's early life in East Germany, time in New York as a spy, and defection to the US in 1997. Barksky's book is titled: "Deep Undercover: My Secret Life And Tangled Allegiances As A KGB Spy In America."

CRIMINAL INVESTIGATIONS

Charleston Church Shooter Requests New Trial.

The AP (2/12, Kinnard) reports "Convicted Charleston church shooter Dylann Roof has asked for a new federal trial, saying prosecutors didn't have jurisdiction to bring their case against him." In a Friday motion, attorneys for Roof claimed the government failed to prove Roof's use of highways, a gun manufactured outside of South Carolina, and the Internet were sufficient links to bring federal religious obstruction charges. "Roof remains in custody in the Charleston County jail, where he awaits a death penalty trial in state court," the AP says.

The Daily Beast (2/12, 1.11M) and Columbia (SC) State (2/12, Monk, 357K) also report on Roof. The Christian Science Monitor (2/12, 387K) posts the AP's coverage to its website.

South Carolina Black Community Seeks "To Come To Terms" With Church Shooting. The AP (2/11, Collins) reported "the holes in the fabric of life in Charleston remain" following the shooting of an African-American church in Charleston, South Carolina. The AP highlighted the difficulties faced by the black community in the city "to come to terms with the murders at Emanual," and that this is made all the harder by the still unresolved case of a white police charged in the death of unarmed black man Walter Scott. However, the piece said "there has been progress," noting that after 50 years, the Confederate Flag was removed from Statehouse grounds.

North Carolina Man Charged With Opening Fire In DC Restaurant To Remain Jailed.

McClatchy (2/10, Douglas, 74K) reported that Edgar Maddison Welch, a "North Carolina man charged with firing an assault rifle inside a Washington restaurant that conspiracy theorists falsely claimed harbored a child-sex ring remained jailed Friday as his attorney received more time to negotiate a possible plea deal with federal prosecutors." Welch appeared in DC federal court for a brief hearing in his case. Welch, who has pleaded not guilty to federal and DC firearms charges, has been jailed since December 4. He faces up to 35 years behind bars.

Amid Ethics Concerns, Philadelphia DA Announces He Will Not Seek Reelection.

Reuters (2/10, Ingram) reported that Philadelphia District Attorney Seth Williams announced Friday that he would not run for reelection, citing "regrettable mistakes" he made when he accepted gifts that resulted in his being fined $62,000 by Philadelphia's ethics board. The gifts, which Williams failed to disclose, "including NBA basketball tickets, cash and lodging," Reuters said. "The gifts prompted the FBI to interview members of the prosecutor's staff and at least one of the gift-givers, and the bureau is investigating a nonprofit Williams founded." Williams apologized for his actions during a televised news conference. The AP (2/10, Dale) reported that Williams "failed to disclose five sources of income and 89 gifts on 2010-2015 financial statements and omitted 10 items on an amended statement." Williams has served as district attorney for seven years. The Washington (DC) Times (2/10, Dale) posts the AP's coverage to its website.

Community Honors Three Muslims Students Killed In North Carolina.

NBC Nightly News  (2/11, story 8, 2:10, Diaz-Balart, 16.61M) reported members of the Muslim community in Chapel Hill, North Carolina are coming together to honor the legacy of three Muslim students who were shot and killed, dental student Deah Barakat, his wife Yusor and her sister Razan. Correspondent Roger Allen said the s new facility called the Light House has been named in honor of the students, and that it "will be a hub for community groups." Deah Barakat's sister Suzanne said, "I hope it brings the community together."

Dossier Allegations Gaining Credibility After Details Corroborated By Intel.

The CBS News (2/11, Pegues, 4.4M) says the dossier is "gaining credibility among law enforcement," with one "U.S. official familiar with the document's origin say[ing] that even people who discounted it initially have begun to take it more seriously." Jim Sciutto reported on CNN The Situation Room (2/10, 6:02 p.m. EDT, 02:15, Blitzer, 554K) that "For the first time, US investigators say they have corroborated some of the communications detailed in a 35-page dossier compiled by a former British intelligence agent." Sciutto said "until now, US officials have said none of the content or allegations had been verified, but now multiple current and former US law enforcement and intelligence officials tell CNN that intelligence intercepts of foreign nationals confirmed that some of the conversations described in the dossier took place between the same individuals on the same days and from the same locations as detailed in the dossier."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/12, 387K) says the dossier is "gaining legitimacy" amid an ongoing FBI-led probe into the document. Officials caution, though, that "the more salacious things" alleged in the document have not been corroborated, and "a few specific facts and claims listed in the document have already been proven to be incorrect." Still, CSM says that news of the corroborated details "could bolster many Trump critics who question the president's ethics in regard to his business ties as well as his controversial policies."

Spicer: White House "Disgusted" By "Fake News" From CNN On Dossier. The Hill (2/10, Hensch, 1.25M) reports White House press secretary Sean Spicer on Friday "blasted CNN (2/10, Sciutto, Perez, 29.79M) for its reporting on an unverified dossier alleging that the Russian government has compromising information about President Trump." Spicer said, "We continue to be disgusted by CNN's fake news reporting." He added, "It is about time CNN focused on the success the President has had bringing back jobs, protecting the nation, and strengthening relationships with Japan and other nations. ... The president won the [2016] election because of his vision and message for the nation. This is fake news."

Atlanta Releases Documents Related To Bribery Scandal.

WSB-TV Atlanta (2/9, 410K) reported online that "The city of Atlanta...produced more than a million documents" last week "it says are related to a bribery scandal." At a news conference about an ongoing federal investigation into kickbacks for city contracts, Atlanta Mayor Kasim Reed, presented boxes containing some 1.4 million pages of records. "What I'm going to say is the documents that are in this room are the documents we provided to the Justice Department," Reed said. Among the records was a federal grand jury subpoena seeking documents "related to Mitzi Bickers, a political operative who helped Reed get elected and a former business partner of the contractor who admitted paying more than $1 million in bribes," WSB noted. The mayor has not been questioned by the FBI. In a more than 2,000-word article, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/11, 1.41M) discusses the bribery allegations in the context of previous Atlanta political scandals.

Man Charged With Abducting Couple From Illinois Bank.

The Chicago Sun-Times (2/10, Wilusz, 798K) reports that 40-year-old Chad C. Schipper has been charged with abducting a couple from an Illinois bank on Wednesday. "The abduction of Constance P. VanOosten of Erie, Illinois; and her husband, Larry D. VanOosten, may have been financially motivated, according to a statement issued late Wednesday by the FBI's Chicago office," the Sun-Times says. Schipper has been charged with "home invasion, kidnapping and two counts of aggravated kidnapping" the Sun-Times says

Chicago Woman Convicted Of Forcing Women Into Prostitution.

The Chicago Sun-Times (2/10, Mayes, 798K) reported that Chicago woman Rita Law has been found guilty of forcing women to work as prostitutes in multiple spas she operated in Indiana. "Law, 58, was found guilty by a federal jury of sex trafficking, involuntary servitude, transporting a woman across state lines to engage in prostitution, and using an interstate facility to promote prostitution, according to the U.S. Attorney's office for Northern Indiana," the newspaper reported. Law had initially flown to Hong Kong to avoid prosecution. "The case was investigated by the FBI and Homeland Security Investigations, with assistance from Indiana authorities."

CAIR Seeks FBI, State Investigation Of Vandalism Of Ohio Mosque.

WSYX-TV Columbus, OH (2/11, 50K) reported online that the Council on American-Islamic Relations has called upon the FBI and state law enforcement to investigate graffiti painted onto an Ohio mosque. "Officials at the Ahlul Bayt Center said a white man was seen on surveillance video painting messages on the door of the mosque that included 'Allah is a fraud,'" WSYX said. The WCMH-TV Columbus, OH (2/11, 229K) website reported similarly.

FBI Issues Warning About Romance Scams.

Adrienne Bankert reported on ABC World News Tonight  (2/12, story 7, 1:35, Llamas, 14.63M) that the FBI is warning of online romance scams ahead of Valentine's Day. The scams, in which fraudsters use romance to solicit money, "cost victims an average of $15,000 to $20,000," Bankert says, citing the FBI. Some scammers pretend to be US soldiers based overseas. WBBM-TV Chicago (2/10, 61K) quoted FBI Chicago spokesman Garrett Croon as saying, "In 2015 the average loss in Illinois was just over $4-million to romance scams. ... On a national average, the loss was just over $203-million." The numbers cited by Croon, WBBM notes, are based only on reported scams. Many scams go unreported.

Illinois Governor To Aid Chicago In Fight Against Street Violence.

In an exclusive, the Chicago Sun-Times (2/10, Sneed, 798K) reported that in his state budget address on Wednesday, Illinois Gov. Bruce Rauner plans to address the street violence problem in Chicago. According to the Sun-Times, Rauner plans to "add resources to help contain Chicago's violence," is proposing to fund the training of cadets, and will "supplement the surge in troopers he's already sent to the Chicago region to address this issue."

Suit Against Florida Sheriff's Office Over Fatal Shooting Goes To Trial.

The AP (2/12, Spencer) reports from Loxahatchee, FL that "the parents of Seth Adams are sure Sgt. Michael Custer is lying about why he fatally shot their unarmed son in the parking lot of the family's nursery business nearly five years ago, even though the sheriff's deputy was cleared by investigators." According to the AP, "the family will get a chance to prove its allegations when a federal civil rights trial against Custer and the sheriff's office begins Monday with jury selection." The family and their attorneys "say ballistics tests, contradictions in Custer's statements and observations by his Palm Beach County colleagues undermine his account of Adams as an immediate and persistent aggressor in the confrontation."

Criminal Justice Reform Advocates Facing "Hurdle" With Trump Administration.

The Wall Street Journal (2/10, O'Keeffe, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports the new president of Families Against Mandatory Minimums cleared an important hurdle in getting his probation officer to agree to allow him to interact with felons. However, the Journal says now the Trump Administration poses another significant hurdle. While President Obama sought to mitigate what he considered to be unfair sentences, the piece says that under Trump and Attorney General Jeff Sessions, there is a potentially more challenging road ahead. It additionally notes criminal justice reform was not explicitly discussed by Trump while on the campaign, but says that Sessions has been an opponent of shortening prisons sentences.

Miller Says Trump "Correct, 100 Percent" About Large-Scale Voter Fraud.

Presidential adviser Stephen Miller said on ABC's This Week  (2/12, Stephanopoulos, 6.61M), "The White House has provided enormous evidence with respect to voter fraud, with respect to people being registered in more than one state. Dead people voting, non-citizens being registered to vote. ... That is a scandal! ... And I'm prepared to go on any show, anywhere, any time, and repeat it and say the President of the United States is correct, 100 percent."

The New York Post (2/12, Schultz, 3.82M) says Miller "doubled down on President Trump's unsubstantiated claims. ... Asked repeatedly [for] proof, Miller said voter fraud is a serious issue and will be evaluated by [the] Justice Department once it's up and running." The Los Angeles Times (2/12, King, 4.52M) says the Administration "continued Sunday to assert a widely debunked claim that massive vote fraud helped deprive the president of a popular-vote victory" last fall. The Wall Street Journal (2/12, Ballhaus, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) headlines a report on the comments "Trump Adviser Repeats Unsubstantiated Vote Fraud Assertions."

In the Washington Post (2/12, 11.43M) Fact Checker, Glenn Kessler awards Miller "bushels of Pinocchios" over the assertion, writing that "the White House continues to provide zero evidence to back up its claims of voter fraud," instead returning repeatedly "to the same bogus talking points that have been repeatedly shown to be false." Kessler adds, "It's pretty shameless to cite research in a way that even the researcher says is inappropriate."

Sanders, Franken: Vote Fraud Claims Show Trump Is A Liar. On NBC's Meet The Press  (2/12, Todd, 157K), Sen. Bernie Sanders said, "We have a president who is delusional in many respects, a pathological liar. ... When somebody goes before you and the American people and say three million to five million people voted illegally in the last election, nobody believes that. There is not the scintilla of evidence. What would you call that remark? It's a lie. It's a delusion." The Washington Post (2/12, O'Keefe, 11.43M) characterizes the remarks as "strong words."

On CNN's State Of The Union,  (2/12, Tapper, 420K) Sen. Al Franken similarly said that President Trump "lies a lot. He says things that aren't true. ... You know, three million to five million people voted illegally. There was a new one about people going in from Massachusetts to New Hampshire. ... That is not the norm for a president of the United States or actually for a human being."

The New York Daily News (2/12, Edelman, 4.45M) reports Franken, in response to a question by CNN's Jake Tapper as to whether any Republican senators had "expressed concerns about President Trump's mental health," replied, "A few," commenting, "We all have this suspicion that he...that he lies a lot, that he says things that aren't true." Politico (2/12, Cohen, 2.46M) reports Franken also criticized the President's referring to Sen. Elizabeth Warren as "Pocahontas" as "racist." The AP (2/12) and The Hill (2/12, Balluck, 1.25M) similarly report Franken's comments.

WSJournal: Texas Voter Fraud Sentence Is Excessive. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/12, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) argues that while the media minimizes the extent of voter fraud, the eight-year and $5,000 fine sentence for Rosa Maria Ortegaon, a green card holder who voted in Texas, is excessive. While the jury didn't believe Ortegaon's explanation that she thought legal residents have the right to vote, this wasn't a violent felony or a fraud ring. The Journal calls on Gov. Greg Abbott to commute the sentence should the a judge not be able to intervene.

FINANCIAL CRIME & CORPORATE SCANDALS

SEC Accuses Chinese Investor Of Insider Trading In Animation Deal.

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, James, 4.52M) reported that the SEC has accused Chinese investor Shaohua "Michael" Yin and his family of participating in an insider trading scheme to illegally profit "from Comcast Corp.'s $3.8-billion acquisition last year of DreamWorks Animation." According to the SEC, during a three-week period prior to the sale, five brokerage accounts purportedly controlled by Yin, acquired more than 2 million shares of DreamWorks stock. Yin had never owned stock in the animation company before. According to the SEC, Yin "has made illegal trades of stock of other companies, and the FBI executed a search warrant on Yin at the San Jose International Airport on Feb. 3, just before he boarded a flight to China," the Times said. Bloomberg News (2/10, Robinson, 2.41M) reported that Yin or his associates attempted to withdraw the illegal profits from the brokerage accounts after the FBI searched Yin, the SEC claims in its complaint.

Ex-Massey CEO Seeks En Banc Rehearing Of Appeal.

The Charleston (WV) Gazette-Mail (2/10, Ward, 9K) reports that attorneys for Don Blankenship "asked Friday that the full 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reconsider a previous decision in which a three-judge panel upheld the criminal conviction of the former Massey Energy Co. CEO." In a filing with the court, "Blankenship's defense team urged the full court to focus any re-examination of the case on two issues: Whether the trial jury was wrongly instructed on the definition of criminal willfulness and whether defense lawyers were improperly denied the chance for a second cross-examination of a key government witness." The Gazette-Mail notes that Blankenship "is serving a one-year sentence in a federal prison in California" after being "convicted in December 2015 of conspiring to violate federal mine safety standards at Massey's Upper Big Branch Mine, where 29 workers died in an April 2010 explosion."

Massachusetts Couple Sentenced For Tax Evasion.

The Boston Globe (2/11, Geanous, 1.08M) reported that Massachusetts couple Sergey and Anastasia Bulavchenko pleaded guilty Friday to tax evasion charges and were sentenced to two years probation. The couple was "charged with tax evasion and willful failure to file tax returns in connection to their business, UNEOL LLC, which provided a US shipping address for customers living in other countries," the Globe says. According to authorities, the Bulavchenko's business also facilitated identity theft and credit card fraud. The investigation of the couple and their business involved the FBI and Massachusetts State Police.

Former Arizona Sheriff's Deputy Pleads Guilty In Embezzlement Scheme.

The Arizona Republic (2/10, Wagner, Harris, 1.1M) reports that former Pima County, Arizona Sheriff's Deputy Christopher Radkte pleaded guilty Friday to misappropriating funds as part of an embezzlement scheme. "Radtke, 55, once second in command of the Sheriff's Department, was indicted on seven felony counts of money laundering and theft after investigators discovered deputies misappropriated roughly a half-million dollars seized from criminals over 18 years," the Republic says. As part of the plea deal, Radtke will receive no prison time and will retain his state pension.

WSJournal: Greenberg Prosecution Shows Abuse Of Law By Prosecutors.

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/12, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) uses former AIG CEO Hank Greenberg's $9 million settlement to blast the businessman's prosecution, calling the amount negligible for Greenberg, who the Journal says admitted only accounting errors. The Journal touts the outcome as a vindication for Greenberg and blasts prosecutors for the money spent on the case. The Journal argues that the prosecution was revenge by former state AG Eliot Spitzer for Greenberg's criticism of him, illustrating the lengths progressives go to punish capitalists. The Journal concludes the case shows the ease whereby prosecutors can abuse the law to seek fame instead of justice.

Privacy Groups Criticize FBI Methods In Playpen Probe.

CSO Magazine (2/11, Kan, 81K) reported that three privacy advocacy groups on Friday "filed briefs in a lawsuit involving the FBI's hacking operation against Playpen." Privacy International, the Electronic Frontier Foundation, and the ACLU of Massachusetts claimed that the FBI's take down of the child pornography website violated the constitution and international law because the "operation involved the FBI hacking 8,700 computers in 120 countries, based on a single warrant," the magazine said. The groups filed their briefs in the case of Alex Levin, a "suspect in the FBI's Playpen investigation who's appealing the way the agency used malware to gather evidence against him," the magazine said. Slashdot (2/12, 46K) reported similarly.

UK Cyber Official: 188 "High-Level" Cyberattacks In Last Three Months.

BBC News (UK) (2/12, 2.39M) reports "Britain's security has been threatened by 188 high-level cyber attacks in the last three months, according to" National Cyber Security Centre chief executive Ciaran Martin, who "told the Sunday Times many of the attacks 'threatened national security.'" Martin "told the newspaper that attempts on government departments were designed to 'extract information on UK government policy on anything from energy to diplomacy to information on a particular sector.'"

The Guardian (UK) (2/12, 4.07M) reports that Martin "told the Sunday Times there had been a 'step change' in Russia's online aggression against the west." Martin is quoted saying, "Part of that step change has been a series of attacks on political institutions, political parties, parliamentary organisations and that's all very well evidenced by our international partners and widely accepted."

The Independent (UK) (2/12, Roberts, 1.28M) reports Martin "warn[ed] that Britain is being hit by 60 'significant' cyber-attacks each month." The Independent adds, "An attempt to disrupt the 2015 general election was thwarted by GCHQ in a cyber attack the security service said was the first of its kind."

British Schoolchildren To Receive Cybersecurity Lessons.

BBC News (UK) (2/11, Symonds, 2.39M) reports, "Schoolchildren in England will be offered lessons in cyber security" beginning in September "in a bid to find the experts of the future to defend the UK from attacks." BBC says, "Classroom and online teaching, 'real-world challenges' and work experience will be made available."

The Independent (UK) (2/11, Dearden, 1.28M) reports, "The new Cyber Schools Programme aims to teach pupils some of the skills they would need to help defend Britain's businesses and institutions against online threats." The Independent adds, "Ministers are making up to £20m available for extracurricular sessions that will see expert instructors drafted in to teach, test and train selected teenagers."

Cyber Experts: Recent Hacks Part Of International Effort, Resembling 2014 Sony Hack, To Target Global Banks.

The Wall Street Journal (2/12, McMillan, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports cybersecurity experts have found evidence which suggests recent attacks on Polish institutions form part of an international effort targeting global financial institutions in several countries, and that the effort shares traits with the 2014 Sony attack. Researchers say the attacks installed code on financial regulatory authorities' websites, then used them to attack the computers of certain financial institutions. The number of targeted banks and the extent of financial losses are unknown.

Defense Contractors Among "Vulnerability Hunters."

Under the headline "The secret world of vulnerability hunters," the Christian Science Monitor (2/10, Sternstein, 387K) reports on the market for network vulnerability exploitation – including the hackers who sell "bug bounty" programs to companies they've infiltrated, cybersecurity experts who "moonlight" for the agencies like FBI to infiltrate networks of criminal targets, and government contractors who also work to find vulnerabilities. According to the article, "defense contractors ManTech, Booz Allen Hamilton, Harris, and Raytheon have all landed formal US government contracts to infiltrate targeted software, say former employees there." The companies "have scooped up boutique firms that concentrate on spy technology, industry insiders say," with Mantech buying exploit researcher Oceans Edge and Raytheon purchasing bug developer SI Government Solutions.

Microsoft To Grade Commercial Customers' Security Settings.

The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Greene, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports Microsoft will begin grading the Office 365 security settings of its commercial customers, in order to strengthen its software and services from frequent hacking attempts. The Journal says Hartford Financial Services Group Inc. plans to use the security score to determine cyberinsurance rates for its customers. Microsoft did not say whether other insurance companies were approached to use the service.

Florida County School Employees At Risk Of Becoming Data Breach Victims.

The South Florida Sun Sentinel (2/12, 581K) reports, "Authorities say as many as 7,700 Manatee County school employees are at risk of being victims of a data breach." County school officials "learned earlier this month that two payroll employees of the school district along Florida's Gulf Coast had fallen for an email phishing scam" from a hacker "posing as Superintendent Diana Greene" requesting "all W-2 forms for district employees."

Senate Armed Services Cyber Subcommittee Chairman Wants To Learn About Current State Of US Cybersecurity.

Politico (2/10, 2.46M) "Morning Cybersecurity" reports that the "immediate priority" for US Sen. Mike Rounds, the "newly appointed chairman of a freshly created Armed Services cybersecurity-focused subcommittee," is to "figur[e] out the state of play." Rounds is quoted as saying that includes asking the Defense Department for an assessment of "where they see the need for either manpower or additional resources," as well as "assessing where the United States stands in its capabilities compared with 'both bad actors and peer competitors.'"

House Homeland Security Committee To Hold Hearing On Cyber Threats.

The Hill (2/10, Chalfant, 1.25M) reports, "The House Homeland Security Committee is planning a hearing on cybersecurity threats early next month." The committee "is expected to hold a full hearing on the Department of Homeland Security's (DHS) cyber defenses and threats to the U.S. on March 1, according to a committee aide." The Hill adds the hearing "will be the committee's first focusing on cybersecurity since the intelligence community concluded that Russia engaged in a cyber and disinformation campaign aimed at influencing the 2016 U.S. presidential election," though it "will not focus on the Russian election hacks but will instead cover the full scope of the threat landscape."

Russia Suspected In Italian Foreign Ministry Hack.

The Guardian (UK) (2/10, 4.07M) reports, "Russia is suspected by Italian officials of being behind a sustained hacking attack against the Italian foreign ministry last year that compromised email communications and lasted for many months before it was detected, according to people familiar with the matter." The Guardian says an Italian government official "confirmed that the attack took place last spring and lasted for more than four months but did not infiltrate an encrypted system used for classified communications." While then-foreign minister Paolo Gentiloni "was not affected by the hack, according to the official," the foreign ministry's "field offices" were affected, though "the government official said sensitive information had not been compromised because it would also have been encrypted."

"Prolific" Hacker Sentenced In "Rare Win" For Law Enforcement.

The AP (2/10) reports that "prolific foreign hacker" Ercan Findikoglu, who was "behind sophisticated cyberattacks that netted an estimated $55 million," was sentenced to eight years in prison Friday in a "rare win for law enforcement officials who have identified, but failed to arrest, hundreds of others like him." The AP describes Findikoglu as "a Russian-speaking Turkish national so skilled with computers that he tracked the sprawling international heist in real-time to make sure a small army of thieves wouldn't cheat him out of his share of the proceeds."

Cybersecurity Exercise Takes Place In Colorado.

The Denver Post (2/12, 778K) reports on a cybersecurity training exercise "conducted by Regis University, the state, and the Colorado Army and Air Force National Guard" involving the virtual disabling of a dam. The Post says, "This particular exercise was based on a real cyberattack against a small dam in upstate New York that was conducted by Iran, said Jeremy Lammon, master sergeant in the Air National Guard." DHS representatives were among the attendees, the Post adds.

CSMonitor Analysis: Cyber System Flaws Trigger Efforts To Identify Vulnerabilities.

A more than 2,100-word Christian Science Monitor (2/10, Sternstein, 387K) analysis examines how "flawed" and "vulnerable" cyber systems, including "the websites we all use, the apps on our smartphones, the software on our laptops, and industrial systems running critical infrastructure," has lead a push in the hiring of cybersecurity professionals to detect these vulnerabilities. The Monitor says that such flaws have become "increasingly valuable to both the people trying to break into digital networks and those trying to defend them." It has driven efforts by companies to launch "so-called bug bounty programs" that pay researchers to locate system and product vulnerabilities.

House Democrats Call For Probe Of White House Cybersecurity.

FedScoop (2/10) reports, "Democratic members of the House Committee on Science, Space and Technology are calling for a probe into the White House's cybersecurity practices." US Reps. Eddie Bernice Johnson, Dan Lipinski, and Don Beyer "signed and sent a letter to the committee's Republican leadership requesting a hearing on the matter." Their letter is quoted saying, "Given your previous investigations of cybersecurity practices at multiple federal agencies, including the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) and Federal Reserve Board, and with respect to former Secretary Clinton's private email server, we trust you will be equally concerned with any and all careless cybersecurity practices of the Trump Administration."

Senators Demand Answers From Yahoo CEO On Data Breaches.

The Washington Times (2/10, Blake, 272K) reports Sens. John Thune and Jerry Moran sent a letter to outgoing Yahoo CEO Marissa Mayer on Friday raising questions about "a pair of high-profile data breaches that resulted in more than a billion accounts being compromised by hackers." In the letter, the Senators said, "Despite several inquiries by Committee staff seeking information about the security of Yahoo! user accounts, company officials have thus far been unable to provide answers to many basic questions about the reported breaches." The Times says they are requesting a response by February 23.

Representatives Urge Flynn To Change Export Agreement To Address Cybersecurity Concerns.

The Hill (2/10, Uchill, 1.25M) reports that bipartisan group of representatives "with cybersecurity chops" are urging National Security Adviser Flynn "to change an export agreement many believe weakens international cybersecurity." The Wassenaar Arrangement, the Hill says, is a non-binding agreement between 40 nations, which "creates export policies for civilian technologies with military uses." According to The Hill, the accord does not account for the "subtleties of cybersecurity" and "some of its restrictions can prevent the sharing of cybersecurity research and information about threats."

California, US Saw Surge In Gun Sales Last Year.

NBC Nightly News (2/12, story 6, 2:15, Snow, 16.61M) reported that last year, "more guns were sold" in California "than ever before," and the state "was not alone with the surge of gun sales as the fight over guns is heating up." NBC (Beck) added that one reason for the surge is "California's bullet button ban," in which "the state made it illegal to sell rifles that have a button shooters can use to reload faster." The ban was passed in July 2016 "but took a few months to go into effect." According to NBC, "gun store owner Vince Torrez says the ban helped make 2016 his busiest year in decades." California gun sales "surged last year, selling over a million firearms for the first time ever," which mirrored a nationwide trend. NBC added that "the gun industry is bracing for a slowdown in sales because of solid Republican control in Washington."

New York Planning To Have 23,000 Body Cams On Officers BY 2019.

The AP (2/11, Long) reports that New York City is planning to "put body cameras on all 23,000 of its patrol officers by 2019," which it notes is an "ambitious effort that would dwarf all others across the country," but that the department is still "lagging behind other cities, with only limited experience with the cameras and zero currently on the streets." Mayor Bill de Blasio's body camera plan, the AP says, "is crucial to restoring trust between officers and the communities they serve."

Podesta: Some "Forces" Within FBI Wanted Clinton "To Lose."

The Huffington Post (2/12, Bobic, 237K) reports that Hillary Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta on Wednesday criticized the FBI for its response to Russia's purported hacking of the DNC. "I think to this day it's inexplicable that they were so casual about the investigation of the Russian penetration of the DNC emails," Podesta said during a panel discussion in San Francisco. "They didn't even bother to send an agent to the DNC. ... They left a couple of messages at the IT help desk saying, 'You might want to be careful.'" Podesta added, "There are at least forces within the FBI that wanted her to lose."

Wyden Asks FBI To Explain Changes To FOIA Rules.

CNN Money (2/10, Larson, 3.59M) reports that Sen. Ron Wyden (D-OR) is asking the FBI for an explanation of the bureau's announcement last week that it "would stop accepting email requests for Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) data," and instead require the submission of FOIA requests "through an online portal called eFOIA – or via fax or snail mail." In a letter to the FBI on Thursday, Wyden, a member of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, "said there are limitations to the online portal," including "a 3,000 character limit on requests, unclear rules about what people can request, and technical barriers that prevent people 'engaged in the innovative use of technology' from automating their requests. 'These limitations may become serious problems if this system is to be the sole method through which the agency can receive digital FOIA requests,' Wyden said in his letter."

The Daily Dot (2/10, 287K) reports that Wyden "urged the FBI to revise its new policy, which he interpreted as potentially placing an 'unnecessary burden' on requesters, citing limitations of the FBI's new online submission platform. 'While it is admirable that the FBI has sought to make it easier to receive and process FOIA requests,' wrote Wyden, 'there are a number of limitations with the online portal. These limitations may become serious problems if this system is to be the sole method through which the agency can receive digital FOIA requests.'"

Sanctuary City Debate May Influence Decision On Building FBI's New Headquarters.

The Washington Times (2/12, Miller, 272K) reports the decision over where to build a new FBI headquarters may be influenced by the sanctuary city debate as the two finalist cities are Prince George's County, Maryland and Fairfax County, Virginia. In Prince George's County, "local officials resist helping deport illegal immigrants," while police cooperate with ICE in Fairfax County. The Times says it is unknown whether the executive order that bars federal funds from sanctuary jurisdictions will impact construction projects.

FBI Creates "Wanted" App For Smartphones.

Bloomberg Government (2/10, 1K)reported on the "FBI Wanted App" for Apple and Android devices. The app "allows users to join in the search for fugitives and suspects, as well as crime victims and missing children," Bloomberg said. According to FBI spokesman Christopher Allen, "Thousands of cases have been solved over the years thanks to the watchful eyes of concerned citizens. ... The FBI Wanted App will help carry on this tradition." The FBI has also created the Child ID App and the Bank Robbers App.

Miller: Administration Considering Options On Travel Ban.

Coverage of presidential adviser Stephen Miller's comments on four Sunday morning shows about the White House's next steps on the travel ban now frozen by a federal court is widespread but essentially straightforward. Reports cover Miller's defense of President Trump's policy as constitutional and examine the Administration's options with little additional analysis or comment – though several Democratic senators also appeared to rebut Miller's arguments and reiterated their opposition to the policy.

NBC Nightly News  (2/12, lead story, 2:30, Snow, 16.61M) said in its lead story that "the White House is considering how to move forward on its immigration policy after losing in court last week." NBC's Kelly O'Donnell said, "Defending that travel ban across morning television [Sunday]...Miller lashed out at the courts." Miller: "We have a judiciary that has taken far too much power and become in many cases a supreme branch of government." ABC World News Tonight (2/12, story 3, 2:05, Wright, 14.63M) reported, "The Administration is now turning its attention back to the targeted travel ban, intent on rescuing the policy one way or another, even if that means writing a new, more limited order. ... The Administration doesn't want the courts to have the last word." Miller: "We can pursue further executive actions. All options are on the table. We have equal branches of government in this country. The judiciary is not supreme."

On ABC's This Week (2/12, Stephanopoulos, 6.61M), Miller said, "A district judge in Seattle cannot force the President of the United States to change the laws and our Constitution because of their own personal views. ... And we will do whatever we need to do, consistent with the law, to keep this country safe." On CBS' Face The Nation (2/12, Dickerson, 4.61M), Miller said, "I think it has been an important reminder to all Americans we have a judiciary that has taken far too much power and become in many case as supreme branch of government. One unelected judge in Seattle cannot remake laws for the entire country."

On NBC's Meet The Press (2/12, Todd, 157K), Miller said, "The bottom line is we are pursuing every single possible action to keep our country safe from terrorism." On Fox News Sunday (2/12, Wallace), Miller said the Administration's options include "the possibility of new executive actions designed to prevent terrorist in perpetration of our country. And I want to say something very clearly, this will be very disappointing to the people protesting the President and the people in Congress like Sen. Schumer, who has attacked the President for his lawful and necessary action. The President's powers here are beyond question."

The Washington Post (2/12, Rucker, 11.43M) reports Miller said the Administration is considering appealing "and having an emergency hearing 'en banc,' or before all judges on the court; seeking an emergency stay at the Supreme Court; taking the case to trial at the district level; or writing a new executive order for Trump to sign that would withstand legal scrutiny." The Post calls Miller's Sunday interviews "unusually combative."

Bloomberg Politics (2/12, Niquette, 201K) reports that Miller said the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals "took power that belongs 'squarely in the hands of the president' in a 'judicial usurpation.'" The Wall Street Journal (2/12, Ballhaus, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) also reports Miller said several options are under consideration, and notes Miller's defense of Trump's actions as constitutional, while the New York Daily News (2/12, Edelman, 4.45M) says Miller's comments "indicated that the administration was actively looking at ways to keep the measure alive."

Newsweek (2/12, Loffredo, 862K) reports on its website that Miller "continued Donald Trump's attacks on the judiciary over his suspended travel ban while declining to indicate what legal strategy the administration will pursue." Reuters (2/12, Chiacu, Harte) says Miller "attacked" the court ruling, and the Los Angeles Times (2/12, King, 4.52M) reports he "renewed the White House attack on what the president and senior aides have characterized as overreach by the courts."

USA Today (2/12, Jackson, 5.28M) says the 31-year-old Miller's "influence and public profile appear to be on the rise," and the Washington Times (2/12, Howell, 272K) reports that the President, "who is known to keep tabs on his aides' TV performances, said he was pleased with Mr. Miller's defense." Trump tweeted, "Congratulations Stephen Miller – on representing me this morning on the various Sunday morning shows. Great job!" The Huffington Post (2/12, Fang, 237K), however, says Miller's appearances went "disastrously," on the travel ban and on other issues. Voice of America (2/12, Bredemeier, 57K) also covers Miller's appearances on its website.

Schumer: Trump Should Throw Travel Ban "In The Trash." On CBS' Face The Nation (2/12, Dickerson, 4.61M), Senate Minority Leader Schumer said Trump should not revise the travel ban executive order, but "he ought to throw it in the trash. I think this executive order is so bad and so poisoned and its genesis is so bad and terrible that he ought to just throw it in the trash can." Politico (2/12, Strauss, 2.46M) says the comment "came in response to a question about the Trump administration looking to introduce a new executive order similar to a travel ban for seven majority-Muslim countries" blocked by the Ninth Circuit.

The New York Post (2/12, Moore, 3.82M) reports that Schumer "went on to call the order 'un-American and unconstitutional.'" Schumer said, "A religious ban just goes against the American brain. We believe in immigrants in this country and we don't believe in a religious test." The Washington Times (2/12, Howell, 272K) also reports on Schumer's remarks.

Other senators were also critical. On NBC's Meet The Press  (2/12, Todd, 157K), Sen. Bernie Sanders called Miller's remarks "a shell game," saying, "While there is a whole lot of discussion about the racist, in my view, immigration policies of the Trump Administration which are based on anti-Muslim ideology, which are doing us enormous harm all over the world, something else is going on at the exact same moment is that President Trump is backtracking on every economic promise that he made to the American people when he told workers and senior citizens he was not going to cut Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid."

On Fox News Sunday  (2/12, Wallace), Sen. Ben Cardin said, "I've talked to leaders from around the world that tell us that" the travel ban executive order "will be used as a recruitment for terrorist organizations it will put Americans at greater risk traveling abroad, that it adds to self-radicalization." On CNN's State Of The Union  (2/12, Tapper, 420K), Sen. Al Franken similarly said, "I agree with Sen. McCain and Sen. Graham that actually this kind of ban makes us less safe and it gives a recruiting tool to ISIS and to other jihadists saying America is anti-Muslim. ... I think that Trump and his group are trying to make Americans more afraid. I think that's part of how they got elected is make more people afraid."

However, Sen. Jeff Flake, a Republican who is frequently critical of Trump, said on CBS' Face The Nation  (2/12, Dickerson, 4.61M), "I do think it is constitutional. It is not a Muslim ban. ... I think that the message that it sends to our allies abroad and the countries that we need to work with is not a good one."

WPost Analysis: 9th Circuit Cites 1993 Case About Ritual Sacrifices In Blocking Travel Ban. The Washington Post (2/12, Guerra, 11.43M) reported on its "Post Nation" blog that in 1993, the Supreme Court "granted constitutional protections to an Afro-Cuban religious group that sacrifices animals, such goats, chickens, ducks and turtles, as a form of ritual," and "more than two decades later, specifically Thursday, three federal appeals court judges relied partly on that ruling when they declined to reinstate President Trump's controversial entry ban on refugees and citizens from seven predominantly Muslim countries." The Post noted that "the states of Washington and Minnesota, which sued to block Trump's executive order, cited the president's fiery rhetoric and a previous statement about a 'total and complete shutdown' of Muslims entering the country to prove that his directive was meant to discriminate against one religion," and the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals "agreed, citing the 23-year-old Supreme Court ruling on animal sacrifices as precedent."

Page: Trump Running Up Against Realities Of Presidential Power. Susan Page of USA Today (2/12, 5.28M) writes under the headline "Reality Check: After Three Weeks, Trump Hits A Washington Wall" that after "a dizzying flurry of actions" in his first weeks in office, Trump "has begun running smack into constraints mandated by the Constitution and imposed by political reality. Without acknowledging he's being forced to trim his sails, the president is moving to delay some campaign promises and downsize others, steps that sometimes have been overshadowed by a continued stream of the defiant tweets that marked his political rise." Page writes that Trump is "discovering how the Constitution's structure, federal laws and rival power centers...make leadership in the Oval Office a more complicated calculation than in the corporate suite."

Washington State AG Ferguson Profiled. The AP (2/12, Johnson) profiles Washington State Attorney General Bob Ferguson, who is in "the vanguard of resistance" against Trump's travel ban. Ferguson said on ABC's This Week  , "The Administration, the President, simply refused to recognize what everybody else can recognize. Four federal judges have looked at this case. ... All four have completely and utterly rejected the President's arguments in this case, and we anticipate winning as the case moves forward."

Some Employees Of Long-Established Tech Firms Join Critics Of Ban. The New York Times (2/12, Streitfeld, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that though "the older, stodgier, less glamorous part of the tech universe" has been generally quiet about the ban, not joining in the legal filings or public criticism of its peers, some employees of firms like Cisco, Hewlett Packard

Enterprise, and IBM are showing "defiance" and "agitating for an explicit corporate morality."

Policy Puts Hospitals' Selections Of Residents In Turmoil. The Wall Street Journal (2/12, Evans, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) looks at the difficulties hospitals are having in selecting applicants for residencies, noting that in recent years, about 14 percent of residents have come from abroad.

Syrian Refugee Family Now In US. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, King, 4.52M) has a feature on a refugee family who had "survived war's bloody ruination of their Syrian hometown, Homs, endured years of hardscrabble life in Jordan and undergone an exhaustive US vetting process that had lasted more than two years," and are now in the US after the refugee ban initially froze their plans.

WPost: Trump Should Back Abolition Of EB-5 Visa Program. In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/12, 11.43M) says that if President Trump really wants "to show that his immigration policies reflect consistent principles, not his and his family's involvement in the real estate business," he should back a bill sponsored by Sens. Charles Grassley and Dianne Feinstein, the chair and ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, that would abolish the EB-5 visa program, "which began a quarter-century ago as a well-intentioned plan to attract international capital to the United States, but has morphed into a scandal-ridden embarrassment."

Law Professors: Trump Should Be Judicious In Criticism Of Judiciary. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/12, Subscription Publication, 6.37M), University of Virginia law professor Sai Prakash and University of California, Berkeley law professor John Yoo write that while it is legitimate to criticize the federal judiciary, it is unwise when such criticism is unfounded. The professors defend President Trump's right to lodge reasonable protests about important decisions, as his predecessors have done, but warn that such criticism should be reserved for issues and decisions of importance, not a legal setback in a minor procedural test of a temporary executive order.

Miller Says Blumenthal Misrepresented Gorsuch's Comments.

On Fox News Sunday  (2/12, Wallace), Chris Wallace said Judge James Robart "has received death threats" since President Trump tweeted criticism of the judge in the wake of his decision to issue a temporary restraining order against the travel ban. Asked if Trump should be blamed if "something happens" to Robart, presidential adviser Stephen Miller said, "This is one of the most ludicrous things that the media does, where when any crazy person in this country issues a death threat, that they then blame a politician or a public official. That is reckless and irresponsible and should never be done." Asked about Supreme Court nominee Neil Gorsuch's comment that Trump's criticism of the judiciary was "disheartening and demoralizing," Miller said, "I have my opinions, and Judge Gorsuch has had his comments, as you know, misinterpreted and misrepresented by Senator Bluementhal, who as we all know has profound credibility issues."

Schumer Questions Gorsuch's Independence For Not Publicly Criticizing Trump. On CBS' Face the Nation  , Senate Minority Leader Schumer said he asked Judge Gorsuch if he would "publicly condemn what President Trump did with the existing judge, which any judge worth his salt should do. He refused. He said to me, 'I'm disheartened.' Now, his handlers were sitting there and he whispered, 'You can make that public.' So this was not – you can't behind closed doors whisper to a senator and then not say anything. And then when President Trump attacked and said 'he didn't mean me,' they all said yeah, he didn't mean President Trump. That was a further indication of his lack of independence."

AP Analysis: Gorsuch Has Defended Freedom Of Speech, Religion. The AP (2/12, Donn, Mulvihill) reports that Gorsuch "has been a defender of free speech and a skeptic of libel claims, an Associated Press review of his rulings shows," a record that "puts him at odds with President Donald Trump's disdain for journalists and tendency to lash out at critics." However, the AP analysis found, "on other First Amendment cases involving freedom of religion," Judge Gorsuch's rulings "in his decade on the 10th US Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver reflect views more in line with the president and conservatives." Judge Gorsuch "repeatedly has sided with religious groups when they butt up against the secular state," according to the AP.

Gorsuch Scales Back Description Of Harvard Pro Bono Work. The Wall Street Journal

(2/12, Reinhard, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that Judge Gorsuch has scaled back a description of his pro bono work at Harvard Law School after questions were raised over his involvement in two volunteer criminal justice programs. In a questionnaire released on Saturday by the Senate Judiciary Committee, Gorsuch said he "participated" in the two programs. He had said in a 2006 Senate form, as a federal appeals court nominee, that he had represented "defendants in criminal proceedings in Massachusetts state courts" and helped represent inmates, the Journal notes.

DC Area Prepares For Economic Woes Due To Trump's Effect On Federal Workforce, Spending.

The Washington Post (2/12, McCartney, 11.43M) reports that while "the administration and congressional leaders have sent mixed signals about their intentions," the Washington, DC region "is bracing for shock" to its economy due to decreased federal spending. "The region is widely expected to fare worse" than others due to efforts "to restrict the size and cost of the federal workforce." Predicted "sharp cuts in federal nondefense spending...would strain local budgets nationwide and pose a particular threat to economic growth," and while President Trump has called for infrastructure investment, detailed plans appear to involve tax credits, not spending. Meanwhile, business leaders say "Trump's demonization of the capital...has hurt the region's reputation as a good place to work." On top of all this, GOP proposals to convert domestic spending programs into block grants would "shift costs and responsibilities to state and local governments," as well as, according to critics, serve "to mask cuts."

INTERNATIONAL NEWS

Report Disputes Russia's Claims Of Restraint In Syria.

The New York Times (2/12, Gordon, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that while Russian military officials have "vociferously denied that their airstrikes have killed civilians in Syria," but a "new analysis that draws on satellite images, security camera videos, social media and even footage from the Kremlin-backed Russian television network has challenged Moscow's claims." The analysis by the Atlantic Council also "concludes that Syrian forces used chlorine gas on a far greater scale than is commonly believed."

Hezbollah Supports Syrian Ceasefire, Peace Talks.

Reuters (2/12, Francis) reports Hezbollah said Sunday it "strongly supports the Syrian ceasefire agreed on in Kazakhstan and any truce that could lead to a political solution." Leader Hassan Nasrallah said Sunday, "Hezbollah strongly supports, not just the Astana ceasefire, any ceasefire agreed upon in Syria," in order "to prevent bloodshed and pave the way for political solutions."

Opposition Selects Delegation For Geneva Talks.

Another Reuters (2/12, Al-Khalidi, Perry) report says Syria's main opposition body, the High Negotiation Committee (HNC), on Sunday approved a delegation to take part in Geneva peace talks later this month. The group said in a statement after two-days of meetings in Riyadh, the "21-member negotiating team included members of two dissident alliances with which it has previously been at odds."

Tension Mounts Among Shiites In Baghdad After Clashes.

Reuters (2/12, Majeed, Rasheed) reports tensions between Iraq's Shi'ite leaders "mounted on Sunday as the toll from protests in central Baghdad on Saturday increased to six killed." At least 174 other protesters were injured in clashes that pitted police and followers of cleric Moqtada al-Sadr demanding "an overhaul of a commission that supervises elections, ahead of a provincial poll due in September."

Baghdad Protesters, Police Clash Outside Baghdad's Green Zone.

Reuters (2/11, Chmaytelli, Hameed) reports thousands of protesters loyal to Moqtada al-Sadr, a prominent Shi'ite cleric, gathered in Baghdad on Saturday to press for election commission reforms. Police attempted to disperse some protesters who tried to cross a bridge into the Green Zone, and the protest escalated into clashes that killed as many as five demonstrators and at least one officer. The Interior Ministry said up to 320 people were wounded. Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi issued an investigation into the casualty claims. Al-Sadr, in a statement, accused the police of using excessive force on peaceful demonstrators and called on protesters to "withdraw until further notice."

The Wall Street Journal (2/11, Kesling, Adnan, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reported Abadi did not address the demonstrators' demands and reiterated that any electoral commission overhauls must be achieved through parliament. Separately, four Katyusha rockets were fired from the eastern side of the city at the Green Zone; no known casualties resulted.

Turkish-Backed Syrian Opposition Forces Stall In Al-Bab.

The Syrian Observatory for Human Rights told the AP (2/11, Issa) that ISIS still controls nine-tenths of the northern Syrian town al-Bab, even though Turkish and allied Syrian opposition troops reached the outskirts of the city seven weeks ago. The operation is a part of Turkey's broader "Euphrates Shield" mission, in which Turkey hopes to clear both ISIS and US-backed Kurdish forces in Syria away from its border, and Syrian opposition forces hope to secure territory. Meanwhile, Kazakhstan's Foreign Ministry announced on Saturday that it is inviting Syrian government and opposition forces as well as Russian, Turkish, and Iranian delegates for preparatory ceasefire talks on Feb. 16 and 17.

WPost Urges Administration To Support Assad's Removal.

The Washington Post (2/11, 11.43M) editorializes the Saydnaya military prison outside of Damascus "deserves attention, if only because it shows the regime's calculated sadism and cold determination to exterminate all who oppose it." Citing an Amnesty International report, the Post says up to 13,000 civilians were systematically executed at Saydnaya, dubbed the "human slaughterhouse," under Syrian President Bashar al-Assad's rule, "and there is no reason to believe the killings have stopped since then." The Post urges "all those who believe that the Syrian civil war" can conclude with Assad still in power to consider the report, and calls on the Administration to avoid decisions that "tolerate or even support the butchers of Damascus."

Iraqis Battling Oil Well Fires Set By Retreating ISIS Militants.

The Washington Post (2/12, Holley, 11.43M) reports on the challenges faced by Iraqi oil workers. Outside of Mosul, retreating ISIS militants set fire to oil wells, and "at least five of the 25 oil well fires left in the militants' wake still rage...forming a second front in the battle for Iraq that is no less dangerous for the proud men involved."

Amnesty International Urges UN To Investigate 13,000 Hangings In Syria.

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Agrawal, 4.52M) reports Amnesty International urged the United Nations to independently investigate and take action against Syrian government and military prison officials allegedly responsible for as many as 13,000 executions by hanging since 2011. Even though the UN and US have repeatedly denounced the Syrian government's use of chemical weapons, barrel bombs, and airstrikes against civilians, "inaction has been the norm." According to analysts, former President Obama could not convince Congress or any other world leader to move forward with a military operation, in part because Russian President Vladimir Putin is an ally of Syrian President Bashar Assad. Furthermore, any action on behalf of the UN Security Council would require unanimous approval, which China and Russia have vetoed in the past.

Afghan Official: Joint US-Afghan Raid Killed 22 Civilians.

The AP (2/12, Khan) reports Helmand presidential envoy Jabar Qahraman and residents of the Sangin district claimed that a joint US-Afghan operation last week led to 22 civilian deaths. A statement by American spokesman CAPT Bill Salvin indicates American forces have "not reached any conclusions" about civilian casualties. According to Reuters (2/12, Smith), a UN statement on Sunday indicated the strikes killed 18 civilians, primarily women and children, and the UN's most recent report shows civilian deaths from American and Afghan airstrikes "dramatically" increasing in 2016.

Media Analyses: Netanyahu Will Seek To Reset US Ties During Talks With Trump.

Bloomberg Politics (2/12, Wainer, 201K) reports that when he visits the White House this week, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu will try to "recalibrate ties" with the US "after eight years of high-profile clashes" with President Obama. Netanyahu "sees a chance for a warmer relationship" with President Trump. "The overriding goal will be to restore the relationship so that there are no surprises and no daylight," said former Ambassador Michael Oren, now a deputy minister in Netanyahu's office. The New York Times (2/12, Fisher, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Netanyahu "suggested on Sunday that it was unrealistic to expect their two countries to agree completely on all issues," but insisted that "he was the strongest leader to navigate the relationship – the nation's most important, yet often its trickiest." The Times says Wednesday's meeting is "expected to set the tone for the American-Israeli relationship."

According to Reuters (2/12, Heller), Netanyahu said Sunday he would present "responsible policies" in talks with Trump, "signaling to the Israeli far-right to curb its territorial demands in the occupied West Bank." Said the Israeli leader, "I understand there's great excitement about this meeting (with Trump). But...my primary concern is Israel's security (and) strengthening our solid alliance with the United States." That, he added, "requires responsible policies," without elaborating. The Washington Post (2/12, Booth, 11.43M) reports that during his visit, Israeli Education Minister Naftali Bennett, leader of the pro-settlement Jewish Home party, pressed Netanyahu "to abandon his tentative commitment to the two-state solution," and not to use the words "Palestinian state."

The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Wilkinson, 4.52M), however, notes that on Friday, Trump told Israel Today that "going forward with settlements" is not a "good thing for peace," a position the Times says "puts him far closer to traditional US policy, and to Obama, than before." Settlements "don't help the [peace] process. I can say that. There is [only] so much land left. And every time you take land for settlements, there is less land left." The Times says the President's remarks "put him at odds with Netanyahu."

Feinstein, Heinrich Call For Continued US Efforts Towards Two-State Solution. In an op-ed in USA Today (2/12, 5.28M), Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Martin Heinrich call for the Administration to "help create the conditions necessary for resuming direct talks between" Israel and the Palestinians, including "a halt to Israeli settlement construction and an end to Palestinian incitement of terror." The senators warn that a two-state solution, which both Democratic and Republican administrations have worked towards, is the only way to stem the violence, provide "true security for Israel," and keep Israel "both majority Jewish and democratic." With "the incitement of violence and terror by Palestinians," Israel expanding settlements, and Trump's nominee to be the ambassador to Israel, David Friedman, expressing "an openly hostile attitude to a two-state solution," Feinstein and Heinrich call for the United States to "continue to play a constructive role, rather than turning a blind eye to actions by either party that undermine the prospects for peace."

Media Analysis: Trump-Trudeau Meeting Comes Amid Questions About Relationship.

The AP (2/12, Gillies) reports the first in-person meeting between President Trump and Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau "could be the most important meeting for Canada" with a US leader "in decades." The meeting comes, according to the AP, as "many Canadians fear Trump will enact protectionist measures that could hurt their economy" and are worried that Trump "could be as combative as he was with the leaders of Mexico and Australia." The Wall Street Journal (2/12, Vieira, Mauldin, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) says the meeting likely will provide indications of how Washington intends to proceed with changes to the economic framework of the continent. Trudeau said last week that both Trump and he were "elected on commitments to strengthen the middle class and support those working hard to join it, and that's what we are going to focus on in these meetings."

NYTimes Analysis: Canada's Conservatives Looking For a Way Forward. The New York Times (2/12, Austen, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that while in many countries the "political right" has "been on the rise lately," Canada's Conservatives "are in the political wilderness" following their 2015 defeat to the Liberals and Trudeau. The Conservatives, according to the Times, also are "lacking a permanent leader to replace" former Prime Minister Stephen Harper. The Times says the Conservatives "are asking" who "can take up our standard, cross swords with a charismatic and popular opponent, and lead us back to power in Parliament?"

Media Analyses: North Korean Missile Launch A Challenge To Trump.

Media reports on North Korea's test early Sunday of a mid-range ballistic missile cast the move as a test of the Trump Administration. On NBC Nightly News  (2/12, story 2, 0:55, Snow, 16.61M), for example, Kier Simmons said the launch "was a direct and deliberate challenge to the new Administration," and the AP (2/12, Talmadge) too says it was "an implicit challenge" to President Trump.

ABC World News Tonight  (2/12, story 2, 1:50, Llamas, 14.63M) noted the test came as Trump hosted Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe at Mar-a-Lago. The leaders responded "with a swift joint statement, calling the test launch intolerable and Trump assuring that the US has Japan's back 100 percent." ABC's David Wright noted Sunday's launch was Pyongyang's first missile test since Trump took office, and while it "posed no threat to the US...it was a crucial test of Trump's commitment to the US-Japan security alliance."

The Washington Post (2/12, Wagner, 11.43M) reported early Sunday that Trump's "hastily called news conference" Saturday evening with Abe ended with a "pledge...to stand by Japan '100 percent' in the wake of North Korea's latest ballistic missile launch." The Post noted that the press conference "lasted barely two minutes" and neither leader took questions from reporters. The AP (2/12, Talmadge) said Abe "read a brief statement," and "Trump followed Abe with even fewer words," saying in part: "I just want everybody to understand and fully know that the United States of America stands behind Japan, its great ally, 100 percent."

The New York Times (2/12, Baker, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that in response to North Korea, Trump "reacted with surprising restraint" in "sharp contrast to his response after Iran tested a ballistic missile." The Times says if Pyongyang "was testing the new president, as many analysts believe, then Mr. Trump seemed intent on showing that he would not be baited into a confrontation."

USA Today (2/12, Madhani, 5.28M) reports Trump adviser Stephen Miller told Fox News Sunday  (2/12, Wallace) that Trump is sending an "unmistakable signal to North Korea and to the entire world," and is determined to "reinforce and strengthen our vital alliances in the Pacific region as part of our strategy to deter and prevent the increasing hostility that we've seen in recent years from the North Korean regime." On CBS' Face the Nation  , Miller said, "Last night was a show of strength. Saying that we stand with our ally, having the two men appear on camera worldwide to all of planet earth was a statement that will be understood very well by North Korea." Reuters (2/12, Chiacu) also reports Miller's comments.

The Wall Street Journal (2/12, A1, Nicholas, Lee, Cheng, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports on its front page that in the wake of Sunday's test, Trump is facing calls for a show of strength toward North Korea. Sen. Cory Gardner urged Trump to "immediately pursue a series of tough measures," including sanctions, military exercises with US allies in the region, and the accelerated deployment of an advanced missile system in South Korea. Sen. Tom Cotton similarly said, "It's time the regime had to face consequences for its behavior."

For its part, Reuters (2/12, Park) reports North Korea hailed the test of a new type medium-to-long-range ballistic missile as successful. State-run media said leader Kim Jong Un supervised the test of the Pukguksong-2. AFP (2/12) reports the missile flew for "about 500 kilometers (310 miles) before falling into the Sea of Japan," according to South Korea's defense ministry. The New York Times (2/13, Choe, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports North Korea said the missile "used a high-thrust, solid fuel-powered engine and was fired from a self-propelled missile launching truck," which is "an important stride."

The AP (2/12) reports the US, Japan, and South Korea have requested an urgent meeting of the UN Security Council, which "is expected to take place Monday."

Trump Urged To Pursue Tougher Sanctions. On CNN's Fareed Zakaria GPS (2/12, Zakaria, 410K), Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, said, "We're moving towards the situation where either...we get the Chinese on board and we increase the pressure on [North Korea] through sanctions, and the Chinese are in the unique position to do it ,or Mr. Trump is going to have to face a truly fateful decision about whether we're prepared to live with a North Korea with the capability against us or we're going to use military force one way or another to destroy their nuclear missile capabilities."

Also CNN's Fareed Zakaria GPS (2/12, Zakaria, 410K), former Director of Policy Planning at the State Department, Anne-Marie Slaughter, said, "There is a tougher policy. We can impose much more personal sanctions that strike at the heart of the actual North Korean regime. China doesn't want us to do that, but it has been effective. The question is whether Trump will use this to get a tougher policy."

CNN's Stetler Criticizes Trump For Tweets About CNN In Wake Of Missile Test. Brian Stelter said on CNN's Reliable Sources (2/12, 301K), "Donald Trump's Twitter feed matters, not because it gives us on TV something to talk about, but because foreign leaders are all monitoring it, all paying very close attention, foreign leaders like Kim Jong-un. On a weekend when the President faces his first real international test with North Korea, on a weekend when he's hosting the Japanese prime minister at Mar-a-Lago, on a weekend when he's supposedly working on his response to the Ninth Circuit, Trump is tweeting about all this: 'While he's on Fake News CNN, Bernie Sanders was cut off for using the term fake news to describe the network. They said technical difficulties.'"

Steinmeier, A "Critic" Of Trump, Elected Germany's President.

A special assembly on Sunday elected former German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier the country's new president. Steinmeier received 931 of the 1,260 votes that came from the lower house of parliament and representatives of Germany's states. Media coverage highlights that Steinmeier has been a critic of President Trump. The New York Times (2/12, Smale, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports – in a story discussing Chancellor Angela Merkel's precarious political situation caused by the rising popularity of the country's right – says Steinmeier's new position "provides stature and an important platform" despite its largely ceremonial role.

Bloomberg News (2/12, Donahue, 2.41M) says Steinmeier – who is a "vocal critic" of Trump and once called him a "hate preacher" – "predicted 'difficulties' in relations with the US" amid a "complete re-ordering of international relations." Steinmeier told broadcaster ZDF after his election, "In the past we were always certain that we would have more difficult negotiating partners in the east." He continued, "Suddenly we're confronted with a situation in which we'll at the very least deal with uncertainty and also difficulties in trans-Atlantic relations." The Washington Post (2/12, 11.43M) reports Steinmeier "shunned political tension or any mention of Trump" in his acceptance speech. However, the Post adds that Steinmeier characterized Germany as an "anchor of hope" in an increasingly uncertain world. Steinmeier said, "We're living in tumultuous times; many in our country feel insecure."

The Wall Street Journal (2/12, Geiger, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports Steinmeier's election was expected as, according to the AP (2/12, Press), the Social Democrat "had the backing" of German Chancellor Angela Merkel's "grand coalition" of center-right and center-left parties. The AP says Steinmeier "has long been one of Germany's most popular politicians." He was the chief of staff of former Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and "was a main architect" of Schroeder's economic reforms. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Kirschbaum, 4.52M) reports Merkel's Christian Democrats "had failed to agree on their own candidate" and "reluctantly threw their weight behind" Steinmeier "after criticizing his uncharacteristically sharp comments about Trump." Reuters (2/12, Rinke) quotes Merkel as saying she has "faith" in Steinmeier "to lead our country in these difficult times."

UK Defense Minister Praises Trump's Efforts To Strengthen NATO.

The Wall Street Journal (2/12, Kesling, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports British Defense Minister Michael Fallon said Saturday that US-British defense ties have never been stronger and welcomed President Trump's efforts to strengthen NATO by pushing allies to contribute more to their mutual defense. "The British-American defense partnership is the deepest, strongest defense partnership anywhere in the world," Fallon said.

Iran Arrests Eight Foreigners Suspected Of Plotting Attacks.

Reuters (2/11) reports Iranian Intelligence Minister Mahmoud Alavi announced on Saturday that security forces arrested eight armed Sunni Islamist foreigners, or "Takfiri." The state news agency IRNA wrote, "Initial information indicates that Kalashnikovs and other equipment were obtained to carry out terrorist operations" in Tehran and other cities "under the direct guidance" of militants in neighboring nations. Alavi did not indicate from what nation the alleged organizers resided, but Iranian officials have accused Saudi Arabia in the past of supporting ISIS.

Thousands Protest Against Trump, Pena Nieto In Mexico.

Thousands of Mexicans protested against President Trump on Sunday on the streets of Mexico City and other cities. Media coverage says that while protest organizers intended for the demonstrations to focus on Trump, many attendees chose to use the events to speak out against their own president – Enrique Pena Nieto. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, McDonnell, 4.52M) reports the protesters "wav[ed] Mexican flags and signs denouncing" Trump as they marched through Mexico City in "the largest mobilization in the capital to date against" the American President's policies. Protest organizers, according to the Times, "dubbed the march 'Vibra Mexico' (roughly, Mexican vibe) and mounted an aggressive social media campaign encouraging people to attend."

However, the Washington Post (2/12, Agren, 11.43M) says organizers "envisaged a protest that would condemn Trump's treatment of Mexico, but also demand more of Mexican politicians." The Post says the "balance was proving difficult to maintain" as "hashtags criticizing the Vibra México protest were trending on Twitter" and organizers "were pleading with protesters" to focus on Trump. Many protesters, according to Reuters (2/12, Garcia), "also heaped scorn on their own president" as they criticized him for being "a weak leader who has presided over rampant corruption and violence at home."

WSJournal Analysis: Trump Moves Toward Center On Foreign Policy.

The Wall Street Journal (2/12, Nicholas, Lee, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) under the headline "Donald Trump's Diplomatic Moderation" reports that President Trump seems to be moving towards following a more traditional US foreign policy than was suggested by some of his campaign statements. As an example, the Journal cites Trump's appearance with Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe following the North Korean missile launch in which he said the "United States of America stands behind Japan, its great ally, 100%." That is contrasted to campaign suggestions that Japan benefits more than the US from the alliance. Similar shifts towards established policy are described with respect to the "one-China" policy, NATO, and sanctions against Russia over Ukraine. The moves are credited to advice from Defense Secretary Mattis and Secretary of State Tillerson, as well as Trump's meetings with other leaders.

CSMonitor Analysis: With Similarities To FDR, Trump Moving To Reverse His International Legacy. The Christian Science Monitor (2/12, Jonsson, 387K) reports that, among Americans who feel "a mix of Christian apocalyptic thought peppered with a sense of humiliation at the hands of foreigners," there is a "broader sentiment taking root" that looks to President Trump to revise President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's "legacy of fearless optimism and world leadership." The Monitor uses examples of those who agree with Trump in Warm Springs, Georgia, where Roosevelt built his "Little White House." The Monitor says that despite their different philosophies, Trump and Roosevelt are similar in how "both took on the courts, both pushed the boundaries executive authority in the name of national security, and both showed an ability to take advantage of emerging media," as well as how much of their bases are "self-described 'commoners; who feel they have a handshake deal with the president."

WSJournal Lauds Trump's Handling Of China, Japan. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/12, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) lauds President Trump's phone call with China's Xi Jinping and summit with Japan's Shinzo Abe, contrasting the planning and respect with Trump's previous dealing with foreign leaders. The Journal defends Trump's affirmation of the "One China policy," which he previously said was under negotiation, as not capitulating to China's stance on the issue but setting the stage for expanding support for Taiwan. The Journal also welcomes Trump's reversal from casting Japan as a freeloader to expressing support for the country's defense and praise for Abe.

NYTimes Analysis: Foreign Diplomats Hope Haley Speaks For Administration.

The New York Times (2/12, Sengupta, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that world diplomats are "figuring out how to deal with President Trump." To do that, "they're counting on his United Nations envoy, Nikki R. Haley." They are, however, said to wonder whether Haley is "speaking for herself, or for the administration?" Still they are "queuing up to see her," and "nearly all described" her "as a natural politician and a refreshing contrast to the president."

Peruvian President Asks Trump To Consider Deporting Former Leader.

Reuters (2/12, Taj) reports Peruvian President Pedro Pablo Kuczynski said in a statement that he asked President Trump, by phone, to "consider deporting" ex-president Alejandro Toledo, who is "wanted in connection with a far-reaching graft probe." The issue "is threatening to strain tensions between the United States and Peru." Trump said that they spoke to "reinforce the strong bilateral ties that exist between the United States and Peru," the White House said, but it "did not mention Toledo in a read-out of the conversation."

IMF Head: Trump Policies Likely To Be Good For American Economy In The Short Term.

The AP (2/12, Gambrell) reports International Monetary Fund head Christine Lagarde, during an event at the World Government Summit, predicted President Trump's planned infrastructure investment and tax changes would produce short-term gains for the American economy, but warned of "a tightening that is going to be difficult on the global economy and for which economies have to prepare."

Hezbollah Leader Calls Trump An "Idiot."

The AP (2/12) reports Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah said Sunday that "the world will benefit from having an 'idiot' in the White House." Referring to President Trump, Nasrallah said, "We are very optimistic that when an idiot settles in the White House and boasts about his idiocy, this is the beginning of relief for the oppressed around the world."

Moscow Supporting Europe's Far Right Populists.

NBC Nightly News  (2/12, story 3, 2:15, Snow, 16.61M) reported, "Moscow is exerting more and more political influence in Europe." NBC (Bradley) added that Russia is providing "loans, cooperation, and propaganda" to Europe's increasing vocal far right populists, "even as the US reels from Russian political interference in its own presidential election." In response, the EU "created an agency to counter anti-Europe propaganda."

WPost Touts Russian News Network, Warns Against Political Interference. In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/12, 11.43M), touts Current Time television as a response to Russia's "dark mastery" of soft power in the form of "propaganda, news, social media, cybermischief, deception, leaks and other means to influence hearts and minds." The 24/7 Russian-language television network provides fair reporting without disinformation in Russia and countries. Arguing that "key" to the venture's success is being "deemed credible by audiences that have been fed a steady diet of anti-Americanism in recent years," the Post warns the Administration against making it a propaganda machine. The Post also calls for Congress to make sure this response to Russia's information war, "using real news and straight programming and reflecting the highest and best values of our open society," remains "properly financed and politically unhindered."

Bolton Lauds Reports Trump Seeks To Cast Aside New START Treaty.

Former Ambassador John Bolton, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (2/12, Subscription Publication, 6.37M), welcomes reports of President Trump's disdain for the 2010 New START arms-control treaty. Bolton argues that the treaty has been bad for the US and Trump's position indicates a refusal to accede to Vladimir Putin's wishes. Acknowledging concerns that Trump will weaken the sanctions on Russia, Bolton warns this would embolden Russia in its dealings in the Middle East, particularly with Iran, weaken Western Europe's resolve on sanctions, and alarm Central and Eastern Europe. Bolton concludes that Trump has to realize that countries' foreign policies are driven by national interests, not personal chemistry.

Romanians Continue To Protest Government Corruption.

Bloomberg Politics (2/12, Timu, 201K) reports that 70,000 people demonstrated throughout Romania on Sunday to demand the cabinet step down, according to local media. Bloomberg Politics notes this 13-day protest is the largest show of unrest since the 1989 ousting of dictator Nicolae Ceausescu. According to the Wall Street Journal (2/12, Hinshaw, Subscription Publication, 6.37M), many protesters see National Anticorruption Directorate chief prosecutor Laura Codruta Kövesi as a symbol of change in Romania. The NAD has reportedly increased in authority in recent years, with 2,100 abuse-of-office cases currently under investigation, among them many high-profile politicians. The Journal says that older generations resist the anticorruption measures as reminiscent of communist era rule. The New York Times (2/12, Gillet, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) also reports on the story.

Kashmir Clash Between Indian Troops, Militants Leads To Violent Protests.

The New York Times (2/12, Kumar, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that four militants, two soldiers, and one civilian died in a gun battle between Indian security forces and Hizbul Mujahedeen militants lasting 12 hours into Sunday morning in a Kashmir village. Young people who gathered to grieve the deaths of the militants threw stones at security forces. The troops responded with gunshots and tear gas, resulting in one death and 21 injuries, according to the local hospital superintendent.

Somaliland To Allow UAE To Establish Naval Base.

Somaliland's parliament on Sunday approved the United Arab Emirates' formal application to establish a naval base in the territory's Berbera port town, the AP (2/12, Guled) reports. An official with the Somali breakaway territory explained the UAE intends to use the base to attack Shia Houthi fighters in Yemen and Somaliland President Ahmed Silanyo claimed the measure would create jobs and benefit the territory. Nine parliamentary lawmakers vehemently opposed the "controversial" plan, as did neighboring Ethiopia and Djibouti.

WSJournal Analysis: Despite European Unhappiness, IMF Won't Budge On Greece Bailout.

In an analysis, the Wall Street Journal (2/12, Nixon, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that the window for a with the window for a Greek Debt deal quickly closing, European governments and institutions sorely want to resolve the standoff over the next phase of the country's bailout program, but the International Monetary Fund is standing firm against political pressure, refusing to participate because it believes the numbers don't add up. Many Europeans criticize the IMF as being overly pessimistic in its forecasts and assessment of the country's prospects for reform. The Journal concludes that should Europe seek to postpone the Greek bailout issue until after this year's elections, the IMF will not be part of it.

Egyptian Cost Of Living Soars.

The Wall Street Journal (2/12, Lohade, Kholaif, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports Egypt's largely working- and middle-class people are seeing jumps in the cost of living due to high inflation, a weaker currency, falling government subsidies, a new value-added tax, and increased tariffs. However, the government has had to take tough measures on the economy to get International Monetary Fund money that will support an economy hurt by years of political unrest and pay for importing necessities such as wheat and medicine.

Cambodian Opposition Party Leader Resigns.

The New York Times (2/12, Wallace, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Cambodia's "embattled" opposition party leader, Sam Rainsy, abruptly resigned on Saturday in what he described as a "pre-emptive defense move" to save the Cambodia National Rescue Party ahead of June's local elections. Earlier this month, Prime Minister Hun Sen proposed a series of moves through which he could dissolve any party, including the CNRP, headed by someone with a criminal conviction. A number of criminal defamation lawsuits have been filed against Rainsy, a long-lasting, "internationally visible opposition figure," who leads the Cambodian People's Party.

Swiss Voters Approve Simplified Citizenship Process For Third-Generation Immigrants.

The New York Times (2/12, Cumming-Bruce, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Swiss voters, in a national referendum on Sunday, approved a government-sponsored measure to simplify and expedite the citizenship approval process for third-generation immigrants under 25-years-old. The measure will not grant automatic citizenship to children of non-citizens born in the nation, but nearly 25,000 people who are the descendants of foreigners with permanent residency status are no longer subjected to the "lengthy and expensive procedure to obtain citizenship." The Times says Sunday's vote "went against the recent tide of right-wing populism and anti-immigrant sentiment in much of Western Europe." The result also, according to the Times, came despite a campaign by the right-wing People's Party "to stoke fears of Muslims infiltrating the country."

Spain's Far-Left Podemos Party Head Defeats Leadership Challenge.

The New York Times (2/12, Minder, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Spain's Podemos Party leader Pablo Iglesias "won an unexpectedly clear victory" in a leadership challenge vote on Sunday. The Times says Iglesias' win is expected to bolster his far-left party's "radical" and "anti-institutional hard-line policies." The Times adds the result will also "likely" increase "pressure on the Socialists," which is in the throes of its own "bitter leadership dispute."

Voeten: Public Recognizes Friendly, Hostile Countries Well.

Erik Voeten, in the "Monkey Cage" blog of the Washington Post (2/12, 11.43M) writes, "The public does pretty well" in recognizing which countries are friendly and hostile to the United States in international affair. A YouGov survey of 7,150 Americans between Jan. 28 and Feb. 1 found a "quite high" correlation between public opinion of 144 countries and their alignment with US interests, as measure by voting with "the United States in the United Nations General Assembly on contentious issues during the 71st session (fall of 2016)." Voeten concludes, "in the aggregate, the public does have a pretty clear sense of who the United States' foes and friends are." However, Trump's hostility towards such countries may not hurt him politically, as academic research indicates "the public doesn't lead but follows messages by political leaders when forming opinions about foreign policy."

LEADING THE NEWS

Trump Blasts "Illegally Leaked" Flynn Information, Readies "Broad Review" Of Intel Agencies.

Coverage of National Security Adviser Flynn's resignation continues to be heavy, including reports on all three network newscasts and extensive cable commentary. The focus of the story has shifted to the President's comments on the matter Wednesday, as well as to calls from lawmakers for an investigation into whether Trump campaign aides were in contact with Russian officials during last year's campaign. Trump is portrayed very unfavorably in most reports, with many deriding his criticism of the media and what he termed "illegally leaked" information on Flynn as an attempt to distract from legitimate questions about his aides' contacts with Russian officials. On  CNN's Situation Room (2/15, 554K), for example, Jim Acosta said, "You can see the President is taking no responsibility for any of this. He's blaming the press." Scott Pelley, in the lead story for the CBS Evening News  (2/15, lead story, 3:10, Pelley, 11.17M), reported Trump "lashed out...at perceived enemies," suggesting that "the FBI and the NSA are behind what he called 'illegal leaks of classified information' that led to the downfall of Michael Flynn."

Politico (2/15, Nelson, 2.46M), meanwhile, said that while Trump "is facing a very real threat of growing calls for investigations into numerous controversies," he is "on the offensive, blaming the media and the intelligence community for what he continues to call 'fake news.'" In a tweet Wednesday morning, Trump wrote, "The fake news media is going crazy with their conspiracy theories and blind hatred. @MSNBC & @CNN are unwatchable. @foxandfriends is great!" Trump added, "This Russian connection non-sense is merely an attempt to cover-up the many mistakes made in Hillary Clinton's losing campaign," and "Information is being illegally given to the failing @nytimes & @washingtonpost by the intelligence community (NSA and FBI?). Just like Russia." The Washington Times (2/15, Sherfinski, 272K) reports that Trump tweeted, "The real scandal here is that classified information is illegally given out by 'intelligence' like candy. Very un-American!"

In fact, the New York Times (2/15, Risen, Rosenberg, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports, "Administration officials" say Trump "plans to assign a New York billionaire to lead a broad review of American intelligence agencies...an effort that members of the intelligence community fear could curtail their independence and reduce the flow of information that contradicts the president's worldview." Cerberus Capital Management co-founder Stephen A. Feinberg's potential role "has met fierce resistance among intelligence officials already on edge because of the criticism the intelligence community has received from Mr. Trump during the campaign and since he became president." While there has been no announcement on the matter, Feinberg "recently told his company's shareholders that he is in discussions to join the Trump administration." The Hill (2/15, Vladimirov, 1.25M) also reported on Feinberg's possible position, citing the Times report.

The Washington Times (2/15, Taylor, 272K) says the Administration and the intelligence community "moved closer to open warfare in the wake of National Security Adviser Michael Flynn's spectacular downfall – and the fallout is unnerving key American intelligence partners around the world." The Times cites a "senior Republican national security source" who said, "Our foreign partners are deeply alarmed and unsettled by what they're seeing in Washington." The Wall Street Journal (2/15, Harris, Lee, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) cites current and former officials who said US intelligence officials have withheld sensitive information from Trump amid concerns it might be leaked. The Journal says the decision to withhold the information highlights the level of mistrust between Trump and the intelligence community.

The New York Daily News (2/15, Joseph, 4.45M) says Trump "fiercely defended" Flynn and "took aim at the leaks." Lester Holt said on NBC Nightly News  (2/15, story 2, 2:50, Holt, 16.61M) said Trump's praise for Flynn a day after he forced him out, leaves "the question whether the President would have fired him had Flynn's false statements about his dealings with a Russian official not gone public." Kristen Welker called Trump's comments "a stunning act of defiance," and cited "a source inside the White House" who acknowledges that "the episode has been a major distraction and now there are attempts to turn the page."

The AP (2/15, Pace) reports that as Flynn's resignation "sparked a new swirl of controversy over Trump's potential ties to Moscow," Trump "blamed the media and 'illegally leaked' intelligence information for" causing Flynn's downfall. Appearing to "side with his former aide," Trump said it was "really a sad thing that he was treated so badly." To the Washington Times (2/15, Boyer, 272K), Trump offered "an angry defense" of Flynn and "characterized the firing as a result of sabotaging leaks to the media, rather than dissatisfaction with Mr. Flynn's job performance."

Bloomberg Politics (2/15, Olorunnipa, 201K) quotes Trump as saying during a joint news conference with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, "He's been treated very, very unfairly by the media – as I call it, the fake media, in many cases." Reuters (2/15, Holland) says Trump called Flynn a "wonderful man." The Washington Post (2/15, Parker, 11.43M) notes that Trump's comments came after White House press secretary Sean Spicer on Tuesday "emphasized that Trump asked Flynn to resign because he could no longer be trusted."

According to The Hill (2/15, Fabian, Hagen, 1.25M), Trump "doubled down on his condemnation of the leaks from the intelligence community," saying, "It's criminal action, a criminal act and its been going a long time, before me. ... But now it's really going on." Trump added, "People are trying to cover up for a terrible loss the Democrats had under Hillary Clinton." Correspondent Chip Reid said on the CBS Evening News  (2/15, story 3, 2:00, Pelley, 11.17M) that "Democrats, including Congressman Adam Schiff, say the focus on leaks is just a distraction." Meanwhile, the "Republican Chairman of the House Intelligence Committee says he will ask the FBI to investigate the recent rash of leaks, and, the penalty on a charge of leaking classified information is up to ten years in prison."

The New York Times (2/15, Landler, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) also says Trump "lashed out at the nation's intelligence agencies," blaming "illegal leaks to the news media" for Flynn's ouster. Trump "tried to shift attention from damaging questions about contacts with Russia by Mr. Flynn and others close to the president, arguing that the outrage is not those contacts, but the leaks about them." However, the Times adds, "the White House has had little success in trying to shift the narrative from the Russian contacts to accusations about the leaking of sensitive information by the intelligence agencies, as well as by the FBI."

Jonathan Karl said in the lead story for ABC World News Tonight  (2/15, lead story, 5:20, Muir, 14.63M) that Trump "is expressing more outrage about leaks in the newspapers than about Flynn's behavior" despite the fact that "during the presidential campaign, then-candidate Trump reveled in leaks when they were about somebody else, Hillary Clinton." The Washington Post (2/15, Parker, 11.43M) also says that Trump's "ire over the insider tips to journalists...contrasted with his indirect praise of the disclosure of leaked internal emails from the Clinton campaign made public by WikiLeaks during the lead-up to the election." Dana Milbank writes in his Washington Post (2/15, 11.43M) column that Trump has gone "from zero to Watergate in 25 days," as media outlets have revived the Nixon era question of what the President knew and when he knew it. Milbank argues, however, that this may be "the wrong question." The "real question" is "whether Flynn, in his contacts with the ambassador, was doing Trump's bidding, at least implicitly."

The New York Times (2/15, Shear, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports the President has changed his attitude from "I love WikiLeaks!" on the campaign trail to condemning the acts of those who submit information to the site as "criminal" from the White House. Trump is not the first to change his opinion against Washington's "common currency," with former President Obama having prosecuted more whistle-blowers while in office than all previous presidents combined.

Joe Scarborough said on MSNBC's Morning Joe  (2/15, 270K) that it is up to congressional Republicans "to get to the bottom of this and to begin investigating. And how disheartening it was to see several people on the Hill and some editorial writers say this isn't about the Russian connections, this is about leaks." Phil Mudd said on CNN's Situation Room (2/15, 554K), "Every President comes in office and says, 'Wow, there's gambling in Vegas and people in Washington, DC leak.' The second challenge you find when you determine that you get leaks like that is not all of them come from the Department of Justice, the FBI, the NSA, people you don't like. Some have come from within your own house. In this case, the White House." Mudd added, "We have a National Security Adviser who had inappropriate conversations with the Russians and lied to his boss, and the blame goes on the National Security Agency. Are you kidding me? Happens every year, every administration...and I think this President is having a hard time accepting that."

Karl also said in the lead story for ABC World News Tonight (2/15, lead story, 5:20, Muir, 14.63M) that "the turmoil in the White House combined with the National Security Council shake-up has some key Republicans in Congress worried about chaos and dysfunction in the West Wing." Sen. John McCain: "We don't know who is in charge, this Flynn situation, the whole environment is one of dysfunction in the Trump Administration."

GOP Lawmakers Alarmed About Flynn Leak; Rubio Says Intel Panel Conducting Probe. Breitbart (2/15, Wong, 2.02M) reported that Sen. Marco Rubio said Tuesday that the Senate Intelligence Committee will examine who wiretapped and leaked Flynn's conversation with the Russian ambassador. Said Rubio, "The Senate Select Intelligence Committee is conducting an investigation into Russia's role in our elections and its aftermath. And I imagine this among other topics will be in the purview of that." Rubio also expressed concern that "intelligence was being leaked to the press, rather than given to committees that have oversight over the intelligence agencies."

Meanwhile House Oversight Committee Chairman Jason Chaffetz said Wednesday that he has asked the Justice Department to investigate the leaks surrounding Flynn. Politico (2/15, Lima, 2.46M) reported that in a letter to Justice Department IG Michael Horowitz, Chaffetz "expressed concern over 'potentially classified national security information' circulated in recent news reports leading up to the resignation of the former national security adviser." Chaffetz wrote, "We have serious concerns about the potential inadequate protection of classified information here. ... In light of this, we request that your office begin an immediate investigation into whether classified information was mishandled here."

House Intelligence Committee Chairman Rep. David Nunes said on Fox News' Hannity (2/15, 535K), "There could have been multiple crimes here committed, but for sure, leaking of classified information is punishable by law. This needs to be looked into by the appropriate agencies, and in fact our committee is going to be requesting that the agencies actually look into this and try to bring these perpetrators accountable and hold them accountable under the law."

Rep. Steve King said on Fox News' Hannity (2/15, 535K), "It looks like it was a strategic plan that was unfolded and kind of synchronized that the intel that was gathered, perhaps by someone within the FBI at the time – less likely one of our other branches or components of the intelligence community – and then strategically released and leaked the information to do the maximum amount of damage to Mike Flynn."

In his Washington Times (2/15, 272K) column, Bill Gertz writes that Flynn's resignation "was the result of a coordinated effort by current and former US intelligence officials to undermine the Trump administration using the disclosure of highly classified communications intercepts." Gertz cites "a White House national security official" who said "the intelligence bureaucrats went after Mr. Flynn" because of "his plan to reform US intelligence agencies that during the Obama administration became mired in political correctness and lost much of their effectiveness." In his "Talking Points Memo" segment on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (2/15, 767K), Bill O'Reilly decried what he described as "mass hysteria" over Flynn. O'Reilly argued that there is "no credible evidence that General Flynn was directed to do anything, yet the anti-Trump media spends hours talking trash."

Lawmakers Push For Investigation Of Trump-Russia Ties; Republicans Oppose Select Committee. Correspondent Jim Axelrod said on the CBS Evening News (2/15, story 2, 2:55, Pelley, 11.17M) that Trump "has insulted everyone from federal judges to fellow Republicans to Meryl Streep," but he has "seemed to bend over backward to avoid criticizing Vladimir Putin." Peter Wehner, who "worked for Ronald Reagan and both Bush administrations, writing speeches and generating policy ideas," says part of the reason "could be financial entanglements between Mr. Trump's real estate empire and Russia." USA Today (2/15, Dorell, 5.28M) provides an overview of Trump's "long-standing ties to Russia," which former US Ambassador to Ukraine and Uzbekistan John Herbst said "might explain why his policy is 'noticeably weaker on Russia than on anything else.'"

Major Garrett said in the lead story for CBS Evening News  (2/15, lead story, 3:10, Pelley, 11.17M) that Democrats "stepped up calls for a bipartisan investigation." While "some Republicans like Tennessee's Bob Corker and South Carolina's Lindsey Graham are calling for thorough inquiries," Sen. Rand Paul "wants to defer to the Justice Department." The Wall Street Journal (2/15, Paletta, Lee, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) says the Administration is facing pressure from lawmakers over its contacts with Russia, with Democrats focusing on whether Flynn was freelancing when he spoke to the Russian ambassador, or acting on the orders of a superior in the Administration. Bloomberg Politics (2/15, Olorunnipa, 201K) describes "a growing sense of political peril" within the GOP and says "leading congressional Republicans on Wednesday joined calls by Democrats for a deeper look at relationships between President Trump's team and Russian government officials."

However, Politico (2/15, Bresnahan, Bade, 2.46M) reported that House Republicans are "downplaying calling for a select committee to investigate the matter." Nunes "reacted angrily to calls for a new probe following a New York Times bombshell report about such communications," telling Politico, "The Democrats can play their politics all they want; they're welcome to do that, this is Washington. ... But as far as I'm concerned, we will continue to investigate the Russian activity like we've done for many years." Of a select committee, Nunes said, "There is not going to be one; I can tell you there is absolutely not going to be one. And I am not going to be lectured by people who are speaking out of both sides of their mouths." House Speaker Ryan expressed a similar sentiment on MSNBC's Morning Joe  (2/15, 270K), saying, "It's not as if the Intelligence Committee has not been already investigating this. They have been and will continue to do that. It's important that it is the Intelligence Committee because they are the ones that have access to classified information."

Meanwhile, USA Today (2/15, Kelly, 5.28M) says congressional Democrats "raced to every open microphone Wednesday to demand a broad and independent investigation." Roll Call (2/15, Bowman, 63K) reported that Democrats "laid out their demands for independent investigations" and "are hopeful public outcry will force the administration and congressional Republicans to comply." In addition, Democrats were "united in calling on Attorney General Jeff Sessions to recuse himself from any Justice Department investigation into whether there was criminal wrongdoing." The AP (2/15, Lardner) reports that Senate Minority Leader Schumer "said Sessions should not be involved because of potential conflicts of interest and because of Justice Department regulations that prohibit individuals with political ties to the subjects of an investigation from leading it."

Schiff, a member of the House Intelligence Committee, said on CNN's Situation Room  (2/15, 554K) that conversations between Trump campaign aides and Russian officials "will be a key investigation into this. There is a lot to look at. We'll look at the what the FBI response was, how they used paid media and trolls and also the issue of collusion." Schiff added that "this is something very much of interest and has to be investigated. And I think that's really one of the most serious allegations to surface since the election." Asked if he believes Trump directed Flynn to tell the Russians that his Administration would roll back sanctions, Schiff said, "I don't know is the answer. But it certainly wouldn't surprise me."

Rep. Kathleen Rice told CNN's Situation Room  (2/15, 554K) that there is "no question that President Trump found out about this three weeks ago...and chose to do nothing until it became public. Now, what that says is he's interested, President Trump is interested in having a very secret administration and that's not what the public deserves."

