Let's get serious about reforms

new Emperor | July 17, 2007 - 5:12pm

reply »

RFN:

Did I ever tell you I am the starting Quarterback for the Dallas Cowboys?

I have started every Monday morning game for the past 30 years.

new AK_Logic | July 16, 2007 - 3:24pm

reply »

I think that means you're not only interested in that bridge, you have the means to pay for it!

Please post a mailing address so I can mail you the brochure.

new rfn | July 16, 2007 - 4:31pm

reply »

good one

I was starting to think you were a starting pitcher for the Seattle Mariners. Thank god I was wrong.

new Stags_Leap | July 16, 2007 - 3:48pm

reply »

Stags:

Now that is mean :)

new AK_Logic | July 16, 2007 - 4:12pm

reply »

interesting

two separate high-power law firms in D.C., with payments made to each in nearly identical timeframes.

It could lead one to speculate that DY is under investigation by two separate grand juries on separate issues. That's an awful lot of money prior to any indictments being handed out. Imagine what a full-blown trial would cost.

I also think it's a travesty of justice that a man can use his public campaign funds to pay for legal defense fees related to possible corruption charges. I would think DY's Office owes an explanation to the public on what the "legal services" for $260K and change involve.

new Stags_Leap | July 16, 2007 - 9:34am

reply »

The Doms Buddy Down In California Is Having Legal Woes Too

By Erica Werner
ASSOCIATED PRESS
8:48 a.m. July 16, 2007

FBI - Stevens-1106

WASHINGTON – California GOP Rep. John Doolittle's fundraising has slowed and he lags his likely Democratic opponent in money as the congressman's legal woes mount in a congressional influence-peddling scandal.
The nine-term conservative from Rocklin reported raising $100,183 from April 1 through June 30, according to his quarterly Federal Election Commission report, filed Sunday. The three-month period encompassed an FBI raid on his home in early April in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

new twentythreeskidoo | July 16, 2007 - 1:13pm

reply »

is this a 'doo nugget'?

Perhaps a trademark thingy should start happening? doo nugget looks and sounds better than a nose nugget...

new akgen | July 16, 2007 - 1:37pm

reply »

nosenugget, doonugget

it's all the same.

new twentythreeskidoo | July 16, 2007 - 2:31pm

reply »

© Copyright 2007, The Anchorage Daily News, a subsidiary of The McClatchy Company
Contact Us | Newsroom Contacts | Communication Forms | Subscriptions | Advertising | Terms of Use
Daily News Jobs | RSS Feeds | ADN Store | Newspapers in Education | Privacy Agreement

A member of the
Real Cities Network

FBI - Stevens-1107

NEWS BY EMAIL
• Breaking News • Outdoors
• Fishing • PM Briefing
• Obituaries • & More
SIGN UP HERE

Anchorage Daily News: Alaska's Newspaper

Search Archives »

home alaska life money entertainment outdoors sports blogs classified alaska.com help

news entertainment life money
obituaries
opinion outdoors
sports blogs weather shopping jobs cars homes rentals deals ads from print alaska.com
rss feeds
adn store
adnmail
crossword puzzle
blogs
help

Candidate Harris

Posted: July 16, 2007 - 10:39 am

In R.A. Dillon's column for the News-Miner this weekend, he quotes Rep. John Harris as a potential candidate for U.S. House or Senate.

Harris told Dillon he doesn't plan to challenge Stevens or Young, but would run if one of them got indicted.

add new comment

Harris should stay where he is at

John has too many issues/secrets that would come to light if he ran on the national stage. What you can get away with in Ak would be exposed in the national press. The under handed action during the John Devens campaign in support of Don Young, the weird business that went on between Alyeska and Harris Sand and Gravel in 89-90. Why didn't Alyeska file theft charges on all that missing building materials purchased from Harris Sand and Gravel? Why did the Harris family buy him out of the business after that? Is that how and why the oil industry got a death grip on Harris? Harris Sand and Gravel got away with some bad work for DOT on highway project after John was elected. Many questions that were never answered.

new tim2 | July 20, 2007 - 10:27am

reply »

Oh Great, Just What Alaska Needs....

...another guy who "doesn't get it" when it comes to duty and ethics, running for higher office.

John Harris has presided over the most corrupt house organization in Alaska's brief history. Remember Rep Berkowitz's now-famous call for the "...the House to remain the People's House..."?

Remember who he was talking to? John Harris. John Harris famously ignored Berkowitz and allowed the House to become Bill Allen's little dukedome.

John Harris should be spending his waking days begging for our forgiveness, not contemplating higher office.

A pox on him!!!

new metanoia2k | July 17, 2007 - 9:27am

reply »

I seem to recall that Ethan Berkowitz organized WITH Pete Kott,

Alaska Politics

State, local and beyond

Alaska has a new governor, a new legislature and a powerful congressional delegation. Come here for the latest news and tidbits from the transition, from Juneau and elsewhere by Daily News political reporters. We want to hear from you, too. So sound off and interact with other readers and the reporters in the "comments" section.

Kyle Hopkins covered the 2006 campaign for governor and is covering the Palin administration's transition. Before joining the Daily News in 2005, he was a writer for the Anchorage Press and the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner. E-mail him at khopkins@adn.com.

The Trail 2006 campaign blog

ARCHIVE

Dittman poll: Businesses, milk, global warming - 7/20/2007 3:21 pm

Murkowski in the spotlight - 7/20/2007 10:46 am

Round-up - 7/19/2007 10:06 am

What to do about homeless - 7/18/2007 3:16 pm

Roll Call on Young - 7/18/2007 10:59 am

Tesche - 7/18/2007 10:31 am

Special session and capital creep - 7/17/2007 9:14 pm

Poop update - 7/17/2007 7:54 pm

(UPDATED) AP on Stevens - 7/17/2007 6:27 pm

Wrong number - 7/17/2007 3:20 pm

Wes Keller to replace Kohring - 7/17/2007 12:54 pm

Ads by Google

Moving to Anchorage?
Browse current listings of homes in the Anchorage area.
www.greatalaska.net/hou

Alaska MLS Listing $299
Why Pay 6% ? Direct Access to Alaska MLS.
www.congressrealty.com

Alaska Hard Money Loans
Commercial Mortgage Loans Compared Hard Money Lenders Reviewed - AK
www.BusinessInfotoday.c

India BnB & Yoga Retreat
Affordable Anchorage Lodging. Fresh Indian & American breakfast
www.indiainalaska.com

FBI - Stevens-1108

194-AN-13620-M;496

Tom Anderson, and Lesil McGuire to overthrow Harris. Aren't ya glad that didn't work out? You are way off accusing Harris of being corrupt and calling Berkowitz a saint. Just so happens that Kott/Berkowitz and that little coup attempt were totally backed by who else: Bill Allen.

new acom | July 19, 2007 - 9:46pm

reply »

Right on the mark acom!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

I still remember the picture of ethan and kott with arms around each other's shoulders, smiling like the cat who just swallowed the canary. I will see if I can find it anywhere so people can look at it. Anyone got any ideas where that could be found?

new truthseeker | July 20, 2007 - 10:04am

reply »

Small spenders - 7/16/2007 8:32 pm
Mental illness and guns (UPDATED) - 7/16/2007 4:43 pm
Candidate Harris - 7/16/2007 10:39 am
Lots of lawyering - 7/16/2007 10:01 am
Replacing Kohring - 7/14/2007 2:28 pm
Should dogs be banned from ballfields? - 7/13/2007 12:22 pm
No free wi-fi? - 7/13/2007 12:17 pm
Lobbying - 7/13/2007 12:16 pm
'Discretion and tact are essential' - 7/12/2007 4:38 pm
full archive »

new simplesimon23 | July 16, 2007 - 5:48pm

reply »

Someone with spine

is what we need in the House or Senate.

If you didn't catch the Bill Moyers Journal this weekend - catch it on video at: http://www.pbs.org/moyers/journal/07132007/profile.html

new simplesimon23 | July 16, 2007 - 5:47pm

reply »

John Harris

certainly does not meet the description of someone with spine.

new theodosius30 | July 17, 2007 - 5:06am

reply »

Not everyone on this blog will tell you..

Complacency is bad.

Complacency is the best way to not be a 'target' with the union or CBC until, well the time the Federalis come and raid yer office.

'Do nothing policy' can become a crime or at least get your pension yanked,now.

Nothing about plea bargains, it's a choice of cooperate with the fed or not. Usually the fed is nicer on sentence if the perp cooperated.

Same violation, new penalties.

It would be interesting to see who voted against that revocation clause especially Harris.

new edgefinder | July 16, 2007 - 8:15pm

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1109

John Harris is a definite,

John Harris is a definite, front running suckup to the oil industry.

Always has been, and he always WILL be.

new leowassilie | July 16, 2007 - 10:09am

reply »

Not what we need

If state Republicans want to continue with business as usual with all of their good ol' boys, Harris is definitely the man. I would hope the rest of us regular folk know better than to consider him.

new iHEARTmea | July 16, 2007 - 9:59am

reply »

Humpty Dumbty

has a better chance of being a senator or congressman than John Harris.

new theodosius30 | July 16, 2007 - 11:00am

reply »

In Case of Indictments?

When I suggested that the Republicans need to look for federal replacements as hard as the democrats Harris was not in mind at all.

Now I know more about it.

Who knows if Harris won't or shouldn't be under indictment at this point. PPT HAD A LOT OF MONEY THROWN IN.

Like the other bloggers have suggested, campaign Donors need to know what they're getting before hand.

That's the key to corruption.

new edgefinder | July 16, 2007 - 5:46pm

reply »

© Copyright 2007, The Anchorage Daily News, a subsidiary of The McClatchy Company

FBI - Stevens-1110

Anchorage Daily News: Alaska's Newspaper

Search Archives »

home alaska life money entertainment outdoors sports blogs classified alaska.com help

news
entertainment
life
money
obituaries
opinion
outdoors
sports
blogs weather shopping
jobs cars
homes rentals
deals ads from print
alaska.com
rss feeds
adn store
adnmail
crossword puzzle
blogs
help

(UPDATED) AP on Stevens

Posted: July 17, 2007 - 6:27 pm

UPDATE: Click here for the financial disclosure document Stevens filed (it's 18 pages).

After 2-month delay, Stevens releases report on personal finances

By JEANNETTE J. LEE
Associated Press Writer

ANCHORAGE, Alaska (AP) -- Sen. Ted Stevens filed the annual report on his personal finances with the Senate Ethics Committee on Tuesday after receiving a two-month extension to fix what he called a few simple technical errors.

The delay was not unusual for members of Congress, but with his son under investigation by the FBI for corruption, Stevens said he wanted to make sure his report, detailing income, assets and gifts from 2006, was unassailable.

"The delay happened, really, because I asked for it, because of the circumstances right now," Stevens said Tuesday. The 83-year-old senator said nothing in the mandatory disclosure report has anything to do with the investigation.

FBI raids on the offices of several Alaska lawmakers last year included his son, former Alaska Senate President Ben Stevens.

The FBI has asked the elder Stevens, who is the longest-serving Republican in Senate history, to retain his records. The agency is looking into the remodeling of the senator's Girdwood home in 2000 in connection with the investigation, which is ongoing.

Neither the senator nor his son have been charged.

Most members of Congress submitted their financial disclosure reports in mid-May. Stevens said the filing delay was due to questions by the Senate Ethics Committee over his wife's 401K, as well as a few small mistakes.

"I put an X on front page in the wrong box," Stevens said.

A copy of the report provided by Stevens' office to The Associated Press shows his assets are worth between $1 million and to $2.1 million, with about half in a blind trust. Individual assets include oil well interests in Oklahoma worth $50,001 to $100,000 and rental housing in Wickenburg, Ariz., in the same range. Local holdings include commercial property and a share in Sack's Restaurant, a downtown eatery. Each is worth between $15,001 and $50,000.

"People write all these stories about senators being rich.

Alaska Politics

State, local and beyond

Alaska has a new governor, a new legislature and a powerful congressional delegation. Come here for the latest news and tidbits from the transition, from Juneau and elsewhere by Daily News political reporters. We want to hear from you, too. So sound off and interact with other readers and the reporters in the "comments" section.

Kyle Hopkins covered the 2006 campaign for governor and is covering the Palin administration's transition. Before joining the Daily News in 2005, he was a writer for the Anchorage Press and the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner. E-mail him at khopkins@adn.com.

The Trail 2006 campaign blog

ARCHIVE

Dittman poll: Businesses, milk, global warming - 7/20/2007 3:21 pm

Murkowski in the spotlight - 7/20/2007 10:46 am

Round-up - 7/19/2007 10:06 am

What to do about homeless - 7/18/2007 3:16 pm

Roll Call on Young - 7/18/2007 10:59 am

Tesche - 7/18/2007 10:31 am

Special session and capital creep - 7/17/2007 9:14 pm

Poop update - 7/17/2007 7:54 pm

(UPDATED) AP on Stevens - 7/17/2007 6:27 pm

Wrong number - 7/17/2007 3:20 pm

Wes Keller to replace Kohring - 7/17/2007 12:54 pm

Ads by Google

Alaska Unclaimed Money
Millions in unclaimed money How much do they owe you?
www.CashUnclaimed.com

Alaska MLS Listing $299
Why Pay 6% ? Direct Access to Alaska MLS.
www.congressrealty.com

Alaska Fishing Guides
Alaska Kenai River King Salmon, Fly Halibut Fishing Guides & Lodging www.myalaskafishingguid

Hidden Creek B&B
Girdwood, AK, 40 min. S Anchorage New luxury B&B, all ammenities www.hiddencreekbb.com

FBI - Stevens-1111

194-AN-13620-M,497

This one isn't," Stevens said.

The senator's disclosure report also included a retroactive list of gifts he received from the Kenai River Sportfishing Association. The group works to protect salmon runs on the Kenai River and was founded by Stevens' friend and business partner Bob Penney.

Penney and Stevens were part of a group of 10 prominent Alaskans who owned a racehorse together under a company called Alaska's Great Eagle, which is also listed on the senator's disclosure form. Penney testified in June before a federal grand jury in Anchorage that has gathered information in the corruption cases.

Stevens hosts the fishing association's annual fundraiser and, according to the report, received guns priced from $850 to $1,800 over the course of five years starting in 2002. They included a $1,400 Smith & Wesson and an $1,800 Beretta 470 Silver Eagle.

The firearms were awarded in recognition of public service, exempting them from a Senate rule that prohibits mosts gifts worth more than $49.99.

Small spenders - 7/16/2007 8:32 pm
Mental illness and guns (UPDATED) - 7/16/2007 4:43 pm
Candidate Harris - 7/16/2007 10:39 am
Lots of lawyering - 7/16/2007 10:01 am
Replacing Kohring - 7/14/2007 2:28 pm
Should dogs be banned from ballfields? - 7/13/2007 12:22 pm
No free wi-fi? - 7/13/2007 12:17 pm
Lobbying - 7/13/2007 12:16 pm
'Discretion and tact are essential' - 7/12/2007 4:38 pm
full archive »

The senator commented briefly on the remodeling of his home in the sleepy ski resort town of Girdwood that doubled the size of the house, a four-bedroom structure that is Stevens' official residence in Alaska.

A contractor who did work on the house has said he was directed to send bills to the oil-field services company, VECO, headed by Stevens' friend Bill Allen, who has been indicted on political bribery charges. Someone at the company would examine them for accuracy before sending them to Stevens.

"I will tell you we paid every bill that was given to us with our own money," Stevens said, referring to himself and his wife. "She works and I work. That was our own money."

Stevens said he could not answer questions in detail because of the FBI investigation.

"If I do, I'm liable to be accused of obstruction of justice," he said.

Stevens said attorney Bill Canfield assisted in vetting his financial disclosures. Canfield was Stevens' chief of staff when the senator headed the Senate Ethics Committee.

add new comment

"People write all these "People write all these stories about senators being rich. This one isn't," Stevens said.

Is that like what Ben said about his multi million option at ADAK?

"I'm not getting rich off it."

Ask any GG employee and 2.1m is rich.

And I bet a current appraisal in Wik is more $ for the house. Things have boomed around there.

new edgefinder | July 18, 2007 - 5:34pm

reply »

Ask the crab fishermen

Ask any of the 1000 crab fishermen the Stevens father-son team put out of work if 2.1 million is rich.

new tkelley | July 18, 2007 - 10:34pm

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1112

Nailed it through the hands

Right on man - just like trying to prove your innocence in the murder of a Martian. How many other aliens have you killed, Mr. Senator? Is this the reason you never visit Roswell? Innocent if he drowns, stone him if he floats.

new nerka86 | July 18, 2007 - 12:50pm

reply »

What about the bills that weren't sent to you?

Senator Stevens concerning the VECO-linked remodeling job: "I will tell you we paid every bill that was given to us". No one is questioning that fact. The question is how many bills were not sent to the Stevens? And who paid those bills?

new tkelley | July 18, 2007 - 6:51am

reply »

Nailed It

You've nailed it, tkelley. Since when were we concerned whether Stevens paid all the bills that were sent to him? The question is whether others paid for goods and services delivered to Stevens.

It's sort of like being accused of murder and saying "I haven't killed anyone with a pitchfork."

new chilcoot | July 18, 2007 - 9:57am

reply »

Maybe you meant...

Unsaid quote: "I'm not rich if you count only my assets in the USA that the IRS can find! By jove, those London trips to handle my Jersey Isle accounts are so nice when I fly on a private corporate jet for free." - Ted.

The German 5th: "I know nutthing!, Colonel Hogan!" - Sgt. Schultz

new staufon | July 18, 2007 - 9:06pm

reply »

© Copyright 2007, The Anchorage Daily News, a subsidiary of The McClatchy Company

FBI - Stevens-1113

UNITED STATES SENATE FINANCIAL DISCLOSURE REPORT FOR ANNUAL AND TERMINATION REPORTS

Last Name	First Name and Middle Initial	Annual Report / Calendar Year Covered by Report	Senate Office / Agency in Which Employed
STEVENS	THEODORE (TED) F.	2006
Senate Office Address (Number, Street, City, State, and ZIP Code)	Senate Office Telephone Number (Include Area Code)	Termination Report / Termination Date (mm/dd/yy)	Prior Office / Agency in Which Employed
SENATE HART 522 WASHINGTON DC 20510	(202)224-3004

AFTER READING THE INSTRUCTIONS - ANSWER EACH OF THESE QUESTIONS AND ATTACH THE RELEVANT PART

	YES	NO		YES	NO
Did any individual or organization make a donation to charity in lieu of paying you for a speech, appearance, or article in the reporting period? If Yes, Complete and Attach PART I.		X	Did you, your spouse, or dependent child receive any reportable travel or reimbursements for travel in the reporting period (i.e., worth more than $305 from one source)? If Yes, Complete and Attach PART VI.		X
Did you or your spouse have earned income (e.g., salaries or fees) or non-investment income of more than $200 from any reportable source in the reporting period? If Yes, Complete and Attach PART II.	X		Did you, your spouse, or dependent child have any reportable liability (more than $10,000) during the reporting period? If Yes, Complete and Attach PART VII.		X
Did you, your spouse, or dependent child hold any reportable asset worth more than $1,000 at the end of the period, or receive unearned or investment income of more than $200 in the reporting period? If Yes, Complete & Attach PART IIIA and/or IIIB.	X		Did you hold any reportable positions on or before the date of filing in the current calendar year? If Yes, Complete and Attach PART VIII	X
Did you, your spouse, or dependent child purchase, sell, or exchange any reportable asset worth more than $1,000 in the reporting period? If Yes, Complete and Attach PART IV.	X		Do you have any reportable agreement or arrangement with an outside entity? If Yes, Complete and Attach PART IX.		X
Did you, your spouse, or dependent child receive any reportable gift in the reporting period (i.e., aggregating more than $305 and not otherwise exempt)? If Yes, Complete and Attach PART V.	X		If this is your FIRST Report: Did you receive compensation of more than $5,000 from a single source in the two prior years? If Yes, Complete and Attach PART X

Each question must be answered and the appropriate PART attached for each "YES" response.

File this report and any amendments with the Secretary of the Senate, Office of Public Records, Room 232, Hart Senate Office Building, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC 20510. $200 Penalty for filing more than 30 days after due date.

This Financial Disclosure Statement is required by the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, as amended. The statement will be made available by the Office of the Secretary of the Senate to any requesting person upon written application and will be reviewed by the Select Committee on Ethics. Any individual who knowingly and willfully falsifies, or who knowingly and willfully fails to file this report may be subject to civil and criminal sanctions. (See 5 U.S.C. app. 6, 104, and 18 U.S.C. 1001.)