The New York Times (2/15, Flegenheimer, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that while Democrats "see a scandal 'bigger than Watergate,'" Republicans "see a Russia-size obstacle to conservative legislation," and the result is that "aggressive oversight on Capitol Hill of ties between President Trump's campaign associates and Russian intelligence is far from assured." Schumer said, "I've been in Congress for a long time. I've never seen anything like this. ... Nothing less than our system of checks and balances, democratic institutions and our national security is at stake." The Hill (2/15, Bolton, 1.25M) said Schumer "warned that Trump officials might try to cover up improper contacts with Russian intelligence." According to Schumer, "there is legitimate concern that President Trump's circle of advisers may try to destroy evidence that could shed light on the substance of reported conversations with Russian agents." Schumer "demanded that all records of contact between Trump's campaign, transition and administration officials be preserved."

The Washington Post (2/15, Demirjian, Sullivan, 11.43M) reports that Senate Democratic leaders agreed "to a bipartisan probe inside Congress" of the allegations, agreeing to "push forward with an ongoing Intelligence Committee investigation." This, as Senate GOP leaders "responded to Flynn's resignation by saying that the Intelligence Committee probably will examine the circumstances," a position they reiterated on Wednesday. Asked on MSNBC's Morning Joe  (2/15, 270K) if there needs to be a special committee, Senate Majority Leader McConnell said, "No. We know how to do our work and we have an Intelligence Committee. ... I don't think we need to go through setting up a special committee but we are going to look at Russia involvement and the US election."

Sen. Jeff Flake said on CNN's The Lead  (2/15, 320K), "My understanding is the Senate is already looking into it, the intelligence committee. I don't think a special committee is needed. I think the standing committees can do it just fine." Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Bob Corker said on MSNBC's Morning Joe  (2/15, 270K), "It's hard to know where to start. The base issue is getting to the bottom of what the Russian interference was and what the relationship was with associates of the Trump effort. So that is the big elephant in the room that has got to be dealt with in the most appropriate way. The American people need to understand, we need to understand and it needs to be dealt with quickly and we need to get it behind us."

Sen. Chris Coons said on MSNBC MTP Daily  (2/15), "Initially we need to rely on the Senate Intelligence Committee which is already under way in conducting an open investigation that will be classified into materials and information that really shouldn't be reviewed in an open setting. ... I also think two committees on which I serve, Foreign Relations and Judiciary should be holding public hearings into what this means for our next election, for our relations with our vital allies in Europe who also face Russian aggression against their elections in Germany, France, and elsewhere and on Judiciary into what this means and cyber crime and for Russia's interference in our election. Then we should proceed to an independent commission and an independent investigation outside of Congress."

Senate Minority Whip Durbin was less sanguine about an Intelligence Committee probe, telling MSNBC's Morning Joe  (2/15, 270K) that "the Intelligence Committee is a graveyard for investigations. Let me tell you why. Their hearings are largely in secret. The public will not have access to the testimony." Durbin added, "We are waiting for bipartisan cooperation and support for an independent commission to take on this investigation."

Sen. Chris Murphy said on MSNBC's Morning Joe  (2/15, 270K), "There is a real urgency to getting to the bottom of this. Why? Because it is potentially affecting US policy. There is no theory of international relations that explains the positioning that Trump has taken on Russia." Coons added that "an independent nonpartisan commission is the only way to get to the bottom of this and give it subpoena power and allow it to do what the Republicans have been explicit that the two existing intelligence investigations are not going to do."

The Washington Post (2/15, 11.43M) argues in an editorial that by "dash[ing] off a half-dozen tweets in which he curiously both denied the news and attacked the leakers who disclosed it," Trump "gave more cause for Republicans and Democrats to demand answers about his opaque and increasingly troubling ties with Moscow." The Post stresses "the dire need for a broader, bipartisan probe of Russia's election-year meddling," and says if "congressional inquiries ultimately are derailed by politics, an independent commission must be empaneled."

Also Wednesday, Sens. Chuck Grassley and Dianne Feinstein, the chairman and ranking member of the Senate Judiciary Committee asked Attorney General Sessions "to send the committee documents and provide a briefing on the resignation of President Donald Trump's national security adviser," Reuters (2/15, Zengerle) reports.

The AP (2/15, Tucker) reports that Democrats also accused the FBI of having a double standard for refusing "to discuss potential contacts between Russian officials and associates of President Donald Trump," despite its "public disclosures about Hillary Clinton's emails." Congressional Democrats and former Clinton aides "say they're upset a law enforcement organization that so publicly discussed one probe didn't even hint at the existence of another."

In an editorial, the New York Times (2/15, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says there is "more than sufficient reason for Congress to investigate what Moscow has been up to and whether people at the highest levels of the United States government have aided and abetted the interests of a nation that has tried to thwart American foreign policy since the Cold War." The Times adds that while "one might expect Mr. Trump to be clamoring for details that would eliminate any suspicion that his administration is in league with an enemy," he "has waged an unhinged attack on the intelligence agencies themselves."

NYTimes Analysis: Journalists See Russia Story As A Watergate Tale For Twitter Era. Michael Grynbaum and Sydney Ember of the New York Times (2/15, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) write under the headline "Journalists, Battered And Groggy, Find A Renewed Sense Of Mission" that "the swirling story around President Trump's dealings with Russia is being compared in journalism circles to past blockbusters like Watergate and the Monica Lewinsky scandal – with a 21st-century twist." Major mainstream news organizations "are jousting for scoops" as the "watch the news unfold on Twitter in real time. Anonymous sources are driving bombshell stories, and leaks are springing from encrypted iPhone messaging apps rather than from meetings in underground parking garages." New Yorker editor David Remnick said, "There is this uncertainty about what is happening minute to minute, day to day. There is this sense that every day is going to bring something startling, if not calamitous." The Times writes that "the accelerated metabolism is nonpartisan," with conservative websites also "covering every twist of the White House developments."

Henninger, Dan Rather Weigh In On Watergate Similarities. In his Wall Street Journal (2/15, Henninger, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) column, Daniel Henninger writes that while this situation does not rise to the level of a Watergate-type threat to Trump's presidency, the goal of Trump's opponents is not impeachment but to undercut his power with the American people, which requires making him look like a loser. Henninger argues that could occur unless the Administration can return to the basics that got them to the White House. Dan Rather took a different view of the severity of the scandal in a Facebook post that went viral on Tuesday. According to the New York Post (2/15, Mendoza, 3.82M), Rather wrote, "On a 10 scale of armageddon for our form of government, I would put Watergate at a 9. This Russia scandal is currently somewhere around a 5 or 6, in my opinion, but it is cascading in intensity seemingly by the hour." Rather also "slammed the White House's credibility," writing, "The White House has no credibility on this issue. Their spigot of lies – can't we finally all agree to call them lies – long ago lost them any semblance of credibility. I would also extend that to the Republican Congress, who has excused away the Trump Administration's assertions for far too long."

Flynn's Security Clearance Suspended. CNN has reported that Flynn's security clearance has been suspended, The Hill (2/15, Hensch, 1.25M) reported. A spokesman for the DIA that "the suspension is a normal administrative move for clearances under 'pending review.'" According to the spokesman, the clearance "could be reinstated if no wrongdoing is found." Meanwhile, Pamela Brown reported on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360  (2/15, 686K) that "the FBI is not suspected to pursue charges against" Flynn. However, "there is still an ongoing broader FBI review of Flynn, and other Trump campaign aides on their Russia-related dealings."

In a separate story for ABC World News Tonight  (2/15, story 2, 2:35, Muir, 14.63M) Senior Justice Correspondent Pierre Thomas said an "intensive investigation [is] under way." So far "FBI and intelligence officials have found no direct cooperation between Trump associates and the Russian government aimed at influencing the 2016 election and authorities can not yet say for certain if Trump associates knew they were dealing with suspected Russian intelligence who often pose as business, political and academic leaders. And even if they didn't know, many asking, why so much contact with the Russians before an American election at all?" CNN International (2/16, 598K) reports similarly.

Trump Offers NSA Job To Harward. Reuters (2/15, Hosenball, Walcott) reports that President Trump has offered the job of national security adviser to Vice Admiral Robert Harward, according to "two US officials familiar with the matter." Sources say it was not clear whether Harward had accepted the offer. Foreign Policy (2/15, Ricks, 359K) said Harward "is likely to bring in his own team, from deputy on down, with a focus on national security types with some experience under their belts."

Figure In Russian Cyber-Treason Scandal Linked To Underground Criminal Web Forums. McClatchy (2/15, Johnson, 74K) reports that Dmitry Dokuchaev, who is "one of the key figures in a cyber-treason scandal shaking Russia and possibly related to Russian efforts to influence the US presidential election has been linked to underground criminal forums on the web." Dokuchaev, a major in Russia's FSB security service and its Information Security Center, "used the screen name 'Forb' when he mingled with the large underground community of Russian-speaking criminals who use the so-called dark web to trade tools for defrauding consumers in the West." His activities "have potential significance to congressional inquiries into President Donald Trump's ties to Russia."

The Hill Analysis: Flynn Case Thrusts Comey Back Into Spotlight.

Under the headline, "Flynn Puts FBI Director Back In Spotlight," The Hill (2/15, Williams, 1.25M) reports that FBI Director Comey "is now reportedly presiding over an investigation that appears to have implicated one of President Trump's top aides." Though "Comey's presence has been in the background in recent weeks," the Hill says, the investigation into former National Security Adviser Flynn refocuses attention on the director, with both Republicans and Democrats pressuring the FBI for a "public accounting" of its investigation. MSN (2/15, Williams, 7.46M) posts The Hill's coverage to its website.

Mook Questions Why The FBI Never Commented On Flynn Probe. The Independent (UK) (2/15, Bulman, 1.28M) reports that in a tweet on Tuesday, former Clinton campaign manager Robby Mook criticized the FBI for handling the Clinton email probe and the Flynn investigation differently. "I'd like the FBI to explain why they sent a letter about Clinton but not this," Mook tweeted along with a link to the New York Times' coverage of Flynn's "repeated contacts" with Russian intelligence.

Downie: Flynn Situation "Destroyed Any Excuse" For Comey's Actions In Clinton Probe. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/15, Downie, 11.43M) "Post Partisan" blog, James Downie argues that reports of Trump associates Paul Manafort and Michael Flynn's contact with Russian intelligence officials have "destroyed any excuse for FBI Director James B. Comey's conduct during the election." According to Downie, reports of the existence of evidence of Manafort and Flynn's contacts with Russia prove that Comey made comments about the Clinton email probe while refusing to publicly discuss "concrete evidence" of the Trump advisors' misconduct. Reports that Comey sought to prevent other intelligence chiefs from telling the Trump transition team that Flynn had lied about his contacts with Russia only make the situation "worse" for Comey, Downie says. "With every new revelation," Comey's comments in the Clinton email probe appear "less and less justified," Downie concludes.

In a piece for GQ (2/15, Willis, 18.73M), Jay Wills similarly opines that Comey has "some explaining to do" regarding why he said "nothing at all" about Flynn while choosing to weigh in on the Clinton email controversy. "If [Comey] knew his agency had evidence that the Trump camp just might be colluding with a foreign government to swing the election, pulling the fire alarm on the inane Clinton emails story as he did is the height of irresponsibility, stupidity, partisanship, or some unholy combination thereof," Wills says.

COUNTER-TERRORISM

Pentagon Memo Decrees "ISIS" Official Name For Terror Group.

USA Today (2/15, Brook, 5.28M) reports that a Pentagon memo issued Tuesday decreed that "in all official references will refer to the terror network as the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria or ISIS." In an email, spokesman Navy Capt. Jeff Davis said, "ISIS is the term most known and understood by the American public, and it is what our leadership uses. This simply aligns our terminology."

Study: ISIL Terror Suspects Charged In US Are Frequently Citizens.

Citing a new study by the Center on National Security at the Fordham University School of Law, NJ News (2/15, 952K) reports that many terrorists targeting America on behalf of ISIL are US citizens. In the center's survey of more than 100 ISIL prosecution cases filed in the US, "nearly eight in 10 individuals charged were U.S. citizens." Around 90 percent of the individuals were young men and about a third of them were converts to Islam, NJ News says.

Arkansas Senators Explain Letter Urging Trump To Keep Gitmo Open And Halt Transfers.

The Northwest Arkansas Democrat-Gazette (2/15, Lockwood, 54K) reports that Arkansas' two US senators – John Boozman and Tom Cotton – were among 11 Republican lawmakers who sent a letter to President Trump, "urging the White House to block the release of any more prisoners housed at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba." The also called for "maintaining and expanding the utilization of the detention facility," suggesting it should be used to store "current and future enemy combatants who pose a threat to our national security." Cotton on Tuesday told the Democrat-Gazette that the letter was to "reassure the president that he had congressional support for taking the steps necessary to roll back some of the needless Obama restrictions on the use of" Gitmo. Boozman told the newspaper that only the "most dangerous of the dangerous" remain at the facility, which is why the lawmakers want to "make sure that they remain in that facility versus bringing them over to the homeland or releasing them."

CRIMINAL INVESTIGATIONS

US Charges 41 Felons In Arkansas In Anti-Violence Program.

The Arkansas Democrat Gazette (2/15, 278K) reports that federal prosecutors in Little Rock, AR on Tuesday announced "the indictment of 41 convicted felons on federal charges, praising a federal anti-violence program for changing the way local and federal authorities work together." The indictments "were made under the Violence Reduction Network, a national program with the U.S. Department of Justice, that aims to reduce violent crime by providing participating agencies with training and federal resources." According to the Gazette, Little Rock and West Memphis "joined the federal anti-violence program in 2015, along with Compton, Calif., Flint, Mich., and Newark, N.J." The Gazette adds that "all of the 41 people indicted have long histories of drug trafficking, violent felonies or both, said Christopher Thyer, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas, at a news conference Tuesday afternoon."

Three Federal Prisoners Plead Guilty To Beating Another Inmate.

The AP (2/15) reports from Alexandria, LA that "three prisoners housed at the U.S. Penitentiary in Pollock, Louisiana, have pleaded guilty to the assault of an inmate that resulted in injuries." US Attorney Stephanie A. Finley's office said that Jason Mackenzie, 35, Robert Shipp Jr., 32, and Calvin Skelton, 42, "jumped the victim while he was reading a newspaper in the cell block on Oct. 21, 2015," and "punched and kicked him repeatedly." The victim "underwent multiple surgeries to repair injuries form the assault."

Jury Selected In Second Oregon Occupation Trial.

The Oregonian (2/15, Bernstein, 894K) reports that a jury of 12 has been selected for the trial of four Malheur National Wildlife Refuge occupation defendants. The newspaper describes several of the jurors. "In other developments," the Oregonian says, prosecutors are seeking permission from the Justice Department to compel the testimony of a former radio journalist who interviewed occupier Ryan Bundy in January 2016. In the interview, Bundy describes the occupiers' motivations. Defense attorneys have questioned why the government's move to seek the journalist's testimony comes only a few days away from the start of the trial.

Chicago Two-Year-Old Killed In Crossfire; Authorities Call For Federal Help.

According to NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 6, 2:00, Holt, 16.61M), a gunman killed two-year-old Chicago resident Lavontay White in the backseat of a car and a 26-year-old man, the suspected target. Chicago Police Superintendent Eddie Johnson and Mayor Rahm Emmanuel reportedly call for federal help in combating this crisis, with three children caught in crossfire in the past five days and 400 shootings in the city already this year.

Kansas Governor Confirms His Office Calls Were Intercepted By Federal Prosecutors.

The AP (2/15) reports from Topeka, KS that Kansas Gov. Sam Brownback "confirmed Wednesday that he and two of his top aides received letters from the U.S. Justice Department telling them that the federal government intercepted phone calls between them and an ex-legislator's number." The Kansas state Senate's "top two leaders also received the same letter dealing with phone calls in 2015 from a number for then-state Sen. Michael O'Donnell, a Wichita Republican who now serves on his local county commission in Sedgwick County." O'Donnell "told reporters Wednesday that he was shocked to learn that his phone was tapped in 2015." His comments "came a day after businessman Brandon Steven has confirmed he's the subject of an inquiry into poker and his efforts to open a casino in southeast Kansas in 2015."

The Topeka (KS) Capital-Journal (2/15, Shorman, 106K) reports that letters from the Justice Department "disclosing the interceptions went to Brownback at his Cedar Crest residence, deputy chief of staff Kim Borchers, and Tim Shallenburger, a legislative liaison for the governor and president of the Kansas Development Finance Authority." The Capital-Journal adds that "multiple news organizations in Wichita received letters earlier this week saying the justice department had intercepted calls in 2015 between staff members and O'Donnell." The Wichita Eagle reported on Tuesday "that former staff members of the newspaper had received letters," and "letters also were sent to multiple people in Wichita about the same time telling them their calls with Brandon Steven, a Wichita businessman, had been intercepted." WIBW-TV Topeka, KS (2/15, Viviani, 42K) reports that "the DOJ says the letters do not mean the person is being charged and they are required to send them out."

FBI, DOJ Investigating Threats Against Jewish Community Centers.

CNN (2/16, Burke, 29.79M) reports online that the FBI and Justice Department say they are investigating the recent rash of threatening calls placed to 48 Jewish community centers across the country. The agencies are probing "possible civil rights violations in connection" with the threats, the FBI said in a statement. The calls, which conveyed bomb threats, affected Jewish organizations in 27 states and one Canadian province last month.

Continuing Coverage: Two Reputed New York Mobsters Charged With Murder, Racketeering.

The Putnam (NY) Daily Voice (2/15, Failla) reports in continuing coverage that New York men Christopher Londonio and Terrance Caldwell have been indicted on charges related to the 2013 murder of Michael Meldish in the Bronx and their alleged participation in mafia racketeering schemes. "Hollywood and popular fiction almost romanticize the mob, so much so the general public may not know it exists in real life anymore," said FBI New York Assistant Director in Charge William Sweeney, Jr. "However, the crimes members are accused of taking part in are violent and all too real for their victims. The men charged in this case allegedly committed murder, robbery, dealing illegal drugs and extortion to only name a few." Caldwell was additionally indicted in the shooting of a mob rival.

Continuing Coverage: FBI Seeking DC Child Sex Trafficking Suspect.

The Washington Post (2/15, Hedgpeth, 11.43M) reports in continuing coverage that the FBI is seeking a Washington, DC man believed to be involved with child sex trafficking. "The child exploitation task force in the FBI's Washington field office has an arrest warrant for Gary O'Neal Bell, 24. Official allege he has been offering an underage girl for sexual encounters over the past several months," the Post says. A $2,000 reward is being offered for information leading to Bell's arrest. The WTTG-TV Washington (2/15, 67K) website also continues coverage.

Key Witness Refuses To Testify In Case Against Former Utah AG.

KSL-TV Salt Lake City (2/15, 547K) reports online that Utah businessman Jeremy Johnson on Wednesday refused to testify at the trial of former Utah Attorney General John Swallow. A judge jailed Johnson for contempt of court after he informed her he intended to "invoke his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, even though the state extended him immunity," KSL says. "Losing Johnson would be a significant blow to the prosecution's case against Swallow" as "many of the state's charges are built around claims he has made." Swallow is charged with multiple felonies, including bribery, racketeering, and money laundering.

Judge Denies Motion To Dismiss Case Against Officer In Shooting Death.

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/15, Xiong, 1.27M) reports that "the criminal case against officer Jeronimo Yanez in the fatal shooting of Philando Castile will proceed to trial after a judge denied defense attorneys' attempt to dismiss the charges." Ramsey County District Judge William H. Leary III "heard oral arguments on the issue Wednesday morning, and filed his decision about 3:11 p.m. that afternoon, noting that whatever actions Castile may have taken did not exonerate Yanez, and that there was enough probable cause to move forward with the case."

Actor Testifies About Sex Trafficking At Senate Hearing.

USA Today (2/15, Jensen, 5.28M) reports that actor Ashton Kutcher on Wednesday testified at a senate hearing entitled, "Ending Modern Slavery: Building on Success." "I'm here today to defend the right to pursue happiness," Kutcher said at the start of his testimony. The actor, who is a co-founder of Thorn, an anti sex trafficking advocacy group, said he has met several victims though his work. "I've been on FBI raids where I've seen things that no person should ever see," said Kutcher. "I've seen video content of a child that's the same age as mine being raped by an American man that was a sex tourist in Cambodia." The Washington Post (2/15, Heil, 11.43M) reports, "Kutcher nearly broke into tears while describing his frustration at being unable to help the Department of Homeland Security locate a girl who was shown being raped on a video posted to the dark Web." The situation, he said, devastated him, because the girl may still be subject to abuse.

Roll Call (2/15, Gangitano, 63K) reports and The Hill (2/15, Chavez, 1.25M) report similarly.

Former Oklahoma Jailers Resentenced For Violating Inmates' Rights.

KFOR-TV Oklahoma City (2/15, 271K) reports from Muskogee, OK that "two former jailers at the Muskogee County Jail have been resentenced to longer terms in prison for violating the civil rights of inmates." Federal prosecutors said former jail superintendent Raymond Barnes, 46, was sentenced on Wednesday to two years in prison and former assistant superintendent Christopher Brown, 35, was sentenced to one year in prison. The two "were convicted in 2014 of assaulting inmates or instructing other jailers to assault the inmates." Barnes "was initially sentenced to one year in prison and Brown to six months in prison, but prosecutors appealed and the U.S. 10th Circuit Court of Appeals found the sentences 'unusually lenient' and ordered both men be resentenced."

2013 Poll: As Many As 2.1 Million Non-Citizen Hispanics May Be Illegally Registered To Vote.

The Washington Times (2/15, Scarborough, 272K) reports, "A large number of non-citizen Hispanics, as many as 2 million, were illegally registered to vote in the US, according to a nationwide poll. The National Hispanic Survey," which "was conducted in June 2013 by McLaughlin and Associates" offers "additional evidence for use by anti-voter fraud conservatives and bolsters an analysis by professors at Old Dominion University who say non-citizens registered and voted in potentially large numbers." In the poll, which had a "randomly selected sample of 800 Hispanics, 56 percent, or 448, said they were non-citizens, and of those, 13 percent said they were registered to vote." The Times adds that James Agresti, "who directs the research nonprofit 'Just Facts,' applied the 13 percent figure to 2013 US Census numbers for non-citizen Hispanic adults," and "calculated that the number of illegally registered Hispanics could range from 1.0 million to 2.1 million."

FINANCIAL CRIME & CORPORATE SCANDALS

FBI Posts Records On '70s Probe Of Alleged Trump Apartments' Race Discrimination.

Politico (2/15, Gerstein, 2.46M) reports that the FBI "has released nearly 400 pages of records on an investigation the bureau conducted in the 1970s into alleged racial discrimination in the rental of apartments from President Donald Trump's real estate company." The records "detail dozens of interviews the bureau conducted with Trump building tenants, management and employees, seeking indications that minority tenants were steered away from housing complexes." Politico added, "The records, posted on the FBI's Freedom of Information Act website, include a 1974 interview with a former doorman at a Trump building in Brooklyn. A supervisor 'told me that if a black person came to [the building] and inquired about an apartment for rent, and he, that is [redacted] was not there at the time, that I should tell him that the rent was twice as much as it really was, in order that he could not afford the apartment,' the ex-doorman said."

The Hill (2/15, Wilson, 1.25M) reports that the FBI probe, which was conducted from 1972 to 1974, "was part of one of the largest of such discrimination cases brought in that era. The Justice Department's Civil Rights Division ultimately filed a suit in 1973." Trump Management Co. countersued the government for $100 million in damages for alleged false accusations of discrimination. The government and the company eventually entered into a consent decree under which the company admitted no wrongdoing but took steps to prevent discriminatory practices. The Washington Post (2/15, Kranish, 11.43M) also reports on this story.

Indiana City Official Arrested, Charged With Fraud.

Indiana Public Media (2/15, 1K) reports that the FBI has arrested Muncie, Indiana building commissioner Craig Nichols, a month after investigators searched his home and office. "In a statement, the U.S. Attorney's office in Indianapolis says 38-year-old Craig Nichols has been indicted on charges of wire fraud, theft, and money laundering," IPM says. According to federal prosecutors, Nichols, used his city position to obtain work for his private contracting businesses. "Charges say he also billed Muncie for $376,000 of work the companies never actually undertook or completed at inflated prices," IPM says. The AP (2/15) reports that Nichols could face up to 20 years behind bars. The WRTV-TV Indianapolis (2/15, 76K) website reports similarly.

Florida Software Developer, New Jersey Pastor Stand Trial For Bitcoin Exchange.

Reuters (2/15, Raymond) reports from New York that "a Florida software engineer and a New Jersey pastor engaged in lies and corruption to facilitate an illegal bitcoin exchange business whose operators wanted to take over a small credit union to evade scrutiny, a federal prosecutor said on Wednesday." Reuters adds that "at the start of a trial in Manhattan federal court, Assistant U.S. Attorney Won Shin told jurors that programmer Yuri Lebedev schemed with others to bribe Trevor Gross, the pastor and head of a Jackson, New Jersey-based credit union housed in his church." Shin said Gross "accepted bribes including a $150,000 church donation in exchange for helping unlicensed bitcoin exchange Coin.mx's operator take over Helping Other People Excel Federal Credit Union."

Georgia Dentist Sentenced To 18 Months For Medicaid Fraud.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/15, Sharpe, 1.41M) reports Dr. Oluwatoyin Solarin, a dentist in Georgia, was sentenced to 18 months imprisonment for Medicaid fraud. Solarin was convicted of filing false claims worth almost $1 million from her dental practice in DeKalb and Gwinnett counties.

Man Dubbed "Porn's New King" Sentenced To 11 Years For Defrauding Investors.

The AP (2/15, Neumeister) reports from New York that "a Los Angeles man once dubbed 'Porn's New King' was sentenced to over 11 years in prison Wednesday by a judge who said he lived the high life with luxury homes on both coasts as he defrauded dozens of investors of tens of millions of dollars." Jason Galanis, 46, "insisted he has turned his life around before U.S. District Judge P. Kevin Castel imposed an 11-year, 3-month sentence, citing the loss of between $25 million and $65 million by 60 investors." Judge Castel said Galanis "had built his fortune with fraud 'either for the thrill of the game, being on top of the world in terms of the trappings of wealth, or for his own self-esteem and feelings of accomplishment.'"

Federal Agents Raid NYC's Friars Club In Possible Embezzlement Probe.

The AP (2/15, Hays) reports from New York that US Postal Service investigators "raided the legendary Friars Club after club members tipped off federal prosecutors to a possible embezzlement scheme at the place best known for celebrity roasts." The AP adds that "Postal Inspection Service spokeswoman Donna Harris confirmed Wednesday that agents served a search warrant earlier this week at the private wood-paneled club in midtown Manhattan." According to the AP, "some club members met during the fall over suspicions a higher-up was embezzling funds, said billionaire businessman John Catsimatidis, a former mayoral candidate and a Friar," and "concerns were strong enough that members decided they should report the alleged theft to the U.S. Attorney's office, he said."

US Charges Former BoNY Mellon Employee With Embezzlement.

Reuters (2/15) reports from New York that "a former Bank of New York Mellon Corp employee was arrested on Wednesday on charges that he embezzled $7.1 million, money he used to buy among other things an outdoor pool, home landscaping, vacations and a luxury car." Christopher Canale, "who worked for Bank of New York's Pershing LLC unit most recently as an accounts payable manager, was charged in a criminal complaint filed in Manhattan federal court."

Attorney: Feds Investigating Sexual Harassment Payments By Fox News.

The Los Angeles Times (2/15, Battaglio, 4.52M) reports that federal prosecutors are "exploring whether Fox News settlement payments for sexual harassment claims should have been reported to the shareholders of parent company 21st Century Fox." Fox News said in a statement issued on Wednesday "that it has been in discussions with" the Manhattan US Attorney's office "for months" in regard to the matter, "adding that no one in the company has been subpoenaed by federal prosecutors." According to the Times, "the information first surfaced during a court hearing in which Judd Burstein, the attorney for Fox News personality Andrea Tantaros, said another one of his clients had recently been subpoenaed to discuss the matter."

The New York Times (2/15, Steel, Koblin, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that Burstein said in a text message to the Times that "he believed federal investigators were looking at whether Fox News structured sexual harassment settlement claims by paying them out in salaries, 'so as not to have to report them.'" Burstein "added that the prosecutors had identified themselves as being from a securities fraud division of the United States attorney's office in Manhattan." The Times adds that Burstein "made the remarks while he was arguing that Ms. Tantaros's case – she sued the network in August, accusing Fox News of retaliation after she complained about sexual harassment – should go forward in an open court." The Times notes that a judge "rejected that claim on Wednesday and ruled that her case would be resolved in arbitration."

The Washington Post (2/15, Wemple, 11.43M) reports in its "Erik Wemple" blog that Tantaros "claimed that Ailes made offensive comments about her and otherwise mistreated her, all with the complicity of his lieutenants." Fox News "responded to Tantaros's complaint by seeking to steer it into an arbitration proceeding under the supervision of the American Arbitration Association (AAA) – the better to keep it out of the sunshine of the civil justice system," and "the network also alleged that the real reason for Tantaros's fall from grace at Fox News was that she failed to comply with the network's book guidelines for 'Tied Up in Knots: How Getting What We Wanted Made Women Miserable.'"

Reuters (2/15, Wiessner) reports that "tt was not clear how the investigation could be tied to securities fraud," as "federal securities law requires companies to report legal settlements, including in sexual harassment cases, to the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission."

The New York Daily News (2/15, Brown, 4.45M) reports that Burstein said in court, "I was told by the U.S. attorney's office there is an ongoing criminal investigation, relating to these allegations, all of these allgations ... I believe I have a racketeering case here, and extortion." Reuters notes that "an attorney from Fox News said the network had not received a subpoena but would comply with one if it did."

USA Today (2/15, Snider, 5.28M) reports that Tantaros' sexual harassment suit "came a month after Gretchen Carlson, another former Fox News broadcaster, sued Ailes for sexual harassment, claiming he opted not to renew her contract after she refused to sleep with him." USA adds that "21st Century Fox settled the case, agreeing to pay Carlson $20 million," and Ailes, "who denied the allegations, left the company in July with a $40 million settlement. Fox also conducted an internal investigation." Fox News host Megyn Kelly, "who left the network in January for NBC, said Ailes had harassed her starting in 2005 in her book Settle for More. Fox, which is controlled by billionaire mogul Rupert Murdoch, has settled other claims, the network has confirmed." The Wall Street Journal (2/15, Hong, Flint, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) and Variety (2/15, 492K) also report.

Yahoo Warning Users Of "Potentially Malicious Activity" On Accounts Between 2015 And 2016.

The AP (2/15) reports, "Yahoo is warning users of potentially malicious activity on their accounts between 2015 and 2016, the latest development in the internet company's investigation of a mega-breach that exposed 1 billion users' data several years ago." Yahoo has confirmed it is notifying users of a potential compromise of their accounts, though it declined to state how many were affected. In a statement, the company "tied some of the potential compromises to what it has described as the 'state-sponsored actor' responsible for the theft of private data from more than 1 billion user accounts in 2013 and 2014."

The Guardian (UK) (2/15, 4.07M) reports the company "would not name the state." The Guardian adds, "Security experts have pointed to Russia and China as the usual suspects for these kinds of attacks, although some have questioned whether Yahoo would be a target."

Twitter Argues For Right To Disclose More Specific Details On NSLs.

The Washington Times (2/15, Blake, 272K) reports that attorneys for Twitter on Tuesday told a federal judge "that the Justice Department is violating the company's right to free speech by barring it from stating the specific number of surveillance requests it has received from the government." The lawyers, the Times says, "sounded off inside an Oakland courthouse...amid a years-long legal battle brought by Twitter in a bid to provide precise statistics regarding the number of national security letters its received." In 2014, Twitter sued the Justice Department over rules mandating companies disclose the number of NSLs they receive only in bands of 1000, beginning with 0-999. Twitter attorney Lee Rubin argued in court that reporting specific numbers could not harm national security. However, Justice Department attorney Julia Berman countered by saying that FBI officials believe possible adversaries could benefit from knowing more precise numbers.

Former AAG Carlin Warns Europe About Election Hacking.

Reuters (2/15, Volz) reports from San Francisco that former Assistant Attorney General John Carlin "said European countries must be willing to respond forcefully to efforts by Russia or others to use cyber attacks to meddle in their elections, saying the U.S. response fell short." Carlin, "who ran the national security division at the Justice Department and oversaw the pursuit of cyber criminals, said the United States did not do enough to deter the hacking and leaking of Democratic Party emails during the 2016 presidential campaign. 'What we did was too late,' Carlin said during a panel discussion on election hacking at the RSA cybersecurity conference. 'We weren't bringing deterrence at all to the table.'"

French President Requests Briefing On Measures To "Fend Off Cyber Interference" In Upcoming Election.

Bloomberg Politics (2/15, 201K) reports French President Francois Hollande has requested "a full briefing on what is being done to fend off cyber interference in the 2017 presidential race." The request "comes after independent candidate Emmanuel Macron reported repeated cyber-attacks on his campaign and blaming Russian interference," an accusation Kremlin spokesman Dmitry Peskov is quoted as calling "absurd."

Reuters (2/15) quotes from a statement from Hollande's office: "The President wants to see presented to him at the next council meeting some specific monitoring and protection measures, including in the cyber domain, to be taken during the election campaign."

The AP (2/15) reports Macron's head of digital campaigning, Mounir Mahjoubi, "told The Associated Press that his team identified thousands of hacking attempts originating from Ukraine in recent weeks" that "coincided with what he called a fake news operation targeting Macron in Russia-sponsored media in France." The AP adds, "Macron's leading rivals, Francois Fillon and Marine Le Pen, want to lift sanctions against Russia, while Macron has been less friendly toward Moscow."

Another Reuters (2/15) article reports, "France said on Wednesday it would not accept interference by Russia or any other state in its presidential election, and would retaliate if necessary." The Kremlin "said on Tuesday that allegations made by Macron's En Marche (Onwards!) movement were absurd."

In Presentation On Cybersecurity, US Army Depicted Hillary Clinton "As Insider Threat."

The Washington Times (2/15, Scarborough, 272K) reports that the US Army "depicted former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton as an insider threat in a Powerpoint presentation to soldiers on cyber security." A picture of Clinton was "depicted along with...Food Hood assassin Maj. Nidal Hassan, Navy Yard shooter Aaron Alexis, major leakers Chelsea Manning and Edward Snowden, and retired Army Gen. David Petraeus," who "provided classified logs to his biographer and girlfriend." The Times adds, "The insider threat lecture was delivered to soldiers at Fort Leonard Wood in Missouri." The report doesn't say when the lecture was given.

Young: Private Sector, Government Must Work Together To Address IoT Security Vulnerabilities.

Intel Security Group senior vice president and general manager Chris Young writes in the Christian Science Monitor (2/15, 387K), "All around us is proof that the newest persistent threat in cybersecurity – and perhaps the most pernicious – is data manipulation." Young argues that "the weaponization of data at the micro level is a serious challenge," and the "amorphous corporate boundary" between company and personal information assets "means enterprise security as we used to think about it...is as good as dead." Young adds, "Prime attack surfaces are now the personal car, the coffee shop or airport, and especially the home network, where many IoT devices are shockingly exposed to attack." Young says the "IoT-powered home is exactly where we now see the biggest opportunity...for greater data integrity." Young calls on private-sector competitors and the government to "work as a dream team, with urgency, to address today's alarming patchwork of small-bore digital vulnerabilities and inspire more confidence."

Cooper: Cybersecurity Executive Order Must Account For Workforce, White House Leadership.

Dr. Betsy Cooper of the UC Berkeley Center for Long-Term Cybersecurity writes in The Hill's (2/15, Cooper, Contributor, 1.25M) Congress Blog, "Since the first draft of the cyber [executive order] was leaked on Jan. 31, updated drafts and political grandstanding have caused the signing of this extremely important measure to be delayed twice – and have shifted focus away from important issues in the process." Cooper notes the first draft proposed a cybersecurity workforce development review "totally missing from the most recent version," a "disappointing" change. Cooper also says that "top technology positions remain unfilled," while appointments such as Rudy Giuliani as cyber advisor "fall completely outside traditional White House structures." Cooper argues, "The vacuum at the top...will make it difficult to develop a comprehensive cybersecurity strategy." Cooper concludes, "Unless the final version takes account of our need to grow both the cyber workforce and our White House leadership in this area, more remains to be done."

McCaul: "We Are Not Winning" Cybersecurity Fight.

eWeek (2/15, 668K) reports House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Michael McCaul "didn't mince words to describe threats to the country's cyber-security" in a keynote address at the RSA security conference in San Francisco. McCaul is quoted saying, "To be brutally honest, we are in the fight of our digital lives, and we are not winning," and he described threats from Russia, China, and terrorists. McCaul "said cyber-terrorism and other digital threats are particularly challenging because there has never been a weapon like it that is so adaptable and expensive to defend against." McCaul argues for deterrence, and "said the sanctions imposed on Russia for hacking in the U.S. election is a perfect example." McCaul "also urged companies and governments to do more to cooperate with each other on sharing information on security threats and intrusions."

Tibken: One Year After FBI, Apple Privacy Standoff, Issue Persists.

Shara Tibken writes for CNET News (2/15, Tibken, 762K) that a year after the FBI sought information from a San Bernardino shooter's phone, the issues at the core of the dispute between the FBI and Apple have yet to be resolved. Tibken writes that Apple and others continue to tighten security, privacy, and encryption measures and companies have had their own clashes with law enforcement – like requests for "access to data stored in [Microsoft and Google's] cloud services" and murder investigators seeking recordings from Amazon's Echo. Tibken says Trump's Administration is the "wildcard" in the situation given his projected tough stance.

Idaho Secretary Of State: DHS May Have Tried To Penetrate State Election Website.

The Idaho Statesman (2/15, 197K) reports Idaho Secretary of State Lawerence Denney says DHS may have attempted to penetrate Idaho's election website "around the Nov. 8 presidential election" without giving state officials advance notice. Denney is quoted saying, "I don't know what they penetrated, or what they tried, I just know their IP address showed up as hitting our website. ... I don't know what they were doing. It would have been nice if they had told us." Denney "said the Idaho incident was limited to the state's public election website, which doesn't contain any sensitive voter information." The Statesman adds, "A DHS spokesman said the department planned to study the Idaho incident specifically, but did not have an explanation Tuesday."

GAO Head: Federal Legacy Systems Pose Hindrance To Improved Agency Cybersecurity.

MeriTalk (2/15) reports, "The preponderance of legacy systems in the Federal government poses a major obstacle to improved agency cybersecurity practices, according to Gene Dodaro, Comptroller General of the United States and head of the Government Accountability Office." Dodaro is quoted saying before the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, "There's a lot of legacy systems, old systems where they just can't keep up with patching things. ... Despite the breaches that have occurred most recently, there's more attention being given to this area but not enough."

US Steel Withdraws Claim Against Alleged Cybertheft Of Intellectual Property.

The Wall Street Journal (2/15, Mauldin, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports US Steel is withdrawing an intellectual property claim that Chinese hackers stole a recipe for high-tech steel. The company is cited saying it will continue to press claims on alleged antitrust violations. The Journal says the move demonstrates the challenges US firms face in fighting cyberespionage, and is a setback for a case trade lawyers hoped to be precedent-setting.

Russian Group Linked To Democratic Party Hack Reportedly Releases Macintosh Malware.

CNET News (2/15, 762K) reports, "The same Russian hackers who were linked to the hacking of the US Democratic National Committee have now turned their attention to Apple's Macintosh computers." CNET adds, "APT28 has released new Xagent malware that creates backdoors into Macs, letting the hackers steal browser passwords, grab screenshots and nab iPhone backups stored on the computer, according to Romanian security software company Bitdefender." Bitdefender is quoted saying, "Currently we don't know what are the targeted organizations, but the links to the APT28 cybercrime group are obvious: The use of the same dropper/ downloader and similar command and control center URLs, as well as sine artifacts hardcoded in the binary files."

LAW ENFORCEMENT SERVICES

Lawmakers Seek To Require Warrants For Use Of "Stingrays."

USA Today (2/15, Kelly, 5.28M) reports, "A bipartisan group of House and Senate lawmakers introduced legislation Wednesday requiring police agencies to get a search warrant before they can deploy powerful cellphone surveillance technology known as 'stingrays' that sweep up information about the movements of innocent Americans while tracking suspected criminals." The legislation, known as the Geolocation Privacy and Surveillance (GPS) Act, would require warrants of all domestic law enforcement agencies that hope to track individuals via GPS technology. "It also aims to combat high-tech stalking by creating criminal penalties for secretly using an electronic device to track someone's movements." USA Today notes.

DNC Member Takes Aim At Comey With Resolution Condemning TV Show.

The Hill (2/15, Savranky, 1.25M) reports in its "Blog Briefing Room" blog that "A Democratic National Committee (DNC) member appears to be mocking FBI Director James Comey with a resolution admonishing the TV show 'Designated Survivor.'" The resolution, to be considered this month, "describes the show as focused on a fictional FBI director 'being blackmailed into confessing to a crime he did not commit.'" The resolution states, "The portrayal of this situation is unbelievable and could result in the undermining of faith in the FBI." The resolution then criticizes Comey, saying he "demonstrated in the recent 2016 election that he does not need to be blackmailed to engage in illegal partisan actions." The resolution, the International Business Times (2/15, Kreiter, 814K) reports, "targets Comey's actions 10 days before the Nov. 8 election in which he first announced the investigation into Democrat Hillary Clinton's private email server after investigators found some emails from her aide, Huma Abedin, on a computer she shared with her ex-husband Anthony Weiner."

Vanity Fair (2/15, 6.22M) and the Huffington Post (2/15, Linkins, 237K) also report on this story.

OTHER WASHINGTON NEWS

Coalition Of Civil Rights Groups Calls On Senators To Oppose Gorsuch.

The Washington Times (2/15, Swoyer, 272K) reports that more than 100 civil rights groups led by the Leadership Conference on Civil and Human Rights signed a letter to senators imploring them to oppose Supreme Court nominee Neil Gorsuch, "saying they feared he would work to cut off their access to the courts." The letter referred to "a 2005 National Review article where the federal circuit judge criticized 'American liberals' as having an 'addiction to the courtroom.'" The advocates said "those comments showed a 'hostility to the use of courts by discrimination victims.'"

McConnell: Gorsuch "Single Most Outstanding Circuit Judge In America." Senate Majority Leader McConnell said on MSNBC's Morning Joe  (2/15, 270K), "I think the Supreme Court nominee was superb. I think [President Trump] picked the single most outstanding circuit judge in America to be on Supreme Court." Asked if he will have to resort to the nuclear option to confirm Gorsuch, McConnell said, "That will depend on the Democrats. ... He'll be confirmed."

Senate Votes 57-43 To Overturn Rule Barring Gun Ownership By Mentally Impaired.

USA Today (2/15, Gaudiano, 5.28M) reports that the Senate voted 57-43 on Wednesday "to overturn a rule barring gun ownership for some who have been deemed mentally impaired, clearing the measure for President Trump's signature." The rule "required the Social Security Administration to send records of some beneficiaries to the National Instant Criminal Background Check System after they've been deemed incapable of managing their financial affairs because of a disabling mental disorder, ranging from anxiety to schizophrenia." It was opposed by both Second Amendment advocates and disabled rights groups. The Washington Times (2/15, Sherfinski, 272K) reports that Democrats countered that the rule "was carefully tailored so that only people who were so incapacitated that they had someone else receive their payments for them would be considered." No Republican voted to retain the rule; Democratic Sens. Joe Donnelly, Heidi Heitkamp, Joe Manchin, Jon Tester, and Democratic-causing independent Sen. Angus King voted to overturn it.

In an editorial, the New York Times (2/15, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says Republicans "have managed to act with lightning speed" to strike down the "sensible Obama administration rule." Trump is expected to sign the regressive measure "despite the Republican mantra that tighter control of mentally troubled individuals – not stronger gun control – is the better way to deal with the mass shootings and gun carnage that regularly afflict the nation." The Hill (2/15, Carney, 1.25M) also reports on this story.

AP Analysis: Trump White House "Beset By A Crush Of Crises."

The AP (2/15, Lemire) reports that President Trump's "White House is beset by a crush of crises. Divisions, dysfunction and high-profile exits have left the young administration nearly paralyzed and allies wondering how it will reboot." The AP says that "controversy has forced out both his top national security aide and his pick for labor secretary," and "Republicans have begun voicing their frustration and open anxiety that the Trump White House will derail their high hopes for legislative action." For example, Sen. John Thune (R-SD) "demanded Wednesday that the White House 'get past the launch stage,'" adding, "There are things we want to get done here, and we want to have a clear-eyed focus on our agenda, and this constant disruption and drumbeat with these questions that keep being raised is a distraction."

SOCOM Chief: US Government In "Unbelievable Turmoil." The CBS Evening News (2/15, story 5, 0:25, Pelley, 11.17M) reported that Gen. Raymond Thomas, head of US Special Operations Command, told a military conference this week that the US government "continues to be in unbelievable turmoil." ABC World News Tonight (2/15, lead story, 5:20, Muir, 14.63M) said Thomas added, "I hope they sort it out soon because we're a nation at war."

Conservative Talk Radio Remains In Trump's Corner. The New York Times (2/15, Tavernise, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that President Trump has suffered through "a tough week" that saw "the resignation of his national security adviser and the revelation that his campaign aides and other associates had repeated contacts with Russian intelligence officials." However, "if his supporters on the right were beginning to doubt him, there was no sign of it on conservative talk radio, where Mr. Trump's contention that he was a victim of leaks and entrenched Washington insiders" was a hot topic. For example, The Times quotes Rush Limbaugh as saying on Wednesday, "There is no evidence for the primary assertion that is driving this entire attack on Trump," adding, "This attack is coming from the shadows of the deep state, where former Obama employees remain in the intelligence community."

Rove: Time Running Out For Trump Administration To Get Things Under Control. Karl Rove writes in his Wall Street Journal (2/15, Rove, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) column that the Trump Administration is off to a rocky start and time is running out for them to get things under control. Doing so, he argues, will require disciplined leadership from Trump.

Blumenthal Wants To "Clarify And Strengthen" Amendment On Removing Presidents. The AP (2/15, Jalonick) reports, "Perhaps in a bit of wishful thinking," Rep. Earl Blumenthal (D-OR) "says he plans to form a working group to 'clarify and strengthen' the 25th Amendment of the US Constitution, which lays out presidential succession and the steps the executive branch can take to remove a president from office." The Democrat "says he's initiating this effort in response to Republican Donald Trump's presidency, even though there have been no signs of an effort to remove him." Blumenthal, in a statement, said, "Like many people, I've noticed a renewed interest in the 25th Amendment as we've seen erratic behavior out of the White House."

GOP Former Ohio Judge: "Trump Must Be Impeached." In a Tuesday Cincinnati

Enquirer (2/14, 511K) op-ed that appeared (2/15, Painter, 5.28M) Wednesday on the website of USA Today, former Ohio Judge Mark P. Painter wrote, "I am a lifelong Republican. I voted for every Republican presidential candidate from 1968 to 2004. But I have watched what once was a sane, center-right party go off the rails, first to the extreme right, then to wherever [President] Trump is, which is in another universe. It's tough, but we must end this dangerous presidency. Trump must be impeached and removed with all haste."

Dionne: Trump "Unfit" To Be President. In his Washington Post (2/15, 11.43M), E.J. Dionne continues his steady drumbeat of criticism of Trump, asking, "What is this democratic nation to do when the man serving as president...plainly has no business being president of the United States? The Michael Flynn fiasco was the entirely predictable product of the indiscipline, deceit, incompetence and moral indifference that characterize Donald Trump's approach to leadership." Moreover, the President's "loyalties are now in doubt," says Dionne, calling for "a transparent investigation into what ties Trump has with Putin's Russia – and who on his campaign did what, and when, with Russian intelligence officials and diplomats." Dionne adds, "Isn't it rash to declare [Trump] unfit after so little time? The answer is no, because the Trump we are seeing now is fully consistent with the vindictive, self-involved and scattered man we saw during the 17 months of his campaign."

Emba: "Trump Brand Seems Less Attractive Than Ever." In a Washington Post (2/15, 11.43M) column, Christine Emba, who edits The Post's "In Theory" blog, says that "despite the fact that it now commands a presidential seal, the Trump brand seems less attractive than ever." Emba points out, for example, that "Nordstrom, Neiman Marcus and even discount retailers such as Kmart are dropping daughter Ivanka's fashion line." Moreover, says Emba, "The narrative beneath the Trump brand is crumbling. ... Trump built his brand on getting things done that no one else could. ... Winning, first and foremost." However, "what happens when a brand built on winning starts to lose?"

Maryland Lawmakers Approve Attorney General's Authority To Sue Trump. According to the Washington Post (2/15, Hicks, 11.43M), Maryland's General Assembly voted along party lines Wednesday to approve a blanket authorization for state Attorney General Brian Frosh to sue the federal government, which Republican Governor Larry Hogan cannot veto. The Post reports this is one of a series of measures Maryland Democrats have pushed forward in response to President Trump's policies, including setting aside funds to protect its residents from "harmful" federal actions and proposing a ban on local law enforcement's compliance with federal immigration laws.

INTERNATIONAL NEWS

US No Longer Advocating Two-State Solution To Israeli-Palestinian Conflict.

Media coverage reflected unfavorably on the President's remarks on Middle East peace during a joint press conference Wednesday with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, casting them as a break with US policy in the region. Outlets say the President backed away from US support for a two-state solution – a move that was immediately criticized by the Palestinians and the UN Secretary-General.

ABC World News Tonight  (2/15, story 4, 2:10, Muir, 14.63M) said the President made "controversial statements on the search for peace in the Middle East...breaking with longstanding US policy on a two-state solution." Margaret Brennan said on the CBS Evening News  (2/15, story 4, 1:30, Pelley, 11.17M) that the President "broke with two decades of US policy today, saying he would not insist on a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict." The Wall Street Journal (2/15, Paletta, Lee, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) quotes the President as saying, "I'm looking at two-state and one-state and I like the one that both parties like. I'm very happy with the one that both parties like. I can live with either one."

The Washington Times (2/15, Miller, 272K) calls the remarks a "jarring deviation from the longtime US position that the creation of a separate Palestinian state was fundamental to a Middle East peace deal." The AP (2/15, Salama) reports Trump is "charting a striking new course for the Middle East" by withholding "clear support for an independent Palestine," and the New York Times

(2/15, Baker, Landler, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says the comments "were a striking departure from two decades of diplomatic orthodoxy, and they raised a host of thorny questions about the viability of his position." The Palestinians are "highly unlikely to accept anything short" of statehood, and "a single Israeli state encompassing the Palestinians" would become "either become undemocratic or no longer Jewish, given the faster growth rate of the Arab population." But the President "did not address these dynamics, preferring to focus on his confidence that he could" – in his own words – "make a deal" that "might be a better and better deal than people in this room even understand."

Not everyone agreed with this line of analysis. Sen. Jeff Flake said on CNN's The Lead (2/15, 320K), "My take is with regard to the two or one-state solution, President Trump seemed to be simply saying that they will accept whatever the parties negotiate and those parties are Israel and Palestinians. That's been the long-held position that the United States has had. So, I don't think that that's a break from the past."

Calling his remarks a "significant departure from past US policy," meanwhile, the Washington Post (2/15, A1, Gearan, Eglash, 11.43M) says Trump "confidently predicted that he can help broker an end to the decades-long Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and started the negotiations immediately." Speaking to reporters, Trump said, "I would like to see a deal be made. I think a deal will be made. I know that every president would like to. Most of them have not started until late, because they never thought it was possible, and it wasn't possible because they didn't do it." The Post notes he have "no timetable...but suggested it will come soon."

Reuters (2/15, Baker, Spetalnick) likewise says Trump "offered no new prescription for achieving an accord that has eluded so many of his predecessors." He also "dropp[ed] a bombshell on Netanyahu as they faced reporters," saying, "I'd like to see you pull back on settlements for a little bit." On NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 3, 2:35, Holt, 16.61M), Andrea Mitchell also said the President dropped a "bombshell...on Netanyahu," who "gave no commitments." Bloomberg Politics (2/15, Talev, 201K) too said Netanyahu was "noncommittal," and USA Today (2/15, Korte, Jackson, 5.28M) says he "downplayed the significance of the issue." AFP (2/15) says the Israeli leader, however, "hammered home his own prerequisites for peace," saying, "First, the Palestinians must recognize the Jewish state. They have to stop calling for Israel's destruction. Second, in any peace agreement, Israel must retain the overriding security control over the entire area west of the Jordan River."

A Los Angeles Times (2/15, 4.52M) editorial says the President "casually demolished a pillar of US foreign policy under both Democratic and Republican administrations," claiming "to know better." On its editorial page, the Washington Post (2/15, 11.43M) similarly says Trump "signaled a dangerous retreat from the Middle East policy that Republican as well as Democratic presidents have pursued for the past two decades." The Post says that "to his credit, Mr. Trump did seek to check Mr. Netanyahu in one area: settlements." If he "really wants to broker a deal," the Post argues that "he should start by pressing Mr. Netanyahu for such a commitment."

Responding to Trump's remarks, the Washington Post (2/15, Booth, 11.43M) reports, Palestinian officials "pleaded with the White House...not to abandon the two-state solution." The Palestinian leadership "appeared stunned" that an Administration official told reporters in Washington late Tuesday that the White House was open to a new approach that does not emphasize two states. The New York Times (2/15, Fisher, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) likewise says Palestinians "reacted with anger and bafflement" after Trump's remarks. Chief negotiator Saeb Erekat raised the specter of "apartheid" and called for "concrete measures in order to save the two-state solution."

Reuters (2/15) reports UN Secretary-General Antonio Guterres also warned against abandoning the idea of a two-state solution, saying there was "no alternative." During a visit to Cairo, the UN chief said, "There is no alternative solution for the situation between the Palestinians and Israelis, other than the solution of establishing two states, and we should do all that can be done to maintain this." An AP (2/15, Perry) analysis similarly says the "alternatives are few, and each comes with daunting and combustible complications, including for Israel itself."

Netanyahu: Trump Right Leader To Defeat Radical Islam. The Washington Times (2/15, Miller, 272K) reports that at yesterday's press conference, Netanyahu "said President Trump was the right leader to defeat radical Islamic terrorism." Said the Israeli leader, "Under your leadership I believe we can reverse the rising tide of radical Islam." He also commended Trump for showing "great courage in confronting this threat head-on."

Trump Called Only On Conservative Outlets During Press Conference. Politico (2/15, Gold, 2.46M) reports in its "On Media" blog that the President on Wednesday "continued his streak of calling only on conservative-leaning outlets" during his press conferences with Netanyahu. Trump called on David Brody of the Christian Broadcasting Network and Katie Pavlich, the editor of TownHall.com. Politico says the result of his "selection of questioners was that some of the most urgent questions of the day continued to go unanswered," including former National Security Advisor Flynn's contacts with Russia.

David Nakamura of the Washington Post (2/15, 11.43M), meanwhile, considers the differences in news conferences between the previous and current presidents, writing that they used to be "a chance to hear from Professor Obama, the long-winded lecturer in chief who expounded on domestic politics and international relations with nuance, depth, range and, most of all, a lot of words." Under President Trump, "joint news conferences with foreign leaders are brisker affairs. He is not interested in filibustering answers to run out the clock, the way Obama did, but prefers racing through them in a mix of simplistic declarative sentences, ad-libs and non sequiturs."

First Lady Visits African American History Museum With Sara Netanyahu. The AP (2/15) reports that the First Lady visited the National Museum of African American History and Culture with Sara Netanyahu on Wednesday. They "were led on a tour by David Skorton, secretary of the Smithsonian, and Lonnie Bunch, the museum's founding director." The Hill (2/15, Shelbourne, 1.25M) reports that the two "reportedly spent several minutes on the last stop of the tour, which was in the room with a waterfall that features quotes on the wall from figures such as Nelson Mandela and poet Frances Harper."

The Daily Mail (2/15, Spargo, 4.59M) reports that before the museum visit, the First Lady "greeted her guests with a kiss and the group exchanged pleasantries while posing for some photos before going inside for the President and Prime Minister's news conference. Once inside, Melania sat next to Ivanka, who attended the early afternoon event with her husband, Jared Kushner." Us Weekly (2/15, Chen, 5.35M) reports that it was Melania Trump's "first official White House appearance" since the inauguration. Vogue (2/15, Barsamian, 3.53M) and Women's Wear Daily (2/15, Feitelberg, 67K) report that the First Lady wore an exclusive Karl Lagerfeld outfit.

CNN (2/15, Bennett, 29.79M) reports on its website that the First Lady "has interacted with Sara Netanyahu before, as recently as November, when the Prime Minister posted on his Facebook page details of a call between his wife and the then-first lady-elect."

Tillerson's Absence During Trump's Meetings With Foreign Leaders Noted. The New York Times (2/15, Harris, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that Secretary of State Tillerson was "conspicuously absent" during Trump's meeting with Netanyahu. Tillerson, it notes, "also missed two other important occasions in Washington this week: a lunch with Russia's ambassador and Mr. Trump's meetings with the prime minister of Canada." Instead, Tillerson relied on acting Deputy Secretary Thomas A. Shannon Jr., "a holdover from the Obama administration, to be his stand-in for the meetings this week."

Pompeo, Abbas Hold Talks In West Bank. The CBS Evening News (2/15, story 4, 1:30, Pelley, 11.17M) reported CIA Director Pompeo "met secretly" with the Palestinians "for the first time." According to the AP (2/15, Laub), Pompeo and President Mahmoud Abbas "met secretly...in the West Bank" on Tuesday, Palestinian officials said. The White House and the CIA "declined comment" on the meeting.

McClatchy Analysis: Kushner To Fill Void Left By Flynn's Departure. McClatchy (2/15, Ordoñez, Hall, 74K) reports this week's "sudden resignation" of National Security Adviser Flynn has left "a leadership void on Middle East issues that President Donald Trump's son-in-law, Jared Kushner, looks poised to fill."

Former Ambassadors: Friedman "Unqualified" To Serve As Ambassador. The AP (2/15, Lardner) reports that five former US ambassadors to Israel said Wednesday that President Trump's nominee for the post, David Friedman, "is unqualified and are urging senators to carefully consider his nomination." In a letter sent to members of the Foreign Relations Committee, the former diplomats said Friedman has staked out "extreme, radical positions" and has derided the two-state solution as an "illusory" fix. "We believe the committee should satisfy itself that Mr. Friedman has the balance and the temperament required to represent the United States as ambassador to Israel," they wrote. In an interview with NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 4, 2:10, Holt, 16.61M), founder of the Beit El settlement in the West Bank and Prime Minister Netanyahu's brother-in-law, Hagi Ben-Artzi, said, "There was no President who appointed an ambassador to Israel who is a real supporter of the settlements, never." NBC noted that Friedman has helped raise "millions" for Beit El.

Fatah Selects New Deputy Leader. Reuters (2/15, Sawafta, Al-Mughrabi) reports Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas's Fatah party on Wednesday chose a deputy leader, "but it was unclear whether Mahmoud Al-Aloul would also be favorite to succeed him as president." Aloul, a "close Abbas confidant," is the first deputy leader appointed since Fatah's founding in the 1960s.

CNN Report: Pentagon May Recommend Deployment Of US Combat Troops In Syria.

CNN's Situation Room (2/15, 554K) reported the Pentagon could propose to send conventional US ground troops into northern Syria to "speed up the fight against ISIS." Barbara Starr said that "it is not a done deal yet, but what we do know is the Pentagon is looking at the idea." Starr noted that the ground troops would be on top of the special forces and trainers already stationed in Syria.

US, Allies To Hold Syria Talks Friday.

Reuters (2/15, Irish) reports that on the sidelines of G20 talks in Germany on Friday, the foreign ministers of "countries opposed to Syrian President Bashar al-Assad" will meet to "seek common ground ahead of UN-backed peace talks in Geneva next week." A "senior French diplomatic source" said, "It's urgent to meet to see whether all the like-minded countries are on the same page," adding that the talks between the US, France, Britain, Turkey and Saudi Arabia and others would be the first opportunity to "test" Secretary of State Tillerson's position on Syria.

Elsewhere on Wednesday, the AP (2/15, Issa) reports UN special envoy Staffan de Mistura said negotiating a political transition "will be the sole item on the agenda" for the upcoming talks in Geneva. De Mistura "emphatically rejected any change to the agenda," saying it would open a "Pandora's box."

Astana Talks Delayed, Delegations Downgraded. Reuters (2/15) reports that the start of Syria talks in Astana "has been delayed by a day after the late arrival of Syrian rebel negotiators, who have decided to only send a group technical experts after threatening to boycott the meeting, sources and the delegation said." UN special envoy Staffan de Mistura also "said he would not attend the talks and Turkey also sent a lower-level delegation than" it sent to an earlier round of talks last month.

New Rebel Offensive In Southern Syria Threatens Cease-Fire.

The Washington Post (2/15, Loveluck, 11.43M) reports that a cease-fire brokered by Turkey and Russia two months ago "is fraying along Syria's southern border as rebel forces launch their largest offensive in the area in more than a year." According to "monitors, activists and an aid group," fighting between opposition and pro-government forces "raged for a fourth day Wednesday in the southern city of Daraa, pushing the number of dead and wounded past 60." In what the Post calls "an unusual development for Syria's knotty conflict," the rebel offensive in Daraa "appeared to have been launched without international support."

US, Arab Allies Explore Military Coalition To Counter Iran.

The Wall Street Journal (2/15, Abi-Habib, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports the Trump Administration is in talks with Arab allies, including Saudi Arabia and the UAE, about forming a military alliance that would share intelligence with Israel to counter Iran. According to officials involved in the talks, the alliance would also include Egypt and Jordan, which have longstanding peace treaties with Israel. The AP (2/15), meanwhile, reports Iranian President Hassan Rouhani met with the leaders of Oman and Kuwait on Wednesday "as part of a two-state visit aimed at repairing ties with Iran's Gulf Arab neighbors."

Mattis To NATO Allies: Pay More Or US Will "Moderate Its Commitment."

NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 5, 1:25, Holt, 16.61M) reported President Trump "is facing a series of early tests from a country led by a leader he has repeatedly praised" amid "several provocative actions by Russia involving the US in the air and at sea." The Russian aggression remains a "key concern" for NATO members, who were presented "an ultimatum" by Defense Secretary Mattis: "Pay up or America will 'moderate its commitment' to NATO." The AP (2/15, Baldor) also calls his remarks "an ultimatum to America's allies," but Reuters (2/15, Emmott, Stewart) says Mattis "stopped short of issuing an explicit ultimatum or say how the United States might moderate its support." The Washington Post (2/15, Birnbaum, 11.43M) calls Mattis' remarks "a harsh threat to countries that have been struggling with anemic growth and high unemployment."

In comments the New York Times (2/15, Cooper, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says "give teeth to President Trump's expressed skepticism about the alliance," Mattis said, "Americans cannot care more for your children's future security than you do. I owe it to you to give you clarity on the political reality in the United States and to state the fair demand from my country's people in concrete terms." Politico (2/15, Herszenhorn, 2.46M) calls his remarks "a stark warning delivered on behalf of...Trump."

Mattis' comments came as Fox News' Special Report (2/15, 1.53M) reported that the "Pentagon and NATO are concerned" about reports Russia has deployed "nuclear capable cruise missiles in violation of a treaty between Moscow and Washington." The AP (2/15) reports NATO Secretary-General Jens Stoltenberg Wednesday the alliance "would be concerned" if the reports "prove true." Stoltenberg said "compliance with arms control agreements is of great importance and especially when it comes to treaties covering nuclear weapons." He warned that "any non-compliance of Russia with the INF Treaty would be a serious concern for the alliance."

Tillerson In Germany On His First Overseas Trip.

The AP (2/15, Lee) reports Secretary of State Tillerson "has his work cut out for him" on his first overseas trip as America's top diplomat this week, expected to "face a blizzard of questions about the Trump administration's foreign policy from nervous Asian and European allies" at a meeting of G20 foreign ministers in Germany. The Secretary, adds the AP, "will be playing defense amid the chaos and turmoil caused by the firing of national security adviser Michael Flynn" and will hold his first face-to-face talks with Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov.

The Washington Post (2/15, Morello, 11.43M) says that with the Administration's "foreign policy overtures...mostly being conducted from the White House," Tillerson's participation at the G20 meeting "is in some aspects his introductory foray into the world of diplomacy." A "senior State Department official" said Tillerson will be in "listening mode" during multilateral meetings on the conflicts in Syria and Yemen. During his meeting with Lavrov, the official said the Secretary will discuss Syria and "insist that Russia stop supporting separatists in eastern Ukraine and live up to other commitments it made in the Minsk agreements."

Reuters (2/15, Wroughton) reports that while "there is no shortage of global challenges...senior US officials cast Tillerson's two-day trip as a 'listening tour,' conceding that this may frustrate some of his counterparts." Said one "US official" who spoke anonymously, "I think he is mostly going on a listening tour," and "if our (guy) says, 'Well, I am just here to listen,' that's going to be dispiriting."

The AP (2/15, Jordans) reports that "all eyes [will be] on the new US Secretary of State for clues about the direction Washington will take over the next four years." During the two-day talks, US allies "are seeking reassurances from...Tillerson that the administration...won't ditch a decade of close cooperation among G20 nations on climate change, international development and the global economy." Germany, Bloomberg Politics (2/15, Donahue, 201K) reports, "fixed climate change as a key topic" for the talks, "setting up for a clash" with Tillerson on the issue.

Another Reuters (2/15, Rampton, Barkin) reports says Vice President Pence will also head to Europe this week "to meet with allies seeking clarity on the Trump administration's foreign policy strategy and its stance toward Russia" after Flynn's resignation, which was greeted in "some European capitals...with relief." Reuters cautions that Pence "may be unable to lay out many details about Trump's policies given the turbulence on the foreign policy team, but he could provide insight into White House views ahead of a NATO summit in May that Trump will attend."

German Official: Trump Undermines Joint Position Towards Russia. Reuters (2/15, Nienaber) reports Germany's "point man on Russia," Gernot Erler, has accused President Trump of "undermining the joint position of Western countries towards the Kremlin by creating uncertainty about his approach." In an interview with newspaper Mannheimer Morgen, Erler said, "Washington is undermining the ability to act of Western politics. Donald Trump radiates a great sense of uncertainty."

Dunford To Meet With Russian Counterpart.

The New York Times (2/15, Gordon, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Joint Chiefs Chairman Gen. Joseph Dunford "will try to reopen a military dialogue with his Russian counterpart on Thursday amid tensions over Russia's harassment of American warships, stepped-up fighting in eastern Ukraine and accusations that Moscow has violated a landmark arms control accord." The meeting between Dunford and Gen. Valery V. Gerasimov, chief of the Russian general staff, will take place in Azerbaijan and will be "the first face-to-face meeting between military chiefs from Washington and Moscow since 2014." According to Politico (2/15, Herb, 2.46M), Dunford has been seeking a meeting with Gerasimov "for months."

AP Analysis: Russians "Patient" For Thaw With Trump. The AP (2/15, Isachenkov) reports that as questions over the Trump Administration's contacts with Russia "roil US politics, the Kremlin is taking a decidedly measured approach, carefully weighing what it says to avoid jeopardizing a chance for better relations." The AP says this "patience is evident in Russian state media, helping to temper public expectations" of Trump.

Fighting Escalates In Eastern Ukraine.

The Los Angeles Times (2/15, Ayres, 4.52M) reports that the escalation of fighting elsewhere in Ukraine in recent weeks has reached the industrial city of Mariupol, "a key component in southeast Ukraine's struggling economy." Ukraine's nearly three-year battle against Russian-backed separatists in the east "erupted into the worst fighting in two years in late January," but "exactly why the fighting intensified recently remains unclear."

Fox News Analysis: "Trump Effect" Sparks Anti-Immigrant Push In European Elections.

Fox News' Special Report  (2/15, 1.53M) reported that the "so-called Trump effect is playing a part in a trio of elections for American allies in Europe," starting in the Netherlands, where "the party of the anti-immigrants leads in some polls." In France, far-right candidate Marine Le Pen is a "projected leader." German Chancellor Angela Merkel's reelection bid "could be hurt by a new anti-immigrant party." Meanwhile, in Holland, one candidate "doesn't just want a Muslim ban. He wants to send some back" and "monitor mosques."

Trump Calls On Venezuela To Release Jailed Opposition Leader.

Reuters (2/16, Walsh) reports President Trump on Wednesday called on Venezuela to release opposition leader Leopoldo Lopez, who was sentenced last year to nearly 14 years in prison on charges of inciting anti-government protests in 2014. "Venezuela should allow Leopoldo Lopez, a political prisoner & husband of @liliantintori (just met w/ @marcorubio) out of prison immediately," Trump tweeted. Reuters notes the President met earlier yesterday with Lopez's wife, Lilian Tintori, and Sen. Marco Rubio. The Washington Post (2/15, Phillip, 11.43M) reports that in a series of tweets, Tintori thanked Trump for "standing with the Venezuelan people & our aspirations to restore democracy to our country."

A separate Reuters (2/15) report says Trump and Argentine President Mauricio Macri shared their "concern" over Venezuela in a Wednesday phone call, Macri's spokesman said. The two leaders "spoke broadly about Latin America and on 'Venezuela in particular' in the five-minute-long call, the statement said."

According to a third Reuters (2/15, Gupta) report, President Nicolas Maduro said earlier Wednesday that he wanted to avoid confrontation with Trump. "I don't want problems with the Trump administration," Maduro said in a speech. "We want respectful relations with the new administration."

Venezuela Suspends Spanish-Language CNN. Reuters (2/15, Gupta) reports Venezuela suspended the broadcast of CNN's Spanish-language service from the nation's airwaves on Wednesday, "accusing it of distorting the truth in coverage." The US-based "CNN en Espanol" was unavailable on some cable providers "minutes after a statement by telecommunications regulator Conatel announcing the suspension" over charges the network "defame[s] and distort[s] the truth...inciting aggression against the sovereignty of Venezuela and its institutions."

Tillerson, Kelly To Visit Mexico Next Week.

The AP (2/15) reports Mexico said Wednesday that Secretary of State Tillerson and DHS Secretary Kelly will visit next week. The Foreign Ministry said in a statement that the two secretaries will be in Mexico City on Jan. 23 for talks with Mexican officials aimed at promoting "a respectful, close relationship" between the two countries. The AP notes that the US "has not yet confirmed the visits." Reuters (2/15) similarly says the officials will "continue the dialogue agreed upon" during a phone call last month between President Trump and President Enrique Pena Nieto.

Malaysia Arrests Two Suspects In Killing Of Kim Jong-Un's Half-Brother.

ABC World News Tonight (2/15, story 8, 0:25, Muir, 14.63M) reported on the arrest in Kuala Lumpur of a female suspect in the apparent assassination of Kim Jong-Nam, the exiled half-brother of North Korean leader Kim Jong-Un. Police in Malaysia have given "no official motive for his murder." NBC Nightly News (2/15, story 7, 0:20, Holt, 16.61M) reported the unidentified suspect is "a woman with a Vietnamese passport," and another woman "is still on the run," but the AP (2/15, Ng) reports a second woman was arrested Thursday by Malaysian police. On Wednesday, an autopsy to determine the cause of Kim Jong-Nam's death was begun, but a Malaysian government official "said North Korea objected to the procedure because they wanted the body back." The official said the autopsy was still continuing despite the objections.

The Wall Street Journal (2/15, Jun, Gale, Otto, Malaysia, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports South Korean intelligence chief Lee Byung-ho told lawmakers Wednesday that Kim Jong-Un issued a "longstanding" assassination order to kill his half-brother after seizing power in 2011. The Washington Post (2/15, A1, Fifield, 11.43M) says Monday's assassination suggests that Kim "will stop at nothing to keep power." The Post quotes Lee as saying of the assassination order, "It was a command that had to be pulled off no matter what," adding that North Korea's spy agency had "consistently been preparing for the killing, and it just turned out to have been accomplished this time."

Burma Says Retired Army Officer Paid For Human Rights Lawyer's Murder.

The New York Times (2/15, Moe, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports the office of Burma's civilian president released a statement Wednesday announcing Aung Win Khine, a 45-year-old retired lieutenant colonel, is suspected of having paid 100 million kyat (about $71,500) to the murderer of human rights lawyer U Ko Ni. With Khine at large, the president's office has published his photograph and requested people share information about his whereabouts.

South Africa Considers $260-Per-Month Minimum Wage.

The New York Times (2/15, Onishi, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports South Africa is considering implementing a minimum wage that "would maximize benefits to the poor and minimize any possible" disincentives to work, with Deputy President Cyril Ramaphosa endorsing a government panel's recommendation last week setting a May 2018 deadline for the new wage to go into effect. The proposed minimum of $260 per month is just below the median income and working poverty line, but critics say it is too high and will result in fewer jobs. The Times notes disparity in income along racial lines and features stories of many who struggle to support their families.

Police Whistleblower Scandal Puts Irish Cabinet In Crisis.

According to the New York Times (2/15, O'Shea, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), a decade-long Irish police scandal involving accusations of retaliation against a whistle-blower has resulted in a political crisis for Irish Prime Minister Enda Kenny. Last week, two Irish news media outlets reported the country's child protection agency had created a file containing a false accusation of child abuse against the whistle-blower, Sgt. Maurice McCabe. The outlets also said this was not the first time McCabe had been wrongly accused. Kenny's critics claim he failed to resolve the "mess" in 2014 and that he supported the police chief and justice minister for too long. Kenny was expected to survive Sinn Fein's Wednesday no-confidence motion, but the Times says his government's coalition "had little appetite" for new elections.

THE BIG PICTURE

- Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

- Today's Events In Washington.

LEADING THE NEWS

Trump Says He Has Directed Sessions To Investigate Leaks.

USA Today (2/16, Johnson, 5.28M) reports that President Trump said "in the midst of a meandering and combative White House news conference" that he has directed Attorney General Sessions "to investigate alleged leaks of classified information," which "immediately revived concerns previously voiced by Democratic lawmakers that Sessions could not assert his independence as the nation's chief law enforcement officer." Senate Minority Leader Schumer has called on Sessions to recuse himself, and Senate Judiciary Committee ranking Democrat Dianne Feinstein "asked that Sessions limit contacts between the White House and the Justice Department." The New York Times (2/16, Savage, Lichtblau, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) writes that while "no law forbids a president from making a criminal referral to the Justice Department," it's "unusual for a president to direct the agency to open a criminal investigation into his perceived opponents or to talk publicly about having done so."

Congressmen Say Trump "Fumed" About Leaks In Meeting. Politico (2/16, Cheney, Bade, 2.46M) reports that the President "fumed about intelligence community leaks during a meeting at the White House with his earliest supporters in Congress," according to Reps. Lou Barletta Mike Kelly (R-PA) and Mike Kelly (R-PA), who were among the 11 lawmakers at the meeting. Kelly said Trump "vented" that Flynn's departure "is 'not the issue' compared to the leaks that made those revelations public," and Barletta said Trump "'talked a lot' about the leaks."

Nunes: Leakers "Probably" People From Obama Administration. The Washington Times (2/16, Sherfinski, 272K) reports that House Intelligence Chairman Devin Nunes said Wednesday evening that "most of the recent intel leaks are likely originating from people who worked in the Obama administration." He said on Fox News' Hannity, "It's totally unacceptable for anyone within government to be doing this. I think most of this is probably from people who were in the old Administration, but there still could be some people that have burrowed in and are providing classified information to the media."

Officials Say Flynn Denied Discussing Sanctions With Russian Ambassador In FBI Interview. The Washington Post (2/16, A1, Horwitz, Entous, 11.43M) reports that Flynn denied to FBI agents in a January 24 interview "that he had discussed U.S. sanctions against Russia" with Ambassador Sergey Kislyak before President Trump took office, "contradicting the contents of intercepted communications collected by intelligence agencies," according to current and former officials. The Post says Flynn may be "in legal jeopardy" since "lying to the FBI is a felony offense."

Meanwhile, CNN (2/16, Perez, 29.79M) reports online that the FBI is not expected to seek charges against Flynn because authorities do not believe he intentionally sought to mislead them. "Flynn initially told investigators sanctions were not discussed. But FBI agents challenged him, asking if he was certain that was his answer. He said he didn't remember," CNN says, citing law enforcement officials.

ABC World News Tonight (2/16, story 2, 2:25, Muir, 14.63M) reported that while "Justice Department attorneys are intensely reviewing why former National Security Advisor Michael Flynn made misleading statements to the White House about his conversation with Russia's ambassador to the US and whether he broke any laws in the process," Trump "defend[ed] the national security adviser he just fired." On the CBS Evening News (2/16, story 5, 2:25, Pelley, 11.17M), John Dickerson said, "The Michael Flynn episode is about what penalty there is for not telling the truth in the Trump Administration. And today we got about the fourth explanation from the President on what his relationship was with Michael Flynn."

On the CBS Evening News (2/16, story 2, 2:35, Pelley, 11.17M), Jeff Pegues reported that Trump "was asked by three reporters if any of his campaign staffers were in regular contact with Russian operatives during the election. He denied any connections to the Kremlin and dismissed the investigation." Trump: "Russia is a ruse. I have nothing to do with Russia. Haven't made a phone call to Russia in years."

The Hill (2/16, Hensch, 1.25M), Reuters (2/16), The Hill (2/16, Williams, 1.25M), and the New York Daily News (2/16, Slattery, 4.45M) discuss the Post and CNN's coverage of Flynn's remarks to investigators.

ODNI Denies Allegations That IC Withholding Intel From Trump. A video on the CBS News (2/16, 4.4M) website says a Wall Street Journal report alleges that intelligence officials have withheld intelligence from Trump because of their "deep mistrust" for Trump and his Administration. Fox News Insider (2/16, 3K) said Fox News chief intelligence correspondent Catherine Herridge reported that former National Security Adviser Mike Flynn wanted Trump to review raw data, which Herridge said "which may explain the blocks reported by the Wall Street Journal." However, she noted that "the nation's spy chief is pushing back against the explosive report." According to Politico (2/16, Nelson, 2.46M), the ODNI released a statement denying the allegations, saying, "Any suggestion that the U.S. Intelligence Community is withholding information and not providing the best possible intelligence to the President and his national security team is not true."

In addition, the AP (2/16, Salama, Riechmann) reports that CIA Director Pompeo called the allegations "dead wrong" on Thursday and said his agency "does not, has not, and will never hide intelligence from the president, period. We are not aware of any instance when that has occurred." He also claimed that the accusations damage the "integrity of thousands of professional intelligence officers."

Harward Turns Down Offer To Become NSA. Reuters (2/16, Beech) reports that retired Vice Adm. Robert Harward has turned down Trump's offer to be named national security adviser. USA Today (2/16, Cummings, 5.28M) reports that Harward told the AP that he turned down the job for personal reasons, but CBS reported that Trump "insisted that Deputy National Security Adviser K.T. McFarland be allowed to stay on, and Harward refused to retain the former Fox News analyst and Flynn hire." The New York Times (2/16, Davis, Schmitt, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says White House officials "had scrambled to head off the refusal, asserting as late as Thursday evening" that Harward "was still in the running."

NYTimes Analysis: US Does Not Yet Have A "Deep State," But Is Heading That Way. The New York Times (2/16, Taub, Fisher, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says in an analysis that the leaks are leading some to compare the US to countries "like Egypt, Turkey and Pakistan, where shadowy networks within government bureaucracies, often referred to as 'deep states,' undermine and coerce elected governments." Experts say the US is not yet "seeing the rise of its own deep state...but the echoes are real – and disturbing."

Time Analysis: White House Returns To "Reality-Show Ways" Amid "Chaos." Philip Elliott of TIME (2/16, 6.98M) looks "Inside Donald Trump's White House Chaos," writing that while Trump "mastered the art of disruption" as a presidential candidate, "disruption in government – the rulemaker breaking the rules – turns out to be more costly." Facing crises and protests, "the White House has fallen back on its reality-show ways, distracted by the internecine drama of senior aides who spend their days mixing government business with jockeying for position and favor with the boss."

In her Wall Street Journal (2/16, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) column, Peggy Noonan

pleads with Trump to bring in more conventional staff members to balance out his own unconventional style and that of much of his inner circle. However, in the Washington Post (2/16, 11.43M), contributing columnist Hugh Hewitt warns against hyperbole, writing that every Administration stumbles in its first days, and that "judgments about Trump's presidency based on his first month in the Oval Office are by definition premature."

Leonhardt: Comey, McCain Face "Test" Over Flynn. In his column for the New York Times (2/16, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), David Leonhardt argues that the investigation of Flynn presents FBI Director Comey and Sen. John McCain with a "character test." The men, says Leonhardt, disappointed those "alarmed by Donald Trump's rise" in 2016 and are now in the unique position of being able to compel Flynn to testify. "Because Republicans control both houses of Congress, only they really have the power to address the situation, which is as alarming as any political situation in a long time," Leonhardt says.

Weiner: Comey At Helm Of "Delicate," Possibly "Dangerous" Probe Into Flynn. In an op-ed for Reuters (2/16, Weiner), author Tim Weiner argues that Comey is overseeing "one of the most delicate, and potentially the most dangerous, counterintelligence cases in the 108-year history of the FBI." The case, says Weiner, is complicated by the fact that Comey will sometimes need the approval of Attorney General Sessions, "a leading figure in the Trump campaign." Though much of the Flynn probe will likely take place in secret, "there are no secrets that time will not reveal," Weiner concludes.

COUNTER-TERRORISM

Man Linked To San Bernardino Terrorists Pleads Guilty To Conspiracy Charges.

The Inland Valley (CA) Daily Bulletin (2/16, Rokos, 94K) reports that California man Enrique Marquez pleaded guilty Thursday "to conspiring to support terrorists and lying on documents signed during the purchase the rifles used to kill 14 people and wound 22 others" in the San Bernardino terrorist attack. Marquez faces up to 25 years behind bars. The 25-year-old will be sentenced under a plea agreement that will allow him to escape conviction on some of the charges originally filed against him. "As part of the agreement, charges of marriage fraud and misuse of visas and permits will be dropped at sentencing," the Daily Bulletin says, noting that Marquez was engaged in a sham marriage to a Russian woman. Marquez can also "be fined up to $250,000 for each of the counts," the newspaper says. The AP (2/16) reports that the families of some of those killed by the San Bernardino terrorists expressed discontent at the length of the maximum sentence possible for Marquez. "U.S. Attorney Eileen M. Decker said she understands...but explained that she is bound by the law and there is no evidence that Marquez participated in or had advance knowledge of the San Bernardino killings," the AP says. Reuters (2/16, Gorman) reports that Marquez is set to be sentenced on Aug. 21. The Pasadena (CA) Star-News (2/16, 71K) posts the Daily Bulletin's coverage to its website.

FBI: South Carolina Man Sought To Carry Out Attack Styled After Charleston Church Massacre.

Reuters (2/16, Skinner) report that the FBI this week said it had arrested Benjamin McDowell, a South Carolina man who had hoped to carry out an attack similar to Charleston church shooter Dylann Roof. McDowell was arrested after allegedly illegally purchasing a gun from an undercover FBI agent. "I seen what Dylann Roof did, and in my heart I reckon I got a little bit of hatred. ... I want to do that," McDowell allegedly told the undercover agent last month. McDowell, who is connected to the White Supremacy Extremists hate group, asked the FBI agent to buy the firearm for him, which he could not legally own due to a felony conviction.

The AP (2/16, Collins) reports that the FBI said it had provided McDowell with a .40-caliber Glock and ammunition for $109. Though McDowell had threatened a synagogue on Facebook, the FBI said, he told the undercover agent he did not have a specific target in mind and might just shoot at a group of black people. "I got the heart to do that s---, but I don't have the good training," McDowell said, according to the undercover operative. "Authorities began investigating McDowell in December" after he threatened the synagogue, the AP says.

The Charleston (SC) Post and Courier (2/16, Smith, 300K) reports, "McDowell's frustrations apparently boiled over" around the time of Dylann Roof's hate crimes trial. "He posted a message on Facebook on Jan. 5 griping about supremacists who liked to post pictures of Vikings and swords but lacked 'the heart to fight for Yaweh like dylann roof,'" the Post and Courier says, citing the complaint. "The post appeared a day after the penalty phase of Roof's trial began in Charleston." The NBC News (2/16, 2.67M) website reports that McDowell, "who had connected with white power gangs while serving time in prison," has an extensive criminal history, including "malicious injury to animals, assault, violent second-degree burglary...and a third-degree burglary."

ABC World News Tonight  (2/16, story 8, 0:30, Muir, 14.63M), the Daily Beast (2/16, 1.11M), and the Rock Hill (SC) Herald (2/16, KULMALA, ROLDÁN, 85K) report similarly. The Houston (TX) Chronicle (2/16, Collins, 1.91M) posts the AP's coverage to its website.

Tennessee Man Convicted Of Planning Attack On New York Muslim Community.

The AP (2/16) reports that a federal jury on Thursday convicted Tennessee man Robert Doggart of planning an attack on a New York Muslim community. "Media outlets report that 65-year-old Robert Doggart was found guilty of solicitation to commit a civil rights violation, solicitation to commit arson of a building and making a threat in interstate commerce," the AP says. Doggart, prosecutors said, amassed a collection of weapons and told others about his plans to attack Islamberg, a Muslim community in New York. The prosecution showed jurors one of Doggart's weapons and played for them recordings of a series of conversations he had with an informant. "Doggart's attorneys argued that he never had a consistent plan in place, he was entrapped by a confidential informant and he only wanted to conduct reconnaissance on Islamberg," the AP says. Reuters (2/16) quotes Acting Assistant Attorney General Tom Wheeler as saying, "The defendant sought out others to join him in a violent attack on a community of men, women, and children because of their religion." Doggart, prosecutors said, had planned to raise a militia to help him attack Islamberg. The Guardian (UK) (2/16, 4.07M) posts the AP's coverage to its website.

Man Arrested In Los Angeles After "Unexploded Devices" Found In Denver Hotel.

The Denver Post (2/16, Paul, 778K) reports a man "was arrested Thursday in Los Angeles after unexploded devices were found at the Sheraton Denver Downtown Hotel." Adam Hayat, who is due in court Friday, was reportedly "found with knives after apparently flying to Los Angeles. He was arrested near the airport," the Post says. "A Denver Police Department spokesman referred questions about the case to the FBI."

ADL: US Deaths Linked To Domestic Islamic Extremism The Highest In Decades.

The Washington Times (2/16, Noble, 272K) reports that last year's Orlando nightclub shootings "propelled the annual number of deaths linked to domestic extremist-related attacks to their highest level in decades and made Islamist extremism the deadliest ideology for the first time in 30 years." That Times adds that according to a new report from the Anti-Defamation League, "the preliminary tally of homegrown extremist-related deaths in the U.S. shows that 69 people died in such attacks last year, the most since the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing." According to the Times, Omar Mateen's "pledge of allegiance to the Islamic State and al Qaeda during the Pulse nightclub massacre led to classification of the attack, which killed 49 people, as domestic Islamic extremism – setting 2016's figures far afield from prior years."

Netanyahu: Trump And I Agree On Threat From Radical Islam.

On Fox News' Hannity  (2/16, 535K), Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu described his meeting with President Trump as "historical" and a "meeting of the minds and a meeting of the hearts." Netanyahu added that "radical Islam has two fountainheads" – "radical Sunnis led by ISIS" and "radical Shiites led by Iran." Netanyahu added, "In my conversation yesterday with President Trump, he sees the things in the same way. That opens up opportunities. No question about it."

COUNTER-INTELLIGENCE

Chinese National Convicted Of Stealing Engineered Rice From US Company.

Reuters (2/16, Beech) reports, "A federal jury on Thursday convicted a Chinese scientist in Kansas of conspiring to steal samples of a variety of genetically engineered rice seeds from a U.S. research facility, the U.S. Justice Department said, the latest attempt at agricultural theft linked to China." Weiqiang Zhang was convicted of multiple counts, include conspiracy to steal trade secrets. Zhang stole hundreds of rice seeds from Kansas-based company Ventria Bioscience Inc, where he worked as a rice breeder. "In Zhang's case, employees of a crop research institute in China visited him in 2013 in Kansas. U.S. customs officers found seeds belonging to Ventria in the luggage of Zhang's visitors as they prepared to leave the United States for China," Reuters says, citing authorities.

Tech Groups Gear Up For Fight Over FISA Surveillance Extension.

IDG News Service (2/16, Gross) reports that "a controversial provision in U.S. law that gives the National Security Agency broad authority to spy on people overseas expires at the end of the year, and six major tech trade groups are gearing up for a fight over an extension." Section 702 of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act "expires on Dec. 31, and Congress almost certain to extend it in some form." According to IDG, "the tech trade groups, including BSA, the Consumer Technology Association, and the Computer and Communications Industry Association, are asking lawmakers to build in new privacy protections for internet users. 'It is critical that Congress takes a balanced yet focused approach with respect to Section 702,' the groups said in a letter sent to top lawmakers Wednesday. 'We urge your committees to ensure that any reauthorization includes meaningful safeguards for internet users' privacy and civil liberties.'"

CRIMINAL INVESTIGATIONS

Florida Man Charged With Making Bombs In Plot To Blow Up Target Stores.

The Orlando (FL) Sentinel (2/16, Hayes, 684K) reports that a Florida man made at least 10 bombs in hopes of blowing up East Coast Target stores in a scheme to buy cheap stock. Mark Charles Barnett has been charged with "possession of a destructive device affecting commerce by a previously convicted felon." According to a federal complaint, Barnett had hoped to disguise the explosive devices as food items and plant them at stores along the Eastern seaboard from New York to Florida in hopes that the plot would cause Target's stock to fall before rebounding. "He paid a man $10,000 to place the bombs on shelves," the Sentinel says, citing the complaint. The man alerted authorities. WTTG-TV's Washington (2/16, 67K) website quotes US Attorney A. Lee Bentley III as saying, "An explosives expert determined that [the devices] were capable of causing property damage, serious injury, or death to nearby persons upon detonation." The ATF, FBI, and Florida authorities investigated the case.

FBI Interviewing US Gymnastics Team Members Over Sexual Abuse Allegations.

Citing persons familiar with the matter, the Wall Street Journal (2/16, O'Brien, Radnofsky, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that multiple top US women's national gymnastics team members have been interviewed by the FBI regarding allegations of sexual abuse by former team doctor Larry Nassar. The doctor served as volunteer trainer and physician for the US national team for nearly 30 years and now faces charges in the state of Michigan and several civil lawsuits alleging sexual misconduct. Federal prosecutors charged Nassar with possession of child pornography in December. According to sources, Nassar could soon face federal charges related to the sexual abuse of gymnastics team members. After learning of Nassar's alleged misconduct, USA Gymnastics did not report the allegations for at least five weeks, and the FBI did not open a formal probe for another nine months after being alerted, the Journal says.

The Washington Post (2/16, Maese, Hobson, 11.43M) reports that some have accused USA Gymnastics of failing to act quickly enough to stop Nassar. "They're actually acting like they're responsible for him being caught," said attorney John Manly, who represents dozens of gymnasts alleging abuse. "Nothing could be further from the truth. They delayed this. ... The fact that they're still acting like they don't have any culpability for this and still being secretive and duplicitous about it is abhorrent." For his part, Nassar denies allegations of wrongdoing. USA Today (2/16, Alesia, 5.28M) reports that in a statement, USA Gymnastics "said the FBI assured the organization that it handled the matter correctly." USA Today (2/16, 5.28M) posts a timeline to its website of how USA Gymnastics says it responded to the allegations.

San Antonio School Board Member Charged With Taking Bribes.

The AP (2/16) reports that San Antonio, Texas school board member Olga Hernandez "has been indicted in a public corruption probe involving alleged bribes from insurers seeking district contracts." The 66-year-old, who took office in 2006, faces charges of conspiracy to commit wire fraud and honest services wire fraud. According to authorities, Hernandez accepted jewelry, cash, and trips in exchange for her vote in favor of certain insurance contracts. "Prosecutors say Hernandez conspired with two insurance representatives who've since pleaded guilty to conspiracy-related counts," the AP says. The San Antonio Express-News (2/16, Contreras, 844K) and the WTAW-AM College Station, TX (2/16, 428) website report similarly.

US Charges Navy Commander In "Fat Leonard" Corruption Scandal.

The Washington Post (2/16, Gibbons-Neff, 11.43M) reports that US Navy Cmdr. Mario Herrera "was arrested Thursday and charged with accepting prostitutes, luxury travel, elaborate dinners and $1,800 in steaks from Leonard Glenn Francis, the defense contractor at the root of a massive corruption scandal that has hit the Navy." Herrera, 48, "is the 12th Navy official, including one admiral, to be charged in connection with the scandal." He was arrested in San Antonio "and is scheduled to appear in federal court in San Diego, according to a news release from the office of U.S. attorney for the Southern District of California."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/16, Moran, 496K) reports that Herrera "was charged with accepting gifts, travel, expensive meals and the services of prostitutes from Francis' company, Glenn Defense Marine Asia," and "in return, prosecutors said he provided Francis with classified information on ship schedules for the Seventh Fleet and used his position in the Navy to steer ships to visit ports that Francis' company controlled." The Union-Tribune adds that "the charges against Herrera echo what has become a familiar litany of corruption and misconduct by Navy personnel that was orchestrated over more than a decade by Francis, whose extroverted personality and plus-sized stature earned him the nickname 'Fat Leonard' among officers in the Seventh Fleet."

The AP (2/16) reports that "according to the complaint, Herrera and other U.S. Navy 7th Fleet officers who helped Francis in exchange for the perks called themselves the 'Band of Brothers' and the 'Wolf Pack.'" Federal prosecutors "say Glenn Defense Marine Asia bilked the Navy out of $35 million by overcharging for his company's services that supplied Navy ships in the Pacific with food, water, fuel and other necessities." CNN (2/16, Crawford, Kupperman, 29.79M) and KNSD-TV San Diego (2/16, Kaur, 216K) run similar reports on their websites.

Chaffetz Asks Sessions To Charge Ex-Clinton Aide In Email Probe.

The AP (2/16, Daly)reports that House Oversight Chairman Jason Chaffetz, "who has refused Democratic requests to investigate possible conflicts of interest involving President Donald Trump, is seeking criminal charges against a former State Department employee who helped set up Hillary Clinton's private email server." The AP says Chaffetz on Thursday sent a letter to Attorney General Jeff Sessions "asking him to convene a grand jury or charge Bryan Pagliano, the computer specialist who helped establish Clinton's server while she was secretary of state. Pagliano did not comply with two subpoenas ordering him to appear before the oversight panel. The GOP-led committee later voted to hold him in contempt of Congress."

The Washington Post (2/16, 11.43M) and the New York Daily News (2/16, 4.45M) post the AP's coverage to their websites.

Florida Airport Shooting Suspect Is Mentally Competent, Defense Attorneys Say.

The AP (2/16) reports that defense attorneys for Esteban Santiago, the Alaska man accused of killing five people in a mass shooting at Fort Lauderdale-Hollywood International Airport last month, say their client is mentally competent to stand trial. "Santiago, 26, was treated briefly before the shooting at an Anchorage, Alaska, psychiatric facility after showing up at an FBI office and telling agents he was hearing voices and was under CIA mind control," the AP says. Defense attorney Hector Dopico, however, said his client understands the charges against him and can help in his defense. "Trial is currently scheduled to begin Oct. 2 in Miami," the AP says.

Michigan Art Dealer Sentenced For Selling Forged Art.

The AP (2/16, Neumeister) reports that Michigan art dealer Eric Spoutz was sentenced Thursday to three years in prison for selling forgeries he claimed to be by renowned American artists. "Prosecutors say Spoutz used forged receipts, bills of sale and letters from deceased attorneys and other individuals to convince buyers that he had inherited or bought dozens of works by the artists and that they were authentic," the AP says. "This was a career that was founded on fraud," said Assistant US Attorney Andrew Adams. Spoutz, he said, did not stop selling forgeries until a year after he was approached by the FBI. Spoutz, US Attorney Preet Bharara said, "used the full palette of deception to complete his decade-long work of fraud, swindling art collectors out of more than a million dollars." The Detroit Free Press (2/16, 1.01M) posts the AP's coverage to its website.

Judge Dismisses One Of Three Charges Against Bundy Attorney.

The Oregonian (2/16, Bernstein, 894K) reports that US District Judge John C. Coughenour on Thursday "dropped one of three criminal charges against Marcus Mumford, Ammon Bundy's lawyer, and said he will decide – not a jury – on the other two charges." Judge Coughenour "dismissed a charge that accused Mumford of creating a disturbance by impeding the official duties of government officers because it encompassed the same conduct alleged in the second count, failing to comply with official signs that prohibit the disruption of federal officers' official work." Mumford's attorney, Michael Levine "has argued that the deputy U.S. marshals engaged in 'outrageous' government misconduct and lacked authority to wrestle Mumford to the ground and stun him with a Taser gun while he was arguing on behalf of Bundy in a federal courtroom last fall."

Palm Springs, California Mayor Accused Of Taking Bribes For Decisions Favorable To Developers.

The Palm Springs (CA) Desert Sun (2/16, 71K) reports, "For two years while serving as mayor of Palm Springs, Steve Pougnet accepted bribes from local real-estate developers in exchange for favorable decisions from behind the City Council dais, prosecutors alleged in a criminal complaint listing 21 felony charges against him." Businessmen John Wessman and Richard Meaney were also charged. Pougnet was allegedly "paid $375,000 between September 2012 and September 2014 through a scheme in which Wessman paid Meaney who then directed money to Pougnet."

Another Palm Springs (CA) Desert Sun (2/16, 71K) article says the case "delivers on a frequent promise by first-term District Attorney Mike Hestrin, who pledged an increased focus on government integrity when he took office two years ago." Local and federal law enforcement, including the FBI, worked on the case.

A third Palm Springs (CA) Desert Sun (2/16, 71K) article identifies Meaney as "a real estate developer and personal friend of Steve Pougnet."

The Memphis (TN) Commercial Appeal (2/16, 229K) identifies Wessman as a "real estate developer behind two boutique hotels in Memphis."

Ohio Street Gang Members Accused In Multi-State Electronics Theft Ring.

The AP (2/16) reports that eight reputed members of an "Ohio street gang have been charged in federal court for their involvement in the thefts of $500,000 worth of cellphones and electronic devices from stores and shopping malls in nine states outside of Ohio, an FBI spokeswoman said Thursday." The FBI and Cleveland Police Department arrested three Heartless Felon gang members this week. Four were already behind bars for other crimes, and one remains a fugitive. According to authorities, the gang members would pry open locked cabinets and drawers at closed mall kiosks or stores and steal cell phones. NJ News (2/16, 952K)reports similarly.

Texas Man Sentenced To Ten Years In Prison For Possessing Child Pornography.

The Dallas Morning News (2/16, Farmer, 1.12M) reports that "a Denton County man was sentenced Wednesday to 10 years in federal prison after he admitted he owned a computer containing more than 20,000 images and videos of child pornography." David M. Kruse, 63, of The Colony "pleaded guilty in October to possession of child pornography." The News adds that "in August 2015, federal agents obtained a search warrant for a computer Kruse owned," and "they spoke to Kruse, who said it was his computer." The agents "later found the tens of thousands of files, some 'depicting prepubescent minors and sadistic or masochistic conduct,' according to the U.S. Department of Justice."

Texas Man Sentenced To 50 Years For Child Pornography Offenses.

The Dallas Morning News (2/16, Ramirez, 1.12M) reports that Pedro Jose Meza, 35, of Forth Worth, TX "has been sentenced to 50 years in federal prison for child pornography offenses." Meza "had pleaded guilty last July to charges of production and distribution of child pornography." The News adds that "according to court documents, Meza in June 2014 persuaded a six-year-old girl to engage in sexually explicit acts for the purposes of producing a visual depiction of the conduct," and that "the offense took place at a Fort Worth home Meza was living in with the child and her mother." According to the News, "a separate offense occurred in October 2015 when Meza used the internet and the Kik messaging application to distribute a 1½-minute video of an adult male engaging in sexual intercourse with a prepubescent female."

Eleventh Circuit Rules Florida Doctors May Discuss Guns With Patients.

The New York Times (2/16, Alvarez, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals "cleared the way" on Thursday "for Florida doctors to talk to their patients about gun safety, overturning a 2011 law that pitted medical providers against the state's powerful gun lobby." In a 10-to-1 ruling, the full court "concluded that doctors could not be threatened with losing their license for asking patients if they owned guns and for discussing gun safety because to do so would violate their free speech. 'Florida does not have carte blanche to restrict the speech of doctors and medical professionals on a certain subject without satisfying the demands of heightened scrutiny,' the majority wrote in its decision." The Times adds that "the medical community argued that questions about gun storage were crucial to public health because of the relationship between firearms and both the suicide rate and the gun-related deaths of children."

Gun Control Nonprofit Head: Bill To Repeal Gun Rules "Made America Dangerous Again."

In a Washington Post (2/16, 11.43M) op-ed, Everytown for Gun Safety President John Feinblatt argues that the legislators who voted to repeal the rule enforcing existing laws that prevent those with severe mental illnesses from obtaining guns have "made America dangerous again." Despite claims by some that mental illness is the real issue, many who voted to "fundamentally downgrade the system" have re-opened a loophole that allows the mentally ill to buy guns. Feinblatt anticipates the gun lobby will reduce public safety by promoting measures that further enable the proliferation of guns and decrease government regulation of concealed-carry permits and silencers.

FINANCIAL CRIME & CORPORATE SCANDALS

US Charges Pennsylvania Man With Filing False Bankruptcy Petitions.

The Harrisburg (PA) Patriot-News (2/16, 523K) reports that Michael J. Jackson, of Hershey, PA "was indicted by a grand jury on charges he filed false bankruptcy petitions to try to defraud creditors and postpone sheriff sale of his house." Jackson, 57, "was indicted Wednesday by a federal grand jury on wire and bankruptcy fraud, false bankruptcy oaths and claims, and aggravated identity theft charges." US Attorney Bruce D. Brandler said Jackson "is accused of a scheme to defraud his creditors, bankruptcy court and his wife between 2009 and 2017." Jackson "filed seven Chapter 13 and 11 bankruptcy petitions, five of which were under his name and two under his wife's name without her knowledge or consent, Brandler said."

FBI, IRS Raid Texas State Senator's Law Office.

The Dallas Morning News (2/16, Pruner, 1.12M) reports that the FBI and IRS on Thursday raided the law office of Texas state Sen. Carlos Uresti. "The raid is focused on Uresti's involvement with the now-bankrupt FourWinds LLC, a San Antonio oil company that traded frac sand, a material used in the hydraulic fracturing production of oil. The company was accused of defrauding investors and declared bankruptcy in 2015," the Morning News says. Uresti held many positions at the company and also helped solicit investors. "The former CEO of the defunct company, Stan Bates, allegedly used investors' money for lavish personal expenses including exotic cars," the Morning News says. Breitbart (2/16, Price, 2.02M) reports that the FBI confirmed its participation in the raid. The San Antonio Express-News (2/16, Contreras, Danne, 844K) reports similarly.

FBI Reportedly Seeking Possible Accomplices To Embezzling Lobbyist.

Citing sources, the Wall Street Journal (2/16, Mullins, Barrett, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that the FBI is investigating connections between a prominent Washington media strategist and Evan Morris, a deceased lobbyist accused of stealing from his employers to finance a lavish lifestyle. The FBI is reportedly assessing whether media strategist James Courtovich or his associates had knowingly helped Morris to hide the payment of kickbacks. According to people familiar with the matter, Morris gave millions of dollars worth of business to companies linked to Courtovich. The companies also sent millions of dollars to Morris' bank account.

CYBER DIVISION

FBI's Smith: Bureau Working To Develop Predictive Policing Technology.

FedScoop (2/16, Bing) reports that during a panel discussion at the 2017 RSA conference, FBI Assistant Director Scott Smith said the bureau's cybercrime unit is working on predictive policing technology. "It's where we are moving, and hope to go when you talk about predicting as opposed to proactive and reactive. Reactive is consistently where we have been, proactive means we're really trying to get ahead of it. But predictive is where we want to be. And that's where I know FBI Cyber Division is strongly moving towards as we speak," Smith said. According to FedScoop, "Predictive policing is a broad term used to describe law enforcement's ability to forecast criminal activity. In cyberspace, such technology could feasibly help officers pinpoint a data breach or other illegal internet activity before it happens."

Florida Man Among Three Sentenced For Hacking, Spamming Scheme.

NJ News (2/16, 952K) reports from Newark that "a Florida man who hijacked a company's Web site and used other methods to unlawfully inundate countless email inboxes with spam was sentenced Tuesday to 48 months in prison, U.S. Attorney for New Jersey Paul Fishman said." Timothy Livingston, 31, of Boca Raton, FL "racked up $1.3 million in illegal profits via his company, A Whole Lot of Nothing LLC." Beginning in 2011, Livingston "operated the business, which specialized in sending out mass emails advertising lawful companies, including insurance firms," but "Livingston's clientele also included illegal businesses, including online pharmacies that sold drugs without prescriptions."

Reuters (2/16) reports that Livingston was one of three men who have been sentenced "for their roles in a wide-ranging hacking and spamming scheme that targeted personal information of 60 million people, including Comcast Corp customers, prosecutors said on Thursday." Tomasz Chmielarz, 34, and Devin McArthur, 28, "were each sentenced on Thursday to two years of probation and ordered to pay restitution of $64,529, $7,070, respectively," and Chmielarz "must also pay a $3,000 fine, prosecutors said." Prosecutors said Chmielarz and Livingston "hacked into email accounts and seized control of corporate mail servers to further their spam campaigns, and created software that exploited vulnerabilities in a several corporate websites." The North Jersey (NJ) Media Group (2/16, Ortiz, 95K) and the Palm Beach (FL) Post (2/16, Elmore, 306K) also report.

No Senior Trump Administration Officials In Attendance At RSA.

USA Today (2/16, Weise, 5.28M) reports that Trump Administration officials have "stayed away" from the RSA conference, "one of the nation's largest computer security conferences." USA Today contrasts this with the Obama Administration, which "was very engaged at RSA, in keynotes and panels." Forty-one government speakers were present at this year's RSA, but "no senior level speakers from the Trump administration." Former DHS deputy undersecretary for cybersecurity Bruce McConnell is quoted saying, "It's disappointing not to see a greater administration presence here." RSA "said that at the time its program was finalized, many of the new administration's appointments were not selected," and many who were invited "were unable to speak at this year's conference, RSA said in a statement to USA TODAY." USA Today adds, "One reason the lack of participation has been noted is that the Trump administration was widely expected to release its executive order on cybersecurity during RSA."

The Intercept (2/16) reports that RSA panels on cybersecurity policy "worked off of leaked drafts of an executive order abandoned by President Donald Trump's administration." The Intercept adds, "Rudy Giuliani serves as White House cyber security adviser, though he has said little publicly on the topic since being appointed."

Cybersecurity Companies "Steering Clear" Of "Feud" Between President, Silicon Valley. The Hill (2/16, Chalfant, 1.25M) reports, "Cybersecurity companies are steering clear of the growing feud between President Trump and Silicon Valley, underscoring their willingness to continue to do business with the federal government." Cybersecurity businesses "say they shouldn't be lumped in with the tech executives fighting Trump's agenda," including his immigration policies. The Hill says representatives of several cybersecurity companies "said they are eager to partner with the federal government, regardless of who's in power."

Carlin: Cybersecurity Must "Remain At The Top" Of US Government Priorities. Former Assistant Attorney General for the DOJ National Security Division John P. Carlin writes in MarketWatch (2/16, 767K) that the President has "vowed to make cybersecurity a top priority of his new administration," and "as other priorities compete for this administration's focus and attention, cybersecurity must remain at the top. Our national security will depend on it." Carlin says the government must continue "employing a 'whole-government' approach" to cybersecurity, rather than treating it as just an intelligence matter. Carlin also says, "We need to make public as much as possible about hacks" in order to "credibly demonstrate it can attribute cyberattacks," and to "smash the myth" of cyberattacks being a cost-less crime for the perpetrators. Carlin adds that "the U.S. must continue to strengthen relationships with the private sector and encourage sharing both ways," and the country "must acknowledge a new truth: There is no wall high or deep enough that can prevent a cyberattack."

RSA Attendees Offer "Best Cybersecurity Tips."

PC World (2/16, 293K) features the "best cybersecurity tips" from experts at the RSA conference. Dell SecureWorks malware research director Joe Stewart is cited advising two-factor authentication to protect Internet accounts, "especially email," while CrowdStrike vice president of technology strategy Mike Sentonas advises businesses to "first think about what assets they're trying to protect from cyber threats, as opposed to blindly buying the latest security products." Veracode chief technology officer Chris Wysopal says people should expect software and Internet services to be compromised, and adds that vendors should earn the trust of consumers and businesses.

Ukrainian Hacking Forum Administrator Sentenced For Using Botnet To Steal Data.

Reuters (2/16, Raymond) reports Sergey Vovnenko, "a Ukrainian who administered two online hacking forums," was sentenced to 41 months in prison Thursday "for using more than 13,000 computers to steal log-in and credit card data, U.S. prosecutors said." Reuters adds, "Prosecutors said that from 2010 to 2012 Vovnenko, 31, engaged in a scheme to hack into computers belonging to individuals and companies, steal user names and passwords for bank accounts and other online services and steal debit and credit card numbers." The AP (2/16) reports similarly.

New York Unveils "First Of Its Kind" Cybersecurity Regulation.

The Hill (2/16, Chalfant, 1.25M) reports New York state Governor Andrew Cuomo announced a regulation on Thursday "intended to protect the financial services industry and its consumers from cyberattacks." Cuomo "describ[ed] it as the first of its kind in the nation," and it "will require banks, insurance companies, and other entities regulated by the state's Department of Financial Services to establish cybersecurity programs to protect consumers' sensitive data and secure the financial services industry." The Hill says the regulation takes effect in March. Reuters (2/16) reports similarly.

EU Officials Seek Reassurance That Immigration Order Won't Impact Privacy Shield.

Reuters (2/16, Fioretti) reports European Union "data privacy watchdogs will seek assurances from U.S. authorities that a move by U.S. President Donald Trump to crack down on illegal immigration will not undermine a transatlantic pact protecting the privacy of Europeans' data." The order "directs U.S. agencies to 'exclude persons who are not United States citizens or lawful permanent residents from the protections of the Privacy Act regarding personally identifiable information.'" The exemption "of foreigners from the U.S. law governing how federal agencies collect and use information about people has stoked worries across the Atlantic about the new administration's approach to privacy and its impact on cross-border data flows."

Shackelford: Cybersecurity Should Be Recognized As Human Right.

Law and ethics professor Scott Shackelford writes in the New York Observer (2/16, 518K) that "having access to the internet is increasingly considered to be an emerging human right," and "the next step to help ensure some measure of cyber peace online may be for cybersecurity to be recognized as a human right, too." Shackelford argues that calls for standardizing the encryption of private communications "are signaling what could be early phases of declaring cybersecurity to be a human right that governments, companies and individuals should work to protect." While Vinton Cerf, a "father of the internet," argues that technology is "a means through which rights can be exercised" rather than a right in itself, Shackelford says, "Cerf's argument may, in fact, strengthen the case for cybersecurity as a human right – ensuring that technology enables people to exercise their rights to privacy and free communication."

LAW ENFORCEMENT SERVICES

ACLU Official: Trump's Effort To Protect Cops Not Based On Facts.

In an op-ed for USA Today (2/16, 5.28M), Jeffery Robinson, an American Civil Liberties Union deputy legal director and the director of the Center for Justice, writes that President Trump "put an executive order into effect last week to, in his words, 'stop crime and crimes of violence against law enforcement officers,'" but "when the facts about police, violence and victims are considered – real facts, not alternative facts – the math doesn't work." According to Robinson, "officer deaths have dropped overall since the 1970s, with the number of officers killed on duty falling roughly by half during that time, according to the National Law Enforcement Officers Memorial Fund." Robinson argues that Trump should instead "pay attention to the mounting number of people of color being killed by police."

Six White House Aides Dismissed For Failing To Obtain Security Clearance.

According to Politico (2/16, Palmeri, 2.46M), six White House aides were dismissed Thursday morning due to failing the to obtain a security clearance based on the SF86 questionnaire, said "sources familiar with the matter." Among those "walked out of the building by security" were Caroline Wiles, President Trump's director of scheduling. "Two sources close to Wiles" indicate Wiles will find another position in the Department of the Treasury. Wiles, the Tampa Bay (FL) Times (2/16, 785K) reports, formerly served as an aide to Florida Gov. Rick Scott.

Senate Judiciary Committee To Begin Gorsuch Hearings March 20.

The Washington Post (2/16, Sullivan, 11.43M) reports that the Senate Judiciary Committee announced Thursday that it will begin hearings on the nomination of Judge Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court on March 20. A tweet from the committee read, "Chairman @ChuckGrassley:

@SenJudiciary Committee to begin hearing on the nomination of Judge Neil Gorsuch for #SCOTUS on March 20th." The hearings "are expected to span several days and draw intense public scrutiny." The New York Times (2/16, Pérez-Peña, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says Democrats are "angry that Republicans refused to allow President Barack Obama to fill the seat over the last 11 months of his presidency," and "have vowed tough questioning" of Gorsuch. While Gorsuch has "strong legal credentials, some Democrats are likely to oppose him, with many people on the left demanding that they push back against Mr. Trump in any way they can."

In an op-ed for USA Today (2/16, 5.28M), Senate Judiciary Chairman Charles Grassley criticizes Senate Democrats for "signal[ing] plans to block any nomination made by the newly-elected president even before he announced his nomination" after "criticizing Republicans for taking a principled position about a lame duck president that was advocated by Democrats for decades." Arguing that there should not be "one set of rules for Republicans and another set of rules for Democrats," Grassley writes, "We won't abide by such a double standard."

Trump: New Version Of Travel Ban Executive Order Coming Next Week.

Reuters (2/16, Rascoe) reports that during his Thursday news conference, President Trump said that he "will issue a new version next week of his executive order banning citizens of seven mostly Muslim countries and all refugees" from traveling to the US some time next week. The President "once again blasted federal courts that blocked the implementation of his travel ban," but said the new order will address the concerns raised by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals. Trump said, "The new order is going to be very much tailored to what I consider to be a very bad decision." The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Dolan, Kaleem, 4.52M) says Trump "did not clarify details of what would be in the new order," and McClatchy (2/16, Ordoñez, 74K) similarly says that Trump "didn't give much information on what the new order would be."

The New York Times (2/16, Liptak, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports the Justice Department told the appeals court on Thursday "that it would not seek a rehearing of a decision that shut down President Trump's targeted travel ban. Instead, the administration will start from scratch." In a brief, the DOJ said, "Rather than continuing this litigation, the president intends in the near future to rescind the order and replace it with a new, substantially revised executive order to eliminate what the panel erroneously thought were constitutional concerns." The Washington Post (2/16, Zapotosky, 11.43M) reports that Washington State Attorney General Bob Ferguson, who sued over the ban, "wrote on Twitter that the Justice Department filing, in particular, 'recognizes the obvious – the President's current Exec Order violates the Constitution.'"

The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Dolan, 4.52M) reports that the Ninth Circuit said late Thursday that it will "take no further action on President Trump's travel ban while the administration prepares new, more limited restrictions."

ABC World News Tonight (2/16, story 5, 0:15, Muir, 14.63M) and the CBS Evening News (2/16, story 3, 0:15, Pelley, 11.17M) each had very brief items on the President's statement. Fox News Special Report (2/16, 1.53M) said Trump will unveil "a new executive order on extreme vetting," but John Roberts said "the real question is will it pass legal muster? The first one certainly did not." The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Kendall, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) and the Washington Times (2/16, Noble, 272K) also have reports.

Trump Says He Will "Show Great Heart" In Dealing With Dreamers. During his press conference Thursday, President Trump said he will "show great heart" in dealing with so-called Dreamers, "saying they are among the toughest decisions he has to make as he tries to formulate his immigration policy," the Washington Times (2/16, Dinan, 272K) reports. Referring to penalties that call for "expulsion of those who entered the country illegally," Trump said, "I find it very very hard doing what the law says to do."

The AP (2/16, Colvin) says Trump "spoke in unusually personal terms" about the issue. In what the AP describes as "a rare admission of uncertainty," Trump said, "We're going to show great heart. DACA is a very, very difficult subject for me, I will tell you. To me, it's one of the most difficult subjects I have...because you have these incredible kids, in many cases."

The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Bennett, Memoli, 4.52M) says Trump "wavered" on "whether he will stop shielding from deportation people who were brought to the US illegally as children."

While "an executive order has already been drafted to end" the DACA program, with Trump "showing less willingness to sign such an order, advisers have begun to explore alternatives," suggesting that "the White House is hesitant to publicly target a well-organized group of immigrants who have prominent public backing."

Fox News (2/16, 11.07M) notes that while Trump has said he will deal with Dreamers "with heart," he also said he has a lot of politicians to convince. In separate coverage, the AP (2/16, Colvin) reports President Trump has not yet said whether Dreamers will be allowed to remain in the country, though he had "previously suggested those covered by the program would be safe from immediate deportation."

However, "Democrats were immediately skeptical" of Trump's statements, The Hill (2/16, Lillis, Bernal, 1.25M) adds. The chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, Rep. Tony Cardenas, said, "I have absolutely no reason to believe anything that comes out of his mouth or anything that he tweets."

Politico (2/16, McCaskill, 2.46M) provide similar coverage.

Ten Key Questions About DACA Program Examined. CNN (2/16, Almasy, Shoichet, 29.79M) examines what it says are 10 key questions about the DACA program, which it says are critical to consider while President Trump weighs what to do with the program. They include questions about which immigrants are allowed to participate in the program, what protections the program affords these immigrants, and what the current standing is of the program.

Media Analyses: Trump's Performance At News Conference Unseemly, Unprecedented.

Media coverage characterizes President Trump's Thursday press conference as an "angry," "defensive," "rambling" "spectacle" that was unprecedented in modern-day politics. The overwhelmingly negative reporting takes issue with Trump's criticism of the media, and provides little coverage of Trump's recap of the early days of his Administration and stated successes. However, analysts also predicted Trump's return to his campaign-style interaction with the press was likely to play well with his supporters. NBC Nightly News  (2/16, lead story, 5:30, Holt, 16.61M), for example, reported in its lead story that the left has written about the press conference as a "meltdown," while the right has "heralded" it as "the trashing of the media in an epic news conference." At any rate, NBC added, people from all political viewpoints likely agree that it "was pretty much unlike anything we've heard from behind a presidential podium." Indicative of the overall tenor of much of the coverage, USA Today (2/16, Wolf, 5.28M) refers to "one of the wildest presidential press conferences on record" – one that included "a rambling, defensive and at times angry performance by the leader of the free world." During the "spectacle for the ages," USA Today adds, Trump "lashed out at the media, Hillary Clinton, the intelligence community, judges and Democrats – among many others."

Politico (2/16, Dawsey, 2.46M) says that "after stewing in anger during four rocky weeks" as President, the press conference "appeared to be a cathartic moment" for Trump, who aides say "has found running the government harder than expected." However, Politico says Trump "seemed to be in his element" on Thursday. Trump, according to the AP (2/16, Lemire), "bullied reporters, dismissed facts and then cracked a few caustic jokes." The AP says that "combination" made Trump "irresistible cable TV fodder" during the campaign. Bloomberg Politics (2/16, Sink, 201K) says Trump "appeared to satisfy his itch to duke it out with a press corps he feels has treated him unfairly since his inauguration." Bloomberg adds that Trump's supporters "no doubt ate it up" and possibly saw that the President "seemed to enjoy his banter with reporters, so much so that he could barely pry himself away from the cameras." Bloomberg quotes Trump as saying that he is "actually having a very good time." Trump added, "Don't forget, that's the way I won. Remember, I used to give you a news conference every time I made a speech? Which was like every day." Reuters (2/16, Holland) similarly reports the President's "message" during the press conference "appeared aimed at the same voters who elected him" and "feel Washington has left them behind and who like his image as an outsider trying to shake up the establishment."

The Washington Times (2/16, Miller, Boyer, 272K) reports Trump said the "level of dishonest" in the media "is out of control" as news organizations are siding with special interests rather than average Americans. The media, Trump said, is "trying to attack our administration because they know we are following through on pledges that we made, and they're not happy about it." The New York Post (2/16, Halper, 3.82M), with a front page that the Drudge Report shows as having a picture of Trump dressed as a circus ringmaster with the headline "Wildest Show On Earth" – says Trump indicated he was using the press conference to take his message "straight to the people." The Huffington Post (2/16, Wilkie, 237K) reports that Trump said this was necessary because "many of our nation's reporters and folks will not tell you the truth and will not treat the wonderful people of our country with the respect they deserve." Trump added that "much of the media" based in the District of Columbia, New York, and Los Angeles "in particular" do not speak for average Americans, "but for the special interests and for those profiting off a very, very obviously broken system." However, the New York Times (2/16, Baker, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that despite his criticism of the media, Trump at "one point plaintively pleaded for understanding." Trump said "the tone" of cable news commentary about him "is such hatred," adding, "I'm really not a bad person."

The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) editorializes that Trump provided a clear and coherent message that was far from a bad performance. The New York Times (2/16, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) editorializes that Trump "needed the press to play the punching bag that so delighted his political base," while Chris Cillizza says in a Washington Post (2/16, 11.43M) analysis that Trump "understands" that the media "represent everything" his supporters "dislike about American society." Cillizza indicates that Trump's supporters view the media as made up of "Ivy-League-educated coastal elites who look down their noses at the average person, dismissing them and their views as stupid and ill-informed." In a Washington Times (2/16, 272K) column, Charles Hunt says Trump "is an agent of total disruption, bordering on chaos – everything American voters would like to see set upon Washington." Hunt adds that Trump – who is not "a politician," is not "polished by public relations experts," and "doesn't always speak with complete precision" – "always gets his point across." Trump, Hunt continues, "wants to shake things up" and Americans "stand behind him." On Fox News' Hannity  (2/16, 535K), Sean Hannity called Trump's press conference "a historic beatdown of the alt-left propaganda media and they had it coming. ... It is very refreshing to see a commander in chief who will fight back against the all the dishonesty, all the smears, and set the record straight with you, the American people." The hashtag #TrumpPressConference was trending on Twitter throughout the day Thursday and Thursday night. Tweets were largely – but not universally – negative toward Trump.

Meanwhile, a New York Times (2/16, Shear, Haberman, Thrush, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) analysis says it is "unlikely" that Trump's press conference "will divert much long-term attention from questions" that his Administration has faced. Chuck Todd said on NBC Nightly News  (2/16, story 2, 1:10, Holt, 16.61M) that while the press conference likely played well with Trump's base, it "did nothing to somehow cause" concerned lawmakers "to be less uneasy." Howard Kurtz said on Fox News Special Report  (2/16, 1.53M) that "the other news he made today was drowned out by his assault on the media which doesn't help him pass his legislative agenda, the thing that would actually ensure he gets more positive press." However, Chris Wallace said on Fox News' O'Reilly Factor  (2/16, 767K) that "this was a determined effort by this President, who is by far the best spokesman in his administration, for his administration, to seize the narrative." Wallace added, "This is a President saying, 'I am in charge, I know what I'm doing. I am not going to bend to Washington. Washington is going to have to get used to me.'"

The Washington Post (2/16, Parker, Wagner, 11.43M) reports that Trump "alternated between claims that he had 'inherited a mess' and the assertion that his fledgling administration 'is running like a fine-tuned machine.'" The Post adds that Trump "seemed to acknowledge the widespread reports of turbulence and upheaval emanating out of his West Wing." Trump said, according to The Hill (2/16, Fabian, 1.25M), "I turn on the TV, open the newspapers and I see stories of chaos. Chaos. Yet it is the exact opposite." The CBS Evening News  (2/16, lead story, 4:15, Pelley, 11.17M) showed Trump adding, "This administration is running like a fine-tuned machine." The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Bierman, Memoli, Lauter, 4.52M) reports that Trump "countered that all of his early setbacks were the fault of others, the product of 'fake news' reporting or both." Trump said, "I inherited a mess," adding, "It's a mess at home and abroad."

McClatchy (2/16, Kumar, Ordoñez, 74K) reports that Trump "boasted of his successes despite a series of setbacks" – including an appellate court ruling of his immigration executive order, the resignation of former National Security Adviser Flynn, the withdrawal of former Labor Secretary nominee Andrew Puzder, and leaks from the White House and federal agencies. Roll Call (2/16, Bennett, 63K) says Trump "hammered Democrats at several points, saying 'the only thing they can do is delay because they screwed things up royally.'" According to Roll Call, Trump "used the criticism as a way to pivot to a list of first-month actions he said he took to reverse Democratic policies" and uphold "a promise I made to the American people." The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Lee, Paletta, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) quotes Trump as saying, "There has never been a presidency that's done so much in such a short period of time" and "we have not even started the big work yet." Jonathan Karl reported on ABC World News Tonight  (2/16, lead story, 4:45, Muir, 14.63M) that Trump "pointed to the soaring stock market, his executive orders cutting regulations and the smooth roll-out of his Supreme Court nominee."

Media Considers Truthfulness Of Trump's Statements. A New York Times (2/16, Fandos, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) analysis says that while Trump accused the media of dishonesty, he "uttered several falsehoods of his own." The Times highlights "some of the most important," which include: winning the most electoral college votes since former President Ronald Reagan; the US Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit is "in chaos"; and that he inherited an economy that was a "mess."

The CBS Evening News  (2/16, story 6, 1:35, Pelley, 11.17M) reported that while Trump received 304 electoral votes, former President Obama won 365 and former President George H.W. Bush had 426. The AP (2/16, Boak, Woodward) reports that "economic stats and territorial losses of Islamic State insurgents don't support [Trump's] assertions about the problems handed to him on those fronts." The AP says that "by almost every economic measure," Obama "inherited a far worse situation" in 2009 than Trump took over. The AP adds that ISIS "began to lose ground before Trump took office."

The Washington Post (2/16, 11.43M) reports that "there's a fair amount of truth" to Trump's statement that "drugs are becoming cheaper than candy bars." Drugs, the Post says, "are often incredibly inexpensive, particularly per dose." The Post cites a 2015 Baltimore Sun report that said "peewee" capsules of heroin sold for about six dollars per dose in West Baltimore and opiate painkillers "can sometimes be even cheaper" at "the per-pill level." Moreover, another Washington Post (2/16, 11.43M) piece says that while "it is true that some drug in some quantity might be less expensive than some candy bar at some size," the "cheapest drug is going to be more expensive than a relatively pricey candy bar." The Post provides examples of drug prices that it identified by searching on Quora.

Cummings: Trump Made Up "Story About Me." The Washington Post (2/16, Portnoy, 11.43M) reports that Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-MD) denied Trump's claim that the lawmaker would not meet with the President despite repeated requests from the White House. Trump, during the press conference, "speculated that Cummings may have been dissuaded from coming to the White House for political reasons." Cummings said in a statement, "I have no idea why President Trump would make up a story about me like he did today. Of course, Senator Schumer never told me to skip a meeting with the President."

WPost Analysis: Trump's Comment To Black Reporter "Crystallized The Unusual Nature" Of Presidency. The Washington Post (2/16, Bump, 11.43M) reports "few moments crystallized the unusual nature" of Trump's Administration as "effectively as an exchange" with April Ryan of American Urban Radio Networks. When Ryan stood up to ask Trump if he would include the Congressional Black Caucus in discussions about urban policy, the Post says, Trump responded by asking the reporter if she "want[s] to set up the meeting." Trump added, "Are they friends of yours? Set up a meeting."

ABC World News Tonight  (2/16, story 4, 1:50, Muir, 14.63M) reported Trump's response left "members of the Congressional Black Caucus in shock." Rep. Emanuel Cleaver (D-MO) said that Trump made an "assumption" that "because there was a black woman in the room," she "had a unique connection with the Congressional Black Caucus." Cummings said on CNN's Situation Room  (2/16, 554K) that Trump likely "saw an African-American woman connected with the Congressional Black Caucus and said maybe they're friends." Cummings said that "every time

[Trump] talks...about the inner city, he has negative things to say." Cummings added, "I wish he could walk into some of the areas that I live in and where people are doing extremely well, taking very good care of their families, and he needs to have a bigger picture of the African-American communities and our cities."

Durbin Says Press Conference Was "Hard To Follow." Senate Minority Whip Durbin said on CNN's The Lead  (2/16, 320K) that Trump's press conference was "hard to follow. There were so many different things he said. It clearly was a spur-of-the-moment decision. And what I think frankly we should reflect on is we're dealing with some extremely serious questions." Durbin added, "The President would have been well-advised to sit down for five minutes with his legal counsel before that press conference and get a few things straight before he made these statements."

Media Analyses: Trump-CNN Conflict Reaches New Stage. The New York Post (2/16, Atkinson, 3.82M) reports that both Trump and CNN "took a blowtorch to the blowup" between the two sides during the press conference. The Post says Trump "made it personal" when he told White House correspondent Jim Acosta to "ask [CNN Worldwide President] Jeff Zucker how he got his job, OK?" The Post says "it was not immediately known what Trump meant." Politico (2/16, Weprin, 2.46M) says Zucker on Thursday said that Trump's comments about CNN being fake news are a "badge of honor" and the network's coverage of the Administration has increased employee morale.

Kushner Complained To Time Warner Executive About CNN Coverage. The Wall Street Journal (2/16, Hagey, Paletta, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports senior adviser Jared Kushner met with Time Warner executive Gary Ginsberg in recent weeks and expressed the Administration's concerns about CNN's coverage, according to a White House official. Kushner, the Journal says, complained about unfair and slanted coverage against the President.

Fox News' Smith Blasts Trump's Performance. USA Today (2/16, Cummings, 5.28M) reports Fox News anchor Shepard Smith "is under fire for criticizing" Trump's interaction with Acosta and refusing to answer questions about ties to Russia. Smith on Thursday said that Trump "keeps repeating ridiculous, throwaway lines that are not true at all and sort of avoiding this issue of Russia as if we're some kind of fools for asking the question." Smith added, "We have a right to know. You call us fake news and put us down like children for asking questions on behalf of the American people."

O'Reilly: Trump Did Not Understand "How Extensive The Problem Really Is." In his "Talking Points Memo" segment on Fox News' O'Reilly Factor  (2/16, 767K), Bill O'Reilly said, "When President Trump first mentioned draining the swamp in Washington, I don't believe he understood how extensive the problem really is. For eight years of President Obama, there are many people working in the federal government who like the former President and who despise Mr. Trump. Eliminating all of them and stopping the leaks, pretty much be impossible. Also don't trying to get fairness out of the anti-Trump press is impossible as well. So, the Trump Administration has its hands full."

Powers: Trump "Probably A Little Frustrated" With Spicer. Kirsten Powers said on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360  (2/16, 686K) that from Trump's perspective, the press conference "shows he's probably a little frustrated with Sean Spicer," and "this is how he would like press conferences to be handled."

Podesta: Trump Is Trying To "Disorient Public Perceptions" Of News. In a Washington Post (2/16, 11.43M) op-ed, former Hillary Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta says Trump's "fake-news pivot isn't subtle" as he "benefited from fake news stories during the campaign" and has President "has constantly used the epithet against mainstream media outlets that dare criticize him." Trump, according to Podesta, "is deploying a strategy, used by autocrats, designed to completely disorient public perception." Podesta says that Trump "seeks nothing less than to undermine the public's belief that any news can be trusted" and that "any news is true."

NYTimes Criticizes Trump's Answer To Anti-Semitism Question. A New York Times (2/16, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) editorial criticizes the President's answer to a question about the rise of anti-Semitic incidents in the US, saying that "as is so often the case, he began with a focus on himself and skirted the issue." He then "once again...exploited the Jewish members of his family to bolster his credibility," before deriding the question as "very insulting."

INTERNATIONAL NEWS

Trump: Hopes For Russian Reset May Have Been Dashed By "Horrible Fake Reporting."

USA Today (2/16, Dorell, 5.28M) reports President Trump said Thursday during a White House press conference that his hopes for a reset of US-Russia relations may have been dashed by "false reporting" by the news media about alleged connections between his staff and Russian officials. "It would be great if we could get along with Russia," Trump told reporters. "But it's possible I won't be able to get along with (Russian President Vladimir) Putin." The reason: "The false reporting by the media, by you people, false, horrible fake reporting, makes it much harder to make a deal with Russia." In its lead story, NBC Nightly News  (2/16, lead story, 5:30, Holt, 16.61M) reported Trump "insisted the negative headlines could hurt chances for a Russian reset," and ABC World News Tonight  (2/16, lead story, 4:45, Muir, 14.63M) said in its lead story that the President called reports of his advisers' contacts with Russians "fake."

Trump, the Wall Street Journal (2/16, A1, Hodge, Lubold, Barnes, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports, also suggested that a series of recent military provocations from Russia were likely signs Putin had concluded he couldn't reset ties with the Administration in the current political environment. In its lead story, the CBS Evening News  (2/16, lead story, 4:15, Pelley, 11.17M) said that when asked if Russia is testing him, Trump replied, "No, I don't think so. I think Putin probably assumes that he can't make a deal with me anymore because politically it would be unpopular for a politician to make a deal."

ABC World News Tonight  (2/16, story 3, 2:00, Muir, 14.63M) reported when asked about the "series of provocative military moves" by Russia, the President called the incidents "not good." When asked about a US response, the President said, "I'm not going to tell you anything about what response I do. I don't talk about military response." The New York Times (2/16, Hauser, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Trump said his critics probably think "the greatest thing I could do is shoot that ship that's 30 miles offshore right out of the water." He ruled that out.

Charles Krauthammer said on Fox News Special Report  (2/16, 1.53M), "When he says the greatest thing I could do is shoot that ship out of the water, I kind of sat up because that means initiating World War III. What's revealing about this is that Trump's response to this idea is to think about what the reaction would be, rather than the intrinsic merits of starting a third world war."

Former CIA Director Leon Panetta said on CNN's Situation Room  (2/16, 554K) that Trump "really does need to understand that Russia is an adversary and will do everything it can to undermine" the US. He added that while Trump is trying to establish a relationship with Russia, "you cannot establish a relationship with Putin...from weakness." Panetta said that Putin thinks he has the upper hand, which is "why it's important for the President of the United States to draw those lines and to work with NATO...to make clear that there are lines that cannot be crossed."

House Armed Services Chairman Mac Thornberry similarly told CNN's Situation Room  (2/16, 554K) that if "you don't stand up to provocation and aggression, it will get worse. And that's true whether we're talking about Russia, China, Iran, North Korea, or terrorists."

Tillerson, Mattis Signal No Quick Changes To US-Russia Ties.

The AP (2/16, Baldor, Lee) reports that during separate visits to Europe on Thursday, Secretary of State Tillerson and Defense Secretary Mattis "signaled...there will be no change soon in US-Russian relations, putting the onus on Moscow to prove itself if it wants closer cooperation with Washington." At a NATO meeting in Brussels, Mattis "made clear the United States isn't ready to collaborate militarily" with Moscow against ISIS or other threats, and after meeting with Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov in Germany, Tillerson "said Moscow first must help stop violence in Ukraine." The AP says their remarks "appeared to put the brakes on a rapid transformation in US-Russian ties."

NBC Nightly News  (2/16, story 3, 1:40, Holt, 16.61M) similarly reported said Mattis made "it clear that cooperation is not imminent," while Tillerson adopted a "tough tone on Russia" over its involvement in Ukraine, saying, "We expect Russia honor its commitment and work to deescalate the violence in the Ukraine." Likewise, Reuters (2/16, Stewart, Emmott) says their remarks are "perhaps the strongest indication yet from the Trump administration that prospects for any significant cooperation between the US and Russian militaries against Islamic State in Syria is unlikely anytime soon."

The Wall Street Journal (2/16, A1, Hodge, Paletta, Barnes, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports in a front-page story that Mattis rejected renewed military collaboration with Russia just hours after President Vladimir Putin called on NATO and other nations to work with Russia in Syria and elsewhere. "It's in everyone's interest to resume dialogue with the intelligence agencies of the US and other members of NATO," Putin said.

Calling Thursday "a landmark day" for Tillerson, meanwhile, the Washington Post (2/16, Morello, 11.43M) says the "centerpiece...was his one-hour meeting" with Lavrov, and "when it was over, Tillerson came out and read aloud a five-sentence statement." Tillerson said they discussed a "range of issues," but "the only one he mentioned specifically was the ongoing violence in eastern Ukraine." Fox News Special Report  (2/16, 1.53M) reported that during "his first overseas trip," Tillerson "outlined what he expects from the relationship with Russia." Tillerson was shown saying the US "will consider working with Russia when we can find areas of practical cooperation that will benefit the American people. Where we do not see eye-to-eye, the United States will stand up with the interests and values of America and her allies."

A USA Today (2/16, 5.28M) editorial says that while Trump "appears convinced that Russian assistance would speed up the defeat of ISIS," an alliance with Russia "would be a Faustian arrangement where the US would be drawn into an association with Russia's murderous partner, Syrian President Bashar Assad." Daniel DePetris, a fellow at Defense Priorities, writes in an accompanying USA Today (2/16, 5.28M) op-ed that the US and Russia should work together, but acknowledges that it won't "be easy." He argues that "refusing to explore the option misses an opportunity, and it would leave the US in the risky position of introducing more adversity into a relationship with a country that is still a major power."

Bloomberg News (2/16, Wadhams, Donahue, Arkhipov, 2.41M), meanwhile, says "all eyes were on...Tillerson's meeting with his Russian counterpart...and as first encounters go, it was awkward." Bloomberg says that while "protocol dictates the two would shake hands, exchange platitudes in front of the clicking cameras, and perhaps take an impromptu question before retiring for a private chat," journalists "got a swift signal to exit the room" when Tillerson began to speak. Reuters (2/16, Shalal) similarly notes that reporters were "ushered out when Tillerson began to speak."

Pentagon To Present Trump Option Of Sending Ground Troops To Syria.

Two senior US defense officials told NBC Nightly News  (2/16, story 3, 1:40, Holt, 16.61M) that President Trump is set to be presented with the option of deploying "possibly hundreds" of ground troops to Syria to join Special Forces already there. Under the plan, US helicopters and artillery would also be sent.

Dunford To Visit Turkey For Talks On Raqqa.

The AP (2/16) reports Turkish Defense Minister Fikri Isik said Thursday that Joint Chiefs Chairman Gen. Joseph Dunford will arrive in Ankara on Friday for talks on a possible joint operation to recapture Raqqa. Isik told reporters in Brussels that Dunford's visit would help Washington assess whether Turkey and the US could act jointly.

Astana Talks End With No Agreement.

The AP (2/16, Issa) reports Syrian government officials met face-to-face with rebels "for the second time in three weeks" in Kazakhstan on Thursday, "as diplomats stepped up efforts to lay the groundwork for UN-brokered peace talks next week" in Geneva. However, Reuters (2/16, Auyezov) reports Thursday's talks ended "with no joint communique, usually the minimum outcome of any diplomatic negotiation, and saw opposing Syrian groups exchanging angry tirades at each other and the brokers."

ISIS Executes "Scores" Of US-Backed Syrian Rebels.

The Washington Post (2/16, Loveluck, 11.43M) reports ISIS-linked militants in western Syria have executed "scores of rebel fighters as part of an intensifying battle with what remains of the country's armed opposition, a monitoring group said." The militants, "an offshoot of the Jund al-Aqsa group, killed more than 150 rebels" in the village of Khan Sheikhoun in Idlib province, the SITE Intelligence Group reported Wednesday. Most of the purported victims were believed to be part of the US-backed Jaish al-Nasr group, but the report "could not be independently verified."

At Least 45 Killed In Baghdad Market Bombing Claimed By ISIS.

ABC World News Tonight  (2/16, story 7, 0:25, Muir, 14.63M) reported that "at least 51 people were killed and more than 60 wounded" Thursday in a bombing at a Baghdad car market. ISIS has claimed responsibility for the attack, which the Washington Post (2/16, Salim, 11.43M) calls "the deadliest in a series of recent attacks in the Iraqi capital blamed on" the militant group. The attack was "at least the third bombing in the capital in as many days, and it appeared to be aimed at diverting the government as it prepares an offensive to drive the Islamic State from the northern city of Mosul." The New York Times (2/16, Zucchino, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) likewise says the attack "came as Iraqi security forces, backed by American military advisers and Special Operations forces, prepared to assault an Islamic State stronghold in Mosul." In response, Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi "convened an emergency meeting with top military and security officials Thursday night to discuss efforts to combat terrorist attacks."

ISIS Bombing Kills 75 At Pakistani Shrine.

ABC World News Tonight  (2/16, story 7, 0:25, Muir, 14.63M) reported in Karachi, Pakistan on Thursday, an ISIS suicide bomber attacked "a famous religious shrine, killing at least 75 worshipers and 200 wounded." The AP (2/16, Jawad, Ahmed) says the attack was the deadliest in the country "in more than two years." ISIS claimed responsibility for the attack in a statement circulated by its Aamaq news agency, saying it had targeted a "Shiite gathering."

The Washington Post (2/16, Constable, Mehdi, 11.43M) says the bombing at the Lal Shahbaz Qalandar shrine "followed three successive days of violence that claimed 25 lives in all four provinces of Pakistan and two tribal areas." Just a day earlier, Pakistan "lodged a formal complaint with next-door Afghanistan, alleging that the Islamic State-linked militants were operating from sanctuaries across the border." The New York Times (2/16, Masood, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that a spokesman for the armed forces, Maj. Gen. Asif Ghafoor, announced on Twitter after the attack that Pakistan was closing its border with Afghanistan "effective immediately," and the Los Angeles Times (2/16, Ali, Sahi, 4.52M) reports Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif "said in a statement that Thursday's bombing was an attack on the whole of Pakistan."

Britain: "No Doubt" US Committed To Working With Allies.

Reuters (2/16) reports Britain said Thursday after talks between Foreign Secretary Boris Johnson and Secretary of State Tillerson that it had "absolutely no doubt" that the US was committed to working closely with its allies to tackle crises around the world. "There was absolutely no doubt that the US remains as committed as ever to working closely with us, and other likeminded partners, to face up to aggression and tackle tough problems around the world," a Foreign Office spokesman said in a statement.

The two met on the sidelines of a G20 meeting in Germany, where the AP (2/16, Jordans) reports envoys met "to discuss current conflicts and ways to prevent future crises, against a backdrop of uncertainty among allies and adversaries over the direction of US foreign policy." German Foreign Minister Sigmar Gabriel "rebuffed" President Trump's stated goal of putting "America first," saying, "Security in the world can't be achieved without justice and a better life for everybody." Bloomberg Politics (2/16, Donahue, 201K) reports State Department officials "stressed that Tillerson is using his initial trip both to engage with the G20 and to introduce himself to key allies."

Tillerson Staying At Sanatorium During G20. According to Bloomberg Politics (2/16, Donahue, 201K), Tillerson was "forced to stay at a sanatorium in a German village known for its hot springs, 30 minutes from where other world leaders gathered," because Bonn's hotels "were all booked by the time he confirmed his attendance" at this week's meeting.

Lithuania Confident Of US Commitment To NATO.

In an interview with the AP (2/16, Cook), Lithuanian Defense Minister Raimundas Karoblis said Thursday he is confident that all NATO allies, including the US, will help protect his country from Russia. Karoblis said he had no doubts about "the solidarity from any NATO country, including the United States." Noting that Defense Secretary Mattis warned NATO allies this week to boost defense spending to two percent of economic output, Karoblis said Lithuania is on target to meet the spending benchmark next year.

Also noting Mattis' call this week, the Washington Post (2/16, Faiola, 11.43M) reports that ahead of a major security conference in Munich this week, Chancellor Angela Merkel "and her defense minister both acknowledged the need for Germany to ramp up military spending as the Trump administration increases pressure on European allies to pull more of their weight." Yet the Post says the comments by Merkel and Defense Minister Ursula von der Leyen "remained vague enough to suggest that Germany, even as it moves to reverse decades of defense cuts, may not move as fast as some hope."

Meanwhile, Reuters (2/16, Rinke) reports European Commission President Jean-Claude Juncker "said on Thursday that Europe must not cave in to US demands to raise military spending, arguing that development and humanitarian aid could also count as security." Said Junker, "I don't like our American friends narrowing down this concept of security to the military."

In an interview with Bloomberg Politics (2/16, Ummelas, 201K), Estonian Defense Minister Margus Tsahkna said Russia is testing NATO's willingness to respond to provocation, demonstrating the need for the members to increase spending on defense. "When we look at Russia's behavior after the US elections, they have slowly been increasing tensions, and their behavior has become more aggressive, including on violating international law," Tsahkna said. "The limits are really being tested now. I hope this won't open new conflict areas. That's why NATO has to be prepared."

NYTimes Analysis: Pro-Russian "Ukrainian Team" Scuttled Dutch Trade Pact.

The New York Times (2/16, Higgins, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Harry van Bommel, a "left-wing member of the Dutch Parliament, had persuasive allies in convincing voters that they should reject a trade pact with Ukraine" last April – a special "Ukrainian team" of "gleefully contrarian group of émigrés whose sympathies lay with Russia." According to the Times, they "attended public meetings, appeared on television and used social media to denounce Ukraine's pro-Western government as a bloodthirsty kleptocracy, unworthy of Dutch support." However, they were "actually from Russia, or from Russian-speaking regions of Ukraine, and parroted the Kremlin line."

Haley: US Still Supports Two-State Solution.

Reuters (2/16, Parker) reports Ambassador Haley said Thursday that the US still supports a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, just one day after President Trump "suggested he is open to new ways to achieve peace." Speaking to reporters at the UN, Haley said, "First of all, the two-state solution is what we support. Anybody that wants to say the United States does not support the two-state solution – that would be an error." She added that the US is "thinking out of the box as well: which is what does it take to bring these two sides to the table? What do we need to have them agree on?" The New York Times (2/16, Sengupta, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Haley "said nothing about what that approach would be, nor did she go any further in revealing a coherent picture of United States policy on the conflict." The AP (2/16, Lederer) says Haley's comments were "far more forceful in support of a two-state solution than...Trump's," and Bloomberg Politics (2/16, Foroohar, 201K) reports that while they "weren't in conflict with Trump's remarks...they added to confusion about Mideast policy in the new US administration."

Meanwhile, Reuters (2/16, Irish) reports French Foreign Minister Jean-Marc Ayrault said

Thursday that his nation considers the US position "confused and worrying." Speaking after talks with Secretary of State Tillerson in Germany, Ayrault said, "I found that there was a bit more precision (on foreign policy) even if I found that on the Israeli-Palestinian dossier it was very confused and worrying."

In Israel on Thursday, Reuters (2/16, Heller) reports Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's "far-right political allies hailed" the "shift in US support for a Palestinian state," but the Washington Post (2/16, Booth, Gearan, 11.43M) reports that there is debate among Israelis about "exactly what the new American leader meant." Many "saw a new day," while "others felt uneasy." And some "thought the president didn't seem to know what he was talking about and was just throwing out words and phrases." The New York Times (2/16, Kershner, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) likewise says both Israelis and Palestinians are "feverishly debating what might come next, still confused about American policy" after Haley reasserted that the Administration "absolutely" supported two states. Another New York Times (2/16, Landler, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) piece says the President "has just as readily reversed himself, sowing confusion among allies and adversaries and raising questions about how seriously to take any of his pronouncements."

The Los Angeles Times (2/16, Mitnick, King, 4.52M) reports that in Ramallah, few now "believe that the new US administration will help advance the cause of Palestinian statehood, and that doubt is echoed across much of the Arab world."

Tillerson Denies Suggesting US Wants To Scrap Iran Deal.

Reuters (2/16) reports Secretary of State Tillerson "said on Thursday he did not suggest to French Foreign Minister Jean-Marc Ayrault that Washington planned to scrap the Iranian nuclear agreement." Asked about a report which cited Ayrault as saying the French had the impression that Washington wanted to get rid of the deal, Tillerson told reporters, "I didn't leave any such impression."

After Talks With Tillerson, Saudis Voice Optimism About US Relations.

The AP (2/16, Lee) reports that after talks Thursday with Secretary of State Tillerson, Saudi Foreign Minister Adel al-Jubeir said his country expects to have a productive relationship with the Trump Administration and is optimistic about US-Saudi cooperation. "We look forward to working with the Trump administration on all issues," al-Jubeir said. "We are very, very optimistic about our ability to resolve issues in the region." The AP notes that during a meeting on Yemen with Jubeir and the foreign ministers of Britain, Oman and the UAE, Tillerson "did not respond to a reporter's question about the Trump administration's proposed travel ban for citizens of seven mainly Muslim nations." In fact, the AP says he "made no substantive remarks in the presence of reporters."

Saudi-Led Coalition Strike Hits Yemeni Funeral, Killing 10. Reuters (2/16) reports a Saudi-led coalition airstrike on Thursday hit a house north of Sanaa where residents said a crowd of mourners was gathered, "killing nine women and a child and injuring dozens." The Saudi-led coalition said it was investigating reports of civilian casualties. The AP (2/16) reports Jamie McGoldrick, the UN humanitarian coordinator in Yemen, said he was "saddened and appalled" by the attack, noting that "it is not the first time that a funeral gathering is struck by airstrikes, nor is it the first time that women and children are killed in civilian premises such as hospitals, schools and private homes."

Tillerson Condemns North Korean Missile Test.

Bloomberg News (2/16, Wadhams, 2.41M) reports Secretary of State Tillerson vowed that North Korea's violations of UN Security Council resolutions will bring an "even stronger international response." In a statement issued jointly with the foreign ministers of Japan and South Korea after talk on the sidelines of the G20 meeting in Bonn, Tillerson condemned "in the strongest terms" a Feb. 12 ballistic missile test and noting the North's "flagrant disregard" for UN Security Council resolutions.

Third Suspect Arrested In Killing Of North Korean Leader's Half-Brother. The AP (2/16, Ng) reports Malaysian authorities announced the arrest of a third suspect Thursday in the death of North Korean leader Kim Jong-Un's half-brother, Kim Jong-Nam, on Monday. Three suspects – two women and a man – were arrested separately. The women were identified using surveillance videos from Kuala Lumpur International Airport, where Kim Jong-Nam "suddenly fell ill." Police said they had detained a Malaysian man "believed to be the boyfriend" of one of the female suspects. According to the Washington Post (2/16, Fifield, 11.43M), "South Korea's often-unreliable intelligence service and some analysts in China" believe Kim Jong-Un is "suspect No. 1 in the apparent assassination," but "many questions remain. Why would Kim Jong Un want to kill a half brother who...had shown no political ambitions?" NBC Nightly News  (2/16, story 7, 1:55, Holt, 16.61M) similarly reported that "speculation raising that Kim Jong-Un himself ordered the execution of Kim Jong-Nam."

Trump: Rubio And I Have "Very Similar Views On Cuba."

The Miami Herald (2/16, Torres, 856K) reports the President said during yesterday's White House press conference that he shares Sen. Marco Rubio's views on Cuba. "We had dinner with Senator Rubio and his wife, who was by the way, lovely, and we had a very good discussion about Cuba, because we have very similar views on Cuba," Trump told journalists.

Mexican Populist Rises Amid Anti-Trump Sentiment.

The Washington Post (2/16, Partlow, 11.43M) reports that the "outrage" in Mexico over President Trump's proposals to build a border wall and renegotiate NAFTA has "elevated a longtime politician who has unnerved the country's business community with his nationalist views and leftist rhetoric." Political opponents have compared Andrés Manuel López Obrador, widely known as AMLO, with the late Hugo Chávez. The Post says "while that may be an exaggeration," López Obrador "can bring thousands into the streets on command" and his critics "worry that his penchant for stubborn resistance could provoke confrontation with the United States, while his fans see him as a defender of the common man."

WPost Analysis: Trump Has Led To "Unexpected Surge" Of Left In Germany.

The Washington Post (2/16, Faiola, 11.43M) reports that the "unconventional administration of President Trump may be causing consternation among American liberals," but in Germany, "Trump's rise is helping fuel an unexpected surge of the left." The Social Democrats (SPD) have "bounced back under the charismatic Martin Schulz, the former head of the European Parliament who took over as party chairman last month and is now staging a surprisingly strong bid to unseat Chancellor Angela Merkel."

Merkel Testifies Before Panel On Alleged US Eavesdropping. The AP (2/16, Moulson) reports German Chancellor Angela Merkel told lawmakers that "she stands by her 2013 complaint that 'spying among friends' is unacceptable as she testified Thursday to a committee examining alleged US surveillance...as well as questionable activities by German intelligence – which she said she heard about only much later." Merkel stressed the importance and difficulty of "finding the right balance between freedom and security."

Bild Apologizes For False Report On Sexual Assaults By Migrants. The New York Times (2/16, Eddy, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Germany's Bild newspapers has "emphatically" apologized to its readers for an article that said a "mob" of Arab men had sexually assaulted women on New Year's Eve in a Frankfurt restaurant, "after the police said that an investigation had failed to turn up any evidence." The Times says the accusations "carried echoes of genuine attacks on New Year's Eve a year earlier."

Trudeau Seeks Closer Ties With EU.

The New York Times (2/16, Kanter, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Justin Trudeau because the first sitting Canadian prime minister to address the European Parliament on Thursday, declaring that "the whole world benefits from a strong EU." The Times says his address underscores Canada's close ties with the EU, "even as Britain prepares to leave...and as President Trump celebrates the fracturing of the 28-nation bloc." His speech came a day after the European Parliament ratified "a landmark trade deal that many economists and other observers see as a counterweight to the protectionist policies supported by Mr. Trump."

Samsung Heir Arrested On Bribery Charges.

The New York Times (2/16, Sang-Hun, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that the "de facto leader" of Samsung, Lee Jae-yong, was arrested Friday on bribery charges, in a "dramatic turn in South Korea's decades-old struggle to end collusive ties between the government and powerful family-controlled conglomerates." Lee is accused of paying $36 million in bribes to President Park Geun-hye's secretive confidante, Choi Soon-sil, in exchange for political favors from Park, including government support for a merger of two Samsung affiliates in 2015.

Strassel: Trump Must Back Out Of Paris Deal To Avoid Overstep By Judiciary.

Kimberley Strassel writes in a Wall Street Journal (2/16, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) column that President Trump needs to follow through on his campaign promise to roll back former President Obama's climate change prevention policy by withdrawing from the Paris climate accord. Strassel writes that some in the White House are reluctant to cause international uproar or think leaving is unnecessary because the deal is not binding. In response, she warns that the judiciary could require the EPA to execute the provisions of the Paris deal, as she notes the numerous lawsuits that have cropped up in response to Trump's policies.

Indonesia Pollster: Religious Sentiment Holds Sway Over Jakarta Governor Election.

The New York Times (2/16, Cochrane, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports unofficial estimates from independent polling agencies indicate that Jakarta governor candidates Basuki Tjahaja Purnama and Anies Baswedan will faceoff in an April runoff. The results of the Wednesday election favor Basuki, a Chinese Christian, at 43 percent of the vote over Anies, a Javanese Muslim. Before a September scandal led to charges of blasphemy, however, Basuki, the current governor, polled at 52 percent. The director of an Indonesian polling company indicates that "Religious sentiment played a significant role and undermined the performance of [Basuki] in this election."

US Treasury: Venezuelan VP Involved In Narcotics Rackets.

According to the New York Times (2/16, Casey, Herrero, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), the Department of the Treasury imposed sanctions on Venezuelan Vice President Tareck El Aissami Thursday for his involvement in narcotics rackets extending from Colombia to Mexico. The Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control says he "facilitated shipments" by exerting influence at a Venezuelan air base and "oversaw or partially owned narcotics shipments of over 1,000 kilograms." Venezuelan President Nicolas Maduro "vigorously defended" El Aissami as an "enemy of the narcotics rackets" this week on national television, says the Times, but during El Aissami's tenure as interior and justice minister, violent crime rates grew rapidly, according to organizations focused on crime research.

LEADING THE NEWS

Comey Briefs Senators On Flynn, Russia Investigation.

Politico (2/17, Wright, 2.46M) reported FBI Director Comey briefed Senators over President Trump's ties to Russia during "a closed-door meeting on Friday...amid an uproar on Capitol Hill over alleged contacts between Trump aides and Moscow." Sen. Mark Warner, the ranking member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, "said as he left the meeting he was confident the intelligence panel would have access to the documents it needs to carry out its investigation of the issue," although he and other members of the committee "declined to comment specifically on what was discussed in the meeting." The Hill (2/17, Williams, 1.25M) reported Committee Chairman Richard Burr described the meeting as "just a normal classified briefing" and refused to comment further.

Rep. Joaquin Castro told CNN The Situation Room  (2/17, 5:10 p.m. EDT, 10:31, Keilar, 554K) "both the House and the Senate want to have full and fair investigations into the connection between Russia and the hacking of the 2016 presidential election." He explained, "Of course, anyone who is on the House or Senate intelligence committee is often very careful about what information they divulge" because of "a criminal penalty that you can be subject to if you divulge classified information." Castro said "a full investigation" should also address "the relationship between anybody in the Trump campaign and Russia, the government, and Russian intelligence agencies," and "it's also fair to consider the leaks." Rep. Walter Jones, The Hill (2/17, Uchill, 1.25M) reported, has now become "the first House Republican to co-sponsor a bill calling for an independent investigation of foreign interference in the 2016 presidential election."

CNN The Situation Room's (2/17, 5:35 p.m. EDT, 34:35, Keilar, 554K) senior political reporter Nia-Malika Henderson said "something substantive could certainly come out of" the congressional investigation. Democratic lawmakers "want more of an independent counsel, something like a select committee," but Senate Majority Leader McConnell appears "reluctant to do that, wanting this to go through the Senate Intelligence Committee" and focus on "the leaks rather than the substance of the leaks." The Hill (2/17, Bolton, 1.25M) reports McConnell told reporters on Friday that "he had 'no idea' whether President Trump's campaign advisers were in touch with Russian officials last year" and his spokesman, Don Stewart, "later clarified that McConnell thought he was asked whether he knew of any contacts between Trump and Russian officials."

Meanwhile, Politico (2/17, Conway, 2.46M) reported White House Chief of Staff Priebus "held the party line on...reports about scrutiny into the Trump campaign's relationship with Russia as exaggerated without saying, definitively, that none of the president's associates contacted the country before the election." During an interview with Fox News, Priebus "insisted...he had spoken with high-level intelligence officials who told him that the Times story about the campaign contact with Russia was 'grossly overstated and inaccurate.'" Priebus added, "I wouldn't come on your show and say something like that if I didn't have a green light and approval to say it."

Law Enforcement Officials Predict No Charges Against Flynn. Law enforcement sources told the CBS Evening News (2/17, story 2, 2:15, Pelley, 11.17M) that Flynn will not likely face charges "in connection to his discussions of US sanctions with the Russian ambassador to the US." Correspondent Jeff Pegues said "investigators say that despite misleading the Vice President, there is not enough evidence to charge him with lying to the FBI," and he "has also not been cleared in the broader investigation into whether he and others in the Trump campaign were in regular contact with Russian officials during the election."

Russians Contradicted Administration's Statements On Contact With Trump Campaign. Highlighting previously reported statements by Russian officials, the New York Times (2/20, Rosenberg, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that the Administration's "denial" that it did not have contact with Russia during the presidential campaign "stands at odds with statements by Russian officials" who have at least two times "acknowledged contacts with aides to Mr. Trump before the election." The Times says Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Sergei Ryabkov said two days after the election that his government maintained contacts with Trump's "immediate entourage" during the campaign. The Times adds that Russian Ambassador Sergey Kislyak told the Washington Post that he communicated with former National Security Adviser Flynn frequently during the campaign.

White House Asked To Preserve Documents Tied To Russia Probe. NBC Nightly News (2/19, story 2, 1:35, O'Donnell, 16.61M) reported the Senate Intelligence Committee has asked the White House to "preserve any documents, any emails that may be useful in their investigation" of Russian interference in the 2016 election. The AP (2/19, Riechmann, Sullivan) reports the committee sent "formal requests to more than a dozen organizations, agencies and individuals" – including the White House – "asking them to preserve all materials related" to their investigation. The request came the same day committee members received a classified briefing from FBI Director Comey.

Klobuchar, Menendez Back Investigation Of Russia Connections. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/19, Sherry, 1.27M) reported that Sen. Amy Klobuchar said in an interview that she will "leverage what she said are strong alliances with her Republican colleagues to push for an independent investigation into possible ties" between the Trump Administration and Russia. She asked, "Why did all of this happen? Why was the Trump campaign so focused on placating Russia and making them happy when they have been ruthless to our allies and ruthless trying to attack us?"

On CNN's State of the Union (2/19, Sciutto, 420K), Sen. Robert Menendez said he backed a bipartisan commission, saying, "The only question for me is the Intelligence Committee in and of itself alone the appropriate entity, particularly since much what have they will do will be in secret, and I think that there elements of the whole Russia scandal that deserve to be in public view."

On NBC's Meet The Press, Sen. John McCain said, "There are so many questions out there that we first of all need to understand the parameters of what's happened here. And so I would hold off and wait and see what happens. ... There's probably going to be some more shoes to drop."

Nunes Says Obama Administration Holdovers Responsible For Leaks. The Washington Times (2/19, Miller, 272K) reported that House Intelligence Chairman Devin Nunes said on CBS' Face The Nation "that Obama administration holdovers are illegally leaking information to the news media in an effort to damage President Trump." Politico (2/19, Trudo, 2.46M) reported that Nunes also said, "If Gen. Flynn was talking about Obama's pettiness that he did right after Christmas, kicking out a few Russian diplomats and telling the Russians not to overreact, and if the FBI used the Logan Act, I think we have much bigger problems here than Michael Flynn."

Trump Associates Developed Plan To Lift Russia Sanctions. According to the New York Times (2/19, Twohey, Shane, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), one week before Gen. Mike Flynn resigned as national security adviser, "a sealed proposal was hand-delivered to his office, outlining a way for President Trump to lift sanctions against Russia." The Times says the plan was developed by Michael D. Cohen, Trump's personal lawyer; Felix H. Sater, "a business associate who helped Mr. Trump scout deals in Russia"; and Andrii V. Artemenko, a Ukrainian lawmaker. While the plan contains plans to secure a peace deal between Russian and Ukraine, Artemenko "claims to have evidence — 'names of companies, wire transfers' — showing corruption" by Ukrainian President Petro Poroshenko "that could help oust him." According to the Times, it is "unclear if the White House will take the proposal seriously," but the "diplomatic freelancing has infuriated Ukrainian officials." It also notes that Cohen is "one of several Trump associates under scrutiny in an FBI counterintelligence examination of links with Russia, according to law enforcement officials." In an appearance on Fox News' Special Report (2/20, 1.53M), Deputy Assistant to the President Dr. Sebastian Gorka said he was skeptical of the Times' report. "I'm not familiar with the plan. Given the source of the report I have to have a little bit of skepticism because I think there's a fake news phenomenon," Gorka said.

Putin Reportedly Orders Report On Trump's Psychological Makeup. According to the New York Post (2/20, Fredericks, 3.82M), an NBC news report indicated that Russian President Vladimir Putin "ordered up a dossier on President Trump's psychological makeup" in preparation for their first meeting. The analysis, the Post says, "so far peg the president as someone not afraid to take risks but who can also be naive about people and issues he doesn't understand." Former Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Andrei Fedorov told NBC that Trump "doesn't understand fully who is Mr. Putin – he is a tough guy."

McMullin: Congress Should "Demand" Sessions Investigate Trump, Flynn Over Russia Ties. In a New York Times (2/17, McMullin, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) op-ed, former independent presidential candidate Evan McMullin urged Congressional Republican leaders to hold President Trump accountable over his and Flynn's Russian connections. He argues they "should demand that Attorney General Jeff Sessions appoint an independent special counsel to investigate Russia's assault on American democracy and Mr. Trump's possible collusion with the Kremlin." At a minimum, he said "they must establish a bipartisan special select committee with subpoena power in the House or the Senate for the same purpose."

Mukasey Criticizes Leaks Of Classified Information. In a Wall Street Journal (2/20, Mukasey, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) op-ed, former attorney general Michael Mukasey criticizes the leaking of classified information that resulted in the resignation of NSA Mike Flynn. Mukasey says the damage from such leaks can be equal to or greater than that done by outright espionage.

FBI Conducting Three Separate Probes Into Alleged Russian Election Hacking.

Five current and former US officials told Reuters (2/18, Menn) the Federal Bureau of Investigation is conducting three separate investigations into Russia's alleged hacking of the presidential election. The bureau's Pittsburgh field office, which frequently conducts cyber security probes, is attempting to identify the people who breached the Democratic National Committee's computer systems in 2015 and 2016. Its investigation has progressed the furthest, but Justice Department officials do not believe they have enough evidence for an indictment. The FBI's San Francisco office is attempting to identify the people behind the "Guccifer 2" moniker that posted emails seized from Hillary Clinton's campaign manager John Podesta. Additional counterterrorism agents are pursuing leads provided by informants and foreign communications intercepts. The officials "also corroborated a Tuesday New York Times report that Americans with ties to Trump or his campaign had repeated contacts with current and former Russian intelligence officers before the November election."

Trump's Former Advisers React To Accusations Of Election Hacking Involvement. President Trump's former adviser on Russia, Carter Page, told McClatchy (2/17, Stone, 74K) on Friday that he urged the Justice Department in a letter sent on Sunday to launch an investigation into Hillary Clinton. In the letter, Page accused Clinton's campaign and political allies "of the severe election fraud in the form of disinformation, suppression of dissent, hate crimes and other extensive abuses." Trump's former adviser and longtime confidant, Roger Stone, also told McClatchy that he encourages a Justice Department investigation and "would relish the opportunity to testify in public before Congress" to address their suspicions about his alleged ties to Russia. He added, "Any fair, unbiased investigation would be fine with me. I don't believe the president or I have anything to fear." Both Page and Stone "are believed to be among a handful of Trump loyalists under scrutiny."

Trump Associates Say They Have Not Been Contacted By FBI. The Daily Caller (2/20, Ross, 898K) says that despite media reports naming Trump associates Michael Cohen, Roger Stone, Paul Manafort, and Carter Page as "persons of interest in an FBI investigation of links to Russia," they "all say they have not been contacted or interviewed by federal investigators." According to former FBI official Ron Hosko, the fact the FBI has not contacted the men could mean that the media reported falsely, that the FBI does not have enough information to advance the investigation, or that agents are still compiling evidence prior to conducting interviews.

Russian Foreign Minister Asks For Factual Basis Behind Hacking Allegation. Bloomberg Politics (2/18, Wadhams, Arkhipov, 201K) reported Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov rejected accusations that Russian hackers interfered in the US presidential election. On Saturday at the Munich Security Summit, Lavrov called into question the lack of facts presented to support the allegation, and "portrayed Russia as a leader in efforts to focus on information security." Lavrov asserted election hacks are "happening in France, Germany, Italy," and accused the Central Intelligence Agency of spying on French political parties during that nation's 2012 presidential election. Lavrov said he proposed US-Russian collaboration on cyber security in 2015 and repeatedly asked former Secretary Kerry about the status of that proposal. He said in the following year, "we had no reaction from them" until December, when "they said let's meet, and later they said now we have transitional administration let's postpone it."

COUNTER-TERRORISM

Eleven Jewish Community Centers Receive Bomb Threats Monday.

According to ABC World News Tonight  (2/20, story 2, 1:50, Muir, 14.63M), 11 Jewish community centers received bomb threats Monday, and 54 centers have been targeted already in 2017. The "menacing phone calls" came in four waves as part of "a coordinated effort to spark fear" that the FBI is investigating for civil rights violations and hate crimes. The Hill (2/20, Savransky, 1.25M) reports a White House statement responded to the threats emphasizing there is no place for hatred "in a country founded on the promise of individual freedom." The Jewish Community Center Association of North America says the threats affecting such cities as Chicago, Buffalo, Houston, and New York were "hoaxes," and Director of Strategic Performance David Posner said, "We will not be cowed by threats intended to disrupt people's lives."

In its lead story, NBC Nightly News  (2/20, story 5, 1:50, Holt, 16.61M) reported Anti-Defamation League CEO Jonathan Greenblatt calling on President Trump "to show moral leadership" and address the issue of rising anti-semitism "before communities go from anxiety to real trauma." Politico (2/20, Lima, 2.46M) says ADL started the Twitter hashtag #answerthequestion Monday to encourage the Administration to address the issue.

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/17, Xiong, Montemayor, 1.27M) reports that "the St. Paul Jewish Community Center was evacuated after receiving a bomb threat Monday morning – one of 11 incidents nationwide and the second such scare in the Twin Cities in as many months." The Tribune adds that "Monday's incident comes one month after a phoned-in bomb threat closed the Sabes Jewish Community Center in St. Louis Park." Jeff Van Nest, a spokesman for the FBI's field office in Minneapolis, "said the agency was coordinating with local law enforcement much as it did after the St. Louis Park bomb threat. 'All of the resources of the FBI are available in a case like this,' Van Nest said. 'Any time there's a bomb threat, even if it's a hoax, is a violation of federal law.'"

ABC News (2/20, 3.09M) reports on its website that "federal authorities are looking into threats communicated to at least 60 Jewish centers around the country this year." The threats "started in January and the FBI began investigating later that same month. 'The FBI will collect all available facts and evidence, and will ensure this matter is investigated in a fair, thorough, and impartial manner,' the FBI said in a statement."

The Chicago Tribune (2/20, 2.54M) reports that "a threat to a facility in the 5200 block of South Hyde Park Boulevard about 10:10 a.m. Monday brought police to the scene, but officers and staff found no evidence that the threat was bona fide, according to police." Police said that no evacuation was necessary. The Tribune notes that "in upstate New York, a bomb threat that forced the Jewish Community Center to evacuate two buildings in Buffalo and Amherst late Monday morning was part of a nationwide effort that saw at least 10 such centers targeted with similar threats, according to local and national officials." The Tribune adds that "following an earlier round of threats – there have been at least four instances in which multiple Jewish centers have been targeted with telephone threats on the same day – the FBI confirmed that it is investigating the threats."

The Columbus (OH) Dispatch (2/20, 529K) reports that the Mandel Jewish Community Center in Cleveland "was among the 11 which received hoax calls Monday that turned out to be unfounded," and "other Jewish centers receiving calls were located in Tampa, Birmingham, Alabama; Chicago Hyde Park, St. Paul, Minn., Albuquerque, New Mexico; Buffalo, New York; Tulsa, Oklahoma; Nashville, Tennessee; Houston and Milwaukee, according to a list provided by the JCC Association of North America. 'Our centers have in place security protocols to ensure the safety of their program participants and facility visitors,' David Posner, director of strategic performance at the JCC Association, who advises local JCCs on security policies and practices, said in a statement Monday."

The Birmingham (AL) News (2/20, Robinson, 157K) reports that "the Levite Jewish Community Center was evacuated Wednesday, as were dozens of others throughout the U.S." On Jan. 18, "Birmingham police and other lawmen responded to the facility on Montclair Road in the eastern part of the city," and "after the building was evacuated, bomb-sniffing dogs checked out the complex and the parking lot, and the all-clear was given."

KDVR-TV Denver (2/20, 214K) reports that "it's been three weeks since a bomb scare forced the Boulder Jewish Community Center to evacuate." Police said "someone threatened to detonate themselves," and "the building was evacuated and bomb sniffing dogs came out, but didn't find anything suspicious."

Reuters (2/21, O'Brien) reports "officials at the Harry and Rose Samson Family Jewish Community Center in Whitefish Bay, Wisconsin, north of Milwaukee, received a bomb threat at 10:15 a.m. local time, the second such incident at the center over the last three weeks, it said on Twitter."

CNN (2/21, 29.79M) reports that the White House on Monday "denounced a spate of threats made against Jewish Community Centers around the country." CNN adds that "the reaction is notable coming after weeks of criticism that the Trump administration has not been forceful enough to denounce acts of anti-Semitism that have occurred nationwide since his election. 'Hatred and hate-motivated violence of any kind have no place in a country founded on the promise of individual freedom. The President has made it abundantly clear that these actions are unacceptable,' said White House deputy press secretary Lindsay Walters." The Jewish Telegraphic Agency (2/20, 5K) also reports.

Ivanka Trump Tweet Calls For "Religious Tolerance." The New York Times (2/20, Haberman, Chokshi, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Ivanka Trump tweeted a statement Monday night that calls for "religious tolerance" in response to the threats against Jewish community centers. The Times says the President's daughter, converted to Judaism prior to marrying Jared Kushner, an Orthodox Jew, is in a "position to be a prominent voice" and that the tweet is her "most vocal foray" into public discussion.

AP, Other News Organizations Push For Info On FBI iPhone Hack.

The AP (2/20, Tucker) says it along with Vice Media LLC and USA Today parent company Gannett filed a document Monday with the US District Court in Washington to force the FBI to release information regarding the identity of the third-party vendor involved and the price paid to unlock the iPhone of Syed Rizwan Farook, one of the shooters in the 2016 San Bernardino, California attack. The news organizations say their requests are "narrowly tailored" and the information would not jeopardize the government's ability to protect the country, but the Justice Department maintains that the information redacted in documents it released in January could be used by "hostile entities" to threaten national security. Bloomberg News (2/20, 2.41M) reports similarly.

Wisconsin, Virginia Men Sentenced For Trying To Join, Assist The ISIL.

Reuters (2/17, Ax) reported 36-year-old Joshua Van Haften of Madison, Wisconsin was sentenced to 10 years in federal prison following a guilty plea for "post[ing] an oath of allegiance to Islamic State's leader online" and "travel[ing] to Turkey in 2014...to cross the border into Syria, according to prosecutors." Similarly, 26-year-old Haris Qamar of Burke, Virginia got 8 and a half years in prison after also pleading guilty to helping "a confidential witness working with the Federal Bureau of Investigation take photographs of landmarks in Washington, D.C., for what he believed would be a propaganda video for Islamic State to encourage attacks." The Washington Post (2/17, Weiner, 11.43M) noted that tweets by Qamar via hundreds of accounts initially drew the FBI's attention to him. The AP (2/17) reported that the sentence received by Qamar is longer than the five- to six-year term requested by his attorney, but less than the 20-year maximum sentence for his crimes.

CAIR Seeks Federal Investigation Of Anti-Muslim Meeting In North Carolina.

The Winston-Salem (NC) Journal (2/19, Drabble, 204K) reported that the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) is requesting a federal investigation into death threats made by people who attended a Kernersville, North Carolina meeting on Thursday. "The meeting, attended by about 20 people at a seafood restaurant, included a focus on a 'supposed Muslim plot to conquer the United States,'" the Journal said, citing CAIR. According to the organization, one of the meeting participants recommended people "start killing the hell out" of Muslims. CAIR hopes the FBI investigates the meeting in light of the recent attack on a Canadian mosque, the newspaper reported.