FOR OFFICIAL USE ONLY
Do Not Write Below this Line

07 JUL 17 PM 2:26

Certification	Signature of Reporting Individual	Date (Month, Day, Year)
I CERTIFY that the statements I have made on this form and all attached schedules are true, complete and correct to the best of my knowledge and belief.	Ted Stevens	7/17/07

For Official Use Only - Do Not Write Below This Line

	Signature of Reviewing Official	Date (Month, Day, Year)
It is the Opinion of the reviewer that the statements made in this form are in compliance with Title I of the Ethics in Government Act

Reporting Individual's Name	PART II. EARNED AND NON-INVESTMENT INCOME	Page Number
Theodore (Ted) F. Stevens		2

Report the source (name and address), type, and amount of earned income to you from any source aggregating $200 or more during the reporting period. For your spouse, report the source (name and address) and type of earned income which aggregate $1,000 or more during the reporting period. No amount needs to be specified for your spouse. (See p.3. CONTENTS OF REPORTS Part B of Instructions.) Do not report income from employment by the U.S. Government for you or your spouse.

Individuals not covered by the Honoraria Ban:
For you and /or your spouse, report honoraria income received which aggregates $200 or more by exact amount, give the date of, and describe the activity (speech, appearance or article) generating such honoraria payment. Do not include payments in lieu of honoraria reported on Part I.

	Name of Income Source	Address (City, State)	Type of Income	Amount
Example:	JP Computers	Wash., DC Example	Salary Example	$15,000
	MCI (Spouse)	Arlington, VA Example	Salary Example	Over $1,000
1	(S) Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw, LLP	Washington, DC	Salary	over $1,000
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11 12
13
14

JUL-17-2007 21:48 MCCLATCHYDC P.03/19

Reporting Individual's Name: Theodore (Ted) F. Stevens

PART IIIA. PUBLICLY TRADED ASSETS AND UNEARNED INCOME SOURCES

Page Number: 3

BLOCK A — Identity of Publicly Traded Assets And Unearned Income Sources

Report the complete name of each publicly traded asset held by you, your spouse, or your dependent child. (See p.3, CONTENTS OF REPORTS Part B of Instructions) for production of income or investment which:
(1) had a value exceeding $1,000 at the close of the reporting period; and/or
(2) generated over $200 in "unearned" income during the reporting period.
Include on this PART IIIA a complete identification of each public bond, mutual fund, publicly traded partnership interest, excepted investment funds, bank accounts, excepted and qualified blind trusts, and publicly traded assets of a retirement plan.

BLOCK B — Valuation of Assets

At the close of reporting period
If None, or less than $1,001, Check the first column

BLOCK C — Type and Amount of Income

If "None (or less than $201)" is Checked, no other entry is needed in Block C for that item. This includes income received or accrued to the benefit of the individual.

	Block A	None (or less than $1,001)	$1,001 - $15,000	$15,001 - $50,000	$50,001 - $100,000	$100,001 - $250,000	$250,001 - $500,000	$500,001 - $1,000,000	Over $1,000,000	$1,000,001 - $5,000,000	$5,000,001 - $25,000,000	$25,000,001 - $50,000,000	Over $50,000,000	Dividends	Rent	Interest	Capital Gains	Excepted Investment Fund	Excepted Trust	Qualified Blind Trust	Other (Specify Type)	None (or less than $201)	$201 - $1,000	$1,001 - $2,500	$2,501 - $5,000	$5,001 - $15,000	$15,001 - $50,000	$50,001 - $100,000	$100,001 - $1,000,000	Over $1,000,000	$1,000,001 - $5,000,000	Over $5,000,000	Actual Amount Required if "Other" Specified
Example: S, DC, or J	IBM Corp. (stock)				X									X							Example		X										Example
	(S) Keystone Fund					X										X		X			Example	X											Example
1	(S) Credit Suisse Securities, LLC San Francisco, CA (Money Market)				X									X											X
2	(J) United States Senate Federal Credit Union Washington, DC					X										X									X
3	(J) Wells Fargo (Checking Account) Anchorage, AK		X													X						X
4	(S) Bank of America (Checking Account) Washington, DC	X														X						X
5	(S) Wells Fargo (Checking Account) Wickenburg, AZ (1/3 interest)		X													X						X
6
7
8
9
10

EXEMPTION TEST (see instructions before marking box) If you omitted any asset because it meets the three-part test for exemption described in the instructions, please check box to the right ☐

 This category applies only if the asset is/was held independently by the spouse or dependent child. If the asset is/was either held by the filer or jointly held, use the other categories of value, as appropriate.

Reporting Individual's Name: Theodore (Ted) F. Stevens

PART IIIA. PUBLICLY TRADED ASSETS AND UNEARNED INCOME SOURCES

JUL-17-2007 21:49 MCCLATCHYDC

BLOCK A — Identity of Publicly Traded Assets And Unearned Income Sources

Report the complete name of each publicly traded asset held by you, your spouse, or your dependent child, (See p.3, CONTENTS OF REPORTS Part B of Instructions) for production of income or investment which:
(1) had a value exceeding $1,000 at the close of the reporting period; and/or
(2) generated over $200 in "unearned" income during the reporting period.
Include on this PART IIIA a complete identification of each public bond, mutual fund, publicly traded partnership interest, excepted investment funds, bank accounts, excepted and qualified blind trusts, and publicly traded assets of a retirement plan.

BLOCK B — Valuation of Assets

At the close of reporting period. If None, or less than $1,001, Check the first column

BLOCK C — Type and Amount of Income

If "None (or less than $201)" is Checked, no other entry is needed in Block C for that item. This includes income received or accrued to the benefit of the individual.

	Block A	Block B: None (or less than $1,001)	$1,001 - $15,000	$15,001 - $50,000	$50,001 - $100,000	$100,001 - $250,000	$250,001 - $500,000	$500,001 - $1,000,000	Over $1,000,000	$1,000,001 - $5,000,000	$5,000,001 - $25,000,000	$25,000,001 - $50,000,000	Over $50,000,000	Block C: Dividends	Rent	Interest	Capital Gains	Excepted Investment Fund	Excepted Trust	Qualified Blind Trust	Other (Specify Type)	None (or less than $201)	$201 - $1,000	$1,001 - $2,500	$2,501 - $5,000	$5,001 - $15,000	$15,001 - $50,000	$50,001 - $100,000	$100,001 - $1,000,000	Over $1,000,000	$1,000,001 - $5,000,000	Over $5,000,000	Actual Amount Required if "Other" Specified
S, Example: DC, or J	IBM Corp. (stock)				X									X							Example		X										Example
(S)	Keystone Fund					X										X		X			Example	X											Example
1	IRA w/Fidelity Investments as Custodian Consisting of the following:
2	Fidelity Cash Reserves	X												X											X
3	Fidelity International Small Cap Opportunity Fund					X								X								X
4
5
6
7
8
9
10

EXEMPTION TEST (see Instructions before marking box): If you omitted any asset because it meets the three-part test for exemption described in the Instructions, please check box to the right. ☐

 This category applies only if the asset is/was held independently by the spouse or dependent child. If the asset is/was either held by the filer or jointly held, use the other categories of value, as appropriate.

Reporting Individual's Name: Theodore (Ted) F. Stevens

PART IIIA. PUBLICLY TRADED ASSETS AND UNEARNED INCOME SOURCES

Page Number: 5

BLOCK A — Identity of Publicly Traded Assets And Unearned Income Sources

Report the complete name of each publicly traded asset held by you, your spouse, or your dependent child, (See p.3, CONTENTS OF REPORTS Part B of Instructions) for production of income or investment which:
(1) had a value exceeding $1,000 at the close of the reporting period; and/or
(2) generated over $200 in "unearned" income during the reporting period.
Include on this PART IIIA a complete identification of each public bond, mutual fund, publicly traded partnership interest, excepted investment funds, bank accounts, excepted and qualified blind trusts, and publicly traded assets of a retirement plan.

BLOCK B — Valuation of Assets

At the close of reporting period. If None, or less than $1,001, Check the first column.

BLOCK C — Type and Amount of Income

If "None (or less than $201)" is Checked, no other entry is needed in Block C for that item. This includes income received or accrued to the benefit of the individual

	Block A	None (or less than $1,001)	$1,001 - $15,000	$15,001 - $50,000	$50,001 - $100,000	$100,001 - $250,000	$250,001 - $500,000	$500,001 - $1,000,000	Over $1,000,000	$1,000,001 - $5,000,000	$5,000,001 - $25,000,000	$25,000,001 - $50,000,000	Over $50,000,000	Dividends	Rent	Interest	Capital Gains	Excepted Investment Fund	Excepted Trust	Qualified Blind Trust	Other (Specify Type)	None (or less than $201)	$201 - $1,000	$1,001 - $2,500	$2,501 - $5,000	$5,001 - $15,000	$15,001 - $50,000	$50,001 - $100,000	$100,001 - $1,000,000	Over $1,000,000	$1,000,001 - $5,000,000	Over $5,000,000	Actual Amount Required if "Other" Specified
Example: S, DC, or J	IBM Corp. (stock)				X									X							Example		X										Example
	(S) Keystone Fund					X										X		X			Example	X											Example
1	(S) CITIGROUP SMITHBARNEY IRA Consisting of the following funds:
2	(S) CGCM Large Cap Value Eq Investments		X															X						X
3	(S) CGCM Large Cap Growth Investments			X														X				X
4	(S) CGCM Small Cap Value Investments		X															X					X
5	(S) CGCM Small Cap Growth Investments		X															X				X
6	(S) CGCM International Equity Investments		X															X					X
7	(S) CGCM Emerging Mkts Equ Investments		X															X						X
8	(S) CGCM Govt Money Investments		X															X				X
9
10

EXEMPTION TEST (see instructions before marking box). If you omitted any asset because it meets the three-part test for exemption described in the instructions, please check box to the right. ☐

 This category applies only if the asset is/was held independently by the spouse or dependent child. If the asset is/was either held by the filer or jointly held, use the other categories of value, as appropriate

JUL-17-2007 21:50 MCCLATCHYDC P.06/19

Reporting Individual's Name: Theodore (Ted) F. Stevens

PART IIIA. PUBLICLY TRADED ASSETS AND UNEARNED INCOME SOURCES

Page Number: 6

BLOCK A — Identity of Publicly Traded Assets And Unearned Income Sources

Report the complete name of each publicly traded asset held by you, your spouse, or your dependent child, (See p.3, CONTENTS OF REPORTS Part B of Instructions) for production of income or investment which:
(1) had a value exceeding $1,000 at the close of the reporting period; and/or
(2) generated over $200 in "unearned" income during the reporting period.
Include on this PART IIIA a complete identification of each public bond, mutual fund, publicly traded partnership interest, excepted investment funds, bank accounts, excepted and qualified blind trusts, and publicly traded assets of a retirement plan.

BLOCK B — Valuation of Assets

At the close of reporting period
If None, or less than $1,001, Check the first column.

BLOCK C — Type and Amount of Income

If "None (or less than $201)" is Checked, no other entry is needed in Block C for that item. This includes income received or accrued to the benefit of the individual.

	Block A	Block B: None (or less than $1,001)	$1,001 - $15,000	$15,001 - $50,000	$50,001 - $100,000	$100,001 - $250,000	$250,001 - $500,000	$500,001 - $1,000,000	Over $1,000,000	$1,000,001 - $5,000,000	$5,000,001 - $25,000,000	$25,000,001 - $50,000,000	Over $50,000,000	Block C: Type of Income: Dividends	Rent	Interest	Capital Gains	Excepted Investment Fund	Excepted Trust	Qualified Blind Trust	Other (Specify Type)	Amount of Income: None (or less than $201)	$201 - $1,000	$1,001 - $2,500	$2,501 - $5,000	$5,001 - $15,000	$15,001 - $50,000	$50,001 - $100,000	$100,001 - $1,000,000	Over $1,000,000	$1,000,001 - $5,000,000	Over $5,000,000	Actual Amount Required if "Other" Specified
S, Example: DC, or J	IBM Corp. (stock)				X									X							Example		X										Example
	(S) Keystone Fund					X										X		X			Example	X											Example
1	(S) MAYER, BROWN, ROWE & MAW 401(k) plan administered by:
2	BOK Financial Services and consists of the following funds:
3	(S) DWS Equity 500 Index Fund (Formerly Scudder Equ 500 Index Fund)			X														X								X
4	(S) TCW Select Equities Fund 1 (Formerly TCW Galileo Select Equ Fund)			X														X				X
5	(S) Jennison Small Company Z			X														X					X
6	(S) STI Classic Sm Cap Growth Stock Fund	X																X					X
7	(S) Fidelity Adv. Diversified Intl Fund			X														X								X
8
9
10

EXEMPTION TEST (see instructions before making box): If you omitted any asset because it meets the three-part test for exemption described in the instructions, please check box to the right ☐

 This category applies only if the asset is/was held independently by the spouse or dependent child. If the asset is/was either held by the filer or jointly held, use the other categories of value, as appropriate.

JUL-17-2007 21:50 MCCLATCHYDC F.07/1

Reporting Individual's Name: Theodore (Ted) F. Stevens

PART IIIB. NON-PUBLICLY TRADED ASSETS AND UNEARNED INCOME SOURCES

BLOCK A — Identity of Non-Publicly Traded Assets and Unearned Income Sources

Report the name, address (city state and description) of each interest held by you, your spouse, or your dependent child (See p.3, CONTENTS OF REPORTS Part B of Instructions) for the production of income or investment in a non-public trade or business which:

(1) had a value exceeding $1,000 at the close of the reporting period; and/or

(2) generated over $200 in "unearned" income during the reporting period.

Include the above report for each underlying asset, which is not incidental to the trade or business. Publicly traded assets held by non-public entity may be listed on Part IIIA.

BLOCK B — Valuation of Assets

At the close of reporting period. If None, or less than $1,001, Check the first column

BLOCK C — Type and Amount of Income

If "None (or less than $201)" is Checked, no other entry is needed in Block C for that item. This includes income received or accrued to the benefit of the individual.

	Block A	Block B: None (or less than $1,001)	$1,001 - $15,000	$15,001 - $50,000	$50,001 - $100,000	$100,001 - $250,000	$250,001 - $500,000	$500,001 - $1,000,000	Over $1,000,000	$1,000,001 - $5,000,000	$5,000,001 - $25,000,000	$25,000,001 - $50,000,000	Over $50,000,000	Block C: Type of Income: Dividends	Rent	Interest	Capital Gains	Excepted Investment Fund	Excepted Trust	Qualified Blind Trust	Other (Specify Type)	Amount of Income: None (or less than $201)	$201 - $1,000	$1,001 - $2,500	$2,501 - $5,000	$5,001 - $15,000	$15,001 - $50,000	$50,001 - $100,000	$100,001 - $1,000,000	Over $1,000,000	$1,000,001 - $5,000,000	Over $5,000,000	Actual Amount Required if "Other" Specified
S, DC, or J	Example: JP Computer, Wash DC				X									X							Example		X										Example
	Example: Undeveloped land, Dubuque, Iowa					X															Example	X											Example
1	(S) National Life (Life Insurance) Montpelier, VT		X													X							X
2	(S) State of Alaska Permanent Fund Dividend													X										X
3	State of Alaska Permanent Fund Dividend													X										X
4	Alaska's Great Eagle As Well, LLC Girdwood, AK		X																		LLC												(6424)
5	Alaska's Great Eagle, LLC Girdwood, AK		X																		LLC												(4264)
6	Theodore F. Stevens Blind Trust Anchorage, AK							X												X								X
7	Oil Interests (individual wells) Oklahoma City, OK				X																wrkg intrst												9048
8	Sacks Restaurant, LLC Anchorage, AK		X																		LLC												157
9
10

EXEMPTION TEST (see instructions before marking box): If you omitted any asset because it meets the three-part test for exemption described in the instructions, please check box to the right. ☐

 This category applies only if the asset is/was held independently by the spouse or dependent child. If the asset is/was either held by the filer or jointly held, use the other categories of value, as appropriate.

JUL-17-2007 21:51 ATCHYDC

Filer's Last Name: Theodore (Ted) F. Stevens

PART IIIB. NON-PUBLICLY TRADED ASSETS AND UNEARNED INCOME SOURCES

BLOCK A — Identify of Non-Publicly Traded Assets and Unearned Income Sources

Report the name, address (city, state and description) of each interest held by you, your spouse, or your dependent child (See p.3, CONTENTS OF REPORTS Part B of Instructions) for the production of income or investment in a non-public trade or business which:

(1) had a value exceeding $1,000 at the close of the reporting period; and/or

(2) generated over $200 in "unearned" income during the reporting period.

Include the above report for each underlying asset, which is not incidental to the trade or business. Publicly traded assets held by non-public entity may be listed on Part IIIA.

BLOCK B — Valuation of Assets

At the close of reporting period. If None, or less than $1,001, Check the first column.

BLOCK C — Type and Amount of Income

If "None (or less than $201)" is Checked, no other entry is needed in Block C for that item. This includes income received or accrued to the benefit of the individual.

	Block A	None (or less than $1,001)	$1,001 - $15,000	$15,001 - $50,000	$50,001 - $100,000	$100,001 - $250,000	$250,001 - $500,000	$500,001 - $1,000,000	Over $1,000,000	$1,000,001 - $5,000,000	$5,000,001 - $25,000,000	$25,000,001 - $50,000,000	Over $50,000,000	Type of Income: Dividends	Rent	Interest	Capital Gains	Excepted Investment Fund	Excepted Trust	Qualified Blind Trust	Other (Specify Type)	Amount of Income: None (or less than $201)	$201 - $1,000	$1,001 - $2,500	$2,501 - $5,000	$5,001 - $15,000	$15,001 - $50,000	$50,001 - $100,000	$100,001 - $1,000,000	Over $1,000,000	$1,000,001 - $5,000,000	Over $5,000,000	Actual Amount Required if "Other" Specified
Example: S, DC, or J	JP Computer, Wash DC				X									X							Example		X										Example
	Undeveloped land, Dubuque, Iowa					X															Example	X											Example
1	(S) CHAMER COMPANY INC: Anchorage, AK (Family Investment Co.)
2	(S) Investment in Rental House Wickenburg, AZ				X																	X
3	(S) Interest in Commercial Property Anchorage, AK			X																		X
4	(S) Interest in Bank Account- Wells Fargo Anchorage, AK			X																		X
5
6
7
8
9
10

EXEMPTION TEST (see instructions before marking box): If you omitted any asset because it meets the three-part test for exemption described in the instructions, please check box to the right. ☐

 This category applies only if the asset is/was held independently by the spouse or dependent child. If the asset is/was either held by the filer or jointly held, use the other categories of value, as appropriate.

MC_OTCHYDC
JUL-17-2007 21:51

Reporting Individual's Name: Theodore (Ted) F. Stevens

PART IV. TRANSACTIONS

Report any purchase, sale, or exchange by you, your spouse, or dependent child (See p.3 CONTENTS OF REPORTS Part B of Instructions) during the reporting period of any real property, stocks, bonds, commodity futures, and other securities when the amount of the transaction exceeded $1,000. Include transactions that resulted in a loss. Do not report a transaction involving property used solely as your personal residence, or a transaction between you, your spouse, or dependent child. Please clarify which two properties are involved in any reportable exchange.

	Identification of Assets	Transaction Type (x): Purchase	Sale	Exchange	Transaction Date (Mo., Day, Yr.)	Amount of Transaction (x): $1,001 - $15,000	$15,001 - $50,000	$50,001 - $100,000	$100,001 - $250,000	$250,001 - $500,000	$500,001 - $1,000,000	Over $1,000,000	$1,000,001 - $5,000,000	$5,000,001 - $25,000,000	$25,000,001 - $50,000,000	Over $50,000,000
S, Example: DC, or J	IBM Corp. (stock) NYSE	X			2/1/0X		X			E	X	A	M	P	L	E
	(DC) Microsoft (stock) NASDAQ/OTC		X		1/27/0X				X	E	X	A	M	P	L	E
1	Alaska's Great Eagle, LLC (Capital Call)				6/6/06	X
2	Alaska's Great Eagle, LLC (Capital Call)				11/28/06	X
3	Alaska's Great Eagle As Well, LLC (Capital Call)				5/18/06	X
4	IRA with Fidelity Investments as custodian: Fidelity International Small Cap Opp Fund	X			10/6/06				X
5	Stockmen's Bank (Now National Bank of Arizona) (checking account) Wickenburg, AZ (Gifted to Family)				5/15/06	X
6	TFStevens Bedbug Outfit - undivided 1/2 interest in Livestock Congress, AZ (Gifted to Family)				05/15/06	X
7
8
9
10
11
12

EXEMPTION TEST (see instructions before marking box): If you omitted any asset because it meets the three-part test for exemption described in the instructions, please check box to the right. ☐

 This category applies only if the asset is/was held independently by the spouse or dependent child. If the asset is/was either held by the filer or jointly held, use the other categories of value, as appropriate.