At Trial, DC Terror Suspect Will Claim He Was Entrapped.

Citing court records, WTTG-TV Washington (2/20, 67K) reports online that Nicholas Young, the former DC Metro Transit Police officer accused of aiding ISIL, will claim he was entrapped by authorities. "Young was arrested last August and accused of assisting ISIS by purchasing gift cards and sending the codes on the back to someone he thought was working with the Islamic State," WTTG says. His attorneys, who recently filed two motions questioning the persecution's evidence, plan to call Young to the stand and "are fighting a government claim that it may use evidence obtained from a FISA warrant to impeach him at trial," WTTG says.

FBI Still Probing Minnesota Mall Stabbing Spree.

The AP (2/17, Forliti) reported that according to the FBI, authorities are still investigating the stabbing attack that left 10 wounded at a St. Cloud Minnesota mall five months ago. "FBI Special Agent in Charge Rick Thornton said getting into Dahir Ahmed Adan's electronic media has been an ongoing effort, and authorities might never know exactly what he was thinking," the AP said.

However, Thornton added, he would not rule out the possibility that Adan, who asked some victims their religion, was radicalized." In this era of encrypted communications and encrypted devices and so forth, I think it's going to be an increasingly common outcome where we may not have absolute clarity on what was in people's minds. If you aren't seeing all of their communications, there's always the potential for a gap," Thornton said of the investigation. The Minneapolis (MN) Star Tribune (2/17, Forliti, 1.27M) and the St. Paul (MN) Pioneer Press (2/17, 460K) post the AP's coverage on their websites.

Top White House Adviser Gorka Sees Islam Itself As Root Of Extremism.

The Washington Post (2/20, Jaffe, 11.43M) runs a 3,200-word profile of Deputy Assistant to the President Sebastian Gorka, who for years "had labored on the fringes of Washington and the far edge of acceptable debate as defined by the city's Republican and Democratic foreign policy elite." The former Breitbart national security editor now "occupies a senior job in the White House and his controversial ideas – especially about Islam – drive [President] Trump's populist approach to counterterrorism and national security." The Post says Gorka sees the world as engaged in "a high-stakes civilizational war, still in its early days," and believes that "the terrorism problem has nothing to do with repression, alienation, torture, tribalism, poverty, or America's foreign policy blunders and a messy and complex Middle East," but rather, "is rooted in Islam and 'martial' parts of the Koran that he says predispose some Muslims to acts of terror."

Eleven Travelers Pass JFK Security Checkpoint Without Being Screened.

According to the CBS Evening News  (2/20, story 12, 0:20, Mason, 11.17M), 11 travelers passed through an unattended security checkpoint at the JetBlue Terminal 5 of Kennedy Airport. In its lead story, NBC Nightly News  (2/20, lead story, 2:20, Holt, 16.61M) reported that the passengers triggered metal detector alarms but continued into the terminal and onto aircraft unchallenged. NBC Nightly News says the "only problem" is that police were not notified until two hours after the security breach. A TSA statement says the agency is "confident this incident presents minimal risk." According to ABC World News Tonight  (2/20, story 10, 1:30, Muir, 14.63M), the incident occurred at 6 a.m. The Washington Times (2/20, Chasmar, 272K) reports a Port Authority announcement that three of the passengers boarded a plane to California and were screened upon arrival, but the other eight have not been identified. The passengers' carry-on luggage was properly screened, however, TSA officials said.

Dwyer: Rahman's Death Will Not Still The Danger Of His Voice.

In a column for the New York Times (2/20, Dwyer, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), Jim Dwyer writes of the death last weekend in a federal prison of the "blind Egyptian sheikh" Omar Abdel Rahman, who was convicted in 1995 for plotting terror attacks in New York City, and a man Dwyer calls, "a figure long faded from public life, but whose voice still blares in the national conversation as if on a speakerphone from the past." According to Dwyer, Rahman's presence in the US since 1990 "rewired the public apprehension about Islam and terrorism." Rahman's speeches and sermons, Dwyer contends, "were powerful recruiting tools for the Islamic resistance," and he argues that "in fixating on Mr. Abdel Rahman's thinking, his foes, even more than his followers, may very well be amplifying and weaponizing his voice."

World Trade Center's 1993 Bombing Overshadowed At 9/11 Memorial.

The New York Times (2/19, Bashinsky, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports many of the people who gathered outside the 9/11 Memorial in Lower Manhattan on Sunday "did not realize they were also visiting the site of an earlier attack that, while less deadly, presaged an era of terrorism fears in New York City that many believe culminated in September 2001." For these people, the Sept. 11 attack "looms large," but for others at the memorial, including Lindsay and Brian Buckley, "the first World Trade Center attack" nearly 24 years ago "remained a searing memory." Lindsay Buckley told the Times that the 1993 World Trade Center bombing "was my first experience with Islamophobia," and said her dad described it as "radical terrorism." Brian Buckley told the Times that he grew up in Dubiln, Ireland, so a bombing "in a city is reminiscent of a bombing going off at home."

Gates Warns Bioterrorism Could Be More Deadly Than Nuclear Weapons.

The Washington Post (2/18, Selk, 11.43M) reports Bill Gates at the Munich Security Conference on Saturday warned of "a genetically engineered virus" that "could kill more people than nuclear weapons." He said, "The next epidemic has a good chance of originating on a computer screen," speaking of the potential disaster an outbreak could generate unless governments start "to prepare for these epidemics the same way we prepare for war." The Post notes Gates and his wife have been "worrying about the world's ability to stop a deadly pandemic since Ebola killed thousands two years ago."

Bloomberg News (2/18, Tirone, 2.41M) reports Gates spoke of the use of "genetic engineering to create a synthetic version of the smallpox virus, or a super contagious and deadly strain of the flu" by terrorists, which are threats experts have "said that the world isn't prepared to deal with." Gates added, "Getting ready for a global pandemic is every bit as important as nuclear deterrence and avoiding a climate catastrophe."

Egyptian Cleric Convicted Of New York City Terror Plot Dies In Prison.

The  CBS Weekend News (2/18, story 8, 0:25, Morgan) reported Omar Abdel-Rahman, known as the "Blind Sheikh," died in prison on Saturday morning. Rahman was convicted of planning attacks on New York City landmarks, and is "suspected of inspiring bombers who tried to blow up the World Trade Center in 1993."  NBC Nightly News (2/18, story 8, 0:25, Diaz-Balart, 16.61M) said Rahman was serving a life sentence in North Carolina. The Egyptian cleric was 78 years old.

The Washington Post (2/18, Schudel, 11.43M) and the New York Times (2/18, Preston, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) also discuss his death.

Merkel Calls For European-Russian Cooperation Against Terrorism.

Reuters (2/18, Shalal, Barkin) reports German Chancellor Angela Merkel, in a Saturday speech to the Munich Security Conference, stated, "The joint fight against Islamic terrorism is one area where" European nations and Russia "have the same interests and we can work together." Merkel stressed that Islam was not the source of Islamist terrorism and called Muslim nations' involvement in the effort critical.

Report Suggests ISIS Likely Sees Revenue Falling.

The AP (2/17, Hinnant) reported the International Centre for the Study of Radicalisation and Political Violence and accounting firm EY released a joint analysis on Saturday that suggested ISIS' revenue dropped from $1.8 billion in 2014 to $870 million at most in 2016. King's College London director Peter Neumann credited its loss of financial resources to its many territory-related expenses. "It needs to fix roads. It needs to pay teachers. It needs to run health services. It needs to pay for these things that al-Qaida never had to," Neumann told the AP. Neumann identified taxes and fees, ransoms, oil, looting, and extortion as ISIS' top revenue sources. Furthermore, Neumann said, ISIS' business model depended on its ability to exert absolute control. The report acknowledged ISIS' loss of revenue did not mean the group was less dangerous, because its attacks in Paris, Berlin, and Brussels were not expensive; however, Neumann said, its brand will likely suffer "because it is no longer projecting strength and utopia."

CRIMINAL INVESTIGATIONS

USA Gymnastics Doctor Facing Sexual Abuse Charges.

NBC Nightly News  (2/17, lead story, 3:00, Holt, 16.61M) reported on growing sexual abuse allegations against USA Gymnastics former head doctor, Dr. Larry Nassar, who is now facing trial "for allegedly sexually abusing a family friend, going back decades." Correspondent Stephanie Gosk said Nassar "faced just one of more than 60 women who have come forward in the last year to accuse him of sexual abuse." Nassar has pleaded not guilty to the charges and, according to Gosk, "Federal charges of possessing pornography, including 30,000 images and GoPro video." The charges, Gosk noted, "may not stop there. The Wall Street Journal reports that the FBI conducted interviews with gymnasts from the gold medal winning London and Rio Olympic teams...Dozens of athletes from Michigan State and the US national gymnastics team have come forward to accuse Nassar of sexually assaulting them during treatment."

USA Today (2/19, Axon, Armour, 5.28M) reported that among the women to come forward with sexual abuse claims are "former elite American gymnasts" Jamie Dantzscher, Jeanette Antolin, and Jessica Howard. The women, who detailed the alleged abuse they experienced on CBS' "60 Minutes," claimed to have been fondled and digitally penetrated by Nassar under the guise of medical treatment. MLive (MI) (2/19, 878K) reported that according to Dantzscher, Nassar abused her for five years, starting when she was 14- or 15-years-old.

The Wall Street Journal (2/17, Radnofsky, O'Brien, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reported that Sen. Dianne Feinstein said Friday that she is drafting legislation to require amateur sports organizations, including USA Gymnastics, to report allegations of sexual abuse to the authorities immediately or face criminal charges. According to Feinstein, reports of Nassar's alleged conduct revealed potential "systemic problems within USA Gymnastics that have allowed allegations of sexual abuse go unreported."

The Detroit Free Press (2/19, 1.01M) posted USA Today's coverage to its website. The Indianapolis Star (2/17, Kwiatkowski, Alesia, Evans, 550K), the Lansing (MI) State Journal (2/17, Mencarini, 183K), and the WXYZ-TV Detroit (2/20, 141K) website reported similarly.

Man Accused Of Plotting To Attack Minorities In South Carolina Wanted To Defend Whites, Mother Says.

The AP (2/18) reported that Benjamin McDowell, the South Carolina man accused of plotting to kill black and Jewish people in an attack inspired by the Charleston church shooting thought white people needed to defend their rights, his mother said. "Joanne Strickland told WBTW-TV that her son Benjamin McDowell was religious and carried a Bible with him Wednesday as he left their home," the AP reported. According to the FBI, McDowell had not decided on a specific target for his attack prior to his arrest.

Continued Coverage: Florida Man Charged In Plot To Blow Up Target Stores.

USA Today (2/17, Rodriguez, 5.28M) reported in continued coverage of Mark Charles Barnett, the Florida man accused of plotting to bomb East Coast Target stores in a bid to depress Target's stock prices. "Barnett, 48, is charged with possession of a destructive device affecting commerce by a previously convicted felon, according to a criminal complaint," USA Today said. The Florida man allegedly tried to pay a second person $10,000 to plant explosives at 10 Target stores in hopes that the explosions would allow him to buy Target stock relatively cheaply before prices rebounded. Instead, authorities say, the person gave the explosives to law enforcement. In a statement, Target commended law enforcement for thwarting the alleged plot. The Los Angeles Times (2/17, Hayes, 4.52M) quoted FBI Jacksonville Special Agent in Charge Charles Spencer as saying, "The cooperation between the local, state and federal law enforcement agencies involved in this case was instrumental to quickly identifying this individual and resolving any potential threat to the public."

NYC Mayoral Candidate Seeks Probe Of De Blasio's Legal Representation.

The New York Post (2/20, Gartland, 3.82M) reports that "Republican mayoral candidate Paul Massey is formally demanding the Manhattan DA" and "US attorney probe Mayor de Blasio's legal representation, describing it as 'an arrangement no ordinary person or business entity could secure.'" Massey, "a real-estate developer, sent letters to District Attorney Cyrus Vance Jr. and US Attorney Preet Bharara on Friday." Massey "requested the offices 'determine whether a thing of value, an illegal campaign contribution, or a failure by the mayor to pay lawfully rendered bills represents a violation of criminal law, the New York City Charter, or New York State ethics laws.'" De Blasio, "who's facing investigations by Vance and Bharara over his fund-raising, is using the law firm Kramer Levin Naftalis & Frankel to represent him, but has not yet paid any of its bills."

US Withdraws Charge Against Tennessee Child Rape Suspect.

The Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel (2/20, Satterfield, 245K) reports that "a martial arts instructor who fled to the Middle East nearly a quarter-century ago after he was accused of raping an 11-year-old student is now free on bond after federal authorities abruptly dismissed a passport fraud charge against him." According to the Sentinel, "just three days after mounting a case for the continued jailing of Jahangir John Shafighi on a charge of lying to renew his U.S. passport while on the lam, Assistant U.S. Attorney Bart Slabbekorn filed a motion to drop the charge," saying "that further probing cast doubt on the government's case. 'The United States continued its post-indictment investigation and review of the supporting facts and evidence and, based on newly discovered information, concludes the evidence is insufficient to proceed,' Slabbekorn said."

FBI, Police In Indiana Searching For Killer Of Two Teen Girls.

ABC World News Tonight  (2/18, story 7, 1:30, Llamas, 14.63M) reported the FBI and local law enforcement in Delphi, Indiana are on a manhunt for a suspect involved in the double homicide of teenage girls. Correspondent Stephanie Ramos said, "Thirteen-year-old Abigail Williams and 14-year-old Liberty German were dropped off for a hike on a popular nature trail last Monday. ...Police say their bodies were found less than a mile away in rough wooded terrain." She noted, "It's been nearly a week and still no suspects," though police are seeking a man who was last seen in the area with the girls. ABC News (2/19, 3.09M) reported similarly on its website.

Indiana Teen Sentenced To More Than 13 Years For Role In Robberies.

The Indiana Daily Student (2/20, Telford, 2K) reports that "an Indianapolis teenager was sentenced to 157 months in federal prison for his involvement in a string of violent robberies that occurred when he was a juvenile." Andre Jermaine Maxey, 18, "pleaded guilty to six counts of interference with commerce by threats of violence and one count of possession of a firearm during a violent crime." Maxey "was sentenced as an adult, although he was a teenager at the time the crimes were committed." The Student adds that "in addition to his prison sentence, Maxey was ordered by Judge Sarah Evans Barker to pay upwards of $23,000 in restitution for his crimes. 'Gun violence has no place in a civil society,' United States Attorney Josh Minkler said in a press release."

Wisconsin Fireman Arrested On Child Porn Charges.

The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (2/18, Glauber, 513K) reported that Milwaukee firefighter Robert Rutley was arrested in Montana on Friday on child pornography charges. "On Feb. 10, the FBI Milwaukee Division's Child Exploitation Task Force, in cooperation with the Milwaukee Fire Department executed a federal search warrant at Engine House No. 29," the newspaper said. "The FBI said authorities conducted a forensic review of evidence seized during the search and on Monday obtained a federal arrest warrant for Rutley, who was assigned to the engine house. Rutley was charged with possession and distribution of child pornography." WISC-TV Madison, WI (2/18, 185K) reported online that Rutley was disciplined by the Milwaukee Fire Department in 2014 for placing pornography in the station to which he was assigned at the time.

The WLUK-TV Green Bay, WI (2/18, 56K), KBZK-TV Butte, MT (2/18, 785), and WKOW-TV Madison, WI (2/18, 34K) websites reported similarly.

Michigan Man Faces Child Porn Charges.

MLive (MI) (2/19, 878K) reports that a Michigan man "faces child pornography charges after more than 240 images were allegedly found on his work computer at General Motors' Technical Center in Warren." The man, who is not named in the report, is charged with "knowingly possessing or accessing child pornography and knowingly receiving child pornography." The case was investigated by an FBI Violent Crime against Children task force.

Washington State Man Charged With Trafficking Minor.

The Cleveland Plain Dealer (2/17, 976K) reported that Washington state man Tyrell Moss "was indicted on a federal charge after investigators said he brought a 17-year-old to the Cleveland suburbs to be a prostitute." The teen, the FBI said, was forced into prostitution in several states. Moss was arrested in October as part of Operation Cross Country X. He was originally charged in state court.

Ohio Inmate Charged With Mailing Threats Against President, Judges.

The AP (2/17) reports that Ohio prison inmate Rodney Cydrus "faces new charges over allegations that he threatened President Donald Trump and federal judges in letters mailed to the FBI and a public defender's office." Cydrus allegedly mailed multiple threatening letters, some of which contained white powder that was found to be harmless. Cydrus is currently serving time for arson, aggravated robbery and theft.

FBI, CBP Detroit Offices Launching Campaign Against Corruption.

WXYZ-TV Detroit (2/20, 141K) reports on its website that the Detroit offices of CBP and the FBI will launch a "campaign against corruption at the US-Canadian border." Head of the Detroit CBP office of professional responsibility Aaron Poyer said, "We're speaking of the anomaly here. ... That agent who succumbs to some life situation that they end up being somehow compromised or enticed by a criminal organization to go to the dark side."

Bharara: Cities' "Slush Funds" Are Invitation To Corruption.

The New York Post (2/20, Sheehan, Schram, 3.82M) reports that Manhattan US Attorney Preet Bharara said on Monday that "slush funds" like "the one set up by the City Council nearly a decade ago should set off the alarm bells for all honest elected officials. 'The public deserves to see where their money is going and for what purpose. Who puts the money in? Are there subcontractors? Shell companies? Be on top of that. Be wary of slush funds for council members,' Bharara told the Association of Towns of the State of New York at the Marriott Marquis in Midtown. 'We have seen a lot of that going on in New York City in the past and I am sure it is not perfect in all your towns either,' Bharara added."

Texas Election Officials Say Hundreds May Have Voted Improperly.

In an exclusive, the AP (2/18, Rauf) reports hundreds may have "improperly cast ballots" in the November election in Texas, according to state election officials, despite the "toughest-in-the-nation voter ID law." Chief election officers in two counties are now "considering whether to refer cases to local prosecutors for potential perjury charges or violations of election law," the AP adds, though other officials "say they will simply let the mistakes go, citing widespread confusion among poll workers and voters."

Los Angeles Police Officers Killed, Wounded In Gunfight With Traffic Accident Victim.

ABC World News Tonight (2/20, story 8, 1:20, Muir, 14.63M) reported a 30-year veteran Los Angeles policeman died and his fellow officer was wounded Monday night in a gun fight with the victim of a traffic accident. The man a Los Angeles Sheriff Department official describes as having "tattoos all over his face" and wearing "gang attire" opened fire on the police officers with a semiautomatic weapon as they were preparing to process the man and check him for weapons.

USA Today Weighs In On GOP Reversal Of Obama-Era Gun Policy.

USA Today (2/20, Board, 5.28M) writes in an editorial that Congressional Republicans' move to "kill a sensible gun policy" to stop people with severe mental illness from obtaining guns is "backwards" because it is a "worthy goal" the public favors. Though NRA and disabilities advocates say it is too broad and could stereotype the innocent, USA Today argues in the "real world," "more finely tuned" rules are not possible and that the "real crime" is the Social Security Administration not using its data on people with severe mental illness to prevent gun purchases.

ACLU senior legislative counsel Vania Leveille and Susan Mizner, its disability counsel, write in an op-ed for USA Today (2/20, Leveille, Mizner, 5.28M) that the gun control rule Congress repealed this month "would do little to stem gun violence but do much to harm our civil rights." It cites the lack of data that connects Americans with disability benefits managed by someone else with a propensity for gun or any violence. The ACLU counselors call adding "more innocent Americans" with mental disabilities to the National Instant Criminal Background database "a disturbing trend."

FINANCIAL CRIME & CORPORATE SCANDALS

Richmond Mayor Hires Aide With 2015 Embezzlement Conviction.

The Richmond (VA) Times-Dispatch (2/20, 324K) reports that Richmond, VA Mayor Levar Stoney "says he hired a former state official despite a 2015 conviction for embezzling nearly $240,000 because he 'believes in redemption.'" According to the Times-Dispatch, Steven Hammond Jr. pleaded guilty in federal court "to stealing money intended for substance abuse education while working as a program coordinator at the Virginia Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control." Stoney "hired him in late January to serve as an executive assistant, a position Stoney's office said is primarily clerical, though Hammond regularly accompanies Stoney to events." In his plea, Hammond "admitted to creating false payments to nonexistent programs that depended on grant money to fight underage drinking, issuing 77 checks that were cashed by friends, who split the proceeds."

Ex-Attorney, Father Charged With Running Ponzi Scheme.

The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/18, 586K) reports that former Pennsylvania attorney Michael Kwasnik and his father, William Kwasnik, "were indicted Thursday by a federal grand jury in Camden on five counts of fraud, seven counts of money laundering and one count of conspiracy to commit money laundering." The men are accused of orchestrating a $13 million Ponzi scheme. According to prosecutors, the Kwasnik's defrauded more than 40 clients of Michael Kwasnik's law firm by diverting funds from their trust accounts into an insurance company controlled by the father and son. "Ultimately, they used at least $10 million of the stolen funds to pay operational expenses for their businesses and for personal expenses for themselves and their families, the indictment alleges," the Inquirer says.

New Zealand Court Clears Extradition Of Megaupload Founder To Face US Charges.

Reuters (2/19) reports that a New Zealand court ruled on Monday "that internet entrepreneur Kim Dotcom could be extradited to the United States to face charges relating to his Megaupload website, which was shutdown in 2012 following an FBI-ordered raid on his Auckland mansion." The Auckland High Court "upheld the decision by a lower court in 2015 on 13 counts, including allegations of conspiracy to commit racketeering, copyright infringement, money laundering and wire fraud, although it described that decision as 'flawed' in several areas."

The Guardian (UK) (2/20, 4.07M) reports that "US authorities had appealed for Dotcom's extradition to face 13 charges including allegations of conspiracy to commit racketeering, copyright infringement, money laundering and wire fraud." Dotcom, a German national "who has permanent residency in New Zealand, faces up to 20 years in jail if convicted in the US of piracy, which authorities say cost copyright owners hundreds of millions of dollars." The Guardian adds that "it is nearly five years since Dotcom, a self-described 'internet freedom fighter', was arrested in a dramatic police raid on his mansion near Auckland after the FBI shut down Megaupload's servers."

CNET UK (2/20, Reilly, 20K) reports that US prosecutors have "been fighting for the extradition of Dotcom, alongside Mathias Ortmann, Bram van der Kolk and Finn Batato, since 2012." According to CNET, "the group are wanted for trial in the US on 13 counts, including copyright infringement, conspiracy to commit racketeering, money laundering and wire fraud." The Financial Times (2/19, Smyth, Subscription Publication, 1.39M) also reports.

Corporations Stockpiling Bitcoin To Meet Ransomware Demands.

The Lexington (KY) Herald-Leader (2/17, 306K) reports US corporations "that have long resisted bending to the demands of" ransomware hackers "are increasingly stockpiling bitcoin, the digital currency, so that they can quickly meet ransom demands rather than lose valuable corporate data." The companies are acting in response to cyber experts "who recently have changed their advice on how to deal with" ransomware.

Hauenschild: National Security Concerns Should Not Be "Trump Card" In NSL Discussion.

In a post for The Hill's (2/19, Hauenschild, 1.25M) "Pundits Blog," technology policy analyst Jonathon Hauenschild argued that arguments surrounding "national security" should not be a "trump card" in the debate over national security letters (NSLs). Technology companies, including Microsoft and Twitter, want to inform the public about NSLs they receive, but are currently prevented from doing so by gag-orders included as part of the NSLs in the name of national security. "Companies and courts should evaluate the requests for secrecy, balancing the need to keep investigations quiet with the public's interest in understanding the specific requests the government is making of communications companies," Hauenschild said.

Trump Consulting With Tech Firms Ahead Of Issuing Cybersecurity Order.

Bloomberg Politics (2/18, Syeed, 201K) reports that the Trump Administration delayed an executive order on cybersecurity that was slated to be signed January 31. The piece notes that ahead of issuing that order, President Trump has been "quietly consult[ing] technology industry leaders." CrowdStrike chief technology officer and co-founder Dmitri Alperovitch said, "People associated with the administration have reached out for feedback to myself and other experts in the industry as they're thinking through the strategy for cybersecurity and more."

Armed Services Realizing Need For "Organic" Cyberoffense Capability.

C4ISR & Networks (2/17) reports that according to Air Force Brig. Gen. and Cyberspace Operations and Warfighting Integration director Kevin Kennedy, cyberoffense capability outside of Cyber Command and the NSA "doesn't exist with the services." C4ISR&N says, "Given the joint nature of cyberspace and the fact that cyber warriors and cyber teams are trained to the same standards, the services are coming to grips with the need for an organic capability within their traditional mission sets." C4ISR&N adds, "Last year, Kennedy said, the Air Force came to the conclusion that there is an organic capability it needs to retain, not just with the service cyber protection teams, but some organic capability heavily focused right now on defensive cyber operations."

Former, Current Government Officials: No Cause For Alarm Over US Cybersecurity Under Trump Administration.

The Christian Science Monitor (2/17, 387K) reports current and former government officials advise the public to not panic about the "future of US cybersecurity under President Trump." Some former Obama Administration officials "said a draft executive order on cybersecurity...could offer welcome improvements on the technology front." Former White House Homeland Security Adviser Lisa Monaco is quoted saying, in reference to certain provisions regarding critical infrastructure and management of digital risk, "You could basically lift that entire paragraph out of Obama's cyberstrategy." Retired Air Force Gen. Greg Touhill, the Obama Administration's first federal chief information security officer, "said the departing administration had 'left behind a really good flight plan' on cybersecurity," but "still called for improvements in training, education, and replacing legacy technology systems in the US government."

Former Bush Official: Trump Administration Cyber Policy "Remarkably Boring And Responsible." Fox News (2/20, 11.07M) reports, "If leaked drafts are any indication, the Trump administration's forthcoming cyber policy will likely be similar to those of previous presidents, a former Homeland Security official said at the RSA Conference in San Francisco last week." Stewart Baker, former DHS assistant secretary for policy in the George W. Bush Administration, is quoted saying, "I actually think we have some decent clues. We've seen a couple of different leaked drafts of a cyber order. ... Compared to the [other executive] orders that were actually signed, they are remarkably boring and responsible."

Hempfield: Autonomous Vehicles' "Real-Time Alert Infrastructure" Could Be Used To Resolve Cyberthreats.

Pitney Bowes location intelligence vice president Clarence Hempfield writes in TechCrunch (2/18, 530K) about the cybersecurity risks of autonomous vehicles. Hempfield notes the National Highway Transportation Safety Administration released guidelines last year "stating that automakers should make cybersecurity a priority," but "cybersecurity is a never-ending battle. Individuals with enough technical skills, patience and desire to profit will find a way around the latest security barriers." Hempfield adds, "What's critical...is that we must take a holistic view of cybersecurity that goes beyond more complex encryption." Hempfield suggests that the "same type of real-time alert infrastructure" vehicles use to alert drivers of anomalous behavior "could help resolve cybersecurity threats and more traditional thefts, which could lead to new or expanded offerings by vehicle monitoring companies."

White House Officials Downloaded Messaging App With "Security Concerns."

CNBC (2/17, 2.17M) reports senior White House officials, "including press secretary Sean Spicer, have at one point downloaded the Confide messaging app," which promises "military-grade encryption," but "it may be a great deal less secure than they think." Cyber experts warn Confide "is rife with security concerns," and the app's ability to delete messages as soon as they are read raises concerns that it "potentially flout[s] rules requiring that they keep an accurate record of communications within the White House."

Hackers Found To Have Inserted Russian Into Malware In Attempt At "False Flag."

PC World (2/20, 293K) reports that hackers responsible for "a sophisticated attack campaign that has recently targeted financial organizations around the world" inserted Russian words and commands into their software intentionally, "in an attempt to throw investigators off." BAE Systems researchers "recently obtained and analyzed additional malware samples related to an attack campaign that has targeted 104 organizations – most of them banks – from 31 different countries." Researchers found "multiple commands and strings in the malware that appear to have been translated into Russian using online tools, the results making little sense to a native Russian speaker." Researchers are quoted in a blog post describing the use of the language as an apparent "false flag." PC World adds, "In reality there is technical evidence to link these malware samples and the overall attack campaign to a group known in the security industry as Lazarus."

Mitchell: Russia Controversy Overshadowing Other Cyber Policy Issues.

InsideCybersecurity.com editor Charlie Mitchell writes in the Washington Examiner (2/20, 400K) that "the probe by various congressional panels into Russian efforts to influence the 2016 elections, and contacts between Trump representatives and Russian officials, continues to overshadow other cyber policy questions and needs." Mitchell adds, "Couple that controversy with Senate Democrats' slow-walking of Trump's nominees and it's little surprise that Congress has yet to dive deeply into other cybersecurity issues." Mitchell notes that House Homeland Security Chairman Michael McCaul "is planning for a March hearing on the Department of Homeland Security's cyber role and broader cybersecurity policy questions." Nonetheless, Mitchell says the "expanding Russia controversy...almost certainly will continue to be the case for the foreseeable future after Congress gets back from recess."

WSJournal Analysis: Four Large US Cities Struggle With Rising Homicide Rates.

The Wall Street Journal (2/20, Calvert, Mahtani, Elinson, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that murder rates in four big US cities have returned to levels not seen since the 1990s, and police officials are struggling to understand this as national crime rates are near historic lows. A Wall Street Journal analysis of homicide figures since 1985 for the 35 largest US cities shows that four – Chicago, Baltimore, Milwaukee and Memphis, TN – have in the last two years approached or gone beyond the records set some 25 years ago. According to the Journal, 27 of the nation's 35 largest cities have seen per capita murder rates rise since 2014, although, the Journal notes, most homicide rates are still relatively low compared with 1990s levels. The Journal adds that the nation's two largest cities, New York and Los Angeles, have experiences long-term decreases in murder rates.

WPost: "Cool Headed Deliberation" Needed In Selecting New FBI Headquarters.

The Washington Post (2/18, 11.43M) editorializes that politics are playing a "part in the selection of the FBI's new headquarters location," which is a move that have been "in the works for a decade." The Post says that "the 'winning' locality may expect a windfall in economic development and tax revenues," but that it "may also grapple with a traffic headache whose mitigation will require major state and local spending." The Post notes that the lobbying around the selection of the new facility "is healthy and normal." However, the Post highlights some "toxic and irrelevant questions" that have arisen around this, including from conservatives worried about how the selection will impact "the current culture war over immigration." The piece argues "cool-headed deliberation" in the selection "would be best for the FBI, its workers and the region."

Trump Selects McMaster As National Security Adviser To Bipartisan Praise.

President Trump's selection of Army Lt. Gen. H.R. McMaster to serve as national security advisor receives mostly positive coverage, with McMaster's intellect and experience praised by analysts and members of both parties. Some analyses, however, question whether McMaster – who is known for bluntly challenging authority – will have the independence he needs to be successful, and whether he can bring order to the National Security Council. Several reports also say Trump and McMaster may clash on Russia, where McMaster has a hawkish view.

On ABC World News Tonight (2/20, lead story, 3:00, 14.63M), Cecilia Vega said that McMaster is "known as one of the Army's leading thinkers. ... He replaces the controversial Michael Flynn, fired by the President after lying about his conversations with the Russians – Flynn's ouster seen as a sign of a White House in turmoil, though the President insisted otherwise." David Muir: "Gen. Flynn was a controversial figure from the start, really, but Lt. Gen. McMaster has a different reputation." Vega: "He is receiving praise from Democrats and Republicans alike. In fact, Republican Sen. John McCain, who said that the Trump Administration was in disarray, tonight is calling the McMaster pick outstanding."

NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 2, 2:20, Holt, 16.61M) also said the selection is "earning widespread praise." Kristen Welker said McMaster "is highly decorated, having served in both Iraq wars and in Afghanistan. Also hailed for his military book 'Dereliction of Duty,' about officers who refused to tell President Johnson at the time he was wrong about Vietnam. Now McMaster is in a position of having to weigh if and when to speak out to the President." On the CBS Evening News (2/20, lead story, 1:55, Mason, 11.17M), Margaret Brennan called McMaster "outspoken," noting his criticism of President Bush's prosecution of the Iraq war.

Like the broadcast networks, CNN's Situation Room (2/20, 554K) mentioned that McMaster "was not the President's first choice." He was selected after Vice Adm. Robert Harward turned down Trump's offer. Retired Lt. Gen. Keith Kellogg, who had been the acting national security adviser, will return to his role of NSC chief of staff. The AP (2/20, Williams, 74K) reports that Trump "brought four options for the position to Mar-a-Lago over the weekend for in person interviews, McMaster among them." Trump said he would be asking another contender, former UN ambassador John Bolton, "to work with them in a 'somewhat different capacity.'"

The New York Daily News (2/20, Edelman, 4.45M) says the news came "in an unscheduled announcement" from Mar-a-Lago, where "Trump told reporters that McMaster was his choice and called him 'a man of tremendous talent and tremendous experience.'" USA Today (2/20, Jackson, Brook, 5.28M) calls McMaster "a noted writer and intellectual," and says that in "thanking Trump for the appointment that does not require Senate confirmation, McMaster told reporters that 'I would just like to say what a privilege it is to be able to continue serving our nation. I'm grateful to you for that opportunity, and I look forward to joining the national security team and doing everything that I can to advance and protect the interests of the American people.'"

The New York Times (2/20, Baker, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says McMaster is "a widely respected military strategist" who "is seen as one of the Army's leading intellectuals." As a commander, "he was credited with demonstrating how a different counterterrorism strategy could defeat insurgents in Iraq, providing the basis for the change in approach that Gen. David H. Petraeus adopted to shift momentum in a war that the United States was on the verge of losing."

Deputy Assistant to the President Sebastian Gorka was asked on Fox News Special Report  (2/20, 1.53M) what he thinks McMaster's appointment will mean for the White House. Gorka said, "I am over the moon. We are excited he's coming on board. He's known for being the iconoclast general. Fits nicely with the iconoclast President."

Slate (2/20, Kaplan, 1.83M) says McMaster, who is close to Defense Secretary Mattis, "is widely viewed as the Army's smartest officer." However, "he has spent little time in Washington and has had no experience even participating in interagency meetings, much less running them." But the Huffington Post (2/20, Wilkie, 237K) says "initial reactions to Trump's choice of McMaster were largely positive, with former administration officials and members of Congress praising his intellect and temperament."

Rep. Adam Kinzinger (R-IL) said on CNN's The Lead  (2/20, 320K), "I think it's a great pick." Asked what will be key for McMaster to be successful in the position, Kinzinger said, "He obviously has to understand he works for the President. ... So he has to understand that his role is to be an advisor to the President, to give him the best advice he can, but ultimately he has to do what the President says."

Andrew Exum, who says he has known McMaster for more than a decade, writes at The Atlantic (2/20, 5.35M) that the selection "is unambiguously good news. The United States, and the world, are safer for his decision. ... I fear this president and his known weaknesses will be too much for even as great a public servant as McMaster. But – and again, this is not hyperbole – I will tuck my sons into bed tonight feeling a little better about the country in which I am raising them."

Reuters (2/20, Mason, Rampton) says McMaster "is a highly regarded military tactician and strategic thinker, but his selection surprised some observers who wondered how the officer, whose Army career stalled at times for his questioning of authority, would deal with a White House that has not welcomed criticism." Trump and McMaster differ on Russia, which McMaster sees as "a threat and an antagonist." Politico (2/20, Wright, Herb, 2.46M) also focuses on that difference, writing that "warrior-scholar" McMaster "has staked out a decidedly more hawkish position on Russia and gone out of his way to assert that the war against terrorism must not morph into a war against Islam." Roll Call (2/20, 63K) headlines its report "New National Security Adviser: No Friend To Russia?" while Slate's Isaac Chotiner tweeted that McMaster once said, "Historians will likely regard Russia's 2014 invasion of Ukraine as the event that punctuated the end of the post-Cold War era."

One of the more negative reports comes from the Washington Post (2/20, Wagner, 11.43M), which focuses less on McMaster than on the Flynn turmoil. The Post says Harward's turning down of the job had the effect of "compounding the embarrassment surrounding" the Flynn resignation, and says the McMaster pick is "meant to help put the White House on firmer footing after missteps on multiple fronts." The Wall Street Journal (2/20, Lee, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) says McMaster must now lead an NSC that has been rudderless and unsure of its influence within the Administration. The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Memoli, 4.52M) similarly says the NSC "is short on staff and the subject of reports of internal turmoil."

TIME (2/20, Miller, 6.98M) notes that McMaster "was named to TIME's list of the 100 most influential people in 2014 shortly after his promotion to lead the Army's 'futures' center, in which he was lauded as perhaps 'the 21st century Army's pre-eminent warrior-thinker.'" The Columbus (GA) Ledger-Enquirer (2/20, Williams, 856K) reports that the choice "was well received" in its readership area, "where McMaster served as Fort Benning commander from June 2012 to July 2014 when he was promoted and took his current post with Training and Doctrine Command helping to design the Army of the future."

The Wall Street Journal (2/20, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) says in an editorial that McMaster could be a great choice, provided that Trump is wise enough to listen to him and that West Wing political figures do not get in his way. Bloomberg Politics (2/20, Dlouhy, 201K), the New York Post (2/20, Schultz, 3.82M), the Washington Times (2/20, Miller, 272K), the Daily Intelligencer (NY) (2/20, Raymond, 795K), and Military.com (2/20, McGarry, 234K) also have straightforward accounts, most of them brief, on the choice.

Rice, Democratic Legislators Warn Of Bannon's Role. Amid the praise came warnings to McMaster regarding the role of Steve Bannon. The Washington Times (2/20, Boyer, 272K) reports that Obama Administration NSA Susan Rice on Monday urged McMaster "to get rid of a national security wing" led by Bannon, tweeting, "Hope you will be able to choose your team, have direct reporting and daily access to POTUS, and can eliminate Strategic Initiatives Group."

Sen. Chris Coons said on CNN's Situation Room (2/20, 554K), "I think he is a good selection. Everything I have heard from his background...is all positive. His training, his experience, his education, his willingness to stand up and challenge folks where he disagrees with them. ... Steve Bannon will be a challenging opponent for him on the National Security Council."

Rep. Ruben Gallego (D-AZ), a member of the House Armed Services Committee, said on CNN's Situation Room (2/20, 554K), that McMaster is "very well-known, very well respected. ... The problem is this may still just be, you know, lipstick on a pig. Right now the foreign policy and our national security policy is basically being run by Bannon and by Donald Trump's tweets. The combination of those two things have made it unstable."

Democratic blogger and former Hillary Clinton adviser Peter Daou tweeted, "Dems would be less alarmed if @realDonaldTrump surrounded himself (and listened to) people like HR McMaster rather than Bannon and Miller." Jason Kander of Let America Vote, the 2016 Democratic nominee for Senate in Missouri, tweeted, "The biggest role Steve Bannon should have in national security decisions is judging whether LTG McMaster's shoes need a shine." And not only Democrats weighed in: Max Boot of the Council on Foreign Relations tweeted, "HR McMaster is an outstanding choice but his selection does not end WH dysfunction with Bannon & Kushner pursuing own foreign policies."

Pence Says He Was "Disappointed" By Flynn. The Hill (2/20, Fabian, 1.25M) reports that President Trump said Vice President Pence "had a role" in the selection of McMaster. The Washington Post (2/20, Birnbaum, Parker, 11.43M) reports that Pence, while visiting NATO headquarters, said he "'fully supported' Michael Flynn's ouster last week as national security adviser." CNN's Situation Room (2/20, 554K) reported that Pence publicly said "for the first time that Michael Flynn's behavior was a let-down to the Administration." The Washington Times (2/20, Boyer, 272K) reports Pence said, "I was disappointed to learn that the facts conveyed to me by Gen. Flynn were inaccurate. I'm very grateful for the close working relationship I have with the President."

Democrats Say Gorsuch Refusing To Address His Views On Key Questions.

The New York Times (2/20, Hulse, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that Senate Democrats are say they are having difficulty getting Supreme Court nominee Judge Neil M. Gorsuch to provide "pertinent answers" as they prepare for his confirmation hearings next month. Sen. Richard Blumenthal said, "He refused to say anything about potentially relevant questions." While this "test of wills promises to provide friction" during the hearings, it is "the latest match in the longstanding tug-of-war over how far judicial nominees should or should not go in responding to questions from lawmakers." It has become "an uncomfortable norm for nominees to avoid providing fulsome answers both in private interviews and during the confirmation hearing." While "no one expects a nominee like Judge Gorsuch to address how he would rule on a specific case," Democrats "say that Judge Gorsuch must be willing to discuss the merits of past Supreme Court decisions as well as his judicial principles and philosophy."

INTERNATIONAL NEWS

Mattis Says US Not In Iraq To Seize Oil.

The CBS Evening News  (2/20, story 7, 0:15, Mason, 11.17M) reported Defense Secretary Mattis traveled to Baghdad yesterday for meetings with Iraqi leaders as Reuters (2/20, Stewart) says he "distanc[ed] himself" from President Trump's remarks about seizing oil. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, Lubold, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) quotes Mattis as saying – prior to departing Abu Dhabi for Baghdad – "I think all of us here in this room, all of us in America, have paid for our gas and oil all along and I'm sure that we will continue to do so in the future." Mattis added, according to according to the New York Times (2/20, Cooper, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), that the US is "not in Iraq to seize anybody's oil."

Barbara Starr reported on CNN's Situation Room  (2/20, 554K) that Mattis was also "making clear the US isn't leaving [Iraq] any time soon." He was shown stating, "I imagine we'll be in this fight for a while and we'll stand by each other." The AP (2/20, Baldor) reports Mattis also indicated that his meetings with Iraqi leaders have shown the partnership between the US and Iraq. Mattis said there is no question that "the Iraqi people, the Iraqi military and the Iraqi political leadership recognize what they're up against and the value of the coalition and the partnership, in particular with the United States." Mattis: Administration Will "Take Steps To Allow Those Who Have Fought Alongside Us" Entry Into US. Jennifer Griffin of Fox News' Special Report  (2/20, 1.53M) reported that Mattis also discussed Trump's immigration order "banning Iraqis temporarily." Mattis told Iraqi officials that exceptions will be made. Fox showed Mattis saying, "I am not seeing the new executive order but I am assured that we will take steps to allow those who have fought alongside us to be allowed in to the United States."

Coons Says Mattis' Comment "Reassures Me." Sen. Chris Coons told CNN's Situation Room  (2/20, 554K) that Mattis' assertion on Iraq's oil "reassures me." However, he said it is "troubling" that Mattis and Vice President Pence have repeatedly been forced to reassure allies following controversial statements by Trump. Coons said, "We need President Trump to make calming and reassuring statements that show he is a deliberate and well-toed head of state."

US Military Advisers Fighting Alongside Iraqi Troops In Western Mosul.

The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Hennigan, Bulos, 4.52M) reports Army Lt. Gen. Stephen Townsend told reporters in Iraq that about 450 US military advisers are "operating closer and deeper into Iraqi formations" in the western Mosul offensive. He explained the adjustment was made during the eastern Mosul operation. Col. John Dorrian, a spokesman for the US-led coalition against ISIS, also confirmed US forces can now go "as close as they need to get." The Times notes the Pentagon did not publicly announce the adjustment, "but it became apparent Sunday after scores of uniformed U.S. soldiers were seen fighting shoulder-to-shoulder with Iraqi forces." Former President Obama "quietly granted" the authority to place US troops near combat lines in November, and "Iraq officials believe it will be crucial against the 2,000 militants still inside" western Mosul.

The Washington Post (2/20, Lamothe, 11.43M) reports Defense Secretary Mattis also told reporters on Sunday night that the US-led coalition will "continue to go after" ISIS in Mosul and Raqqa "until we destroy them and any kind of belief in the inevitably of their message." When questioned about President Trump's previous suggestion that the US may take Iraq's oil, Mattis responded, "We're not in Iraq to seize anybody's oil." Turkey reportedly submitted two plans to US officials for the Raqqa offensive that incorporated local Arab forces and not Kurdish forces. Mattis commented that the coalition allies "are still working it out" and "sharing planning, and that's all I'm going [to say] right now. But the planning is still underway, so it has not all been decided upon who is going to do what and where. We're working together to sort it out."

Mattis also said the jihadists were "going to be shown exactly what they are, which is a bunch of murderous relics," and Iraq's leaders and civilians will recognize "what they are up against and the value of the coalition," AFP (2/20, Watkins) reports. Meanwhile, Iraq's military reached the Aqrab checkpoint, which federal police officer Lt. Gen. Haider al-Mtoury called "very important because it is considered to be Mosul's southern gate." He said the advancing troops faced numerous car bombs and suicide bombers as they advanced within a mile of Mosul's southern city limits. They also secured the strategic Al-Buseif hills near Mosul's airport, and in the north, allied paramilitaries descended further west to Tal Afar, which is still fully controlled by ISIS.

Charlie D'Agata of the CBS Evening News (2/20, story 8, 2:05, Mason, 11.17M) reiterated that "ISIS has been dug in for months in western Mosul, and they're not likely to leave without a major fight." Furthermore, new ISIS propaganda videos "appear to show armed drones dropping explosives on Iraqi troops with dead center accuracy." The terror group's drones "have also been used to deadly effect as surveillance, guiding car bombs through Mosul's narrow streets straight to Iraqi troop positions." D'Agata said "the US military told us its troops have new weapons to counter ISIS drones," however, including "a gun that jams the radio waves between the drone and its controller."

Roadside Bomb Kills Four Russian Servicemen In Syria.

The Washington Post (2/20, Loveluck, 11.43M) reports Russia's defense ministry said in a statement that on Feb. 16, four of its servicemen were killed in a roadside bomb explosion targeting a Syrian military convoy near the Tiyas airbase. Russia has used the western Syrian airbase to launch raids against ISIS fighters in Palmyra. Russia's claim was not verified, and ISIS militants did not claim responsibility for the attack. Yet, Russia's allegations "underscored the growing toll that Syria's conflict has wrought on Russian military and mercenary forces fighting on behalf of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad."

ISIS Releases Video Of Suicide Car Bombing Team.

The New York Post (2/20, Perez, 3.82M) reports ISIS' Amaq News Agency posted a video that seemingly depicts a team of suicide car bombers conducting a fatal attack against an Iraqi army base in Mosul on Monday. In the video footage, the jihadists are shown driving their SUVs into the base and then detonating their devices. One of the suicide car bombers, British-born Abu Zakariya al-Britani, was reportedly "grinning from ear to ear," and another "happy" fighter was shown "cheerfully pointing to the camera and saying something in Arabic before he shuts the driver-side door and pulls off." ISIS released an official statement in which it claimed the jihadists' operation resulted in "many casualties," but the Post says the actual death toll is unknown. At least two of the suicide car bombers reached a base west of Mosul, and a third was said to have detonated before reaching the base.

Damascus Airstrikes Kill At Least Seven.

The AP (2/20) reports airstrikes killed at least seven people and wounded at least 12 in the Barzeh and Qaboun neighborhoods of Damascus on Monday. The Syrian Observatory for Human Rights and Barzeh Media Center claimed either Russian or Syrian Air Force jets conducted the attacks. Barzeh, Qaboun, and Tishreen are collectively one of the opposition forces' remaining footholes inside the Syrian capital. Barzeh and Qaboun connect "to a vast, opposition-held district in the suburbs" through a smuggling tunnel network, according to Century Foundation researcher Aron Lund.

France's Le Pen Discusses Syria, Terrorism With Lebanese Leaders.

The AP (2/20, Rosa, Ganley) reports France's far-right National Front party presidential candidate, Marine Le Pen, met with Lebanon's Prime Minister Saad Hariri and President Michel Aoun on Monday. In talks with Hariri, Le Pen asserted there is "no viable and workable solution" to the Syrian civil war without choosing between President Bashar al Assad and ISIS. She said that "in the political picture the least bad option is the politically realistic," and "Assad is evidently today the most reassuring solution for France." An official readout of Le Pen's meeting with Hariri quoted the prime minister as stating, "Muslims are the first victims" of terrorism, and moderate Muslims are "the first bulwark against extremism." Le Pen also met with the Christian Maronite patriarch and stressed her support for the Christian minority, but she added, "For me to protect Christians is to make sure the Christians stay in their countries" and not seek refuge elsewhere.

Pakistani Ski Resort Allows Ski Tourism To "Re-Emerge."

Reuters (2/20, Jorgic) reports that a ski resort in Malam Jabba, Pakistan and the improved security surrounding it's Swat Valley location "has allowed ski tourism to re-emerge" after the Taliban declared skiing "un-Islamic" when it controlled the area from 2007-2009. Reuters says that locals "tout Swat" as "the Switzerland of Pakistan," but "Army checkpoints" still "abound."

Trump Doubles Down On Criticism Of Sweden's Immigration Policy.

Media reporting on Monday characterized President Trump's tweet about Sweden's immigration policy as a continuation of critical comments he made about it over the weekend. The AP (2/20, Lucey) and The Hill (2/20, Greenwood, 1.25M) report the President tweeted, "The FAKE NEWS media is trying to say that large scale immigration in Sweden is working out just beautifully. NOT!" The New York Times (2/20, Chan, Anderson, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says Trump's comment "escalated his attack on Sweden's migration policies" by "doubling down on his suggestion" that the country's refugees were responsible for an increase in crime and terrorism, while the Washington Times (2/20, Miller, 272K) indicates that Trump is "accusing the news media Monday of being the ones who got the story wrong."

Similarly to most reporting, Politico (2/20, 2.46M) says the tweet "follows a social media dustup that started after Trump alluded to an unknown event in Sweden" during a Saturday speech. Trump said, "You look at what's happening in Germany. You look at what's happening last night in Sweden. Sweden, who would believe this? Sweden. They took in large numbers and they're having problems like they never thought possible." Trump, according to Politico, "later stated that he was referring to a Fox News story on immigration in Sweden."

AFP (2/20, HONORE) says the last terrorist attack in Sweden came in December 2010 – when a Swedish citizen of Iraqi origin "blew himself up" in a Stockholm shopping area – but that was "before the large migrant influx in 2014-2015." AFP adds that while Sweden "registered a record number of crimes per capita in 2015," acts of violence against people dropped by 0.4 percent.

Ruth Marcus said on CNN's The Lead  (2/20, 320K), "What I love here is that the President says something false, fake, if you will, look at what happened in Sweden last night, and then he somehow manages this magnificent pivot to attack us in the media for fake news." Marcus added that "it's really different when you say something that is not true as a President, than even as a presidential candidate and you get called on it in real time by a reporter at a press conference and you get called on it by another country when you are doing it to them. And so I think – it would be too much to say this is a learning moment for the President, but it should be."

Kinzinger, Kristol Discuss Impact On Relationship With Sweden. Rep. Adam Kinzinger said on CNN's The Lead  (2/20, 320K), "I think this was a mistake, it was an embarrassment, at the end of the day, our relationship with Sweden is fine. The people around the President are very good. I just think he needs to be a little more conscious in caging his words in terms of when he talks about allies and things along that line." However, Bill Kristol said on CNN's The Lead  (2/20, 320K) Trump's comments are "offending a nation we don't have to offend." It is, he added, "unnecessarily offensive. ... There is nothing to be gained from it."

Former Ambassador: Trump Seems To Be "Building A Narrative" Based On News Reports. Former US Ambassador to Sweden Mark Brzezinski said on MSNBC's Morning Joe  (2/20, 270K) that Trump seems to be "building a narrative on an informational basis based on what he sees on cable news and news reports. That is a dangerous thing to do as seen by this example. Then secondly, it doesn't seem that he's relying on the national security process at the White House. If there had been a terrorist attack in Sweden, the President would have been briefed on it by his national security team. That couldn't have happened."

Haley Says Security Council Meeting Showed "Anti-Israel" Bias.

Breitbart (2/20, Nazarian, 2.02M) reports that US Ambassador Nikki Haley on Thursday "issued a scathing criticism" of the Security Council over its "anti-Israel" bias following her first regular monthly meeting of the organization. Haley "noted that while" the Security Council's mission is to discuss methods of maintaining peace and security; the meeting on the Middle East did not address important issues such as Hezbollah's buildup of rockets in Lebanon; money and weapons that Iran is sending terrorist groups; and ways to combat ISIL. Haley said, "Instead, the meeting focused on criticizing Israel, the one true democracy in the Middle East." Haley added, "I'm here to say the United States will not turn a blind eye to this anymore. I'm here to underscore the ironclad support of the United States for Israel."

Bloomberg Analysis Considers Alternatives To Two-State Solution. Bloomberg Politics (2/20, Ferziger, 201K) reports President Trump's Feb. 15 statement that the Israelis and Palestinians could decide for themselves whether to move toward a one-state or two-state solution "resuscitated an option previous administrations had buried." Bloomberg lists "possible alternatives that may now be back in play." These include: a one-state solution; annexing about 60 percent of the West Bank and offering Palestinians in remaining areas "autonomy on steroids;" a confederation in which both sides are separate political entities within one state; creating an interim Palestinian state; a "partial Israeli pullback;" and maintaining the "status quo."

Turnbull: Conversations With Trump "Constructive, Frank, And Forthright."

Bloomberg Politics (2/20, Lun, 201K) reports Australian Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull said Tuesday that President Trump has a "very big personality" with a "very big job." Turnbull told Bloomberg Television that the leaders "had several conversations now" and the talks were "constructive, frank and forthright." Turnbull added that his government's approach to dealing with Washington has not changed since Trump entered office. Turnbull said, "We pursue our national interest methodically, calmly, consistently, we make our case very frankly, and forthrightly, when we're speaking to our American friends," adding, "As you'd expect, with good friends, we are fairly circumspect about what we say in public."

Norway Joins International Effort To Replace US Funding For Family Planning, Abortions.

Reuters (2/20, Fouche) reports Norway joined an international effort to raise money to replace abortion funding that is no longer being provided by the US. Norwegian Prime Minister Erna Solberg indicated the government is "increasing support for family planning and safe abortion by 85 million Norwegian crowns ($10 million)" over its 2016 contribution. Solberg added, "At a time when this agenda has come under pressure, a joint effort is particularly important."

Pence Vows US Support For EU, NATO.

Vice President Pence on Monday promised that the US would stand by the EU and NATO. Media coverage highlights that Pence's statements during a trip to Brussels comes amid European concern about past comments by President Trump, with divergent reporting on the amount of skepticism that greeted Pence's comments. The CBS Evening News  (2/20, story 2, 0:50, Brennan, 11.17M) reported that Pence's trip "was meant to reassure European allies that the Trump Administration will support NATO and counter Russian aggression" and NBC Nightly News  (2/20, story 4, 1:55, Holt, 16.61M) said that Pence was "among those trying to calm anxious US allies unnerved by" Trump's comments.

The New York Times (2/20, Harris, Kanter, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Pence "told a rattled Europe" that President Trump fully supports the institutions. Pence said Trump asked him "to come here to Brussels, to the home of the European Union, and deliver an additional message." Pence added that "it's my privilege, on behalf of President Trump, to express the strong commitment of the United States to continued cooperation and partnership with the European Union." The Washington Post (2/20, Birnbaum, Parker, 11.43M) reports Pence said "he looked forward to greater coordination" on economic issues and combating terrorism. The Vice President "urged peace efforts in Ukraine" and promised the US would press Russia on that issue.

The AP (2/20, Thomas, Cook) reports Pence's comments were "met with some skepticism from leaders shaken by" President Trump's "more critical comments." Fox News' Special Report  (2/20, 1.53M) showed European Council President Donald Tusk telling the Vice President, "Thank you for this meeting. We truly needed it. Too much has happened over the past month in your country and surprising opinions have been voiced for us to pretend everything is as it used to be." The Wall Street Journal (2/20, Barnes, Norman, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) quotes Tusk as saying that Europe is "counting, as always in the past, on the United States' wholehearted and unequivocal support – let me repeat – unequivocal support for the idea of a united Europe." Tusk added, "The world would be a decidedly worse place if Europe were not united." AFP (2/20, Carmichael) reports EU foreign policy chief Federica Mogherini indicated that Pence's visit is "a very important political sign." However, Mogherini "suggested EU-US relations may become more pragmatic and less automatic than before."

Reuters (2/20, Rampton, Macdonald) reports that Pence during a NATO meeting later in the day "made clear that US support" for the bloc "had a price." Pence said that Trump "expects real progress" from European governments by the end of the year in efforts to increase military spending closer to the alliance's target of 2 percent of GDP. The Washington Times (2/20, Muñoz, 272K) reports NATO Secretary-General Jens Stoltenberg told CNN that Trump's requirement that l NATO members meet their financial requirements "clear, firm and fair." Stoltenberg added that he agrees with Trump that there is an "unfair burden sharing" among the bloc's members and the alliance cannot expect the US to pay most of the costs. Stoltenberg said the bloc is "starting to turn the corner" on investments. NATO Secretary General said on CNN Wolf  (2/20, 224K) that he was encouraged by Pence's comments "because it is a very consistent message." Stoltenberg said that he has spoken to multiple US officials and the "message from all of them is that United States is strongly committed to the trans-Atlantic alliance, to NATO, and will continue to support not only in words, but also in deeds because we see that the United States is now increasing their military presence in Europe in with new forces and more equipment."

US Flag At Pence's Speech Had 51 Stars. The AP (2/20) reports the American flag displayed in a background picture during Pence's comments had 51 stars instead of 50. The AP says the EU Council "did not immediately respond" to the question of how the mistake was made.

British Lawmakers Debate Whether UK Should Rescind Trump's State Visit Invitation.

The New York Times (2/20, Erlanger, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports British lawmakers on Monday "debated whether to deny" President Trump a formal state visit in response to a petition signed by "nearly two million Britons" that said such an honor would "cause embarrassment to Her Majesty the queen." ABC World News Tonight  (2/20, story 4, 2:50, Muir, 14.63M) showed Parliament member Tulip Siddiq saying that the UK "should not be inviting him to preach hatred and to spread his bigotry, his misogyny and his division."

The AP (2/20, Lawless) says the "passionate debate" is "unlikely to change" the government's position and "no formal vote was held" following the session that occurred in a side room of Parliament instead of the House of Commons chamber. The AP adds that "thousands of protesters" against Trump demonstrated outside the Parliament building during the debate.

Russia Dismisses Peace Plan Designed By Ukrainian Lawmaker, Trump Associates.

The AP (2/20) reports Moscow said Monday that it does not know about a Ukraine peace plan designed by pro-Russia Ukrainian opposition lawmaker Andrii Artemenko and two associates of President Trump. The AP says spokesman Dmitry Peskov "shrugged off the plan" – which calls for Russian forces to withdraw from Ukraine and a referendum on whether Crimea should be leased to Russia – and called it "absurd." Peskov said, according to the New York Times (2/20, Chan, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), "there is nothing to discuss" and "we don't know anything about any plans." Peskov added that "there is a general understanding that there is no alternative to the Minsk agreements" and Reuters (2/20, Vasovic) reports that Peskov also asked, "How can Russia rent its own region from itself?"

Russia Says Accepting Passports Issued By Rebels Is "Humanitarian" Move. The AP (2/20, Isachenkov) reports Russia on Monday "defended its decision to recognize passports issued by" Ukrainian separatists as the result of Ukraine's blockade of rebel regions. Peskov said it was a "humanitarian" decision as the blockade made it impossible for residents to travel to Ukrainian government-held territory to obtain or extend official documents.

Coons: It's "Worrying" That Trump Is Not Challenging Putin. Appearing on CNN's

Situation Room (2/20, 554K), Sen. Chris Coons said he is uncertain if the Administration will lift sanctions against Russia. However, Coons noted that there is bipartisan legislation in the Senate that would "require congressional action before those sanctions could be lifted." Still, Coons said, "It continues to be puzzling and worrying that [Trump] has not been direct in challenging Vladimir Putin's inappropriate interference in our election and in speaking forcefully against his ongoing occupation of Crimea," his "meddling in eastern Ukraine," and his "human rates violations in Syria."

Russian Ambassador To UN Dies Of Apparent Heart Attack.

The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 3, 0:25, Mason, 11.17M) reported Russian UN Ambassador Vitaly Churkin died of an apparent heart attack one day before he turned 65-years-old. ABC World News Tonight (2/20, story 9, 0:25, Muir, 14.63M) reported Churkin "died suddenly after falling ill at his office at the UN mission here in New York."

The AP (2/20) describes Churkin as "a veteran diplomat known as a potent and personable voice for his country's interests as he sparred with his Western counterparts." NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 6, 1:35, Holt, 16.61M) showed former US Ambassador Michael McFaul saying that Churkin was "a great diplomat." However, McFaul added that "it does reflect a kind of moment that we're in, given that there's been mysterious deaths in Russia recently that people want to run to that kind of explanation."

Montenegro Special Prosecutor Accuses Russia Of Plotting Election-Day Coup.

The AP (2/20, Milic) reports Montenegro's special prosecutor has accused Russia of "plotting an election-day coup attempt that included plans to kill" former Prime Minister Milo Djukanovic. Prosecutor Milivoje Katnic said an investigation into the October plan to overthrow the government and prevent it from joining NATO has shown "that Russian state bodies were involved at a certain level." Kremlin spokesman Dmitry Peskov said the accusation is "absurd" and "irresponsible."

European Finance Ministers Agree To Start Greece Bailout Talks.

The New York Times (2/20, Kanter, Kitsantonis, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports European finance ministers on Monday agreed to start talks as early as next week over necessary changes that Athens must undertake in exchange for bailout payments. The Times says the agreement "fell short of an all-encompassing deal" as there are "key questions" remaining over the "shape of the changes" to pensions, tax rules, and labor rules.

Reuters Analysis: Bailouts Have Not Helped Greece's Poverty. Reuters (2/20, Tagaris) reports that despite "seven years of bailouts" and "billions" of euros being "poured" into Greece, the country's poverty "isn't getting any better" and is "getting worse like nowhere else in the EU." Reuters says that while "the austerity and reform policies" that international lenders required of Greece prevented the country from entering bankruptcy, the "conditions have helped to turn recession into a depression."

EU Moves To Combat Fake News.

A front-page story in the New York Times (2/20, Scott, Eddy, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports on an 11-person team called East Stratcom, which "serves as Europe's front line against this onslaught of fake news." The team of "diplomats, bureaucrats and former journalists" was created by the EU to address "Russia's ongoing disinformation campaigns.'" It "tracks down reports to determine whether they are fake," then "debunks the stories for hapless readers." Since its creation 16 months ago, the team "has discredited 2,500 stories, many with links to Russia." The team's efforts come as "officials play catch-up in the fight against sophisticated hacking and fake news operations," fearing "Europe and its elections remain vulnerable at a critical moment: The region's decades-old project of unity hangs in the balance, challenged by populist forces within the bloc and pressures from Russia and beyond."

Analysts: Suspending Coal Imports China's Way Of Pressing Pyongyang On Nuclear Program.

The Wall Street Journal (2/20, Wong, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports Beijing's decision to suspend coal imports from North Korea provides China with an opportunity to push Pyongyang to pull back its nuclear program. The Journal says that analysts indicate the move is a way for China to condemn North Korea's Feb. 12 missile test, while also deflecting US criticism that Beijing has not taken enough steps to deter Pyongyang from developing its nuclear program.

CNN: North Korean Researcher Says North Koreans Care About US Policy, Not Trump. CNN's Situation Room (2/20, 554K) reported that while "the world struggles to understand what President Trump is doing next, North Korea says it could care less." Researcher Yu Gwang Choi told CNN, "We only care if they stop their hostile policy toward my country." Correspondent Will Ripley said the term "hostile policy" was "repeated by nearly everyone" he spoke to for the report.

North Korea, Malaysia In "Diplomatic Spat" Over Kim Jong-Nam Death.

NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 10, 1:35, Holt, 16.61M) reported that video has emerged that apparently shows how Kim Jong-nam, the half-brother of North Korean leader Kim Jong-un, was poisoned at an airport in Malaysia. Malaysian police and Interpol are searching for four North Korean men who apparently "left the country the same day Kim was killed. Four others are already in custody." CNN's Situation Room (2/20, 554K) reported that "two female suspects and two men [are] in custody."

Fox News' Special Report (2/20, 1.53M) reported the investigation "has caused a diplomatic spat after the North Korean ambassador called it politically motivated." North Korean Ambassador to Malaysia Kang Choi was shown stating, "There is no clear evidence on the cause of death and at the moment we cannot trust the investigation by the Malaysian police." Malaysian Prime Minister Najib Razak "hit back" as Fox showed him stating, "We have no reason why we want to do something that would paint the North Koreans in a bad light."

South Korean President: Killing "Intolerable Crime Against Humanity," "Terrorist Act." The New York Times (2/20, Sang-Hun, Paddock, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports acting South Korean President Hwang Kyo-ahn on Monday called the killing "an intolerable crime against humanity and terrorist act" plotted by Pyongyang. The comments, the Times says, "were the strongest yet" by South Korea's government linking North Korea to the Feb. 13 at Kuala Lumpur International Airport in Malaysia. Hwang said during a cabinet meeting that the act "starkly demonstrated the North Korean regime's recklessness and cruelty as well as the fact that it will do anything, everything in order to maintain its power."

Egyptian, Algerian, And Tunisian Presidents To Meet To Reconcile Libyan Factions.

The AP (2/20, Bouazza) reports a summit meeting has been announced among the Egyptian, Algerian, and Tunisian presidents to attempt to "reconcile" the competing factions in Libya in order to reduce "chaos" there. At a meeting in Tunis, the diplomats who announced the coming meeting also pledged their "attachment to Libya's sovereignty and territorial integrity." A date has not yet been announced for the meeting.

Merkel's Christian Democrats Recapture Lead In Pre-Election Poll.

Reuters (2/20, Kirschbaum) reports that on Monday, Germany's Bild newspaper published the results of an INSA poll of 2,030 voters that suggested Chancellor Angela Merkel's Christian Democrats and sister Christian Social Union party would win 31.5 percent in upcoming elections, a 1.5 percentage point increase from polling results last week. The previously-leading center-left Social Democrats' support dropped by one percentage point, according to the poll, and stood at 30 percent. In January, the Social Democrats enjoyed an "unexpected surge of some 12 points," which caught Merkel and conservatives off guard just seven months ahead of Germany's Sept. 24 election. The Social Democrats' support increased after "the appointment of Martin Schulz as the chancellor candidate who wants to take his party to the left to beat Merkel."

Le Pen Gains Ground In France's Pre-Election Polls.

According to an OpinionWay poll on Monday, France's far-right National Front presidential candidate Marine Le Pen continued to gain on independent front-runner Emmanuel Macron and Republican Francois Fillon, Bloomberg Politics (2/20, Viscusi, 201K) reports. The poll suggested Macron would secure 58 percent of votes against Le Pen's predicted 42 percent in May's run-off, an advantage that "has halved in less than two weeks." OpinionWay director Bruno Jeanbart explained, "It's all about security," and "Le Pen is benefiting from the fact that they're all busy either bickering or unable to disentangle themselves from their many controversies." Macron "opened himself up to criticism" when he called aspects of colonialism a crime against humanity, and Fillon has failed to regain the ground he lost after "allegations that he misused public funds to hire family members" emerged. Le Pen has also faced her own legal issues; on Monday, investigators searched the National Front's headquarters in a broader probe into whether the she paid nonexistent jobs with European Parliament funds.

Reuters (2/20, Bon) reports the European Union anti-fraud agency OLAF initially introduced the allegations against Le Pen, who has denied the accusations. French judges launched the investigation on Dec. 15, and thus far it is unclear "what impact the probe could have on Le Pen or how quickly the investigation will move forward." National Front vice president Florian Philippot told BMF television that the "media-stunt searches" of the party's headquarters came as Le Pen "gets a 2-point bounce in the polls. It's always when the system is in panic that these affairs come out."

American, Chinese Global Weapons Sales On The Rise.

The Washington Times (2/20, Muñoz, 272K) reports analysts at the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute, or SIPRI, released an analysis on Monday in which they claimed US weapons manufacturers' sales to the global community were 21 percent greater in the four year period 2012-2016 than they were in the previous four-year cycle. SIPRI director Dr. Aude Fleuant said US suppliers sold major arms to "at least 100 countries," a significantly larger clientele than any other state supplier. Fleuant attributed a large portion of those sales to both advanced strike aircraft and latest-generation air and missile defense systems. According to the analysis, the US suppliers accounted for about one-third of all global arms sales, and Russian-based defense firms for just over 23 percent. China boosted its global sales by 6.2 percent and emerged as a "top-tier supplier" of arms on par with German and French military defense firms. The Times notes that from 2007 to 2011, China increased its international weapons sales by 3.8 percent.

Former Turkish Soldiers Tried For Alleged Assassination Attempt.

The New York Times (2/20, Kingsley, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports 47 former Turkish soldiers accused of attempting to assassinate President Recep Tayyip Erdogan were brought to trial on Monday in the southwestern city of Mugla. The charges were related to the July 16 attempted coup, but unlike other cases related to the incident, the Mugla trial focused on the defendants' alleged assassination attempt during Erdogan's Mediterranean coast vacation on July 15. Gokhan Sonmezates, one of the defendants, admitted his involvement in the attempted coup but denied that he or his co-defendants had conspired to assassinate Erdogan, or that they were connected to exiled cleric Fethullah Gulen. Erdogan's attorney, Huseyin Aydin, told reporters that there was little doubt that the defendants "arrived at the scene with the intention of killing the president." Aydin added, "For the first time in our history, it is discussed that a commander in chief, a president, was subject to an assassination attempt by Turkish Army members."

Migrants Attempt Mass Breach Of Spanish Territory's Border Fence.

The New York Times (2/20, Bilefsky, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports around 600 African migrants attempted to breach a border fence separating Morocco from the Spanish enclave of Ceuta on Monday morning. Eleven migrants were hospitalized with injuries related to the crossing attempt, according to the Red Cross. Hundreds of African migrants were injured in a similar breach attempt on Friday. Ceuta's immigration center now hosts more than 1,400 migrants who may face deportation. Ceuta and another Spanish territory, Melilla, "have the only two land borders between the European Union and Africa, and they have become a magnet for sub-Saharan migrants willing to cross deserts, brave razor wire and endure perilous conditions in search of a better life." Spain's state security secretary, José Antonio Nieto, reportedly claimed the government may start using drones to heighten the border's security.

Ecuadoran Leftist Candidate Expected To Win Election.

The AP (2/20, Solano) reports Ecuador's ruling socialist party candidate, Lenin Moreno, secured an early presidential election lead on Monday with more than 39 percent of the votes. Moreno's closest contender, former banker Guillermo Lasso, trailed with 28 percent of the votes. To avoid a runoff election, Moreno must secure 40 percent of the vote and a 10-point lead over Lasso. Moreno declared himself the winner before the first votes were released on Sunday evening and called Lasso to concede. He later agreed to wait until the final votes were tallied but added, "I have faith we'll reach 40 percent." Lasso's supporters held an overnight vigil on Sunday night that stretched into Monday; by the afternoon, the vigil evolved into a protest against President Rafael Correa, who hand-picked Moreno as the ruling party's candidate. Lasso's running mate, Andres Paez, warned that if the election results were not clean, "we'll declare ourselves in civil disobedience."

Famine Declaration Issued For Northern South Sudan.

The Washington Post (2/20, Ombuor, 11.43M) reports South Sudanese National Bureau of Statistics head Isaiah Choi Aruai joined representatives from the World Food Program, UNICEF, and the Food and Agriculture Organization on Monday at a news conference in Juba to formally issue a famine declaration for two northern Unity state counties. The agencies collectively warned that 100,000 people face starvation, and another one million are on the cusp of famine. World Food Program head Joyce Luma called the severe food shortage a "man-made" famine that the UN officials credited to disrupted agriculture and a crippled economy resulting from ongoing ethnic wars and political turmoil.

The UN officials also warned 275,000 children faced fatal starvation without a rapid humanitarian aid increase, the Los Angeles Times (2/20, Dixon, 4.52M) reports. Luma said her organization "and the entire humanitarian community have been trying with all our might to avoid this catastrophe, mounting a humanitarian response of a scale that quite frankly would have seemed impossible three years ago." She cautioned that without peace and security, however, "there is only so much that humanitarian assistance can achieve." Aruai urged the international community to increase its aid contributions in the coming months. According to the US Famine Early Warning Systems Network, man-made famines in South Sudan and Nigeria and the threat of famines in Somalia and Yemen underscore the "unprecedented" need for emergency food assistance. The Network also estimated 70 million people in 45 nations will require food aid in 2017.

Gerson Calls On Administration Officials To Restore American Exceptionalism.

Michael Gerson, in his column for the Washington Post (2/20, Gerson, 11.43M), suggests President Trump's inaugural address was meant "to signal the end of exceptionalism, at least in its international expression." His rhetoric was a departure from the "bipartisan, post-World War II foreign policy consensus," but "also a culmination of recent trends" under former President Obama's habitual "geostrategic retreat." This trend, Gerson writes, is a "sobering development" that is "consistent with a broader political trend," with American and European leaders opting "to ride this trend rather than buck it." As "America loses its ideological nerve," authoritarian regimes will "have greater confidence in impunity," and relativism "is easily imported across the border" and can have inward-facing consequences for American civil rights. Gerson says the Administration "is divided on these matters," and the Defense and State Departments' "committed internationalists" could assume "this calling of leadership" and thwart efforts by White House Chief Strategist Steve Bannon and others to "take America toward dishonor and failure."

Scholar: Trump Largely Following Established Foreign Policy.

Michael Auslin, a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/20, Auslin, Subscription Publication, 6.37M), that despite some suggestions to the contrary, the President is following a coherent and consistent approach to foreign policy. Auslin argues that Trump is overturning some longstanding policies where his domestic priorities require it, such as the Trans-Pacific Partnership and NAFTA, but is abiding by established policy in other areas, such as the postwar military alliances in Europe and Asia, and the "One China" policy.

Lawmakers Urge State Department To Re-List North Korea As Terrorism Sponsor.

Sen. Cory Gardner and Reps. Ed Royce, Ted Poe, and Eliot Engel told the AP (2/18, Pennington) that they are urging the State Department to re-designate North Korea as a state sponsor of terrorism. The blacklist currently includes Iran, Sudan, and Syria as terrorism sponsors. North Korea was on the blacklist for two decades and began after the 1987 South Korean airliner bombing that killed 115 people; former President George W. Bush removed the designation in 2008 to more effectively "smooth the way for aid-for-disarmament negotiations." However, the AP says the alleged "assassination of the North Korean leader's estranged half-brother is strengthening bipartisan calls" for the re-designation, and lawmakers reintroduced a 2015 bill that called for the State Department's review of North Korea's purported dissident assassinations, weapons sales to various militant groups, and hacking of Sony Pictures Entertainment. To relist North Korea, Secretary of State Tillerson "would have to determine that it has 'repeatedly' provided support for acts of international terrorism."

Reuters (2/18, Brunnstrom, Bartz) reports a State Department spokesperson reiterated that all nations "should fully and transparently implement all relevant UN Security Council Resolutions" against North Korea. The spokesperson added, "We continue to urge China to exert its unique leverage as North Korea's largest trading partner to convince Pyongyang to return to serious talks on denuclearization."

Arms Experts Assess North Korea's Nuclear Weapons Capabilities. The New York Times (2/17, Gladstone, Jacquette, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports North Korea, despite its diplomatic challenges and the sanctions implemented against it, has managed to invest in becoming a nuclear weapons power. Experts told the Times they believe North Korean leader Kim Jong-un specifically launched the February missile test "to jolt a new American president," and arms experts cautioned the missile featured solid-fuel technology, which decreases a missile's detection and allows it to launch more quickly. The experts said North Korea's nuclear weapons program has progressed in four key areas: "arsenal size, bomb strength, missile technology and ability to elude detection." North Korea is believed to have fewer than 10 weapons, but satellite imagery suggested it could very quickly expand that arsenal. Los Alamos National Laboratory emeritus director Siegfried S. Heckler predicted, "Pyongyang will likely develop the capability to reach the continental United States with a nuclear tipped missile in a decade or so."

Chinese Official: US Policy On North Korea "Not Working." Bloomberg News (2/18, Wadhams, 2.41M) reports Chinese Foreign Affairs Committee Chair Fu Ying told world leaders at the Munich Security Conference on Saturday that "China just keeps on telling" the US that its policy of maintaining both sanctions and military pressure on North Korea "is not working, although we're going along with you." Fu warned that the measures "will only drive them in the wrong direction further." Sen. Dan Sullivan and South Korean Foreign Minister Yun Byung-se joined Fu on stage "in a rare public airing of differences" between the US and South Korea and China. Both Sullivan and Yun rejected Fu's call for more talks. President Trump has repeatedly pressured China to compel North Korea into abiding by United Nations Security Council resolutions implemented to curb the nation's nuclear program.

China Suspends Coal Imports From North Korea. The New York Times (2/18, Sang-Hun, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports China's Commerce Ministry announced in a statement issued on Saturday that it will suspend all North Korean coal imports beginning on Sunday. The measure constituted China's effort to enact United Nations Security Council sanctions against North Korea for its nuclear weapons and ballistic-missile program. The suspension will extend until the end of the year.

The Washington Post (2/18, Denyer, 11.43M) reports because coal is North Korea's largest export item, it also serves as China's most effective point of leverage. The "surprise move" will sever "a major financial lifeline for Pyongyang and significantly enhance the effectiveness of U.N. sanctions." Experts posited China's decision did not reflect its desire to implement the resolution as China claimed, but likely reflected Beijing's deepening frustration over Pyongyang's alleged role in the assassination of Kim Jong-un's half brother in Malaysia. Carnegie-Tsinghua Center director Paul Haenle said China viewed "the assassination as a direct affront to China," and President Xi Jinping, who has already grown "more and more frustrated with Kim Jong Un," will not "tolerate these provocations."

Malaysia Arrests New Suspect In Assassination Of North Korean Leader's Half Brother. ABC World News Tonight's (2/18, story 8, 1:20, Llamas, 14.63M) Jennifer Eccleston reported Malaysian authorities also arrested a third male suspect from North Korea in connection to the assassination of Kim Jong Un's half brother, Kim Jong Nam. Aishah's "family claims she thought she was part of a candid camera TV show, spraying Kim Jong Nam--along with several other men--in the face for laughs, unaware of any potential deadly chemicals inside."

The Wall Street Journal (2/18, Rachman, Otto, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports Indonesian National Police Chief Tito Karnavian similarly said Aishah "was used" and "did not realize it was an assassination attempt." On Saturday, Indonesia's Foreign Ministry announced it would enlist a legal team for Aishah and clarified that Malaysian authorities did not charge her with a crime, but simply took her into custody.

Malaysians Rally In Support Of Islamic Law's Integration Into Legal System.

Reuters (2/18, Sipalan) reports thousands of Malaysians gathered in the capital city of Kuala Lumpur on Saturday to rally for the adoption of a contentious bill that "seeks to incorporate parts of the Islamic penal code, or 'hudud', into Malaysia's existing Islamic legal system." Prime Minister Najib Razak has supported the measure, but critics warned empowering the Shariah Court will exacerbate already unequal judicial treatment of Muslims and non-Muslims.

Avian Virus Infections Surge In China.

The New York Times (2/19, A6, Buckley, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Chinese health officials on Friday confirmed that in February, eight people died and 77 were diagnosed with H7N9 "bird flu" infections. Last month, 192 people were diagnosed, and 79 of those people died. In response to the surge in infections, China's National Health and Family Planning Commission prohibited live poultry sales in certain eastern, southern, and southwestern regions. Almost all confirmed cases resulted from direct contact with birds, but experts expressed concerns "that the virus could eventually mutate into one that passes easily between people."

French Presidential Candidate Campaigns Without Party Alignment.

The Washington Post (2/18, McAuley, 11.43M) reports former French Economy Minister Emmanuel Macron "has billed himself as a radical centrist, a candidate for all," and chose not to identify with a party in his presidential campaign. He "remains extraordinarily popular, especially among Parisian elites and younger people," but his critics pointed to inconsistencies in his message. Macron, a former investment banker, drafted an "unpopular" law aimed at stimulating economic growth but viewed by many on the left as pro-big business. Yet, Macron is believed to be "the candidate with the best chance of defeating" far-right candidate Marine Le Pen, who is expected to qualify for the final presidential voting round in May. Even if he does win, "he has no party support behind him and his blend of ideologies will probably be difficult to sell in the French Parliament."

Poll Suggests Most French Voters Wish Fillon Would Withdraw. Reuters (2/18, Rosemain) reports the results of an Ifop poll of 1,0004 French voters surveyed on Friday and Saturday indicated 65 percent of respondents wished conservative presidential candidate Francois Fillon would withdraw his candidacy. Fillon's wife was allegedly "paid for a fake job," but he confirmed on Friday that he intends to remain in the race.

Wilders Loses Momentum Ahead Of Dutch Presidential Election.

The Wall Street Journal (2/18, Pop, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports the Netherlands' far-right candidate for prime minister, Geert Wilders, has been dubbed the "Dutch Trump" because of similarities between their rhetoric and campaign promises. Yet, a recent backlash against Trump's policies in the Netherlands and throughout Europe prompted Wilders to distance himself from the comparisons; he is losing momentum, but his Party for Freedom is still expected to win a parliamentary majority.

The New York Times (2/18, Goldman, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Wilders, at a parliamentary election campaign event on Saturday, told voters he will "make the Netherlands our again." To reporters, Wilders also called Moroccan immigrants "scum" and accused them of making "the streets unsafe." The Times notes Wilders was convicted of inciting discrimination in December for leading an anti-Moroccan chant at a 2014 political rally.

London Mayor, EU Target High Air Pollution Levels.

The New York Times (2/17, De Freytas-Tamura, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Britain's Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Department suggested air pollution is connected to 23,500 annual deaths, the second highest number of nitrogen dioxide-related deaths in the European Union. The EU on Wednesday ordered five bloc members, including Britain, to reduce car pollution levels; however, the British government's previous efforts to encourage diesel engine use backfired when tests indicated that diesel vehicles emitted about five times as much emissions. London Mayor Sadiq Khan said on Friday that he will introduce toxicity taxes for polluting vehicles, plans to expand the city's low-emission zone across the capital in 2019, and will implement 12 low-emission bus zones throughout London.

Spanish Protesters Urge Government To Accept More Refugees.

The AP (2/18) reports that in Barcelona on Saturday, more than 160,000 protesters marched to demand that the conservative Spanish government accept more refugees from war-torn nation. The government pledged in late 2015 to accept 17,337 refugees in the following two years, but on Thursday, the number of refugees accepted in the nation totaled 1,100.

Greek Workers Turn To Shadow Economy In Wake Of Increased Taxes.

The New York Times (2/18, Alderman, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that in the last two months, more than 21,000 self-employed workers and small businesses in Greece have sought assistance from tax consultancies in book-closing procedures, but "many are not actually closing their businesses." As a result, "business has jumped" and Greece's shadow economy has grown. The black market is now believed to comprise between 20 and 25 percent of the nation's gross domestic product. The "once law-abiding Greeks" said they were motivated by "new austerity measures," specifically tax increases up to an estimated 70 percent of individual gross income. Some Greeks claimed that they are unwilling to put their money back into a financial system controlled by a government they do not trust. Greece's creditors have prioritized shutting down the black market, and the topic will likely be discussed on Tuesday in negotiations between Greece and its European creditors.

NYTimes A1: Russian Region's "Vodka Tragedy" Highlights Nation's Growing Poverty.

On its front page, the New York Times (2/18, Macfarquhar, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Russian President Vladimir Putin vowed that his economic, press, and political reforms would improve Russians' quality of life, and organized "a series of targets for 2020." Yet, its middle class now comprises only about 50 percent of the population, the average wage is about 20,000 rubles short to equal Putin's target, and in some regions, such as Irkutsk, the number of people living below the poverty line has increased. In Irkutsk, dubbed "a snapshot of the growing poverty in Russia," bootleggers marketed "boyaryshnik" as a bath oil but it is widely consumed "as poor man's vodka." Boyaryshnik's consumption created a "mass poisoning" in the region because some bootleggers used methanol instead of ethanol; until that "vodka tragedy," the Times writes, "nobody protested the economic plight."

State Department Demands Release Of Venezuelan Political Prisoners.

The Miami Herald (2/18, Wyss, 856K) reports State Department spokesman Mark Toner issued a statement on Saturday in which he reiterated the US' "dismay and concern" over Venezuelan authorities' arrests of former presidential candidate Leopoldo López, former Mayor Daniel Ceballos, and "many other students, activists, journalists, and peaceful protesters." Toner wrote, "We call for the immediate release of all prisoners of conscience, respect for the rule of law, the freedom of the press, the separation of constitutional powers within the government, and the restoration of a democratic process that reflects the will of the Venezuelan people."

The AP (2/18, Rueda) reports the Administration imposed sanctions against Vice President Tareck El Aissami on Feb. 13 for his alleged role in international drug trafficking, and a day later, President Trump met with El Aissami's wife, Lilian Tintori. In comments from jail to the Colombian newspaper El Tiempo, Lopez said he did not reject voluntarily submitting to Venezuelan authorities instead of seeking asylum because it "gave me an opportunity to confront the lies, abuse of power and show the need to change the system at its roots." Lopez was sentenced last year to nearly 14 years in prison, and is one of more than 100 political activists currently incarcerated. His trial was "marred by irregularities for inciting violence during anti-government protests."

LEADING THE NEWS

NYTimes Analysis: Newly Released FBI Interviews Show Awlaki's Role In Plane-Bombing Plot.

The New York Times (2/22, A9, Shane, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that newly released documents show that "in a series of conversations in Qaeda safe houses in Yemen in 2009, Anwar al-Awlaki carefully sized up a young Nigerian volunteer, decided the man had the diligence and dedication for a 'martyrdom mission' and finally unveiled what he had in mind." Awlaki, "an American-born cleric who had become a leading propagandist for Al Qaeda, told the man, Umar Farouk Abdulmutallab, that 'the attack should occur on board a US airliner,' according to the account" Abdulmutallab gave the FBI. The documents, "obtained by The New York Times after a two-year legal battle under the Freedom of Information Act, fill in the details of a central episode in the American conflict with Al Qaeda: Mr. Abdulmutallab's recruitment by Mr. Awlaki and his failed attempt to blow up an airliner approaching Detroit on Christmas in 2009 using sophisticated explosives hidden in his underwear."

COUNTER-TERRORISM

Bomb Threat Reported Against Anti-Defamation League's NY HQ.

WRC-TV Washington (2/22, 453K) reports online that on Wednesday, "the Anti-Defamation League's national headquarters in New York received a bomb threat...and the group says it is working with authorities to determine if it is connected to the rash of threats targeting Jewish community centers across the country in recent months." WRC adds, "The FBI is involved in the investigation, and the ADL has called on U.S. Attorney General Jeff Sessions to launch a coordinated multi-agency probe."

The Huffington Post (2/22, Ferner, 237K) quotes the FBI as stating, "The FBI and the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division are investigating possible civil rights violations in connection with threats to the Anti-Defamation League. The FBI will collect all available facts and evidence. As this is matter is ongoing, we are not able to comment further at this time." ADL's Center on Extremism Director Oren Segal "told HuffPost that the organization has been in close communication with the FBI over the incidents and is 'confident that they are conducting a serious investigation into these threats.'"

NC Man Charged With Making Threats On Whisper App.

Ars Technica (2/22, Farivar, 1.61M) reports that "according to a newly released federal criminal complaint, Garrett Grimsley of Cary, North Carolina, allegedly used the Whisper app to" make "violent threats" on Sunday. Grimsley said on Whisper, "Aslam alaikum brother. For too long the kuffar have spit in our faces and trampled our rights. This cannot continue. I cannot speak of anything. It will be only the beginning, insha'Allah." The FBI affidavit said that "hours" after making the threats, "local police and the FBI arrived at his door to search his apartment." Grimsley "is set to appear again before a federal judge in Raleigh, North Carolina, on February 24."

The Verge (2/22, Brandom, 1.25M) reports that one message reads, "the FBI will understand I was only reading Dabiq for the pictures, right?" Then, "after Grimsley became aware of the FBI response, the messages grew more tense. 'Holy fuck I'm actually going to get raided,' he wrote to a friend. He attempted to encrypt his hard drive to protect it from police, but ran out of time; the process was 63 percent complete when agents obtained the laptop."

San Bernardino Victims Say California's Workers' Comp System Is Denying Them Treatment.

Fox News (2/22, Carr, 11.07M) reports online, "More than a year after terrorists murdered 14 and injured 22 inside a San Bernardino County Christmas party, many of the victims say they feel like forgotten survivors." The victims told "Fox News that for months they have received denials for critical medical and psychological care" from California's workers' comp system. San Bernardino County spokesman David Wert "says 58 of the 88 county employees who filed claims in connection with the attack were placed into the workers' comp system, and of that, 54 of those 58 cases are still active." The victims are now "petitioning the Trump Administration for help," Fox adds.

Man Gets Two Years For Lying To FBI About Somali Militant Group Members.

The AP (2/22, Forliti) reports that on Wednesday, Minnesota man Mahdi Hussein Furreh was sentenced "to two years in federal prison for lying to the FBI during their investigation into the travels of young men who left the U.S. to join the Somali militant group al-Shabab." Furreh "pleaded guilty in October 2014 to making false statements during the government's terror investigation, specifically admitting that he lied about contacting a man who's wanted for allegedly encouraging others to join al-Shabab." Assistant US Attorney Charles Kovats "argued that Furreh should be sentenced to about two years in prison, saying that lying to law enforcement should have consequences, and a sentence of time served should be reserved only for defendants who cooperate from the start."

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/22, Montemayor, 1.27M) notes, "The charges against Furreh stemmed from the FBI's investigation into the pipeline of Somali-Americans in Minnesota who began plotting to join the Al-Shabab terrorist group in Somalia around 2007."

FBI Agent, Former FBI SAC Testify In Malheur National Wildlife Refuge Case.

The Oregonian (2/22, Bernstein, 894K) reports on Wednesday's testimony in the Malheur National Wildlife Refuge case. FBI Agent Ronnie Walker "testified that some informants sent into the Malheur National Wildlife Refuge during the occupation were authorized to engage in unlawful activity." Retired FBI SAC Greg Bretzing agreed on the stand the he did not believe the Malheur occupiers "that went to trial in the fall of 2016 were held accountable." Also on Wednesday, refuge neighbor and longtime rancher Andy "Dunbar acknowledged the FBI paid $2,000 each to him and his son after they let agents use their property on Jan. 29 and Jan. 30, 2016, as agents tried to persuade people remaining at the refuge to leave after the Jan. 26 arrests of the occupation leaders."

White House: Gitmo Serves A "Very Healthy" National Security Purpose.

The Miami Herald (2/22, Rosenberg, 856K) reports that while White House press secretary Sean Spicer "dodged a question on whether the Trump administration would send US citizens to Guantánamo," he said the President "believes that Guantánamo Bay does serve a very, very healthy purpose in our national security." Spicer said "that the base's purpose was 'in making sure that we don't bring terrorists to our shores.'" He "twice declined to say whether US citizens could be held there," saying, "As the president has said very clearly before, we don't telegraph what we're going to do."

Suicide Bomber Reportedly Received Compensation From UK After Gitmo Release.

Reuters (2/22, Faulconbridge, Abdelaty) reports Abu-Zakariya al-Britani – the ISIS suicide bomber from Britain who attacked Iraqi forces near Mosul this week – received compensation for the time he spent detained in Guantanamo Bay, according to Western security sources. Reuters says Britani was released in 2004 after the British government "lobbied for his release" and that he later traveled to Syria to fight with ISIS. Reuters adds that Britain "reached a civil damages settlement" with former Gitmo inmates in 2010 and the Daily Mail reported that Britani received $1.25 million after claiming that British officials knew or were complicit in alleged mistreatment. The Washington Post (2/22, Adam, 11.43M) reports that "a decade after his return" to Britain, Britani "traveled to Syria to join" ISIS. Arthur Snell, the former head of Britain's "flagship counterextremism program," said his country's authorities failed to keep track of Britani.

Imam In England Charged With Eight Terror-Related Offenses.

Breitbart (2/22, 2.02M) reports Imam Kamran Sabir Hussain, an "influential" figure in Stoke-on-Trent, England, has been charged with eight terror-related offenses in connection with his religious work. Hussain is facing two charges related to addressing the mosque with the intent of "encourag[ing] support" for ISIS and six counts for giving a sermon in which he "intended or was reckless as to whether members of the public would be, directly or indirectly encouraged or otherwise induced by the statement to commit, prepare or instigate acts of terrorism."

Former CIA Officer Expected To Be Extradited From Portugal To Italy "Within Days."

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Kington, 4.52M) reports that Portuguese authorities detained retired CIA officer Sabrina De Sousa and the 61-year-old faces extradition to Italy to serve a four-year sentence due to a conviction for taking part in the 2003 "kidnapping" of radical Muslim cleric Hassan Osama Nasr. De Sousa's lawyer, Dario Bolognesi, said he would request that De Sousa receive a pardon in Italy and hoped she would not have to be jailed while waiting a response. Manuel Magalhaes, De Sousa's lawyer in Portugal, said extradition is expected "within days." State Department spokesman Mark toner said the US is "deeply disappointed in her conviction and sentence" and has "asked our European counterparts what their next steps may be."

Thousands In Egypt Attend Funeral For Cleric Convicted In 1993 WTC Bombing.

Reuters (2/22, Ismail, Gaballa) reports "thousands" gathered in Al-Gamaliya, Egypt on Wednesday for the funeral of Muslim cleric Omar Abdel-Rahman, who was convicted of conspiracy in the 1993 World Trade Center bombing. Reuters says that "movements across the Islamist spectrum from the Muslim Brotherhood to al Qaeda issued statements mourning him" and leaders from Egypt's Islamic Group – which views Abdel-Rahman as a "spiritual leader" – attended the funeral. The Washington Times (2/22, Ernst, 272K) cites the Reuters story as saying that mourners changed "We will meet in heaven," "God is great," and "We will defend you with blood and soul, Islam!"

Muslim Brotherhood Spokesman Says Group Not A Terrorist Organization.

Gehad el-Haddad, the Muslim Brotherhood's official spokesman, writes in an op-ed for the New York Times (2/22, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) from his solitary confinement cell in "Egypt's most notorious prison" that a move by the US to declare his organization a terrorist group would be wrong. El-Haddad says "offshoots" that turn violent leave the Muslim Brotherhood because of its "understanding of Islam that emphasizes the values of social justice, equality and the rule of law" and rejects violence. He acknowledges and regrets political missteps that "created distance between us and the people we have long lived to serve," but the spokesman refutes absolutely that the Muslim Brotherhood is a terrorist organization, insisting on its commitment to "peaceful resistance."

Votel: More US Ground Troops May Be Needed In Syria.

The CBS Evening News  (2/22, story 6, 2:10, Mason, 11.17M) reported that a week before President Trump's deadline for Pentagon leaders to submit a new strategy for defeating ISIS, CENTCOM Commander Gen. Joseph Votel "says he won't hesitate to ask for more American ground troops in both Iraq and Syria." Votel: "I've always been encouraged if we need more, we will ask for more." According to David Martin, Votel said "additional American troops would be especially useful in Syria." Fox News' Special Report  (2/22, 1.53M) quoted the general as saying, "We might bring potentially more of our assets to bear if we need to, as opposed to relying on our partners. ... There could be other forces that we potentially bring in to do this."

The New York Times (2/22, Gordon, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) quotes Votel as saying, "I am very concerned about maintaining momentum. It could be that we take on a larger burden ourselves. That's an option." According to the Times, "one option being considered is for American troops to step up their support" of Syrian Kurdish and Arab fighters "by firing artillery, shooting mortars, helping with logistics and significantly expanding efforts to advise them, much as the United States is doing for Iraqi forces in the battle for Mosul." Barbara Starr noted on CNN's Situation Room  (2/22, 554K) that there are up to 500 US forces – "mainly special operations forces and some conventional forces" – already in Syria "doing train, advise, assist," but "what we're talking about is if additional forces go in, they will be providing much more direct support to the Kurdish and the Arab forces who are supposed to be on the front line to the fight in Syria."

The Washington Post (2/22, DeYoung, 11.43M) says the plan being developed by the Pentagon "may lead to significant alterations in the Syria strategy that Trump inherited from Barack Obama, including a reduction or elimination of both long-standing US support for moderate opposition forces fighting against the Syrian government and the use of Syrian Kurdish fighters as the main US proxy force against the militants, according to US officials."

Rep. Adam Smith, a member of the House Armed Services Committee, said on CNN's Situation Room  (2/22, 554K) that he doesn't think "it's necessary at the moment" to bring US troops on the ground in Syria.

Trump's Desired "Safe Zones" In Syria Face Opposition From Turkey.

The Washington Times (2/22, Muñoz, Taylor, 272K) reports President Trump's "vision of 'safe zones' for refugees fleeing" violence in Syria "is running into opposition" from Turkey, which is "warning that the US-protected safe areas will become havens" for Kurdish militants. The Times says that Turkey is claiming that the Syrian government "is poised to exploit the zones as a way to increase political and military tensions inside Turkey." The Times quotes a "senior Turkish diplomatic source" as saying Syrian President Bashar al-Assad "has used all means to stay in power and distract from his problems in Syria. Any distraction will be of use to him, and he won't refrain from using it."

Russia: Safe Zones Need To Be Coordinated With Damascus. The AP (2/22, Isachenkov) reports Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said Wednesday that Moscow is "open for dialogue with the United States on safe zones in Syria but believes that any such initiative needs to be coordinated with the Syrian government." Lavrov said he had briefly discussed the issue with Secretary of State Tillerson when they met in Germany last week, but Tillerson "told him the concept was still being worked out."

ISIS "Seeping Back Into Areas" It Previously Controlled.

The Washington Post (2/22, Morris, 11.43M) reports that while ISIS "is nearing defeat on the battlefield," its members "are seeping back into areas the group once controlled" by "taking advantage of rampant corruption in Iraq's security forces and institutions." The Post says that police officers, judges, and local officials indicate that "an uneven hand of justice" leads to some ISIS collaborators being permitted "to walk, dimming Iraq's chances of escaping the cycle of violence that has plagued the country since the 2003 US-led invasion." According to the Post, "the plight of those majority Sunni areas also provides fodder for extremist groups to drive their recruitment."

McCain Makes Visit To US Forces In Syria.

The AP (2/22, Lardner) reports Sen. John McCain's office announced that he traveled to northern Syria last week to visit US forces and discuss efforts to defeat ISIS. McCain's office said the "visit was a valuable opportunity to assess dynamic conditions on the ground in Syria and Iraq." The statement added that President Trump "has rightly ordered a review of US strategy and plans to defeat" ISIS and McCain looks forward to working with the White House and military "to optimize our approach." The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Nissenbaum, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that McCain is believed to be the first American lawmaker to travel to the Kurdish-controlled areas of Syria since US forces began aiding local forces against ISIS.

De Mistura Says "Pro-Active Momentum," Not Breakthrough Expected At Syria Talks.

Reuters (2/22, Miles, Nebehay) reports UN envoy Staffan de Mistura on Wednesday said he did not anticipate an immediate breakthrough when Syria peace talks resume on Thursday. However, de Mistura added that he wanted the talks to be productive and begin the process of finding a political solution. De Mistura said he is "expecting and determined for keeping a very pro-active momentum."

Justice Dept. Intends To Block CIA's Haspel From Testifying In Suit Against Contract Psychologists.

The Guardian (UK) (2/22, Ackerman, 4.07M) reports that in a Wednesday filing in a federal court in Washington State, US attorneys and Justice Department officials "indicated [they] will seek to prevent" new Deputy CIA Director Haspel "from telling a court about her role in Bush-era torture" by asserting the state secrets privilege. The filing came in the lawsuit against former CIA contractor psychologists James Mitchell and Bruce Jessen, brought on by "representatives for four men who seek to hold them liable for torture they experienced in secret CIA prisons." According to the Guardian, the state-secrets privilege has long been "the target of criticism by human rights lawyers as a legal gambit for covering up wrongdoing under the veil of national security."

Justice Dept. Ordered To Unveil Redacted CIA Docs About Detainee Deaths. In a paywall article, Law360 (2/22, Koenig, 23K) reports that the U.S. District Judge J. Paul Oetken on Tuesday ordered the Justice Department to "hand over redacted memoranda on overseas" CIA interrogations, "including information that could unveil the names of two detainees who died while in custody," after Oetken rejected some of the Justice Department's secrecy arguments.

Federal Inmate Pleads Guilty To Threatening To Blow Up Government Buildings.

The AP (2/22) reports from Clarksburg, WV that "a federal inmate in West Virginia has admitted he threatened to blow up government buildings in several major U.S. cities." Jeremy Edward Smith, 37, pleaded guilty on Wednesday in a Clarksburg federal court "to making the threats in a 2015 letter he wrote while in solitary confinement at a U.S. penitentiary in Hazelton." Federal prosecutors said "that in the letter, Smith threatened to blow up government buildings in Boston, Chicago, New York, Philadelphia and Washington, D.C."

CRIMINAL INVESTIGATIONS

Recording Of Suspect Found On Phone Of Murdered Girl In Indiana.

In a piece titled "Sound of the Suspect," ABC World News Tonight  (2/22, story 4, 1:35, Muir, 14.63M) reported that police found a recording of a man saying "down the hill" on the cell phone of murder victim Libby German, who was reported missing along with Abby Williams after the girls went on a hike last week in Delphi, Indiana. That man is now a suspect in the females' murders, and the police have played that recording publicly, seeking information on the man's identity. State Police Capt. David Bursten said, "We think that there's enough there that somebody would recognize that voice, and we want that person to call us." NBC Nightly News  (2/22, story 11, 1:50, Holt, 16.61M) reported similarly.

The Indianapolis Star (2/22, Paul, 550K) paraphrases FBI SA Greg Massa as saying "20 FBI agents are in Delphi on any given day to assist in the investigation." Massa said, "We're not going anywhere. We will be here until this case is solved, and I'm confident this case will be solved." In addition, "The FBI's behavioral analysis unit has urged residents to report people who abruptly missed work or cancelled meetings Feb. 13, or individuals who have changed their appearance, behavior or sleep patterns in the following days."

The Indiana Daily Student (2/22, Evans, 2K) paraphrases Massa as saying, "Even details that seem unimportant could actually be essential to the investigation." Massa said, "Just think if you had an interaction with an individual who inexplicably canceled an appointment you had together, or an individual called into work sick or canceled an important appointment or a social engagement. That could be important." Massa "also said people should watch for recent changes in people around them. Those changes could be in appearance or dress style, unexpected travel, changes in sleep or behavior patterns."

The New York Post (2/22, Miller, 3.82M) and the AP (2/22, Callahan) similarly quote Massa discussing the investigation. WISH-TV Indianapolis (2/22, 170K) reports online that, according to state police, "FBI director James Comey has been briefed on the case twice." WISH adds that "a $41,000 reward is being offered for tips that lead to an arrest."

Michigan AG Charges Former USA Gymnastics Coach With Molesting Nine Girls.

ABC World News Tonight  (2/22, story 9, 0:20, Muir, 14.63M) reported former team doctor for USA gymnastics Larry Nassar is "now accused of molesting nine young gymnasts while treating their injuries at his home and medical facilities around Lancing, Michigan." ABC added, "Nassar is being sued by dozens of former patients," but he "denies the allegations."

In its lead story, the CBS Evening News  (2/22, lead story, 2:40, Mason, 11.17M) reported Michigan Attorney General Bill Schuette hit 53-year-old Nassar with 22 criminal charges relating to nine girls under the age of 16, including "possession of child pornography, and criminal sexual conduct involving the daughter of a family friend." Jamie Dantzscher, who won a bronze medal in the 2000 Olympics, said "Nassar treated her without a glove or chaperon." Schuette said "more than 80 women have come forward so far with complaints against Nassar."

The New York Times (2/22, B11, Mather, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) quotes Schuette calling Nassar a "monster." According to FBI agents, Nassar "had tens of thousands of pornographic images as well as videos of himself molesting girls." The Times adds, "Nassar is being held without bail on those charges. He will be arraigned for the new charges on Thursday." A 1,300-word USA Today (2/22, Mencarini, 5.28M) report details previous complaints against Nassar. NBC Nightly News  (2/22, story 13, 0:35, Holt, 16.61M) also provided brief coverage.

In Arizona, FBI Arrests "Barrel Chested Bandit," Suspected In 11 Bank Robberies.

The AP (2/22) reports the FBI said that on Tuesday, 40-year-old Anthony James Lane, "believed to have to have robbed 11 banks in five Western states including Arizona and New Mexico has been arrested in Tucson" by FBI agents and local police, "without incident." The FBI had offered "a reward of up to $10,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the so-called 'Barrel Chested Bandit.'"

The Arizona Daily Star (2/22, Duarte, 270K) notes, "Earlier this month, the FBI put out multi-state news releases for the robber dubbed the Barrel Chested Bandit, and based on a tip Feb. 14 agents spoke to three former co-workers of Lane in Tucson." The Arizona Republic (2/22, Restrepo, 1.1M) reports, "In its statement, the FBI said a criminal complaint was filed in federal court against Lane, but the statement did not specify the charges pending."

Additional coverage is provided by the Salt Lake (UT) Tribune (2/22, 426K) and KSL-TV Salt Lake City (2/22, 547K) online.

FBI Agent Testifies In Case Alleging Corruption By Former Utah AG.

The Deseret (UT) News (2/22, Romboy, Romero, 362K) reports on Wednesday's testimony in the trial over alleged public corruption by former Utah attorney general John Swallow, whose defense attorney, Scott Williams, "tore into" FBI SA Jon Isakson, the agent who led the investigation against him. According to the article, "Isakson is scheduled to finish his testimony Thursday before the state rests its case a day later than anticipated and the defense starts calling its witnesses. The trial is scheduled to run until March 3." Swallow faces "12 felony charges and one misdemeanor, including racketeering, bribery, accepting gifts and making false statements."

KTVX-TV Salt Lake City (2/22, Ortiz, 2K) reports online that Williams claimed Isakson committed perjury during his testimony. The Salt Lake (UT) Tribune (2/22, Dobner, 426K) reports Isakson said the request that the DOJ's Public Integrity Section not file charges against former Utah Attorneys General John Swallow and Mark Shurtleff "was driven in part by concerns over the federal statute of limitations and a desire to dig further into Shurtleff, Swallow and Tim Lawson, Shurtleff's so-called 'fixer.'" Isakson also testified that agents "were talking to Salt Lake County District Attorney Sim Gill, who was interested in pursuing charges." The Salt Lake (UT) Tribune also covers this story in a separate article.

FBI Searches For Missing Teen In Northern Virginia.

The Washington Post (2/22, Hermann, 11.43M) reports the FBI and Prince William County police in Virginia are searching for 15-year-old Makayla Phyllis Mattei "who authorities said has disappeared with" Meiti Metsla, a man "she met on the Internet and who flew to the U.S. from Estonia to meet her." FBI spokeswoman Nicole Schwab said, "We need to find her and bring her home." Authorities "said there is an urgent medical need to find her" because "she has diabetes and relatives are not sure she has insulin with her."

FBI Investigates Death Of Army Soldier's Infant In Hawaii.

The AP (2/22) reports that on Wednesday, US Army Lt. Col. Rob Phillips said "special agents from the U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Command and the FBI are investigating all circumstances surrounding the death of" the infant son of a Schofield Barracks soldier in Hawaii.

Convicted Charleston Church Killer's GPS Shows He Went To Second Church After Shooting.

The AP (2/22, Kinnard, Foreman) reports court documents unsealed Tuesday revealed "federal prosecutors said they had GPS evidence showing that after the fatal shootings at Charleston's Emanuel AME church on June 17, 2015, Dylann Roof exited the interstate and drove approximately 30 miles northwest toward the Branch AME Church in Summerville." Prosecutors indicated "the Branch church also had a sign advertising Bible study...and Roof shut off his GPS device," indicating he had stopped his car; however, the pastor had canceled the bible study that night. The AP notes, "During a lengthy confession the day after the shootings, Roof told FBI agents he was too tired after the Emanuel killings to carry out any other violence."

Reuters (2/22, McLeod) reports similarly.

Seattle Cop, Investigated By FBI, Charged With Drug Possession, Computer Trespass.

Relying on information in the Seattle Times (2/22, Miletech, 1.05M), the AP (2/22) reports that last month, "after an investigation by Seattle police detectives and the FBI's Public Corruption Squad," longtime Seattle police officer Robert Marlow was charged with "illegal drug possession in connection with a strip-club dancer and computer trespass for providing confidential crime victim information to a local TV news anchor." According to court documents, "Marlow was romantically involved with a dancer and shared drugs with her," and he "had regularly sent a news anchor text messages with personal information on crime victims." The AP adds, "Marlow plans to plead guilty to gross misdemeanors under amended charges next week."

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (2/22, Pulkkinen, 666K) says "an informant reported that Marlow and his girlfriend were using cocaine inside the club," and then "investigators teamed with agents from the FBI public corruption squad to substantiate the allegations."

FBI Raids Office Of Psychiatrist In Jacksonville, FL.

WJAX-TV Jacksonville, FL (2/22, 30K) reports online that the FBI "raided the Southside office of Nikhil Nihalani, a Jacksonville psychiatrist" who "had been arrested in 2016 for violating a domestic violence injunction" and "had also been arrested in November 2015 on an out of state warrant." Action News says it "is working to find out why the FBI conducted the raid." On its website, WJXT-TV Jacksonville, FL (2/22, McKeiver, 142K) paraphrases an FBI spokeswoman as saying "the agents will likely be at the scene for the rest of the day" and "the case is still under investigation and the reason for the raid could not be released." WTLV-TV Jacksonville, FL (2/22, 129K) reports similarly online.

FBI Releases Photographs Of Bank Robbers In Florida.

WFOR-TV Miami (2/22, 48K) reports online that on Wednesday, the FBI "released surveillance pictures of three people wanted for a bank robbery in Sunrise," Florida. The robbers were dressed in Hazmat gear.

FBI Arrests NJ Men Wanted For Shooting, Robbery.

NJ News (2/22, 952K) reports Newark, NJ Public Safety Director Anthony Ambrose said "two criminal suspects were arrested Wednesday in connection with a shooting and a separate robbery last month,." The FBI's Fugitive Task Force and the police department's Fugitive Apprehension Team "arrested city resident Dujuan R. Curry, 28," after he "allegedly robbed his cousin at Martin Luther King Boulevard and Clinton Avenue Jan. 23." City detectives "also arrested Anthony Mollison, 22, of East Orange, on charges of aggravated assault, unlawful possession of a weapon and possession of a weapon for an unlawful purpose" after police said he shot a 22-year-old on Jan. 15.

Obstruction Retrial For Former LA County Sheriff Begins Today.

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Rubin, 4.52M) reports a retrial is set to open this week in the matter of allegations that former Los Angeles County sheriff Lee Baca obstructed an FBI investigation. The Times notes, "All but one of the 12 jurors in Baca's first trial in December voted to acquit him of charges alleging he was involved in a 2011 scheme carried out by subordinates to thwart a federal probe into widespread abuses and corruption by deputies working in county jails." The Times explains that "the allegations against Baca focus on a six-week period during August and September in 2011, after deputies discovered a phone that had been smuggled to an inmate who was working as an FBI informant."

The Los Angeles Daily News (2/22, 315K) reports jury selection began today in the case. The article says, "The case against Baca focuses on a period of time when sheriff's deputies based at the Men's Central Jail stumbled upon a secret FBI probe of alleged civil rights abuses and unjustified beatings of inmates within jail walls."

Former House Speaker's Sexual Abuse Victim Sues For Hush Money.

The Chicago Tribune (2/22, 2.54M) reports that "one of former U.S. House Speaker Dennis Hastert's sexual abuse victims" alleged in a breach-of-contract lawsuit that "he kept his end of the bargain to remain silent about decades-old misconduct in exchange for $3.5 million, and it was the disgraced politician who first disclosed the existence of their secret pact." The victim thus "maintains he is due full payment because he was no longer obligated to remain silent once Hastert told federal authorities about their agreement when he falsely accused the man of extortion." According to the suit, "Hastert stopped making payments in December 2014 after the FBI questioned him in his Plano home about the large bank withdrawals."

NYTimes Backs Lawsuit By Family Of Mexican Boy Shot By Border Patrol Agent.

The New York Times (2/22, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) editorializes that "when a 15-year-old boy named Sergio Hernández Guereca was shot to death by a United States border agent in 2010, he was crouching behind a concrete pillar a few steps inside the Mexican border," and "had he been on American soil, there's no question constitutional principles could be invoked in seeking justice for his death," so why should those principles "not apply because he was standing on the other side of the border?" That issue was before the Supreme Court on Tuesday "during oral arguments in a lawsuit brought by Sergio's parents, who believe they should have a right to get justice for his killing." The Times concludes that "the Constitution should be broad enough to apply to people like Sergio, and his family should be allowed to sue in American courts."

Pence Condemns Anti-Semitic Acts, Makes Surprise Trip To Vandalized Cemetery.

ABC World News Tonight  (2/22, story 3, 2:10, Muir, 14.63M) reported that Vice President Pence made a "surprise visit" to a Jewish cemetery near St. Louis that was vandalized over the weekend. Pence, according to the Washington Times (2/22, Boyer, 272K), accompanied Missouri Gov. Eric Greitens for a community clean-up event. The CBS Evening News  (2/22, story 4, 0:25, Mason, 11.17M) reported Pence "shar[ed] a prayer" and "helped clean up the sacred ground where more than 150 headstones were damaged."

NBC Nightly News  (2/22, story 5, 0:30, Holt, 16.61M) reported Pence "took to the megaphone to declare there is no place in America for hatred, acts of prejudice, violence or anti-Semitism." The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Kaleem, 4.52M) says Pence "condemned" the desecration of the cemetery and recent bomb threats against Jewish community centers across the country. The Hill (2/22, Fabian, 1.25M) quotes Pence as saying the vandalism is "a sad reminder of the work that still must be done to root out hate and prejudice and evil." The Washington Post (2/22, Wagner, 11.43M) reports Pence said "there's no place in America for hatred or acts of prejudice or violence or anti-Semitism." Pence also praised Missouri residents for their response, saying, "I must tell you, the people of Missouri are inspiring the nation by your love and care for this place, for the Jewish community in Missouri, and I want to thank you for that inspiration, for showing the world what America is really about."

Milbank: Pence, Not Trump, Gave Presidential Response To Anti-Semitic Acts. In a Washington Post (2/22, 11.43M) column, Dana Milbank contrasts President Trump and Pence's responses to recent anti-Semitic acts. Milbank says Pence "did exactly what a president should do" by visiting a Nazi concentration camp in Europe and the cemetery, while speaking out against the acts. Milbank says that Trump was "invited to condemn the surge in anti-Semitism" on two occasions last week and "failed to do so." When he did condemn anti-Semitic acts, Milbank adds, Trump did not mention the specific occurrences.

Media Analyses: Released Emails Show Close Ties Between Pruitt, Energy Industry.

The state of Oklahoma on Wednesday released more than 6,000 pages of emails between former Attorney General Scott Pruitt's office and the energy industry in response to a court order based on a request from the Center for Media and Democracy. The Washington Times (2/22, Wolfgang, 272K) reports the message "do not appear to contain any smoking guns that could imperil" Pruitt's future. Times adds that the emails include "frequent communication between the Oklahoma attorney general's office and energy companies, energy industry lobbying groups, and powerful conservative organizations such as Americans for Prosperity." However, the New York Times (2/22, Davenport, Lipton, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) takes the opposite stance by saying the emails show that the current EPA Administrator "closely coordinated with major oil and gas producers, electric utilities and political groups with ties to the libertarian billionaire brothers Charles G. and David H. Koch to roll back environmental regulations." The Washington Post (2/22, Dennis, Mufson, 11.43M) quotes Nick Surgey, the research director of the Center for Media and Democracy, as saying the emails "reveal a close and friendly relationship between Scott Pruitt's office and the fossil fuel industry, with frequent meetings, calls, dinners and other events."

Reuters (2/22) reports the emails included communications between the AG office and Devon Energy that "suggest the company gave the Oklahoma officials language on limits on methane emissions at oil and gas operations." Reuters adds that Pruitt's office "then used this language in suing the EPA over the regulations." The AP (2/22, Biesecker, Dearen) cites an email from Devon Vice President William Whitsitt that says, "Our goal is to have input to (the office) with a goal of its directing BLM to completely do away with the present thrust." The AP adds that Devon executive Brent Rockwood also "chimed in with suggested edits and additions for Pruitt's filing." Deputy Solicitor General Clayton Eubanks wrote Rockwood saying, "Thank you for your guidance and assistance in getting this letter out."

Citing Racist Testimony, Justices Call For New Sentencing In Texas Death Penalty Case.

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Savage, 4.52M) reports that the Supreme Court on Wednesday "firmly rejected the use of racial stereotypes when deciding the proper sentence for a convicted criminal, reopening the case of a black man who was condemned to death after his Texas jury was told African Americans are statistically more likely than whites to commit violent crimes. 'Our laws punish people for what they do, not for who they are,' Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. said in the courtroom." Roberts wrote in his decision that "providing the jury with such crime statistics appealed 'to a particularly noxious strain of racial prejudice.'" The 6-2 decision "faulted Texas authorities and judges for refusing to give a new sentencing hearing to Duane Buck, a Houston man convicted of shooting and killing his ex-girlfriend and her new boyfriend in 1995."

The New York Times (2/22, Liptak, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that the testimony "came from a psychologist who said black defendants were more dangerous than white ones." Chief Justice Roberts "said the psychologist's report 'said, in effect, that the color of Buck's skin made him more deserving of execution.'" During the trial's sentencing phase in 1997, Buck's attorneys "presented a report from the psychologist, Walter Quijano, who said race was one of the factors associated with future dangerousness," and at the trial, an attorney for Buck "asked Dr. Quijano to elaborate. 'It's a sad commentary that minorities, Hispanics and black people, are overrepresented in the criminal justice system,' Dr. Quijano testified." A prosecutor "followed up: 'The race factor, black, increases the future dangerousness for various complicated reasons – is that correct?'" and Dr. Quijano answered, "Yes."

USA Today (2/22, Wolf, 5.28M) reports that Justices Clarence Thomas and Samuel Alito dissented, with Justice Thomas writing "that the racial testimony was secondary to 'the heinousness of petitioner's crime and his complete lack of remorse' for shooting his former girlfriend in the street as her children watched."

ACLU Sues Milwaukee Police Over Racial Profiling, "Stop-And-Frisk."

The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (2/22, Barton, Luthern, 513K) reports the ACLU of Wisconsin filed a lawsuit Wednesday against the Milwaukee Police Department for performing "thousands of illegal stop-and-frisks targeting African Americans and Latinos every year." The policy violates both the fourth and fourteenth amendments because the police lack "reasonable suspicion" and their actions are "motivated by race and ethnicity." The ACLU filed its suit while the city awaits the outcome of a "collaborative reform report" from the Justice Department to evaluate the Police Department's "use of force, training and policies" because the report would not be legally binding.

According to the Washington Post (2/22, Berman, 11.43M), Police Chief Edward Flynn refuted the suit's claims in a statement Wednesday because the police have "never used the practice of 'stop and frisk,' nor has there ever been a quota for traffic stops," another claim the ACLU makes. A spokesman relaying the statement added that "traffic stops in high crime areas have been proven to reduce the number of non-fatal shootings, robberies, and motor vehicle thefts."

US Charges Tennessee Deputy With Guarding Undercover Drug Deal.

The AP (2/22) reports from Memphis, TN that "federal prosecutors in West Tennessee say a former sheriff's deputy is facing charges that he provided security during a cocaine deal." Federal prosecutors in Memphis said on Wednesday that "former Crockett County Deputy Calvin Fields has been indicted on charges of distributing powder cocaine and possession of a firearm during commission of drug-trafficking." Prosecutors said Fields "was seen stationed in his patrol vehicle while on duty, providing security while cocaine was being delivered by an undercover source on Feb. 13," and that "he had a Glock .40-caliber pistol in his possession."

Georgia Inmate Convicted Of Dealing Drugs From Inside Prison.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/22, Habersham, 1.41M) reports that a federal judge on Wednesday "tacked on 18 years to the sentence Kevin Bristol Patterson was already serving in Ware Penitentiary, U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman Bob Page said." Patterson "will now be transferred to a federal prison instead of the state facility in Waycross." Prosecutors "called the 35-year-old a career criminal who distributed methamphetamine and heroin both inside and outside of prison." Patterson "used a contraband cellphone to set up drug deals, conspiring with two other inmates to deal 649 grams of meth and 334 grams of heroin, Page said. 'This case represents another example of the dangers that contraband cellphones inside of the prison system pose to our citizens outside the prison,' U.S. Attorney John Horn said in a news release."

Maryland Man Pleads Guilty To Producing Child Pornography.

The AP (2/22) reports from Ocean City, MD that "the former owner of an Ocean City theater has pleaded guilty to two counts of producing child pornography." US Attorney Rod Rosenstein said in a statement on Tuesday that David Edward Weatherholtz, 57, "had sexual contact with at least four minors, including family members and a child whom he mentored and taught as owner of the OC Jamboree theater." Weatherholtz "was arrested by an undercover detective with the Worcester County Sheriff's Office who posed as a 13-year-old boy."

Indicted Chicago Alderman Sued By Political Rival.

The Chicago Tribune (2/22, 2.54M) reports that Chicago Alderman Willie Cochran, "under federal indictment for allegedly misusing charity funds to pay for his daughter's college and for allegedly shaking down a liquor store," is now "also being sued by a political rival who says Cochran publicly threatened to assault him for acting as a 'snitch.'" The Rev. Andre Smith, "who ran losing campaigns against Cochran in the South Side ward in the 2011 and 2015 elections, and says he plans to run again," filed a civil lawsuit in Cook County Circuit Court on Tuesday "alleging that Cochran came after him on Valentine's Day at a vigil for slain 11-year-old Takiya Holmes."

US Charges South Carolina Man With Threatening Obama, Trump.

The AP (2/22) reports from Spartanburg, SC that a South Carolina man "has been charged with threatening then-President Barack Obama and President-elect Donald Trump last year." Federal prosecutors announced on Tuesday that "a federal grand jury had indicted 30-year-old Kipper Ken King of Spartanburg on two counts of making the threats around November 28, 2016." According to the AP, "no details of the threat have been released, and indictments against King don't contain any other information." He faces up to five years in prison and $250,000 in fines.

Mexican Woman Linked To Kansas Killing Is Deported.

The AP (2/22, Hegeman) reports from Wichita, KS that "a Mexican woman who tried to hide a gun her boyfriend used to fatally shoot a Kansas teenager has been deported, the government said Wednesday." Azucena Garcia-Ferniza, "a 22-year-old immigrant who had been living in Salina, was deported Friday to Mexico, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Brent Anderson." Garcia-Ferniza was sentenced in December "to the 15 months she had been in custody after pleading guilty to a weapons count that prohibits people who are unlawfully in the country from possessing a firearm." According to the AP, "court documents say she legally entered the U.S. at the age of 3, but her visitor visa expired in 1998." She "was covered in 2013 under the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program for two years, and had a work permit" that "was terminated after the offense."

US Charges West Virginia Correctional Officer With Assaulting Detainees, Submitting False Report.

West Virginia MetroNews (2/22, Thomas, 6K) reports from Elkins, WV that a Randolph County, WV correctional officer "was charged Wednesday with violating the rights of two pretrial detainees and obstructing justice." MetroNews adds that "according to a statement from acting U.S. Attorney Betsy Steinfeld Jividen, Adam Joseph Neal Graham, 26, of Elkins, is accused of assaulting and injuring detainees at the Tygart Valley Regional Jail in Belington."

The Elkins (WV) InterMountain (2/23, 30K) reports that "the indictment charges that Graham, while serving as a TVRJ correctional officer, assaulted and injured two pretrial detainees, and then submitted a false incident report to cover up his use of unlawful force." The indictment "alleges that Graham assaulted a detainee on February 15, 2015, and assaulted a second detainee on March 9, 2015." Graham "faces up to 10 years for each violation," and he also "faces up to 20 years for allegedly submitting a false incident report."

Two Kansas Men Sentenced For Hate Crime Attack Against Somalis.

The AP (2/22, Hegeman) reports from Wichita, KS that "two southwest Kansas men were punished Wednesday for their roles in a hate crime attack on three Somali that a federal judge said flies in the face of everything cherished in this country." US District Judge J. Thomas Marten sentenced Omar Cantero Martinez, 32, a Mexican citizen, to 26 months in prison. Martinez's brother, Armando Sotelo, 24, of Dodge City, "got a time-served sentence for the 20 months he had already been in jail in the case." The AP adds that "the men were tried last year for three hate crimes charges but the trial ended in a hung jury," and "in lieu of a re-trial, they later pleaded guilty – Sotelo to one hate crime count and Martinez to one perjury count for falsely testifying at the trial that he had been acting in self-defense."

California Auctioneer Charged In Rhinoceros Horn Smuggling Conspiracy.

Courthouse News (2/22, Leonard, 2K) reports that "a Beverly Hills auctioneer will appear before a New York federal judge next week on charges of conspiring to smuggle 15 horns from endangered rhinoceros abroad." According to "the Feb. 15 indictment returned against him, Jacob Chait, 34, was engaged in at least eight separate deals or attempted deals involving 15 rhinoceros horns worth an estimated $2.4 million." Chait, "the head of acquisitions and auctioneer of I.M. Chait Gallery in Beverley Hills, California, is charged with violating the Lacey Act."

NYTimes Analysis: ATF Filed Secret Bank Account With Money From "Shadowy Cigarette Sales."

The New York Times (2/22, Apuzzo, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that "working from an office suite behind a Burger King in southern Virginia, operatives used a web of shadowy cigarette sales to funnel tens of millions of dollars into a secret bank account," and the Times adds that "they weren't known smugglers, but rather agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives." According to the Times, "the operation, not authorized under Justice Department rules, gave agents an off-the-books way to finance undercover investigations and pay informants without the usual cumbersome paperwork and close oversight, according to court records and people close to the operation." The Times adds that "the secret account is at the heart of a federal racketeering lawsuit brought by a collective of tobacco farmers who say they were swindled out of $24 million."

The Washington Examiner (2/22, 400K) reports that "House Oversight Committee Chairman Jason Chaffetz, R-Utah, is demanding that the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives turn over all the information it has about an unauthorized confidential informant program over which the ATF has lost control." The Examiner adds that "in a letter to ATF, Chaffetz charged that the program was not authorized by the Justice Department, and allowed people who are supposed to serve as informants about illegal cigarette trafficking to pocket the money they earned along the way from selling illegal cigarettes."

US Charges Ten In Steroid Ring Linked To Florida Gym Operator.

The AP (2/22, Anderson) reports that from Miami that "ten people have been charged with operating a $10 million steroid distribution ring allegedly overseen by a Miami man who co-owns a popular bodybuilding gym called Iron Addicts, federal authorities said Wednesday." Federal prosecutors in Brooklyn, NY "announced steroid distribution and money laundering charges against 37-year-old Richard Rodriguez of Miami and nine others, seven of whom live in South Florida and have been arrested." The AP adds that "two were arrested in Phoenix, Arizona, and one suspect remained at large." According to the AP, "court records show Rodriguez runs a company called Wellness Fitness Nutrition LLC and the Iron Addicts Gym at the same Miami location, which was raided early Wednesday the Drug Enforcement Administration agents and U.S. Marshals." The case "is being investigated chiefly by a DEA task force based out of its office in Newark, New Jersey."

The Miami Herald (2/22, Harris, 856K) reports that "federal agents raided a popular Miami gym early Wednesday morning, leaving a U.S. Marshal-branded 'no trespassing' sign on the door and arresting its co-owner on charges of heading a $10 million international steroid production and distribution ring." According to the Herald, "early morning workout buffs at Iron Addicts Gym, on 31 NE 17th St., were herded against the wall by Drug Enforcement Agents, who used sledgehammers to knock down walls in the second story office, a witness wrote on Facebook." The Herald adds that "above the gym, Iron Addicts co-owner Richard Rodriguez ran a supplement company that the DEA said produced and sold anabolic steroids," and "in a criminal complaint, agents accused Rodriguez, 37, and wife Nancy, head of a nine-member steroid ring, of importing products from China, manufacturing steroids in an Arizona lab and distributing the drugs worldwide from a Miami P.O. Box."

The Lakeland (FL) Ledger (2/22, Meyer, 146K) reports that "Pat Trainor, public information officer for the DEA out of Philadelphia, said that he could confirm there is an ongoing investigation of a chemical manufacturer and that warrants were served Wednesday at the two locations."

Philadelphia Physician Pleads Guilty To Illegal Drug Sales.

The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/22, Roebuck, 586K) reports that Dr. Alan Summers "admitted Wednesday to turning his substance abuse clinic into one of the city's most notorious sources for addicts and drug dealers of highly-regulated prescription medications." The Inquirer adds that "federal authorities likened Dr. Alan Summers' now defunct National Association for Substance Abuse-Prevention and Treatment" in south Philadelphia to "an open-air drug market," and that "as he overprescribed medications like the anti-anxiety drug Klonopin and Suboxone, a treatment for heroin addiction, patients openly bought and sold his prescriptions in his waiting room. 'Dr. Summers and many of the other doctors employed by him abandoned the practice of medicine and simply became drug dealers,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert J. Livermore wrote in court filings."

ATF Assisting South Carolina Police In Probe Of Teen's Shooting.

The Columbia (SC) State (2/22, 357K) reports that the ATF is "assisting Columbia police in the investigation of a shooting that left a 13-year-old in critical condition." According to the State, "the unidentified 13-year-old victim was shot in the chest while at a home on Wild Iris Court with several other juveniles on Feb. 12." Investigators "are still trying to determine who owned the firearm that was used to shoot the teen, and Columbia police are now working with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, police spokeswoman Jennifer Timmons said this week. 'We believe that the weapon was brought to the incident location by a youth,' she said."

ATF Probing Four Georgia Church Fires.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/21, 1.41M) reports that "local and federal officials are investigating after someone intentionally set four fires at a DeKalb County church." The fires "happened Tuesday night at Restoration Ministries Church in the 4300 block of Mercer Road near Decatur, DeKalb fire Capt. Eric Jackson said." The AJC adds that "because the fires happened on church property and there were multiple points of origin, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives is assisting in the investigation."

FINANCIAL CRIME & CORPORATE SCANDALS

Atlanta Mayor Expresses Frustration Over City Hall Bribery Allegations.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/22, Stafford, 1.41M) reports Atlanta City Mayor Kasim Reed "expressed anger" on the "day after one of his department heads was caught up in the widening Atlanta City Hall bribery scandal." On Tuesday, the FBI "seized items in the office of Adam Smith, the city's chief procurement officer, who was later fired and escorted out of the building."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/22, Niesse, 1.41M) investigated the Atlanta bribery scandal, and found that "in February 2014 as contractor Elvin 'E.R.' Mitchell Jr. paid $188,000 in bribes for Atlanta contracts, city officials awarded his company emergency work totalling $5.2 million for a devastating ice storm that month." His company, "Mitchell's Cascade Building Systems captured 65 percent of the city's business even though it was only one of five companies hired to clear roads, haul salt and remove debris." The article also notes Tuesday's FBI raid. WSB-TV Atlanta (2/22, Belcher, Diamant, 410K) also carries this results of this investigation online.

Former Atlanta Employee At Center Of Bribery Investigation Still "Close" With City Hall. WXIA-TV Atlanta (2/22, 415K) reports online that "new developments in the Atlanta bribery scandal show that" Mitzi Bickers, a "former city employee at the center of the investigation," remains "close with people in city hall." WXIA says, "Two city contractors have pleaded guilty to offering bribes and the city's chief procurement officer was fired Tuesday. Bickers has not been charged with any crime." WXIA adds, "11Alive uncovered that one of her companies is still doing work for the city. After she retired during a separate ethics controversy, Bickers continued to be paid thousands of dollars for city work."

More Rick Siskey Companies Close To Bankruptcy In Wake Of Alleged Ponzi Scheme.

The Charlotte (NC) Observer (2/22, Rothacker, 656K) reports, "More companies operated by the late Rick Siskey are set to be pushed into bankruptcy as attorneys continue to seek repayment for investors caught up in an alleged Ponzi scheme." The Observer notes, "An FBI affidavit unsealed in January alleged he was operating a Ponzi scheme and that more than 100 investors could be out as much as $19 million."

Collins: Committee Could Subpoena Trump's Tax Records For Election Investigation.

Roll Call (2/22, Lesniewski, 63K) reports Sen. Susan Collins on Wednesday said she believes the Intelligence Committee could subpoena President Trump's tax records as part of an investigation into Russian interference in the election. Collins told Maine Public Radio that while she does not know if the committee "will need to do that," she "suspect[s] that we would" if "it's necessary to get to the answers." Collins added, "My hope is that we'll have a lot of voluntary cooperation." She added, "And keep in mind that in some ways, this is a counterintelligence operation – in many ways – and that's what our committee specializes in." Politico (2/22, Wright, 2.46M) reports Collins also said she wants former National Security Adviser Flynn to testify as part of the investigation and the committee has asked agencies and campaign officials "to preserve" all documents, emails, and text messages "that could be in any way relevant to the investigation."

Law Professors Explore Possible Compromise On Trump's Taxes. In a Washington Post (2/22, 11.43M) op-ed, Harvard law professor Mihir Desai and Southern California law professor Edward Kleinbard say "sensitivity to the president's presumptive reasons for his tax disclosure reticence" and "compromise" is needed to resolve the current "stalemate" over Trump's tax returns. The authors list the "substantive concerns" that Trump could have about releasing his returns, including: his returns "are extraordinarily complex and his wealth large;" he would "prefer not to unleash an army of amateur auditors eager to help the IRS;" and his returns "could reveal confidential commercial information and relationships." Desai and Kleinbard indicate that a possible "compromise" would be for Trump to invite Joint Committee on Taxation to confidentially review his tax returns and report its findings to the IRS for any audit determinations and publish a public summary that does not include proprietary business information.

Maryland Accountant Pleads Not Guilty To Bribing Lawmaker.

The Washington Post (2/22, Bui, 11.43M) reports that a Rockville, MD accountant "pleaded not guilty to a federal bribery charge in connection with allegations that he paid off a Prince George's County lawmaker to obtain thousands in taxpayer funds." Federal prosecutors have "accused Felix Nelson Ayala, 58, of paying then-Prince George's County Council member William A. Campos (D) $5,000 a year between 2012 to 2015 in exchange for $25,000 in annual funding to the Caucus Salvadoreño Empresarial." The Post notes that Ayala "founded the D.C.-based business caucus that awards scholarships to students in El Salvador and locally." Ayala "entered the not guilty plea in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt on Wednesday, about three weeks after he was charged in the case," and "he also pleaded not guilty to a charge of making false statements to investigators."

Illinois Man Pleads Guilty To Bankruptcy Fraud.

The AP (2/22) reports from East St. Louis, IL that Marck McFarland, of Springfield, IL, "who federal prosecutors say filed for bankruptcy 10 times in five years has pleaded guilty to fraud charges." McFarland pleaded guilty on Tuesday in federal court in East St. Louis, and he is scheduled to be sentenced on June 6. The AP adds that according to court records, McFarland "filed 10 bankruptcy cases in the Central District of Illinois between April 2009 and August 2013." McFarland, 58, "was identified as president of Second Chance Inc., a rehabilitation program for juvenile and adult ex-offenders." According to the AP, "after prosecutors determined Second Chance was located in Springfield, where the case belonged, McFarland filed an amended bankruptcy petition stating Second Chance has an Alton address."

WSJournal: Credit Suisse Caught Up In Another Tax Evasion Probe.

The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Letzing, Viswanatha, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that the Justice Department is investigating Credit Suisse over allegations that its Israeli unit assisted tax evasion.

Maryland Woman Pleads Guilty To Tax Fraud.

WBAL-AM Baltimore (2/22, Waldman, 45K) reports that a Suitland, MD woman "has pleaded guilty in federal court to two counts of preparing fraudulent tax returns, prosecutors say." Joann Little, 60, "worked as a tax preparation firm known as Speedy Tax Service, and earlier, Instant Tax Service," and "she prepared returns for tax years 2009 through 2014 that sought inflated refunds by reporting inaccurate charitable deductions, fake un-reimbursed employee expenses and false businesses. She cost federal coffers at least $262,714, prosecutors say."

Mississippi Man Sentenced For Tax Evasion.

The Biloxi (MS) Sun Herald (2/22, Fitzgerald, 138K) reports that "businessman Samuel Frazier has been sentenced to one year in prison and ordered to pay the Internal Revenue Service $210,589 for failing to file an income tax return for 2009." US Magistrate Judge John Gargiulo "sentenced Frazier, also known as Johnny Frazier, Wednesday in U.S. District Court." Frazier "owned two companies, Frazier Fire Systems LLC and EZ Haul Demolition and Construction LLC, Acting Deputy Assistant Attorney General Stuart M. Goldberg of the Justice Department's tax division said in a news release," and "special agents with the IRS criminal-investigation division had contacted Frazier in 2011 because he had not filed a tax return since 1997, Goldberg said." WLOX-TV Biloxi, MS (2/22, 39K) also reports.

Advocate Urges Senate's Passage Of Email Privacy Act.

In the Christian Science Monitor (2/22, 387K), R Street Institute Outreach Manager Nathan Leamer urges swift passage of the Email Privacy Act in the US Senate. The bill, "which would require government agencies to get a search warrant before accessing emails or other digital communications that are more than 180 days old," was passed in the US House last week, but a version of the bill failed in the Senate in 2016. Leamer argues, "Passing the Email Privacy Act to update the three decade old law and require warrants for digital searches is crucial to ensure our online correspondence enjoys the same protections as other personal items in real life."

State Election Officials Rebuke DHS For Designating Electoral System As Critical Infrastructure.

Politico (2/22, Starks, 2.46M) "Morning Cybersecurity" reports, "State election officials on Monday sent the Department of Homeland Security a resolution rebuking it for labeling the electoral system as 'critical infrastructure.'" Members of the National Association of Secretaries of State "overwhelmingly approved the resolution – which declares that DHS 'has no authority to interfere with elections, even in the name of national security.'"

Experts: Hack Of President's Twitter Account Would Cause "All Sorts Of Chaos."

NBC News (2/22, 2.67M) reports that "experts say a hack" of President Trump's Twitter account "and some unauthorized tweets could lead to all sorts of chaos, including profiteering and causing mayhem on the world stage." ZeroFOX founder and CEO Evan Blair is quoted saying, "There is an opportunity now for the president's direct words to be compromised. ... Never has that happened before and now, we're accustomed and trained to expect anything from him." NBC News also presents "another unsettling possibility: Hackers could make brazen statements that could have the potential to upset foreign relations."

Audit: Sophisticated Malware Targeted ATM Transactions In India.

The Economic Times (IND) (2/23, 1.96M) discusses "what till now is the worst cyber breach to compromise" India's payments network, which occurred from May to July 2016. The ET adds, "Weeks after the panic – by when thousands had lost money – it surfaced that hackers had penetrated the network of Hitachi," a third-party ATM transaction processor for some banks. Hitachi hired a payments security firm whose audit report "brings out an uncomfortable truth that most Indian banks and corporates will now have to deal with: anti-virus and anti-malware devices they have installed are no match for targeted cyber attacks." The ET adds that the forensic team was "stunned by the level of sophistication and ingenuity of hackers who targeted Hitachi" and found the malware "was so ingenuously written that it could spread within the Hitachi system at an alarming rate. This was despite Hitachi using some of the best security devices."

GSA IG: 18F Violated Cybersecurity Rules.

The Wall Street Journal (2/22, 6.37M) reports that the 18F initiative aimed at embedding tech executives and personnel in the GSA has been criticized by the GSA's Inspector General, who claims it violated cybersecurity rules and committed other security lapses. According to the IG's reports, 86 percent of 18F-used software was not approved for the GSA IT environment, and none of the information systems the 18F office used had the proper authorizations, with two of the systems containing personally identifiable information.

Researchers Demonstrate How Data Can Be Stolen From Air-Gapped Computers By Reading LED Pulses.

EurekAlert (2/22, 4K) reports researchers from Ben-Gurion University of the Negev Cyber Security Research Center "have demonstrated that data can be stolen from an isolated 'air-gapped' computer's hard drive" by "reading the pulses of light on the LED drive using various types of cameras and light sensors." Researchers demonstrated in a paper "how data can be received by a Quadcopter drone flight, even outside a window with line-of-sight of the transmitting computer." Center R&D head Dr. Mordechai Guri is quoted saying, "Our method compared to other LED exfiltration is unique, because it is also covert. ... The hard drive LED flickers frequently, and therefore the user won't be suspicious about changes in its activity."

Continuing Coverage Of DHS Employees Locked Out Of Own Computers.

NextGov (2/22, 2K) continues coverage of how an "expired security certificate was to blame for some Homeland Security Department employees being locked out of their computers Tuesday morning." NextGov says, "According to a DHS official, domain controller credentials expired on President's Day – a federal holiday – and steps to ensure network redundancy weren't taken. That means the network issues users experienced were preventable."

Experts: Trump Administration Likely To Push For Increased Cyber Spending, Digital Surveillance, Encryption Workarounds.

PC World (2/22, 293K) reports that some cybersecurity experts believe the Trump Administation will push to increase cybersecurity spending in government, but also for increasing digital surveillance and workarounds to encryption. Trump transition tech advisor Jeffrey Eisenach is cited saying Trump will likely seek ways to let the NSA and other agencies assist government and the private sector in defending themselves against cyberattacks. PC World adds, however, that "beyond the leaked drafts, it's difficult to read the tea leaves of a Trump cyber policy, other cybersecurity experts said."

FBI Data Shows Crime Rates Falling Since 1993, Pew Analysis Says.

In a Washington Post (2/22, Ingraham, 11.43M) "Wonkblog" analysis, Christopher Ingraham says that "violent crime and property crime have fallen sharply over the past quarter century" in the US, contrary to President Trump's "characteristically bleak vision of an America beset by 'crime and gangs and drugs.'" Ingraham says "official FBI counts of...violent crime...'fell 50% between 1993 and 2015, the most recent full year available,'" according to a recent Pew Research Center (2/21, Gramlich, 7K) analysis. A "survey of crime victims undertaken by the Bureau of Justice Statistics (BJS) – shows an even sharper drop of 77 percent over the same period." Regarding property crime, "the FBI's numbers show a drop of 48 percent since 1993, while the BJS survey shows a 69 percent drop." However, "last year saw one of the largest year-over-year increases in the murder rate in decades, rising to 4.9 cases per 100,000 people, up from 4.5 per 100,000 in 2014," according to FBI data. In addition, "the FBI's preliminary numbers for the first half of 2016 suggest that incidents of violent crime, including murders, continued to rise last year."

Columnist Jennifer Rubin similarly writes in the Washington Post (2/22, Rubin, 11.43M) "Right Turn" blog that Trump "amplifies" the "misunderstanding" the crime rates are "much worse" than they used to be. Rubin summarizes Pew's analysis of FBI data as finding that "overall crime is way down, but there has been a disturbing uptick in the rate in the past couple of years."

White House Chief Digital Officer, Five Others Dismissed After Failing FBI Background Check.

Politico (2/22, Palmeri, Lippman, 2.46M) reports unnamed sources indicated "White House Chief Digital Officer Gerrit Lansing was among the six staffers who were dismissed from the White House last week after being unable to pass" the FBI security questionnaire SF86. One "source close to Lansing said the issue with the background check was over investments." President Trump's Schedule Director Caroline Wiles also "did not pass the intensive FBI screening."

Former Employee Of Louisiana Sheriff Sues Over Firing After Providing FBI Evidence.

Relying on information in the Baton Rouge (LA) Advocate (2/21, Burgess, 75K), the AP (2/22) reports Deborah Lourd, a former office employee of Iberia Parish Sheriff Louis Ackal, said "the sheriff wrongly fired her for cooperating with the FBI in an investigation against him" last year. The AP notes that prior to Ackal's trial, "Lourd had given investigators several secret recordings of Ackal, including one in which authorities said Ackal used an ethnic slur to refer to someone believed to be federal prosecutor Mark Blumberg." Lourd alleged "she was demoted and stripped of her job duties when Ackal learned in July that she was cooperating with the FBI."

FBI Impersonator Sentenced To Five Years Incarceration.

WJXT-TV Jacksonville, FL (2/22, 142K) reports online that 36-year-old Jacksonville man Anthony Tyrone Jones "was sentenced to five years and six months in federal prison for impersonating an FBI agent, wire fraud and failure to appear." Court documents alleged Jones defrauded an "individual by posing as an FBI agent to induce a woman to have sex with him at no charge after he had previously promised to pay her for sex," for which he was arrested in Jan. 2013. Jones pleaded guilty to the charges last February.

Administration Reverses Obama-Era Directive On Transgender Students.

Coverage of the Trump Administration's decision to rescind Obama-era guidance on protections of transgender students generally paints a favorable picture of the previous Administration's position. Moreover, some reports highlight the reported disagreement between Attorney General Sessions and Education Secretary DeVos over the new guidance – with the President ultimately siding with Sessions. There was little discussion of the topic on cable and in newspaper commentary sections. Twitter discussion leaned against the Trump Administration's move – with some attacking the President personally and others commenting on his past stance on the issue – though some Trump supporters were pleased by the decision.

NBC Nightly News  (2/22, story 3, 2:00, Holt, 16.61M) was the only broadcast network to cover the story, reporting that "the Trump Administration indicated...it's set to make a big U-turn in the issue of transgender rights, changing course from President Obama's position on whether or not they're protected by federal law. It could have far-reaching consequences." NBC's Pete Williams called it "a big reversal, slowing the push for transgender rights that zoomed ahead under President Obama." However, Williams said on MSNBC's Hardball  (2/22, 713K), "The practical effect in the short term is none because the letter the Obama Administration sent out last May to public schools saying you could lose your federal funds unless you let students use the bathrooms that match their gender identity – that letter was almost immediately put on hold by a federal court...[and] has never had the force and effect of actual education policy."

Jeff Zeleny said on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360  (2/22, 686K) that during a meeting in the Oval Office, Sessions and DeVos "were at strong disagreements here over what they should do about rescinding this guidance, and we are told that" DeVos "was arguing strongly that protections be placed for students. ... This is an early and pretty rare disagreement from two Cabinet secretaries."

The AP (2/22, Danilova, Gurman) says the Administration "is coming down on the side of states' rights" and "stripping students of federal protections to use bathrooms and locker rooms matching gender identities that differ from their birth certificates." White House press secretary Sean Spicer said, "The President has made it clear throughout the campaign that he is a firm believer in states' rights and that certain issues like this are not best dealt with at the federal level."

The New York Times (2/22, Peters, Lichtblau, Becker, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says DeVos "initially resisted signing off on the order and told President Trump that she was uncomfortable with it, according to three Republicans with direct knowledge of the internal discussions." Sessions, "who strongly opposes expanding gay, lesbian and transgender rights, fought Ms. DeVos on the issue and pressed her to relent because he could not go forward without her consent." The Times says that after the President "sided with his attorney general," DeVos "faced with the choice of resigning or defying the president" or going along.

Alabama Live (2/22, Koplowitz, 804K) says Sessions "flexed his influence" with Trump. Gloria Borger said on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360  (2/22, 686K), "I'm not sure it's Donald Trump's point of view, quite honestly, but it is his Administration's." Erin Burnett said on CNN's OutFront  (2/22, 409K), "This actually goes against what the President said during the campaign." The Huffington Post (2/22, Terkel, 237K) reports that DeVos issued her own statement, saying that she "considered protecting all students, including lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and queer students, 'not only a key priority for the Department, but for every school in America.'" But Reuters (2/22, Trotta) reports that Spicer "denied any division, saying DeVos was in agreement '100 percent.'"

The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Radnofsky, Ballhaus, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports Spicer said earlier that the Education and Justice Departments, which both had to sign off on the change, were simply sorting out details. The Washington Times (2/22, Richardson, 272K) reports that the final order read in part, "In these circumstances, the Department of Education and the Department of Justice have decided to withdraw and rescind the above-referenced guidance documents in order to further and more completely consider the legal issues involved. The Departments thus will not rely on the views expressed within them."

The Washington Post (2/22, Somashekhar, Brown, Balingit, Barnes, 11.43M) says the departments notified the Supreme Court that the Executive Branch was "ordering the nation's schools to disregard memos the Obama administration issued during the past two years that said prohibiting transgender students from using facilities that align with their gender identity violates federal anti-discrimination laws." USA Today (2/22, Toppo, 5.28M) says the new guidance could have the effect of "potentially sowing confusion in schools, angering LGBTQ rights groups and adding uncertainty to a widely discussed case due to come before the US Supreme Court next month." The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Memoli, 4.52M) says implementation of the Obama Administration order had already been "uneven; it was challenged in court and judges had varying interpretations." McClatchy (2/22, Kumar, 74K) says the guidance came now largely because the Supreme Court will take up a related case next month.

The Christian Science Monitor (2/22, Kauffman, 387K) writes that Trump "was considered the most pro-LGBT Republican candidate in the 2016 election – a distinction touted by his team as recently as this month. But his administration had sent mixed signals about how they would approach the debate over transgender rights." Vox (2/22, Lopez, 1.15M) writes that Trump "initially said he didn't care what bathrooms trans people use, saying he would let Caitlyn Jenner use the bathroom for her gender identity in Trump businesses. But he later said that the Obama-era guidance, even though it was not legally binding, was an example of federal overreach – and he vowed to undo it if elected." On MSNBC's Rachel Maddow Show (2/22, 769K), Rachel Maddow said, "As of tonight, everybody who told you that the Trump Administration wouldn't be terrible on LGBT issues, at least they'll be okay on that – as of tonight, now you know those people were all full of it."

People (2/22, McAfee, 5.23M) reports that the "backlash has already begun," with New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio tweeting, "We affirm the right of every New Yorker to use the bathroom that fits their identity. A new president will not change our values." The Miami Herald (2/22, Mazzei, 856K) reports that Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-FL), who has a transgender son, said, "This lamentable decision can lead to hostile treatment of transgender students and studies have shown that bullying and harassment can be detrimental to the emotional and physical well-being of teenagers." The Glens Falls (NY) Post-Star (2/22, Goot, 90K) reports that teachers unions were also critical. American Federation of Teachers said, "LGBTQ kids face a disproportionate amount of bullying and violence at school, leading to increased levels of fear, anxiety or worse."

Inauguration singer Jackie Evancho, who has a transgender sister, tweeted, "@realDonaldTrump u gave me the honor 2 sing at your inauguration. Pls give me & my sis the honor 2 meet with u 2 talk #transgender rghts." News of her tweet, which has been liked more than 4,000 times and retweeted more than 2,000 times, was trending on Facebook.

The Texas Tribune (2/22, Ura, 12K) says it is "unclear" what the revocation will mean for a "proposed 'bathroom bill' filed by Texas Republicans, in part, as a response to the Obama directive." Though Pennsylvania was not among the 13 states – 12 of which voted for Trump – that sued over the Obama Administration policy, the Harrisburg (PA) Patriot-News (2/22, DeJesus, 523K) reports that "nearly 100 state House members penned a letter to Obama calling the guidelines an 'unconstitutional intrusion' that should be 'rescinded immediately.'"

Koa Beck of Vogue (2/22, 3.53M) calls the shift "an assault on children's welfare," writing that "78 percent of transgender/gender non-conforming students in grades K-12 have experienced harassment, according to the National Transgender Discrimination Survey. ... 35 percent of students experienced physical assault and 12 percent have survived sexual violence. This abusive reality for kids becomes statistically fatal in adulthood. The National Coalition of Anti-Violence Programs reports that 55 percent of all reported LGBT and HIV-affected homicide victims in 2014 are of transgender women, and 50 percent are of transgender women of color." But David French, who considered an independent presidential run last year as a conservative alternative to Trump, writes in the National Review (2/22, French, 696K) that the Obama Administration policy was "lawless and radical."

Advocates: High Court Rulings On Abortion, LGBT Matters Are Interlinked. Nancy Northup of the Center for Reproductive Rights and Rachel Tiven of Lambda Legal write in a Washington Post (2/22, 11.43M) op-ed that their organizations "won leading Supreme Court cases in recent years on sexual and reproductive rights" that "rest on a shared foundation of legal precedent, which is the often unseen root structure of the law that guides the decisions of judges at all levels." They write that any Supreme Court reversal on either issue affects the other.

Media Analyses: Trump Dismissive Of Angry Voters Confronting GOP Lawmakers.

Angry voters confronting Republican lawmakers around the country and the criticism of them from President Trump and the White House as planned actions by professional liberal activists garnered more than nine minutes of coverage on the network news broadcasts Wednesday – including as the lead story for ABC World News Tonight  (2/22, lead story, 4:45, Muir, 14.63M) – as well as heavy print and online coverage and cable commentary. The coverage – while not especially negative toward the President – generally portrays him as dismissive of the protesters, and likens the confrontations to the conservative opposition that confronted President Obama while he was in office.

The AP (2/22, Wyatt) reports that just as Republicans "benefited from rowdy town halls six years ago and harnessed a wave of discontent with Democrats to win seats in Congress," they are learning this week that "the left is happy to return the favor." Democrats and their allies across the nation "are spending this short congressional recess protesting elected Republican politicians who are avoiding the events that often turn into shouting matches." The "new left and left-leaning protesters are taking out their ire on Republicans and their links to President Donald Trump." Rep. Mark Sanford said on CNN's Situation Room  (2/22, 554K), "The President has broken every conventional political rule out there on things that one could say, and I think that to a degree has given people what they perceive to be license to be awfully rough and at times maybe crossing the line with regard to rudeness in some of these town hall meetings."

The Washington Post (2/22, Zak, Samuel, 11.43M) says lawmakers have "felt the wrath of liberals (and of some conservatives) who are terrified of Trump's divisive rhetoric and swift executive actions," and, like the Los Angeles Times (2/22, Barabak, Cherwa, 4.52M), cites examples from around the country. According to the Times, the "raucous gatherings have been the mirror image of the clamorous sessions that birthed the tea party movement early in President Obama's term, a conservative opposition that tormented him – and sometimes the GOP establishment – throughout his eight years in office." USA Today (2/22, Sullivan, Estepa, 5.28M) also provides examples.

McClatchy (2/22, Tate, 74K) says that even in his hometown of Louisville, Kentucky, Senate Majority Leader McConnell "couldn't escape frustrated constituents who weren't crazy about his plan to repeal Obamacare." Inside and outside a luncheon with local business leaders, McConnell "faced a large group of Kentuckians who demanded answers from their senator of more than 30 years." For his part, "McConnell acknowledged the protesters, calling their presence 'as American as apple pie.'"

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Barabak, Cherwa, 4.52M) says the question "is whether the outpouring at town halls, the circuit-jamming phone calls to Capitol Hill and the email- and letter-writing campaigns are the start of a meaningful political movement or merely an angry spasm," and the answer "is unknowable until the next nationwide election in November 2018." On NBC Nightly News  (2/22, story 2, 2:15, Holt, 16.61M), correspondent Pete Alexander said lawmakers are "wondering whether this is an isolated moment or the start of a movement," while Trump "remains unimpressed, mocking so-called angry crowds, insisting many are planned out by liberal activists."

In its lead story, ABC World News Tonight (2/22, lead story, 4:45, Muir, 14.63M) highlighted a tweet from the President, which read, "The so-called angry crowds in home districts of some Republicans are actually in numerous cases planned out by liberal activists. Sad!'" The New York Post (2/22, Schultz, 3.82M) reports that White House press secretary Sean Spicer said Wednesday, "I think some people are clearly upset, but I think there is a bit of professional protester, manufactured base in there. ... But obviously there are people that are upset, but I also think that when you look at some of these districts ... it is not a representation of a member's district." Spicer added, "Just because they're loud doesn't necessarily mean there are many." The CBS Evening News (2/22, story 5, 2:20, Mason, 11.17M) similarly said the White House "claims professional outside agitators are partly to blame," but congressional correspondent Nancy Cordes, reporting from meeting being held by Sen. Bill Cassidy, said that if any "professional agitators were lurking in a line outside the Jefferson Parish Library today, we didn't meet them."

Politico (2/22, Cheney, 2.46M) reports that in addition to the ACA, "Donald Trump's relationship with Russia" is "animating" the town halls as "constituents and liberal activists are demanding to know what GOP lawmakers are doing to help or hinder investigations into the president's ties to Moscow and Russian interference in the 2016 election," suggesting that "the firestorm over alleged ties between Russian officials and members of Trump's campaign and administration has spread well beyond the Beltway." According to Politico, the interest of their constituents in the issue "could increase pressure on GOP lawmakers to pursue a serious and far-reaching probe," and will "test how far Republican are willing to go in openly challenging the new president, who has consistently dismissed the matter as 'fake news.'"

Rep. Marsha Blackburn said on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (2/22, 686K), "The anger, indeed, was real from the individuals that were in the room. What we found was so interesting – a little bit less than one-third in the room were constituents of mine." Blackburn added that some residents "were not able to get into the meeting and, of course, the reservation or the seats had been taken by those that were actually from outside of my district."

WPost A1: State Department "Sidelined" By Trump Administration.

According to a front-page story in the Washington Post (2/22, A1, Morello, Gearan, 11.43M), the Trump Administration has "largely benched the State Department from its long-standing role as the preeminent voice of US foreign policy, curtailing public engagement and official travel and relegating Secretary of State Rex Tillerson to a mostly offstage role." The Post reports that "decisions on hiring, policy and scheduling" are all being driven by the White House, which is "wary of the foreign policy establishment and struggling to set priorities and write policy on the fly." The "most visible change" is the "month-long lack of daily press briefings" and Tillerson's absence from White House meetings with foreign leaders. While acknowledging that "it is still early in Tillerson's tenure," the Post says "the biggest factor is the confusing lines of communication and authority to the White House, and Trump's inclination to farm out elements of foreign policy to a kitchen Cabinet of close advisers."

Elise Labott, meanwhile, said on CNN's Situation Room (2/22, 554K) that European diplomats are "very nervous" over the "mixed messages" being sent by the Administration, and those diplomats "don't know where to turn." Labott said there are "very few" career diplomats left at the State Department, "so they don't know who to talk to." According to Politico (2/22, Toosi, 2.46M), Tillerson "has asked his aides to find ways to improve his media profile, a request that comes as US diplomats increasingly worry about the direction of the State Department and whether their new boss has enough influence" with the President. A "State Department official said Tillerson's aides have asked staffers at the agency to draft a paper laying out ways he can engage with reporters, who have been given almost no access" to him, suggesting that he is "concerned about the perception that he is out of the loop on major foreign policy decisions" being made by the Administration.

Politico Analysis: Trump's Hiring Style "A Shock To Washington."

According to Politico (2/22, Dawsey, Stokols, 2.46M), President Trump's hiring style is "something of a shock to Washington's political culture" for his intuitive decisions often based on first impressions. Politico says he cares most about "appearance, loyalty and a strength." When he does not make choices on a whim, Trump often consults a wide, and sometimes unexpected, array of opinions, says Politico. Sources close to the President assert that those who control the information he sees about nominees have significant power.

"Our Revolution": Trump Betrays Voters By Hiring "Wall Street Lackeys."

The Washington Post (2/22, Wagner, Merle, 11.43M) reports the spinoff group from Sen. Bernie Sanders' campaign called Our Revolution claims on its website President Trump's nomination of many Wall Street executives, particularly from Goldman Sachs, is "hypocritical" because of his promises "to look after working-class people." Trump proponents argue, however, that voters are more concerned with how the economy performs and whether they have jobs than which "Wall Street lackeys," as Our Revolution says, the President appoints to make policy. The Post also notes the Administration's efforts to weaken the Dodd-Frank Act which "could save the industry billions," although a Goldman Sachs statement says it has had "no involvement in the drafting of any executive orders."

Breitbart Profiles Deputy Chief Of Staff Katie Walsh.

In a more than 2,600-word exclusive, Breitbart (2/22, 2.02M) profiles Deputy Chief of Staff Katie Walsh, saying that she, along with "other strong women on President Donald J. Trump's team," is "instrumental in making the White House function." According to Breitbart, Walsh is charged with "making sure that the key items President Trump and his inner team want to handle get on the schedule and that his time – and the time of the key people around him – is used to the fullest extent possible."

Local Police Concerned Immigration Orders Will Hinder Fight Against Gangs.

The New York Times (2/22, Robbins, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports local police are concerned that the Administration's immigration orders – especially the requirement that local law enforcement detain undocumented immigrants – could negatively impact the fight against gangs. The Times cites a statement from the International Association of Chiefs of Police last month that said it would "strongly oppose any initiative that would mandate that state and local law enforcement agencies play a role in the enforcement of federal immigration law." The Times highlights Suffolk County as an example of "wrestling with a conundrum facing police departments across the country" as they determine "how to shut down a violent gang when the immigrants they will need as witnesses and tipsters may be afraid to come forward."

White House Says Revised Immigration Order To Be Released Next Week.

NBC Nightly News  (2/22, story 4, 0:15, Williams, 16.61M) reported that the White House said its revised executive order that restricts immigration from seven countries will not be released until next week. Reuters (2/22, Rascoe) and Bloomberg Politics (2/22, Jacobs, 201K) report that President Trump had indicated that the order would be released this week.

The Hill (2/22, Fabian, 1.25M) indicates that the Administration did not provide a reason for the delay. However, John Roberts reported on Fox News' Special Report  (2/22, 1.53M) that he "was told this morning that it may be pushed to next week because they want to make sure...it passes legal muster." Roberts said the new order is "expected to target the same seven countries as the original one," and "will implement the same 50 percent cut in refugee admissions this year, limiting admissions to 50,000." However, "in a nod to the courts, the new order will drop the indefinite suspension of Syrian refugees." Instead, Roberts said, it "likely call for a temporary suspension of all refugees from any country until those countries can put in place a background security test that can pass US standards." In addition, the new order is expected to specifically exempt "legal permanent residents and other visa holders from the ban." Jim Sciutto said on CNN Wolf  (2/22, 224K) that "there has been a continuing contradiction among Donald Trump's advisers" on the content of the new order. Sciutto indicated that Stephen Miller has said that "the changes to the new executive order were...going to be minor and technical." However, Sciutto added that Press Secretary Sean Spicer "is claiming that it is a whole different thing, it's not about the Muslim faith, it's actually about vetting."

Analysts Say Non-Substantive Change Might Not Satisfy Court. The Washington Post (2/22, Zapotosky, 11.43M) reports that analysts say that only making non-substantive changes to the order "could hurt the administration's bid to lift the court-imposed suspension" of the restrictions. Leon Fresco, who worked in the office of immigration litigation during the Obama Administration, said "it is very bad to say our intent here is to engage in the prohibited outcome" when trying to "moot out litigation."

Huckabee: Trump Is "Keeping A Campaign Promise" With Immigration Order. Mike Huckabee said on Fox News First 100 Days  (2/22), "I think it's as Donald Trump is keeping a campaign promise, one that the American people elected him to do." Huckabee compared the order to "lock[ing] your doors at night when you go to bed." Huckabee said, "Donald Trump is locking America's doors at night and he says if you would like to come in, knock on the door, we will come to the door. Just like in every neighborhood, we don't open the door and invite everyone and who knocks on the door. We'll check these folks out and see. That is common sense."

Lieu: Administration's Actions Are "Offensive, Un-American, And Cruel." Rep. Ted Lieu said on CNN Wolf  (2/22, 224K), "Having come to the United States as an immigrant, I find the Administration's actions offensive, un-American and cruel. It's going to separate children from their parents. It's going to break apart families. At least under George Bush, we had compassionate conservatism. This is cruel conservatism, and is going to lead potentially to large-scale deportations and that is not what is good for America and I hope people see about what's to happen and we stop it."

Media Analyses: Fear Of Deportation Impacting Lives Of Undocumented Immigrants.

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Vives, 4.52M) reports the Administration "swept aside nearly all restrictions Tuesday on targeting for removal" of undocumented immigrants, leading to "heightened fears among people in this country illegally." Some of those individuals, the Times says, indicate "they are now preparing for the possibility of deportation." The Times says the developments "were reverberating on the streets of Southern California and beyond" and highlights personal stories of impacted undocumented immigrants. The New York Times (2/22, Yee, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) similarly says that the threat of deportation for undocumented immigrants in California's Central Valley "has now begun to distort every movement." The Times adds that this is a change from when deportation was mostly a "threat on paper."

WSJournal: DHS Immigration Memos Are Too Broad. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) editorializes that the recent immigration memos by DHS Secretary Kelly are too broad, as they will cost billions of dollars, expand the size of government, and increase government intrusiveness. The Journal says that while the US should deport undocumented immigrants who are criminals, spending these resources to identify and deport people committing low-level crimes is not worth the effort and creates a negative image. Instead, the Journal says that the US should focus on deporting people who commit major crimes.

CBS Features Teenage Refugees Who Want Trump To "Reconsider" Order. On the CBS Evening News  (2/22, story 10, 2:50, Mason, 11.17M), Mark Strassmann spoke to teenage immigrants who believe Trump "should reconsider" his immigration order. One teenager is shown saying, "America's like a savior. There's always, like, a second chance." A Somali war refugee said that officials making the policies "don't really think about who they're affecting. You leave everything in your old country just to get here, and then it's like a slap in the face."

Churches Facing Decisions On Whether To Offer Sanctuary To Undocumented Immigrants.

The Tennessean (2/22, Meyer, 407K) reports that "faith communities across" the country "have signed on to the growing sanctuary movement" by "agreeing to shield undocumented immigrants from deportation." However, the Tennessean says "not all congregations support the movement nor think it's appropriate to go against the federal government." The Tennessean highlights churches that both support and have decided against becoming sanctuaries, adding that "the issue could become more pronounced in the months ahead."

House Speaker Visits US-Mexico Border.

NBC Nightly News  (2/22, story 6, 0:15, Holt, 16.61M) reported House Speaker Ryan on Wednesday went on a "fact-finding tour" of the US-Mexico border with Homeland Security officials. Ryan, according to the AP (2/22), visited McAllen, TX and came "face to face with some of the challenges that arise in building a wall." The AP says Ryan met with local officials and toured the area by boat, helicopter, and horseback. The New York Times (2/22, Flegenheimer, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) quotes Ryan as saying in a statement, "When you see with your own eyes the many challenges facing our law enforcement professionals along the border, it gives you even greater respect for the work that they do day in and day out." Ryan added, "But more tools and more support are needed for them to do their jobs effectively. Congress is committed to securing the border and enforcing our laws, and together with the Trump administration, we will get this done."

Drug Smuggling Prevalent Along "Areas With A Border Wall."

NBC Nightly News  (2/22, story 8, 2:15, Holt, 16.61M) reported, "President Trump has said that proposed border wall will help stop the skyrocketing overdose rate in the US, driven in large part by an increase in narcotics coming in from Mexico. But as NBC's Jacob Soberov found out along a section of border that already has high security, smugglers are putting US authorities to the test every day." Soberov reported, "The DEA says most narcotics entering the US are driven in, hidden in vehicles, through...legal border crossings." Soberov said of these crossings: "One thing these places all have in common, they're all areas with a border wall."

McAuliffe Vows To Veto Sanctuary City Prohibition.

The Washington Post (2/22, Schneider, Vozzella, Sullivan, 11.43M) reports the GOP-controlled Virginia Senate voted along party lines 21-19 Wednesday to approve a bill banning sanctuary cities that Governor Terry McAuliffe has vowed to veto. The Virginia ACLU called on McAuliffe to uphold his commitment to protect immigrant communities made in his letter last week.

McMaster Considering Reorganization Of NSC.

The New York Times (2/22, Baker, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports National Security Adviser McMaster is "considering a reorganization of the White House foreign policy team that would give him control of Homeland Security and guarantee full access to the military and intelligence agencies." One proposal under discussion "would restore the director of national intelligence and the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to full membership" to the NSC's principals committee, "according to two officials." But "left uncertain is what, if anything, will happen regarding" Chief Strategist Steve Bannon, who was made a member of the principals committee.

Former Under Secretary of State Tony Blinken told CNN's Anderson Cooper 360  (2/22, 686K) that Bannon's presence on the National Security Council has left it in disarray. Blinken said Bannon is "trying to have policy around and above the NSC without trying to get input. That is not a good recipe for good sound policy."

IRS Audits Drop For Fifth Straight Year.

The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Rubin, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports preliminary data released Wednesday shows budget cuts at the IRS have resulted in a fifth straight year of decreased tax audits of individuals, with 2016 the lowest since 2003. According to the data, the agency's audits of high-income households and businesses also declined, with its enforcement staffing down 30% since the 2010 peak, which the Journal attributes to spending cuts and an effort by the GOP to punish the IRS for its treatment of tea party organizations.

Authorities Close Down Dakota Access Protest Camp.

ABC World News Tonight  (2/22, story 2, 1:45, Muir, 14.63M) reported a "dramatic final showdown" as authorities moved to evacuate Dakota Access protesters camped out on Army Corps land, and one police officer indicated the area could soon face flooding. The CBS Evening News  (2/22, story 2, 1:20, Mason, 11.17M) said authorities arrested "several holdouts just after 4:00 p.m." In its lead story, NBC Nightly News  (2/22, lead story, 1:55, Holt, 16.61M) specified "about 100 defied orders to leave" and that the police were "peacefully" making arrests. The New York Times (2/22, Smith, Blinder, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports in a front-page story that one policeman indicated the authorities' reluctance to "mount an immediate raid."

According to the Los Angeles Times (2/22, Tchekmedyian, 4.52M), hundreds of protesters voluntarily left prior to the 2:00 p.m. deadline, "praying singing and beating drums." The Washington Post (2/22, Berman, 11.43M) reported video footage and images displayed on cable news and social media Wednesday showed camp structures on fire, which the AP reported was part of praying protesters' ceremony as they left the camp. Some said they would resist the eviction order. The Washington Times (2/22, Richardson, 272K) says the state of North Dakota has set up a travel-assistance center to "provide protesters with support as they prepare for their return home," including food, water, wellness assessments, lodging, and travel vouchers.

WPost: Montgomery County Role Model For Prosecution Of Child Abuse.

The Washington Post (2/22, 11.43M) writes in an editorial that the fact prosecutors secured three convictions in Montgomery County, Maryland in the past year for cases involving the death of very young children is notable, and it underscores State's Attorney John McCarthy's priority in fighting such crimes. The prosecution showed that "dynamic head movement and impact can do great damage to young brains and those who might suggest otherwise do a great disservice." The Post says resources the county put toward the effort should be mirrored in other jurisdictions.

DOJ IG Looks At Upcoming Challenges.

Federal News Radio (DC) (2/22, Thomas, 16K) reports that the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General (OIG) "has a lot on its plate in 2017 to ensure money and time are used wisely to combat fraud, waste, drugs and threats to national and cyber security." According to FNR, "some of the biggest challenges the department will face in upcoming months are keeping track of appropriated funds to federal, state and local law enforcement, managing overcrowded prison systems and safeguarding national and cyber security, said DoJ Inspector General Michael Horowitz on In Depth with the Justice Department. 'The challenge for law enforcement and the intelligence community in particular is on understanding where those attacks may come from and what's causing the issues to arise,' Horowitz told Eric White on the Federal Drive with Tom Temin. 'It's also a challenge to do that in a manner that is obviously consistent with our constitutional safeguards and protections.'"

Sterling Heights, MI To Allow Mosque Construction In Settlement With DOJ.

The New York Times (2/22, Victor, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that "over the objections of some residents, a Muslim group won the fight to build a mosque in Sterling Heights, Mich., after the city on Tuesday settled a lawsuit by the Justice Department that accused officials of religious discrimination." The American Islamic Community Center "applied to Sterling Heights, about 16 miles from downtown Detroit, to build the house of worship in August 2015." According to the Times, "the planning commission rejected the application, citing concerns over the building's height, parking and noise," but "the lawsuit, filed in December – and the anti-Muslim language used by many residents who spoke at public meetings about the mosque – suggested that the rejection and the uproar were more about religion than by-the-book zoning details."

The Detroit Free Press (2/22, Warikoo, 1.01M) reports that "attorneys for the AICC cheered the settlements, calling them a victory for religious freedom and the Muslim-American community, which was concerned after the city in 2015 denied permission for the center to build a mosque on 15 Mile Rd between Mound and Ryan roads." Residents "who objected to the proposed 20,5000-square-foot mosque believed it was not suited for the area, which they said was zoned more for residential use." Eastern Michigan US Attorney Barbara McQuade, "who handled the case along with the civil rights division of the Justice Department, also applauded the settlement. 'I grew up in Sterling Heights, and I am proud that the city is taking steps to protect the religious rights of all of its residents,' McQuade said in a statement. 'The law protects people of all religions from discrimination or unnecessary obstacles when they seek to build a place of worship.'"

Reuters (2/22, Ingram) reports that the Sterling Heights City Council "has approved a stalled proposal to build a mosque, a necessary step to settle discrimination lawsuits from Muslim residents and the U.S. Department of Justice." Reuters adds that "the council's unanimous vote late on Tuesday followed a raucous meeting where opponents were especially vocal." Sterling Heights Mayor Mike Taylor "said on Wednesday that one mosque opponent accused council members of working with 'terrorists.'" Reuters notes that "mosque opponents in Michigan and elsewhere had sought help from Attorney General Jeff Sessions and President Donald Trump," but the Justice Department on Wednesday "released a statement commending the approval of the mosque. 'Federal law protects the right of faith communities to build places of worship without discrimination or unreasonable burdens on their religious exercise,' said acting Assistant Attorney General Tom Wheeler, a Trump appointee overseeing the Civil Rights Division."

DOJ Joins Texas AG In Seeking Delay For Hearing On Voter ID Law.

The AP (2/22, Rauf) reports that the Justice Department joined Texas Attorney General Ken Paxton on Wednesday "in asking a federal court to delay a hearing on the state's voter ID law, the latest signal that the federal government might drop its opposition to the law now that Donald Trump is president." In a joint filing, the department and Paxton "asked to delay next Tuesday's hearing until summer because the Texas Legislature is considering changes to the existing law, which a federal court has found to be discriminatory." The AP notes that the Obama Justice Department had joined the lawsuit contesting the law. The AP adds that Senate Republicans in Texas this week "introduced a revised voter ID bill that could address problems courts have identified with the existing Texas law, namely the lack of an affidavit process for voters who are unable to obtain one of seven forms of state-approved photo identification."