JUL-17-2007 21:52 M_LATCHYDC

PART IV. TRANSACTIONS

Report any purchase, sale, or exchange by you, your spouse, or dependent child (See p.3 CONTENTS OF REPORTS Part B of Instructions) during the reporting period of any real property, stocks, bonds, commodity futures, and other securities when the amount of the transaction exceeded $1,000. Include transactions that resulted in a loss. Do not report a transaction involving property used solely as your personal residence, or a transaction between you, your spouse, or dependent child. Please clarify which two properties are involved in any reportable exchange.

	Identification of Assets	Transaction Type (x): Purchase	Sale	Exchange	Transaction Date (Mo., Day, Yr.)	Amount of Transaction (x): $1,001 - $15,000	$15,001 - $50,000	$50,001 - $100,000	$100,001 - $250,000	$250,001 - $500,000	$500,001 - $1,000,000	Over $1,000,000	$1,000,001 - $5,000,000	$5,000,001 - $25,000,000	$25,000,001 - $50,000,000	Over $50,000,000
Example: S, DC, or J	IBM Corp. (stock) NYSE	X			2/1/0X		X			E	X	A	M	P	L	E
	(DC) Microsoft (stock) NASDAQ/OTC		X		1/27/0X				X	E	X	A	M	P	L	E
1	(S) CITIGROUP SMITHBARNEY- IRA Consisting of the following funds:
2	(S) CGCM- Large Cap Value Equity	X			1/30/06	X
3	(S) CGCM- Small Cap Value Equity		X		1/30/06	X
4	(S) CGCM- Emerging Markets Equity		X		1/30/06	X
5	(S) CGCM- International Equity	X			1/30/06	X
6	(S) CGCM- Large Cap Growth Equity	X			1/30/06	X
7	(S) CGCM- Small Cap Growth Equity		X		1/30/06	X
8	(S) CGCM- International Equity		X		8/22/06	X
9	(S) CGCM- Large Cap Growth Equity	X			8/22/06	X
10	(S) CGCM- Large Cap Value Equity	X			12/15/06	X
11
12

EXEMPTION TEST (see instructions before marking box): If you omitted any asset because it meets the three-part test for exemption described in the instructions, please check box to the right. ☐

 This category applies only if the asset is/was held independently by the spouse or dependent child. If the asset is/was either held by the filer or jointly held, use the other categories at value, as appropriate.

P.11/19

LATCHYDC

JUL-17-2007 21:52

Reporting Individual's Name: Theodore (Ted) F. Stevens

PART IV. TRANSACTIONS

Report any purchase, sale, or exchange by you, your spouse, or dependent child (See p.3 CONTENTS OF REPORTS Part B of Instructions) during the reporting period of any real property, stocks, bonds, commodity futures, and other securities when the amount of the transaction exceeded $1,000. Include transactions that resulted in a loss. Do not report a transaction involving property used solely as your personal residence, or a transaction between you, your spouse, or dependent child. Please clarify which two properties are involved in any reportable exchange.

	Identification of Assets	Transaction Type (x): Purchase	Sale	Exchange	Transaction Date (Mo., Day, Yr.)	Amount of Transaction (x): $1,001 - $15,000	$15,001 - $50,000	$50,001 - $100,000	$100,001 - $250,000	$250,001 - $500,000	$500,001 - $1,000,000	Over $1,000,000	$1,000,001 - $5,000,000	$5,000,001 - $25,000,000	$25,000,001 - $50,000,000	Over $50,000,000
S, Example: DC, or J	IBM Corp. (stock) NYSE	X			2/1/0X		X			E	X	A	M	P	L	E
	(DC) Microsoft (stock) NASDAQ/OTC		X		1/27/0X				X	E	X	A	M	P	L	E
1	(S) MAYER, BROWN, ROWE & MAW- 401(k) plan administered by BOK Financial Services. Consisting of the following funds:
2	(S) DWS Equity 500 Index Fund	X			1/1/06	X
3	(S) TCW Select Equities Fund 1	X			1/1/06	X
4	(S) STI Classic Sm Cap Growth Stock T Fund	X			1/1/06	X
5	(S) Fidelity Adv. Diversified Int'l Fund	X			1/1/06	X
6	(S) DWS Equity 500 Index Fund	X			4/1/06	X
7	(S) TCW Select Equities Fund 1	X			4/1/06	X
8	(S) STI Classic Sm Cap Growth Stock T Fund	X			4/1/06	X
9	(S) Fidelity Adv. Diversified Int'l Fund	X			4/1/06	X
10	(S) STI Classic Sm Cap Growth Stock T Fund exchanged for Jennison Small Company Z			X	10/1/06		X
11	(S) DWS Equity 500 Index Fund		X		11/22/06	X
12	(S) TCW Select Equities Fund 1		X		11/22/06	X

EXEMPTION TEST (see instructions before marking box): If you omitted any asset because it meets the three-part test for exemption described in the instructions, please check box to the right. ☐

 This category applies only if the asset is/was held independently by the spouse or dependent child. If the asset is/was either held by the filer or jointly held, use the other categories of value, as appropriate.

JUL-17-2007 21:53 RCLATCHYDC

Reporting Individual's Name: Theodore (Ted) F. Stevens

PART IV. TRANSACTIONS

Report any purchase, sale, or exchange by you, your spouse, or dependent child (See p.3 CONTENTS OF REPORTS Part B of Instructions) during the reporting period of any real property, stocks, bonds, commodity futures, and other securities when the amount of the transaction exceeded $1,000. Include transactions that resulted in a loss. Do not report a transaction involving property used solely as your personal residence, or a transaction between you, your spouse, or dependent child. Please clarify which two properties are involved in any reportable exchange.

	Identification of Assets	Transaction Type (x): Purchase	Sale	Exchange	Transaction Date (Mo., Day, Yr.)	Amount of Transaction (x): $1,001 - $15,000	$15,001 - $50,000	$50,001 - $100,000	$100,001 - $250,000	$250,001 - $500,000	$500,001 - $1,000,000	Over $1,000,000	$1,000,001 - $5,000,000	$5,000,001 - $25,000,000	$25,000,001 - $50,000,000	Over $50,000,000
S, Example: DC, or J	IBM Corp. (stock) NYSE	X			2/1/0X		X			E	X	A	M	P	L	E
	(DC) Microsoft (stock) NASDAQ/OTC		X		1/27/0X				X	E	X	A	M	P	L	E
1	(S) MAYER, BROWN, ROWE & MAW- 401(k) plan administered by BOK Financial Services. Consisting of the following funds:
2	(S) Jennison Small Company Z		X		11/22/06	X
3	(S) Fidelity Adv. Diversified Int'l Fund		X		11/22/06	X
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12

EXEMPTION TEST (see instructions before making box): If you omitted any asset because it meets the three-part test for exemption described in the instructions, please check box to the right. ☐

 This category applies only if the asset is/was held independently by the spouse or dependent child. If the asset is/was either held by the filer or jointly held, use the other categories of value, as appropriate.

JUL-17-2007 21:53 RECLATCHYDC F.12/13

Report the source, brief description and value of all gifts aggregating more than $305 in value received by you, your spouse, or your dependent child, (See p.3 CONTENTS OF REPORTS Part B of Instructions), from each source. Gifts with a value of $122 or less need not be aggregated towards the disclosure threshold. "Gift" is defined in the Instructions.

Exclude: (1) Bequests and other forms of inheritance; (2) Political campaign contributions; (3) Communications to your offices including subscriptions to newspapers and periodicals; (4) Consumable products provided by home state businesses to your offices, if those products are intended for consumption by persons other than yourself; (5) Gifts received prior to your Federal employment; (6) Gifts to your spouse or dependent child totally independent of his or her relationship to you; (7) Gifts from relatives; (8) Personal hospitality of any individual (see instructions); (9) meals and beverages unless consumed in connection with a gift of overnight lodging; and (10) Food, lodging, transportation, and entertainment provided by a foreign government within a foreign country, or by federal, state, D.C., or local governments.

	Name of Income Source	Address of Source	Dates and Brief Description	Gift Value
Example:	Mr. John Q. Smith	Anytown, VA Example	August 12, 200X, Silver platter - Ethics Committee waiver granted	$400
1	Kenai River Sportsfishing Assoc. 501(c)3	Kenai, Alaska	July 2006, Smith & Wesson; Engraved for public service	$1,400
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12

Note: The Senate Gift Rule prohibits most gifts in excess of $49.99.

JUL-17-2007 21:53 MCLATCHYDC

PART VIII. POSITIONS HELD OUTSIDE U.S. GOVERNMENT

Report any positions held by you during the applicable reporting period whether compensated or not. Positions include, but are not limited to those of an officer, director, trustee, general partner, proprietor, representative, employee, or consultant of any corporation, firm, partnership, or other business enterprise or any non-profit organization or educational institution. Both the year and month must be reported for the period of time that the position was held.

Exclude: Positions with federal government, religious, social, fraternal, or political entities, and those solely of an honorary nature.

	Name of Organization	Address (City, State)	Type of Organization	Position Held	From (Mo/Yr)	To (Mo/Yr)
Example:	National Assn. of Rock Collectors	NY,NY EXAMPLE	Non-profit education	President	6/90	Present
	Jones & Smith	Hometown, USA EXAMPLE	Law Firm	Partner	7/85	11/0X
1	Dwight D. Eisenhower Memorial Commission	Washington, DC	Presidential Appointment	Member of the Board	4/01	Present
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11 12
13

Compensation in excess of $200 from any position must be reported in Part II.

JUL-17-2007 21:54 LATCHYDC P.15/17

Reporting individual's name: Theodore (Ted) F. Stevens

PART V. GIFTS

Page Number

Amendment 2007

Report the source, brief description and value of all gifts aggregating more than $305 in value received by you, your spouse, or your dependent child, (See p.3 CONTENTS OF REPORTS Part B of Instructions), from each source. Gifts with a value of $122 or less need not be aggregated towards the disclosure threshold. "Gift" is defined in the Instructions.

Exclude: (1) Bequests and other forms of inheritance; (2) Political campaign contributions; (3) Communications to your offices including subscriptions to newspapers and periodicals; (4) Consumable products provided by home state businesses to your offices, if those products are intended for consumption by persons other than yourself; (5) Gifts received prior to your Federal employment; (6) Gifts to your spouse or dependent child totally independent of his or her relationship to you; (7) Gifts from relatives; (8) Personal hospitality of any individual (see instructions); (9) meals and beverages unless consumed in connection with a gift of overnight lodging; and (10) Food, lodging, transportation, and entertainment provided by a foreign government within a foreign country, or by federal, state, D.C., or local governments.

	Name of Income Source	Address of Source	Dates and Brief Description	Gift Value
Example:	Mr. John Q. Smith	Anytown, VA Example	August 12, 200X, Silver platter - Ethics Committee waiver granted	$400
1	Kenai River Sportsfishing Assoc. 501(c)3	Kenai, Alaska	July 2002, Marlin Guide; Engraved for Public Service	$650
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12

Note: The Senate Gift Rule prohibits most gifts in excess of $49.99.

Ted Stevens

RECEIVED SECRETARY OF THE SENATE 07 JUL 17 PM 2:26

JUL-17-2007 21:54 MCCLATCHYDC

Reporting Individual's Name: Theodore (Ted) F. Stevens

PART V. GIFTS

Page Number

Annual Report 2003

Report the source, brief description and value of all gifts aggregating more than $305 in value received by you, your spouse, or your dependent child. (See p.3 CONTENTS OF REPORTS Part B of Instructions), from each source. Gifts with a value of $122 or less need not be aggregated towards the disclosure threshold. "Gift" is defined in the Instructions.

Exclude: (1) Bequests and other forms of inheritance; (2) Political campaign contributions; (3) Communications to your offices including subscriptions to newspapers and periodicals; (4) Consumable products provided by home state businesses to your offices, if those products are intended for consumption by persons other than yourself; (5) Gifts received prior to your Federal employment; (6) Gifts to your spouse or dependent child totally independent of his or her relationship to you; (7) Gifts from relatives; (8) Personal hospitality of any individual (see instructions); (9) meals and beverages unless consumed in connection with a gift of overnight lodging; and (10) Food, lodging, transportation, and entertainment provided by a foreign government within a foreign country, or by federal, state, D.C., or local governments.

	Name of Income Source	Address of Source	Dates and Brief Description	Gift Value
Example:	Mr. John Q. Smith	Anytown, VA Example	August 12, 200X, Silver platter - Ethics Committee waiver granted	$400
1	Kenai River Sportsfishing Assoc. 501(c)3	Kenai, Alaska	July 2003, Winchester Model 70 Super Grade; Engraved for Public Service	$1,400
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12

Note: The Senate Gift Rule prohibits most gifts in excess of $49.99.

RECEIVED
SECRETARY OF THE SENATE
07 JUL 17 PM 2:26

JUL-17-2007 21:55 MCLATCHYDC

Reporting Individual's Name
THEODORE (TED) F. STEVENS

PART V. GIFTS

Page Number
2004 Amend

Report the source, brief description and value of all gifts aggregating more than $305 in value received by you, your spouse, or your dependent child, (See p.3 CONTENTS OF REPORTS Part B of Instructions), from each source. Gifts with a value of $122 or less need not be aggregated towards the disclosure threshold. "Gift" is defined in the Instructions.

Exclude: (1) Bequests and other forms of inheritance; (2) Political campaign contributions; (3) Communications to your offices including subscriptions to newspapers and periodicals; (4) Consumable products provided by home state businesses to your offices, if those products are intended for consumption by persons other than yourself; (5) Gifts received prior to your Federal employment; (6) Gifts to your spouse or dependent child totally independent of his or her relationship to you; (7) Gifts from relatives; (8) Personal hospitality of any individual (see instructions); (9) meals and beverages unless consumed in connection with a gift of overnight lodging; and (10) Food, lodging, transportation, and entertainment provided by a foreign government within a foreign country, or by federal, state, D.C., or local governments.

	Name of Income Source	Address of Source	Dates and Brief Description	Gift Value
Example:	Mr. John Q. Smith	Anytown, VA Example	August 12, 200X, Silver platter - Ethics Committee waiver granted	$400
1	Kenai River Sportsfishing Assoc. 501(c)3	Kenai, Alaska	July 2004, Benefit 470 Silver Eagle Slide by Slide; Engraved and accepted in recognition for public service	$1,800
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12

Note: The Senate Gift Rule prohibits most gifts in excess of $49.99.

Ted Stevens 7/17/07

07 JUL 17 PM 2:28

JUL-17-2007 21:55 CLATCHYDC

FBI - Stevens-1130

Reporting Individual's Name
THEODORE (TED) F STEVENS

PART V. GIFTS

Page Number
2006 Annual

Report the source, brief description and value of all gifts aggregating more than $305 in value received by you, your spouse, or your dependent child, (See p.3 CONTENTS OF REPORTS Part B of Instructions), from each source. Gifts with a value of $122 or less need not be aggregated towards the disclosure threshold. "Gift" is defined in the Instructions.

Exclude: (1) Bequests and other forms of inheritance; (2) Political campaign contributions; (3) Communications to your offices including subscriptions to newspapers and periodicals; (4) Consumable products provided by home state businesses to your offices, if those products are intended for consumption by persons other than yourself; (5) Gifts received prior to your Federal employment; (6) Gifts to your spouse or dependent child totally independent of his or her relationship to you; (7) Gifts from relatives; (8) Personal hospitality of any individual (see instructions); (9) meals and beverages unless consumed in connection with a gift of overnight lodging; and (10) Food, lodging, transportation, and entertainment provided by a foreign government within a foreign country, or by federal, state, D.C., or local governments.

	Name of Income Source	Address of Source	Dates and Brief Description	Gift Value
Example:	Mr. John Q. Smith	Anytown, VA Example	August 12, 200X, Silver platter - Ethics Committee waiver granted	$100
1	Kenai River Sportsfishing Assoc. 501(c)3	Kenai, Alaska	July 2005, Ruger Alaskan Revolver; Engraved and accepted in recognition for public service	$800
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12

Note: The Senate Gift Rule prohibits most gifts in excess of $49.99.

Ted Stevens 7/17/07

07 JUL 17 PM 2:29
SECRETARY OF THE SENATE

JUL-17-2007 21:56 CLATCHYDC

Roll Call on Young

Posted: July 18, 2007 - 10:59 am

Roll Call has a story today on Don Young campaign contributions, reporting that:

(Young) has acknowledged taking more than $5,500 in illegal campaign contributions from a seafood trade association since 2001, but has informed federal officials he will only pay back a portion of those funds because some of the violations fall outside the statute of limitations for campaign finance violations.

At issue appears to be a bunch of crab or seafood that the Pacific Seafood Processors Association has been donating to Young fund-raisers in D.C. over the past few years, Roll Call reports.

The problem is, trade associations aren't allowed to make political donations to Congressmen, according to the paper.

add new comment

Lisa Murkowski

Kyle, when are we going to get a thread on her deal with Penney.
The deal is getting national attention.

new theodosius30 | July 20, 2007 - 3:59am

reply »

Ntl Press

The only national ink this story has gotten has been on the TPM website.

Actually, it's getting kind of echo-ee in here.

TPM reports it, then the ADN reports it, then TPM reports that the ADN reported it.

To be fair, KTUU has picked up as did the Juneau Empire.

Beyond that, no other media outlets have reported this story. (that show up on google.news anyways...)

This is a non-story, really. When it's all said and done there's nothing there, unless the assessor was playing games with those numbers.

The dirt path to Murky's door will involve Cornell and VECO, but it will go through the Campaign Treasurer of her 04 Senate run.
That's the story.

Kyle -

Here's a nuggie for ya, Benino Filal is in up to his

Alaska Politics

State, local and beyond

Alaska has a new governor, a new legislature and a powerful congressional delegation. Come here for the latest news and tidbits from the transition, from Juneau and elsewhere by Daily News political reporters. We want to hear from you, too. So sound off and interact with other readers and the reporters in the "comments" section.

Kyle Hopkins covered the 2006 campaign for governor and is covering the Palin administration's transition. Before joining the Daily News in 2005, he was a writer for the Anchorage Press and the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner. E-mail him at khopkins@adn.com.

The Trail 2006 campaign blog

ARCHIVE

Dittman poll: Businesses, milk, global warming - 7/20/2007 3:21 pm

Murkowski in the spotlight - 7/20/2007 10:46 am

Round-up - 7/19/2007 10:06 am

What to do about homeless - 7/18/2007 3:16 pm

Roll Call on Young - 7/18/2007 10:59 am

Tesche - 7/18/2007 10:31 am

Special session and capital creep - 7/17/2007 9:14 pm

Poop update - 7/17/2007 7:54 pm

(UPDATED) AP on Stevens - 7/17/2007 6:27 pm

Wrong number - 7/17/2007 3:20 pm

Wes Keller to replace Kohring - 7/17/2007 12:54 pm

Ads by Google

Alaska MLS Listing $299
Why Pay 6% ? Direct Access to Alaska MLS.
www.congressrealty.com

Moving to Anchorage?
Browse current listings of homes in the Anchorage area.
www.greatalaska.net/hou

India BnB & Yoga Retreat
Affordable Anchorage Lodging. Fresh Indian & American breakfast
www.indiainalaska.com

Alaska Hard Money Loans
Commercial Mortgage Loans Compared Hard Money Lenders Reviewed - AK
www.BusinessInfotoday.c

FBI - Stevens-1132

194-AN-13620-M;498

earballs in the Abramoff muck and is now a cooperating witness for the Feds.

BTW, Don Young is a very good friend of Mr. Filal and was instrumental in carrying out Delay's policies (which were Abramoff's policies) in the CNMI.

new twentythreeskidoo | July 20, 2007 - 5:38am

reply »

Small spenders - 7/16/2007 8:32 pm
Mental illness and guns (UPDATED) - 7/16/2007 4:43 pm
Candidate Harris - 7/16/2007 10:39 am
Lots of lawyering - 7/16/2007 10:01 am
Replacing Kohring - 7/14/2007 2:28 pm
Should dogs be banned from ballfields? - 7/13/2007 12:22 pm
No free wi-fi? - 7/13/2007 12:17 pm
Lobbying - 7/13/2007 12:16 pm
'Discretion and tact are essential' - 7/12/2007 4:38 pm
full archive »

Murky indeed

What caused the governor to change his strongly stated opposition to privatized prisons? He hasn't explained his shift yet. But in May 2003, a prominent Anchorage architect named Mark Pfeffer met with his aides to promote the Veco-Cornell prison project. Pfeffer had recently joined the prison consortium, and he had also signed on as treasurer for Lisa Murkowski's reelection campaign. Around that time, her father began to back away from his pledge to oppose private prisons, issuing a vague announcement that his administration would take a "fresh look" at the Veco-Cornell prison plan.

new BravoSierra | July 20, 2007 - 6:19am

reply »

Murkiness

Here is the link to the story that Salon.com ran in 2004.

new twentythreeskidoo | July 20, 2007 - 6:33am

reply »

The Muckraker Express

Here is an interesting comment posted on the Muckraker Express website regarding Don Young and the appropriation for Native Alaska education.