DOJ: Massachusetts Town In Compliance With ADA.

The Fall River (MA) Herald News (2/22, Holtzman, 156K) reports from Swansea, MA that the Justice Department "informed town officials in a recent letter" that "Americans with Disabilities Act compliance on town buildings, including voting places, dating to a settlement agreement five years ago, has been completed. 'During this time, you have submitted documentation, photographs, reports and other evidence to demonstrate the town's progress in complying with the settlement agreement … the department is satisfied that the town has satisfactorily complied with the settlement agreement, and we are, therefore, closing our files on this matter,' says a Jan. 13 letter from Kevin Kijewski, deputy chief of the DOJ Disability Rights Section."

Deaf Woman Settles Lawsuit With NYC Police Over Denial Of Interpreter.

The New York Daily News (2/22, Rayman, 4.45M) reports that "a deaf and speech-impaired woman who sued the NYPD for allegedly denying her a sign-language interpreter while she was jailed overnight has won a $100,000 settlement from the city, the Daily News has learned." Opal Gordon "was arrested on Sept. 21, 2015 while leaving Manhattan Family Court," and she was accused of violating an order of protection. Gordon, 54, "who describes herself as 'profoundly deaf and speech-impaired,' claimed cops didn't explain why they collared her – and didn't provide a sign-language interpreter." The News notes that "the NYPD inked a consent decree with the U.S. Department of Justice in 2009 to improve its treatment of deaf people – including special training for officers and providing interpreters 24 hours per day," but "some members of the deaf community and their advocates maintain the department has failed to uphold the agreement."

INTERNATIONAL NEWS

Tillerson, Kelly To Discuss Immigration Issues With Mexican Officials.

Media reports previewing today's visit by Secretary of State Tillerson and DHS Secretary Kelly to Mexico overwhelmingly cast it as coming at time of tense relations between the two countries. Reports indicated they are likely to face criticism from Mexican officials over the Administration's newly announced immigration enforcement guidelines and plans to build a border wall. The AP (2/22, Lederman), for example, says the two officials are on "a fence-mending mission complicated by the actual fence [Trump] wants to build" on the border, and Mexico's government signaled Wednesday that "it was in no mood to be lectured by the new US administration."

NBC Nightly News  (2/22, story 7, 0:15, Holt, 16.61M) reported Tillerson and Kelly will meet with Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto, "who last month canceled a meeting with President Trump after he insisted Mexico would pay for the border wall," and CNN's Situation Room  (2/22, 554K) reported the trip comes as "Mexican officials are already voicing concern about the new enforcement measures, not to mention the proposed border wall." However, White House press secretary Sean Spicer on Wednesday "insisted the relationship isn't under strain." Spicer said, "I would argue that we have a very health and I robust relationship with the Mexican government and Mexican officials and I think they would echo that same sentiment. ... I think the relationship with Mexico is phenomenal right now." The Washington Post (2/22, Olivo, 11.43M) says Spicer "played down the apparently deepening rift," and the CBS Evening News  (2/22, story 3, 1:55, Mason, 11.17M) quoted him as saying, "I think that Secretary Tillerson and Secretary Kelly are going to have a great discussion down there and walk through the implementation of the executive order." Reuters (2/22, Mason) also reports Spicer's comments.

AFP (2/22) reports Trump "has outraged Mexico," and "now he has sent Tillerson and...Kelly to Mexico City to smooth over tensions." Spicer told reporters yesterday, "It's significant that the president is sending the secretaries to Mexico so early in the administration. It's symbolic of the meaningful relationship that our two nations have."

While Tillerson and Kelly are seeking to "ease relations strained significantly by President Trump's politics and rhetoric," CNN's Situation Room  (2/22, 554K) reported that even before they arrived, Mexico delivered a "hard line," saying "they're not going to pay for any wall, [and] they're under no obligation to accept any deportees, except Mexican nationals." Saying the "timing could not have been stranger for the first visit of America's newest top diplomat to Mexico," Fox News' Special Report  (2/22, 1.53M) showed Foreign Minister Luis Videgaray saying, "I want to say clearly and emphatically that the government of Mexico and the Mexican people do not have to accept provisions that one government unilaterally wants to impose." Reuters (2/22, Alper, Rama) says Mexico "reacted with anger" to what Videgaray called "hostile" new US immigration guidelines, and the New York Post (2/22, Moore, 3.82M) described Videgaray as "defiant." The Washington Times (2/22, Dinan, 272K) also reports his remarks, which the Wall Street Journal (2/22, Schwartz, De Córdoba, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) says in a front-page story headlined "Top US Officials Get Chilly Reception in Mexico" do not bode well for Tillerson and Kelly.

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Wilkinson, McDonnell, 4.52M) reports that "Mexican officials must walk a fine line: appeasing get-tough calls from an irate domestic audience, without further alienating the leaders of Mexico's key trading partner at a time when the nation's economy is already shaky." USA Today (2/22, Agren, Stanglin, 5.28M) likewise says the Mexican government "faces a tough balancing act between diplomacy with Trump to achieve a good outcome and standing up to the new president." Former Mexican Ambassador to the US Arturo Sarukhan told CNN's Situation Room  (2/22, 554K) that while "we have to recognize the fact that Secretary Tillerson decid[ing] to do his first bilateral trip to Mexico is an important gesture," deporting non-Mexican nationals to Mexico "is a nonstarter."

A Washington Post (2/22, 11.43M) editorial says "if the goal" of today's visit "was to widen bilateral cooperation and soothe the harsh feelings Mr. Trump has engendered with our neighbor and ally, the timing was pitiable."

Tillerson, Kelly Will Not Meet With Top Mexican Trade Official. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Schwartz, Whelan, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports Tillerson and Kelly are scheduled to meet with the Mexican ministers of finance, interior, national defense, and the navy, but not with the nation's economy minister, Ildefonso Guajardo, who is expected to lead the renegotiation of NAFTA.

Lieu: US-Mexican Relations At Historic Low. Rep. Ted Lieu said on CNN Wolf (2/22, 224K), "Sean Spicer is lying again. He said that US-Mexico relations are phenomenal. That is false. There have been large protests in Mexico against Donald Trump's policies and Mexican lawmakers just introduced legislation to say they are not going to buy US corn. These relations are at one of the worst points in US-Mexican history."

Trudeau Defends Plan To Give US Border Agents Greater Authority In Canada.

Reuters (2/22, Ljunggren) reports Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau on Wednesday "defended plans" to allow US border agents based in Canada greater ability to question and search individuals entering the US by saying that travelers would have the protection of domestic laws. Trudeau said, "Canadian laws are in place, so there is extra protection when Canadians go through American customs in Canada." Reuters says Trudeau is "under pressure" from "left-leaning opposition New Democrats" who are concerned that US border guards "are already racially profiling Canadians" entering the US.

Reuters Poll: Republicans More Concerned With Leaks Than Administration's Ties To Russia.

McClatchy (2/22, Welsh, 74K) reports a new Reuters poll found that more Republicans are worried about leaks from the White House than the Administration's ties with Russia. The poll asked people to select "the most concerning" statement between "reports of conversations between Russia and the Trump team" or "leaks to the media about those conversations." Fifty-seven percent of Republican respondents said the leaks were most concerning, while 23 percent chose the conversations with Russia.

FBI Rejected Priebus' Request To Contest Stories On Russia Contacts, Sources Say.

CNN (2/23, Sciutto, Perez, Prokupecz, Raju, Brown, 29.79M) reports online that "multiple" anonymous "US officials briefed on the matter" indicated "the FBI rejected a recent White House request to publicly knock down media reports about communications between Donald Trump's associates and Russians known to US intelligence during the 2016 presidential campaign." Sources indicated FBI Director James "Comey rejected the request for the FBI to comment on the stories...because the alleged communications between Trump associates and Russians known to US intelligence are the subject of an ongoing investigation." A White House official commented late Thursday that White House Chief of Staff Reince Priebus made the request only "after the FBI indicated to the White House it did not believe the reporting to be accurate."

USA Today (2/23, Cummings, 5.28M), the AP (2/24, Pace), the Huffington Post (2/23, 237K), the New York Daily News (2/24, Slattery, 4.45M), The Hill (2/23, Bolton, 1.25M), the International Business Times (2/23, Kreiter, 814K), the Daily Beast (2/23, 1.11M), and the New York Post (2/23, Perez, 3.82M) summarize the CNN report.

Jim Sciutto said on CNN's Situation Room  (2/23, 554K) that the White House "sought the help of the Bureau and other agencies investigating the Russian matter to say that the reports were wrong and that there had been no contacts." Evan Perez reported on CNN's Situation Room  (2/23, 554K) that US law enforcement officials said the White House request began when White House Chief of Staff Reince Priebus met with FBI Deputy Director Andrew McCabe the day after those media reports broke. However, White House officials disputed that account, "saying that McCabe called Priebus that morning" and said a New York Times story on the matter "vastly overstated what the FBI knows about these Russia contacts."

Perez later said on CNN's Situation Room  that communication between the White House and the FBI is "unusual because of a decade-old restriction on such contacts." Perez added, "the request from the White House is a violation of those procedures to limit communications with FBI on pending investigations."

Politico (2/23, Lima, 2.46M) says Democrats have "ripped" the White House over the reports. Rep. Andre Carson (D-IN) said on CNN's Situation Room  (2/23, 554K), "The fact that the Administration is using its authority to impose on the FBI in a way that is unlawful and unethical, quite frankly, disturbs me." Carson was later asked if the White House contact with the FBI should be investigated, to which he replied  , "Without a question. I think it goes along the lines of other questionable acts not only the violation of the emolument clause and other violations and general Flynn speaking to Russian diplomats." Sciutto said on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360  (2/23, 686K) that the FBI is still investigating the communications between Trump associates and Russian officials, as are the House and Senate Intelligence Committees, according to several members of those panels.

Ignatius: US, Allies Must Resist Russia Influence Efforts Or "Post-West Era" May "Be Next." In his Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) column, David Ignatius says "we may be missing the forest for the trees" in the story about Russia allegedly attempting to influence the US election as the effort "is part of a much bigger tale of Russian covert action" that used Trump's campaign as a "witting" or "unwitting" "tool." Ignatius urges Americans to "pay attention" because "this is how the Russians try to subvert politics -- boldly, secretly and often corruptly." Ignatius adds that if the US and its allies "don't resist, a post-West era may indeed be next."

COUNTER-TERRORISM

New Orleans Jewish Community Center Evacuated After False Bomb Threat.

The New Orleans Times-Picayune (2/23, 656K) reports that on Thursday morning, the Jewish Community Center in New Orleans was evacuated "following a bomb threat, according to the New Orleans Police Department." However, "Mayor Mitch Landrieu tweeted just before 11 a.m. that the threat had been deemed 'non-credible,'" adding, "FBI is investigating. Be clear, anti-semitism will not be tolerated in NOLA." New Orleans JCC Executive Director Leslie Fischman "said they were outside for roughly 55 minutes before law enforcement cleared the building and allowed them to go back in," and that "this is the first threat the facility has received in her 21 years with the organization."

Analysis Highlights Difficulty Of Investigating Anti-Semitic Threats. TIME (2/23, 6.98M) contributor Katie Reilly provides an analysis of the challenges associated with investigating anti-Semitic threats. John Jay College of Criminal Justice adjunct professor James Mulvaney said, "Statistically, most of [the threats] are hoaxes. Realistically, you have to handle every one as if it's the real deal." The article highlights the increased level of threats since the election of President Trump. Reilly notes that the FBI has said it is investigating "possible civil rights violations in connection with threats to Jewish Community Centers across the country."

Jewish Americans Reportedly Concerned Trump Is Not Taking Threats Seriously. Vox (2/23, 1.15M) contributor Sarah Wildman provides an 1,800-word analysis of "the epidemic of bomb threats against Jewish organizations," saying there is a "genuine fear that the country has entered into a new era where anti-Semitism has left the shadows, and taken a new, louder, bolder place on the center stage of American society." Wildman says "Trump is in denial about the dangers of white supremacists and neo-Nazis," citing Anti-Defamation League (ADL) Co-Director Oren Segal as asserting "not monitoring white supremacists...creates a feeling among Jewish Americans that their concerns are not being taken seriously."

Ecoterrorist Admits To Firebombing MSU In 1992.

The Detroit Free Press (2/23, Wolcott, 1.01M) reports that twenty-five years after a firebombing at Michigan State University, Rodney Coronado "admits he was solely responsible," and that he intended to destroy the research of Richard Aulerich because he thought it was "funded by the commercial fur industry." The morning of the bombing, the Animal Liberation Front (ALF) – which has been designated a domestic terrorist organization by the FBI – "claimed responsibility in a press release" that Coronado said he wrote. In 1993, Coronado was indicted "on seven counts, ranging from conspiracy to commit crimes against the United States to malicious destruction and arson." However, "in exchange for pleading guilty for arson" at MSU, charges for "attacks in other states were dropped." Coronado now runs "Great Lakes Wolf Patrol, a nonprofit organization dedicated to ensuring people followed the rules when it comes to hunting wolves."

US Army Veteran Charged With Attempting To Support ISIL.

The Washington Post (2/23, Wootson, 11.43M) reports US Army veteran Robert Hester "was charged last week with trying to support the Islamic State as part of what he thought was a coordinated attack against civilian targets and military installations." According to an affidavit in US District Court in Missouri, "agents swooped in during a meeting with a man Hester believed was an Islamic State contact. ... But the man was actually an undercover FBI agent who had been building a case against the 25-year-old father of two." The Post highlights the uptick in arrests of people suspected to be connected to ISIL, noting that "at one point, the FBI made an arrest almost every week in connection with the group."

"Radicalized" Georgia Man Charged With Possession Of Ricin.

The AP (2/23) reports an indictment filed Wednesday alleges north Georgia man William Christopher Gibbs had ricin, a "biological agent and toxin" without registration required by law. The AP adds, "Federal prosecutors said after the arrest that the FBI had 'identified no evidence that any poisonous or toxic substances have been dispersed or that the public is at risk' in the case."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/23, Habersham, 1.41M) reports that Gibbs had become radicalized online, saying, "Based on his social media profiles, Gibbs had recently become an adherent of the Church of Creativity, a largely internet-based holdover of the defunct Church of the Creator, a white supremacist, deeply anti-Semitic 'religion' that preaches racial warfare." US Attorney John Horn's office "charged Gibbs with one count of possession of a biological agent, a federal charge that carries a prison sentence of up to five years." The article notes the FBI's arrest last week "of Benjamin McDowell in South Carolina after he allegedly bought a gun and ammunition off a federal agent posing as a member of the Aryan Nations."

Sudanese Immigrant To Be Sentenced For Aiding Bombing Plot.

The Washington Post (2/23, Weiner, 11.43M) reports ahead of Friday's sentencing of Sudanese immigrant Mahmoud Elhassan, who admitted he drove Joseph "Farrokh to the Richmond Airport and then lied to agents about his friend's plans." Farrokh was "convicted in a bombing plot." The Post says, "At first" Elhassan "appeared to be an accessory to Farrokh's plans. But prosecutors now say Elhassan was the instigator, having been radicalized long before the two met." However, "Elhassan's attorneys say he...was shaped by trauma," a victim of a hostile upbringing. Elhassan faces up to 28 years in prison.

Boy, 14, Receives Extra TSA Screening, Told He's On Watch List.

The AP (2/23) reports 14-year-old New Hampshire boy Peter Haas said he received "extra screening and a pat down" from the TSA "at Logan International Airport last week" after agents told him he was on a US government watch list. The TSA responded that "it vets all airline passenger names against the watch lists, and that it uses a variety of screenings, including random selection." However, "Haas' mother, Pam Jaquith, said a supervisor said the screening wasn't random and she needed to contact the Homeland Security Department." The AP adds, "The FBI said it couldn't comment as to how his name ended up on the list."

FBI Agents Testify In Malheur National Wildlife Refuge Case.

The Oregonian (2/23, Bernstein, 894K) reports on Thursday's testimony in the Malheur National Wildlife Refuge case. FBI Agent Matthew Yeager testified regarding "a slew of photos and messages that he found on defendant Darryl Thorn's Facebook page, including Thorn's stated plan of 'sneaking back' onto the Malheur National Wildlife Refuge a year ago." FBI agent Ben Jones testified Jason "Patrick had various roles during the occupation, according to a Jan. 7, 2016, breakdown of responsibilities found on [Ammon] Bundy's cellphone. He was to be in charge of 'organization,' 'morale'...and 'Speakers Flyers.'" A US "Bureau of Land Management special agent and several refuge employees testified earlier in the day about how the occupation hindered their work."

Continuing Coverage: FBI Interviews Reveal Bomb Plot Role Of Al-Qaeda Chief.

Newsweek (2/23, Moore, 862K) continues coverage of FBI interviews with American Al-Qaeda chief and young Nigerian national Umar Farouk Abdulmutallab, revealed in documents obtained by the New York Times under FOIA, which show that Anwar al-Awlaki "directed the young Al-Qaeda member from the militant group's safe houses in Yemen." Awlaki had "told the Nigerian the attack must 'occur on board a U.S. airliner,' and even planned his journey." However, "the Nigerian's explosives, hidden in his underwear, failed to explode as the plane approached Detroit." The article adds, "The FBI flew Abdulmutallab's relatives to the U.S. to speak to him and increase the chances of him opening up about the plot...a technique which proved a success," which Newsweek speculates "is likely to add weight to claims that torture is an unnecessary--and ultimately ineffective--means of extracting information from suspects."

Analysis: Police Concerned Administration Is Ignoring Threats Of Far-Right Extremists.

The Washington Post (2/23, Holley, 11.43M) profiles the 2010 killings of West Memphis Police Department officer Brandon Paudert and his partner, Bill Evanswere, calling the shootings "a wake-up call for law enforcement, raising awareness about the threat far-right extremists pose to officers." The Post says "Paudert and other experts in homegrown extremist movements fear that the Trump administration is ignoring that threat as officials shift federal resources to root out Islamic extremism." The article cites reports of Administration "plans to rename 'Countering Violent Extremism' (CVE) – a Department of Homeland Security program that funds local terrorism prevention efforts – to 'Countering Islamic Extremism' or 'Countering Radical Islamic Extremism.'" The Post adds, "Even now, with the sovereign citizen movement classified as a domestic terrorist threat, Paudert said, too many law enforcement agencies across the country remain ignorant about the threat."

Fact Check Analysis: Gorka "Botched Facts" About Former Gitmo Detainee.

An analysis from Fact Check (2/23, Farley, 59K) reports that in a Feb. 22 appearance on "Fox & Friends," deputy assistant to President Trump Sebastian Gorka "botched two facts...about a released Guantanamo Bay detainee responsible for a recent suicide bombing in Iraq." In a discussion about former Gitmo detainee Jamal al-Harith, "who perpetrated a recent suicide bombing in Iraq" for ISIS, Gorka claimed that when President Obama "released lots and lots of people that were there for a very good reason," almost "half the time, they returned to the battlefield." However, "current statistics don't back up Gorka's claim of a re-engagement rate of almost 50%." In addition, while "Gorka suggests that al-Harith was released from Gitmo by Obama," he "was not. Al-Harith was transferred out of Gitmo to Britain on March 9, 2004, under [President George W.] Bush."

Harith Spoke Of Hatred He Felt For American Military At Gitmo. The New York Post (2/23, Moore, 3.82M) reports that after being released from Guantanamo Bay in 2004, the British suicide bomber who recently blew himself up in Iraq told BBC that he hated the US military personnel he encountered. Jamal al-Harith said he "wanted to spit" in the face of an "American soldier" who "was taking off my chains," but "you have to hold yourself inside."

Terror Victims To Receive Compensation Checks From French Bank Settlements.

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Barrett, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports victims of terror attacks against Americans, domestically and overseas, before 2001 will receive compensatory checks in the coming weeks from a $1.1 billion fund generated by settlements between the US government and French banks BNP Paribas SA and Crédit Agricole SA for admitted criminal wrongdoing by evading sanctions. The Journal says this constitutes a novel approach, linking wrongdoing to the issue of terrorism, and advocates hope it will become a model for the compensation of terror victims and their families.

European Welfare Benefits "Accidentally" Fund ISIS Militants.

USA Today (2/23, Hjelmgaard, 5.28M) reports welfare benefits from Denmark, Sweden, Belgium, France, and the UK have "accidentally" funded citizens who used the funds toward ISIS militancy. The Danish labor minister calls the $100,000 spent toward 29 citizens who went to fight in Syria a "huge scandal," and Belgium has reformed its system so that those convicted of terrorism can no longer receive benefits while in jail, preventing future funding of attacks like those in 2015 and 2016 in Brussels and Paris. USA Today reports that radical Islamic cleric Anjem Choudary encouraged UK terrorists to seek "jihadiseeker's allowance."

Benghazi Mood Optimistic As Authorities Near Defeat Of Militants.

According to the Washington Times (2/23, Gaitier, 272K), Benghazi is all but conflict-free, although the fragility of the UN-backed Government of National Accord may lead to a renewal of violence due to opposing Tobruk and Tripoli governments. The Times says citizens move freely with a mood of optimism in the soon-to-be Islamic militant-free city, and it describes artistic expression flourishing and an teenager's aspirations of becoming an aeronautical engineer instead of dying by terror violence like his cousins. Officials warn that though Salafist fundamentalists have helped fight terrorists, they will likely maintain a presence in the city by trying to "control" peoples' "way of thinking."

Pakistani Army's "Reject Disorder" Operation To "Indiscriminately" Target Terrorists.

The Washington Post (2/23, Constable, 11.43M) reports the Pakistani army's nationwide military operation to "indiscriminately" eliminate terrorism is the first time the government "has reluctantly agreed to allow the armed forces to enter Punjab province" with "special powers to hunt down, arrest and shoot suspected militants." The Post says the move comes "after years of appeasing certain Islamist militant groups for political and religious reasons" as Punjab is the "home of a variety of Islamist groups, including mainstream religious parties, sectarian movements officially banned for their violent methods, and anti-India militants who have been accused of a 2008 terrorist siege in Mumbai." According to the Post, army officials indicated the "Reject Disorder" operation includes sending 2,000 rangers into Punjab for the next 60-90 days.

Officials Say Trump's Efforts To Accelerate Fight Against ISIS May Include More Troops.

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Lubold, Nissenbaum, Barnes, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that US officials indicate that President Trump's strategy of accelerating the fight against ISIS will at least initially include more troops. The Journal says Trump will consider a range of options that are anticipated to include sending additional forces to Syria and Iraq, according to officials. The Journal adds that additional steps could include loosening battlefield restrictions, possibly by giving commanders more decision-making power on the use of forces in the field.

Dunford: US Must Address Flow Of ISIS Foreign Fighters.

Joint Chiefs Chairman Gen. Joseph Dunford on Thursday said that "the US and its allies must cut off ISIS terrorists from their pipeline of foreign fighters," according to Fox News' Special Report  (2/23, 1.53M). Dunford was shown saying, "We estimate probably over 100, 120 countries have provided 45,000 foreign fighters to just Syria and Iraq alone." He added that the US is "working in combination with local forces and coalition forces [to] drive the threat down."

Senators Urge Tillerson To Hold Assad Accountable For War Crimes.

The Washington Times (2/23, Howell, 272K) reports a bipartisan group of senators on Thursday called on Secretary of State Tillerson to hold Syrian President Bashar al-Assad and his allies accountable for war crimes, amid reports that 13,000 detainees were executed at a Damascus prison because they opposed the government. The 14 senators, who included Bob Corker and Ben Cardin, condemned the acts referenced in an Amnesty International Report and said that it combined with other reports to provide "sufficient documentation" to "charge Bashar al-Assad with war crimes and crimes against humanity." The Senators also asked Tillerson to explain how the US is working to document crimes against humanity and consider them in negotiations to end the Syrian conflict.

Al Qaeda-Linked Groups Control "Key Swaths" Of Syria's Idlib Province.

The Washington Post (2/23, A1, Sly, Zakaria, 11.43M) reports the Syrian province of Idlib "is falling under the control" of al Qaeda-linked groups "amid a surge of rebel infighting" that could lead to the end of the "moderate rebellion." The Post says the extremists "have closed ranks and turned against the US-backed rebels," placing them "in charge of key swaths of territory" in Idlib. The Post adds that moderates losing Idlib "has the potential to prolong – or at least divert – the trajectory of the war" as peace talks restart.

Turkish-Backed Rebels Seize Syrian Town Of Al-Bab From ISIS.

The Washington Post (2/23, Loveluck, Sly, 11.43M) reports the Turkish-backed Free Syrian Army seized the town of al-Bab from ISIS on Thursday. The capture of the town, the Post says, ends "a grinding offensive" that began in August with the intent of "push[ing] the extremist group from one of its final strongholds." The Post says that "victory in the Islamic State's final stronghold along the Turkish border would deepen Ankara's influence in an area" and allow Turkish-backed forces "to press on toward Raqqa." The AP (2/23, Abdul-Zahra Sinan Salaheddin) reports officials indicated that coalition troops accompanied the Iraqi forces, but "they didn't specify the nationalities" of the international forces.

The Hill: Gorka Made "Angry Phone Call" To Author Of Twitter Criticism.

The Hill (2/23, Beavers, 1.25M) reports White House adviser Sebastian Gorka, according to Newsweek, "made an angry phone call and threatened a lawsuit" over counterterrorism expert Michael Smith's critical tweets about him. The Hill says Newsweek's story includes "a recording of the lengthy phone call" that came after Smith "questioned Gorka's qualifications to be a national security adviser." The Hill says Gorka asked Smith "why this vitriol" was coming from him. Gorka said, "I look at your Twitter feed once or twice a day, and it's half a dozen tweets about me, and I've never even met you." Smith said that Gorka "asserted my tweets about him merited examination by the White House legal counsel."

CRIMINAL INVESTIGATIONS

Police Receive More Than 1,900 Tips In Delphi Murder Investigation.

ABC World News Tonight (2/23, story 7, 1:35, Muir, 14.63M) reported there were "more than 1,900 tips" from authorities' request for information on a recording of a man saying "down the hill," which was found on the cell phone of murder victim Libby German, who was reported missing along with Abby Williams after the girls went on a hike last week in Delphi, Indiana. The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 10, 2:00, Pelley, 11.17M) reported, "Over 100 local, state, and federal agents are working the case." The Indianapolis Star (2/23, Wilkins, 550K) reports similarly.

The AP (2/23) reports FBI SSA Robert Ramsey said "the FBI is using electronic billboards across Indiana to seek information in the killings." Ramsey "said the billboards are displaying photos of the teens, an image of a man considered the main suspect in the killings, and a telephone tip line to enable authorities to spread 'the widest blanket possible' in generating tips." According to the AP, "police said Thursday they've received about 3,900 tips in the killings."

On its website, WIMS-AM South Shore, IN (2/23) quotes FBI Assistant SAC Gregory Massa asking the public for assistance. Massa said, "Just think if you had an interaction with an individual who inexplicably canceled an appointment that you had together. Or an individual called into work sick and canceled a social engagement. At the time, they gave what would have been a plausible explanation. Did [an] individual travel unexpectedly? Did they change their appearance? Did they shave their beard, cut their hair or change the color of their hair? Did they change the way they dress?"

Former USA Gymnastics Coach Pleads Not Guilty In Michigan Criminal Proceedings.

The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 8, 0:20, Pelley, 11.17M) reported former team doctor for USA gymnastics Larry Nassar "pleaded not guilty to 22 criminal counts" relating to allegations of sexual abuse of nine young gymnasts who he treated at his home and medical facilities around Lancing, Michigan. CBS added, "Dozens of former athletes are suing him in civil court."

Man Arrested In 11-Year-Old Investigation Of Georgia Teacher's Disappearance.

The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 9, 0:25, Pelley, 11.17M) reported, "33-year-old Ryan Alexander Duke was arrested and charged with murder after investigators received a tip linking him to a former high school teacher and beauty queen, Tara Grinstead," who "disappeared 11 years ago" in Georgia and whose "remains have never been found." CBS noted, "Duke a student at the school where Grinstead taught."

FBI Arrests 13 In South Carolina Drug And Guns Investigation.

The AP (2/23) reports US Attorney Beth Drake announced "on Thursday that 13 people had been arrested on federal drug and gun charges" in Horry, Florence, and Charleston counties in South Carolina. The FBI and DEA "started investigating a large drug trafficking organization operating in the Myrtle Beach, Florence, and Charleston areas" in 2014, and "authorities say the group distributed heroin, fentanyl, cocaine and marijuana in South Carolina and also trafficked in firearms."

Prosecution Drops Some Charges In Former Utah AG's Public Corruption Case.

The Deseret (UT) News (2/23, Romboy, 362K) outlines Thursday's testimony in the trial over alleged public corruption by former Utah attorney general John Swallow, reporting that "the Salt Lake County District Attorney's Office dismissed three criminal charges against Swallow as it turned the case over to the defense." The article says the FBI provided an "elaborate...forensic accounts chart showing how the money flowed...to Swallow." FBI SA Jon Isakson "acknowledged that he spoke outside the scope of his authority when he talked about the Department of Justice Public Integrity Section's decision to not file federal criminal charges against Swallow and Shurtleff." FBI lawyer Doug Davis said "before the jury came in that Isakson said things he wasn't supposed to, but the Department of Justice wasn't willing to grant a waiver for him or other agents to testify about the declination letter."

Man Admits To Lying To FBI About Healthcare Contract For Alabama Jail.

The AP (2/23, Amy) reports Michael P. Goddard of Alabama admitted in a plea agreement filed Tuesday in federal court "to lying to FBI agents about a health care contract at a county jail in Alabama, signaling that a Mississippi prison bribery probe has spilled across state lines." Goddard admitted "that he received money from Mississippi-based Health Assurance in connection with a contract that the company had from 2007 to 2011 to care for inmates at the Jefferson County Jail in Birmingham." Goddard will "appear on March 16 in federal court in Birmingham."

Dallas County Commissioner's Public Corruption Trial Delayed On Day One.

The Dallas Morning News (2/23, Krause, 1.12M) reports that "after a speedy one-day jury selection, the federal corruption trial of" Dallas County Commissioner "John Wiley Price slowed to a crawl Thursday due to the hospitalization of a juror and the reading of a 107-page indictment. The trial will resume Monday morning." KTVT-TV Dallas (2/23, 72K) reports online that "the trial is expected to be very in-depth, with prosecutors presenting FBI evidence spanning more than a decade." The Dallas Business Journal (2/23, Subscription Publication, 43K) reports similarly.

Purported Whistleblower Says FBI Questioned Her Over Alleged Contracting Misconduct In Atlanta.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/23, Kass, 1.41M) reports former Jackson Equal Business Opportunity Manager Stephanie Coleman and her lawyer said "she was interviewed by the FBI months after she said she was fired by the city for blowing the whistle on contracting misconduct." Coleman "said the FBI also questioned her about Mitzi Bickers, an Atlanta political operative and former city employee who has emerged as a subject of the federal cash-for-contracts investigation in Atlanta that occurred from 2010 to 2015."

FBI Investigates Reported Death Threats Against Muslims By NC Conservative Activists.

The Charlotte (NC) Observer (2/23, Marusakj, 656K) reports spokeswoman Shelley Lynch of the FBI's Charlotte office said Thursday the agency "is investigating reported death threats against Muslims made at a meeting of conservative activists in Kernersville," North Carolina. The FBI said in a statement, "The FBI is aware of news media stories about a recent meeting in North Carolina where comments were reportedly made against the Muslim community. We are working with our local law enforcement partners to determine if a federal violation involving threats of violence that is not speech protected under the First Amendment has occurred. The safety and security of our citizens is a priority for the FBI, and we have been in contact with local community leaders to assure them we take potential threats of violence very seriously." Lynch said "The FBI began investigating the threats before [the Council on American-Islamic Relations] called on the agency to look into the remarks."

The Guardian (UK) (2/23, Green, 4.07M) also covers this story.

FBI Investigates Allegations Former WV Jail Guard Assaulted Detainees.

The AP (2/23) reports, "An indictment unsealed Wednesday charges 26-year-old Adam Joseph Neal Graham, of Elkins, with two counts of violating the detainees' rights" after the former jail guard allegedly assaulted and injured "two suspects who were awaiting trial in 2015 at Tygart Valley Regional Jail in Barbour County," West Virginia. Graham was also charged with "submitting a fake incident report that one of the detainees attempted to spit on him." The AP mentions that the FBI investigated this case.

FBI Finds Virginia Girl Safe After Traveling With Estonian Man.

WJLA-TV Washington (2/23, 147K) reports online that spokespeople from the FBI and the Prince William County Police Department in Virginia indicated 15-year-old Makayla Phyllis Mattei "from Prince William County who was missing and was believed to be in danger has been found safe and unharmed in Virginia with" 21-year-old Meiti Metsla, "a man from Estonia with whom she had an 'online relationship.'" Authorities "said they are making arrangements to reunite the girl with her family in Dumfries." Officials added that Metsla "has been arrested on a felony charge of 'using a communication device to solicit certain offenses involving children.'"

Suspect In Possible Hate Crime In Kansas Charged With Murder.

The AP (2/23, Suhr) reports that on Thursday, Adam Purinton, who is "accused of opening fire in a crowded suburban Kansas City bar, killing one man and injuring two others in an attack that some witnesses said was racially motivated, was charged...with murder and attempted murder." Authorities "declined at a news conference to say whether the shooting was a hate crime although local police said they were working with the FBI to investigate the case." FBI SA Eric Jackson "said it was too early to determine" whether the shooting would be considered a hate crime. Jackson said, "This was a violent crime and we want the best prosecution that relates to this because there are victims of this crime and we want the community to know that...we're looking to make sure that the individual involved in this is held accountable for his actions."

FBI Arrests Man Wanted For 2005 Homicide In California.

The AP (2/23) reports that on Wednesday, the FBI "arrested a man on the top of Santa Rosa's list of most wanted criminals after a 12-year search." The AP explains, "The man was wanted for the Jan. 15, 2005 shooting death of 27-year-old Semere Girmai, of Santa Rosa," California. The killing "was allegedly motivated by a cocaine and methamphetamine distribution feud between the men, who had gang ties."

Feds Charge Alleged Cleveland Bank Robber Who Posed As Twin Brother.

The Cleveland Plain Dealer (2/23, 976K) reports the FBI said Thursday that suspected bank robber Mark Lloyd, who was "arrested at Cleveland City Hall last week while posing as his estranged twin brother was charged in federal court for sticking up two Ohio City banks." The FBI affidavit states that agents "ran his fingerprints and figured out his true identity, and he was arrested." In an interview with FBI agents, "Mark Lloyd admitted to using his brother Michael's ID since 2015, though his brother does not know that and that he has not spoken to his brother in some time." The suspect will appear in court this afternoon.

Report: Jacksonville Psychiatrist Raided By FBI Was Involved In Fatal Love Triangle.

WJAX-TV Jacksonville, FL (2/23, Bourne, 30K) reports online that a day after Wednesday's FBI raid of the office of Jacksonville psychiatrist Dr. Nikhil Nihalani, "an Action News Jax investigation uncovered a love triangle that ended in suicide, reportedly using the doctor's gun." A 2015 St. Johns County Sheriff's Office report said "Nihalani had an affair with his married employee Amanda Carlson," who "told deputies she took a gun from Nihalani's home because he'd been making suicidal threats." Then, "on Oct. 13, 2015, her husband shot and killed himself with that gun."

Sentencing Postponed For Man Convicted Of 1979 Killing Of NYC Boy.

The AP (2/23) reports that on Thursday, a NY judge postponed the sentencing of Pedro Hernandez, who was "convicted in a second trial of killing 6-year-old Etan Patz in 1979." The AP notes, "An earlier trial ended in a hung jury when a single juror did not want to convict." The defense "requested the delay to investigate whether a juror may have known during proceedings that members of the first jury were in the audience."

The New York Daily News (2/23, Jacobs, 4.45M) says Hernandez's attorney Harvey Fishbein had asked for a one-week postponement. The New York Post (2/23, Saul, 3.82M) reports, "Prosecutors filed a letter strongly objecting, saying, 'The Patz family has waited almost 40 years for an answer to one of the most heart-wrenching questions a parent can ever be faced with: What happened to their child who disappeared.'" Hernandez faces life in prison. Newsday (NY) (2/23, Riley, 1.3M) reports similarly.

Police Arrest 24 In Protests Against Video Of Off-Duty Police Officer's Altercation With Teens.

In its lead story, NBC Nightly News  (2/23, lead story, 2:35, Holt, 16.61M) showed clips from two videos by witnesses that show an altercation Wednesday between an off-duty LAPD officer and a 13-year-old, who along with others who joined and watched the conflict walked across his lawn against the officer's wishes. The situation escalated when the officer interpreted the juvenile's threat of a lawsuit as "I'm going to shoot you," and the officer shot a warning shot. According to ABC World News Tonight  (2/23, story 6, 1:45, Muir, 14.63M), the teenager, who was arrested and released with another, said in an interview, "I thought I was going to die right there." Parents have sued the LAPD and Anaheim Police Department because the off-duty officer shot his gun too close to the teenagers. The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Etehad, Mather, 4.52M) reports police arrested 24 for failing to disperse, resisting arrest, and battery of a peace officer Wednesday night following demonstrations by more than 300 people in Anaheim over the videos. The city, which has received many concerned phone calls, has put the officer on administrative leave, and Mayor Tom Tait indicated in a statement that the city "is committed to a full and impartial investigation."

Authorities Arrest Nearly Three Dozen To Clear Out Dakota Access Protest Camp.

The AP (2/23) reports authorities cleared out and raze remaining buildings from the Dakota Access Pipeline protest camp in an operation that took about 3.5 hours. "Nearly three dozen" were arrested, though the CBS Evening News  (2/23, story 11, 0:25, Pelley, 11.17M) puts the tally closer to two dozen. The New York Times (2/23, Smith, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says North Dakota State Highway Patrol Lt. Tom Iverson expressed dismay at having authorities enforce the deadline because it "puts us in harm's way. It puts others in harm's way," though there were no reports of injured parties. The Indigenous Environmental Network Executive Director Tom Goldtooth called the evacuation a "violent and unnecessary infringement" on protesters' constitutional rights. According to the Wall Street Journal (2/23, Connors, Subscription Publication, 6.37M), police in riot gear with weapons drawn entered the federal land on Humvees with a Customs and border Protection helicopter overhead Thursday morning to clear out remaining the camp.

Federal Judge Discloses Five Years' Worth Of Surveillance Requests In Washington.

The Washington Post (2/23, Hsu, 11.43M) reports Beryl A. Howell, chief judge of the US District Court in Washington, has released a list of all requests that US prosecutors made in Washington "to secretly collect certain data about Americans' telephone, email and Internet activity from 2011 to 2016." Of the 1,444 cases, only 15 have been unsealed, "even in part, years after the monitoring began." Still, journalist Jason Leopold who sued to unseal "unseal a much larger collection of information about court-ordered electronic surveillance in closed criminal investigations in the nation's capital," said he was "very pleased" with the release. Leopold and Katie Townsend, litigation director of Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, which has joined the case, said the released information "will aid researchers, lawmakers and the public in tracking the scope, evolution and expansion of government conduct."

Texas Man Sentenced To Life In Prison For Dealing Meth.

The San Angelo (TX) Standard-Times (2/23, 2K) reports that a San Angelo man "convicted of meth dealing was sentenced to life in prison without parole by a federal judge Thursday, Feb. 23."

Richard Jasso, 39, "was charged with one count of distribution and possession with intent to distribute 50 grams or more of methamphetamine and aiding and abetting." Jasso "was convicted at trial in November and has been in custody since his arrest on July 13, 2016, according to a news release from the U.S. Department of Justice." According to the Standard-Times, "the charge was enhanced because Jasso had two previous felony drug offenses." Jasso "was among a dozen people arrested by Drug Enforcement Administration, Texas Department of Public Safety and San Angelo Police Department officers during a July 2016 sweep in San Angelo."

US Charges Third LAX Baggage Handler With Drug Trafficking.

My News LA (CA) (2/23) reports that "a third former baggage handler at Los Angeles International Airport has been arrested and is facing federal charges of using his employee credentials to breach airport security for the purpose of smuggling cocaine on airplanes, it was announced Thursday." Alberto H. Botello, 23, of South Gate, CA "was arrested late Tuesday without incident by law enforcement officers from the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Los Angeles World Airports Police Department, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office." Botello "is charged in a federal indictment with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine and to distribute cocaine, along with two co- defendants who are scheduled for trial next month." My News LA notes that Adrian Ponce, 28, and Alberto Gutierrez, 27, both of South Gate, "were also baggage handlers when they were arrested last April."

US Charges 13 From Missouri, Illinois With Drug Conspiracy.

The AP (2/23) reports from Hannibal, MO that 13 people from Missouri and Illinois "face federal charges for allegedly conspiring to distribute cocaine and other drugs in Hannibal and elsewhere in northeast Missouri." Federal prosecutors in St. Louis announced the arrests on Thursday, "a day after raids were conducted in Hannibal and the St. Louis area." The AP adds that "suspects include six people from Hannibal, four from St. Louis, and one each from Mexico, Missouri, Quincy, Illinois, and Swansea, Illinois." A federal indictment "accuses two men of obtaining cocaine from a source in Austin, Texas, and using couriers, often women, to transport the drug to Hannibal, where it was converted into crack cocaine for distribution."

Deaths Of Two Alaskans Found In SUV Ruled Accidental.

The AP (2/23) reports from Anchorage, AK that "state public safety officials have concluded that the deaths of two people near Soldotna in November were accidental." The bodies of Daniel Duck, 39, and Joni Pearcy, 52, "were found in a burned sport utility vehicle." The pair, from Soldotna, "were last seen Nov. 14 and reported missing Nov. 20." Officials announced on Wednesday "that impairment and the inhalation of carbon monoxide were factors in the deaths." The AP notes that the Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco Firearms and Explosives took part in the investigation.

US Charges Pennsylvania Man With Gun Theft.

The Harrisburg (PA) Patriot-News (2/23, 523K) reports from Williamsport, PA that "a man who had been accused of burglarizing a Lycoming County gun shop hours after he pleaded guilty in an unrelated case has been indicted on federal weapons charges." A federal grand jury on Thursday indicted Samuel Bozochovic, 35, of Williamsport, "on charges of theft of firearms, possession of a stolen firearms and possession of a firearm by a convicted felon," and with "possession with intent to distribute heroin." Bozochovic "is accused of breaking into R&J Welch gun store in the Muncy area on Feb. 8 and stealing 11 handguns."

Fugitive Shot By US Marshals Team In Michigan Expected To Survive.

MLive (MI) (2/23, 878K) reports that "a 31-year-old man wanted on a parole violation was shot during an attempted arrest by the U.S. Marshals Fugitive Task Force in Detroit Tuesday." Michigan State Police Lt. Michael Shaw "said the suspect, who hasn't yet been charged with any crimes, is recovering and expected to survive his injuries." Deputy Robert Watson of the US Marshals Service "told the Detroit News a member of the multi-agency task force shot the suspect after he rammed into a police vehicle about 9 a.m. Tuesday near Tuxedo and Linwood in west Detroit."

Alaska AG: US Cannot Overturn State's Marijuana Law.

The AP (2/23) reports from Anchorage, AK that "a representative for the Alaska attorney general's office said a change in how the federal government enforces its own marijuana laws would not affect state marijuana laws." The AP adds that Alaska's law "legalizing recreational marijuana wouldn't be overturned, Department of Law spokeswoman Cori Mills said Thursday after White House spokesman Sean Spicer suggested during a press briefing that President Donald Trump's administration might crack down on states that have legalized marijuana for recreational use. 'The federal law is one thing and the state has the right to enact laws in this area and those are perfectly constitutional,' Mills said. 'Our law wouldn't be overturned. But there is a different federal law, and how they want to enforce the federal law is up to the federal government. We'll just wait and see what sort of actions they take.'"

DOJ Reaches Settlement With Former Prosecutor Who Alleged Sex Discrimination.

The AP (2/23) reports from Spokane, WA that the Justice Department "will pay $225,000 to settle a sex discrimination lawsuit brought by a former prosecutor who alleged women were not treated equally in the U.S. Attorney's office in Spokane." The settlement, reached on Wednesday, "ends a lawsuit filed in 2015 by Katherine J. Bolton, who previously worked as a federal prosecutor in Spokane." Eastern Washington US Attorney Mike Ormsby "says he cannot comment on any aspect of the case." The AP notes that Bolton "worked for Ormsby," and that "she resigned in October 2015 following a controversy in which both Bolton and her co-workers blamed each other for a hostile work environment."

Two Greek Tanker Engineers Convicted Of Pollution Cover-Up In South Carolina.

The Charleston (SC) Post and Courier (2/23, Wren, 300K) reports that "the chief engineer of a chemical tanker that docked in North Charleston in 2015 has been found guilty in a jury trial of falsifying the ship's oil record book to cover up illegal pollution discharges." Panagiotis Koutoukakis, "a Greek national, faces up to 25 years in prison for two felony charges," and Herbert Julian, "who succeeded Koutoukakis as the ship's chief engineer, was found guilty of an obstruction charge that carries a maximum sentence of five years." The verdict on Wednesday "followed a three-week trial in federal court in Charleston," and "sentencing for both men will be scheduled after the federal government prepares a pre-sentencing report, probably in the next two or three months."

US Charges Washington Jail Guard With Tipping Off Drug Traffickers.

The AP (2/23) reports from Tacoma, WA that "a guard at the Aberdeen city jail has been arrested on allegations that he tipped off drug traffickers about police activities." Charles Andrew Stocker "was due to make an initial appearance in U.S. District Court in Tacoma following his arrest Thursday." Federal prosecutors "have charged him with three criminal counts, including aiding and abetting drug trafficking." According to the AP, "prosecutors say Stocker warned a drug dealer about someone who was working as a police informant, alerted two other dealers that police were listening in on calls at the jail, and agreed to hold money for one of the investigation's targets."

US Charges Florida Man For Role In Jamaican Lottery Scam.

The Jamaica Observer (2/23, 139K) reports that "a 49-year-old Florida man was arrested in Miramar, Florida, on mail and wire fraud charges in connection with the fraudulent lottery scheme tied to Jamaica." The arrest "follows the return of a 12-count indictment against him by a grand jury in the Southern District of Florida." The Justice Department announced on Thursday "that Claude Shaw aka Mac and Claude Mac, a US citizen residing in Florida, was charged with two counts of mail fraud and 10-counts of wire fraud in connection with a fraudulent lottery scheme tied to Jamaica." The indictment alleges that "the victims in the scam were instructed on how, and to whom, to send their money," and that "Shaw discussed plans to receive victims' money via text messages then send a portion to accomplices in Jamaica."

FINANCIAL CRIME & CORPORATE SCANDALS

Michigan Ponzi Schemer Sentenced to Five Years Incarceration.

The Traverse City (MI) Record-Eagle (2/23, Troutman, 84K) reports a US District Court Judge sentenced Michigan woman Sarah Frances Bolhuis to five years in prison for wire fraud and money laundering. The woman was "accused of running a 'Ponzi scheme' that bilked investors out of millions of dollars," and "more than 50 investors lost their savings, abandoned retirement plans and experienced financial stress thanks to Bolhuis, authorities contended." FBI agents said "the scheme lasted from 2006 to 2015."

Former PA Governor's Aide Disbarred After Guilty Plea In FBI Sting.

The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/23, Shaw, 586K) reports Pennsylvania's Supreme Court's disciplinary board said Thursday that "one of former Gov. Ed Rendell's top aides," John H. Estey, "who pleaded guilty last May to one count of wire fraud after being caught up in an FBI sting, has agreed to be disbarred." Court filings indicate "the FBI set up a phony business in 2009 to 'investigate allegations of public corruption in Pennsylvania'" and "the fake firm hired Estey and a top Harrisburg lobbying firm to help it obtain legislation to benefit its business, and made campaign contributions to further its goals." The undercover agents then "gave Estey $20,000 that he promised he would pass along as campaign contributions in his name, circumventing state laws that ban corporate gifts and the use of lobbyists as 'pass-throughs.'"

Former Comverse CEO Sentenced To 30 Months In Options Backdating Case.

Newsday (NY) (2/23, Riley, 1.3M) reports that Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, "the former CEO of Long Island software firm Comverse Technology who fled to Africa to avoid fraud charges, was sentenced Thursday in Brooklyn federal court to 30 months in prison." Alexander, 64, "an Israeli citizen who founded digital voicemail pioneer Comverse in 1982, returned last year to plead guilty to securities fraud after fleeing to Namibia in 2006 to evade prosecution for backdating stock options and trying to bribe an underling to take the fall. 'I really don't understand how someone as brilliant and accomplished and focused and respected as you could be so incredibly, abjectly foolish as to make some of the decisions you made,' said U.S. District Judge Nicholas Garaufis." Newsday adds that Alexander "claimed in a letter to the judge that he fled out of fear of a draconian sentence for a white-collar crime and fought extradition for a decade because he was 'terrified' by seeing his name on a Most Wanted list with Osama bin Laden."

Reuters (2/23) reports that Alexander's attorneys "had sought a prison term of no more than two years for the Israeli citizen, who has spent six months in custody after Garaufis rejected his request for release on a $25 million bond." Reuters notes that Alexander "is likely to be credited for the time he was held." Reuters adds that "the case was one of the last open U.S. prosecutions arising from government or internal investigations of backdating of stock options at over 200 companies, including Comverse, which was acquired in 2013 by former unit Verint Systems Inc."

CBS News (2/23, 4.4M) reports that in 2006, federal prosecutors "charged Alexander and other Comverse executives with a scheme to manipulate stock options." CBS adds that "the options' grant dates were allegedly falsified to coincide with a low point in the stock's value, thereby boosting the value of the stock option." Alexander "turned up in Namibia after having transferred tens of millions of dollars overseas," and "he lived comfortably there until last year, when he gave up an extradition fight and agreed to plead guilty in the U.S."

Bloomberg News (2/23, Hurtado, 2.41M) reports that "Alexander's decision to flee exacerbated the case and warranted imposing a prison term longer than the 24-month sentence, which to date had been the longest imposed for options backdating, the judge said. 'Corporate executives must know if they commit this type of crime, they will be punished swiftly and appropriately,' Garaufis said. 'They must know they cannot flee the jurisdiction to escape the criminal process, to buy a new life and evade the law.'" The New York Daily News (2/23, Moynihan, 4.45M) and the Wall Street Journal (2/23, Orden, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) also report.

Florida Man Pleads Guilty In Attempted Hack Of Clinton Foundation.

Reuters (2/23, Raymond, Layne) reports that a Florida man pleaded guilty on Thursday "pleaded guilty in a case stemming from an attempted hacking of the Clinton Foundation," months after he was sentenced to 42 years in prison "in the wake of child pornography discovered on his computers during the probe." Timothy Sedlak, 43, pleaded guilty in a Manhattan federal court "to attempting to access protected computers without authorization," and federal prosecutors "accused him of trying to gain access to an unnamed New York-based charitable organization's network." In a court filing obtained by Reuters "that summarized a US Secret Service interview in 2015 with Sedlak, an agent said he was questioned about notes they found referencing former Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton and her daughter, Chelsea Clinton."

Cellebrite Announces Ability To Crack Apple Devices Running iOS.

The International Business Times (2/23, Dellinger, 814K) reports that on Thursday, Israel-based cybersecurity firm Cellebrite announced "it has added the capability to crack a number of locked Apple devices running iOS, including the iPhone 6 and iPhone 6 Plus." Cellebrite's Director of Forensics Research Shahar Tal "suggested Cellebrite has had the ability to crack iPhones for some time but was just announcing it publicly now." The IBT mentions that "it is believed that Cellebrite is the company the United States FBI tapped to help unlock the iPhone 5C that belonged to one of the killers involved in the San Bernardino, Calif. shooting in December 2015."

Nevada Public Safety Director Argues For Creation Of Cyber Defense Office.

Nevada Appeal (2/23, Dornan, 86K) reports that on Thursday, Nevada Public Safety Director Jim Wright argued for the "creation of a Cyber Defense Office that would bring together not only public safety agencies but other agency efforts in the war against hacking." According to Wright, "the office would treat cyber attacks in much the same way the Department of Public Services currently treats terrorism, natural disasters and other emergencies." He added that "the office would be located within" the Department of Public Safety, partly because it "has access to the FBI and national criminal information data." Wright said, "Most of these attacks have a criminal background so it's a natural fit for us."

Cyber Experts Warn That "Global Action Must Be Taken" On Cybersecurity Issues.

McClatchy (2/23, 74K) reports that "alarms over the state of the internet appear with greater frequency" due to malware, data theft, and digital weapons wielded by nation-states. McClatchy says, "Once a platform for enlightenment, the internet flirts with a dark age, industry leaders warn, and global action must be taken." McClatchy goes on to discuss Microsoft President Brad Smith's proposal for a "Digital Geneva Convention, an international agreement to protect civilians from the destructive uses by states of the digital sphere," adding, "Whether an international treaty or convention could slow the destructive currents that make the internet increasingly hazardous is subject of intense debate." Former cybersecurity czar J. Michael Daniel "said he worries that some authoritarian nations would distort such an accord" to control content, and "a better first step...would be further agreements of the sort that Obama reached with China's President Xi Jinping...which barred purely commercial hacking between the two nations, but not digital espionage."

Senator Calls For "Retro Approach" To Protecting Power Grid.

McClatchy (2/23, Hotakainen, 74K) reports, "Idaho Republican Sen. Jim Risch says it's time for a retro approach to protect the nation's power grid, relying more on humans and less on sophisticated technology as a way to thwart hackers." Risch "said the U.S. should heed the lesson of the 2015 cyberattack on Ukraine's power grid," namely that more damage was prevented because hackers couldn't gain physical access to all of the power grids' controls as some were manually operated. Risch and fellow Senate intelligence committee member Angus King "want Congress to pass a $10 million bill that would create a two-year pilot program to investigate more low-tech approaches that might frustrate hackers."

Google Cracks SHA-1 Cryptographic Algorithm.

Forbes (2/23, 15.17M) reports that Google "cracked an old cryptographic algorithm called SHA-1," a "significant" occurrence "because SHA-1 has been in use across the web for some time, largely to check the authenticity of digital artefacts flying around the internet." Forbes says Google had SHA-1 create the same hash for two different files, something that "shouldn't be possible." Forbes goes on to explain that the "second file" could be malware or a forgery. Nonetheless, Forbes says, "For some time now, major web companies have downgraded SHA-1 and won't use it to carry out those verification processes." Google "thinks its research should get all companies still using the algorithm to move away from SHA-1, which has long been deemed vulnerable."

Report: Majority Of Hackers Claim To Be Able To Break Cyberdefenses Within Hours.

ZDNet (2/23, 151K) reports, "The majority of hackers claim they can break through cybersecurity defenses and infiltrate their target's systems within hours, according to new research." A report from Nuix Black "says that more than three-quarters of hackers – 88 percent in total – who responded to the Nuix survey believe most network defenses can be breached within 12 hours." Furthermore, "roughly a third said that their activities were never noticed by their victims – and 17 percent of hackers claimed it would take them no longer than two hours to breach a target."

Bitcoin Hits "All-Time High."

According to USA Today (2/23, Weise, 5.28M), bitcoin "hit an all-time high of $1,163.59" on Thursday. USA Today reports on a "couple of factors" that "seem to be pushing the digital currency upwards," including the confirmation of Mike Mulvaney, "a long-time supporter of bitcoin," as OMB director. Furthermore, "There's also anticipation that the Securities and Exchange Commission will allow the first of three exchange-traded funds to launch."

UK National Arrested In Connection With Deutsche Telekom Cyberattack.

Yahoo! Tech (2/23, 1K) reports, "A 29-year old Brit has been arrested in connection with a cyber-attack that affected nearly a million Deutsche Telekom customers back in November." The suspect was arrested "at one of London's airports on Wednesday."

Coast Guard Admiral: Cyberwarfare Rules Of Engagement Poorly Defined.

Business Insider (2/23, 3.42M) reports, "Coast Guard Vice Adm. Marshall Lytle gave the perfect analogy that demonstrates how unique, and difficult it can be, for the US military to operate in the cyber realm." Lytle is quoted saying at the AFCEA West 2017 conference, "Cyberwarfare is like a soccer game with all the fans on the field with you and no one is wearing uniforms." BI adds, "Lytle's remark highlights the 'wild west' nature of the cyberwarfare," and "as Lytle explained, cyberwarfare doesn't have clear battle lines."

House Intelligence Staff Director: 2017 To Be A "Banner Year" For Congressional Cybersecurity Debates.

CyberScoop (2/23) reports House Intelligence Committee staff director Michael Bahar says, "It will be a banner year for cybersecurity debates in Congress – and that isn't necessarily a good thing." According to CyberScoop, "retrospective" efforts to investigate alleged Russian influence on the 2016 US election "are just a portion of the task ahead for lawmakers who handle cybersecurity issues." Bahar is quoted saying in a panel discussion, "For far too many industries, we are in a pre-Enron phase. If you think about Enron, what led to that was board members and senior executives at companies saying it looks fine and if it's an accounting issue, then take it to accounting. And I think that's where we are in many industries for cyber. ... And what I think that means is that a lot of it will be driven by what the courts do. And how Congress will respond to that."

Russian Hacking Group APT 28 Profiled.

The Financial Times (2/23, Jones, Subscription Publication, 1.39M) profiles the Russian hacking group APT 28, which western officials believe is connected to the country's military intelligence arm. Analysts said the group hacked the DNC and released information to undermine the US democratic system.

Continuing Coverage: States Oppose Critical Infrastructure Designation For Elections Systems.

In continuing coverage, eWeek (2/23, 668K) reports the National Association of Secretaries of State "adopted a resolution opposing the 'critical infrastructure' designation by the U.S. Department of Homeland Security." Their reasoning "was partly due to concerns of overreaching by the federal government and because the agency had refused to provide adequate information on the impact that the designation would have on the states, according to Kay Stimson, spokeswoman for the National Association of Secretaries of State (NASS)."

Hacked Texts Suggest Manafort Faced Blackmail Attempt From Ukrainian Official.

Politico (2/23, Vogel, Stern, Meyer, 2.46M) reports "undated communications, which are allegedly from the iPhone of" political consultant Paul Manafort's daughter suggest that Manafort "was the victim of a blackmail attempt while he was serving as Donald Trump's presidential campaign chairman last summer." One text "appears to come from a Ukrainian parliamentarian named Serhiy Leshchenko," in which he attaches "a note to Paul Manafort referring to 'bulletproof' evidence related to Manafort's financial arrangement with Ukraine's former president, the pro-Russian strongman Viktor Yanukovych, as well as an alleged 2012 meeting between Trump and a close Yanukovych associate named Serhiy Tulub." Leshchenko disavowed the texts in question and "Manafort denied brokering a 2012 meeting between Trump and Tulub and also point[e]d out that he wasn't working for Trump at the time." However, Manafort confirmed the authenticity of the texts as coming from his daughter's phone, saying he contacted a lawyer at the time they were received.

The Hill (2/23, Savransky, 1.25M) and Vanity Fair (2/22, Tracy, 6.22M) also cover Politico's report.

De Blasio To Meet With Prosecutors, FBI Friday.

The New York Times (2/23, Rashbaum, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports the "expansive criminal inquiry" on Mayor Bill de Blasio's 2013 campaign trading beneficial city action for donations "is most likely in its final stages" as the mayor is set to meet with FBI agents and federal prosecutors Friday to discuss more than a dozen topics in a session estimated to last four hours. The inquiry will focus on businessman and rabbi Moishe Indig, Harendara Singh, Gina Argento, and other donors under scrutiny. De Blasio spokesman Eric Phillips emphasized in a Thursday statement, "We are absolutely confident that the mayor and our City Hall staff have acted appropriately and well within the law at all times."

Local Leaders Comment On Possible Plans For FBI Expansion At Redstone Arsenal.

A 1,200-word report by Alabama Live (2/23, Gattis, 804K) says the FBI "is considering bringing hundreds, if not thousands, of jobs to Redstone Arsenal in what could possibly be a landmark economic development for Huntsville." Although "the plan exists on paper...it's not clear how close it is to becoming a reality or if the plan, conceived during the Obama administration, will change under President Trump. But some construction is already under way on Redstone." Huntsville/Madison County Chamber of Commerce Senior VP Mike Ward said, "I think the master plan that the FBI discussed at the Redstone Update is still notional and it remains so until the plan is funde[d]. Some parts of the plan have been funded and are being executed. We're hopeful that we will be able to advance this plan to make it a reality." US Rep. Mo Brooks (R-AL) "said he has heard many different estimates on potential jobs that could be associated with the FBI's growth in his hometown." The article notes, "FBI Director James Comey, in a visit to Redstone last year to formally open" the Terrorist Explosive Devices Analytical Center (TEDAC), "described Huntsville as a possible new 'center of gravity' for the bureau."

On its website, WAAY-TV Huntsville, AL (2/23, Martin, 2K) similarly quotes Ward's comments on the possible FBI expansion in Huntsville.

FBI Director's Community Leadership Award Honors North Dakota Children's Advocacy Center.

KXMC-TV Minot, ND (2/23, 1K) reports online that the FBI Director's Community Leadership Award was presented to Shannon Hilfer and Jessica Ahmann of the Sanford Health community in North Dakota, who were honored for going "above and beyond" in their work with child abuse victims. Ahmann said, "The recognition just really shows that we do make a difference to these kids, and that's truly, like Shannon said, what it's all about. It's helping them get through this tough time."

DOJ Reverses Obama Order Phasing Out Private Contractors To Run Prisons.

Reuters (2/23, Beech) and the New York Times (2/23, Lichtblau, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) report the Justice Department has reversed an Obama Administration order that called for the phasing out of using private contractors to run federal prisons. Reuters says that Attorney General Sessions wrote in a memo made public Thursday that former President Obama's policy harmed the government's ability to meet possible needs of the prison system. Sessions said, according to Bloomberg News (2/23, Strohm, 2.41M), "The memorandum changed long-standing policy and practice, and impaired the Bureau's ability to meet the future needs of the federal correctional system." Politico (2/23, Ocasio, 2.46M) reports a Justice Department spokesman indicated that the new memo provides the Federal Bureau Of Prisons with more flexibility. The spokesman said in a statement, "This will restore BOP's flexibility to manage the federal prison inmate population based on capacity needs."

The Washington Post (2/23, Zapotosky, 11.43M) says that while the change is "a significant policy shift" from the Obama Administration, "the practical impact might be somewhat muted." The Post indicates that "most inmates are housed in state prisons, rather than federal ones" and the Obama Administration's decision to no longer use private facilities "only affected 13,000 prisons" that "hous[ed] a little more than 22,000 inmates." The Post adds that the original order "also did not apply to Immigration and Customs Enforcement and US Marshals Service detainees."

Media: Private Prison Sector Supported Trump During Election. Eamon Javers said on CNBC's Closing Bell (2/23, 142K) that the private prison sector has been "very close" to Trump and "saw something they very much liked in Donald Trump's administration." USA Today (2/23, Schouten, 5.28M) reports private prison companies "have contributed big sums to pro-Trump groups" and now "stand to make big gains under President Trump's new immigration orders." USA Today says private prison companies "see the potential for significant growth" with Trump and some GOP lawmakers "pushing to toughen penalties for undocumented immigrants who are deported and then re-enter the country illegally." USA Today highlights that GEO Group donated $250,000 to support Trump's inauguration and a subsidiary of the company gave $225,000 to a super PAC that spent about $22 million to help Trump. CoreCivic provided $250,000 to support Trump's inauguration.

White House Says DOJ Will Crack Down On Recreational Marijuana.

The Washington Times (2/23, Boyer, 272K) reports White House press secretary Sean Spicer indicated Thursday that the Justice Department will increase enforcement of the federal ban on the recreational use of marijuana, and he "compared recreational marijuana loosely with the opioid epidemic." According to McClatchy (2/23, Kumar, Hotakainen, 74K), a 2014 John Hopkins School of Public Health report shows "there's little evidence to connect marijuana to opioid addiction." Washington Gov. Jay Inslee vowed to defend his voters' pro-pot preferences earlier this month, and Nevada Senate Majority Leader Aaron Ford called on the state's attorney general to "vigorously defend" its laws.

The AP (2/23, Gurman) says Spicer's announcement is "a departure from the Trump administration's statements in favor of states' rights." According to the Los Angeles Times (2/23, Halper, McGreevy, 4.52M), the Administration's options for enforcement could range from "largely symbolic gestures" to "filing injunctions seeking to nullify state legalization laws." The Washington Post (2/23, Wagner, Zapotosky, 11.43M) reports pro-cannabis organization and industry leaders' concern with Spicer's statement, with one noting, "Many of the states who helped elect President Trump just voted to also support recreational marijuana."

Media: Trump Calls Deportations "A Military Operation"; Kelly Quickly "Contradicts" Him.

President Trump's comment at a White House meeting of business executives that under his immigration policy, "we're getting really bad dudes out of this country at a rate that nobody's ever seen before" in "a military operation" draws considerable critical media attention, with every major story on the comment stating that DHS Secretary Kelly quickly followed by saying that no military force is being used. While the White House said the President was using the term figuratively, several sources use the contradiction between Trump and Kelly to highlight the difficulties the Administration has had with immigration policy.

ABC World News Tonight (2/23, lead story, 3:40, Muir, 14.63M) reported that the President called his "immigration crackdown...'a military operation' at the border." But "his own Homeland Security secretary had very different words about the operation." ABC's Matt Gutman: "At the White House today, President Trump declaring his new immigration crackdown" a success. Trump: "We're getting really bad dudes out of this country, and at a rate that nobody's ever seen before, and they are the bad ones, and it's a military operation." Gutman: "A military operation? Not according to Homeland Security Secretary John Kelly." Kelly: "No. Repeat, no use of military force in immigration operations. None." The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 2, 1:00, Pelley, 11.17M) said "there was some confusion today on immigration." CBS' Margaret Brennan: "The White House later tried to clarify, saying the President meant 'military operation' as an adjective to describe what they say is an efficient rate of deportation."

NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 4, 1:35, Alexander, 16.61M) reported that Trump was "contradicted quickly" by Kelly, who is in Mexico with Secretary of State Tillerson. USA Today (2/23, Agren, 5.28M) reports that Kelly "addressed an anxious audience of Mexican migrants living in the USA and Mexican officials preparing to receive an influx of deportees." Kelly said, "Everything that we do will be done in a legal way and with respect for human rights and the US justice system." The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Schwartz, Whelan, De Córdoba, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that Kelly also said there would be "no mass deportations." The AP (2/23, Lederman) reports that while Kelly and Tillerson "tried to alleviate Mexico's concerns, Trump was fanning them further," offering "an altogether different message from Kelly and Tillerson, who traveled here to meet with top Mexican officials at a time of intense turbulence for US-Mexico relations."

The Washington Post (2/23, Rucker, 11.43M) says the President "celebrated what he called 'a military operation' to round up and deport undocumented immigrants who have committed crimes or caused violence." The Post says the phrasing "could raise eyebrows among immigrant rights advocates and even within" DHS. The Post says "a leaked DHS proposal last week to deploy Army National Guard troops to help apprehend undocumented immigrants was quickly denied by DHS leadership and the White House as being under consideration."

The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Memoli, 4.52M) writes that while Trump "speaks in terms of unadulterated success" on immigration policy, "few others in the administration go so far," and "a muddled picture has emerged on where the Trump administration is headed. Thursday offered a clear example of the problems that arise when Trump and his top aides send different messages." The Hill (2/23, Fabian, 1.25M) reports that White House press secretary Sean Spicer said Trump "wasn't speaking literally." Spicer said, "The President was using that as an adjective. It is happening with precision."

The New York Times (2/23, A1, Ahmed, Harris, Nixon, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) writes that Trump "has a penchant for dropping unwelcome surprises during visits between the United States and Mexico. Last month, on the first day of a trip to Washington by Mexico's foreign minister, Mr. Trump signed an executive order to build a wall between the two countries," and earlier this week, just before the trip by the two secretaries, the Administration "released policies that vastly expanded the potential for deportation of undocumented immigrants." The Washington Post (2/23, Olivo, 11.43M) says "the visit by Tillerson and Kelly comes a month after a heated volley of tweets between President Trump and Mexico's president, Enrique Peña Nieto, over who should pay for a wall on the southern US border prompted Peña Nieto to cancel a White House visit."

The Washington Times (2/23, Boyer, 272K) says Trump "praised" DHS efforts "to arrest and deport more illegal immigrants Thursday, calling it 'a military operation' that is getting 'really bad dudes' out of the US." The New York Post (2/23, Halper, 3.82M) also reports that Trump "likened the removal of illegal immigrants in the US to a 'military operation.'" Politico (2/23, Nussbaum, 2.46M) says "the comment was surprising given that ICE and the border patrol are civilian, not military, organizations." Business Insider (2/23, Woody, 3.42M) says the comments "appear to contradict some White House efforts to downplay the scope and scale of his deportation plans."

The TIME (2/23, Beckwith, 6.98M) and Vanity Fair (2/22, Nguyen, 6.22M) websites also highlight the President's use of the term "military operation," while the Washington Times (2/23, Dinan, 272K) and Politico (2/23, McCaskill, 2.46M) have brief items focused on Kelly's remarks.

CBS Fact-Checks Trump's Deportation "Boasting." The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 3, 0:40, Pelley, 11.17M) reported, "The President's boasting go the better of him today. He said the US is deporting drug dealers and gang members 'for the first time.' And as you heard, he said they're being deported at a rate nobody has ever seen before. For the record, our research department spoke to an official at the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency. In January of last year, there were 17,649 deportations. Last month, it was one thousand fewer. And last year, 58 percent had been convicted of serious crimes, such as drug dealing."

The Intercept (2/23, Devereaux) headlines a report "Donald Trump Plans To Bypass The Courts To Deport As Many People As Possible." Tennessee-based immigration attorney Greg Siskind said, "I see now what the plan is. Their plan is basically to have everybody thrown out of the country without ever going to court."

Newsweek Analysis: Trump's Deportation Policies Could Cost "Billions." Newsweek (2/23, Cadei, 862K) under the headline "Trump's Deportation Plans Would Cost Billions" that Trump's "plans to dramatically increase deportations are causing panic in immigrant communities across the country" and are also "likely to add billions of dollars to the tab for Trump's immigration crackdown, on top of the $21 billion that DHS officials have estimated it could cost to build the president's desired wall on the border with Mexico." Last year, Ben Gitis of the "center-right" American Action Forum estimated that it would cost $400 billion to $600 billion to deport all of those in the US illegally within two years. While Trump has not called for that, Newsweek says the additional staffing needs for increased enforcement could cost more than $1.5 billion.

Trump Tweets "Chicago Needs Help" After Seven Homicides On Wednesday.

The Chicago Sun-Times (2/23, Charles, 798K) reports seven homicides occurred in Chicago Wednesday, making it "the deadliest day of 2017 so far," and President Trump responded in a tweet that the situation is "totally out of control. Chicago needs help!" Six people were shot on the South Side and one was killed in Little Village. Among those killed were a young pregnant woman and a sexagenarian. Five of the shootings occurred in a two-hour span. According to the Chicago Tribune (2/23, Williams-Harris, Crepeau, Malagon, 2.54M), at least 495 people have been shot in Chicago so far this year, 60 more people than were shot over the same period a year ago. The Tribune provides details of the seven homicides Wednesday and notes that the West Side experienced the most violence last year. ABC World News Tonight (2/23, story 8, 0:15, Muir, 14.63M) also briefly reported on the story.

Administration Reportedly Broadens Search For Fed Vice Chair For Bank Oversight.

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Tracy, Ackerman, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that people familiar with the matter indicated the Administration has widened its search for the next Fed Vice Chair in charge of bank oversight. The Journal says the Administration is still considering David Nason, an executive in General Electric's financing arm, and met with US Bancorp chief executive Richard Davis and Harvard Law School professor Hal Scott.

CNN: IC Concerned White House Wants Report Tailored To Justify Immigration Order.

Anderson Cooper said on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360  (2/23, 686K) that as the White House works "to provide a factual basis" for Trump's immigration order, there is "pushback of some in the intelligence community who have been given the job of evaluating the evidence information and who are worried that they're being asked to tailor the facts to fit a preordained conclusion." Jake Tapper added that "sources" told CNN's Pamela Brown "that there are those within the Department of Homeland Security who have concerns that intelligence at the department might be becoming politicized." A New York Times (2/23, Qiu, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) analysis examines "some of the more misleading claims Mr. Trump and his administration have made about the first iteration of the travel ban."

Also on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360  (2/23, 686K), Tapper cited a "senior White House official" who said that "the Department of Homeland Security and the Justice Department, quote, 'are working on an intelligence report that will demonstrate that the security threat for these seven countries [covered by President Trump's immigration order] is substantial, and that these seven countries have all been exporters of terrorism into the United States.'" However, "sources tell the CNN" that DHS' Office of Intelligence and Analysis "filed a report that disagrees with the view that blocking immigration from the seven countries strategically make nice sense. Some DHS officials have said they do not think nationality is the best indicator of potential terrorism." Tapper added that when it was asked about the matter, DHS "essentially disparage[d] its own intelligence division's report saying, quote, the Ina report does not include data from other intelligence community sources. It is incomplete."

Rep. Dan Donovan said on CNN's The Lead  (2/23, 320K) that the Administration "looked at the decision by the Ninth Circuit" and is "taking into account where the failures were in the first roll out of the first executive order and trying to make sure that they do the next executive order within the constitutional boundaries."

Illinois, Connecticut Officials Push Back On Trump's Immigration Enforcement Plans.

The Chicago Sun-Times (2/23, Grimm, 798K) reports that President Trump is "not going to get much help from Illinois" with his "ambitious plans to step up immigration enforcement and arrest and deport undocumented people at a record pace." Cook County Sheriff Tom Dart "said he had 'no interest' in devoting his deputies' time to arresting undocumented county residents, and Mayor Rahm Emanuel has consistently said Chicago will remain a 'sanctuary city.'" Meanwhile, state Attorney General Lisa Madigan "said her office is looking into ways to offer legal backup to smaller towns that want to continue their resistance to immigration laws," and Gov. Bruce Rauner "said he had no plans to deputize the Illinois State Police to enforce immigration laws."

The Washington Times (2/23, Ernst, 272K) says a memo to Chicago Public Schools principals from Chicago Chief Education Officer Janice Jackson "positioned CPS as a roadblock to ICE's mission to enforce federal laws governing border control, customs, trade and immigration." The memo, which was issued Tuesday, reads, "To be very clear, CPS does not provide assistance to US Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) in the enforcement of federal civil immigration law. ... Therefore, ICE should not be permitted access to CPS facilities or personnel except in the rare instance in which we are provided with a criminal warrant."

Connecticut Gov. Dannel Malloy was asked on Fox News Tucker Carlson Tonight  (2/23) about his order to state law enforcement not to enforce federal immigration law. Malloy said, "There are federal laws that the federal authorities should enforce and there are state laws that the state authorities should enforce. We want the bad guys off the street, we want bad guys sent home. That's not the disagreement. The disagreement is the President can't order us to do federal work. Quite frankly, the federal government should do its own job and get it done. We are not standing in the way of that happening."

Clarke: Charge Sanctuary City Officials With Harboring Aliens. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (2/23, Glauber, 513K) reports that during a panel discussion at the Conservative Political Action Caucus Thursday, Milwaukee County Sheriff David A. Clarke Jr. said "he has a way to put a stop to sanctuary cities – use a federal statute to charge local officials for harboring aliens." Said Clarke, "I'm telling you right now folks, you charge one mayor, one governor, one council president that adopts these laws, this stuff is going to end right away." Clarke argued that sanctuary cities "provide cover" for "criminal illegal aliens to continue to prey on not only law-abiding people but also illegal immigrants in this country."

Taub, Fisher: Proposed Deportation Rules Risk Creating "Fragmented" Society. In the New York Times (2/23, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), Amanda Taub and Max Fisher say the Administration's proposed deportation rules "risk creating an American underclass with parallels to others around the world," such as "slum residents in India, guest workers in oil-rich Persian Gulf states and internal migrant workers in China." The groups, Taub and Fisher say, "provide a cautionary tale for what could happen" if illegal immigrants "are forced deep into the shadows." The authors say that the undocumented immigrants are "stuck in a gray zone outside the legal system," making them "vulnerable to exploitation, including wage theft and sex trafficking." Taub and Fisher say the end result could be "a fragmented" society, rather than the "cohesive society" that the Administration seeks.

Deportation Plan Dominates US Officials' Visit To Mexico.

Bloomberg Politics (2/23, Cattan, 201K) reports Secretary of State Tillerson and DHS Secretary Kelly "wanted to focus on a range of bilateral issues, including trade, in a meeting with their Mexican counterparts" on Thursday in Mexico City, but instead "immigration concerns dominated" the meeting. In its lead story, ABC World News Tonight  (2/23, lead story, 3:40, Muir, 14.63M) reported Tillerson and Kelly arrived in Mexico at a time when that country is "furious with the Administration's new plan to deport some undocumented immigrants to Mexico, even if they are not Mexican." On CNN's Situation Room  (2/23, 554K), Elise Labott said "the Mexicans do seem to be caught off guard. Normally, you have the White House rolling out a policy several days before the visit. There is time for dust to clear and the aides to set the meetings." Nevertheless, Tillerson "called the talks productive."

NBC Nightly News  (2/23, story 4, 1:35, Alexander, 16.61M) reported that prior to their arrival, demonstrators set fire to a fake wall, and "many were demanding that the Mexican president refuse to meet with" the two US officials. Tillerson tried "to translate [Trump's] tough talk into diplomacy," saying, "Two strong sovereign countries from time to time will have differences."

Reuters (2/23, Alper, Torres) reports Mexican officials expressed "worry and irritation" about Trump's policies during talks with Tillerson and Kelly, "giving a chilly reply to the new administration's hard line on immigration, trade and security." Foreign Minister Luis Videgaray told reporters, "There exists among Mexicans worry and irritation about what are perceived to be policies that could be harmful for the national interest and for Mexicans here and abroad." The Washington Times (2/23, Dinan, 272K) says Mexican officials "scolded their American counterparts," using the meeting to "register their displeasure and demand that the US not increase the number of people deported to Mexico." The New York Post (2/23, Moore, 3.82M) says Videgaray also expressed "concerns" about "the rights of Mexicans living in the US."

According to the Los Angeles Times (2/23, McDonnell, 4.52M), Videgaray told lawmakers "in private comments" on Wednesday that Mexico is preparing for a long "battle" with the Trump Administration, and is "prepared to retaliate with new tariffs if necessary." He is quoted as saying, "We are here preparing for a battle that is going to be long. This is not going to be resolved in three days."

In his "Talking Points Memo" segment on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor  (2/23, 767K), Bill O'Reilly said, "It's entirely Mexico's fault that millions of their own citizens feel they have to come here to earn a decent living. ... Mexico should take full responsibility for its inability to provide a decent economy for its own people and for failing to defeat the vicious drug peddling monsters. But they never will."

DeVos: Obama's Transgender Bathroom Guidance Was An "Overreach."

A day after the Trump Administration rescinded the Obama Administration transgender bathroom guidance, Education Secretary DeVos on Thursday told the Conservative Political Action Conference that the previous Administration's rules were "an overreach," USA Today (2/23, Estepa, 5.28M) reports. DeVos said, according to the Washington Times (2/23, Sherfinski, 272K), "Let me just say that this issue was a very huge example of the Obama administration's overreach to suggest a one-size-fits-all federal government approach, top-down approach to issues that are best dealt with and solved [at] a personal level and a local level."

The New York Times (2/23, Pérez-Peña, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that before the decision was announced, DeVos "met with a representative of gay and transgender employees at the Education Department to warn of what was coming." While an aide "assured the employee that, as was widely reported, Ms. DeVos had resisted the move, according to people briefed on the Wednesday meeting," DeVos "gave no public sign that there had been a rift within the Trump administration, or that she had come up short." However, "people who have known and watched Ms. DeVos through the years...warn against thinking that she will be a meek team player." In her home state of Michigan, DeVos "earned a reputation as a driven, relentless and effective political fighter, using her family's vast fortune to reward allies and punish foes, and working behind the scenes to pass legislation and unseat lawmakers who opposed her."

ABC World News Tonight  (2/23, story 4, 0:40, Muir, 14.63M) reported that White House press secretary Sean Spicer said Thursday that "it's not a matter for the federal government to decide." Spicer: "I think it's not a question of whether it's a civil right, it's where it's appropriately addressed. And as I noted, it's appropriately addressed at the state level." The Washington Post (2/23, Brown, Balingit, 11.43M) says that in the wake of the Administration rescinding the guidance, "school officials from New York to Washington to Tulsa, Okla., moved quickly this week to assure their communities that they would continue to allow students to use bathrooms aligned with their gender identity." Meanwhile, other districts never complied with the guidelines and do not intend to do so now. The result is "a patchwork of policies on transgender student accommodations that varies widely across the country."

The Washington Times (2/23, Richardson, 272K) reports that in an indication of "how states might proceed" now that Trump has rescinded the order, the National Conference of State Legislatures says lawmakers in 12 states "are considering bills that would require transgender people to use bathroom and locker room facilities based on their 'biological sex' or birth gender." Matt Sharp, legal counsel for the Alliance Defending Freedom, said, "I think [the repeal is] going to give states the motivation to start considering laws creating a baseline of privacy for all students...and really bring this issue back to where it belongs, which is in the states and local schools that know their students best." In that same vein, the Los Angeles Times (2/23, Lee, 4.52M) says the Administration's step "has buoyed the hopes of supporters of so-called bathroom bills, but they still face opposition in many states, even conservative ones."

The Administration move is prompting criticism from several fronts. Bloomberg News (2/23, Hagan, 2.41M) says it has "provoked one more outcry from Silicon Valley." Tech firms including Apple, Facebook and Microsoft "released statements and tweets following the administration's announcement."

In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M), former Education Secretary Arne Duncan and former Assistant Education Secretary Catherine Lhamon write that the Administration decision "reflects a fundamental misunderstanding of the federal role in protecting the civil rights of students," confuses "states and school districts, and puts real, live children at greater risk of harm." They add that while the federal government "rightly defers to states and school districts" on "issues such as standards and curriculum," when "it comes to protecting students, the law is clear: Civil rights are paramount."

In an editorial, the New York Times (2/23, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) cites Trump's campaign promise "to protect lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender Americans from violence and oppression," and says it is not surprising he has sided with Attorney General Sessions on rescinding the transgender bathroom guidance, because "has demonstrated time and again that his stated personal convictions are malleable." A Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) editorial also criticizes the decision, saying that while Trump once "seemed able to see through this hysteria, expressing support for the rights of transgender people to 'use the bathroom that they feel is appropriate' and saying Caitlyn Jenner was welcome to use whatever bathroom at Trump Tower she wanted," his endorsement of "the rollback of protections will inflict needless suffering on transgender students, a vulnerable population already subjected to harassment and bullying."

Decision Will Impact Supreme Court Case. USA Today (2/23, Wolf, 5.28M) reports that the Administration decision "could remove the controversial issue from the Supreme Court's docket this spring – or lead the justices to render an even more significant ruling." Next month, the Court is sent to hear Virginia high school student's legal fight to use the bathroom of his choice. However, a Federal appeals court in Richmond relied on the guidance last year "in ruling that Gavin Grimm should be permitted to use the boys' bathroom at his Gloucester County school, and the school district promptly appealed to the Supreme Court." The removal of that policy means the High Court can "vacate that decision and send the case back, or decide on their own which bathrooms are suitable under a 1972 federal law prohibiting sex discrimination." On Thursday, the Court "gave lawyers on both sides six days to submit their views on how best to proceed."

In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/23, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), Ria Tabacco Mar, a staff lawyer for the ACLU's Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender and H.I.V. Project, argues that "the president and his executive agencies cannot change what Title IX says and means. Those jobs still belong to Congress and the federal courts." The Grimm case, Mar adds, "could neutralize the Trump administration's cruel blow to vulnerable transgender youth."

Report: One In 137 Teens Would Identify As Transgender. The New York Times (2/23, Chokshi, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that "an analysis of state and federal data" shows that "nearly 150,000 American teenagers from 13 to 17 years old – or one out of every 137 – would identify as transgender if survey takers asked." The Times says the estimate, which was published in a report from Jody L. Herman, a scholar of public policy at the Williams Institute at the UCLA School of Law, and several co-authors, "stands to inform the fierce debate over the rights of transgender youth."

Trump, Trudeau Discuss Border Cooperation.

Reuters (2/23, Ljunggren) reports Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and President Trump on Thursday "discussed cooperation along the countries' shared border," Trudeau's office said in a statement without providing further details. Reuters notes that "dozens of asylum seekers, worried about Trump's plans for cracking down on immigration, have been crossing into Canada in recent weeks, putting a strain on border communities."

Southwest States May Hinder Trump's Border Wall.

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Frosch, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) highlights efforts in Southwestern US states to hinder President Trump's efforts to build a wall along the US border with Mexico including legislation from New Mexico Democratic state lawmakers to prohibit the Federal government from acquiring the land to build the wall and California Lt. Gov. Gavin Newsom's discussion of using state and federal environmental laws to hinder stymie construction.

Salvadoran Woman Awaiting Emergency Surgery "Forcibly Moved" To Detention Facility. The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Demick, 4.52M) reports that ICE agents "forcibly moved" Sara Beltran-Hernandez, "a critically ill woman from El Salvador who was awaiting emergency surgery for a brain tumor" from a Texas hospital to a detention center, "raising concerns about President Trump's directive to more aggressively pursue people living in the country illegally." Beltran-Hernandez "was bound by her hands and feet and removed by wheelchair from Huguley Hospital in Fort Worth late Wednesday" and taken to "a detention facility in Alvarado, Texas." Attorneys representing the woman in an asylum petition "said they plan to file an emergency appeal in Texas to get their client returned to the hospital."

CBP Agents Ask For Flight Passengers' IDs In Search For Undocumented Immigrant. The Washington Post (2/23, Lowery, 11.43M) reports that US Customs and Border Protection "confirmed" on Thursday "that their agents requested to see the identification of domestic flight passengers landing at a New York airport Wednesday night as they searched for an undocumented immigrant who had received a deportation order to leave the United States." The agency said two CBP agents "asked passengers who had been on Delta Flight 1583 from San Francisco to show their identification while deplaning after landing at John F. Kennedy Airport at about 8 p.m. Wednesday." The search "was conducted at the request of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, CBP said in a statement, but the person they were seeking was not on the flight." A CBP spokesperson "said that the undocumented individual, who they did not publicly identify, received a deportation order after multiple criminal convictions for domestic assault, driving while impaired, and violating a protective order."

Pew Poll Gauges How Hispanic Immigrants See Their Place In US. The AP (2/23, Holland) reports that a Pew Research Center survey taken in December and January and released Thursday found that "more than half of Hispanic immigrants who were neither born in the United States nor have a permanent resident card said they were concerned about their place in the United States, even before the Trump administration made clear its intentions to aggressively crack down on illegal immigration." According to the survey, "55 percent of Hispanics surveyed who were foreign born and neither US citizens nor legal residents – a group Pew said was the most likely to be in the country without authorization – said they had serious concerns about their place in America after President Donald Trump's election." Among "Hispanic lawful permanent residents," 49 percent had the same concerns. Meanwhile, 59 percent of US-born Hispanics "said they were confident about their place in America, along with 60 percent of those US citizens who were foreign-born."