"So if education monies were the target of being struck specifically from African American education efforts for Black History Month (February) by "conservative" Republicans, how long would it take for Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton and other "progressives" to howl at the moon over such actions?

What labels would be attached to the good representatives from New Jersey?

It would be a national racist story of epic proportions, but since it is going for Native Alaskan and Native Hawaiian education efforts, it seems to be OK to racially profile them as a group for funding cuts.

Spare me on how progressive your thinking is on this subject."

new nerka86 | July 19, 2007 - 12:54pm

reply »

The Dom

Is just cranky because he has to give some of his marbles to his lawyers.

It hasn't dawned on him yet that his backroom deals of the past are becoming ever more of a liability.

FBI - Stevens-1133

This is a non-story save for his childish outburst, which seem to be happening more frequently of late.

My question is, exactly what programs does this money help fund ?

Does anybody know the answer to that ?

new twentythreeskidoo | July 19, 2007 - 1:18pm

reply »

Alaska Native Education Equity

PROGRAM DESCRIPTION

The overall purpose is to meet the unique education needs of Alaska Natives and to support supplemental education programs to benefit Alaska Natives.

TYPES OF PROJECTS

Allowable activities include, but are not limited to, the development of curricula and education programs that address the education needs of Alaska Native students, and the development and operation of student enrichment programs in science and mathematics. Eligible activities also include professional development for educators, activities carried out through Even Start (# 84.213) programs and Head Start programs, family literacy services, and dropout prevention programs.

US Department of Education

new Emperor | July 19, 2007 - 2:00pm

reply »

thanks emperor

KTUU reported tonight that Cook Inlet Tribal Council is one recipient of some of this money.

new twentythreeskidoo | July 19, 2007 - 6:46pm

reply »

Everyone?

So now the ENTIRE Alaskan delegation to DC is under investigation?!?

new quixoticneophyte | July 19, 2007 - 11:28am

reply »

Corruption in Alaska Wouldn't Be Complete Without Some

Teamster Muscle

> In addition, Young's current district director in Alaska recently lobbied for an energy conglomerate whose chief executive pleaded guilty in May to bribing several state lawmakers. Young and Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), who has hired his own team of lawyers to deal with that probe, were the top recipients of donations from the executive and that company.

new twentythreeskidoo | July 18, 2007 - 9:41pm

reply »

From TPMmuckraker.com - by Mike D.

Don Young and my late father were friends in the Army around 1956-57. My family lived in Los Angeles, and when Young passed thru town once in the mid-70s, when I was about 14 or 15, my dad and I met him at the airport before his flight home. He was carrying a briefcase with a bumpersticker on it that said, "Don Young / Congressman for all Alaska." I also remember that my dad told me that Young's nickname in the Army was "Rabbit," due to his buck teeth.

There's one other thing from that meeting that I remember, although I could certainly understand if people are skeptical of my recollection, which I suppose would be impossible to verify. But I swear I remember Young and my dad discussed the time when Young was in the Army and had gotten drunk and crashed an Army jeep, leaving Young's passenger paralyzed. They wondered what had happened to the passenger, and neither of them knew.

That's my story, believe it or not. Young wouldn't be the first Republican criminal to escape justice, and his actions wouldn't seem out of character for someone who has apparently threatened to eat New Jersey schoolchildren.

FBI - Stevens-1134

Posted by: Mike D.
Date: July 19, 2007 1:39 AM
==========
This reminds Alaskans of Ben Stevens' DUI that got him 4 yrs of probation, then the judge slapped another 2 on him... so Ben could not run for office until that was done - at age 39. Tony Knowles does Ted a favor, appoints spoiled brat-bully Ben to state Senate, and thus began the cycle of special privilege arrogant corruption. And in Adak case later, Solberg claims Ben and Ted stayed up till 4 am drinking like real men, then got right back up at 8 am - as if they were tough. Was he really saying Ben and Ted DID talk about the fish deals? FBI ought to be all over that hot evidence like salsa on chips.

This also reminds us of the joke, Why do the states each have two Senators? So one can be the designated driver! That is if the Anchorage PD doesn't catch her in the back seat of a car making it a snowmobile and get let off because daddy was a drinking Senator too.

That's right, we have no respect for you political pond scum any longer.

new staufen | July 18, 2007 - 8:46pm

reply »

Mike D

Is Mike D Representative Doogan from Anchorage? Wow, what a story.

new theodosius30 | July 20, 2007 - 5:09am

reply »

Why the ADN frustrates me.

I posted this exact information on this blog 2 days ago, under your "Lots of Lawyering" post and asked why the ADN was not reporting on it. So now, 2 days later and after another media outlet has reported the story, the ADN posts the information on its blog, and doesn't bother to write a story about it.

What is wrong with this newspaper??? Alaska's only Congressman admits to taking illegal contributions from the seafood industry over a period of years, and is only willing to pay back money for crimes occuring within the statute of limitations -- folks this is NEWS.

Seems like this warrants a question or two by the ADN, a newspaper that claims to serve all of Alaska. For example, how much crab does Young claim is $700-800 worth (the amount he says he got from the seafood processors)? Since he admits the contributions were illegal, why isn't Young willing to pay all of them back? Isn't one's Congressman supposed to be a role model for Alaskans? It's bad enough that Young goes around talking about biting other Representatives like a mink, without him acting like a criminal defendant who is only willing to make restitution to some, but not all, of his victims.

The ADN just is NOT doing its job. It's very disappointing.

new alambernakis | July 18, 2007 - 8:46pm

reply »

I have to agree with alambernakis

Just this morning when I saw the headline on the ADN about Lisa's property, I thought how "old" this news was. People have been talking about that for 3 days at least - and ADN just now does a story.

On another note about the video of Young threatening New Jersey that is floating around on the interet - I really think Young and Stevens are responsible for people hating Alaskans and our great state. All you have to do is read the comments being posted on TPMMuckracker and other blogs.

The balance of costs and benefits of keeping Young and Stevens in office is dipping into the 'cost' side of things now.

new simplesimon23 | July 19, 2007 - 4:29am

reply »

Deja Vu! it's true

well, what do you expect from the same newspaper that has yet to run a front page apology to Ray Metcalfe? There are some very good reporters at ADN, but something remains truly psychotic at the top. That's why it takes national news venues to convince some of the writers to beg their editor/publisher to run something... and Kyle probably has to run it under the blog, because to run it as real NEWS would just tear the heart valves out of the publishers psychoses.

FBI - Stevens-1135

It was crab and salmon, and worth a helluva lot more than disclosed... and we all know it. And Don Young pays $262k for attorneys and sits in House for how long? but still doesn't know the statute of limitations is 5 not 3 years?! Disappointing indeed.

Groundswell Fisheries Movement

new staufen | July 18, 2007 - 8:55pm

reply »

Get over it Ray

Just because Ray Metcalfe said he thought Ben Stevens did something wrong (and is likely correct about it) doesn't mean he should be anywhere in politics. He's a creepy man who drives "2Red4U" around town- his mac daddy caddy. Things in HIS past prove he's not the moral compass Alaskans should follow. ps- Theresa Obermeyer also thinks the Stevens are corrupt, but I'm pretty sure no one wants her in office anywhere.

new acom | July 18, 2007 - 9:23pm

reply »

Your knowledge of Alaska history is lacking

Ray Metcalfe signed his name to a complaint, and laid down his own money, helping to stop Tony Know-less (another 'prostitute' to the oilies) from permitting the ARCO monopoly on the N. slope. The FTC seems to have seen Ray's perspective in that case as correct...

With little or no financial reserves, he signed his name as a party to a suit that reversed legislation supported by some of the crooks now on trial that would've made it much more difficult for the average Alaskan to confront apparent constitutional violations by our State 'government.'

Ray Metcalfe travelled on his own dime over the last half-dozen years, at a time that he had few dimes to spare, to educate Alaskans about how badly they've been ripped off for oil revenues, ever since Ramona 'Tammy Fae' Barnes' and Ed Stankworth's oil give-aways, under their re-birthed ELF.

And he has provided useful information about soon-to-be-felons in legislative offices -WAY- beyond ol' tantruming Benny.

I could go on, but I won't. His list of -serious- efforts in very real public service, at his own expense, goes -WAY- beyond Benny and Ted Stevens' poorly-closeted skeletons.

So what have you done to turn Alaska toward pursuing a path of honest government lately?? Did you give 'til it hurt, or take 'til you couldn't consume any more??

I'll second the motion: "DRAFT RAY METCALFE TO THE U.S. SENATE!!" (And lock away the oil companies' legislative prostitutes in an earthen cell, with all of their favorite lobbyists.)

BTW, when do former AG Marquez's and Frank Murkowski's conspiracy and obstruction indictments come out, if at all? (It seems that someone didn't want APOC investigating ol' Benny, back when he was carrying the water in the Senate for Franky's PPT. Purely a coincidence, I'm sure...

new F_Firkle | July 19, 2007 - 12:42am

reply »

You seem the type...

how typical - locker room players think anyone with a conscience and stand-alone ethical capacity is a bit creepy. Translation - you don't find them manipulatable to your liking, you can't get them to cut you or your company a special deal, so you wonder what use such honest people are.

FBI - Stevens-1136

Update - that caddy is long gone.
Challenge - name the HIS past items you are referring to; and while you're at it, join the open society and expose your own name in this public debate. It's only fair, else folks will feel your prejudice or bias is all that's showing.

Let's help you get started on the list - he was in the Legislature and did not like the Religious Right takeover ploy of Jerry Falwell; he was chair of the ad hoc committee on the PFD - and many Alaskans appreciate the service of that committee every year; he was a roustabout on various rigs, so got along fine with working men; and that's right, he's one helluva dancer and the ladies get along just fine; oh we almost forgot, he can walk down the street and have many people he never met before stop him, shake his hand, and thank him for the service he has done for all Alaskans by exposing the corruption and ensuring the FBI was on it - after all, you might notice they are following the blueprint of his APOC filings.

We know you mean well for Alaska, but if not Ray, then who else at this time should have a shot at cleaning up this mess and getting back the 100 billion bucks that was ripped off? Because we can guarantee you that others will try to steal the limelight, have the "praise and honors for the non-participants" trophy in their name, but all of those legislators and candidates stood by for many years as Ray shared all the documents with them, and not one of them lifted a finger to get it right, just as every state agency failed to do its job too. I think this one major fact alone qualifies Ray above all other candidates. No, he's not perfect, and will be the first to tell you that, but he has a good heart and his political ethics are rock solid. He's earned the chance.

DRAFT RAY METCALFE FOR THE U.S. SENATE!

Brgds, Stephen T.

new staufen | July 18, 2007 - 9:41pm

reply »

Arrogance

Believing he is some how entitled is pure arrogance.

new Ter_H | July 18, 2007 - 6:34pm

reply »

Not good

it's a giant FU to the citizens of Alaska and the system that's in place to prevent these ethical violations...and in some cases criminal actions.

I also hope Lisa Murkowski owns up to the purchase price of that land deal from pal Penney. I view that as an even greater lapse of ethics.

new Stags_Leap | July 18, 2007 - 3:56pm

reply »

This won't hurt him in Alaska.....

particularly bush alaska where the school money is being taken from.

As for lisa, haven't you heard, she bought it for the appraised value of $176,000, fair and square?

You might want to find another windmill to joust at.

new truthseeker | July 18, 2007 - 8:35pm

reply »

do your home work

She paid the accessed value NOT the appraised value which is 100,000 more! She filled out a questionair at the borough office it is public record!

new grateful | July 18, 2007 - 9:28pm

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1137

The Dom At His Finest

This is classic, check out the YouTube video Here

The stress is getting to him, he needs to relax a little bit.

> "And if we continue this, what I call biting one another, very much like the mink in my state, that kill their own, there's always another day, and those that bite will be killed too, and I'm very good at that."
>
> "Those that bite me will be bitten back." - Don Young

new twentythreeskidoo | July 18, 2007 - 3:52pm

reply »

>>"Those that bite me will be bitten back." - Don Young<<<

Don, Frank, and Ted apparently all attended the same charm school.

Never mind that one of Don's former aids has already plead out re. Abramoff issues (behavior that was completely unbeknownst to Don, I'm sure....)

Alaska has accepted these corporatist prostitutes and clowns as 'representation' simply because they bring the biscuits and gravy back home when slicing up the federal tax slops; the greed of the State as a whole has caused many to turn a blind eye to the behaviors of these three bafoons for decades, in exchange for personal gain and large contracts. Not so different from some of those we're now prosecuting, in that regard...

What price, integrity??

Ain't rugged individualism and independence grand??

They are all the products of a hungry quasi-welfare state that consumes federal tax money in a similar wasteful fashion as some who abuse the food stamp program.

Humility, integrity, and reverence are not in their characters, but dollar signs eclipse their vision.

new F_Firkle | July 18, 2007 - 6:45pm

reply »

Remember Ben Franklin?

He who proposed the U.S. flag feature a rattlesnake with the legend:

"Don't Tread On Me"

He lost that battle, setting the stage for so much abuse of our good nature over a couple of centuries.

I hadn't thought of Don Young as a latter-day Franklin until just now, so THANK YOU for the inspiration!

new rfn | July 19, 2007 - 9:00am

reply »

Maybe Farmed Salmon would have been more appropriate

Alaskan seafood and crab was served. Maybe everyone would feel more comforable if fresh farmed salmon, which is less expensive, would have been served instead.

new nerka86 | July 18, 2007 - 12:37pm

reply »

What SHOULD be done

has little relevance in today's climate where the rulers of the land have a sense of entitlement. So get over it. If an action or inaction is probably not illegal, or at least doesn't involve jail time, it is fair game.

That is why we need helmet safety laws, right? And poop laws? And seat belt laws? And financial disclosure laws? And...and..and....

new Dusty | July 18, 2007 - 12:12pm

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1138

I am appalled

Not because of the illegal contributions which in the context of Young's warchest were de minimis. But because of the absolute "chutzpa" which he demonstates by saying that he will not return the contributions that fall outside of the statute of limitations. This man obviously has no sense of right and wrong. Reminds me of the old adage "Power corrupts and absolute power corrupts absolutely.""

new theodosius30 | July 18, 2007 - 10:53am

reply »

going down

stevens times 2, murkowski times 2, young, and more than a few Alaska legislators are all going to be investigated and made to stand trials for their wrongs and it is way over due,

new grateful | July 18, 2007 - 9:35pm

reply »

Young's Behavior

... in regard to repaying money is simply that of a narcicistic opportunist behaving as narcicistic opportunists are prone to behave.

For him it matters not that there is an appearance of 'improper influence in government,' but rather, 'what can you actually hurt me for...'

Years ago we called that 'pig-headedness.'

It's not been about a sense of conscientious, personal-morality-based 'right or wrong' in decades, for most of Congress, or even Juneau, for that matter.

It's been about 1.) Power, 2.) Partisan Power, 3.) Providing 'spin' and propaganda to the non-researching public, so as to maintain the first two attributes every other November, and 4.) The Historic Foibles of Human Kind when empowered with the authority to make decisions over others.. Cancerous, it is...

Socially Conscious Anarchy is highly under-rated in my opinion; it tends to more effectively eradicate this whole 'alpha wolf phenomenon' that we now see in the current established Oligarchy, and within -both- major political parties in this Country.. to greater and lesser degrees.

But by all means, protect me from myself. After all, where would I be without Big Government???

Where are the Bolsheviks when ya' need a hand, eh??

new F_Firkle | July 18, 2007 - 12:48pm

reply »

© Copyright 2007, The Anchorage Daily News, a subsidiary of The McClatchy Company
Contact Us | Newsroom Contacts | Communication Forms | Subscriptions | Advertising | Terms of Use
Daily News Jobs | RSS Feeds | ADN Store | Newspapers in Education | Privacy Agreement

A member of the
Real Cities Network

FBI - Stevens-1139

Team Coverage

Criminal investigation into three Alaskan lawmakers

By Andrea Gusty and Matthew Simon, CBS 11 News Reporters
KTVA

Article Last Updated:07/25/2007 08:29:36 PM AKDT

Senior House Republican Don Young has come under criminal investigation. It is a Wall Street Journal story, published Wednesday, that states Representative Young is being investigated for his alleged ties to VECO Corporation and the Legislative corruption scandal.

Three former Alaskan lawmakers are charged with bribery, extortion and money laundering in connection with the case. Others are expected to be named in the scandal. The journal says investigators are trying to determine whether Young or U.S. Senator Ted Stevens took bribes, illegal gratuities or unreported gifts from VECO.

In a statement issued Wednesday, Senator Stevens said:

I know Alaskans are interested in my views on the investigation. While I understand this interest and would like to discuss these issues in great detail, the interests of justice and our state are best served if I make my comments after federal officials complete their work.

Congressman Young's office has no comment on the investigation.

With Congressman Young's name added to the list of lawmakers being investigated, both of Alaska's ranking members of the Washington delegation are in the fed's sights.

So where does that leave Alaska?

Young and Stevens have more than 70 years combined service on Capitol Hill, but the ethics investigations could mean the end of the Young-Stevens era.

And that could mean big changes for Alaska.

The federal ethics investigation has spread from Juneau to Capital Hill with all three of Alaska's Republican Washington representatives under some sort of federal ethics investigation:
Young for campaign contributions, Stevens for his ties to VECO and Lisa Murkowski for land deals.

"Federal investigations do two things. One, they find problems, but they can also find that there are no problems. So to jump to conclusions at this time as to what the findings will be, I can only conjecture with you, which is a waste of time," said Randy Ruedrich of the Republican Party of Alaska.

The state's Democrats say that lawmakers need to be straight with Alaskans about the investigations.

"In Don Young case, he's our only guy there in Washington DC, and he needs to come forward and tell us that he can do his job, even while under a criminal investigation. And he needs to tell us why," said Jake Metcalfe of the Alaska Democratic Party.

Now many worry the investigations will tarnish Alaska's reputation and that it could leave the door wide open for the Democrats to take over.

"To be fair, Don Young and Ted Stevens have been doing a fine job for most of their public carrier, but we are in a situation now where we have to ask if they are going to be able to perform to the high levels of Alaska's needs in the 21st century? And I think the public is going to look at that question and say, 'No,'" said possible candidate, Ethan Berkowitz.

No matter who will represent Alaska in the future, they may have a tough time repairing the state's national image.

"Right now, the reputation of the state is being stained by the investigations that are going on. And it's going to take a long time to repair it," said Metcalfe.

194-AN-13620-M;499

Both Congressman Young's and Senator Stevens's seats are up next year. At least two influential Alaskan Democrats are being groomed by the national party to run against them. Young and Stevens have more than 70 years combined service on Capitol Hill.

Federal law enforcement sources say Young is under scrutiny for campaign finance practices relating directly to former VECO CEO Bill Allen.

Every August for the last 10 years, Allen held fundraisers for Young called "The Pig Roast." Public records show Young received 157,000 dollars from VECO employees and its political action committee between 1996, and 2006.

Earlier this year, Young filed a Federal Election Commission amendment. In essence, Young changed his campaign financial disclosure records to reflect he'd actually received 38,000 fundraising dollars from Allen in 2006.

That is why federal officials confirm they are now looking into Young.

To contact Andrea or Matthew, call 907-273-3186.

Close Window | Send To Printer

FBI - Stevens-1141

<<Back

Alaska reacts to Young article

by Megan Baldino
Wednesday, July 25, 2007

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- Rep. Don Young is once again under fire as the Wall Street Journal reports he is now part of a federal investigation in the Justice Department's influence peddling probe.

The New York paper first reported the story late Tuesday night and fallout began quickly in Alaska.

Citing several unnamed sources, the Journal reported that Alaska's sole representative is now under criminal investigation by the feds.

The Journal reports that Young's and Sen. Ted Stevens' ties to VECO Corp. are the target of the probe, which is focusing specifically on whether they took bribes and unreported gifts from the company.

Late Wednesday, Young's congressional and campaign offices had no comment.

Former U.S. Attorney for Alaska Wev Shea said the news is no surprise.

"Alaska has been so isolated and the arrogance of Don Young's statements on the House floor -- imagine what he's like behind the scenes," Shea said.

Shea is referring to last week's statements by Young accusing a fellow Republican of trying to take education money from Alaska.

"Apparently the students in New Jersey are trying to take money from Alaskan students," Young said on the floor.

Leslie Paige with Citizens Against Government Waste said the quote was telling.

"Wow. That is a little window into the psyche of several members of Congress, but particularly the members from Alaska, who have turned the U.S. Treasury into, like, a personal piggy bank. They think of it as 'their money' and its not," Paige said. "It's the taxpayer's money."

The group said Alaska has been one of the nation's top pork barrel spenders for years, and it may now be catching up to Young and Stevens.

FBI - Stevens-1142

"The problem with pork is it's kind of like a favor factory. You get contributions, potentially from different people ... sometimes you funnel contracts back and it tends to happen ... In a lot of cases, we've seen it happen, there is potential for abuse," Paige said.

Paige said even with the investigation ongoing, it's up to Alaska taxpayers to decide whether the probe will hurt either man.

Shea said it might, but what is potentially career damaging for Young and Stevens, he said could be good for Alaska.

194-AN-13620-M;500

"Everybody says it's bad," Shea said. "I think it's great for Alaska. I think for too long there's been an arrogance of the 'good old boy's' power."

The news follows Young's reporting of a refund of $38,000 in fundraising costs to former VECO executive Bill Allen. Those costs were apparently associated with Young's annual "pig roast" fund-raising event. Young has repeatedly received the "pork king" award by government watchdog groups.

The Wall Street Journal reports that Allen and VECO have contributed more than $150,000 to Young's campaigns in the last decade through the pig roast.

Late this spring, Allen admitted to, and was convicted of, bribing state lawmakers. However, Young was not among those publicly identified in the criminal case.

Contact Megan Baldino at mbaldino@ktuu.com

WorldNow

All content © Copyright 2000 - 2007 WorldNow and KTUU. All Rights Reserved.
For more information on this site, please read our Privacy Policy and Terms of Service.

FBI - Stevens-1143

SEATTLE POST-INTELLIGENCER
http://seattlepi.nwsource.com/connelly/325567_joel30.html

Political scandals thick as trees in Alaska

Last updated July 29, 2007 11:25 p.m. PT

By JOEL CONNELLY
P-I COLUMNIST

Threats and bluster are standard operating procedures for Alaska's seniority-laden Washington, D.C., delegation, and Rep. Don Young, R-Alaska, was in full cry earlier this month.

"There is always another day when those who bite will be killed, too, and I am very good at that," Young said. No kiddin'. He once waved an 18-inch-long oosik, the penis bone of a walrus, at the first woman to direct the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service.

Young, the political architect of Alaska's "bridges to nowhere," was mad at a bid by Republican New Jersey Rep. Scott Garrett to cut one of his pet programs.

Not only did he go after Garrett, but Alaska's congressman went on to note that his opponent comes "from a state that doesn't have the greatest reputation in the world."

A few days later, The Wall Street Journal revealed that Young is under FBI investigation for his ties to VECO, the oil-field-services supplier whose president has pleaded guilty to paying off Alaska state legislators.

"Is two-thirds of the New Jersey congressional delegation currently being investigated by the FBI? Did New Jersey pols and lobbyists organize a Corrupt Bastards Club in the state capital? And get hats made?" the Alaska Ear column of the Anchorage Daily News asked.

Alaska has lately moved out in front of the Garden State when it comes to politicians for sale, for rent and ready to exchange favors.

The past year has seen a curtain pulled back on the crony capitalist insiders' network that has long run the 49th State, treating the "Great Land" as a grand treasure trove.

As usual, there's a key insider: In the 1970s, it was Jess Carr, the Teamsters Union leader whose local ran Alaska Pipeline construction with fists and featherbedding.

The go-to guy of recent times was VECO boss Bill Allen. VECO was the prime contractor in cleaning up Prince William Sound after the Exxon Valdez spill. VECO took in about $800 million of $2.5 billion spent by Exxon.

Allen got around, and got around the law.

By bugging VECO's suite at Juneau's Baranof Hotel, the FBI recorded vote-buying that resulted in Allen and deputy Rick Smith pleading guilty to extortion and bribery, plus corruption charges against one legislator and two former colleagues.

194A-AN-13620-M;501

Between 2002 and 2006, VECO paid $243,000 in consulting fees to the firm of state Senate President Ben Stevens, son of Alaska's U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens. What work the Stevens dauphin actually did is unclear. He has not -- yet -- been indicted.

Allen threw an annual fundraiser called "The Pig Roast" for Young each August. Young chaired the House Transportation Committee until Democrats won control of Congress.

Young received $157,000 from VECO employees and its political committee over the past decade. He amended campaign-finance filings this year to report $38,000 in payments to Allen for "fundraising costs."

And there is 83-year-old Ted Stevens, Alaska's senator for life. The FBI is investigating a 2000 project that more than doubled the size of his home in Girdwood, a ski town near Anchorage.

One contractor who worked on the house said he was told to send bills to VECO. He has said that someone in Allen's office examined the billing, then sent them to Stevens.

The Los Angeles Times did a 2004 study of "Uncle Ted's" personal finances. Stevens has become a millionaire by investing in partnerships with influential contractors. The same partners profited handsomely from spending items that Stevens put into the federal budget.

The Anchorage Daily News has regularly disclosed lucrative lobbying by former aides to Young and Stevens. An ex-Young staffer owns land near the terminus of a controversial proposed bridge. The family of former Gov. Frank Murkowski owns land on Gravina Island, destination of a planned bridge from Ketchikan.

Stevens, too, is given to threats. He vowed revenge on Sen. Maria Cantwell, D-Wash., after she blocked his backdoor bid to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil and gas drilling.

In a final "predators' ball" of Alaska's elite, Stevens, Young and Allen headlined a fundraiser for Cantwell's GOP challenger Mike McGavick. McGavick ended up refunding $14,700 from VECO executives when news of the FBI inquiry became public.

A new north wind is blowing.

It blew away Murkowski in last year's Republican primary. The winner -- now governor -- was Sarah Palin, who blew the whistle on ethical misconduct while chairing the Alaska Oil and Gas Conservation Commission.

Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich is being recruited by Democrats to run against Young. Young is also under scrutiny for favors done for Florida businessmen who were big campaign donors.

The state's junior Sen. Lisa Murkowski -- appointed by her father when he was governor -- dodged a bullet last week. Murkowski and her husband announced they were selling back a choice Kenai River lot to a friend and real estate developer.

The resale came after a D.C. watchdog group filed a complaint against Sen. Murkowski, charging she paid far below market value and that the land deal amounted to an illegal gift.

"While Verne and I intended to make this our family home, and we paid a fair price for this land, no property is worth compromising the trust of the Alaska people," she said.

It's enough to bring tears to your eyes -- if you happen to be a crocodile.

P-I columnist Joel Connelly can be reached at 206-448-8160 or joelconnelly@seattlepi.com. Follow his political blog at blog.seattlepi.com/seattlepolitics.

© 1998-2007 Seattle Post-Intelligencer

FBI - Stevens-1146

« previous | MUCK HOME | next »

Rep. Don Young (R-AK)
(House Website)

Pig Roast Protesters Move On To Salmon Bake

By Laura McGann - August 13, 2007, 11:46 AM

Despite a boisterous crowd oinking and yelling outside his annual pig roast fundraiser last week, Rep. Don Young (R-AK) is holding a public event this afternoon in Anchorage. The same anti-Young crowd is expected to attend.

The state's only congressman will serve up baked salmon to anyone interested in stopping by, a move that made one local political strategist cringe, according to an AP story.

The cringing is pretty reasonable, seeing that John Farleigh, the Alaska native who organized the last Young protest, is rounding up the troops for another assembly at the salmon bake. Farleigh left me a message last night saying he has already spoken with local media and has high hopes that the added pre-protest publicity will work in his favor.

If you're planning to snap photos at the event this afternoon, please send some our way!

Permalink | TOPICS: Don Young

ADVERTISEMENT:

FBI - Stevens-1147

194A-AN-13620-M;
502

TPM MUCKRAKER.COM
They've got muck. We've got rakes.

Rep. Don Young (R-AK)
(House Website)

Editorial: Youngs Earmark Stinks

By Laura McGann - August 14, 2007, 3:34 PM

Rep. Don Young's (R-AK) ethically and legally questionable $10 million Coconut Road earmark doesn't smell right to the editorial board at the Naples Daily News, the paper that originally broke the story.

From the earmark's mysterious appearance in the 2005 transportation bill for the narrowly tailored project, to the revelation that the allocation came from a far-flung congressman, the editorial board didn't like what it saw.

> Now comes the worst smell test failure. A study compiled by a retired veteran of congressional funding practices shows the earmark was changed to specify Coconut Road between the time an overall transportation bill was passed by Congress and later signed by President Bush. Editing solely for style rather than substance is supposed to take place at that stage.

As we reported last week, this is an extremely unusual case.

Permalink | TOPICS: Don Young

ADVERTISEMENT:

FBI - Stevens-1148

MKA-AN-13620-M;503

---

return to the homepage | post a comment

Comments:

First, please put an apostrophe in "Youngs."

Looking at the handy chart Josh posted on Talking Points Memo, it's clear that Alaska's senators and congressman have been very effective in taking care of their state.

I'd like to think that there would be general outrage in Alaska over the behavior and dealings revealed about these representatives, but the cynic in me sees voters in the "new state" thinking that if Stevens, Murkowski, and Young are taking a little off the top for themselves, that's just the cost of getting so much federal money.

We OUTSIDE the state are outraged. But what about the voters up THERE? Even if only a third of the money they've brought into Alaska goes to programs that help Alaskan residents instead of into the pockets of business cronies, they're still getting almost $100 a person more than the next continental state.

Unless the Congress itself does something about these three wheeler-dealers, I don't see them getting voted out of office anytime soon.

Posted by: Roberta
Date: August 14, 2007 4:08 PM

FBI - Stevens-1149

The Officers of Veco are no longer happy . . .

Posted by: Richard L. Adlof
Date: August 14, 2007 9:58 PM

The people in Alaska are not happy either. We are tired of the arrogance, the lies, and the sense of entitlement that these skunks we elected have. Some of us have been tired of it for a long time.

I hope that we DO vote the thieves out. I also hope we don't replace them with more thieves. Unfortunately, with some politicians, the only thing you can be sure of is that they are lying - again.

Stevens - way past time to go. PLEASE retire. And take your son Benny with you. You have lost your effectiveness. Bully ways might have worked once, but most people see you as someone who should have retired. It will be time for ALL of us eventually. The trick is to leave before you get KICKED out and before you have lost all credibility.

Young - an embarrassment to ALL ALASKANS. He is a joke, and has been for years. He isn't 'direct', he is obnoxious. No loss if he loses. My cat could do a better job.

Murkowski - the jury is still out, but she can't help feeling 'entitled'; she learned it at her daddy's knee. And HE is about as ethically challenged as anyone we have ever had. I had high hopes for her.

Wish us luck in getting rid of the ethically challenged. Alaska deserves better.

Posted by: PalmerBuyer
Date: August 14, 2007 10:34 PM

Name:

Remember personal info?
Yes No

Email Address:

URL:

Comments:

FBI - Stevens-1150

Enter the code as it is shown below:

Security Code:

glass

(This field helps prevent automated access.)

Congratulations!
You have won our hourly prize. Click the "OK" button to claim it before time runs out. OK

Alaska Report
"News and Information Since 1999"

Alaska Photo Gallery
Pictures of the aurora, bears, birds, and more.

Don Young picnic targeted by protesters

August 14, 2007

Anchorage, Alaska - Alaska congressman Don Young was heckled by protesters throughout a public picnic he held Monday afternoon in Anchorage.

Young is running for re-election and under multiple criminal investigations for bribery and corruption.

Young arrived about 2 1/2 hours late to his meet-and-greet salmon bake picnic held near the downtown area of Anchorage.

The congressman was heckled from the moment he showed up. About 50 protesters from around the park swarmed his tent and mercilessly shouted "FBI! FBI!" and "The cook is a crook!"

About half a dozen supporters of Young were at the picnic and tried to shout down the protesters. The supporters refused to give their names and hid their faces when a camera was pointed at them.

Near the end of the picnic, around 20 kids, egged on by one of Young's supporters, started picking up signs and joining the crowd. Most were screaming "Young is Bung." Nobody knew what it meant - including the kids - but it added some laughter to the festivities. The kids also shouted "The cook is a crook!", obviously that is was meant for Young.

VECO Corp., a company under investigation for bribing Young and other Alaska lawmakers, supplied one of the grills to his picnic, Young's aide said the grills were rentals and will be paid for by the campaign.

One of the few comments Young made was after a reporter asked him if he had done anything wrong. Young said "The Lord is with me."

© AlaskaReport News

Women's News
Ads by Google

Become Superman
Muscles like steel. Ultra power. Instant Super Strength, New Secrets www.hikuta.net/classical-conditioni

Ultimate Defense Products
Providing personal defense, Security Products & More! www.ultimate-defense.com

Secrets of Self Defense
Learn how to stop any attacker. No previous training required.
www.SimpleSelfDefenceTactics.co

FBI - Stevens-1151

194A-AN-13620-M;
504

Ads by Google

Fear No Man
Discover What The Martial Artists And The Army Don't Want You To Know www.TopSecretTraining.c

Stop Living In Fear
More Than 200 Products To Keep YOU From Becoming Another Victim www.bigkahunasecurity.c

Self Defense Products
Self Defense Products for Everyone Everyday Family Protection
RKCSelfDefense.com

Self Defense for Women
Fast, Easy and Effective Defenses against common attacks on women www.Womens-SelfDefens

R... Stories:
A... Republican Congressman Don Young in serious legal trouble

I... be irresponsible not to investigate Don Young and Ted S...

D... ung involved in shady land deal, Alaska Congressman helps F... developer after fund raiser

D... ng's Former Aide Pleads Guilty To Corruption

A... Congressman Young probed by FBI in pay-off scheme

D... ng caught lying about debate over emissions bill

T... vens and Don Young Fail to Provide 'Honest Services'

D... Young dances a jig while protesters scream "... FBI!" at him.

okup
Number & Find Caller. (Free website reveals all!) er.com

kground Checks
nal, DMV & Sex Offender FCRA Compliant - om es.com

round Checks
Checks For Free! Quickly Find The Info You Need.
ction.com

d Screening Civil and driving records All 50 States and several kresearchsystems.com

Ads by Google

All images, media, an opyright © 1999 - 2007 AlaskaReport.com - Unless otherwise noted - All rights reserved Privacy Policy

FBI - Stevens-1152

NewsBank America's Newspapers

Paper: Honolulu Advertiser, The (HI)
Title: ANALYSIS
Date: August 19, 2007

Senate 'tag team' staying two-fisted

Corruption probe of Alaska buddy could undercut Inouye

WASHINGTON - In a surprise tribute to Sen. Ted Stevens of Alaska in April, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada began with a momentary slip of the tongue. He addressed Sen. Daniel K. Inouye of Hawai'i instead of Stevens, an easy mix-up, he said, because the two men are so close.

"The relationship between Senator Inouye and Senator Stevens, when the history books are written, will be legendary," Reid said on the Senate floor. "They are friends, a Republican and a Democrat, who are like a couple of brothers."

Flowery words are routine in the Senate, where decorum and politeness, at least on the surface, still rule. But the relationship between Inouye and Stevens is exceptionally tight. It began in the late 1960s as a strategic alliance between two young senators who represented the nation's newest states, then grew into a genuine bond as they became masters at directing federal money back home.

With Stevens now under federal investigation in a public corruption probe in Alaska, their partnership, which has helped bring billions in federal money to Hawai'i over the past four decades, may be in peril.

Federal agents have searched Stevens' home in Girdwood, a resort town south of Anchorage, and federal grand juries in Washington and Anchorage are hearing testimony. A Stevens ally and campaign contributor - a former executive at an Alaska energy services company - pleaded guilty in May to bribery involving four Alaska state lawmakers, among them Stevens' son, Ben, a former state Senate president.

Stevens, who is up for re-election next year, has privately asked Republican senators to stand behind him and urged people in Alaska not to judge him until the investigation is completed.

Inouye said his friend has told him he did nothing wrong.

"That's what he assures me," Inouye said in an interview in his Honolulu office. "So far, the senators on both sides have been publicly very cordial and friendly. I don't see any change. They don't shy away like he was a leper."

Inouye, 82, and Stevens, 83, first banded together in the Senate out of necessity. But they found they had common backgrounds.

Both had been decorated for their Army service in World War II. Inouye won the Medal of Honor for his battlefield heroism in Italy, where he lost his right arm. Stevens was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross as an Army Air Corps pilot in China, Burma and India.

FBI - Stevens-1153

They both were lawyers who had been active in territorial politics and were committed to statehood. And they both found they often had to explain and defend the needs of their states to Mainland senators who saw Alaska and Hawai'i as exotic and remote backwaters.

"We had the unbelievable chore of trying to convince our colleagues that we were part of the United States and worthy to be called Americans," Inouye recalled. "Ted and I were involved in this type of battle from day one."

POWER PLAYERS

Although they often disagree on national issues, their partnership for Alaska and Hawai'i has been unshakable, helping to insulate the states from losing out on federal money when political control of the Senate changes. Their seniority on the Senate Appropriations Committee, particularly its defense subcommittee, gives them an ability to steer federal money back home and the internal power necessary to get other senators to go along.

194A-AN-13620-M;505

On the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee, they are chairman and vice chairman, an unusual power-sharing agreement in an otherwise partisan environment.

They also have crossed party lines to help each other on Alaska's and Hawai'i's federal priorities: Inouye is one of the few Democrats to back oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge; Stevens is one of a handful of Republicans to support a Native Hawaiian federal recognition bill.

Their success over the years has made the pair often-revered figures back home as federal money helped create modern Alaska and Hawai'i.

In six of the past seven years, Citizens Against Government Waste has ranked Alaska and Hawai'i as the top two states per capita for federal money that is not part of presidential budget requests, or is not specifically authorized, or originates in one chamber of Congress, or serves only local or special interests. In 2006, for example, Alaska received $325 million, or $489.87 per person, in such spending, while Hawai'i received $482 million, or $378.29 per person.

The watchdog group derides the money as "pork," but Inouye and Stevens are proud of the rankings.

Inouye said that, in part because of Stevens, Hawai'i continued to do well when Democrats were in the minority.

"We didn't go down like other Democratic states because Ted Stevens would be the one to tell the other Republicans, give them a break, they need this," Inouye said. "And throughout good and bad times - and by that I mean Democrats in, Democrats out -these programs have been consistent."

Inouye and Stevens often travel on congressional delegations abroad and attend White House or Capitol Hill functions together. Over the past few days, Inouye has been with Stevens at events in Alaska, where he told people the state is fortunate to have Stevens.

PROUD PORK

Senate staff - and a few senators - have remarked on the personality differences between the reserved Hawai'i Democrat and the combustible Alaska Republican. At the tribute in April, which honored Stevens for becoming the longest-serving Republican in Senate history, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky said he remembers asking himself when he first arrived in the Senate whether Stevens was ever in a good mood.

Winslow Wheeler, a former Senate aide now with the Center for Defense Information, which studies national security and defense policy, calls Inouye and Stevens "the tag team of defense pork."

Inouye is "much more even-tempered. He's much more gentlemanly. The style of his personality is completely different from Stevens. He's very reserved, stately and dignified," he said. "Stevens is a scrapper, an ill-tempered scrapper. The effect, however, is the same."

Wheeler wrote critical essays under the pen name Spartacus on what he considered wasteful spending in defense bills, before he was outed and forced to resign from his position as an aide to Sen. Pete Domenici, a New Mexico Republican. He said he recalls attending meetings with defense subcommittee staff before appropriations bill markups and hearing nearly identical statements from Inouye's or Stevens' staff, depending on who was in charge at the time.

"On earmarks, nobody got everything, nobody got nothing," Wheeler said he was told. "We did as well as we could, but remember, if your boss voted against our bill last year, don't expect much help from us."

FBI - Stevens-1154

Steve Ellis, vice president of Taxpayers for Common Sense, an activist group critical of lawmakers' pet projects, known as "earmarks," said Stevens should step down from his powerful committee posts during the federal corruption investigation.

"That would do the whole country a service and it would also help increase the confidence of the public in the Congress," he said.

Inouye and Stevens have defended earmarks as one method of getting federal money for important state projects. Inouye likes to remind people that the East-West Center, for example, was an earmark. "I'm not embarrassed or ashamed by what they call earmarks," he said.

Stevens, according to the Anchorage Daily News, told an Alaska audience this month: "The money will simply go to other states for their needs and ours will go unmet."

But Ellis, who wants more transparency on earmarks, said Alaska and Hawai'i may be at a disadvantage over time by relying too much on Stevens and Inouye to deliver.

"We're not saying that Alaska or Hawai'i shouldn't get federal resources, by any stretch of the imagination. Certainly, I think that they, by being geographically dislocated from the Mainland, unfortunately sometimes they are forgotten or less thought about," Ellis said.

"But that's nothing you couldn't correct for in any kind of formula program or in a competitive award or a merit-based program for awarding funding. Someday, Senator Inouye isn't going to be in office, and neither is Senator Stevens. I would think that Alaska and Hawai'i would be much better served by having a merit-based system that would actually reward strong performing programs rather than having something based on political muscle."

CROSSING PARTY LINES

Ignoring party rules, Inouye and Stevens have contributed money to each other's campaigns. Alaska donors also have given money to Inouye, and a few Hawai'i donors have given money to Stevens, but mostly as tokens acknowledging the friendship, since neither Inouye nor Stevens has faced any serious political challenge.