Former SOCOM Commander: Trump's Comments About Media A Threat To Democracy.

The Washington Times (2/23, Ernst, 272K) reports Ret. Adm. William McRaven, the former head of Special Operations Command, said Tuesday that he views President Trump's comments about the media as possibly "the greatest threat to democracy" in his lifetime. The current University of Texas system chancellor told members of the school's communication college that efforts to characterize the media as an "enemy" must be challenged. The Daily Texan quoted McRaven as saying, "We must challenge this statement and this sentiment that the news media is the enemy of the American people."

Ginsburg Says Reporters "Trying" To Tell "Truth," Praises Women's March. The AP (2/23, Hananel) reports Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg told BBC's "Newsnight" in a Thursday interview that she reads the Washington Post and the New York Times daily and "reporters are trying to tell the public the truth." While Ginsburg did not comment on President Trump directly, the AP says, the Justice "said she was encouraged" by the women's march in Washington. Ginsburg said, "I've never seen such a demonstration, both the numbers and the rapport of the people in that crowd." She added, "There was no violence, it was orderly. So yes, we are not experiencing the best times, but there is reason to hope that we will see a better day."

O'Keefe Offering $10,000 For Evidence Of Wrongdoing By Media.

The Washington Times (2/23, Richardson, 272K) reports "conservative sleuth" James O'Keefe "is ramping up his effort to take down the mainstream media" by asking "ordinary citizens to go undercover and expose wrongdoing in newsrooms" across the US. O'Keefe said he will award $10,000 to any person who provides evidence of "corruption, malfeasance and wrongdoing" in the press. O'Keefe said in a video, "If you have hidden audio recordings, videotapes or documents inside of a newsroom or media institution, and the material is good enough, I will pay you $10,000."

Strassel: Conflict Over Pentagon Staff Hurting Efforts To Improve Pentagon.

In her Wall Street Journal (2/23, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) column, Kimberley Strassel says conflict between the White House and Defense Secretary Mattis over who to appoint for senior level Pentagon positions risks leaving Mattis without the necessary staff to carry out needed changes for the military. Strassel argues that while Mattis' desire not to consider politics when choosing his staff has merit, the positions ultimately report to the President and carry out his vision.

WPost: World Leaders Should Treat Public Health Issues Like National Security Threats.

In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) says that Bill Gates' address at the Munich Security Conference Saturday "should have caught everyone's attention" because he said world leaders should equate the urgency of public health issues with the urgency of national security threats. While it may be impossible to anticipate the next "fast-moving [wave] of peril," Gates argued that more support should go toward research on speeding up vaccine development with genomics and more time and resources should be spent on surveillance to identify the outbreak of diseases before epidemics spread. A third priority should be exercises and training "the way the military prepares for war," said Gates.

Republicans Expected To Use Congressional Review Act To Repeal Obama Agency Rules.

Roll Call (2/23, Mejdrich, 63K) reports that congressional Republicans "are expected to send a stream of bills...to President Donald Trump's desk, using a process to repeal agency rules known as the Congressional Review Act," which "allows Congress to repeal certain rules of the previous administration under a fast-track process that requires only a simple majority in the Senate." The Act also "states that a rule 'may not be reissued in substantially the same form, and a new rule that is substantially the same as such a rule may not be issued, unless the reissued or new rule is specifically authorized by a law enacted after the date of the joint resolution disapproving the original rule.'"

Bannon Rips Media, Vows Trump Will Push Forward With Agenda.

Coverage of the joint appearance Thursday by Chief Strategist Steve Bannon and Chief of Staff Priebus at the annual Conservative Political Action Conference – which included reports on all three major network newscasts – focuses heavily on two themes: First, Bannon's excoriation of the media and his vow that President Trump is committed to following through on his campaign promises; and second, Bannon and Priebus seeking to put to rest reports of a rift between the two men.

In the lead story for the  CBS Evening News (2/23, lead story, 2:55, Pelley, 11.17M), Margaret Brennan reported that Bannon, making "a rare appearance," portrayed "himself as a revolutionary." Bannon was shown saying, "There's a new political order that's being formed out of this, and it's still being formed. But if you look at the wide degree of opinions in this room, whether you're a populist, whether you're a limited-government conservative, whether you're a libertarian, whether you're an economic nationalist, we have wide and sometimes divergent opinions. We are a nation with a culture and a reason for being. And I think that's what unites us." Brennan added, "Bannon, a former Goldman Sachs banker who previously ran conservative website Breitbart, repeatedly attacked the media, which he referred to as 'the opposition party.'"

On  ABC World News Tonight (2/23, story 3, 1:25, Karl, 14.63M), Jonathan Karl reported that in "rare public comments," Bannon, "dubbed 'the Great Manipulator' by the TIME magazine" and who "may be the President's most powerful and controversial aide," said that President Trump "won't moderate his views and won't back down from an all-out battle with his opponents." Referring to the media, Bannon was shown showing, "If you think they are going to give you your country back without a fight, you are sadly mistaken. Every day, every day it is going to be a fight."

On  NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 2, 2:30, Holt, 16.61M), Lester Holt reported that Bannon made "a rare public appearance." NBC's Hallie Jackson added, "Stepping out of shadows of the West Wing, one of the President's most trusted advisers in a rare public appearance." Jackson described the "controversial" Bannon as "the power behind the populist brand that propelled Donald Trump to victory."

The New York Times (2/23, Peters, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that when Bannon on Thursday "appeared in public...for the first time since the president was sworn in, it was to deliver, in his own combative way, a message of soothing reassurance to the conservative activists" at CPAC. Bannon told the crowd "not [to] believe the 'corporatist globalist media' that was 'crying and weeping' on election night and is still 'dead wrong' about what the Trump administration is doing. Inside the White House, Mr. Bannon said, everything is going according to plan. The 'deconstruction of the administrative state' has just begun."

The Washington Times (2/23, Sherfinski, 272K) reports that Bannon and Priebus "assured conservatives" that Trump "will keep pressing on 'all of those promises' that got him elected, rejected reports of chaos within the White House and accused a hostile press of trying to undermine the new administration." The Times adds, "The joint appearance of" the pair "seemed designed to combat reports of discord within the White House – a characterization Mr. Priebus called 'ridiculous' and Mr. Bannon called 'dead wrong.'"

The Washington Post (2/23, Rucker, Costa, 11.43M), describing Bannon as "the reclusive mastermind behind...Trump's nationalist ideology and combative tactics," reports that Bannon delivered "a fiery rebuke of the media and [declared] that the new administration is in an unending battle for 'deconstruction of the administrative state,'" by which he meant "the system of taxes, regulations and trade pacts that the president says have stymied economic growth and infringed upon US sovereignty."

Breitbart (2/23, Spiering, 2.02M) reports that the crowd "applauded and cheered when Bannon spoke of the deconstruction of the administrative state, cutting cabinet agency regulations that were choking business growth. 'The way the progressive left runs is that if they can't get it passed, they're just going to put it in some sort of regulation in an agency,' he said. 'That's all going to be deconstructed.'"

The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Bierman, 4.52M) reports that during "a rare public appearance together," Bannon and Priebus "agreed on one common enemy: the media." The Times says Priebus, "who is often described as 'embattled,' said he has grown 'conditioned' to the media counting Trump out: during the presidential campaign, the transition and the first month of the presidency. 'The biggest misconception is everything that you're reading,' Priebus said." Bannon, meanwhile, "consistently called the media 'the opposition party.'"

Reuters (2/23, Cowan, Sullivan) reports that Bannon, making "a rare public appearance," urged "conservatives to unite behind [Trump] as he presses his agenda." Bannon told "the gathering, 'We want you to have our back' in upcoming battles, and [denounced] media criticism of Trump."

The Huffington Post (2/23, Bobic, 237K) reports that Bannon "denounced the 'corporatist, globalist media' for being 'adamantly opposed to an economic nationalist agenda'" being pushed by Trump. Bannon "repeated a reference to the media as the 'opposition party,' and bashed it for being 'always wrong' about the workings of the administration." Priebus concurred with the assessment, "adding that he hoped the relationship between the press and the White House would improve. 'It's going to get worse,' Bannon said."

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Bender, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that Bannon pledged that Trump's budget proposal would make good on the President's campaign vows. Said Bannon, "We have a team that's just grinding it through on what President Donald Trump promised the American people. And the mainstream media better understand something – all those promises are going to be implemented." The Washington Times (2/23, Ernst, 272K) quotes Bannon as saying of Trump, "He's laid out an agenda with those speeches, with the promises he made, and our job everyday is just to execute on that." Bannon added, "And he's maniacally focused on that."

Bannon, Priebus Dispute Reports That They Are At Odds With Each Other. The Hill (2/23, Kamisar, 1.25M) reported that while Bannon was "portrayed by 'Saturday Night Live' as the Grim Reaper" and "on the cover of Time magazine as 'the great manipulator,'" during Thursday's "rare public appearance," he "presented a softer image." The Hill added that Bannon "was relaxed and smiling on the convention hall stage next to a chipper Priebus," as the pair "sought to temper Bannon's public image and rebut reports of discord between the administration's top two advisers."

USA Today (2/23, Jackson, 5.28M) says that both men "disputed media reports casting them as rivals in Trump's political court, and each said they are working together to advance the president's ambitious agenda." USA Today adds, "Moderator Matt Schlapp – chairman of the American Conservative Union, which sponsors CPAC – seemed amused by the Bannon/Priebus pleasantries, saying at one point, 'you guys have been so kumbayah.'"

McClatchy (2/23, Glueck, 74K) reports, "Despite several weeks of often-rough headlines for the administration and rampant chatter about tensions between Bannon and Priebus, the two men sought to project unity." Said Priebus, "In regard to us two, the biggest misconception is everything you're reading," adding, "We share an office suite together, we're basically together from 6:30 in the morning until about 11:00 at night."

Law Professors File Misconduct Complaint Against Conway.

The Washington Post (2/23, Horwitz, 11.43M) reports that a group of law professors has filed a misconduct complaint against Conway, "who was admitted to the D.C. Bar in 1995." The letter, from 15 professors who specialize in legal ethics, "said Conway should be sanctioned for violating government ethics rules and 'conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation.'" The professors "cite several incidents, including a television interview in which Conway made the 'false statement that President Barack Obama had 'banned' Iraqi refugees from coming into the United States for six months'" after the "Bowling Green Massacre," as well as "the use of her position to endorse Ivanka Trump products." They argue that while Conway once "understood her ethical responsibilities as a lawyer and abided by them." She "is currently acting in a way that brings shame upon the legal profession."

Spencer Asked To Leave CPAC.

The Washington Times (2/23, Sherfinski, 272K) reports that "ethno-nationalist 'alt-right' movement" leader Richard Spencer "was booted from the Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC) on Thursday." American Conservative Union spokesman Ian Walters said, "He's not welcome here." Spencer posted a video online in which he "said he was 'expelled' from the event and had been 'politely asked to leave.'"

The Washington Post (2/23, Weigel, 11.43M) says that in his speech to the conference, ACU executive director Dan Schneider "challenged the media to stop referring to the 'alt-right,'...as conservative." Schneider said, "There is a sinister organization that is trying to warp its way into our ranks. ... We must not be deceived by [a] hateful, left-wing fascist group." He continued, "They hate the Constitution. They hate free markets. They hate pluralism. ... Fascists tend to want big government control."

Chamber of Commerce: Trump Should Halt, Evaluate Fiduciary Rule.

US Chamber of Commerce Center for Capital Markets Competitiveness President and CEO David Hirschmann and Randel Johnson, the chamber's senior vice president of labor, immigration and employee benefits, write in a USA Today (2/23, 5.28M) op-ed that President Trump's request to review the Labor Department's "well-intentioned, but poorly designed, fiduciary rule" is "a necessary first step in halting the rule's implementation and calling for an evaluation of its true impact." Hirschmann and Johnson say the rule's "rushed compliance period, severe consequences and compliance burdens" hinder small businesses' retirement plan offerings, and its flawed enforcement mechanism will lead to "frivolous lawsuits."

USA Today: Existing "Commonsense" Fiduciary Rule "Should Not Even Be Controversial." In an editorial, USA Today (2/23, 5.28M) argues the fiduciary rule the Administration has put under review is "not an onerous regulation," but rather a "commonsense rule" that "should not even be controversial." The fiduciary rule is a "simple measure that is needed to boost savings rates," and its end "will simply make brokerages richer at the expense of unsophisticated savers," says USA Today.

Stocks "Wobbled" As Dow Rises For 10th Straight Day.

The AP (2/23) reports that stocks "wobbled Thursday as investors changed course and tempered their expectations for faster economic growth." The Dow added 34.72 points to close at 20,810.32 and the S&P 500 rose 0.99 points to finish at 2,363.81, while the Nasdaq ended the day 25.12 points lower at 5,835.51. USA Today (2/23, Shell, 5.28M) says Thursday was the first time in nearly four years that the Dow "finish[ed] higher 10 consecutive trading days."

Scott Pelley said on the CBS Evening News  (2/23, story 5, 1:40, Pelley, 11.17M) that "many people" are referring to it as "the Trump Rally." Jim Axelrod added that "industrial companies are expecting an increase in infrastructure spending as we saw today when the President met with manufacturing executives to discuss jobs." The President "has signaled he will push for an infrastructure spending bill, and, of course, everyone likes the signals on corporate tax reforms and regulation rollbacks." Early Thursday evening, Trump tweeted a Fox Business story headlined, "S&P 500 Edges Higher After Trump Renews Jobs Pledge." As 11:30 p.m., the post had been retweeted more than 6,000 times and liked more than 32,000 times.

A separate USA Today (2/23, Shell, 5.28M) analysis says that while "optimism is on the rise as investors cheer better economic numbers and stronger corporate profits," Lamar Villere, co-manager of the Villere Balanced Fund, warned, "The first time one of Trump's major economic policy platforms gets shut down by Congress, you might get the market to say, 'Hmm, maybe this won't happen.' The market could start to get shaky. ... You could have a pullback, as it would remove one of the main reasons for the rally." USA Today goes on to list other factors "that could roil the market."

State Department Says Press Briefings Will Resume "Soon."

The Washington Times (2/23, Taylor, 272K) reports the State Department is "pushing back against criticism from former senior officials and journalists over the lack of press conferences and other media access" at the department since Secretary of State Tillerson was sworn in three weeks ago. "The Department of State continues to provide members of the media a full suite of services," acting spokesman Mark Toner said, asserting that the department had "answered 174 questions from reporters in the [US] and around the globe in the past 24 hours alone." Toner also said "regular press briefings" will resume "soon" as officials explore ways to try and open them digitally to a wider group of reporters.

Under Fire At Town Halls, Republicans Hedge Their Support For Trump Agenda.

The Washington Post (2/23, Weigel, 11.43M) reports that town halls being held this week during the congressional recess "have repeatedly found Republicans hedging their support for" President Trump's "agenda – and in many cases contradicting their own past statements. Hostile questions put them on record criticizing some of the fights...Trump has picked, or pledging to protect policies such as the more popular elements of Obamacare. And voters got it all on tape, promising to keep hounding their lawmakers if they falter." As one example, the Post says that Sen. Chuck Grassley, asked during a town hall whether he backs an investigation of "Trump's tax returns," offered "a qualified 'yes.'"

On the CBS Evening News (2/23, story 4, 2:15, Pelley, 11.17M), Scott Pelley reported, "Congressional Republicans are getting an earful in their town hall meetings." CBS' Nancy Cordes added, "The question for Republicans this week: How strongly to defend the President. ... When they're already dealing with Democratic anger over plans to repeal Obamacare."

Politico: Republicans Divided On Whether Paid Protesters Behind Raucous Town Halls. Politico (2/23, Nelson, 2.46M) reported, "A rift has opened up among Republicans over whether paid protesters are the root cause of raucous town halls, with the White House fueling the narrative that organized, disruptive sympathizers of Hillary Clinton are the culprits." Politico said GOP lawmakers "have taken different stances in the debate." For example, Grassley has argued "there's no 'evidence' that paid protesters are disguising themselves as angry constituents." However, "others have adopted a stance more in line with the White House's," with Rep. Jason Chaffetz, for instance, contending "that Democrats were 'bullying' in a 'concerted effort' to create chaos."

Under the headline "Takeaways From A Week Of Raucous Town Halls," Politico (2/23, Cheney, 2.46M) reported, "Some Republicans – including White House aides – have complained that the protests popping up at town halls have been orchestrated by liberal activists, perhaps by paying out-of-district residents to pack GOP events. But lawmakers who showed up weren't so sure they were facing an artificial resistance."

In another report, Politico (2/23, Nelson, 2.46M) said that Counselor to the president Kellyanne Conway, appearing Thursday on Fox News, "dismissed the angry crowds that have filled town hall meetings hosted by GOP lawmakers across the country as little more than the venting of frustration by a directionless Democratic Party." Said Conway, "Some people are upset with an election result they didn't see coming. And the fact that this president, a man of action and impact is actually keeping his promises at very fast clip early in his administration."

WSJournal: Many At GOP Town Halls New To Political Activism. Under the headline "America's Rowdy Town Halls: More Organic Than Organized," the Wall Street Journal (2/23, Tau, Andrews, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that the White House and leading Republicans have for the most part contended the angry crowds showing up at GOP town halls are the product of professional organizers and activists who are being paid. However, the Journal says interviews it conducted, both with attendees of a town hall held this week by Rep. Leonard Lance and audience members at similar events across the US, found that a number of those people had never taken part in a town hall or political activism of any sort.

Sen. Bernie Sanders said on  CNN's Out Front (2/23, 409K), "If you don't have the guts to face your constituents, you shouldn't be in the United States Congress. If you need police at the meetings, that's fine, have police at the meetings, have security at the meetings. But don't use that as an excuse to run away from your constituents after you support repealing the Affordable Care Act, doing away with pre-existing conditions. If you're going to do all those things, answer the questions your constituents have."

Meanwhile, a number of reports on the topic focus on various GOP lawmakers across the country. CNN (2/22, Williams, Murphy, 29.79M) reported on its website, "After testy town halls" held by Republican lawmakers such as Chaffetz and Grassley "went viral, some GOP politicians are staying clear of town hall-style events in their home districts." In response, "constituents have turned to some creative ways to voice their displeasure." For example, referring to Rep. Paul Cook, CNN said, "Missing congressman notices have been photographed on milk cartons and posted to the @WhereIsPaulCook Twitter account and website."

The AP (2/23) reports that Rep. Martha McSally "held a town hall-style meeting in Sahuarita," taking "questions from a loud but largely non-confrontational audience Thursday at a church that seats about 300. Organizers of a competing town hall in Tucson had repeatedly invited McSally, but she refused to attend that event," saying "activists wanted an opportunity to verbally berate members of Congress in a public setting and" calling "the attempt a 'political ambush for political theater.'" On its website, CNN (2/23, Fox, 29.79M) reported that McSally "broke with her party and President Donald Trump on a handful of occasions and yet failed to assuage the progressives in the audience who screamed at her to 'answer the question.'"

In another dispatch, the AP (2/23) reports, "A sometimes hostile crowd peppered" Rep. David Young on Thursday "with questions about the Affordable Care Act, environment and other issues at a public forum in Urbandale." The AP says an audience member asked Young "if health care would remain affordable for his 1-year-old son, who was born with a serious health problem. The crowd jeered Young as he sidestepped giving 'a definite answer' but said the boy wouldn't be denied care."

Study: Anti-Muslim, Anti-Immigrant Hate Groups Thrive On Twitter.

USA Today (2/23, Eversley, 5.28M) reports a study released this week by the community security research organization Safe Home this week shows hate groups targeting Muslims and immigrants had the largest number of followers on Twitter, and the number of likes and comments on hate group tweets was higher in 2016 than any year since 2008. Geographically, the Southern states of Arkansas, Mississippi, and Tennessee are home to the highest number of hate groups per capita, with South Dakota and Montana not far behind.

WSJournal: Gorsuch Confirmation Will Buttress Second Amendment Rights.

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) editorializes that the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals' ruling this week upholding Maryland's ban on military-style weapons underscores the importance of confirming Judge Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court, arguing that with Gorsuch on the court, a new majority will soon be in place to reinforce the court's ruling in DC v. Heller, in which it upheld the individual right to bear arms.

WPost: Bowser's Experienced Police Chief Choice Newsham "Makes Sense."

The Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) editorializes that Mayor Muriel Bowser's Thursday announcement that Peter Newsham will succeed Cathy Lanier as D.C. police chief, pending D.C. Council approval, "makes sense" for his help "transforming the department into a model agency." Noting his 28-year commitment to the D.C. force, the Post says he worked closely with police chiefs in the reform and professionalization of the force that has led to "a declining crime rate, the pioneering use of data and a department held out as a national example of how to make community policing work." The Post estimates that Newsham will survive inquiry into the "blemishes on his record" because he has learned lessons that put "him in good stead" to fulfill police chief responsibilities.

Arkansas Supreme Court Strikes Down City's LGBT Protections.

The AP (2/23, DeMillo) reports from Little Rock, AR that the Arkansas Supreme Court on Thursday "struck down a city's ordinance banning discrimination based on a person's sexual orientation or gender identity, but it stopped short of saying whether a state law aimed at prohibiting such local LGBT protections is constitutional." The court "reversed a judge's decision that Fayetteville's anti-discrimination ordinance didn't violate a state law prohibiting cities from enacting protections not covered by state law." The AP adds that Fayetteville, "a liberal enclave in northwestern Arkansas, is one of several cities that approved local protections for lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender people in response to the 2015 law." In the unanimous ruling, "the justices rejected the argument that Fayetteville and other cities with such ordinances have made, that such protections are covered elsewhere in state law."

SCOTUS Will Not Hear Ohio Man's Amish Hair-Cutting Case.

The AP (2/23) reports that the Supreme Court "won't review the case of the Ohio leader of a breakaway group that was accused in hair- and beard-cutting attacks on fellow Amish." Defense attorneys "challenged the constitutionality of the federal hate crimes law and how a kidnapping allegation was used to stiffen the sentence for 71-year-old Samuel Mullet Sr.," who "petitioned the Supreme Court after a federal court rejected his appeal last May." Mullet's attorney, Ed Bryan, said "he is disappointed by the high court's decision this week not to take up the case." Prosecutors "said some of the victims in the 2011 attacks were awakened in the middle of the night and restrained as others cut their hair and beards, which have spiritual significance in the Amish faith," and "prosecutors alleged the motive was religious, while the defense attributed it to family disputes."

Cruz Predicts Another SCOTUS Vacancy Later This Year.

The Washington Post (2/23, Sullivan, 11.43M) reports that in "one of his most prominent political appearances in months," Sen. Ted Cruz predicted at the Conservative Political Action Conference Thursday "that there will be another vacancy on the Supreme Court later this year" and "appeared to suggest that a departure of one of justices from the liberal wing of the court would trigger the opening." Cruz said, "The Scalia seat is defense. ... We're not going to get any better than Justice Scalia. The best we can do is preserve constitutional victories like upholding the Second Amendment. . . . I think we'll have another Supreme Court vacancy this summer. If that happens, as much as the left is crazy now, they will go full Armageddon." Cruz reiterated those comments in an interview with Fox News' Special Report  (2/23, 1.53M), saying, "I think the odds are very good we will see a [Supreme Court] vacancy this summer. If not this summer, next summer. ... The next vacancy, which is going to be the opportunity to shift the course of this court, to put a five justice majority of constitutionalists on the court – that's going to be Armageddon and we need to be prepared to make the case to the American people."

INTERNATIONAL NEWS

Military Leaders Want Higher Level Talks With Russia About Air Operations Over Iraq, Syria.

The Washington Post (2/23, Lamothe, 11.43M) reports that senior US military officials "want to elevate talks with Russia about air operations over Iraq and Syria" in an effort to prevent mid-air collisions. However, the Post says that the prospect of discussions on the issue are "complicated by concerns at the Pentagon that doing so will make it look like Washington and Moscow have begun to collaborate on the battlefield." A 2015 agreement between the US and Russia "called for the use of specific communication frequencies and the establishment of a phone hotline" to deconflict operations, but Lt. Gen. Jeffrey Harrigian indicated the existing agreement has not provided US officers many options when there are points of contention between the two military forces. Harrigian said, "Our perspective has been that there needs to be another layer that allows us to have a more senior-level discussion, and we've got to work through where that layer is."

Treasury Department Sanctions Two Nusra Front In Syria Leaders.

The AP (2/23, Schectman) reports the Treasury Department on Thursday placed two Nusra Front in Syria leaders – Iyad Nazmi Salih Khalil and Bassam Ahmad al-Hasri – on its sanctions blacklist. The US says the men helped oversee the group's operations in Syria, with Khalil acting as its third-highest ranking official.

Syrian Peace Talks Resume.

The AP (2/23, Soguel, Keaten) reports talks to end the Syrian conflict restarted on Thursday with UN envoy Staffan de Mistura saying the negotiations present an opportunity to end the war and give hope to country's population. Mistura said, "The Syrian people all want an end to this conflict and you all know it." Mistura added, "They are waiting for a relief of their own suffering, and the dream of a new road out of this nightmare to a real and normal future in dignity." Mistura indicated that he will hold separate talks with each side as they try to create a plan that would lead to discussions about governance, a new constitution, and elections.

Iraqi Forces Seize Most Of Mosul Airport.

ABC World News Tonight (2/23, story 9, 0:45, Muir, 14.63M) reported that Iraqi forces on Thursday were "taking control" of the airport in Mosul, and the New York Times (2/23, Callimachi, Gordon, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says the troops seized most of the facility. The Times says the progress is "an important milestone" in the effort to recapture the western half of Mosul and "is a promising start to what is expected to be a difficult and bloody fight." US Brig. Gen. Matthew Isler said Iraqi forces are "most of the way through the airfield," which New Zealand Brig. Gen. Hugh McAslan said is "ahead of schedule of where we thought they would be."

NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 7, 1:45, Holt, 16.61M) reported "the offensive is not over" and it "could take another two or three days to secure the airport." The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 7, 2:10, Pelley, 11.17M) showed CENTCOM Commander Gen. Joseph Votel saying that while the operation "might" go "faster if we did it ourselves," he is "pretty convinced the way we are approaching this, this campaign this time, working through our partners, is kind of the right way of doing it." Votel added that the Iraqis "own this" and "we are helping them, helping them to fight, but we are not fighting for them."

Trump Wants US Nuclear Capabilities To Be At "Top Of The Pack."

NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 3, 0:55, Holt, 16.61M) reported that in an interview with Reuters on Thursday, President Trump "doubled down in his desire to beef up the nation's nuclear punch." ABC World News Tonight (2/23, story 2, 1:15, Muir, 14.63M) said Trump "declared he wants the United States to be the world's dominant nuclear power." Trump: "It would be wonderful. A dream would be that no country would have nukes, but if countries are going to have nukes, we're going to be at the top of the pack." Jonathan Karl said Trump's comment comes after Russia violated a 1987 nuclear treaty by deploying a new cruise missile, which the President called "a big deal." In his interview with Reuters (2/23, Holland), Trump called New START "a one-sided deal." Said the President, "Just another bad deal that the country made, whether it's START, whether it's the Iran deal. ... We're going to start making good deals."

Trump Likes Two-State Solution, But Will Leave It Up To Israelis, Palestinians.

In an interview with Reuters (2/23, Holland), President Trump said Thursday that he "likes the concept of a two-state solution to the Israel-Palestinian conflict," but "stopped short of reasserting a US commitment to eventual Palestinian statehood and instead said again" he would be "satisfied with whatever makes both parties happy." Said the President, "I like the two-state solution. But I ultimately like what the both parties like." Reuters says the comments "put a new twist" on a statement he made earlier this month at a news conference with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu that could "send a signal to both sides, as well as the international community, that the principle...will not be discarded if the Trump administration moves forward, as he has promised, with an initiative to restart long-stalled peace efforts."

Haley Meets With Parents Of Slain Israeli Soldier. The AP (2/23) reports Ambassador Haley met Wednesday with the parents of an Israeli soldier "whose remains have never been returned after he was killed in Gaza." Haley told Leah and Dr. Simcha Goldin "that she'd work with them and Israeli diplomats to advocate for the return, the US Mission said."

Israel Bars Human Rights Watch. The Washington Post (2/23, Booth, 11.43M) reports Israeli has barred an American investigator from Human Rights Watch from entering the country, saying Thursday that the group is "systematically anti-Israel" and works as a propaganda tool for the Palestinians. Officials at the rights group "denounced the decision to deny entry to Omar Shakir," an Iraqi-American.

Trump "Not Liking" Chinese And North Korean Military Moves.

In an interview with Reuters (2/23) on Thursday, the President said he is "not liking" recent military moves by China and North Korea. Said Trump, "I know exactly what's going on between China and North Korea and everybody else. But I don't like talking about military strategy in newspapers. ... I'm not liking it. This didn't take place under the Trump Administration, this took place under the Obama Administration. Many things took place that should not have been allowed. One of them is the building of a...massive military complex in the middle of the South China Sea." Politico (2/23, Lima, 2.46M) reports that while Trump "praised China for halting coal imports from North Korea, he stressed the country's importance in avoiding escalating matters" with Pyongyang, saying, "Whether they say so or not is up to them, but they have tremendous control over North Korea. I think they could solve the problem very easily if they want to."

Satellite Images Show Reinforced Chinese Surface-To-Air Missile Sites On Disputed Islands. The Washington Post (2/23, Gibbons-Neff, 11.43M) reports on its website that new satellite images show the Chinese military "shoring up its defenses on a disputed island chain in the South China Sea, adding what appears to be reinforced launch sites for surface-to-air missiles on at least three atolls." The existence of the new launch sites was first reported by Reuters on Wednesday, and on Thursday, "photos of the nearly completed structures were obtained" by CSIS.

North Korea Mocks China For "Dancing To US Tune." The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Cheng, Wong, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports North Korea criticized long-time ally China in a state-media commentary published Thursday. The commentary, published by the state-controlled Korean Central News Agency, didn't specifically name China, instead referring to "a neighboring country, which often claims itself to be a 'friendly neighbor'." According to the piece, the unnamed country is "styling itself a big power, is dancing to the tune of the US."

Malaysia: Kim Jong-Nam Killed By VX Nerve Agent. The New York Times (2/23, Paddock, Sang-Hun, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Malaysian police announced Friday that the poison used to kill Kim-Jong-Nam, the half-brother of the North Korean leader Kim Jong-Un, was VX nerve agent, which is considered a chemical weapon under Chemical Weapons Conventions of 1997 and 2005. Police said samples taken from Kim's skin and eye were identified as the deadly nerve agent. The Washington Post (2/23, Fiffield, 11.43M) says the finding adds "to the increasing pile of evidence suggesting that Kim Jong Un's regime in North Korea was behind the brazen and public attack on Kim Jong Nam in a Kuala Lumpur airport terminal last week." CNN's Situation Room (2/23, 554K), however, reported that North Korea is "pushing back strongly" against claims that the regime ordered Kim Jong-Nam's assassination.

A Wall Street Journal (2/23, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) editorial urges the Trump Administration in the wake of Kim Jong-Nam's assassination to label North Korea a state sponsor of terrorism.

Kushner, Ivanka Trump Pushed To Remove Climate Deal Criticism From Executive Order.

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Harder, Nicholas, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports President Trump's son-in-law, Jared Kushner, and daughter Ivanka Trump pushed to have language critical of an international climate deal removed from a soon to be released executive order, according to multiple sources. The President s expected to sign within days at least two executive orders dismantling former President Obama's climate and environmental regulations.

UN Climate Chief Seeks Meeting With Tillerson. Bloomberg News (2/23, Shankleman, 2.41M) reports UN climate chief Patricia Espinosa "is not taking no for an answer as she travels next week to Washington in the hope of meeting" with Secretary of State Tillerson. But so far, she has not received a response. "The process has been difficult for them to get started, so I don't know if I will be able to see the Secretary of State this time," Espinosa told reporters. State Department spokesman Noel Clay "said he had nothing to confirm at this time."

Scientists Urge Trump To Withdraw From UN Climate Agency. According to the Washington Times (2/23, Richardson, 272K), "more than 300 scientists have urged President Trump to withdraw from the UN's climate-change agency, warning that its push to curtail carbon dioxide threatens to exacerbate poverty without improving the environment." In a letter to the President, MIT professor emeritus Richard Lindzen called on the US and other nations to "change course on an outdated international agreement that targets minor greenhouse gases," starting with carbon dioxide.

Swedish Minister Hits Back At Trump Criticism.

Reuters (2/23, Ahlander) reports Sweden "hit back" on Thursday at criticism from President Trump, "defending its generous immigration policies and saying the diversity from thousands of asylum seekers would build a stronger society." Justice and Migration Minister Morgan Johansson told Reuters in an interview, "The next time I hope the president, if he's going to speak about Sweden, is better informed about what the conditions really are here," noting that unemployment figures continue to fall and public finances are in sound order, despite record number of immigrants.

Max Karlsson, a 22-year-old Swede who has been running the @Sweden account on Twitter since Monday, writes in the Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) that "fact-checking a president is an unusual task, but even people in power have to be held responsible for making unverified claims — and President Trump is no exception." Karlsson says "Trump's remarks, echoing those of high-level xenophobes, are reckless and not to be thrown around lightly. It's surreal seeing the leader of the free world actually believing that Sweden in going down the drain, making comments that risk increasing polarization and, on a larger scale, dehumanizing migrants and ignoring the human right to asylum."

Lebanon Fearful Being Caught Up In Trump's Iran Push.

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Trofimov, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that as President Trump seeks to step up pressure on Iran, Lebanon – home to Tehran ally Hezbollah – fear it will get caught up. Ali Bazzi, a lawmaker from the Shiite Amal bloc allied with Hezbollah, warned that it would be counterproductive for the US to halt aid to the Lebanese army.

Duterte Critic Arrested On Corruption Charges.

The New York Times (2/23, Villamor, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that a Philippine court on Thursday ordered the arrest of a senator who had been "the leading domestic critic" of President Rodrigo Duterte and his anti-drug campaign "on charges that she took bribes from imprisoned drug traffickers." The senator, Leila de Lima, denied the charges, "saying they amount to political persecution."

France's Le Pen Endorses Trump With "Nothing But Praise."

French "far-right" presidential candidate Marine le Pen told the AP (2/23, Ganley) Thursday she "has nothing but praise" for President Trump, citing "the promotion of a form of intelligent protectionism, of economic patriotism" and his "rupture with total free trade imposed on the world." Le Pen said, "There is no (untoward) international fallout" from the President's actions, after laying out her proposed foreign policy approach that focuses on "France going it alone."

Juncker: EU Will Work With Ireland To Prevent Hard Border Post-Brexit.

The AP (2/23) reports EU Commission President Jean-Claude Juncker said Thursday the commission and "the Irish government will work closely" to avoid the establishment of "hard borders" on the island post-Brexit. Irish Prime Minister Enda Kenny says the peace accord with the UK does not allow for a hard border that would restrict travel.

NYTimes Analysis: European Governments, Like America, Less Welcoming To Migrants.

The New York Times (2/23, Smale, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) interprets Germany's wiretapping approval and mass deportation Wednesday as "a clear sign of the stiffening political headwinds that have made Europe, like America, a less welcoming place for migrants." Although Sweden, the UK, Italy, and Hungary are all "restricting their welcome to strangers," Germany's steps are "more assertive," says the Times, noting this is a year in which Chancellor Angela Merkel faces a tough election challenge. Amnesty International is among the organizations who criticize European states for being too harsh on migrants "simply seeking a better life or striving to escape war and persecution."

Danish Man Who Burned Quran Charged With Blasphemy.

The New York Times (2/23, De Freytas-Tamura, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that a Danish man who burned a Quran and posted a video of it on Facebook has been charged with blasphemy, "a striking decision by prosecutors in a country that is largely secular but has grappled with the role of Islam in public life." According to the Times, the decision "stunned many" in the country, which has not convicted anyone of blasphemy since 1946.

Congress Urged To Withhold UN Funding.

Ron Prosor, a former Israeli ambassador to the UN, writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/23, Prosor, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) that Congress should withhold its funding to the UN until the world body returns to its core values, becomes more efficient, and halts its frequent attacks on American values and allies.

Krauthammer: Trump's "Two-Track" Foreign Policy May Work.

Charles Krauthammer writes in his column for the Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) that the set-up of the Administration is "a glaring contradiction," with the heads of State, Homeland Security, the CIA, and especially Defense and the national security adviser representing "mainstream American internationalism," while the President is "inexperienced, untraditional, unbounded" in his approach to foreign policy. Krauthammer argues that so far, the "good-cop, bad-cop" maneuvering seems like it might work a la Nixionian "madman theory," like in cases of China, NATO, free trade, and the Israeli-Palestinian resolution. The risk is that "a two-track, two-policy, two-reality" approach to foreign policy is "unsettling and has the potential to go totally off the rails."

Zakaria: US Can Help Save The Center.

Fareed Zakaria writes in his column for the Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) that amidst the "rise of radical forces on the left and right around the globe," "the center is rising again." Zakaria presents the likelihood that France's Emmanuel Macron will win the second round of the presidential election as a primary example. Macron is "emphatically in favor of free markets, globalization, the European Union and the transatlantic alliance," meanwhile being "an outsider, a reformer and a charismatic politician." German Chancellor Angela Merkel, with her 11-year reign, is also a bastion of centrism, says Zakaria, who notes she lags behind a left-of-center Martin Schulz, "who is even more pro-European, cosmopolitan and globalist." The US will play a critical role in maintaining, or not, an environment where the center can flourish.

Super PAC Begins Ads Urging Flake, Heller To Back Investigation Into Trump's Russia Ties.

Roll Call (2/23, Pathé, 63K) reports the Democratic super PAC American Bridge 21st Century is launching a two-week digital ad campaign that targets Sens. Jeff Flake and Dean Heller, "urging them to back an independent investigation into President Donald Trump's ties to Russia." The super PAC, Roll Call says, plans to expand the campaign to other platforms as it targets "engaged voters" of all parties. The ads call on voters to petition the senators to seek the investigation.

Trump Says China "Grand Champions" Of Currency Manipulation.

Reuters (2/23, Holland, Lawder) reports President Trump on Thursday characterized China as the "grand champions" of currency manipulation. Trump said during an interview with Reuters that he has not "held back" in accusing China of manipulating the yuan, despite "not acting on a campaign promise to declare" Beijing a currency manipulator on its first day. Reuters adds that Trump's comments came hours after Treasury Secretary Mnuchin "pledged a more methodical approach to analyzing Beijing's foreign exchange practices." Mnuchin told CNBC that he is not prepared at this time to make a determination on China's currency practices.

China Replacing Three Senior Economic Officials. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, A1, Wei, Wong, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that people familiar with the matter say that Chinese President Xi Jinping will be announcing changes to his economic team as China contends with domestic financial risk and tension with trading partners. The Journal says that with China's top banking regulator, commerce minister, and top economic planning official all at the retirement age of 65, two close associates of Xi and a well-known technocrat will replace them. Shandong Province Governor Guo Shuqing is expected to become the commissioner of the China Banking Regulatory Commission (replacing Shang Fulin), Vice Commerce Minister Zhong Shan will become Commerce Minister (replacing Gao Hucheng), and He Lifeng will head the National Development and Reform Commission (replacing Xu Shaoshi).

Trump Convenes Meeting Of Executives To Shape Economic Policies.

NBC Nightly News  (2/23, story 6, 2:05, Holt, 16.61M) reported President Trump "met with the CEO of two dozens manufacturing companies" on Thursday and "asked for their help in coming up with the ways to bring back jobs that are lost to foreign competitions." The New York Times (2/23, Davis, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports the meeting is "giving powerful business leaders a potentially influential hand in shaping his still-evolving economic policies." Trump told the group, "My administration's policies and regulatory reform, tax reform, trade policies will return significant manufacturing jobs to our country." Trump added, "Everything's going to be based on bringing our jobs back – the good jobs, the real jobs. They've left and they're coming back. They have to come back." Trump said his campaign vow on taxes, jobs, and infrastructure helped him win the election and he "dispatched his cabinet and senior staff to gather input from the executives on what those packages should look like." Reuters (2/23, Shepardson, Gibson) reports the executives each attended one of four breakout sessions with Administration officials to discuss a variety of topics including conflict minerals regulations, a lack of qualified workers, export regulations for defense products, vocational training and business taxes.

Javers: Trump Was "Suggesting That A Strong Dollar Could Be Bad" For Caterpillar. Eamon Javers said on CNBC's Closing Bell  (2/23, 142K) that "we saw the President making some comments" during the meeting "that you don't typically hear from the President of the United States." Javers added that "to my ear that sounded a little bit like the President was suggesting that a strong dollar could be bad for Caterpillar in terms of the exports that the President's trying to encourage here. That's not something you usually hear from presidents." Javers continued, "Typically Treasury secretaries say the United States has a strong dollar and that's our policy, but here you're seeing a little bit of a shift here on the part of a White House that wants to emphasize exports over imports."

GE CEO Recounts Trump's Golf Hole-In-One During "The Apprentice" Negotiations. The Washington Times (2/23, Boyer, 272K) reports that during the meeting with executives, the President "prodded" General Electric CEO Jeffrey Immelt to talk about the time Trump shot a hole-in-one on the golf course. The Times says that Immelt "dutifully told the tale of their golf outing in 2004" during negotiations between Trump and NBC for "The Apprentice" show. Immelt said,

"President Trump goes up to a par three on his course. He looks at the three of us and says, 'You realize, of course, I'm the richest golfer in the world.' And then gets a hole-in-one." Immelt added, "I have to say, you know, I've seen the magic before." Trump then explained that he "actually said I was the best golfer of all the rich people, to be exact. But then I got a hole-in-one. So it was sort of cool."

NYTimes Analysis: Trump's Economic Policies Leading To "Fear" In Aerospace Industry. The New York Times (2/23, Johnson, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that President Trump's discussion of "border tariffs and new trade deals" has led to "fear" in the aerospace industry that the policies "could raise the cost of American airplanes bought by foreign airlines or governments," leading to a trickle-down impact on the entire supply chain. The Times highlights Boeing as an example, saying that suffering sales or profits could impact the company's "nerve-system supply chain" which is composed of "more than 13,000 companies" in the US and "more than 1.5 million jobs."

Lane: US Business Leaders Must Speak Out Against Harmful Policies. In a Wall Street Journal (2/23, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) op-ed, Bill Lane – Caterpillar's former director of global government affairs – says that while US business leaders are praising or at least not pushing back against President Trump's efforts to prevent jobs from leaving the country, they realize that the approach would hurt their companies in the long run. Lane says the time has come for corporate America to speak out against policies that could hurt the US economy, while also continuing to support beneficial strategies.

LEADING THE NEWS

Trump Condemns FBI Leaks Of Priebus' Request On Alleged Russian Contacts.

President Trump on Friday demanded that the FBI crack down on leaks after reports emerged that Chief of Staff Reince Priebus allegedly asked the bureau to publicly refute claims that Trump's associates and campaign staffers were in contact with Russian intelligence agents, a move that potentially violates White House communication procedures with the bureau in ongoing investigations. The New York Times (2/24, Davis, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Trump "assailed the FBI as a dangerously porous agency" and "charg[ed] that leaks of classified information from within its ranks were putting the country at risk." He tweeted, "The FBI is totally unable to stop the national security 'leakers' that have permeated our government for a long time," adding, "They can't even find the leakers within the FBI itself. Classified information is being given to media that could have a devastating effect on U.S. FIND NOW."

The CBS Evening News  (2/24, lead story, 2:40, Pelley, 11.17M) reported Trump later "said that the news media should not be allowed to use anonymous source. 'You'll see stories dry up,' he said, 'like you've never seen before.'" Correspondent Margaret Brennan said the CBS News "confirmed the FBI Counterintelligence Division is leading an investigation into whether Trump associates were coordinating with Russian officials during the 2016 campaign," and, "The New York Times drew the ire of the White House for writing about constant contacts between Trump aides and Russian intelligence." Then, Brennan reported, CNN claimed on Thursday evening that "Priebus pressured the FBI to publicly refute the story."

Jonathan Karl of ABC World News Tonight  (2/24, story 5, 3:45, Muir, 14.63M) reported Trump "basked in the glow of a friendly crowd" at the CPAC, but then "slammed his own top law enforcement agency for failing to stop what he called illegal leaks." Karl said Trump "is especially outraged at a New York Times story quoting unnamed US officials alleging repeated contacts between the Trump campaign and Russian intelligence," and "is furious about new reports Priebus pressured the FBI to knock the story down. Such pressure could violate longstanding policy prohibiting White House interference in ongoing investigations." Karl added, "But ironically, the White House itself today organized a briefing for reporters on the story and insisted that officials be quoted anonymously."

In its lead story, CNN The Situation Room (2/24, 6:02 p.m. ET, Blitzer, 554K) reported, "In the midst of all the media criticism in the White House, the White House confirmed the essence of the story, that they did speak to the FBI for the communications and did ask the FBI in knocking down the stories describing them." CNN said as of Friday night, however, the White House continues "vehemently defending" the actions.

The AP (2/24, Pace) reported that White House Press Secretary Sean Spicer maintained "Priebus had little choice but to seek Comey's assistance in rebutting what Spicer said were inaccurate reports about contacts during last year's presidential campaign." Spicer said, "I don't know what else we were supposed to do." Spicer told CNN, "We didn't try to knock the story down. ... We asked them to tell the truth," the Washington Post (2/24, Wagner, 11.43M) added. The Post said that according to Spicer, the conversation that took place between Priebus and the FBI was "innocuous." He also criticized the CNN and AP reports, saying, "What you guys have done is indefensible and inaccurate," the Wall Street Journal (2/24, Mann, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reported.

Fox News (2/24, 11.07M) reported online that the White House confirmed that Priebus spoke with FBI Deputy Director Andrew McCabe. The White House, however, claimed that McCabe initiated the communications to inform the Trump Administration that the New York Times' reporting on Trump campaign contacts with Russia had contained inaccuracies. Roll Call (2/24, Bennett, 63K) reported that according to an Administration official, McCabe told Priebus following a meeting on an unrelated topic that the reporting about the Trump campaign's contacts with Russia was "bull----." Priebus, the official said, asked McCable what could be done about the reporting as the White House was "getting crushed" on the story. "McCabe later called back and said the agency would not be able to put out a statement, telling Priebus, 'We'd love to help but we can't get into the position of making statements on every story,'" Roll Call said. According to the official, FBI Director Comey later confirmed McCabe's comments. Slate (2/24, 1.83M) reported that according to the White House, McCabe and Comey "gave Priebus the go-ahead to discredit the [New York Times] story publicly." The Hill (2/24, Fabian, 1.25M) reports that according to the White House, FBI officials gave the Administration permission to cite McCabe and others as "senior intelligence officials" in discussions of the Times' coverage.

In video footage broadcast by CNN The Situation Room (2/24, 5:03 p.m. ET, Blitzer, 554K), Priebus asserted, "I've talked to the top levels of the intelligence community and they have assured me that that New York Times story was grossly overstated and inaccurate and totally wrong." Justice correspondent Pamela Brown quoted former Attorney General Eric Holder as writing in 2009 that contact between the White House and FBI should only happen when "it is important for the performance of the President's duties and appropriate from a law enforcement perspective." Brown added that DOJ memos "preclude FBI officials and White House officials from talking directly about pending investigations." CNN (2/24, Jarrett, 29.79M) reported online that in an interview with the network, former Attorney General Alberto Gonzales explained that the White House and Justice Department should limit their contacts to avoid pressure being placed on the latter and avoid "the appearance of political influence with respect to an investigation or prosecution." According to Politico (2/24, Arnsdorf, 2.46M), previous administrations prohibited "staff from discussing specific investigations and enforcement cases without clearance from the White House counsel" in order to avoid the "appearance of political tampering with law enforcement." The piece said it is not clear if the rules have now changed with the Trump Administration.

TIME (2/25, Calabresi, 6.98M) reported that the "back-and-forth" between the White House and FBI "may have broken internal rules" set in place by previous Administrations. "After President Nixon's scandals in the early 1970s, the Carter Administration imposed rules designed to prevent the FBI from meddling in politics, and to keep politicians from meddling in criminal investigations," Time said. The Clinton, George W. Bush, and Obama Administrations also limited contact between White House and Justice Department staff. Comey and McCabe may additionally have violated Regan-era rules "that require the Attorney General's approval for most contacts between the FBI and the White House regarding foreign intelligence matters that involve domestic political activities," Time added.

NBC Nightly News' (2/24, story 2, 2:45, Holt, 16.61M) Hallie Jackson reported, "Priebus broke no laws by having that conversation with the FBI official, despite Democratic concerns it may have amounted to political interference in an investigation into Russia's meddling with the election." Jackson added Trump is "going after 'leaks' he blames on the agency," even though he repeatedly cites "unnamed sources to slam political opponents, attacking those today, too."

In video footage broadcast by Fox News' Special Report (2/24, 6:04 p.m. ET, Baier, 1.53M), Trump suggested media organizations "shouldn't be allowed to use sources unless they use somebody's name." Correspondent Howard Kurtz reported, "The President is referring to a Washington Post story on Mike Flynn's pre-inauguration contacts with the Russian ambassador and the false account he gave to Vice President Pence." Kurtz added that the story "was later confirmed for the Administration and led Mr. Trump to fire his national security adviser." Kurtz said sources' anonymity is "crucial to investigative reporting" and sources' protection.

Also reporting were Reuters (2/24, Heavey, Chiacu, Stephenson), The Hill (2/24, Hensch, 1.25M), the Los Angeles Times (2/24, Lee, 4.52M), The Guardian (UK) (2/24, 4.07M), the Wall Street Journal (2/24, Ballhaus, Subscription Publication, 6.37M), the Washington Times (2/24, Boyer, 272K), and the CNN (2/26, Bradner, 29.79M) website.

White House Request On Russia Contacts Probe Puts Comey Again In "Political Crosshairs." Politico (2/25, Meyer, Stokols, Bender, 2.46M) reported that while FBI Director Comey "refused" the White House's request that the bureau "publicly refute news reports that associates of President Donald Trump, including campaign staff, engaged in possibly illegal contacts with Russian intelligence," their interaction "puts Comey squarely in the political crosshairs – again." According to Politico, the Washington Post on Friday said "that after Comey refused to get involved, the White House successfully turned to other intelligence officials, as well as to congressional Republicans with access to intelligence reports on the Russia probes, for help pushing back on the Feb. 14 New York Times story, which alleged months-long contacts between Trump associates and Russian intelligence."

The AP (2/25, Tucker) similarly says Comey is "in a familiar spot these days – the middle of political tumult," given he is "facing new political pressure as White House officials are encouraging him to follow their lead by publicly recounting private FBI conversations in an attempt to dispute reports about connections between the Trump administration and Russia."

Himes, Castro Back Congressional Probe Of Russian Contacts, Priebus' FBI Contacts. Rep. Jim Himes (D-CT) told CNN The Situation Room (2/24, Blitzer, 554K) that his House Intelligence Committee should investigate officials' contacts with Russia. Himes said "if in fact the White House is correct and that there was no contact with Russians and there is just nothing to see there, they should be out in front saying, let's do this investigation, let's show everything, let's get the documents out, let's move on so we can start talking about infrastructure." Himes accused the White House of instead "acting in exactly the opposite way" and "doing everything they can to delegitimize the study to say that the truth doesn't matter, and continuing to be dishonest about it. That is not the activities of a group of people who, in fact, don't have anything to hide."

Himes also told CNN The Situation Room (2/24, 5:22 p.m. ET, Blitzer, 554K) that Priebus "asked the FBI to help color a story was hardly classified national security information. What is a threat to this country, of course, is when Iran and China and North Korea see the President of the United States attacking his own security services, his own intelligence community, you can only imagine what the leaders of those countries are thinking, knowing that the United States President is apparently at war with the very people who will advise him on the motion sensitive questions of whether there is a threat to the United States, whether there is a terrorist threat, what the Russians are doing, what the Chinese are doing." He cautioned, "The President of the United States has got to stop publicly attacking the patriotic men and women who put their lives at risk to keep this country safe."

Former President Obama's senior adviser, David Axelrod, told CNN The Situation Room (2/24, 6:30 p.m. ET, Blitzer, 554K) that he agreed with Himes in that "it's hard to understand how the story about the White House chief of staff calling the FBI to try and enlist them in quelling a story that discomfited the President is a national security matter or a classified matter." Axelrod continued, "But the underlying story is one that should be further explored by the congress and others, and that is did the chief of staff call over there for that purpose." The Hill (2/24, Greenwood, 1.25M) reports that Axelrod tweeted Friday, "If @BarackObama [chief of staff] had called the FBI to knock down a story on an ongoing probe of the president's allies, Congress would have raised hell."

Rep. Joaquin Castro (D-TX), also on the Intelligence Committee, told CNN The Situation Room (2/24, Blitzer, 554K) that he would "absolutely" like to see both the House and Senate committees investigating "everything from Gen. Flynn's contacts with the Russians, to other campaign advisers who may have had contacts and relationships with the Russians, and now perhaps the White House possibly trying to strong arm the FBI into shaping the news coverage about the story." He added, "It's hard to give the Administration the benefit of the doubt because they have been so hostile to the press and the intelligence agencies to the CIA before, and today Donald Trump unloading on the FBI."

Democrats React To Preibus' Communication With FBI, Pelosi Seeks Probe. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi stated the Justice Department "must probe reports that...Priebus asked the FBI to push back on media coverage linking figures from...Trump's campaign to Russian intelligence," The Hill (2/24, Hensch, 1.25M) reported. In a Friday statement, Pelosi wrote, "The Trump White House has been caught trying to pressure the FBI into undermining a vital national security investigation into explosive ties between senior Trump officials and Russian intelligence agents, an action which is in violation of Department of Justice rules and may be illegal." She added that "Priebus has committed an outrageous breach of the FBI's independence."

CNN (2/25, Killough, 29.79M) reported online that Sen. Bob Casey tweeted, "The notion that @POTUS Admin would call @FBI & ask them to publicly downplay an ongoing investigation into Russia ties is deeply disturbing."

USA Today (2/24, Jackson, Johnson, 5.28M) reported that former CIA official and independent presidential candidate Evan McMullin Twitted about Trump's statements regarding Priebus' contact with the FBI, writing: "This seems like presidential confirmation that the White House asked the FBI to help cover Trump campaign ties to Russian officers."

The Hill (2/26, Savransky, 1.25M) reports that in comments to CNN, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie on Sunday seemingly tried to excuse the White House's contact with the FBI by mentioning the existence of a "learning curve." Christie said, "I don't think the chief of staff will ever have that kind of conversation with the FBI, with an FBI personnel again, nor should he." Though Christie said he doubted that Priebus did anything wrong, he suggested his actions could be perceived by some observers as improper.

Issa Demands Special Prosecutor For Investigation Into Alleged Russian Contacts. In ABC World News Tonight's (2/25, lead story, 2:45, Llamas, 14.63M) lead story, David Kerley on Saturday reported Rep. Darrell Issa (R-CA) called for a special prosecutor to investigate possible contacts between Trump's campaign associates and Russia. In video footage, Issa called for Attorney General Jeff Sessions to recuse himself because he "was on the campaign and" was appointed by Trump. NBC Nightly News' (2/25, story 5, 0:20, Diaz-Balart, 16.61M) Kelly O'Donnell reported that while "Issa is a Trump supporter," the lawmaker is worried Sessions "is too close to the President to oversee this kind of investigation."

The Washington Post (2/25, Wang, 11.43M) reported that in an appearance on HBO's "Real Time with Bill Maher," Issa, a senior member of the House Judiciary Committee and former chair of the House Oversight Committee, "seemed to agree with [host Bill] Maher that Sessions should not be involved," saying, "You cannot have somebody, a friend of mine, Jeff Sessions, who was on the campaign and who was an appointee. ... You're going to need to use the special prosecutor's statute and office." According to the Post, Issa "added that it would also be inappropriate for Sessions to pass the investigation on to the deputy attorney general. He then explained, in a lengthy tangent, that Russia needed to be investigated 'because they are bad people.'"

Politico (2/25, Wright, 2.46M) reported Sen. Mark Warner (D-VA), the ranking member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, "said Saturday he called Chairman Richard Burr...and CIA Director Mike Pompeo to express his concerns" about the investigation. In a statement, Warner asserted, "I will not accept any process that is undermined by political interference. ... I am consulting with members of the Intelligence Committee to determine an appropriate course of action so we can ensure that the American people get the thorough, impartial investigation that they deserve, free from White House interference."

Senate Intelligence Committee's Probe Into Russia's Election Meddling Garners Bipartisan Support. Bloomberg Politics (2/24, Strohm, 201K) reported a Senate Intelligence Committee investigation into Russian efforts to influence the presidential election "is still in its early stages," but "shaping up as an unexpectedly bipartisan effort." Republican lawmakers "don't want to be seen engaging in a cover-up," but want to prevent the investigation from escalating "the way GOP efforts to probe the Benghazi attacks did during the Obama administration." Armed Services Chairman John McCain (R-AZ) "has been strongly critical of Trump's talk about making deals with Russian President Vladimir Putin and has said he wants a thorough probe of Russia's conduct during the election." Sens. Roy Blunt (R-MO), Tom Cotton (R-AR), Marco Rubio (R-FL), however, "have been notably more hawkish on Russia than Trump." Sen. Chris Murphy (D-CT) said he was encouraged about the probe's direction, but he still wants an independent commission to investigate the allegations.

Poll Suggests Americans' Concerns Over Trump-Putin Relations Are Growing. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Bender, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reported a Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll suggested 38 percent of Americans are concerned Trump's relations with Russian President Vladimir Putin are too friendly and inappropriate for Trump's position, an increase of five percentage points over polling results last month. Nearly one-third of respondents claimed they had not formed an opinion on the matter, although about half indicated that they believe Congress should investigate campaign staffers' contacts with Russia and whether the nation interfered in the presidential election.

Cillizza: Trump's Focus On "Leaks" Misses Important Point About Priebus-FBI Communication. Reporter Chris Cillizza wrote in the Washington Post (2/24, 11.43M) that when CNN broke the story that Priebus had reached out to an FBI official to "to encourage him to talk without attribution to reporters about recent allegations that the Trump campaign had been in regular contact with Russian intelligence officials," Trump's response was to say, "Things are being leaked. ... It's a criminal action – criminal act – and it's been going on for a long time. Before me. But now it's really going on." Cillizza said "Trump is totally missing the point," which is that "it's against the rules for the White House to contact the FBI for matters like that, not that someone at the FBI leaked out the fact that it happened." Instead, said Cillizza, Trump is "making the conversation all about leaks" and "turning the conversation more in his favor."

Politico Magazine Analysis: Leaks Will Get Worse For Trump Administration. A Politico Magazine (2/24, Hess) analysis cited the late New York Times reporter James Reston, who it says "set the standard for Washington coverage in the second half of the 20th century" and who is credited as saying "a government is the only known vessel that leaks from the top." The piece highlighted the first top level leak of the Trump Administration, which was the draft executive order titled "Detention and Interrogation of Enemy Combatants," which "called for a review of the Obama-era policy that shuttered secret detention prisons known as 'black sites,' where interrogation teams tortured prisoners." Politico said that "it will get worse for Trump when the budget and major pieces of legislation gain center stage."

WPost: Separation Between White House, FBI Must Be "Honored." The Washington Post (2/24, 11.43M) editorialized "it looks bad" that Priebus asked FBI Deputy Director McCabe if the FBI would be willing to publicly state that the story on Trump's campaign contacts with Russia was "overblown." The Post said the "Justice Department issued guidelines in 2007 and 2009 limiting contact between the White House and federal investigative entities." The Post argued "the principle of separation that these rules represent should be honored with particular care when communications might relate to an investigation of the president or his circle."

Amid Calls For Special Prosecutor, Trump Says "Russia Talk Is Fake News."

The White House on Sunday continued to deny links between President Trump's campaign and the Russian government while also saying it is too early to determine if Attorney General Sessions should recuse himself from an investigation into the issue. Media coverage focuses on President Trump's tweeted comments about the issue and Congressional calls – including by Rep. Darrell Issa – for a special prosecutor to be appointed.

Politico (2/26, Conway, 2.46M) says that "after a weekend of thorny questions and barbed Democratic criticism surrounding ties" between his campaign and Russia, Trump "took to his favorite platform Sunday to fight back." Trump tweeted, according to The Hill (2/26, Savransky, 1.25M), "Russia talk is FAKE NEWS put out by the Dems, and played up by the media, in order to mask the big election defeat and the illegal leaks!"

The AP (2/26) reports the White House "is dodging questions" about whether Sessions should recuse himself from the investigation and the Washington Post (2/26, Wagner, 11.43M) says deputy press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders indicated it would be premature to conclude that the Attorney General should appoint a special prosecutor. Sanders said, "I don't think we're there yet. Let's work through this process. You guys want to jump to the very end of the line." Sanders added, "We're confident whatever review that Congress wants to do, that's the first step." Sanders said on ABC's This Week (2/26, Stephanopolous, 6.61M) that the Administration is "confident that" that any Congressional investigation is "going to come to the same conclusion – that we had no involvement inn any of this."

ABC World News Tonight (2/26, story 2, 1:55, Llamas, 14.63M) reported "calls for an independent prosecutor...[were] growing louder" on Sunday as "prominent Republican" Issa "weigh[ed] in" and called for a special prosecutor. Issa is shown saying, "You're going to need to use the special prosecutor's statute and office." Issa added, according to USA Today (2/26, Jackson, 5.28M), that Sessions "can't just give it to your deputy. That's another political appointee."

However, Kelly O'Donnell reported on MSNBC's Weekends with Alex Witt (2/26, 222K) that "we're not seeing any traction from other Republicans on that subject yet." O'Donnell added, "That could come in time, but at this stage, we're just not seeing it." On ABC's This Week (2/26, Stephanopolous, 6.61M) House Oversight Committee member Rep. Jim Jordan said the intelligence committees should be allowed to "work" on the investigation before a special prosecutor is needed. Jordan said, "If there's more investigation that's needed, I'm on the Oversight Committee, we've never been shy about digging into issues and we'll do that. No one's ever accused me of going easy on my own party."

On NBC's Meet the Press (2/26, Todd, 157K), Sen. Tom Cotton also urged allowing lawmakers to work through the process. Cotton said the Senate Intelligence Committee "has been examining Russia's attempt to undermine our interests around the world" since he has been a member. Cotton added, "We have said that we will undertake in a bipartisan fashion an inquiry into everything that Russia tried to do in our election process last year. If that leads to potential contacts between Trump associates and the Russian government, then we'll explore those, as well." Cotton continued, "I am confident we'll proceed wherever the facts take us." Politico (2/26, Conway, 2.46M) reports that Cotton said the issue of a special prosecutor is "way, way, getting ahead of ourselves." NBC Nightly News (2/26, story 2, 2:40, Snow, 16.61M) showed Cotton saying there are "no allegations of any crime occurring" and not "even indication there is criminal investigations under way by the FBI."

McClatchy (2/25, Schofield, 74K) reports Congressional Democrats "are questioning whether recent comments from leading Republicans, made at the request of the White House, have compromised" the lawmakers' investigations. McClatchy says both Sen. Richard Burr and Rep. Devin Nunes "have issued statements saying they have done nothing improper." Jack Langer, a spokesman for Nunes, said the congressman was not influenced by the White House request and his "comments were entirely appropriate."

The Washington Times (2/26, Richardson, 272K) says Democrats indicate that Chief of Staff Priebus' conversation with the FBI about the investigation "is the latest hindrance to an impartial investigation." Reuters (2/26, Chiacu) reports House Minority Leader Pelosi said Sessions "must recuse himself." Pelosi, on ABC's This Week (2/26, Stephanopolous, 6.61M) said, "You have seen a flurry of activities that are completely inappropriate, encouraging lawmakers, encouraging officials to say something is one way or another. Let's have the investigation and find out the truth.

And we have been calling, we now have 100 Democrats plus one Republican on a bill for an outside, independent commission to study the personal, political, and financial relationship between President Trump and the Russians."

Brennan Calls For Congress To Investigate "With Vigor," "Bipartisan Support." Bloomberg Politics (2/26, Brody, 201K) reports former CIA Director Brennan called for Congressional committees to "pursue this investigation with vigor and with the appropriate amount of bipartisan support." Brennan said on CBS' "Face the Nation" that "it's very important that the investigation be done in a bipartisan fashion," adding, "If it's only one party that's going to be leading this, it is not going to deliver the results that the American people need and deserve."

Christie: No Need For Special Prosecutor In Russia Probe. Politico (2/26, Conway, 2.46M) reports that New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie said on Sunday "that he does not think a special prosecutor is needed to investigate allegations about Trump's relationship with Russia. 'The Justice Department over the course of time has shown itself, with the professionals that are there, to have the ability to investigate these type of things,' Christie told CNN's Jake Tapper on 'State of the Union.' 'This is whether you're a Republican or a Democrat, we've seen it happen on both sides, when a special prosecutor gets involved, the thing gets completely out of control. And I think that doesn't serve anybody's purposes.'"

Bloomberg's Talev: White House Communication "Ill Conceived," But Not "Nefarious." Margaret Talev of Bloomberg Politics said on CNN Inside Politics (2/26, 303K), "I'm not ready do describe nefarious effect to any of this. ... If we hear any hint or whisper that this Administration is laying heavily on the FBI, on the CIA, on other agencies to reach conclusions that they haven't reached, that's one thing. I think this is a sort of an ill conceived chain of communication, to try to figure out if all the stuff people were telling them behind the scenes could emerge in public on record."

Sattler: Time For Democrats "To Start Talking Impeachment." In a USA Today (2/26, 5.28M) op-ed, The National Memo columnist Jason Sattler says President Trump's efforts to influence investigations into his contacts with Russia are the equivalent of "Watergate with a Congress even more interested than the president in covering up potential high crimes and misdemeanors." Sattler says "it's time for Democrats to start talking impeachment" despite it being "less likely to happen under this Congress than the president giving up basic cable to learn Ancient Greek so he can read some Plutarch."

Protesters In Boston Demand Investigation. The AP (2/26) reports about 200 protesters in Boston on Sunday "demand[ed] an investigation into allegations" that Trump's campaign was in contact with Russia. The AP says the demonstrators "chanted slogans, waved signs and heard from speakers who said the public deserves to know about any ties between Trump's campaign and Russia."

COUNTER-TERRORISM

Kansas Man Pleads Not Guilty In Plot To Bomb Somali Refugees.

The AP (2/24, Hegeman) reports the lawyer for Kansas man Patrick Stein, accused of planning an attack on Somali refugees, said his client "believed then-President Barack Obama would declare martial law and not recognize the validity of the election if Donald Trump won." The AP says Stein and two others charged with him have pleaded not guilty and that the defense claims Stein took a "self-defensive posture." However, "Assistant US Attorney Anthony Mattivi told the court that Stein conducted surveillance on the apartment complex wearing a bulletproof vest and while armed with a handgun and assault rifle." The Philly (PA) (2/24, Hegeman, 942K) posts the AP's coverage to its website.

Minnesota Group Aiding Somalis "Proud" Of Decision To Reject Federal Grant.

The AP (2/25, Forliti) reports that a Minnesota non-profit, Ka Joog, is one of several that has rejected funding from the Federal government designed to counter violent extremism. The AP says the group "works to improve the lives of young Somalis" and that they "knew the stakes were high" when they rejected the funding, with the career mentoring and job placement program possibly being canceled. The organization, according to the piece, "is proud of its decision." They plan to start fundraising beginning this April "to try to make up for the half-million dollars it turned down."

Virginia Man Gets 11 Year Prison Sentence For Helping Another Man Join ISIS.

Reuters (2/24, Simpson) reports 26-year-old taxi driver Mahmoud Amin Mohamed Elhassan of Woodbridge, Virginia received an 11 year sentence Friday "for trying to help another man join the Islamic State militant group in Syria," according to the Justice Department. Reuters says Elhassan pleaded guilty to driving Joseph Hassan Farrokh to Richmond, from where Farrokh intended to fly "to the Middle East to fight for Islamic State, with Elhassan to follow him at a later date, the Justice Department said in a statement."

Pentagon Requests Expanded US Involvement Against Somali Extremists.

The AP (2/26, Baldor) reports senior US officials said the Pentagon asked the White House to expand US special operation forces' ability to battle al-Shabab militants in Somalia, a measure that would grant "the military greater flexibility to launch airstrikes against extremists that appear to be a threat." The officials said the proposal included elements that would also allow special operations forces greater flexibility on whether to accompany local troops and ease restrictions on when the US can use airstrikes against the al Qaeda-affiliated group. The officials said Defense Secretary Mattis approved the proposed recommendations and forwarded them to the White House in early February, but no final decision has been made.

Administration's Plans To Designate Iran's IRGC As Terrorist Organization Have Stalled.

Officials told Reuters (2/24, Walcott, Spetalnick) on condition of anonymity that the Administration's proposed designation of Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps as a terrorist organization stalled after defense and intelligence officials warned that the measure could escalate US-Iranian tensions. "The Iranians are a major source of trouble ... but those kind of moves would only help the hardliners" and undercut moderate leaders, one official explained. The resignation of Gen. Michael Flynn, "one of the Trump White House's leading Iran hawks," on Feb. 13 complicated a decision on the proposal, the officials added. The discussion is still in play, they claimed, but on hold.

French President Criticizes Trump For Remarks On European Terrorist Attacks.

The New York Times (2/25, Rubin, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports French President François Hollande criticized President Trump's remarks to the Conservative Political Action Conference on Friday, in which Trump implied European terror attacks were a consequence of open border policies. "I think it's never a good idea to show the least disapproval with respect to an ally," said the "usually mild-mannered" Hollande. Hollande did not comment on Trump's claim that the terror attacks in Paris and Nice negatively impacted France's tourism industry; however, the Times notes Paris suffered a mere 1.4 percent decline in visitors since 2014. Paris Mayor Anne Hidalgo commented on Twitter that American tourists have placed 30 percent more reservations this year than last year.

French Judges Place Two Suspects Under Formal Investigation For Plotting Attack.

Reuters (2/25, Labbé) reports French authorities arrested two people on Tuesday on "charges of criminal conspiracy to commit a terrorist act, and possession of weapons." On Saturday, a judicial source revealed French judges launched a formal investigation into the people on suspicion that they were either plotting an imminent terror attack in France, or were planning to travel to Syria. The judicial source also indicated that the two detained suspects may be connected to suspects arrested in a Feb. 10 raid in Montpellier. A third person was arrested along with the two other suspects but later released.

French Lawmakers Criticize Deradicalization Centers As "Total Fiasco."

The Washington Post (2/24, McAuley, 11.43M) reports the French Senate issued a bipartisan report in which it described the government's attempts to "deradicalize" former and potential terrorists as a "total fiasco," according to senator Philippe Bas. The report included "a firm condemnation of the planned network of 12 deradicalization centers," dubbed Centers for Prevention, Integration and Citizenship, and criticized the programs as too hastily designed and lacking the proper due diligence.

White House Says Trump Might Support Investigation Of Yemen Raid.

Reuters (2/26, Mutikani) reports White House deputy press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders on Sunday said President Trump might support an investigation into last month's raid in Yemen that killed al Qaeda militants, but also led to the death of Navy SEAL William "Ryan" Owens. ABC World News Tonight (2/26, lead story 3:30, Llamas, 14.63M) showed Sanders saying that while she has not "had the chance to speak with him directly" about the issue, she "would imagine that he would be supportive of that."

The New York Times (2/26, Schmitt, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that Owens' father, William, told the Miami Herald that he refused to meet with Trump on the day his son's body was returned home and said the government "owes my son an investigation." The father said, "Don't hide behind my son's death to prevent an investigation."

Northern Sinai's ISIS-Led Insurgency "Stoking Panic" Among Coptic Christians.

The AP (2/26, Rohan) reports the ISIS-led insurgency in Egypt's northern Sinai town of el-Arish recently pledged to increase attacks on minority Coptic Christians and their holy sites. The ISIS affiliate's December suicide bombing of a Cairo church and murders of two Christians on Tuesday are "stoking panic among Christians," prompting hundreds of them to flee to Ismalia in the Suez Canal. The shift of ISIS' tactics to target the Christians also "poses a fresh challenge to President Abdel-Fattah el-Sissi's government to put down an IS-led insurgency in northern Sinai and prevent spillover" into mainland Egypt. Human rights activists expressed alarm over the recent displacements and the overall decline of Coptic Christians from about 5,000 before the 2011 Arab Spring uprising to fewer than 1,000. The activists suggested the displacement of Coptic Christians evidences the government's failure to protect the minority population, which comprises about 10 percent of Egypt's population and has "always been a favorite target of Islamic extremists."

Terrorist Behind The Upcoming "Day Without A Woman" Protest.

The New York Post (2/25, Smith, 3.82M) reports on the "Day without a Woman" strike that is being called for on March 8. The Post says the vibe of the strike will be different than that of the women's march in January and that "the brains behind the movement are calling for a 'new wave of militant feminist struggle.' That's right: militant, not peaceful." A manifesto by the group organizing the strike was co-authored, the Post says, "by, among others, Rasmea Yousef Odeh, a convicted terrorist." The Post highlights "Odeh, a Palestinian, was convicted in Israel in 1970 for her part in two terrorist bombings, one of which killed two students while they were shopping for groceries." She spent 10 years in jail before coming to the US and faces a court hearing this spring for immigration fraud.

McMaster: Muslims Who Commit Acts Of Terror Are "Un-Islamic."

The New York Times (2/24, Landler, Schmitt, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports National Security Adviser McMaster on Thursday told the National Security Council that the moniker "radical Islamic terrorism" was not helpful because Muslims who commit terrorist actions are "un-Islamic," according to sources at the meeting. The Times says McMaster's remarks indicate he "might move the council away from the ideologically charged views of" his predecessor, Gen. Michael Flynn. Furthermore, the Times writes, McMaster's language "is closer to the positions of former Presidents Barack Obama and George W. Bush," who both "took pains to separate acts of terrorism from Islamic teaching, in part because they argued that the United States needed the help of Muslim allies to hunt down terrorists."

COUNTER-INTELLIGENCE

FBI Investigating Online University For Possible Ties To Chinese Military.

In a Fox News' Special Report  (2/24, 1.53M) exclusive investigative report, Catherine Herridge reported, "In December 2012, the FBI raided the northern Virginia offices of UMT, the University of Management and Technology. The online school advertises as military friendly, helping vets complete new and advanced career. That same day, agents raided the home of UMT's academic dean, J. Davidson Frame, and his wife, UMT president Yanping Chen Frame." Military veteran Stephen Rhodes assisted the FBI in its investigation into the UMT leaders' ties to the Chinese military. Chen has repeatedly "denied being a colonel in the Chinese military." Former diplomatic security agent Ray Fournier said if Chen misrepresented those ties on her immigration petition documents, "then we have a false statement, and where that comes into play most assuredly is in the arena of passport fraud." Rhodes said he is concerned veterans' military information could be compromised because of Chen's role at UMT.

CRIMINAL INVESTIGATIONS

De Blasio Questioined By Federal Prosecutors Over Campaign Fundraising.

The AP (2/24) reports that New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio "met about four hours with authorities as part of his administration's continued cooperation with the probe by the office of" Manhattan US Attorney Preet Bharara, Phillips said in a statement. De Blasio (D), "did not speak to reporters when he left the law offices of his attorney Friday afternoon," and "those seen entering the building before the meeting included Andrew Goldstein, the head of Bharara's public corruption unit, and Assistant U.S. Attorney Russell Capone." The AP adds that "two people with knowledge of the probe" said "the mayor faced questions about whether people were promised favors in return for donations to his 2013 mayoral campaign," and that "investigators are also trying to learn whether promises were made to donors to de Blasio's since closed nonprofit, the Campaign for One New York."

The New York Times (2/24, Rashbaum, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that "about a half-dozen prosecutors and several F.B.I. agents were present, a person with knowledge of the session said." The prosecutors "included Mr. Bharara's deputy, Joon H. Kim, and the chief and deputy chief of the office's Public Corruption Unit," while the FBI agents "included the chief of the Public Corruption Squad handling the case."

Reuters (2/24, Allen) reports that de Blasio "has repeatedly said he and his campaign staff have done nothing wrong and that he was cooperating with prosecutors from the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan in their yearlong criminal investigation."

The New York Post (2/24, Schram, 3.82M) reports that "hard-charging US Attorney Preet Bharara sent a message to Mayor de Blasio Friday – trotting out the same prosecutors who took down Sheldon Silver and Dean Skelos to interrogate Hizzoner about his campaign fund-raising activities. 'Preet's office is a force to be reckoned with, but these prosecutors he rolled out for this case are a big deal and very competent, indicating that they are taking this matter very seriously,' a federal law-enforcement source told The Post."

The New York Daily News (2/25, Slattery, 4.45M) reports that de Blasio "skipped town Saturday to spend time with fellow Dems following his highly anticipated sit-down with federal prosecutors from U.S. Attorney Preet Bharara's office."

The New York Post (2/24, 3.82M) editorializes that "now it's up to both prosecutors to bring this year-long investigation to a swift conclusion, one way or the other," as "New Yorkers deserve to see a resolution as quickly as possible and not have it hanging over this year's election."

The New York Post (2/25, 3.82M) editorializes that "even after his sitdown Friday with prosecutors," de Blasio "still hasn't explained just how he'll pay the lawyers representing him in multiple corruption probes," that is, "whether his legal defense fund – which will cover his costs from investigations into the possible sale of City Hall favors to his donors – will take money from people doing business with the city."

The Wall Street Journal (2/26, Gay, Orden, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports the meeting fueled speculation that a yearlong investigation into his fundraising may be reaching its conclusion.

Prosecutors Probing Possible De Blasio Role In Re-Opening Of School Run By

Fundraiser. The New York Daily News (2/26, Durkin, 4.45M) reports that federal prosecutors "are looking into whether" de Blasio "intervened to get a vacate order lifted on a Hasidic school on behalf of an influential rabbi who raised money for him." Moishe Indig, "a leader of the Satmar sect, supported de Blasio's 2013 campaign and co-hosted a fundraiser for him, and his ties to the mayor have come under scrutiny by investigators who grilled de Blasio for four hours Friday." The Daily News adds that Stephen Witt, "founder of the website Kings County Politics, which first reported the allegations, said he turned over notes to U.S. Attorney Preet Bharara's office in December documenting charges that the mayor ordered city officials to allow the school buildings to re-open after they were shut down for building code violations."

The New York Post (2/26, Short, Bain, 3.82M) reports that Indig "allegedly asked City Hall to lift a Satmar school's partial vacate order in December 2014, sources said. 'They just found out about it and they're looking at it,' said one City Hall source familiar with the inquiry. 'This info came late to them.'" The Post adds that New York City building inspectors "had found several 'illegal classrooms' in the basement of the Sanford Street school and issued a partial vacate order on Dec. 18, 2014, for a 'failure to maintain the building,' city building records show," and "six days later, on Christmas Eve, the order was rescinded when Brooklyn Building Commissioner Ira Gluckman inspected the premises himself, records show." The Post reports that "one source close to Indig, whose Aroni Satmar sect ran the school, said the Hasidic power broker called the mayor at the time and asked him for assistance."

NYC Official Who Approve Housing Deal Dismissed. The New York Post (2/26, Short, 3.82M) reports that "a top city official who approved the 2015 sale of a Lower East Side nursing home to a condo developer was fired Friday, only hours after Mayor de Blasio was questioned by federal prosecutors in a probe of the mayor's fund-raising, according to the Wall Street Journal." Ricardo Morales, deputy commissioner of the Department of Citywide Administrative Services, "OK'd the removal of a deed restriction on Rivington House, allowing it to be sold and turned into a luxury condo." According to the Post, "a DCAS spokeswoman said the leadership change had nothing to do with the mayor's interview with the US Attorney's Office and was 'in the works for some time.'"

NYTimes Analysis: De Blasio Has "No Credible Challenger" For Primary. According to the New York Times (2/26, Goodman, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), New York Mayor Bill de Blasio has "no credible challenger" within the Democratic Party for the September primary election, despite having approval ratings below 50 percent almost eight months ago. The Times notes that some potential challengers would have to step down from their current office to run, while others are waiting to see what comes of the federal investigations of the mayor's administration. Still others are reluctant because de Blasio is "progressive enough" but not too far left, says one political science scholar, and "he doesn't have exploitable weaknesses," says another expert.

Judge Rules Reporter Will Not Have To Testify At Oregon Refuge Trial.

The AP (2/24, Dubois) reports from Portland, OR that "a former Oregon Public Broadcasting reporter won't have to testify at the ongoing conspiracy trial of four men who joined Ammon and Ryan Bundy at last winter's armed occupation of a national wildlife refuge, a federal judge ruled Friday." The AP adds that "asserting journalist's privilege, Oregon Public Broadcasting and reporter John Sepulvado fought a government subpoena to testify about whether his January 2016 story about occupation leader Ryan Bundy was authentic and accurately depicted Bundy's point of view." The AP notes that Attorney General Sessions "approved the subpoena shortly after his confirmation." Defense attorneys "contend Bundy's statements to Sepulvado shouldn't be admitted as evidence because it's unknown what questions were asked and what responses were omitted during the editing process."

Nearly 100 Headstones In Philadelphia Jewish Cemetery Broken, Overturned.

ABC World News Tonight (2/26, story 6, 0:20, Llamas, 14.63M) briefly reported "a disturbing incident at a Jewish cemetery in Philadelphia," and police "are trying to track down" the vandals, said the CBS Weekend News (2/26, story 4, 0:20, Quijano). USA Today (2/26, Toppo, 5.28M) explains that vandals broke or overturned between 75 and 100 headstones at Mount Carmel Cemetery. Detective Shawn Thrush told the Philadelphia Inquirer the acts were "beyond vandalism."

According to the Washington Post (2/26, Kaplan, 11.43M), Aaron Mallin was visiting his father's grave Sunday morning when he discovered the vandalism and reported it to the police. Investigators say they do not have surveillance footage or any leads that would help determine whether it was the work of "drunken kids" or a hate crime. The New York Times (2/26, Chokshi, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Philadelphia Mayor Jim Kenney said the perpetrators would be "prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law" because "hate is not permissible in Philadelphia." Gov. Tom Wolf and Sen. Bob Casey also denounced the act. Reuters (2/26, Simpson) says the Anti-Defamation League is offering a $10,000 reward for leads, and Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Emmanuel Nahshon tweeted a message in support of authorities' capacity to "catch and punish [the] culprits" of the "shocking" and worrisome "desecration."

Two Indians Shot At Kansas Bar Raises Fears In India Of Mistreatment In US.

The New York Times (2/24, Eligon, Blinder, Najar, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reported on its front-page that a shooting on Friday at a Kansas bar "left one Indian engineer dead and another injured" and "escalated into an international incident amid fears that the attack was motivated by bias and hate." The Times says that the FBI is investigating the shooting of Srinivas Kuchibhotla and Alok Madasani as a possible hate crime, while in New Delhi, "India's government expressed shock" and new fears have emerged "about the treatment of foreigners in the United States."

White House spokesman Sean Spicer, however, said on Friday that while the shooting was tragic that linking it to President Trump's rhetoric is absurd and that it is too early to know a motive, Reuters (2/24, Rascoe) also reports.

The family of the Indian men shot "said they feared that an atmosphere of fear and xenophobia in the United States means the country is not a safe place for Indians," the Washington Post (2/24, Gowen, Lakshmi, 11.43M) reports. A relative of Kuchibhotla, Venu Madhav, said, "There is a kind of hysteria spreading that is not good because so many of our beloved children live there. ...Such hatred is not good for people." The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Bengali, 4.52M) adds Kuchibhotla was remembered in his home town of Hyderabad "as a devoted son who loved life in the United States and took frequent trips with his wife to visit Indian friends living in other cities."

CBS Weekend News (2/26, story 3, 1:55, Quijano), the Wall Street Journal (2/24, Mahtani, Subscription Publication, 6.37M), and Reuters (2/24) also reported on this story.

FBI Considers Hate Crime Investigation Into Fatal Shooting Of Indian Immigrant. In a lead story for NBC Nightly News (2/25, lead story, 2:55, Diaz-Balart, 16.61M), Morgan Radford reported the FBI is considering whether to investigate the fatal shooting of an Indian immigrant in Kansas this week as a hate crime. Police accused 51-year-old Adam Purinton of shooting and killing Srinivas Kuchibhotla and wounding Alok Madasani. Radford commented, "This is just the latest in a series of suspected crimes targeting religious or ethnic minorities." The AP (2/24) reports that according to witnesses, prior to opening fire, Purinton yelled "get out of my country." Hours later, the former air traffic controller "reportedly told a bartender in another town that he needed a place to hide because he had just killed two Middle Eastern men."

Indian Students Rethink Studying In US Following Kansas Shooting. The Washington Post (2/25, Gowen, 11.43M) reported the shooting of two Indians in Kansas has left many Indian graduate students rethinking studies in the US. The Post said that "concern over the troubled US political climate, beginning with its rhetoric-charged presidential campaign, has reverberated through India's thriving industry for test preparation and admissions coaching, which prepares students for study abroad." According to the piece, "the possible hate crime has prompted anger in India and concern that the Trump-era United States is no longer a safe place for its thriving community of visiting Indian students, scholars and tech workers."

Kansas Shooting Victim Refused To Leave "The Country He Loved." The Washington Post (2/25, Selk, 11.43M) reported that the family of the Indian man killed in last week's Kansas shooting, Srinivas Kuchibhotla, "warned him about the dangers of remaining in the United States." Speaking at a news conference on Friday, his wife Sunayana Dumala indicated that they were uncertain of staying in the US, saying "I told him many times we should think about going back [to India]." However, she also noted her husband "was not fearful" and "he refused to abandon 'the country he loved.'"

University of Connecticut Student Killed, Eight Arrested In Off-Campus Frat Party.

ABC World News Tonight (2/25, story 5, 1:40, Llamas, 14.63M) reported on the death of a 19-year-old college student at the University of Connecticut and the arrest of eight others after an off-campus fraternity party. Correspondent Eva Pilgrim said, "Investigators say firefighters were responding to a call when their SUV accidentally ran over 19-year-old Jeffny Pally, who'd fallen asleep against the fire house garage door. .... The emergency call turned out to be false alarm. Two students allegedly stealing a fire extinguisher, both now facing charges. And that's not all. Six more students at an off-campus Kappa Sigma party also facing charges for allegedly providing the alcohol to Pally."

Manhunt Underway For Shooter Who Killed Eight Year Girl In Texas.

ABC World News Tonight (2/25, story 4, 2:10, Llamas, 14.63M) reported on a homicide investigation in Houston, Texas following an overnight collision at an intersection that "erupted in gunfire, killing a little girl who was traveling in the car with her mother." ABC's Adrienne Bankert indicated the suspect is still unknown but that a manhunt is currently underway. She said, "Police say early this morning, two or three cars were speeding down this Houston road. One, this white Pontiac crashing with Toyia Thomas' Honda Accord, her eight-year-old daughter, De'Maree Adkins, in the backseat. ... Moments later, police say someone pulled out a gun, firing eight shots. Bullets flying into the backseat, hitting De'Maree."

FBI Searches Indiana Home In Case Of Slain Teens.