In the 2004 election cycle, Inouye received $34,700 from Alaska donors, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, which follows campaign spending. The donations include $13,000 from executives or family members from VECO Corp., the Alaska energy services company whose executives were caught up in the federal corruption probe. Bill Allen and Richard Smith, former VECO executives who pleaded guilty to bribery, each donated $2,000 to Inouye.

A VECO Corp. assistant told The Associated Press in a 2004 statement about the contributions that they were made because Inouye "is a friend of Ted Stevens and a friend of Alaska."

Another Anchorage businessman who donated money to Inouye, Ed Rasmuson, was more pointed, telling the AP: "You can't be dumb about it, this is Stevens' best friend in the Senate."

The Northern Lights Political Action Committee, Stevens' leadership PAC, gave Inouye $10,000.

In Alaska, where Stevens is known affectionately as Uncle Ted and the airport in Anchorage is named in his honor, he had been expected to easily win re-election next year to another six-year term before news came of the corruption probe. He was first appointed to fill a Senate vacancy in 1968.

Carl Shepro, a political science professor at the University of Alaska-Anchorage, said political opponents will try to use the federal investigation to weaken him but that he remains popular. "I don't see, in all reality, unless there is a substantial charge levied and he's in court, I don't see that the support for him is going to diminish a whole bunch," he said. "I don't know if you can say he's beloved, but he's certainly viewed as a strong champion of Alaskan issues."

Stevens, speaking to Congressional Quarterly Today in May about his campaign, mentioned his friendship with Inouye as an influence. "I just don't think I'd contemplate running again if Dan wasn't here," he said. "One of (us is) going to leave, and other will hang up his shield."

Inouye would still have his seniority and his ties with other veteran Republican senators if Stevens leaves office or loses re-election. But Inouye has lost two lifelines over the past two years - his wife, Maggie, who died in March 2006, and longtime confidant Henry Giugni, who died in November 2005. He would dearly miss Stevens as his brother in the Senate.

FBI - Stevens-1155

"It will make life a little more challenging," Inouye said. "I'll be candid with you, I'd miss him."

Reach Derrick DePledge at ddepledge@honoluluadvertiser .com or 525-8070.

Pull-quote:

"We had the unbelievable chore of trying to convince our colleagues that we (Hawai'i and Alaska) were part of the United States and worthy to be called Americans. Ted and I were involved in this type of battle from day one."

SEN. DANIEL K. INOUYE

Copyright (c) The Honolulu Advertiser. All rights reserved. Reproduced with the permission of Gannett Co., Inc. by

Author: DERRICK DePLEDGE
Section: Main
Page: 1A
Dateline: Hawaii , Alaska
Copyright (c) The Honolulu Advertiser. All rights reserved. Reproduced with the permission of Gannett Co., Inc. by NewsBank, inc.

FBI - Stevens-1156

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

August 26, 2007 Sunday
FINAL EDITION

Military's pollution a lingering war legacy;
WORRIED VILLAGERS: Remote sites, dwindling funds threaten cleanups.

BYLINE: By JEANNETTE J. LEE The Associated Press

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1150 words

For countless generations, Yupik Eskimos fished the Suqitughneq River on St. Lawrence Island. Though his grandfather once pulled salmon and trout from its waters, George Noongwook has never done so.

The Yupik whaling captain from the village of Savoonga is wary of lingering diesel and PCBs from a deserted Cold War surveillance site nearby. He believes they will make him sick.

"There hasn't been anyone fishing there in my lifetime because all the fish died," said Noongwook, 58. "They're back now, but everyone knows (the river) is contaminated so they go elsewhere."

The old Air Force base at Northeast Cape, 140 miles from the Russian mainland, is one of at least 640 contaminated military installations across Alaska dating from World War II and the Cold War. In all, they will cost at least $1 billion to clean up, according to the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

Many of these decaying or downsized outposts are sullying lands and waterways used as primary food sources by at least two dozen tiny communities. Thousands of rural Alaskans depend on wild plants and animals such as caribou, salmon and berries for subsistence.

Old barracks and radar stations from the Arctic coast to the Aleutian Islands contain now-banned materials such as asbestos and lead paint, according to state environmental records. Hidden landfills harbor unknown quantities of scrap metal and munitions. Diesel, PCBs, pesticides and heavy metals have seeped unchecked into soils and rivers.

LANDFILLS ARE LEAKING

Conflicting studies on any lingering health hazards worry many rural residents, who blame the sites for recent increases in cancer and other diseases.

A study in 2002 showed that Alaska Natives who hunt and fish near Northeast Cape have nearly 10 times as many PCBs in their blood as average Americans, but more research needs to be done, said Dr. David Carpenter, an environmental health professor at the University of Albany in New York who led the study.

In the meantime, residents of these isolated villages wait with varying degrees of patience as the years-long cleanups run their course.

At Cape Lisburne on the Chukchi Sea, a scaled-down Cold War radar site continues to leak contaminants onto prime hunting grounds inhabited by caribou, grizzlies and walrus, said Earl Kingik of Point Hope. Pollution from the site runs directly into the Chukchi, part of the Alaska National Maritime Park, according to the state's contaminated sites database.

"There was a cleanup several years ago, but we are not satisfied," said Kingik, co-chair of a community group that advises the military on cleanup. "The landfill is right on the drainage into the ocean."

FBI - Stevens-1157

The military receives congressional funding for cleanups nationwide through the Department of Defense's Environmental Restoration

194A-AN-13620-M;506

Program, started in 1987.

In 2007, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers received $262.8 million for the cleanup of 9,000 former defense sites nationwide. Nearly 8 percent of that went to Alaska.

The state contains the third-highest number of formerly used defense sites in the nation, behind California and Florida, according to the corps, which is in charge of 600 sites in Alaska.

"The military has changed, technology has changed, the threat has changed. The decision to scale down is a combination of all kinds of things," said Tommie Baker, of the 611th Civil Engineer Squadron. The 611th is responsible for environmental restoration of about 40 Air Force sites in Alaska.

During World War II, Alaska became a transit hub for weapons and supplies sent to Russia under the Lend-Lease program. In 1942, the Japanese capture of Attu and Kiska in the Aleutian Islands also spurred speedy military buildup.

Radar and satellite stations sprang up along the northern and western coasts during the Cold War to watch for Soviet air attacks launched over the North Pole.

The military said it has been steadily clearing away the most conspicuous remnants of war, including barracks, radio towers, construction equipment and mounds of rusted oil drums.

"At Northeast Cape we have gotten rid of buildings and other visible impacts," said Carey Cossaboom, a project manager with the Army Corps of Engineers. "We're now moving to the leftover contamination in the ground, the nonvisible impacts, which are very real."

CLEANUP MONEY EBBS

Of 1,500 contaminated sites within the 640 installations, about 50 percent have reached sufficiently clean standards, according to Alaska's Department of Environmental Conservation. The agency oversees the cleanups and determines when they can stop, based on state regulations.

"They're required to clean to levels that are not considered an unacceptable risk," said John Halverson, an environmental program manager at the department. "It's not feasible to clean anything up to original background levels, but that means sometimes the landowners won't be happy."

A former Army installation at Moses Point, an important Inupiat Eskimo fishing site in western Alaska, was closed two years ago to further cleanup. Paul Nagaruk, former mayor of the nearby village of Elim, said the project was far from successful.

The village of 300 people has requested Alaska Community Action on Toxics to do additional testing and studies. The organization advocates for environmental health in communities.

"Our people welcomed the military, our men enlisted, they helped rescue downed planes and the Department of Defense has not taken into consideration the human health effects of these places," said Vi Waghiyi, coordinator of the environmental health and justice program for the nonprofit's Norton Sound Alaska Project. "The Army corps has not properly identified what is left and a lot of times the burden of proof is on communities."

State and federal officials say funding for cleanup on deserted military installations in the state is dwindling and the projects take years to research and execute.

The $20 million allotted to the Army Corps of Engineers for Alaska in 2007 represents a steady annual decrease from 1998 when the corps received $50 million.

Sites in Alaska generally cost more to clean up than in other states because of the logistics of traveling across vast stretches of roadless terrain and the short summer work season.

"You can only go by barge to Northeast Cape and you need to get in by mid-June and get out by September or risk being stuck all winter," said Kenneth Andraschko, the corps' acting program manager for formerly used defense sites in Alaska. "You're at the whim of Mother Nature."

St. Lawrence Island residents hope that one of these summers, the remnants of a 30-year-old, 180,000-gallon diesel spill will be removed from the Suqitughneq River. Then, just maybe, they will return to its banks to fish.

"You can smell it and you can see it," Noongwook said of the diesel. "Before the military came, the river was an important subsistence source, a great ecosystem."

LOAD-DATE: August 27, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: ALASKA COMMUNITY ACTION ON TOXICS / Associated Press archive 1998
Above: Annie Alowa stands at an abandoned military defense site at Northeast Cape on St. Lawrence Island before the site was cleaned up. This old Air Force base, 140 miles from the Russian mainland, is one of at least 640 contaminated military installations dating from World War II and the Cold War scattered across Alaska.
AL GRILLO / The Associated Press
Left: A contaminated fuel tank sits at an abandoned military defense site in Nome.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: WIRE

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1159

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

August 28, 2007 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

Corruption cases may be paired;
TWO LAWMAKERS, ONE TRIAL: Judge's recommendation comes with hearings set to start Sept. 5.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 662 words

With their public corruption trial just over a week away, former state Reps. Pete Kott and Bruce Weyhrauch are maneuvering to throw out big chunks of the prosecution case.

Wiretap evidence. Secret video recordings. Statements by "unindicted co-conspirators," as the prosecution calls them.

Kott's and Weyhrauch's defense lawyers are filing court pleadings at a furious rate as the Sept. 5 trial date nears. Prosecutors, meanwhile, say at least part of the legal battle is too late.

On Monday, a magistrate judge issued a recommendation that the two former lawmakers be tried together.

Weyhrauch was trying to split his case apart from Kott's. His reasons weren't stated publicly because the argument, like many in the case, was filed "under seal." But in his 12-page recommendation Monday, Magistrate Judge John D. Roberts shed some light on the issues raised by Weyhrauch:

* Worries about a spillover effect, if the government has more evidence against Kott. Frequently, that's the situation with co-defendants, Roberts wrote.

"The argument that Weyhrauch never became intoxicated, used foul language or was given a hat with the letters "CBC" (corrupt bastard's club) may serve to distinguish him from the actions of his co-defendant in the jury's assessment of the case," Roberts said. Jurors should be able to separate the evidence against each, and the judge may give special instructions along those lines, he said.

* If the two men are tried together, Weyhrauch's defense lawyer believes the prosecution may try to prove there were multiple conspiracies, but Weyhrauch is accused of participating in only one.

Weyhrauch and Kott were indicted on a charge of conspiring with two Veco Co. executives, Bill Allen and Rick Smith, and others on the rate for a new state oil tax. Both Allen and Smith have since resigned. Veco is an oil field services company.

If evidence of multiple conspiracies is proven at trial, that could be harmful to Weyhrauch and make a conviction "vulnerable to attack on appeal," Roberts acknowledged. But until the trial happens, it's impossible to know whether that will be the case, he said in his recommendation.

U.S. District Court Judge John Sedwick ultimately will decide the issues.

Doug Pope, one of Weyhrauch's lawyers, said that despite Roberts' recommendation, his client's case still could be split apart from Kott's -- after the trial begins and evidence is admitted. That's usually how such matters play out, he said.

The deadline for motions was July 24. That's the same day prosecutors turned over to the defense 1,601 pages of materials used to support their search warrant applicati There simply wasn't enough time to handle th lume of documents, Kott's lawyer, Jim Wendt, wrote in a court filing.

Judges can allow defense lawyers to make new arguments, even at this late date.

The reason the prosecution didn't provide the documents sooner? It's "because the materials disclose multiple ongoing, non-public investigations," according to a filing by prosecutors.

The details of the search warrant documents remain largely hidden from the public -- "under seal," to use the court term. Both sides have filed documents that way. Prosecutors said in one court document that they didn't want information about other suspects or investigations to become public.

Roberts ordered on Friday that no more documents in the case be filed under seal unless the lawyers first get permission from a judge. The order surprised the defense lawyers.

"He came in like a cowboy out of left field on that," Pope said.

Calls to prosecutors weren't returned Friday or Monday.

Weyhrauch, a Republican from Juneau, did not run in 2006. Kott, a former Republican House Speaker from Eagle River, was defeated in the 2006 primary and now lives in Juneau.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

SCANDAL: For past stories on Alaska politicians in trouble with the law or feeling the heat, go to

adn.com/corruption

LOAD-DATE: August 28, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Kott
Weyhrauch

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1161

Automated Serial Permanent Charge-Out
FD-5a (1-5-94)

Date: 01/31/08 Time: 19:44

Case ID: 194A-AN-13620-M Serial: 508

Description of Document:

Type : NEWSPAPE
Date : 08/29/07
To : ANCHORAGE
From : ANCHORAGE DAILY NEWS
Topic: BOROUGH CHIEF LOOKS FOR HELP IN STEM CELLS; CANCER TREATMENT

Reason for Permanent Charge-Out:

FILED IN WRONG FILE

Employee: [redacted] b6 b7C

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

August 30, 2007 Thursday
FINAL EDITION

Kohring: Detention was illegal;
FBI RAID: He says he was not read his rights during questioning.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 769 words

Former state Rep. Vic Kohring claims that when FBI agents raided his legislative office a year ago, they illegally detained him and forced him to submit to hours of interrogation without ever reading him his rights.

Kohring was indicted on bribery, extortion and conspiracy charges in May. He is accused of selling his office to oil field services contractor Veco Corp. and resigned his Wasilla House seat in June. Trial is set for Oct. 22.

His lawyer, John Henry Browne of Seattle, is trying to suppress evidence seized in and statements made by Kohring during the Aug. 31, 2006, search.

New court filings told from Kohring's point of view are full of drama:

Around 11 a.m. that day, FBI agent Alan Vanderploeg called Kohring on his cell. He was with a friend, headed to Palmer to check out a pickup for use in his House race. The agent insisted they meet right away at Kohring's Wasilla office.

"Five armed FBI agents, who were already waiting there, created a quite intimidating scene," when Kohring arrived.

The agents said they had a warrant to search his office, but never produced it, according to Kohring's story. Instead, the court papers say, they pressured him to consent to a search so no warrant was needed and threatened to tell the media if he refused.

The FBI advised Kohring to send his aide home, which he says in a statement he later regretted.

"Then, while Kohring was isolated and segregated, the agents finally revealed that he was not only a witness, but also a suspect as well, and displayed a thick file folder with his name on it ostensibly containing incriminating information, though the agents never displayed its contents," says one of the court filings.

The FBI investigation dated to 2003, his lawyer wrote.

FBI - Stevens-1163

The agents told Kohring he wasn't under arrest, but made it clear he wasn't free to leave, Kohring claimed in his statement. In fact, they locked the front door to his office and wouldn't let him go to the bathroom or get a drink of water, his lawyer contends.

The totality of circumstances -- including a "police-dominated atmosphere" -- shows that he was in custody, yet he was never read his Miranda rights, Browne argued. No reasonable person would have felt free to leave, one of the motions says.

Kohring was able to phone a friend and attorney, Robert Hall. He contends the FBI pressured him to hang up before getting any useful advice.

Hall was so worried, he rushed to Kohring's office but the FBI wouldn't let him in, Hall says in a court filing.

"The agents persisted in searching and questioning in excess of two hours, during which Kohring was isolated in his locked offices while his friend and personal attorney sat in hallway, barred from entry," one of the motio ays.

194A-AN-13620-M : 509

Near the end of the interview, after agents told Kohring he was a suspect, "they threatened him with 20 years in prison if he did not answer incriminating questions in regards to his association with VECO corporation," Browne wrote. They termed it "the Martha Stewart question." The homemaking diva went to prison for lying to investigators.

The search ended after 2 p.m., according to Kohring.

Prosecutors and the FBI dispute Kohring's claims, said Joe Bottini, an assistant U.S. attorney. They will file their detailed response in court, he said.

Kohring himself told a different story the day of the search.

"I fully cooperated and answered all their questions," Kohring said in a written statement back in August 2006. "I was told that I am not a target of the investigation and was asked not to discuss details of the interview."

Kohring wants the judge to move the trial to Washington state because of all the publicity in Alaska. His trial could take place around the same time as a special session set to revisit the state's new oil tax. Gov. Sarah Palin called the session because she said the bribery cases taint the tax legislation passed in 2006.

Two other former representatives, Pete Kott and Bruce Weyhrauch, go to trial just before Kohring. Former Veco Corp. executives Bill Allen and Rick Smith are expected to be key witnesses. They already have pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy.

Browne also wants the government to reveal all promises made to Allen and Smith for their cooperation, as well as to two witnesses who testified earlier this summer against former Rep. Tom Anderson, who was convicted of bribery and other charges.

A hearing on the requests to suppress evidence is scheduled for Sept. 17.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

INVESTIGATIONS: For past stories and a timeline of events, go to

adn.com/corruption

LOAD-DATE: August 30, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Kohring

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

FBI - Stevens-1164

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 4, 2007 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

Prosecutors direct new allegations against Kott;
UNLAWFUL GIFTS: Prosecutors say Kott started accepting benefits from Veco officials in 1999.

BYLINE: By RICHARD MAUER rmauer@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 717 words

As federal prosecutors prepare to begin their case this week against two former state legislators, they have unveiled new allegations that one, Rep. Pete Kott, had been taking unlawful gifts and benefits from Veco officials since 1999.

Kott, a former House speaker who ran a flooring business on the side, stored equipment from 1999 to 2006 at a warehouse owned by the oil-field service company, the government said in a recently unsealed motion. The government also alleged that Kott received $12,000 in equipment from Veco or its former chairman, Bill Allen, in 2002, and that Allen gave him $5,000 in 2004. The next year, Kott took possession of tools and other items that Veco bought in a charity auction, prosecutors said.

Those alleged actions were in addition to conduct charged in the seven-count indictment returned by a federal grand jury in Anchorage in May against Kott, an Eagle River Republican, and former Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, a Juneau Republican. Most of the alleged illegal activity in the indictment took place between September 2005 and August 2006.

Both men have pleaded not guilty to bribery, extortion, fraud and conspiracy. Their trial begins Wednesday in Anchorage before U.S. District Judge John Sedwick.

In the days leading up to the trial, the two defendants have also been firing back at the government, challenging some of the legal theories of the prosecutors. They are disputing the government's assertions that the two men had a duty to disclose they were seeking work from Veco or Bill Allen at the same time they were voting on issues affecting Veco.

Kott also asked the judge to prevent the government from bringing up alleged prior "bad acts" that weren't specifically charged in the indictment.

Allen and former Veco vice president Rick Smith are expected to be key government witnesses. They have pleaded guilty to bribing legislators and hope to get their sentences reduced by cooperating with the authorities.

FBI - Stevens-1165

In disclosing that they intended to bring up Kott's earlier conduct to the jury, government prosecutors said they expected Allen and Smith to testify "to the general scheme to provide Kott with things of value in exchange for securing Kott's agreement to take officials acts to benefit Allen, Smith and Veco."

In one instance, Kott's attorneys said in a court filing last week that Kott was only joking when he asked Veco for help in getting him a job at a prison the company was building in Barbados.

"These Barbados comments are made in jest, and that intent is clear from the context of the conversations, which involved drinking and joking," they said.

And Kott's talk of working as a lobbyist for Veco -- a discussion he held while still in office -- were "off-hand, brief, and are absolutely devoid of any details or even specific requests to be Veco's lobbyist or a specific promise to be hired as Veco's lobbyist," his lawyers said.

194A-AN-136620-M;510

Weyhrauch, a lawyer, is accused of selling his votes for a 2006 oil-industry tax bill in return for a promise of legal work after the regular legislative session. The government said Weyhrauch should have disclosed his negotiations for work with Allen and Smith.

But Weyhrauch's attorneys said he had no duty to disclose under state law or House rules.

Kott's lawyers said as much and asserted that it's the normal House practice to require members to vote even if they have a conflict of interest. That negates the need for disclosure, they said.

Government lawyers said that position is nonsense.

"Each member of the Alaska State Legislature has an inherent duty to the public of the State of Alaska to conduct their dealings free of conflicts of interest," prosecutors said in a memorandum filed Saturday. "The existence of this duty is intrinsic to a public official's obligation to conduct his or her affairs free of improper influences." State law requires legislators to not only avoid conflicts of interest, but even the appearance of a conflict, they wrote.

Weyhrauch appeared to understand that duty, the prosecutors said, because he disclosed other conflicts even if he failed to disclose his job solicitation from Veco.

Find Richard Mauer online at adn.com/contact/rmauer or call 257-4345.

INSIDE

LAWMAKER ON TAPE: Recordings by the FBI used to convict former legislator Tom Anderson.