WANE-TV Fort Wayne, IN (2/26, 48K) reports online that the FBI on Saturday searched a Peru, Indiana home in relation to the killings of two teenage girls. "Abigail Williams, 13, and Liberty German, 14, were both found dead in a wooded area near the Delphi Historic Trail, approximately 60 miles northwest of Indianapolis. Law enforcement is investigating the case as a double homicide," WANE reports. The search, FBI Supervisory Special Agent Bob Ramsey said, revealed that the residents of the home were "in no way connected" to the girls' deaths. "Ramsey said the FBI will continue to execute search warrants as it sees fit," the website says. The Evansville (IN) Courier & Press (2/26, Paul, 156K) reports a $50,000 reward has prompted "a flood of information" in the case. The WLFI-TV Lafayette, IN (2/25, 117K) website provides similar coverage.

FBI Helps Search For Missing California Teen.

The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Rocha, 4.52M) reported that the FBI has joined the search for 14-year-old California boy Elias Rodriguez who disappeared this month during a storm. "The Sylmar boy was reported missing on Feb. 17, when he failed to return home after school. Authorities have already offered a $50,000 reward for information leading to his recovery," the Times says. The Los Angeles Daily News (2/24, 315K) reported that the FBI and police said they were "pursuing every lead" in their search for the missing teen. The My News LA (CA) (2/24) provided similar coverage.

Florida Police Arrest Man After Snapchat Video Shows Him Committing Arson.

ABC World News Tonight (2/25, story 9, 1:35, Llamas, 14.63M) reported that Florida police have arrested a man who they say "set a building on fire and then shared the video on Snapchat." ABC's Marci Gonzalez said, "Investigators crediting Snapchat with helping them solve a case of arson" after "25-year-old Anthony Stowers posted several videos on the popular app. In one clip, the police report states, Stowers recorded himself saying, 'Y'all gonna see a structure fire tonight. I hope you all enjoy.'" Police note the motivation for the fire may have been "because of a girl he pursued romantically turning down his advances."

Pickup Truck "Plows" Into Mardi Gras Parade, Injuring 28.

The New York Times (2/25, Mele, Robertson, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports 28 people were injured at a Mardi Gras parade on Saturday in New Orleans when a "pickup truck plowed into a crowd of spectators." New Orleans Police Department spokesman Beau Tidwell noted the driver is in custody and said, "This was a tragedy that came from someone making bad decisions with alcohol and vehicles." None of the injuries are life threatening, according to Mayor Mitch Landrieu. Reuters (2/26) reports that 25-year-old Neilson Rizzuto was charged in the incident after being taken into custody in "a highly intoxicated state."

Arson Damages Florida Mosque.

The AP (2/24) reports a mosque in Tampa, Florida was set on fire on Friday and investigators said it was intentional. According to a news release from Hillsborough County Fire Rescue, the arson took place at the Islamic Society of New Tampa. Council on American-Islamic Relations in Florida spokesman Wilfredo Amr Ruiz said, "It is worrisome that our community has fallen victim of what appears to be another hate crime." ATF agents were on the scene, though the piece says local fire department officials are leading the investigation. This is the second arson case involving a mosque in Florida in the last six months.

Reuters (2/24, Jenkins) reports CAIR Florida is offering a $5,000 reward for information that leads to an arrest and conviction in the arson case. Tampa Mayor Bob Buckhorn also "called on the community to stand up for anyone victimized for their religion," saying "We will not tolerate this. ...This is America. Our America, their America."

Military Judge Rejects Bergdahl's Claim He Cannot Get Fair Trial After Trump Statements.

McClatchy (2/24, Sowell, 74K) reports military judge Army Col. Jeffery Nance on Friday rejected a claim by US Army Sgt. Bowe Bergdahl's defense lawyer that he "cannot get a fair trial after Donald Trump, when he was running for president, repeatedly called the Idaho native a traitor and said he should be pushed out of a plane without a parachute." Nance ruled, "No reasonable member of the public, apprised of all the facts and circumstances and seeing campaign rhetoric for what it is, would believe that because candidate Trump said those troubling things and is now President Trump, the accused has been or will be denied a fair trial."

Sununu Asks White House For Voting Fraud Proof.

Politico (2/24, Quigley, 2.46M) reports on Friday New Hampshire Gov. Chris Sununu indicated he has requested proof from the White House "of alleged massive voting fraud in his state, in the wake of claims by the Trump administration." Sununu said, "We've talked a little bit, and I basically said, 'Look, if there's real evidence out there that you have that we don't have, we're happy to talk about that and take a look at it.'" He also stated, "In New Hampshire, though, you have to understand, we have some very loose voting laws. ...It's about redefining what is a resident, what is domicile, making sure our election laws are as tight as any other state out there."

Convicted Cop Killer Recommended For Parole In California.

The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Moran, 4.52M) reports a man convicted of killing a San Diego, California police officer, Archie Buggs, more than 30 years ago has been recommended for parole by the state Parole Board on Thursday. The Times says "the decision marks the third time since 2014 that a Parole Board has cleared the way for Cecena to be released. Twice before, in 2014 and 2015, that decision was subsequently overturned by Gov. Jerry Brown."

DC Shooting Leaves Two Officers Wounded, Suspect Killed.

ABC World News Tonight  (2/24, lead story, 2:30, Muir, 14.63M) in its lead segment reported on a deadly police shooting in Washington DC, where two officers were shot and wounded and a suspect killed. It is unclear at this point whether "the officers were shot by the suspect or if there was friendly fire." ABC's Senior Justice Correspondent Pierre Thomas said, "Both officers will survive their wounds, but the encounter shows the daily dangers officers increasingly face. In 2016, 64 officers were killed by gunfire, up 56 percent compared to the previous year." He also noted, "police are reviewing the body cam video and the mayor will decide on whether to release it. Tonight, authorities stress that the videos seen online only shows one angle, so the public should not draw any conclusions."

The Washington Post (2/24, Williams, Zauzmer, 11.43M) also reports the shooting took place "the Trinidad neighborhood of Northeast Washington" and that the officers "were in the neighborhood as part of the police department's response to an earlier report of shots fired on Thursday afternoon, Interim D.C. Police Chief Peter Newsham said." Both "Newsham and Mayor Muriel Bowser went to the hospital where the officers were being treated."

Chicago Police Superintendent "Fires Back" At Trump Criticism Over Increased Violence.

The Washington Times (2/24, Noble, 272K) reports Chicago's police superintendent Eddie Johnson on Thursday "fired back at President Trump over his criticism of the city over recent shootings, saying the president hasn't responded to local officials' requests for aid to combat crime." The Times says he acknowledged the unacceptability of gun violence but also "noted that the city's suggestions for ways the federal government could help stem the violence have gone unanswered." He said, "We've made requests to the White House and the Justice Department for them to support our work — from increasing federal gun prosecution to more FBI, DEA and ATF agents to more funding for mentoring, job training and more. ...We are still waiting for the administration's response to our request."

Chicago Police Announces 81 Arrests In Overnight Raids. The Chicago Sun-Times (2/24, Owen, 798K) reports that a Chicago Police spokesman on Friday announced the arrest of 81 people in overnight raids, 62 of whom were convicted felons. The Times says more details are expected Friday.

CTribune Analysis Chicago Gangs Turning To High-Powered Semi-Automatic Rifles. A more than 2,000-word Chicago Tribune (2/24, Nickeas, Gorner, Moreno, 2.54M) analysis reports that Chicago-area gangs are "boost[ing] their firepower" through the use of semi-automatic rifles, resulting in the death of at least 46 people in the last 9 months, 13 of those fatally. "Police say this is the only area of the city where rifles styled after AR-15s and AK-47s are regularly used, a menacing new development in the gang fights." The Tribune says it is unknown just how many "high-powered rifles are on the street, but police suspect they are being passed around by members of four Hispanic gangs in the Deering police district." It is also unclear why it is that gangs have shifted to high-powered rifles, "except for the obvious speculation that they are deadlier."

AP Analysis: Sessions' Anti-Crime Efforts Could Swell Federal Prison Population.

The AP (2/26, Tucker) reports that "the federal prison population is on the decline," but Attorney General Sessions, "who talks tough on drugs and crime and already has indicated a looming need for private prison cells seems poised to usher in a reversal of that trend." Sessions "signaled at his confirmation hearing – and during private meetings in his first days on the job – that he sees a central role for the federal government in combating drug addiction and violence as well as in strict enforcement of immigration laws," and, "the result could be in an increase not only in the number of drug prosecutions brought by the Justice Department but also in the average length of sentence prosecutors pursue for even lower-level criminals," and "if that happens, the resources of a prison system that for years has struggled with overcrowding, but experienced a population drop as Justice Department leaders pushed a different approach to drug prosecutions, could be taxed again."

The Financial Times (2/27, Lynch, Subscription Publication, 1.39M) runs a similar analysis.

FINANCIAL CRIME & CORPORATE SCANDALS

WSJournal A1: Real Estate Investor Spent Four Years, $3 Million Clearing His Name.

In a more than 5,600-word front-page article, the Wall Street Journal (2/24, A1, Emshwiller, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) examines Los Angeles real-estate investor Bradley Cohen's four year journey to clear his name after being identified in the news as the next Bernie Madoff. Reports falsely claimed Cohen has criminal fraud and money-laundering convictions and accused his industrial real-estate firm, Cohen Asset Management Inc, as being a Ponzi scheme. The Journal says Cohen spent $3 million to bring his online attacker to court, who is described as being persistent. Cohen also won what the piece says was the largest online defamation awards last year in the amount of $38 million.

Alabama Inmate, Woman Indicted In SSA Fraud Scheme.

The AP (2/25) reports a Federal grand jury has indicated Alabama state inmate Richard Stanley and abettor Kristin Fox for "a scheme to defraud the Social Security Administration." Stanley was indicted on "six counts of wire fraud and one count of theft of government property." The US Attorney's Office has filed charged against Fox "accusing her of four counts of wire fraud and one count of theft of government property for helping Stanley collect the payments the wasn't entitled to."

Fourth Circuit Will Not Rehear Ex-Massey CEO's Appeal.

The AP (2/24) reports that the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals indicated in an order handed down on Friday that it "has refused to rehear the case of former Massey Energy CEO Don Blankenship in the deadliest U.S. mine disaster in four decades." The AP adds that in January, "a three-judge panel of the court found no error in trial rulings," and "rejected his argument that jury instructions made it too easy to conclude that he willfully violated safety rules at West Virginia's Upper Big Branch mine before the 2010 explosion that killed 29 men."

DOJ, Takata Reportedly Nominate Feinberg To Oversee Air Bag Fund.

Bloomberg News (2/26, Voreacos, Fisk, 2.41M) reports that the Justice Department and Takata Corp. "have nominated Kenneth Feinberg to design and run a settlement fund of almost $1 billion to compensate consumers over the deadly risks of its air bags and automakers for the cost to replace them, according to two people familiar with the matter." Bloomberg notes that "a federal judge will consider Feinberg's appointment during a hearing" today in Detroit, "where the Tokyo-based company is expected to plead guilty to hiding the deadly risks of its air bags for about 15 years, said the people, who weren't authorized to discuss the matter publicly." Federal prosecutors "charged three former Takata executives for their alleged roles." Bloomberg adds that "the appointment of 71-year-old Feinberg would bring to the case a lawyer experienced in administering some of the nation's highest-profile settlements."

US Attorney Subpoenas Pfizer Over Charity Connections.

Bloomberg News (2/24, Langreth, 2.41M) reported the US Attorney's office in Massachusetts sent Pfizer Inc. two subpoenas related to the Patient Access Network (PAN) Foundation and other "charities that help Medicare patients afford co-payments for drugs" in 2015 and 2016, the company said in a securities filing Thursday. Bloomberg notes Pfizer "donated more than $10 million to the PAN Foundation in 2016, according to a report on its website dated December 19, 2016, including for funds related to kidney cancer and a hormone disorder known as acromegaly."

CYBER DIVISION

NSA Head Pushing For Changes On Handling Cyber Weaponry.

The Hill (2/25, Uchill, 1.25M) reports the National Security Agency (NSA) and Cyber Command Adm. Michael Rogers "is pushing for widespread changes to the US's treatment of cyber weaponry, including contracting private sector firms to develop arms." The Hill cites him as saying at a San Diego conference, as reported by the Defense Department, "we have done almost all of our weapons development internally. ... And part of me goes – five to 10 years from now is that a long-term sustainable model? Does that enable you to access fully the capabilities resident in the private sector? I'm still trying to work my way through that, intellectually." The piece notes that while the US purchases "product-specific digital lock-picking tools so newly discovered that vendors are not aware of them, it combines them and weaponizes them on its own."

Cloudflare Webpages Found To Have Leaked Encrypted Data.

Reuters (2/24, Wagstaff) reported a software bug caused "hundreds of thousands of webpages" hosted by Cloudflare Inc. to leak encrypted personal data. However, Cloudflare indicated on Friday that no sign has yet appeared that hackers have exploited the leak. The leak "was attributable to a bug in the firm's software that had been sending chunks of unrelated data to users' browsers when they visited a webpage hosted by Cloudflare, according to Google researchers." Cloudflare Chief Technology Officer John Graham-Cumming "said the problem had been fixed quickly and most of the exposed data removed from the caches of search engines like Alphabet's Google."

USA Today (2/24, Weise, 5.28M) reported that Google engineer Tavis Ormandy discovered the vulnerability on February 17 "and immediately notified Cloudflare, which fixed the problem." Cloudflare co-founder and CEO Matthew Prince is quoted saying, "This could have been very bad. Thankfully it only affected a small subset of sites."

PBS NewsHour (2/24, 255K) said Cloudflare "manages 10 percent of all web traffic" and "has been leaking assorted bits of customer information...since a bug appeared in their code in 2012."

The Washington Post (2/24, Tsukayama, 11.43M) said Cloudflare "had been leaking information for months in a way that allowed search engines to pick it up," though the issue "is only known to have affected a small portion of the 5.5 million sites that Cloudflare services." The Post added, "Because there's so little information about the sites and Cloudflare services are widely used, it's a good idea to change your passwords on any site, in a 'better safe than sorry' sort of way."

Senators Seek "Full Account" Of EAC Work And Cybersecurity Threats Facing US Officials.

The Hill (2/24, Chalfant, 1.25M) reports Democratic senators, led by Sen.. Amy Klobuchar, have requested a "full account" from the Election Assistance Commission (EAC) of "its work to secure the 2016 election from Russian hackers," including details of the "cybersecurity challenges facing state and local officials as they look to safeguard future elections." In the letter to the EAC, the senators wrote, "As motivated and sophisticated cybercriminals will continue to target our election systems, we must ensure that our state and local election administrators have the resources they need to make critical cybersecurity upgrades." The letter also said, "While there was no reported damage to actual voting machines or voter registration data last year, we hope you will agree when we say that the 2016 election was a wake-up call. We must do more to protect our US elections from foreign interference."

Yahoo Reveals Details About Cybersecurity Measures.

The Hill (2/24, Breland, 1.25M) reports that in a Thursday letter to senators, Yahoo for the first time "revealed extensive details about its cybersecurity measures," following two massive breaches of user data suffered by the company in recent years. In a letter, Yahoo's Public Policy head April Body said "many of the same accounts were affected by both breaches, which occurred in 2013 and 2014." The letter also stated "Yahoo CEO Marissa Mayer doubled the size of the internal security staff and put $250 million into security initiatives," which "went towards the creation of a 'red team' to probe Yahoo's code for security weaknesses and a 'bug bounty program,' an offer of money to people outside the company who alerted Yahoo to exploits in the sites' code."

Engineering Professors Discuss Challenges Of Defending Electricity Grid From Cyberattacks.

Government Computer News (2/24, 1K) carries an article originally in The Conversation by engineering professors Manimaran Govindarasu and Adam Hahn about the vulnerability of the US electricity grid. The authors wrote, "We are just beginning to determine how best to protect [the grid] against cyberattacks." The authors said protecting the grid from cyberattack is a challenge "because the grid has to continue to operate in real time" and "because the electricity industry is used to a slower pace of technological advance." Security standards and simulation exercises "have significantly improved the security of the larger elements of the power system," but "have done little to protect the low-voltage distribution networks that supply power directly to our homes and workplaces." The authors highlighted an approach that "involves systematically analyzing the risks inherent in critical systems and methodically defending against each of them," as well as developing "new systems that can detect anomalous grid communications and create more secure network architectures."

Cybersecurity Focus Of National Governors Association Meeting.

The Hill (2/25, Chalfant, 1.25M) reports that "governors from states across the country put the spotlight on cybersecurity" at a gathering of the National Governors Association. Host Gov. Terry McAuliffe of Virginia is quoted saying, "Cybersecurity is critical to each and every governor. ... We have a wealth of information that every single day people are trying to get in and get our information through cyber threats and cyber criminals." Governors "heard testimony from a panel including John Carlin, former assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's national security division." Carlin is quoted saying, "We are not where we need to be. ... There is no internet-connected system that is safe from the dedicated nation-state adversary or sophisticated criminal group if they're determined to get in right now."

Masterson: Cybersecurity, Critical Infrastructure Designation Ongoing Concerns For Election Officials.

US Election Assistance Commission chair Matthew Masterson wrote in The Hill (2/24, 1.25M) "Congress Blog" that state officials are concerned about cybersecurity and DHS' critical infrastructure designation for election systems. Masterson said the EAC was "able to connect local election administrators facing growing cybersecurity threats and other challenges with the right resources from federal entities," including DHS, adding, "We heard directly from them that they appreciated that support and they want more of it." Masterson goes on to discuss officials' "primary concerns ahead of the 2018 election cycle," including "aging" election infrastructure, the critical infrastructure designation, and the accessibility of elections to eligible voters.

Treason Charges Against Russian Cyber Experts Reportedly The Result Of Seven-Year-Old Accusations.

Reuters (2/26, Stubbs; Reiter) reports treason charges against two Russian FSB officers and Ruslan Stoyanov, head of the computer incidents investigation team at Russian cybersecurity firm Kaspersky Lab, relate to allegations made by a Russian businessman seven years ago that the suspects "passed secrets to U.S. firm Verisign and other unidentified American companies, which in turn shared them with U.S. intelligence agencies." Pavel Vrublevsky, founder of ChronoPay, an online payments company, told Reuters he made the allegations in 2010, and said "he had also learned that the arrests were a response to his allegations." However, Verisign "denies that it received information that was secret," and neither Vrublevsky nor a source connected to the investigation explained "why they believe the Russian authorities would resurrect such an old case seven years after the allegations were first made."

FBI Impersonator Sentenced To Prison.

The AP (2/26) reports that Florida man Anthony Tyrone Jones was "sentenced to five-and-a-half years in federal prison for impersonating an FBI agent and other charges." Jones had pleaded guilty to impersonation and wire fraud. "Court documents show Jones was arrested in 2013 after he told a woman he was an FBI agent so that she would have sex with him for free," the AP says. "Prosecutors also say Jones lied about being a financial adviser who had helped someone become a millionaire. A victim gave Jones nearly $22,000 to invest, which he used for personal enjoyment."

Former FBI Agent Arrested For Shooting At Officer Pleads No Contest.

The AP (2/24) reports that Ruben Hernandez, the former FBI agent accused of shooting at a Michigan police officer, on Friday pleaded no contest to felonious assault charges in a bid to avoid prison. "A no-contest plea isn't an admission of guilt, but is treated as such for sentencing," the AP says. Prosecutors have agreed to recommend that Hernandez be spared prison time. "Defense attorney Larry Willey says Hernandez doesn't remember what happened and that alcohol may have been a factor. Willey says Hernandez was fired by the FBI in January. Sentencing is April 13," the AP says. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (2/24, 676K) posts the AP's coverage to its website.

President Trump Expected To Sign New Travel Order On Wednesday.

The AP (2/26) reports President Trump "is expected to sign a new refugee and immigration executive order on Wednesday," according to a senior administration official.

"Source" Says Administration Believes DHS Report Was Drafted With Intent To Leak. The Washington Times (2/26, Scarborough, 272K) reports that a "source close" to the Department of Homeland Security indicated that Administration officials believe the "report that undercut the president's position on his travel ban was drafted with the express intent of leaking it to the press." The source, according to the Times, says the report was drafted "by those loyal to the Obama Administration" within the office of intelligence and analysis. The report, the source adds, was written with solely open source material as that would allow it to be sent to the media without violating federal laws on handling classified information.

Politico Investigation Finds Trump's Ethics Lawyers Chafe At "Ineffective" Process.

While President Trump "and his business interests have more than two dozen lawyers policing potential conflicts," a Politico (2/25, Samuelsohn, 2.46M) investigation found the lawyers "are grappling with an oversight system that's disjointed and ineffective – and one they say is mostly unnecessary." According to Politico, each lawyer has "part of the Trump ethics portfolio, but no one individual has visibility into the full picture. The set up means that in some cases the lawyers are overlapping while other areas of potential conflict go uncovered entirely." While Politico admits "conflict of interest laws do not apply directly to the president, something many attorneys close to Trump are quick to note, the controversies swirling around the president's business arrangements have nonetheless brought the lawyers working on these issues plenty of political headaches."

Trump Adviser Tells Democrats To "Move On" Over Garland's SCOTUS Snub.

Politico (2/25, Gerstein, 2.46M) reports White House adviser Leonard Leo, in a C-Span interview set to broadcast on Sunday, said, "If I was a Democratic senator who was angry about the way Judge Garland was treated, I would move on." The article says that Leo "insist[s] it's time for both sides in the judicial confirmation wars to lay down their arms." However, it also says that "Democrats will surely look skeptically on Leo's suggestion that a truce be called at a moment when Republicans control both the White House and the Senate, but Democrats ultimately have little power to control the outcome."

Poll Shows Conservatives Want GOP To "Go Nuclear" To Get Gorsuch On Supreme Court. The Washington Times (2/25, Dinan, Sherfinski, 272K) reports a 2017 CPAC/Washington Times straw poll of 1,447 attendees at the Conservative Political Action Conference Saturday shows that "conservative activists are overwhelmingly ready for Senate Republicans to trigger the 'nuclear option' and force Judge Neil Gorsuch onto the Supreme Court." Additionally, the poll highlights that "a movement that is now firmly in Mr. Trump's corner: They believe he is realigning the conservative movement, they generally don't mind his frequent use of Twitter, and they approve of his extreme vetting executive order."

AP Analysis: Gorsuch's Rulings On Employment Cases Shows He Often Sided With Bosses. An AP (2/25, Lavoie, Tarm) analysis reports on the case of a Kansas State University professor who was fired after the university would not extend her six-months of sick leave while she battled cancer, which was overheard by Judge Neil Gorsuch. The AP says "the majority opinion he wrote siding with Kansas State is illustrative. His worker's rights opinions are often sympathetic but coldly pragmatic, and they're usually in the employer's favor." The piece adds that the dozens of employment cases Gorsuch heard while on the 10th Circuit "reveals a focus on texts and a fondness for scrutinizing definitions of words in legislation and the Constitution. Conservatives herald his strict approach. Many liberals say it too often results in workers losing out."

Democrat Elects Perez As DNC Chairman.

Democrats elected former Labor Secretary Tom Perez as chair of the Democratic National Committee on Saturday, making him the first Latino to hold the position. Media coverage, which included nearly seven minutes combined on the network newscasts, was also heavy in print and online. Reporting was largely positive, highlighting Perez's historic election and decision to name his rival, Rep. Keith Ellison, as deputy chair, as well as emphasizing the congratulations he received from President Trump, former President Obama, and a number of other Democratic leaders.

The Washington Post (2/25, Weigel, 11.43M) reports on its front page that Perez became the first Latino chair of the DNC after "a contentious party meeting in Atlanta," while in the lead CBS Weekend News  (2/25, lead story, 3:10, Ninan) segment, Tony Dokoupil said Perez "narrowly" defeated Ellison, "a charismatic progressive, in the second round of voting" and ABC World News Tonight  's (2/25, story 3, 1:35, Llamas, 14.63M) Gloria Riviera reported the former Labor Secretary "in a show of unity" named Ellison as his deputy and sided "with him when it comes to investigating Donald Trump."

NBC Nightly News  (2/25, story 6, 2:10, Diaz-Balart, 16.61M) Sarah Dallof said that by nominating Ellison as his deputy, Perez took "immediate" action to help "unify a party shaken by the hacking and leaking of DNC emails, Hillary Clinton's November loss, and Barack Obama's retirement," although the New York Times (2/25, Martin, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) acknowledges "the suspense-filled balloting revealed that Democrats have yet to heal the wounds from last year's presidential primary." In his victory speech, the Times adds that "Perez played down what he called 'the robust discussions in the Democratic Party'" and said, "We're all going to continue to be united in our values."

The Wall Street Journal (2/25, Epstein, Hook, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) suggests Perez may struggle to resonate with the party's grass roots and notes that a group of Ellison supporters walked out following the announcement of the vote. However, The Hill (2/25, Shelbourne, 1.25M) reports Ellison "called on Democrats to rally behind" Perez, telling supporters, "I am asking you to give everything you've got to support chairman Perez."

Meanwhile, The Hill (2/25, Shelbourne, 1.25M) reports President Trump on Saturday congratulated Perez, tweeting, "Congratulations to Thomas Perez, who has just been named Chairman of the DNC. I could not be happier for him, or for the Republican Party!" The Hill (2/25, Greenwood, 1.25M) "Briefing Room" blog reports former President Obama congratulated Perez in a statement, saying, "I know that Tom Perez will unite us under that banner of opportunity, and lay the groundwork for a new generation of Democratic leadership for this big, bold, inclusive, dynamic America we love so much."

The Hill (2/25, Shelbourne, 1.25M) reports Hillary Clinton congratulated both Perez and Ellison on Twitter while The Hill (2/25, Vladimirov, 1.25M) reports Sen. Bernie Sanders in a statement congratulated Perez but warned, "At a time when Republicans control the White House, the U.S. House, U.S. Senate and two-thirds of all statehouses, it is imperative that Tom understands that the same-old, same-old is not working and that we must open the doors of the party to working people and young people in a way that has never been done before."

DNC Rejects Resolution To Bar Corporate Donations. The Washington Times (2/25, McLaughlin, 272K) reports the DNC on Saturday "tabled a resolution" proposed by Christine Pelosi, daughter of House Minority Leader Pelosi, "that called on the party to reinstate a ban on corporate donations and on federal corporate lobbyists from serving as at-large members of the DNC."

INTERNATIONAL NEWS

Pentagon To Present White House With Options For Conflict Against ISIS.

USA Today (2/26, Michaels, 5.28M) reports the Pentagon this week will provide the White House with options for accelerating the conflict against ISIS and analysts say that "military leaders will likely recommend adjustments that could expand bombings and quicken the pace of ground operations." USA Today says the Defense Department "will likely stick with its current policy of backing local forces to lead the fight against the militants in Iraq and Syria."

The New York Times (2/26, Cooper, Schmitt, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says Defense

Secretary Mattis "is balancing the need to rein in President Trump's more extreme impulses without distancing himself too much and losing White House favor." The Times adds that "nowhere is this juggling act" between being a "valued aide" to Trump and "reassurer" to world leaders more clear than in Mattis' effort of "speeding the fight" against ISIS. The Times says Mattis "will probably present" the White House with "a range of options that include loosening some battlefield restrictions" and permitting US troops "to get closer to the fight." According to the Times, Mattis "may also recommend putting a limited number of additional troops" in Syria.

Gorka: US To Defeat ISIS "Rapidly."

The Washington Times (2/24, Sherfinski, 272K) reports Sebastian Gorka, deputy assistant to President Trump, "said Friday at the Conservative Political Action Conference that the Islamic State terrorist group will be defeated 'rapidly,' while allowing that the battle against the underlying ideology behind it is likely to take longer." Gorka asserted, "We jettison the idea that this is a generational war. We will defeat ISIS, and we will defeat them rapidly."

Former NSC, State Officials: Gorka An "Islamophobic Huckster." In a New York Times (2/24, Simon, Benjamin, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) op-ed, Steven Simon, a professor at Amherst College and member of the National Security Council in the Clinton and Obama Administrations, and Daniel Benjamin, the director of the Dickey Center for International Understanding at Dartmouth College who served as the State Department's counterterrorism coordinator from 2009 to 2012, denounce Gorka, as an "Islamophobic Huckster" who is "weak on jihadist history and doctrine and unaware of what his own government has learned over decades." They conclude that by listening to Gorka, the Administration "now risks exacerbating the very security challenges it hopes to surmount," and call on National Security Adviser McMaster to "exorcise" the influence of Chief of Staff Bannon and Senior Adviser For Policy Miller and make "getting rid of Mr. Gorka...an early priority."

WPost: Trump Has "Worsened The Chances For Success" In Iraq.

The Washington Post (2/26, 11.43M) editorializes that President Trump "has significantly worsened the chances for success" in Iraq. The Post says that while the Obama Administration "deserves blame for sidestepping Iraq's political challenges," Trump "has quickly exacerbated the trouble" with "repeated suggestions that the United States might seize Iraq's oil fields have alienated forces across the political spectrum." In addition, the Post says, Trump's decision to include Iraq on the list of countries from which immigrants are restricted has led to some Iraqis calling for US troops to be expelled from the country.

US-Backed Iraqi Forces Advance Toward Mosul Bridge.

Reuters (2/26, Kalin) reports US-backed Iraqi forces advanced further into western Mosul on Sunday, and are seeking to secure a strategic bridge across the Tigris. Col. Falah al-Wabdan of the Iraqi Interior Ministry's Rapid Response unit said once troops capture the bridge from ISIS militants, it will be rehabilitated so troops can transfer supplies and reinforcements directly from eastern Mosul. Meanwhile, ISIS militants forcibly took dozens of the hundreds of fleeing western Mosul residents to use as human shields. Iraqi commanders believe several thousand militants are holed up in tunnels and passageways throughout western Mosul, heightening the risk of a standoff that threatens the civilian population.

Within the last three days alone, more than 200 civilians and at least 30 Iraqi troops have been killed or wounded, the AP (2/26, George) reports. The sudden increase in casualties reflects the "grueling urban combat" in "the fight for eastern Mosul in early November when military attrition rates spiked." Iraqi forces have thus far encountered fewer car bombs in western Mosul than they did in eastern Mosul, but they are more frequently targeted by ISIS' drone-deployed bombs. Even though ISIS' drones have caused mostly light injuries, "they disrupted operations and monopolized the finite surveillance capabilities available from Iraq's military and the US-led coalition backing the Mosul fight." ISIS' repeated use of mortars has also left fleeing western Mosul residents "more vulnerable than those who fled the city's eastern side."

American Firepower Yields "Notable Gains" Against Militants, Drones. "American firepower, the decision to position American advisers closer to the fighting, and the determined efforts of the Iraqi forces themselves have yielded some notable gains" in the western Mosul operation, the New York Times (2/26, Gordon, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports. The US' encouragement enabled Iraqi forces "to mount an attack on multiple axes to present the militants with more problems than they can handle," but ISIS' use of drones "spooked" Iraqi troops and left American and Iraqi militaries with no "easy remedy." Nonetheless, the US military "has used its firepower to try to mitigate the drone problem," and on Saturday it destroyed a key drone-launching and weapons-storing ISIS "staging area."

Additionally, the Defense and Homeland Security Departments have purchased more than 100 DroneDefenders, which are devices manufactured by Ohio's Battelle Memorial Institute that can scramble ISIS drones' GPS or remote control units from distances of up to a quarter of a mile away, the Wall Street Journal (2/26, Kesling, Iraq, Adnan, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports. Last week, the Air Force also announced it entered into a $15 million contract with ELTA North America, a subsidiary of Israel's Aerospace Industries, for the delivery of 21 counter-drone systems.

Intensified Syrian Government Airstrikes Target Rebel-Held Neighborhood In Homs.

The AP (2/26, Mroue) reports a second day of intensified Syrian government airstrikes on the rebel-held neighborhood al-Waer in Homs killed at least three people on Sunday. The escalation "appeared to be in retaliation for militant attacks in the city on Saturday that killed a senior security officer and at least 31 others." Additionally, government forces and allied militias advanced within a few miles of Palmyra. Also on Sunday, UN envoy Staffan de Mistura met with representatives of separate opposition groups in Geneva. Opposition representative Jihad Makdissi told reporters de Mistura presented papers on "how to facilitate talks" between numerous opposition groups and the Syrian government. Makdissi also downplayed various opposition groups' differences as merely "diverse" and not "fragmented," and claimed all groups "want to be one delegation, not a unified delegation."

Al Qaeda Affiliate Claims Responsibility For Attacks On Syrian Security Offices.

The AP (2/25) reports the Levant Liberation Committee, an al Qaeda-affiliated insurgent coalition, announced that five of its militants stormed two Syrian security offices in Homs on Saturday. Homs Province Governor Talal Barzani claimed a total of three blasts killed at least 32 people, but the Syrian Observatory for Human Rights said the attack killed at least 42 security officials. Maj. Gen. Hassan Daeboul, "a senior official who ran the feared military intelligence services," was killed in the coordinated operation, and Brig. Ibrahim Darwish, head of the state security branch, was critically wounded.

Daeboul, the Washington Post (2/25, Loveluck, 11.43M) reports, served as "the former head of one of Damascus's most notorious detention facilities." The Post notes the Homs attack and intense Syrian government aerial bombardments "took place as Syrian government and opposition delegates met in Geneva for the latest round of talks aimed at bringing Syria's six-year-old crisis to an end."

Reuters (2/25, Irish) reports United Nations special envoy Staffan de Mistura, ahead of a meeting with the Syrian government delegation on Saturday in Geneva, told reporters, "Every time we have talks, or negotiations, there is always someone who tries to spoil."

De Mistura also wrote in a statement, "Spoilers were always expected, and should continue to be expected, to try to influence the proceedings of the talks," Reuters (2/25, Irish, Nebehay, Miles) reports in a separate article. He urged "all parties who are against terrorism and are committed to a political process in Syria not to allow these attempts to succeed." Reuters notes the jihadist rebel alliance Tahrir al-Sham, which is opposed to the peace talks, praised the attacks.

Reuters (2/25, Irish) reports the Syrian government delegation's chief negotiator Bashar Ja'afari also spoke with reporters in Geneva on Saturday. Ja'afari said his delegation told de Mistura "that we are looking for commonalities to look forward" and "how we can discuss with anyone that doesn't condemn terrorism." His 45-minute news conference "almost entirely focused on the need to combat terrorism," and he denounced Saudi Arabia and Turkey as state sponsors of terrorism because of their support of rebel fighters. "If anyone refuses to condemn this terrorist attack," Ja'afari continued, "then he is an accomplice of terrorism and we will deal with them accordingly."

Syrian Rebel Leader Claims Opposition Shares Common Goals With Administration. On Saturday, the Syrian opposition delegation's chief negotiator, Nasr al-Hariri, told the AP (2/25, Soguel) in an exclusive interview that Administration officials met with opposition leaders on multiple occasions in an effort to find common ground. Al-Hariri stated, "We have a lot of points that we share with this new administration of America," and top priorities include "fighting terrorism and reaching stability in Syria across or through a political transition and to face the state of Iran, which interferes not only in Syria but in Iraq and Yemen and in other countries." He claimed former President Obama repeatedly let opposition fighters down, and said Obama refused to intervene directly when Iran extended its support to Syrian President Bashar al-Assad. Al-Hariri also called the establishment of safe zones "a procedure to reach the final, acceptable solution for the Syrian people."

Syrian Opposition Awaits Administration's Decision On Raqqa Operation. The New York Times (2/24, Gordon, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports the Administration's forthcoming decision on whether it will provide the Syrian Democratic Forces, or SDF, with much-needed heavier weapons will mark "a critical moment" for the opposition forces. The SDF has helped the US minimize its military footprint in Syria and is "its best hope of taking Raqqa in the coming months," but the "budding alliance has drawn the United States deeper into the complex politics of northern Syria and prompted furious objections from Turkish officials" over the militia's inclusion of Kurdish fighters. Central Command head Gen. Joseph L. Votel suggested the US could provide heavy weapons to Kurdish fighters for the Raqqa operation, and restrict arms and ammunition flows after seizing the city from ISIS forces. "We would be transparent with" Turkey, Votel asserted, and "could meter things like ammunition." Lt. Gen. Stephen Townsend added that unlike Russia, Iran, or the Syrian government, the US must protect Turkish interests because the two nations are NATO allies.

Saudi Arabian Minister Meets With Iraqi Leaders To Repair Sectarian Divide.

Saudi Arabia's Foreign Minister, Adel Al-Jubeir, met with his Iraqi counterpart Ibrahim al-Jaafari and Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi in "a rare visit to Baghdad on Saturday," Reuters (2/25, Chmaytelli, Rasheed) reports. Jubeir's visit signaled "a new attempt to heal the Sunni kingdom's troubled relations with Shi'ite-majority Iraq." Jubeir told reporters that Iraq's leaders expressed a willingness to reconcile the sectarian divide, and he reiterated Saudi Arabia's hope "to build excellent relations between the two brotherly countries." He also highlighted the "many shared interests from fighting extremism and terrorism or opportunities for investment and trade between the two countries." The leaders also discussed the restoration of direct flights between Saudi Arabia and Iraq, and the kingdom's plan to appoint a new ambassador to Iraq.

Syria Revokes Passport Of Academy Award Nominated Cinematographer.

The CBS Weekend News (2/26, story 5, 2:00, Quijano) reported Syrian cinematographer Khaled Khatib, who shot the Netflix documentary "White Helmets" about civilians who provide rescue response after airstrikes in that country, was expected to attend the Academy Awards, but he reportedly had his passport "revoked by the Syrian government." Other members of the crew are still expected to attend. CBS noted that President Bashar al-Assad "has accused the White Helmets as being a front for al Qaeda and of faking footage of the aftermath of air strikes – charges the group themselves deny."

Rogin Calls For More Comprehensive Strategy On Afghanistan.

In his column for the Washington Post (2/26, 11.43M), Josh Rogin recommends a new strategy on Afghanistan that not only "deals with Pakistan's insistence on providing support and sanctuary for the Taliban," but also includes "a plausible path to return to negotiations to end the conflict." Afghanistan's government has "no safe alternative" to increased US dedication, and Afghanistan's ambassador to the US, Hamdullah Mohib, warned the success of the Taliban or any other terrorist group "emboldens all of them." Rogin says President Trump's generals in support of increased US involvement "could strengthen their case by getting NATO allies to make human and financial commitments up front" to "address Trump's criticism that NATO doesn't do counterterrorism and doesn't pay its fair share." Promoting a new strategy to Trump and the American public "will not be easy," Rogin adds, but if the Administration can "tune out the politics, share the burden and follow a clear strategy, the benefits of the deal will outweigh the costs."

USA Today Urges White House To Clarify Position On Afghanistan. In an editorial, USA Today (2/26, 5.28M) writes that the war in Afghanistan "is now shifting slowly in favor of the enemy, the Taliban and other Islamic extremists," and calls on the White House "to conduct a major policy review of Afghanistan, reach a fundamental decision and then make its case to the American people." USA Today says Army Gen. John Nicholson's request for more soldiers seems "reasonable, but troop levels have to reflect a broader strategy" and soldiers "deserve clarity of purpose." President Trump has not clarified his position on Afghanistan, but "he has ordered his generals to come up with a plan to defeat radical Islamic terrorism." USA Today concludes, "Only when the Taliban realizes that the US commitment is unwavering, and it cannot retake Kabul, will this longest war come to a resolution."

Professor Argues Against Increased US Involvement In Afghanistan. In an op-ed for USA Today (2/26, 5.28M), author and Boston University professor Andrew J. Bacevich argues against sending more US troops to Afghanistan because the measure "ignores root causes" that "predate the ongoing war itself." Bacevich writes that US troops will likely "have to stay a few decades" and "burn through trillions of additional taxpayer dollars" if the US determines that it must "fix the problems afflicting Afghanistan" to maintain "security and well-being." He says policymakers could "shrink from making any such commitment," which begs the "fundamental question" of whether Afghanistan is better equipped to solve its own problems.

Attorneys: Trump's Comments Would Keep Bergdahl From Receiving Fair Trial.

Reuters (2/26, Kearney) reports US Army Sgt. Bowe Bergdahl's defense team announced on Sunday that it will ask the US Army Court of Criminal Appeals in Virginia on Monday to dismiss charges against Bergdahl. Attorney Eugene Fidell explained, "Our position is that President Trump's comments during the campaign repeatedly vilifying Sergeant Bergdahl prevents him from getting a fair trial." Fidell maintained that Bergdahl should not face jail time and is "ready for this to be over. He's lost a decade of his life." Military Judge Jeffrey Nance of the US Army Trial Judiciary Second Judicial Court previously rejected the defense team's argument.

In its "Under The Radar" blog, Politico (2/26, Gerstein, 2.46M) reports that the defense attorneys claimed Trump's statements, including his labeling of Bergdahl as a "dirty rotten traitor," amounted to "unlawful command influence" in Bergdahl's upcoming trial. Nance, in the lower court's decision on Friday, conceded Trump's comments about Bergdahl were "troubling" and "made without consideration of their possible impact on the trial of the accused." Despite the "disturbing and disappointing" statements, Nance wrote, no one "would believe that because Candidate Trump said those troubling things and is now President Trump, the accused has been or will be denied a fair trial." In a statement issued on late Sunday, Fidell countered, "The issues presented by President Trump's outrageous and unprecedented vilification of a fellow citizen are important to public confidence in the administration of justice, as well as simple fairness to Sgt. Bergdahl."

Iran Holds Annual Naval War Games.

Reuters (2/26) reports Iran launched its annual naval drills "at the mouth of the Gulf and the Indian Ocean" on Sunday, a naval commander said. The annual exercises "will be held in the Strait of Hormuz, the Gulf of Oman, the Bab el-Mandab and northern parts of the Indian Ocean, to train in the fight against terrorism and piracy, Rear Admiral Habibollah Sayyari said, according to state media." The AP (2/26) reports the US Navy's 5th Fleet "declined to comment on the exercise or discuss if it had any plans to monitor the drill."

Ahmadinejad Lauds US, Trump Campaign In Letter To American President. The AP (2/26, Karimi) reports former Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad sent a letter Sunday to President Trump, "striking a somewhat conciliatory tone while applauding immigration to America and saying it shows 'the contemporary US belongs to all nations.'" In the letter, published by Iranian media outlets, Ahmadinejad noted Trump won the election while he "truthfully described the US political system and electoral structure as corrupt." The AP notes that it isn't the former

Iranian leader's first letter to a US president, but this letter "may serve to burnish Ahmadinejad's image domestically after the nation's Supreme Leader warned him not to run in Iran's upcoming May presidential election."

Top Chinese Official To Visit US This Week.

Reuters (2/26, Ruwitch) reports Chinese State Councilor Yang Jiechi will visit the US this week, state news agency Xinhua said. Jiechi will be in Washington on Monday and Tuesday, Xinhua said in a report published late Sunday. Reuters notes the visit follows a phone call between Yang and Secretary of State Tillerson last week, and marks "the latest step by the world's two largest economies to try to put relations back on an even keel after a rocky start following Trump's November election victory."

Baucus Warns: Don't Let Beijing Push Us Around. The Washington Post (2/26, Denyer, 11.43M) reports former US Ambassador to China Max Baucus warned that the US "needs to stop getting pushed around by China and work out a long-term strategy to deal with the country's rise." In an interview conducted Thursday, Baucus "expressed frustration with the Obama administration's lack of strategic vision and its weakness when it came to China, but also accused President Trump of blundering around without even a basic understanding of the country." Said Baucus, "The Washington foreign policy establishment tends to put China on another shelf, to deal with it later. We're much too ad hoc, we don't seem to have a long-term strategy, and that's very much to our disadvantage."

China, Taiwan To Commemorate 1947 Uprising. The New York Times (2/26, Horton, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that the "2/28 Incident," as it has come to be known, was an uprising that flared on Feb. 28, 1947 in Taipei and "soon spread to other parts of the island" before it was "crushed in the massacre of up to 28,000 Taiwanese" by Chinese troops. While China has "long commemorated Feb. 28, usually quietly," this year, for the 70th anniversary, "it took a more public approach, organizing a symposium in Beijing on Thursday."

Bloomberg Analysis: "Spat" With Kim Jong-Un Shows China's Dilemma In Dealing With Him.

Bloomberg Politics (2/26, Shi, 201K) reports that the "rare public spat" between China and North Korea illustrates "the dilemma facing Beijing's leaders as they try to coax Kim Jong-Un back to the negotiating table." Bloomberg says "tensions have escalated as China seeks renewed talks on North Korea" with the Trump Administration, but its "ability to broker negotiations risks backfiring for a simple reason: Kim is confident that Beijing doesn't want to see his regime toppled, creating a failed state – or worse, a US-backed unified Korea – on its doorstep."

Malaysian Minister: Kim Jong-Nam Died Quickly. USA Today (2/26, Bacon, 5.28M) reports the half-brother of North Korean leader Kim Jong-Un "was swiftly overwhelmed by paralysis and died within 20 minutes after being daubed with a nerve agent at a Malaysian airport two weeks ago," the Malaysian health minister said Sunday. According to Health Minister Subramaniam Sathasivam, "The dose was so high it affected the heart, lungs, affected everything. It only requires 10 milligrams to be absorbed into the system" to cause death. The AP (2/26, Ng) and the Wall Street Journal (2/26, Otto, Ngui, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) also report his remarks, while McClatchy (2/25, Johnson, 74K) says that "by using one of the world's deadliest known toxins to carry off a high-profile assassination in Malaysia, North Korea sent a message to the world that it has two types of weapons of mass destruction – nuclear bombs and the most ghastly of chemical weapons."

Ukrainian TV Show Features Nothing But Fake News.

The New York Times (2/26, Kramer, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) profiles "what appears to be a nightly newscast...with a very Ukrainian twist: Everything is a lie, from start to finish." The group behind the show "is highly respected in journalistic circles" in Kiev "for its specialty of debunking fake news." According to the Times, "if fact checkers cannot prove that a story published or broadcast by another news media outlet is false, it will not be featured in the weekly airing of 'StopFake News.'"

UN Peacekeepers Disperse Central African Republic Militia.

Reuters (2/26, Cocks) reports the UN's mission in the Central African Republic deployed heavily-armed peacekeepers in an air operation to the town of Bambari on Sunday. In a statement, the UN mission said the operation was necessary to "prevent a war" between the Popular Front for the Renaissance of Central African Republic, or FPRC, and the rival militia Union for Peace in Central African Republic, or UPC. The statement added that the operation was conducted in accordance with the mission's mandate to protect civilians. Mission spokesman Vladimir Monteiro said the air operation's toll "is not yet known" and warned the FPRC "against any attempt to bring war to Bambari."

Duterte Seeks To Lower Age Of Criminal Responsibility In Anti-Drug Campaign Expansion.

The Washington Post (2/26, Rauhala, 11.43M) reports Philippine President Rodrigo Duterte broadened his anti-drug campaign by vocalizing support for proposed legislation aimed at lowering the age of criminal responsibility from 15 to nine. Duterte claimed young offenders needed to be "taught responsibility," and argued the proposed bill would ultimately prevent another "generation of criminals." Duterte's campaign has already left "some of the Philippines' youngest and most vulnerable citizens" dead, witnesses to violence, or orphans, and human rights groups warned the proposed bill would further target the nation's disadvantaged youth. Children's Legal Rights and Development Center executive director Rowena Legaspi said broadening the campaign to include the "criminalizing" of minors would constitute "legitimizing" state-supported violence against children.

Macron Leads In French Pre-Election Polls.

Reuters (2/26, Felix, Pennetier) reports the results of two opinion polls released on Sunday suggested French independent presidential candidate Emmanuel Macron would easily defeat far-right National Front candidate Marine Le Pen in the nation's runoff election. The polls revealed Le Pen would secure 27 percent of votes in the first round, compared to Macron's predicted 25 percent of votes, but only 39 percent in the runoff, compared to Macron's estimated 61 percent of votes. According to both polls, Macron's recent alliance with centrist politician Francois Bayrou helped him poll ahead of conservative candidate Francois Fillon. At a campaign rally on Saturday evening, Le Pen told supporters that the justice system was being used against her to influence the election outcome, and accused Macron of benefiting from the backing of banks and media outlets. Outside of the rally, police clashed with left-wing supporters attempting to block the event.

Guatemala Expels Dutch Vessel, Abortion Advocates.

AFP (2/26) reports Guatemalan President Jimmy Morales ordered his government to file a formal complaint against a Dutch vessel and its 10 passengers last week after learning that the passengers were advocates with the Women on Waves group and intended to offer Guatemalan women abortions in international waters. On Friday, authorities ordered the expulsion the vessel from territorial waters on grounds that the passengers falsely declared themselves as tourists and not members of a "health organization." Women on Waves accused the Guatemalan military of illegally detaining the vessel and of "obstructing a lawful protest against the state's restrictions on the Guatemalan women's right to safe abortion." On Sunday, Puerto Quetzal commander Saul Tobar told reporters, "Notified of its expulsion from the country's territorial waters for having failed to comply with immigration regulations," the vessel requested permission to depart on late Saturday.

WSJournal A1: Japan's Post-Bubble Generation Diminishes Stimulus Efforts.

On its front page, the Wall Street Journal (2/26, A1, Lyons, Inada, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that in April, 2013, Bank of Japan governor Haruhiko Kuroda, in an attempt to change the post-bubble 20- to 34-year-old population's deflationary mindset, launched an ambitious Central Bank stimulus effort that involved the printing of trillions of yen and guided interest rates below zero. The 20 million young adults who grew up in the 1980's have known only economic malaise, however, and are seemingly resilient to the efforts of Kuroda and other Japanese officials to facilitate economic growth, consumer spending, and monetary policy changes; furthermore, an October Bank of Japan survey suggested the post-bubble generation's saving habits will not change any time soon.

WPost A1: Trinidad's Feminist Movement Focuses On Misogyny At Carnival.

In a front-page article, the Washington Post (2/26, Powers, 11.43M) reports Trinidad and Tobago's feminist movement surged after "the high-profile killing" of female Japanese musician Asami Nagakiya at Carnival last year. Port-of-Spain's then-Mayor Raymond Tim Kee blamed Nagakiya's death on the "vulgarity and lewdness" of her revealing costume and behavior, alarming women's rights activists and prompting protests and calls for Tim Kee's resignation. The government has since launched uneven efforts to address the nation's domestic violence, but some activists believe its response has been inadequate. As result, some activists are calling on the government to better protect women throughout the year, and others are "zeroing in on the more commonplace offenses that women face" at Carnival in an attempt "to change the way women are treated" during the celebration.

O'Hanlon Calls For Permanent Neutrality As NATO Expansion Alternative.

Brookings Institution senior fellow Michael O'Hanlon, in an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/26, Subscription Publication, 6.37M), warns NATO protection from Russian aggression does not extend to Ukraine, Georgia, and other Eastern European neutral states, but any efforts to expand NATO to include those nations will fuel Russian President Vladimir Putin's efforts to keep the countries unstable and ineligible for membership. O'Hanlon says Russia understandably views NATO as an insult, and encourages President Trump to advocate for the restructuring of a new security arrangement that is focused on permanent neutrality and includes Russia in negotiations.

Former, Current US Leaders Clarify Foreign Policy Inconsistencies.

"Some measure of disconnect is expected when a new administration takes power," the Boston Globe (2/26, Linskey, 1.08M) reports, but according to former Secretary of State John Kerry's chief of staff David Wade, "You can be guaranteed" that other world leaders "are writing cables home right now about dysfunction." State Department spokesman Mark Toner explained the seemingly contradictory messages are in fact situations where "you're seeing the administration articulate in greater detail its policies on many issues." He said Secretary of State Tillerson speaks with President Trump "daily" and on "every major foreign policy issue." The Globe says Trump's comments on a "two-state solution" in the Middle East constituted among "the more shocking examples" of the disconnect; within 24 hours of Trump's remarks, Ambassador Haley confirmed to reporters at the United Nations that the US continues to "absolutely support a two-state solution," but is "thinking out of the box as well."

McMaster's Book "Viewed As A Guidepost" For His Role In Administration. The New York Times (2/25, Baker, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports National Security Adviser McMaster published his dissertation on "the consequences of the military not giving candid advice to a president" in 1997 under the title "Dereliction of Duty." McMaster's "book is now viewed as a guidepost to how he views his role as the coordinator of the president's foreign policy team," and "is central to General McMaster's identity and career." It also "became a sensation," and received praise from former CIA Director David Petraeus and Sen. Tom Cotton. "Others said General McMaster's book had been misread," and Johns Hopkins University's Eliot A. Cohen said the "book will hang over him being national security adviser" because McMaster "now represents integrity and a forthrightness about speaking truth to power." Author Gordon M. Goldstein commented, "This will really be a test of Trump as commander in chief," and on whether "he can absorb and benefit from the advice of a strong adviser."

US Cancels Planned Back-Channel Talks With North Korea.

The New York Times (2/25, Perlez, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that while the Administration on Friday authorized informal negotiations in New York "between a North Korean delegation and former American officials," the US government "reversed course hours later, withdrawing approval for the North Koreans' visas, two people who were to take part in the planned talks said."

The Washington Post (2/25, Fifield, 11.43M) says the "Track 1.5" talks had been "hanging in the balance after North Korea launched a ballistic missile earlier this month," but Malaysia's assertion Friday "that the Pyongyang regime planned the attack that used a chemical weapon to kill leader Kim Jong Un's half brother," Kim Jong-nam, was "the final straw." The Wall Street Journal (2/25, Cheng, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that the talks would have been the first on US soil in almost six years. Robert Gallucci, the top US negotiator during the North Korean nuclear crisis of 1994, and Victor Cha, the National Security Council's director for Asian affairs under former President George W. Bush, had intended to represent the US at the talks.

UN Report: North Korea Using Network Of Overseas Companies To Evade Sanctions. North Korea "is evading international sanctions with a sophisticated network of overseas companies, enabled partly by its continued access to the international banking system, says a forthcoming United Nations report seen by" Reuters (2/25, Pearson), which adds that the 100-page draft report found, "Designated entities and banks have continued to operate in the sanctioned environment by using agents who are highly experienced and well trained in moving money, people and goods, including arms and related materiel, across borders."

Malaysian Police Sweep Airport For VX Toxin Traces. ABC World News Tonight's (2/25, story 6, 1:30, Llamas, 14.63M) Alex Marquardt reported Malaysian police continued to sweep the Kuala Lumpur airport terminal on Saturday "for remaining traces of toxins" that killed Kim Jong-nam, the half-brother of North Korean leader Kim Jong-un. NBC Nightly News (2/25, story 9, 0:30, Diaz-Balart, 16.61M) reported Malaysian forensic teams were "dressed in hazmat suits" because even trace amounts of VX "can be lethal within minutes."

Malaysian authorities released surveillance video footage of the attack, and the Washington Post (2/25, Bump, 11.43M) says that footage reveals a number of people were "possibly within 100 yards of a rare, deadly nerve agent that might have made its way through the airport until the moment that it was swiped on Kim's face." Stimson Center senior associate Cindy Vestergaard cautioned that the footage captured one of the female suspects walking "across one of the terminals," and even if the suspect "had gloves on, it would have dispersed somehow, somewhere." Because an amount of VX as small as "the size of three snowflakes" can have a fatal effect, confirmation of the toxin as VX would likely broaden the investigation considerably. Vestergaard also suggested that the involved suspects were probably well-prepared for their mission, and may have had access to antidotes.

The New York Times (2/25, Paddock, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports 25-year-old Siti Aisyah was one of the two female suspects detained for the assassination. Indonesia's deputy ambassador to Malaysia, Andrea Erwin, met with the suspect on Saturday. Erwin stated, "She only said in general that someone asked her to carry out this activity," and that "she met with people who looked Japanese or Korean." The suspect also alleged she was paid $90 to smear the substance, which she described as similar to baby oil, on the face of Kim. Malaysian police also detained Doan Thi Houng of Vietnam "within days" of Kim's assassination.

Vietnam's Foreign Ministry told the Wall Street Journal (2/25, Otto, Rachman, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) that diplomats also met with Huong for the first time, and like Siti Aisyah, "Huong said she was duped and thought she was playing in a funny movie clip." Both nations' diplomats claimed on Saturday that the women did not appear to be suffering any side effects from possible VX exposure.

WPost: US Should Relist North Korea As Terror Sponsor. The Washington Post (2/25, 11.43M) editorializes that the nerve agent VX "has no other purpose than being an instrument of death," which is just one more reason "it is so monstrous that North Korean leader Kim Jong Un and his coterie of brutalists may have used VX to murder his half-brother Kim Jong Nam, while he was waiting to board a plane in an international airport in Malaysia." According to the Post, "North Korea ought to be placed back on the U.S. list of nations that sponsor terrorism, from which it was removed almost a decade ago." The Post concludes, "There must be no ambiguity in the message from the United States and its allies: This was outlaw behavior."

NYTimes A1: China To Construct Naval Base Near Pentagon's Camp Lemonnier.

On its front page, the New York Times (2/25, Jacobs, Perlez, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports China is constructing its first foreign naval military base just miles from the Pentagon's Camp Lemonnier in Djibouti. "American strategists" expressed concerns that the Chinese naval port's close proximity to Camp Lemonnier "could provide a front-row seat to the staging ground for American counterterror operations in the Arabian Peninsula and North Africa." US officials cited surveillance issues, China's debt to Djibouti, and the potential threat to the US-Djibouti alliance's long-term durability as three key concerns. The base also furthers China's global ambitions and could have "potential implications for America's longstanding military dominance." China's Defense Ministry downplayed its significance, and in a statement said it "will be mainly used to provide rest and rehabilitation for the Chinese troops taking part in escort missions in the Gulf of Aden and waters off Somalia, U.N. peacekeeping and humanitarian rescue." China claimed the base did not constitute an "arms race or military expansion."

China Projected To Increase Funding For Navy. Reuters (2/25, Blanchard, Martina) reports China's PLA Navy rapidly developed under President Xi Jinping's ambitious military modernization campaign, and it is expected "to secure significant new funding" in the upcoming defense budget, which will be unveiled by parliament next month. China is attempting to bring its navy up to par with the US Navy, and President Trump's pledge to increase the American fleet from 290 to 350 vessels has unnerved China. Trump's aides said the measure is necessary to counter China's rising military power. Additionally, an anonymous Asian diplomat suggested, "China fears Trump will turn on them eventually as he's so unpredictable and it's getting ready."

Indian Foreign Minister To Meet With Administration Officials In Washington.

The AP (2/26) reports India's Foreign Secretary S. Jaishankar is expected to meet with acting Deputy Secretary Shannon and other Administration officials in Washington this week for discussions related to India's concerns over President Trump's strong stance "against exporting US jobs" and the fatal shooting of an Indian engineer in a Kansas bar.

NYTimes A1: UN-Backed Tribune Dismisses Case Against Cambodian Grandma.

In a front-page article, the New York Times (2/24, Wallace, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports a United Nations-backed tribunal charged 74-year-old Cambodian Im Chaem "with crimes against humanity, including mass murder, extermination and enslavement." The defendant, known as "Grandma Chaem," allegedly oversaw "the killing of tens of thousands of people as a Khmer Rouge official in northwestern Cambodia in 1977 and 1978." On Wednesday, however, "the tribunal's investigating judges quietly dropped the charges." The tribunal claimed in a statement that it dismissed the case because Chaem "was neither a senior leader nor otherwise one of the most responsible officials of the Khmer Rouge regime." Yet, the decision has elicited suspicions that the tribunal yielded to pressures from former Khmer Rouge soldier and Prime Minister Hun Sen, who warned that more trials could spark an outbreak of civil war and chaos.

Iran's Navy Begins Drill Near Strait Of Hormuz.

The AP (2/26) reports Iran's navy, in its first major exercise since President Trump's inauguration, began its annual drill maneuvers in the Sea of Oman and Indian Ocean "near the strategic Strait of Hormuz." About a third of all oil transported by sea passes through the strait, and previous US-Iranian confrontations have occurred at the site. The drill will not involve the Revolutionary Guard.

Iran To Acquire Uranium Ore From Kazakhstan. Reuters (2/25) reports Iran's Atomic Energy Organization head Ali Akbar Salehi told the Iranian Students' News Agency that the nation will purchase 950 tonnes of uranium ore from Kazakhstan in three separate shipments over three years. He also claimed that Iran "reached a final agreement on jointly producing nuclear fuel with Russia," and that the two nations "agreed for the Russians to give us advisory help." Reuters notes Iran's acquisition would not violate the 2015 nuclear deal it reached with the US and five other nations.

Power Honors Late Russian Diplomat Vitaly Churkin.

In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/25, Power, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), former Ambassador Power recalls her interactions with Russia's permanent representative to the United Nations, Vitaly Churkin, and says she was "heartbroken" to learn of his death. She describes Churkin as "a believer in the relationship between our two countries," one of the "most effective diplomats," a "good friend and one of the best hopes the United States and Russia had of working together." She expresses sadness "that, in our hyperpolarized environment, praise for Vitaly – the diplomat and the man – has been interpreted as acquiescence to Russia's aggression," and says she "was slammed" on Twitter when she "referred to him as a 'diplomatic maestro'." Power says to restore US-Russian relations, diplomats must "stand firm, while also never losing sight of the humanity of those with whom we fervently disagree."

Trump's Rhetoric Elicits Resurgence Of Mexican Nationalism.

The Washington Post (2/25, Miroff, 11.43M) reports that in Mexico, "the public outcry" over President Trump's trade and border wall proposals has reduced US-Mexican relations "to their lowest point in decades" and "inspired a campaign to boycott" American products and chains. A series of "encounters" between the US and Mexico since the 1840s has resulted in two different forms of nationalism in the two nations, according to Mexican historian Lorenzo Meyer. Meyer said Mexico adopted a "defensive" form, and the US adopted exceptionalism and militarized Manifest Destiny. Thus, Mexicans interpret Trump's rhetoric as "an unmistakable attempt to humiliate them." Former Ambassador Antonio Garza said unlike prior manifestations of Mexican nationalism, this time it is "directed at Trump," and "not the United States."

Mexicans Protest High Gas Prices, Trump's Policy Proposals. Gadi Schwartz of NBC Nightly News (2/25, story 10, 2:15, Diaz-Balart, 16.61M) reported, "For six weekends in a row, ports of entry along the US-Mexico border have temporarily shut down traffic going into Mexico out of fear of protests" against both the Mexican government and President Trump. "Across Mexico, outrage is being fueled by a spike in gas prices," and protests have led to thousands of arrests and six deaths. "Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto says the price increase was needed to offset subsidies," Schwartz reported, "but nearly 50 percent of the population in Mexico lives in poverty." Schwartz said protesters are "also taking aim at the US border and President Donald Trump for his threats to tax imports and make Mexico pay for a wall. Meanwhile, the Mexican economy is struggling," with "Rising taxes and the devalued peso on one side of the border clashing with President Trump's policy of 'America First'."

Zimbabwe's President Delegates Decision On Successor To Congress.

Reuters (2/25, Bulawayo) reports Zimbabwe's longtime President Robert Mugabe announced on Saturday that he will not seek a successor before he retires, and delegated the task to "congress to choose." Mugabe said ZANU-PF lacked viable alternatives and claimed the nation "said I should be your candidate in the next election." Mugabe's critics, however, claimed his policies "have ruined the once promising country."

Rep. Devin Nunes, R-Calif., holds a news conference on Russian hacking
Monday, February 27th, 2017

(JOINED IN PROGRESS)

NUNES: But I'm just looking forward to taking your questions. So -- so with that, I'll just open it up to all of you. QUESTION: Can you say categorically that there were no contacts whatsoever between any officials affiliated with the Russian government and the Trump campaign?

NUNES: Not -- not that I'm aware of. We still have not seen any evidence of anyone that's -- from the Trump campaign or any other campaign for that matter that's communicated with the Russian government.

QUESTION: And also, why would you agree to be -- to talk to reporters at the behest of the White House, knowing that you're still looking into this matter?

NUNES: Yeah, so that -- that story was a little odd, I thought, because if you ask me to contact the White House and said, "Hey, could you set me up with somebody at DOD or the intelligence agencies," I would say sure. So it was kind of an odd story, I thought.

QUESTION: Is it compromised in any way, the fact that you have already made this determination?

NUNES: How is it compromised if I'm trying to be transparent with the press? And if the White House asks me to talk to a reporter, which by the way, it was one reporter, I don't know -- if the White House asked me to talk to you, would you think that would be OK or not OK?

QUESTION: What's your response to that?

NUNES: Well, what's your response to it?

QUESTION: Well, you're investigating this -- you're investigating this matter and the White House is urging you to make -- to knock down these stories that are raising questions (inaudible).

NUNES: No, that -- that absolutely didn't happen.

QUESTION: Is there anything that you have learned in the course of this investigation that really conflicts with public reporting?

NUNES: Well, if you look at -- if you look at what's happened, there's been -- major crimes have been committed. And what I'm concerned about is this, no one is focusing on major leaks that have occurred here.

And so right after the leak of the transcript that President Trump had with the Australian ambassador -- I mean, with the Australian prime minister, I was in contact with the Australian ambassador. I was also in contact with the White House and the appropriate agencies because we can't run a government like this. A government can't function with massive leaks at the highest level of our president talking to foreign leaders.

And so that, I think, is one of the focuses that you all should be concerned about because these are high-level leaks.

QUESTION: (inaudible) -- how big is the circle of individuals who have access to those transcripts?

NUNES: Well, this is out of -- you know, I didn't really realize this, but evidently, the way I understand the process is is that the last administration had it set up to go down to the State Department and the I.C. and perhaps any other stakeholders within the NSC or the appropriate people within the White House.

And so, you know, we don't know how those got out. But clearly, you know, how are foreign leaders going to be able to talk to our president if they don't -- if they don't think that this is going to be leaked to the press?

QUESTION: Just to follow on (inaudible) question because you said no contacts with the Russian government. As I'm sure you're aware, there are many Russian businessmen, oligarchs, et cetera that report back to the Kremlin as part of their circle of intelligence gathering. Have you eliminated that possibility, that the people that Trump advisers were speaking with have connections to the Russian government even if they're not officially working for the Russian government?

NUNES: Well, we -- we haven't -- just to be clear, we haven't eliminated anything. The only thing that I want to make sure that we do is before we go after American citizens and subpoena them or bring them before the legislative branch of government, that it's not just because they appeared in a news story somewhere.

QUESTION: What you're saying...

NUNES: And so -- but as of -- as of...

QUESTION: You're still investigating them, communications between Trump campaign advisers and Russians known to U.S. intelligence...

NUNES: It's not -- I wouldn't limit it to Trump only or Trump officials. I would say that it would be also any contacts with any political candidates anywhere at any level, including in the United States or in foreign -- other foreign countries.

QUESTION: Are you saying then that there were Clinton advisers that were speaking to...

NUNES: I'm just saying that -- no, no, no. Let's not...

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

NUNES: There would be no -- there would be no evidence of that nor is there any evidence that I've been presented about Trump advisers speaking to Russians.

But we do know for a long time that the Russians have been very interested in manipulating elections, manipulating the press. They're very good at propaganda. And so -- I mean, that's what caused me a year ago to come out and criticize the intelligence agencies for the largest intelligence failure since 9/11 because of the lack of good intelligence we were getting on Putin's plans and intentions.

So I'm -- so that's why I really appreciate the amount of press that showed up here today because, you know, we do need to have some scrutiny put on to the Russian government and we do need to know if there are any Americans that are talking to the Russians and anybody connected to the Russian government or Russian agents.

But at this time, I want to be very careful that we can't just go on a witch hunt against Americans because they appear in a news story somewhere.

QUESTION: And by Americans, do you mean Michael Flynn, the former NSA?

NUNES: Any -- any American.

QUESTION: (inaudible) referring to Flynn...

NUNES: Well, I think specifically, there was -- I think the more important question on that was there were three Americans, of which the only name I know is Manafort, the other two I don't know.NUNES: But they appeared in a news story and the questions that we had 10 days ago when that story broke, for many of you who attended the different press availabilities that I had, the question was whether or not we were going to investigate those Americans.

And, at this point, here at the committee, we still don't have any evidence of them talking to Russians.

QUESTION: And do you have all the evidence at this point that you expect to receive?

Or would you say you're still in the preliminary stages of receiving and reviewing that evidence?

NUNES: Well, we're working on the -- we had the scoping of our investigation finished. And then we're going to move into actually receiving the evidence.

But, as of right now, the initial inquiries I've made to the appropriate agencies, I don't have any evidence.

QUESTION: I just want to be really clear, so the FBI specifically told you that they have found no contacts between any Trump associates and Russian officials?

NUNES: Yes, so I want to be -- we're not going to just -- we're going to say the whole I.C. here, I'm not going to get up to specific to any one agency. But as of right now, I don't have -- I don't have any evidence that would -- of any phone calls.

That doesn't mean they don't exist but I don't have that. And what I've been told is, by many -- by many folks, is that there's nothing there.

QUESTION: But you're still looking at it?

NUNES: But we're still -- we're absolutely looking into it. And we want the information. But I just can't -- I just can't call in American citizens with no information.

QUESTION: When you say -- when you say there are no contacts (inaudible), are you referring to direct contacts, for instance, Manafort had a lot of contacts with Ukrainians (inaudible).

NUNES: Yes, well, I think, specifically, this would be on contacts with any association whatsoever to anyone, even within the realm of the Russian intelligence apparatus.

QUESTION: You just said that many people have told you this.

Can you be more specific?

I mean, who has told you that there are...

NUNES: No, I'm not going to get into -- I'm not going to get into specifically the conversations I had -- you know, I had with the executive branch and the appropriate agencies.

But I will say that we long have had a very good process in the Congress here, where we have the Gang of Eight. When counterintelligence issues arise, they brief us on those counterintelligence issues.

And we keep them, because they oftentimes involve American citizens, and I -- and it's important that we keep it that way, when those investigations are ongoing.

But, in this case, as it relates to any campaign officials dealing with Russians, we don't have any evidence right now.

QUESTION: Mr. Chairman, if you've been told that there's nothing there, why are you specifically investigating whether there are any links between the campaigns and Russian officials?

NUNES: Well...unlike what -- I think what's been reported, we've had a long ongoing investigation into Russian activities. I would have preferred for that not to be out and talked about in public.

But you may remember, for the last several years, we've been concerned about Russia's cyber activities. And we remain concerned about those activities.

Since the election, we've broadened the scope of that investigation to include any involvement in this -- in our elections here and, of course, any ties that there might be to any government officials at any level.

So it's not just -- not just here in Washington but governors and others. If there's anything out there, any American citizens from political campaigns coordinating with the Russian government, we clearly would want -- we would want to know that and we would want to investigate it.

QUESTION: Just (inaudible), have you seen the transcripts of Mike Flynn's phone calls with the Russian ambassador? NUNES: No, but I've been briefed -- I've been briefed on them. And it would be unusual, actually, I think unprecedented for us to get transcripts that were illegally leaked out and discussed, for us to have those here in Congress.

QUESTION: Was there any...

NUNES: And I think we've got to be very careful about the legislative branch of government getting FISA warranted communications and that we start combing through private conversations that American citizens are having. We've got to be very careful where we go with this.

QUESTION: Do you think it's concerning, you know, if -- that you (inaudible)?

NUNES: No, I think -- what it appears to me like is that it seems to be there is a difference between what Russia's sanctions are to people like myself, which, when I think Russia sanctions, I think of dealing with Crimea, dealing with the invasion of Ukraine by the Russians and the sanctions that we've put in -- into place, working with our allies, with the E.U. and others, and then what happened right at the time after Christmas, when President Obama kicked some Russian diplomats out, that -- I don't really consider that to be sanctions.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

NUNES: Well, look, Russia sanctions on a global stage, most of the meetings that I have with foreign leaders, they always revolve around -- when we talk Russia sanctions, that's what we're normally referring to. I don't -- when President Obama kicked out a few diplomats, that was -- number one, it was way too late. Number two, it was extremely weak. And number three, the Russian government didn't even respond to it because it was so ridiculous.

QUESTION: When the White House asked you about, you know, talking to this reporter, did you know that they had also asked Senator Burr to do the same thing? And did it feel to you like some sort of a coordinated effort to push back?

NUNES: No. I mean, if anything -- if anything, it was the opposite. So many of you -- many of you who were around ten days ago, you know that I took your questions as it related to the New York Times piece as it related to three Americans and whether or not we had any information or not.

So I had already talked to many of you about that several times, both in press runs and also on individual interviews. And so, by the time -- all it was was a White House communications person passing a number and a name of a reporter over for me -- if I would talk to them following up on what I had already told all of you in the days before that.

So I'm not sure how you generate a press story out of that, but I can't control what you guys write.

QUESTION: Did you know that they had asked...

QUESTION: Are you saying the FBI has not supplied you with the evidence or the FBI has told you there is no evidence?

NUNES: Well, look, I'm not going to get into which agencies, OK? I think it's important.

QUESTION: ... the intelligence community.

NUNES: But -- but the intelligence agencies have not provided me or the committee any information about those three Americans communicating with Russians and...

QUESTION: But they have not told you that that evidence does not exist? There's a difference there.

NUNES: Yeah, I -- the way it sounds like to me is it's been looked into and there's no evidence of anything there. You know, obviously we'd like to know if there is.

NUNES: Then it's pretty serious, then it would be the intelligence agencies then misleading Congress, which opens up a whole other problem.

QUESTION: Why not just not name a special prosecutor to take away the notion that this could be tainted by politics in any way?

NUNES: Well, I mean, look, this is -- we're the legislative branch of government, we're elected. I think the history of special prosecutors is mixed. And at this point, what are we going to appoint a special prosecutor to do exactly, to chase stories of American citizens that end up in newspaper articles?

I mean, that's -- right now, I mean look, if -- some point, we have serious crimes have been committed, it would be something that we would consider. But at this point, we don't have that. The only serious crimes we have are leaks that have come out of our government to the press and others.

Yes?

QUESTION: You had written a letter to the FBI about the leak. Can you give us an update on (inaudible)?

NUNES: Well, we -- I wrote the letter, and obviously, it's a classified letter. There's a classified version and an unclassified version. And we're expecting answers to that. So I think we have some briefings this week and next week and those briefings will continue.

QUESTION: ... committing resources to investigating these leaks?

NUNES: Well, as anything, we can't -- just like I think it's very similar to us not having any evidence of who -- of these American citizens that were allegedly talking to Russians, we also don't know exactly who would have known about General Flynn.

Now, the good thing is about FISA and the way it works, there should be a record of who in the government knew about General Flynn talking to the Russian ambassador and from there we should be able to do know who is in the realm of the possible, who we would need to talk to.

QUESTION: Can I ask you, who made the decision under the last (ph) administration to unmask Flynn? And was it appropriate?

NUNES: We don't know yet, but that's a very good question. And we are -- and that's -- those are some of the -- I think that we should be able to find out. We should be able to find out who within the executive branch knew about the initial conversations and then who went to who to get Flynn's name unmasked. So there -- that should be a relatively small number of people.

QUESTION: When the intelligence community begins presenting evidence to you, is that evidence going to be turned over to your committee or is it going to be housed -- continue to be housed in the intelligence community?

NUNES: Well, that will be -- that's one of the contentious issues right now of where the information is housed. We'll probably have some here, some may remain at the agencies.QUESTION: Do you have any -- have you heard any evidence at all, seen anything about anyone in the White House directing Mr. Flynn to discuss the issue -- any issues with the Russian ambassador? Did anyone in the White House tell him to do that?

NUNES: No, look, I think this whole issue with General Flynn -- General Flynn is an American war hero, one of the -- put together one of the greatest military machines in our history providing the intelligence to basically eliminate Al Qaida from Iraq. And he was the national security adviser designee, he was taking multiple calls a day from ambassadors, from foreign leaders and look, I know this because the foreign leaders were contacting me trying to get in touch with the transition team and folks that wanted to meet with President Trump or -- President-elect Trump and Vice President-elect Pence.

QUESTION: But did President-elect Trump at the time of the transition team tell Flynn to talk to the Russian ambassador?

NUNES: Look, I find that -- I would find that hard to believe because they were so busy and I think these conversations were all very short. I know we had -- yes?

QUESTION: Are you going to finalize and release the scope of the investigation? Also, do you plan to coordinate with the Senate side to have joint...

NUNES: Yeah, we're -- well, we're separate bodies but we will -- so we'll have a scoping document that should be approved, I think it's finished now. And then probably just have some brief outlines of what we'll be looking at, but look, I mean you guys all know what we're going to be looking at. It's not -- it's not rocket science.

QUESTION: But do you plan to coordinate interviews with the Senate so that you don't muck up the...

NUNES: I wouldn't -- I mean, I wouldn't rule it out. I wouldn't rule it out, but -- but, you know, we'll try to work with the Senate where possible. But I view this as a -- as two separate branches of the legislative branch of government.

Yes?

QUESTION: Is there a difference between the White House asking you to call a reporter and asking the FBI to knock down a particular story? NUNES: Well look, I don't think the -- I mean, first of all the White House talking to -- having a reporter -- if a reporter asks the White House, hey, can you get ahold of whatever member of Congress? I don't think there's any issue there, I don't know what the story's about.

As it relates to the -- as it relates to the FBI, I believe what happened with the White House, as I understand it in my limited conversations that I've had, I just think it was an obvious question that one would ask if there's no evidence here, can you talk about it.

And the FBI of course doesn't -- normally doesn't talk about leaks and whether or not they're investigating that or other issues of who the -- who's under investigation. I think it's pretty standard for the FBI not to comment on this. That's pretty unusual if they do comment and so obviously when -- so I don't even know how true that story is. I mean, I would -- I would go to the White House and ask, you know, what conversations actually occurred, but I don't think very many and I think they were -- pretty simple.

QUESTION: Can you give us an idea of how far along you are in starting this investigation? And like how many people are involved...

NUNES: Well, just to make sure you understand, what caused me to go out a year ago and say the biggest intelligence failure since 9/11 was our failure to understand Putin's plans and intentions, what caused that is because we were constantly investigating the Russia problems. So, all we're doing is we're adding additional things that we're looking at, which include the -- which will include the election issues.

QUESTION: How do you -- you say that there's no evidence right now Russians contacted campaign officials, but you also say that you're just in the -- in the scope gathering process of the investigation...

NUNES: Well, we're -- no, we're putting together a scope working with -- bipartisan with my counterpart Mr. Schiff so that we make sure that we -- that we're on the election as it relates to the election. But look, we've always been very, very interested in what the Russians are up to so this is basically part of an ongoing investigation that I was hopeful would have never been out in the press like it is, but now it is.

And now we're just expanding the scope of the investigation to include what we will look at as it relates to the election. But in terms of evidence, some we have -- some evidence we do have. Obviously we're looking for more evidence, but most importantly as it relates to American citizens, if you all have American citizens that you know were talking to Russian agents, if you want to come to our committee, be a whistleblower yourselves and bring me those names, I'd be very interested in having them.

QUESTION: But you expect the -- obtain more evidence or information, I should say, as the weeks go on?

NUNES: Yes, we will continue to take evidence, we'll follow the facts where they lead.

QUESTION: How extensive was the Obama administration's wiretap of the transition team and the campaign? Was it just Flynn or do you think this was a regular -- a regular process of listening into what Trump was doing?

NUNES: Well, as -- as I understand it, this was inadvertent collection to where then Mr. Flynn's name was then unmasked, someone had to make that decision, someone very high up within the government would have had to do that or multiple people. And we're very interested to figure out who those people were because they have -- they have questions to answer as to why -- you know, what laws did they use to decide to unmask General Flynn's name.QUESTION: So to follow up with that, if there was ongoing contact between the Russians and the Trump campaign, wouldn't other names pop up inadvertently? And so if this was the only incident that popped up, would that knock down the idea that there was regular contact?

NUNES: Yeah, look, there is no evidence that I've been presented of regular contact with anybody within the Trump campaign. The only one that's -- that's obvious is the -- is General Flynn's discussions with the Russians which I would still contend that he was doing what he was supposed to do, which is prepare the president-elect for office by getting as many leaders in front of him as possible.

QUESTION: If I could ask, if it's a major crime for leakers to -- to discuss classified information relating to these communications and elsewhere, why is it not inappropriate for the White House and you and Senator Burr to call reporters and give your own interpretation of, again, a continuing investigation that involves classified intelligence? Isn't that a counter leak, as it were? You're still discussing...

NUNES: Well, I would never...

QUESTION: ... investigation?

NUNES: Well, in order -- I would never talk about classified information with any of you because that would be a crime.

QUESTION: But the message that was coming from you and others...

NUNES: So...

QUESTION: ... was that we've looked at the information, there's nothing there and that relates to an ongoing investigation one and it's based on, at its core, classified information about contacts between...

NUNES: Right, but there was -- there was no release of classified information in that. And I'm a little confused by your question because either you -- I mean, the White House has been very critical of a lot of you. And so here, you have the White House actually trying to communicate with many of you and trying to communicate with the Congress about what they're -- what they're doing. And now, suddenly, that's -- that's wrong, there's -- there's nothing wrong with that.

If you look at the last administration and I think if a lot of the Democrats were -- were being honest with you, they know that the relationship between the last White House and Congress was extremely poor. What we're trying to do is have a very good working relationship with the executive branch of government at all levels.

And so I would anticipate that -- that and hope that we have more coordination with the White House and all the appropriate agencies and that we actually -- on one side, we're a separate branch of government and we will conduct rigorous oversight, which look, I've been very clear. If I find out that -- that Reince Priebus was, you know, talking to, you know, Russian agents, you can bet that Reince Priebus will get a subpoena and will appear before the Congress.

QUESTION: Mr. Chairman, Jim Comey, the FBI director, was on the Senate side right before the recess (inaudible) called it a hearing. Has he appeared before your committee in a similar capacity? Have you asked for him to come?

NUNES: Yeah, we've had -- we've had discussions with the FBI director and others within the FBI, and I do expect that they will be briefing us again either this week or next.

QUESTION: Are you going to...

NUNES: Yes, Sir, back there? What's that?

QUESTION: (inaudible) Attorney General to be recuse himself?

NUNES: So that's way above my pay grade, I have -- I have no idea. I don't even know what at this point would the Attorney General...

QUESTION: Well, there's...

NUNES: What would he recuse himself from?

QUESTION: They're calling him to -- because of his relationship with the Trump campaign, that he would be an impartial...

NUNES: Right, but the way -- the way this works is, you know, if the FBI is at some point, if they're conducting an investigation, they would have to go to the appropriate authorities to get a warrant, to do something. And as far as I know, none of that's -- that's happened.

(CROSSTALK) QUESTION: Speaking of Reince Priebus, do you have any concerns with him talking with the FBI, number two at the FBI to back down stories about this, given the...

NUNES: I don't wanna speak -- look, I think you need to ask them. But I think they've been pretty clear about the discussions.

The FBI regularly briefs both branches of government, so they would -- they would brief -- FBI would brief the president, vice president, the chief of staff, any other appropriate personnel the same way that they brief the Senate and the House. And so it would not be unusual in any of those cases for us to make requests of the FBI or any other intelligence agency.

Yes?

QUESTION: Based on your briefings, has anything in the Trump (inaudible) been verified?

NUNES: Not that I'm aware of.

QUESTION: Going back to what the White House was telling you earlier, you said that it was not about knocking down the New York Times report, so what did they suggest...

NUNES: Yeah, I mean, I think that's a -- that's a good point. And -- and look, you guys are the ones that were there. Matter of fact, I think you were there when -- I think I spoke to you that -- the morning of that -- of that story breaking.

I was very clear with all of you about what I thought about that New York Times story. This was way in advance of the White House sending me one phone number and I still don't understand, what would be the problem of the White House sending me a number of a press person to call? Isn't the whole point of the press to be transparent?NUNES: I mean, you guys always normally want to talk to me and that's why I wanted to create this press availability today, so that I can -- so that I can talk to all of you, so that it's just more organized versus you guys chasing me around at press scrums.

QUESTION: ... guidance point (inaudible)?

NUNES: No, no, no. It was just this person wants to talk about the -- about The New York Times story and I got the number and I called the reporter.

QUESTION: Chairman, on the -- on the Flynn phone call, I'm not sure I fully understand the distinction you made between the Ukraine sanctions and the sanctions that President Obama imposed. It wasn't just (inaudible)...

NUNES: So look, it -- I think -- let me -- let me describe it bluntly, OK?

QUESTION: ... sanction individuals with GRUs (ph), contractors that participate in the hacking, and I guess the question is, if General Flynn telegraphed to the Russian ambassador that those sanctions, whether or not you think they were serious enough or strong enough, would be eased or lifted, would that not be ...

NUNES: Well, I don't...

QUESTION: ... (inaudible)?

NUNES: ... so let me be very, very clear. So I think that, just when I apply common sense to this, those were not sanctions. Those were petty. They're not taken seriously by anybody who knows this. When we -- when every conversation I have ever had about Russian sanctions with any of our allies, it's always been about the Russia sanctions dealing with the invasion of Ukraine.

QUESTION: But you realize there were sanctions imposed...

NUNES: Well, look, you guys can -- you guys can -- you guys can call them that if you want. But I...

NUNES: ... but I wouldn't call them that.

QUESTION: That's what they were called by the White House.

The question is, did General Flynn, in any way, suggest to the Russian ambassador that he didn't have to worry, that Vladimir Putin didn't have to worry about these sanctions, because President Trump would either ease or lift them?

NUNES: Yes, well, I think the -- if the discussions occurred around ensuring that the -- that there was no overreaction by the Russian government so that the new administration could do, like all of the other previous administrations who think that they can work with Putin -- which all three have been wrong, that they cannot work with Putin -- if that was -- is that was what General Flynn did, was just to try to keep the lines of communications open and to have -- and to see it makes for the Russians didn't overreact and maybe have some reciprocal attacks on our -- on our diplomats or other embassies around the world, that did us a big favor. And we should be thanking him, not...

NUNES: ... not going after him.

QUESTION: ... like he was telling the Russian ambassador, don't worry about what the president just announced, we're going to do something different when we get...

NUNES: Yes, I don't know that that's what was said. But if that was said, I don't know what the problem would be with that, I mean I would -- I'd think that's exactly what he -- what he should be doing.

QUESTION: Isn't that one U.S. administration (inaudible)...

NUNES: So you want to investigate on the Logan Act.

You're a Logan Act guy?

QUESTION: Make it look (inaudible)...

NUNES: That's really -- look, it's ridiculous if -- the Logan Acts are ridiculous. You guys all know that's ridiculous.

QUESTION: Sir, do you plan...

NUNES: Yes, sir?

QUESTION: ... Trump's tax returns? NUNES: To do what with them?

QUESTION: To subpoena...

NUNES: No.

QUESTION: ... tax...

NUNES: No, we're not going to do that.

QUESTION: (inaudible) answering this question about (inaudible) if I understood correctly, you said, I don't know why he should, because there -- he didn't know of any investigation going on.

So is that saying...

NUNES: Well, I don't think there is any evidence to go after anyone at this point, is my point. At that point, it would be up to -- it would be up to the attorney general and others.

QUESTION: Is the FBI not investigating leaks (inaudible)?

NUNES: I would -- the FBI should always be investigating leaks. I would hope that they are taking the leaks that have occurred over the course of the last couple months seriously and I would hope they are investigating.

But, look, they are not going to comment on those, nor should they.

QUESTION: And one last thing, if you are looking into the -- is that (inaudible) investigation?

Or is that (inaudible)?

NUNES: No, it's all -- it'll all rolled into the investigation.

Any other new questions?

QUESTION: Just your Democratic colleagues are not here at this briefing today. We understand that they were not aware of this happening.

Why should Americans be confident (inaudible)?