Page B-2

LOAD-DATE: September 4, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: CHRIS MILLER / The Associated Press
Former Eagle River lawmaker Pete Kott is led out of court following his arraignment in Juneau last spring. Kott and Bruce Weyhrauch of Juneau have pleaded not guilty to federal charges.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1166

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

August 31, 2007 Friday
FINAL EDITION

Craig opposed Stevens' investigation; 'GESTAPO-LIKE': Idaho senator blasted the FBI on same day he pleaded guilty to lewd conduct.

BYLINE: By ERIKA BOLSTAD ebolstad@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 616 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON -

In the days following a high-profile FBI raid on the home of Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens, Idaho Sen. Larry Craig was among the sharpest defenders of his embattled Alaska colleague.

In comments to reporters in the Capitol on Aug. 1, the Idaho senator criticized the FBI for "Gestapo-like" tactics and expressed sympathy for the position Stevens found himself in.

"I think some people say, 'Ah, there but for the grace of God go I,' " Craig told the Capitol Hill newspaper, the Politico.

Since news broke Monday of Craig's June 11 arrest for lewd conduct in a men's restroom of the Minneapolis airport, the three-term Republican senator has been increasingly under pressure to resign his seat. Top Republicans, including President Bush, have expressed their disappointment in him, and some fellow GOP senators have called for him to step down.

In his Aug. 1 comments about his Alaska colleague, Craig went on to say that he was disturbed by the idea of an FBI raid on the home of a sitting U.S. senator, and he criticized federal agents for using a locksmith to break into the home when Stevens had reportedly offered them a key. Craig said he thought it was "gamesmanship" done for the benefit of television cameras.

"That makes senators very, very angry when they attempt to cooperate when ... they are caught in these webs and yet they are denied that for the sake of the judiciary's publicity," Craig said, according to Politico.

He added, "it would be very intimidating if I was under investigation and handed the FBI a key, and then TV cameras and newspeople (showed up). That is very intimidating."

What makes Craig's comments striking is their timing - especially with the perspective of hindsight. They came Aug. 1, the same day he signed and dated a plea agreement saying he was guilty of disorderly conduct for making sexual advances to an undercover police officer in a Minneapolis airport bathroom. The plea was dropped into the mail and filed with court officials Aug. 8.

Craig's office did not return phone calls or e-mails Thursday requesting clarification of his Aug. 1 remarks.

Craig, who has long stood with Stevens in support of drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, was one of the few Republicans to be openly supportive of -- and sympathetic to -- the Alaska senator. Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., offered support for the Senate's longest-serving Republican, but Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., took a more measured, cautious approach when asked how he would handle the fallout from the Stevens raid.

In all the noise surrounding the raid on Stevens' home, Craig's comments were largely ignored. However, they were picked up by Fox News, and Stevens' fellow Alaskan in the Senate, Lisa Murkowski, also questioned the timing of the raid.

194A-AN-13620-M;511

Thursday, Murkowski echoed other Republicans who have called Craig's arrest and guilty plea a disappointment. But Murkowski, in Alaska with Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, stopped short of calling for Craig's resignation, and said she thought it was appropriate that the matter be handled by the Senate Ethics committee. Craig campaigned for her in 2004 in Alaska.

"The fact that he pled guilty to a crime causes me great concern," Murkowski said. "I'm really just sick about this news."

Stevens, who has refused to address questions about his own investigation, has been silent on Craig's situation. Thursday, as he was traveling in remote western Alaska near Shishmaref, he told The Associated Press that he had spoken to his attorneys about it, "and they advise I make no comments about any investigations right now."

Daily News reporter Megan Holland in Anchorage contributed to this report.

LOAD-DATE: August 31, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1168

NewsBank America's Newspapers

Paper: Anchorage Daily News (AK)
Title: Palin foresees positive changes in Alaska politics - PART ONE OF THREE
Q&A
Date: September 2, 2007

On Aug. 22, 2006, Sarah Palin shocked the Republican Party establishment with a crushing primary victory over incumbent Gov. Frank Murkowski and former state Sen. John Binkley. She went on to win the governor's race in November by a comfortable margin and, according to polls, has grown even more popular with Alaskans during her first year in office.

A year after that primary victory, Gov. Palin sat down with Daily News reporter Tom Kizzia to talk about some of the biggest issues of her first nine months in office, including the ongoing federal corruption investigation and next month's special session to reconsider the state's new oil tax.

Featured today: Her thoughts on the political corruption investigation and the changes to the system she says will be necessary to chart a different course for the state. The governor's comments have been lightly edited for space and repetition. The complete audio is available on adn.com.

ADN: How do you feel about how the FBI investigations are going now? You had a lot to say in May when the indictments came out. Now the investigation is veering toward the congressional delegation and could affect how Alaska does business. ... Does that make you uneasy?

PALIN: I am not scared of the changes that I believe are inevitable in terms of leadership that has represented the state of Alaska for all of these years because the change is inevitable.

Whether the FBI reveals something that leads to change, or just the changes in power in Congress ... or individuals maybe choosing not to run for re-election, age even of our politicians playing a part in this, change is coming to Alaska.

So I am not afraid of that and I don't want Alaskans to be afraid of what is coming. ... There are many positives that are going to result from change if we are in the right mind-set. ...

My interpretation of it is that Alaska has got to change its image. ... We need to be taken seriously so that we are given more credence and more authority here and we are provided more opportunities to develop our state. The only way that we are going to be able to gain the trust of the rest of the United States ... is to prove that we can do things right and honestly and transparently and Sen. Stevens knows that has been my message.

ADN: Transparency in government. Are you talking about self-sufficiency as well?

PALIN: I go back again to remembering when we became a state where we struck the deals with the federal government as we asked to be let into the union and the promise on our part was that we would be as self-sufficient as possible.

We wouldn't solely be reliant on the federal government to pay our bills, to provide services and build our projects here, and we become self-sufficient by developing our resources because we are so wealthy in terms of the resource that we have here, but into -- a large part here, we are not allowed to develop those resources and I think a lot of that has to do with others who are making decisions for us, looking at us like, 'We don't believe that their oversight is going to be strong enough for the environment.'

Now, of course, they are saying, 'We believe that there is corruption up there, so we can't trust Alaska to know how to do the right thing.' All of these things that are kind of elements right now in play, we have to be more responsible and more sensible than ever. This state government, our administration, has to prove to the rest of the United States that we can do things right.

ADN: Well, talk about dependence on the federal government, I think a lot of Alaskans have probably asked themselves why these investigations had to be carried out by the federal Justice Department.

PALIN: Yes.

194A-AN-13620-M;512

ADN: Is the state capable of policing political corruption here or is it too tied up in its own system? Can voters have any confidence that any future transgressions can be handled by the state?

PALIN: That's a great question, and I am one of those who had asked why did it take the feds to come in here over the last couple of years and start digging into the issues that had been speculated about and rumored about?

Why couldn't the state police each other? Why couldn't the Legislature and legislators police one another? Why couldn't APOC (the Alaska Public Offices Commission) -- why didn't they have an investigator? All these tools that we are missing in the state's toolbox to clean up what was rumored to be corruption and undue influence, and I still don't have the answer as to why it was that the state had to rely on the feds again to come in and clean things up. But what we have done to change that though, with APOC, we funded them an investigator.

They need to have one with oversight of the oil industry. We just funded a five million-dollar new office, the PSIO office (Petroleum Systems Integrity Office) where we will have an integrity office overseeing the regulatory environment, even, of oil and gas development in the state. ...

We are going to put our money where our mouth is that we are going to be able to prove that our commitment is to do things right.

ADN: Is the investigator going to do it for APOC? Or does more change need to be made there in the election supervision?

PALIN: Well, an investigator is a good first step. Greater communication with APOC will be able to tell us what else is missing. And then those things that make sense to this administration to add to the toolbox.

We have got to go above and beyond with oversight. We have to make sure that the public is going to be able to trust that state government is making decisions in the people's best interest and we have got a lot of ground to make up.

ADN: Payoffs to legislators goes beyond just campaign finance investigations. That takes some serious digging for the Department of Law or the State Troopers or whomever. It would go beyond APOC.

PALIN: Well, right, and that obviously is why the FBI and Department of Justice, other entities with much greater resources than any state agency, had to come in. But also, I think the FBI's role in this and Department of Justice is an indication that the problems are greater than just maybe a local legislator pocketing a few thousand dollars to change a vote on something.

Evidently, it is more serious than what has been revealed thus far. Of course, not being privy to all of the information, I can't prejudge what any kind of outcome is going to be when more of the trials begin and I can't assume that the period of indictments is over. I think that there will probably be more.

ADN: In May, Attorney General (Talis) Colberg said the state was going to pursue its own investigation of things related, issues related to those Veco confessions. Is that still going ahead?

PALIN: Well, to the degree that we cannot step on the FBI's toes or get in the way of their investigation, our focus has been on what kind of undue influence was either impacting or coming from the administration? They are the ones who proposed the new oil tax regime, remember? And nobody is really asking well, what did Jim Clark (Murkowski's chief of staff) have to do with this? What did Murkowski have to do with all of this?

It's been our role and some of my assistants' roles who were here before to start getting in there and figuring out what was the motivation behind these proposals to change an oil tax. That is still being gathered. ... FBI - Stevens-1170

ADN: Have the feds been looking at the previous administration's motives?

PALIN: I can't tell. We can't tell.

ADN: You can't say or you can't ...

PALIN: I can't prove that they have been doing that, except that they have conducted some interviews. They have interviewed, for instance, Joe Balash, my assistant on the oil and gas issues and Joe had been working for a legislator in the past and it sounds to me like the questions may have had to do with what was the administration's role. But that's something that we, you know, again, I am not privy to and we haven't heard or seen publicly what aspect of the administration's past actions are being questioned.

ADN: Some Alaskans have, you know, defended Ted Stevens and Lisa Murkowski in particular, saying it is only natural in a small state for a politician to have prominent friends and even enter business relations with them. What do you think? Where should public figures, political figures draw the line?

PALIN: Well, maybe that is commonplace in a former smaller world of politicians in Alaska, but that is not commonplace in my world to be presented, you know, maybe amazing or even outlandish investment opportunities that turn us into rich individuals. ...

I am not buddies with Bob Penney. I don't go to that Kenai classic fishery thing, you know, I don't go hunting and fishing with Bill Allen. That's not my world. So my perspective is, I guess this new leadership team, we wouldn't be tempted to become part of that world because that is not where we came from. I'm not enticed at all or excited about the idea of hooking up with some of the characters in the past that now are in trouble.

ADN: Do you think if they had adhered to a brighter line that they could have avoided some of this trouble?

PALIN: I think everyone has that individual and personal ethical compass within and I think that maybe in the past, some individuals, their compass was way off kilter and decisions were made based on a real skewed idea of what ethical activity would be. I am not claiming holier than thou and I am not saying that the people who I hire and surround myself with, that any of us are perfect.

All of us make mistakes ... but as long as I am confident that moral compass is right on target and we are not going to be tempted to do anything for self gain then I think that is what is going to best for the progress that we need here in Alaska. I can't say that was the case in the past in Alaskan politics. Obviously it wasn't or we wouldn't have high-ranking CEOs pleading guilty to bribery.

ADN: But I think you are also talking about the activities in the gray area -- the business relationships with, you know, a senator or congressman or a state legislator. Between someone with interests in the public process and the people running the public process.

PALIN: Right. Well, that's why I think we need more real and normal and hardworking and blue-collar Alaskans to want to run for office and serve in these positions that are making decisions.

Again, I will personalize this. I am not from that other world. My dad as a school teacher wasn't a mover and shaker developer making big bucks in the state of Alaska off of property development. My husband isn't that way. I am not raising my kids to be that way.

... If you want to be in public service, it is being willing to serve Alaskans for the right reasons. It is having to have a servant's heart when you come into these positions. It's not to get rich.

TOMORROW: Palin on the Petroleum Profits Tax and the oil industry.

Contact reporter Tom Kizzia at tkizzia@adn.com.

ONLINE: Hear audio excepts of the interview with the governor and see an audio slide show.

PART ONE OF THREE

SLOPE joB: Palin's views on her husband's return to work.

FBI - Stevens-1171

Back Page

TOMORROW: Palin on the Petroleum Profits Tax and the oil industry.

Question and answer
Caption:
Photos by STEPHEN NOWERS / Anchorage Daily News

Gov. Sarah Palin speaks in a recent interview in her office in downtown Anchorage. The bearskin rug on the sofa is a grizzly shot in the Denali Highway country by her father.
Caption:
Photo 6: palin_9_090207.jpg

Graphic 1: QandA_090207.eps

Graphic 2: slideshowIcon_090207.eps

Graphic 3: 30 promo palin_090207.eps

Graphic 4: palin_3_090207.eps

Graphic 5: palin_5_090207.eps

Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

Author: Tom Kizzia Anchorage Daily News Staff
Section: Main
Page: A1
Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

FBI - Stevens-1172

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 4, 2007 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

Released Anderson sting tapes unveil the federal case; 'YOU WANT VOTES': Lawmaker knew lobbyist sought more than newsletter.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B2

LENGTH: 506 words

More than a month after former state Rep. Tom Anderson was found guilty of bribery and other corruption charges, the prosecution has released the secretly recorded conversations used to convict him.

A federal jury convicted Anderson, an Anchorage Republican, on July 9 of bribery, extortion, money laundering and conspiracy. Several jurors said afterward that Anderson's own words were the strongest evidence against him.

The Daily News and KTUU Channel 2 sought copies of the recordings and other exhibits during the trial but didn't get them at that time. The news organizations then went to court. Negotiations began with prosecutors. The records were released Aug. 23.

The recordings were made by the FBI. A government witness, former Cornell Cos. consultant Frank Prewitt, wore a wire. The recordings, along with witness testimony, gave jurors a picture of a scheme in which Anderson took bribes to do Cornell's bidding. The plan was for a Cornell Cos. lobbyist, Bill Bobrick, to create a sham political newsletter or Web site that would be used to funnel money to Anderson.

Anderson's sentencing is scheduled for Oct. 2.

Here's a quick guide to some of the key conversations:

JULY 21, 2004

Audio recording. Bobrick and Prewitt meet at Southside Bistro in Anchorage to discuss how to get money to Anderson. In exchange, Anderson would "be our boy in Juneau," Bobrick tells Prewitt.

JULY 28

Video of meeting at the Whale's Tale in the Hotel Captain Cook among Anderson, Prewitt and Bobrick. Anderson's hands are in view. When asked about his credentials to do work for Cornell, the first thing he mentions is that he is a legislator. Jurors asked for the recording to be replayed during their deliberations.

FBI - Stevens-1173

NOV. 16

Video recording of meeting between Anderson and Prewitt in Anderson's legislative office in Anchorage. Anderson acknowledges to Prewitt that he knows Cornell really isn't interested in a political newsletter. "You want votes in the Legislature, I would assume," Anderson says. He also says he doesn't want to split the next payment with Bobrick. They discuss Anderson testifying the next day at a public hearing on a juvenile treatment center that Cornell needed state approval to open.

DEC. 21

Video recording of meeting between Anderson and Prewitt at the Whale's Tale. Prewitt brings two checks, one made out to Anderson's consulting firm directly. "That is perfect," Anderson says.

194A-AN-13620-M;513

FEB. 16, 2005

Video recording of a dinner at the Baranof Hotel in Juneau that includes Prewitt, Anderson and then-state Rep. Lesil McGuire. At the time, McGuire and Anderson were dating. They since have married, and McGuire has been elected to the state Senate. McGuire tells Prewitt, "Don't forget, I'm going to stay right up on you boys" to make sure Cornell offers rehabilitation. At one point, McGuire is distracted by a side conversation. Anderson takes the opportunity to tell Prewitt that McGuire doesn't know about his relationship with Cornell.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

LOAD-DATE: September 4, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Anderson

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1174

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 5, 2007 Wednesday
FINAL EDITION

GOP divides ethics cases of senators;
DAMAGE CONTROL: Craig's case called unlike Stevens', Vitter's.

BYLINE: By ERIKA BOLSTAD ebolstad@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 420 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON -

Responding to criticism that GOP senators who've found themselves in trouble this summer have been treated very differently by their peers, the Republican leader of the U.S. Senate outlined why he thinks each should get a "case-by-case" treatment.

U.S. Sen. Larry Craig pleaded guilty after a sex sting in a men's airport bathroom, effectively ending any questions of guilt or innocence, said Sen. Mitch McConnell, the Senate minority leader. Sen. David Vitter, R-La., hasn't been charged with a crime, and wasn't in the Senate when he telephoned the so-called D.C. Madam, McConnell said.

And as far as Sen. Ted Stevens is concerned, McConnell said, the long-serving Alaska Republican "maintains his innocence" in connection with the July 30 raid on his home in Girdwood.

"This had to do with admission of responsibility as opposed to charges or suggestions," McConnell said, in his first remarks about Craig's ouster since the Idaho Republican announced Saturday he would step down.

Eager to avoid being tagged as the party with the most ethical problems, Republicans acted quickly last week to encourage Craig to resign. Yet many have questioned why Stevens -- who is under investigation but hasn't been charged with any crime -- has not faced any official rebuke by his peers.

"There's a substantial difference between a conclusion to a matter and allegations that are being denied or behavior that occurred before you ever came to the Senate," McConnell said.

McConnell did not mention any of the senators by name, but it was clear which ones he was talking about during a press conference Tuesday to outline his party's agenda following Congress's summer recess.

Stevens continued his policy of avoiding any comment connected to the investigation or the raid on his home.

"We're not going to comment at all on Sen. McConnell's press conference," said spokesman Steve Wackowski.

Federal investigators and grand juries in Anchorage and Washington, D.C., have been seeking information about renovations to Stevens' Girdwood home. The project more than doubled the size of the house and was overseen by oil services company Veco Corp. CEO Bill Allen. In May, Allen pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers and agreed to cooperate with authorities in further corruption probes. Veco vice president Richard Smith has also pleaded guilty to identical charges. Allen and Smith resigned from Veco.

The FBI also is investigating the National Science Foundation's award of $170 million in contracts to the company.

LOAD-DATE: September 5, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Stevens

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1176

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 6, 2007 Thursday
FINAL EDITION

Corruption trials divided;
Kott's hearing continues, but Weyhrauch's stalls on federal appeal

BYLINE: By RICHARD MAUER and LISA DEMER Anchorage Daily News

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1034 words

A federal judge Wednesday ordered separate trials for two former Republican legislators to allow jury selection for one to move forward while the government appeals an earlier ruling favoring the other.

The decision on the one-time co-defendants means the bribery, extortion, fraud and conspiracy case against Pete Kott, the former House speaker, will go ahead with opening arguments scheduled for Monday. Jury selection started at midmorning Wednesday and will continue today.

But the trial of Bruce Weyhrauch, a former representative from Juneau, will await the outcome of the government's bid to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco, and perhaps longer. Weyhrauch's attorney, Doug Pope, said he'd try to take the case to the U.S. Supreme Court if the 9th Circuit reverses the decision in Anchorage.

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick made his ruling on separating the trials in a hastily called hearing that began at 8 a.m. Wednesday, just before jury selection was to begin. With more than 80 potential jurors from around Southcentral Alaska cloistered in a meeting room across the lobby and down a hall, Nicholas Marsh, a trial attorney from the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, told Sedwick that his superiors in Washington agreed that an appeal of an earlier ruling was justified.

They are challenging a ruling by Sedwick on Tuesday that said the government couldn't present evidence that Weyhrauch and Kott were duty-bound to report they were seeking employment with Veco, the politically active oil-field service company, in 2006, when they were voting on oil-tax legislation heavily lobbied by Veco's chair, Bill Allen. Sedwick held that state law had no such requirement.

In the Wednesday morning hearing, Marsh told Sedwick the government still had ample evidence against Kott and was prepared to go to trial. But for Weyhrauch, a lawyer who never landed the Veco job, the evidence is crucial, Marsh said.

At issue is whether Weyhrauch used mail fraud to cheat Alaskans of honest services as a state legislator. Pope said Weyhrauch did nothing wrong in sending a personal advertisement for legal services to Veco.

With the trial set to begin, expenses for lawyers and the court adding up, and potential jurors cooling their heels, Marsh proposed that Sedwick revisit a request made in August by Weyhrauch's attorneys to split the trial. At the time, Pope argued that the stronger evidence against Kott could prejudice the jury against his client. The government opposed the motion then, and the judge kept the defendants together.

But now, Pope told Sedwick, the situation has changed. He was fully prepared to go to trial. It would be an undue financial and emotional burden on Weyhrauch and his family to delay any longer. He argued the government's points of appeal were thin and unlikely to succeed.

But Sedwick said federal appeals courts around the country were split on the disclosure issue, while the all-important 9th Circuit, governing courts in Alaska, "hasn't spoken." Sedwick said he followed a line of reasoning adopted by the 5th Circuit in New Orleans.

Jim Wendt, Kott's attorney, opposed the split, mainly because he had prepared a case theory and line of questioning for witnesses based on having a co-defendant. The government agreed to delay opening arguments until Monday, and promised to tell him by Friday whether Allen and former Veco vice president Rick Smith would be called to testify and to reveal the approximate place in the trial they would take the stand.

194A-AN-13620-m.515

Following a 90-minute recess to review the law and rulings in related cases, Sedwick called the parties back to his courtroom and announced he would split up the co-defendants so the government could pursue the appeal. He said the government clearly had that right.

After packing up boxes of documents on a cart and clearing the courthouse, Pope stopped to talk with reporters and expressed outrage at the government. He said prosecutors realized late in the pretrial phase that their case was weak and responded by inventing a new case theory that relied on an improper application of federal law.

He said Weyhrauch's day in court may be delayed for more than a year by the appeal.

Marsh said it would be inappropriate to comment on Pope's out-of-court criticism.

Back in the courtroom, potential jurors began filing in to be questioned about their knowledge of the now-smaller case. The lawyers on both sides introduced themselves, and so did Kott, who represented Eagle River in the House.

"I'm Pete Kott, and I'm the defendant in the case," he said, smiling at the packed room of jurors.

Most of those with strong opinions already had been weeded out through written questionnaires.

Sedwick, and sometimes the lawyers, asked detailed questions of about half those remaining on Wednesday to determine whether any were too biased to be fair jurors or had other reasons not to serve.

One had just landed her first full-time job in a year, so she was allowed to go home. A couple of people had medical issues. One is leaving Alaska this month. Another is married to a former contract manager at BP and socialized with Allen. All left the courtroom.

Some were close calls. One man told the judge he thought he could be fair "for the most part." When Sedwick pressed him, he said part of him struggled with the politics of oil in Alaska. The judge sent him home.

While a number of the prospective jurors had a general idea that the matter before them was a bribery case, some said they didn't pay attention to politics. Others followed the political corruption cases closely. Some told the judge they were most interested in trouble faced by U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens and his son, former state Senate President Ben Stevens. Neither has been charged with a crime, but Ben Stevens is accused of being part of a conspiracy that included Kott, Weyhrauch, Allen and Smith.

Find Richard Mauer online at adn.com/contact/rmauer or call 257-4345.

ONLINE: Read transcripts of conversations between Kott and ex-Veco executives. The documents contain coarse language. Also, check out video and audio surveillance evidence from the trial of former Rep. Tom Anderson.

adn.com/corruption

LOAD-DATE: September 6, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: BILL ROTH / Anchorage Daily News
Former Rep. Pete Kott, center, flanked by attorneys, leaves the coffee shop in the Federal Building and U.S. Courthouse in Anchorage during a pause in his corruption trial on Wednesday. The bribery, extortion, fraud and conspiracy case against Kott, the former House speaker, will go ahead with opening arguments scheduled now for Monday.
Former Rep, Bruce Weyhrauch was accompanied by his wife, LuAnn, in the Federal Building and U.S. Courthouse in Anchorage on Wednesday. His lawyer said Weyhrauch's day in court may be delayed for more than a year by the appeal.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1178

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 7, 2007 Friday
FINAL EDITION

Palin oil tax gets cold shoulder;
PPT: No special session needed, says the resource association head.

BYLINE: The Associated Press

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 459 words

DATELINE: FAIRBANKS -

The head of the Alaska Oil and Gas Association presented Gov. Sarah Palin with a long list of concerns regarding her new oil tax proposal.

Marilyn Crockett said this week that the proposal could decrease investment in the state by raising the tax burden on companies.

Crockett also said it would replace a tax that isn't broken and has not yet had a chance to work.

"The industry does not want to have a special session," she told members of the Alaska Support Industry Alliance at a luncheon in Fairbanks.

Other members of the oil and gas association, which include Exxon Mobil, BP and Conoco Phillips, also expressed their reservations about Palin's proposal.

"We agree with the governor's approach to stay with a PPT-based tax structure; however, we are concerned that the tax rates proposed will make every single project look less attractive for us to reinvest," Kevin Mitchell, vice president of finance and administration for Conoco Phillips, wrote in an e-mail to the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner.

Palin this week restated her intention to call a special legislative session next month to revisit the oil production tax passed last summer. She also presented an outline for a new tax that would increase the tax rate.

Palin said the current petroleum profits tax, or PPT, "isn't working as promised."

Revenue Commissioner Pat Galvin has said that revenues from the PPT will likely come in a little short of expectations in the fiscal year that just ended and very short of expectations next year.

FBI - Stevens-1179

Instead of bringing in an additional $1 billion over the old tax system, the PPT will likely bring in about $250 million more in fiscal year 2008, according to department figures.

Crockett pointed to fiscal year 2007, in which the new tax is expected to add about $1 billion in state revenues over the old tax.

"Is PPT working? I would say that it is," she said.

Galvin said Wednesday that cost increases faced by the companies explain the reduced revenue estimates.

Capital costs are now expected to be about 50 percent higher in fiscal year 2007 than was thought when the PPT was passed, and about 100 percent higher in fiscal year 2008, he said.

194A-AN-13620-M;516

The PPT allows companies to deduct operating and capital costs and receive credits on certain capital costs.

Crockett encouraged the state to look at how to encourage companies to invest in the state and keep production levels up, ensuring future tax revenues as well as revenues from royalties and property and corporate taxes.

"What we need to be focusing on is keeping that pipeline full," she said.

Oil production has dropped from a peak of more than 2 million barrels a day to less than 800,000 barrels a day, she said, and maintaining production levels will require significant new investment.

LOAD-DATE: September 7, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: WIRE

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1180

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 8, 2007 Saturday
FINAL EDITION

Picking a jury is art, not science;
KOTT: Certain qualities sought in jurors for ex-lawmaker's trial.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 722 words

When lawyers picked a jury on Friday to hear the public corruption trial of former state Rep. Pete Kott, they really were deciding who they didn't want on the case.

That's the way it is in jury selection. Prosecutors and defense lawyers rule out who they don't want in a process that's more art than science. At the end of the process, the ones left decide guilt or innocence. To hear Kott's case, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick swore in a jury of 10 women and two men, plus four alternates, just before noon, then sent them home for the weekend.

Those picked include a custodian at Stevens International Airport, a refinery worker from the Kenai Peninsula, and a recent high school graduate who works at Title Wave Books in Anchorage. There's a nurse and a retired teacher; a state health program manager and a state right of way agent.

Eight of the 12 regular jurors live in Anchorage. One is from Eagle River, which Kott represented in the Legislature. One is from Nikiski, another from Kenai. The last is from Kodiak and has a talk show on public radio there.

When it came to excluding potential jurors, prosecutors bumped six, including a Teamster's clerk and an Anchorage real estate agent. The defense didn't want an IRS agent or a former federal biologist, two of the 11 it struck from the pool.

The federal prosecutors trying the case wouldn't talk about how they made their picks.

Defense lawyer Jim Wendt said he was looking for jurors who seemed open as they answered questions posed by Sedwick and the lawyers.

Jury selection stretched over three days. Much of the time was spent questioning jurors one by one on whether they had been influenced by extensive publicity about the corruption investigation.

Many lawyers say that who is on the jury matters immensely.

FBI - Stevens-1181

Lawyers must try to figure out what potential jurors are really like, based on very little information. They may pick people based on basic categories such as gender, job, education or age. Some go through great efforts -- polling the community or hiring body language experts. But in the end, jurors aren't easy to predict.

"Except at the outer fringes, I really think that people are more complicated and more layered and more like onions than we tend to assume," said Jeff Feldman, an Anchorage criminal defense lawyer who has picked hundreds of jurors over more than three decades.

He remembers one juror who scowled at him throughout the trial, but ended up voting his client's way.

"The more I've done it, the less I know about how it really happens," Feldman said.

What most lawyers do, whether they know it or not, is look for jurors who trigger a certain feeling. "smile at you, who don't give a bad vibe," he said.

194A-AN-13620-M ; 517

As prospective jurors in the Kott case filed into theater-like rows of chairs, the lawyers studied their faces.

"We're looking for people that we like. We're looking for people that we don't have to prod to answer questions," Wendt said during a break in the selection process earlier this week. But, he said, he wasn't looking for any particular type in terms of age, gender or background.

Dan Hickey, a former chief prosecutor for the state, said prosecutors want people used to making decisions, people who seem conservative. Business people are good.

Defense lawyers look for people more understanding of human nature. High school teachers especially are thought of as being good because they put up with so much, said Hickey, who led the team that prosecuted two state senators in the 1980s on corruption charges.

The prosecution also wants a strong leader or two, someone who can guide the others through the evidence during deliberations. But not more. "That's a recipe for a hung jury," Hickey said.

Kott is accused of taking bribes from and conspiring with executives of oil field services company Veco Corp. Prosecutors accuse him of pushing a version of a new oil tax favored by Veco through the Legislature.

Opening arguments in the federal case will take place Monday morning.

Among the expected government witnesses: former Veco chief executive Bill Allen and vice president Rick Smith. Based on a rough schedule provided by prosecutors, Wendt said he anticipates Smith taking the stand Wednesday at the earliest, and Allen to follow.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

LOAD-DATE: September 11, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1182

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 8, 2007 Saturday
FINAL EDITION

Oil firm Veco is history;
SIGN COMES DOWN: Company was linked to corruption probe.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

FBI - Stevens-1183

LENGTH: 742 words

Colorado-based CH2M Hill on Friday took over scandal-ridden Veco Corp., the Anchorage oil field services and construction company whose former executives pleaded guilty this spring to bribing state legislators.

CH2M Hill decided not to keep the name Veco for what is now a part of the Colorado firm's energy systems group, and cranes removed Veco signs from the company's East 36th Avenue offices Friday afternoon

The former Veco businesses will generally operate under the CH2M Hill name .

"It's a new day, a new future," said CH2M Hill spokesman John Corsi.

Veco had been one of the largest companies in Alaska with about 2,000 employees in the state and a similar number in operations that span the globe.

Corsi said the purchase includes all core operations, people and projects from the former Veco. CH2M Hill said it did not have a breakdown Friday on what was not included in the sale. But Corsi described the assets left on the table as minimal.

"The short answer is essentially all the operational assets are coming, such as the North Slope, Kenai Peninsula, the fabrication shops, Calgary, Bellingham and so on," Corsi said in an e-mail. "There are some non-core businesses that aren't included. However, the last couple days have been so busy getting the deal done, I just don't have those details right now."

Corsi said the Veco assets were valued at $463 million. The final tally of the sale will come in at slightly less than that, he said.

One former Veco operation not part of the sale is the Voice of the Times, the Web site successor to the conservative half-page editorial section that appeared in the Daily News for 15 years. The site will continue as part of a holding company owned by the Allen family but hopes to become a financially self-sufficient operation, according to Voice of the Times editor Tom Brennan.

Veco's former chief executive Bill Allen and former vice president Rick Smith pleaded guilty to federal conspiracy and bribery in the ongoing political corruption investigation in Alaska. Allen, who helped build Veco starting in 1969, admitted to bribing state lawmakers for their votes or influence on legislation important to the oil industry.

Tammy Kerrigan, Allen's daughter, took over as Veco chairwoman in May after her father pleaded guilty and stepped down from his corporate posts.

"The Allen family is pleased that Veco's legacy of hard work, client service and professional excellence will continue with this acquisition," Kerrigan said in a news release. She is leaving the company. Garry Higdem, a CH2M Hill executive, will lead the former Veco.

CH2M Hill, based in the Denver suburb of Englewood, is an employee-owned company. It has about 19,000 workers engaged in engineering, construction, transportation and environmental services projects around the world. Projects include managing expansion of the Panama Canal and venue construction for the 2012 London Olympic games. The company had revenues of about $4.5 billion last year.

194A-AN-13620-M-518

Corsi said buying Veco fits in with his company's strategic plan by making it a bigger global player in energy industries. He said CH2M Hill has long been interested in Veco.

"The people are great, the reputation is great, they have an outstanding track record for client service," he said.

He said CH2M Hill will keep the former Veco's operations going pretty much as they have been. There are no shake-ups in management or elsewhere in the company planned., Corsi said.

Veco is heavily involved in oil field services and construction on the North Slope, and also has projects in the Lower 48, Canada, Barbados, Russia's Sakhalin Island and the Middle East. The company had annual revenue reaching $1 billion, according to Veco executives.

BP, which operates Prudhoe Bay, is one of Veco's major customers.

"They do a good job supporting oil production and we're looking forward to continuing our strong relationship," said Daren Beaudo, a spokesman for BP Alaska.

Corsi said Veco's existing contracts are expected to continue under CH2M Hill. That includes a contract with the National Science Foundation to provide logistics and support for polar research. The FBI is investigating the award of that contract and is looking into connections between Veco and U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens. Then-Veco chief executive Allen in 2000 oversaw renovations to Stevens' Girdwood home, the scene of a July 30 FBI raid.

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham

LOAD-DATE: September 11, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Photos by MARC LESTER / Anchorage Daily News
A Veco sign is removed by a crew from Glacier Sign and Lighting from the building at 949 E. 36th Ave. on Friday afternoon. CH2M Hill announced Friday that its acquisition of Veco was finalized.
A crowd gathers outside the former Veco building to watch the Veco signs being removed Friday.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1184

2 of 2 DOCUMENTS

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 11, 2007 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

FBI - Stevens-1185

Bribe trial features Kott calls;
TESTIMONY BEGINS: Public betrayed, prosecutor says; defense touts pipeline effort.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1214 words

In a series of secretly recorded telephone calls, former state Rep. Pete Kott joked with Veco executives about drinking and women, but assured them he was serious about one thing: getting a gas pipeline.

"I'm going to get this f-----g gas line done so I can get out of here," Kott told former Veco chief executive Bill Allen in a Jan. 10, 2006, cell phone conversation.

Testimony began Monday in Kott's public corruption trial.

Jurors heard recordings of nine telephone calls and watched one videotaped meeting between Allen and former Veco vice president Rick Smith.

In his opening statement, prosecutor Nicholas Marsh told jurors that Kott betrayed the public trust and sold his legislative office to oil field services company Veco. In return for money and job promises, he pushed an oil tax favored by the industry.

Kott even says on one of the tapes, "I sold my soul to the devil," Marsh said.

Kott's own words will be used against him, Marsh said. It's the same tactic prosecutors used to convict former Rep. Tom Anderson in July of seven federal corruption charges.

But the defense told jurors the government twisted the facts. Kott was just a blue collar Republican working hard to get what most Alaskans wanted, a gas pipeline, said Jim Wendt, one of Kott's defense lawyers.

There's nothing illegal about working with lobbyists or others toward a shared goal, and that's all Kott was doing, Wendt said. "If he is guilty of anything, he is guilty of working to get a pipeline."

Marsh warned jurors they would hear "downright offensive" language. But Wendt said it was just "down-to-earth talk."

An FBI agent from Cincinnati, Steve Dunphy, who monitored and recorded some of the action in Suite 604 of Juneau's Baranof hotel, testified all afternoon about various recordings. Dunphy said he volunteered after a request for help with the Alaska investigation went out agencywide.

The listening began with a wiretap on Smith's cell phone in September 2005 and branched out from there to wiretaps on Allen's cell and home phones, and then the bug planted in the Baranof suite, Dunphy testified.

In various phone calls played for the jury, Kott's familiarity with Allen and Smith is remarkable. He calls them Uncle Bill and Uncle Rick. He sounds tipsy at times. Several times, Kott brings up the idea of working as warden at a prison in Barbados that Veco was building.

"I just wanna be a warden," Kott tells Smith in a Sept. 29, 2005, telephone call.

194A-AN-1362D-M; 519

Wendt told jurors in his opening statement that the Barbados prison gig was a running joke with Kott, that he had heard about topless women on beaches there. But Marsh told jurors that even if Kott was kidding about the warden's post, he clearly wanted a job with Veco when his work in the Legislature was done.

As the 2006 legislative session got under way, Kott fretted to Allen on the phone that things weren't going well and Allen needed to get to Juneau.

Allen made it clear that he thought little of House Speaker John Harris, who won the post in 2005 after Kott was ousted in an internal coup.

"About the only ones that I can trust is you and ol' Ben Stevens," Allen tells Kott in a Jan. 10, 2006 call. Stevens is the former state Senate president. He hasn't been charged.

In one lengthy call between Allen and Smith on Feb. 20, 2006, Allen goes on a tirade about Veco's new young lobbyist, Kris Knauss. Allen was angry that Knauss was using Allen's own well-cultivated influence with Kott as if it were his own, turning it to his advantage with Gov. Frank Murkowski's chief of staff, Jim Clark.

"Well f---. I put more money into Pete Kott than he's ever even thought about," Allen sputtered at one point.

In a March 4, 2006, videotaped conversation in Suite 604, Allen and Smith said they would do whatever they needed to get the pipeline and an oil tax favored by the industry through the Legislature. Smith said they may need to "get dirty."

The room is dimly lit and it's hard to make out their faces. But their voices are clear.

"They got dirty and they crossed the line," Marsh told jurors.

Later in the conversation -- in a part not played in court but discussed by lawyers and the judge -- the topic turned to a faltering effort at the time to sell Veco to an Australian firm. Allen was upset because former Veco president Pete Leathard had apparently boasted to the Australians that Veco was in the business of bribing state legislators.

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick agreed with prosecutors that only a portion of the conversation needed to be played for jurors.

In the same conversation, Allen told Smith that Veco's clients need to know what it's doing in Juneau to pressure legislators. He refers to "the big wheels" with BP and Exxon and more.

The case against Kott is the first to go to trial involving Veco, a company that was hugely influential in Juneau for many years. Allen and Smith have both pleaded guilty to bribery and other charges and resigned their positions with Veco.

As of Friday, Veco no longer exists. It's been sold to the Colorado-based engineering firm CH2M Hill.

Kott, a former house speaker from Eagle River who served 14 years in the Legislature, is being tried on charges of bribery, conspiracy, extortion and wire fraud.

Several dozen people gathered in the federal courtroom for opening statements, including defense lawyers, prosecutors, FBI agents and news reporters, but the crowd cleared out by the afternoon. Whistleblower Ray Metcalfe stayed.

FBI - Stevens-1186

Marsh told jurors that Kott, who ran a hardwood flooring business, is accused of accepting money or things of value three times from Veco executives, plus the promise of a job. The specific accusations, as laid out by Marsh:

* Kott, in need of cash during his 2006 campaign, sent Allen a fake bill for an extra $7,993 in flooring work.

* Veco paid $2,750 for a political poll by David Dittman to see how Kott was faring with voters during the campaign. Kott lost in the primary.

* Kott accepted $1,000 from Allen to reimburse Kott for a contribution he made to then-Gov. Frank Murkowski's re-election bid.

All of that is misconstrued or overblown, Wendt told jurors. Kott received no personal benefit from any of it, the defense lawyer said. He didn't even know about the poll beforehand.

The only thing Kott did wrong was accept the $1,000, but that was just to reimburse him for the contribution, Wendt said.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

AUDIO: Listen to the opening statements from Kott's trial at

adn.com/corruption

The trial of former Eagle River Rep. Pete Kott is part of a broad investigation into public corruption focused on state and federal officials, lobbyists and others. The investigation is being led by the FBI and Department of Justice and has resulted in charges against four former state legislators, two former executives of the Veco Corp., and a lobbyist for a private prison company.

Kott is charged with bribery, conspiracy, extortion and wire fraud for taking money and the promise of a job from Veco executives for supporting an oil tax measure favored by the petroleum industry.

For more on the corruption investigation, including an interactive timeline and overview, go online to adn.com/news/politics/fbi.

The Alaska political corruption investigation

LOAD-DATE: September 11, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Kott
BILL ROTH / Anchorage Daily News
Former House Speaker Pete Kott, left, arrives at the Federal Building and U.S. Courthouse on Monday morning with daughter Pamela Kott on the first day of his trial for bribery, extortion, fraud and conspiracy.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1187

<<Back

Anderson wants sentencing delayed

by Jason Moore
Wednesday, Sept. 12, 2007

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- Former lawmaker Tom Anderson, already convicted on bribery and corruption charges, wants to change the day he gets sentenced.

Anderson says he wants his wife, Sen. Lesil McGuire, to be there.

She plans to be out of the country during the first part of October and then in Juneau in time for the start of the special session on the state's oil tax rate.

Anderson wants his sentencing pushed back about two weeks from its Oct. 2 date in order to accommodate her schedule.

All content © Copyright 2000 - 2007 WorldNow and KTUU. All Rights Reserved.
For more information on this site, please read our Privacy Policy and Terms of Service.

FBI - Stevens-1188

194A-AN-13620-m;520

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 12, 2007 Wednesday
FINAL EDITION

FBI - Stevens-1189

Marrs calls suit misguided;
TRIAL: John Ellsworth is accused of misusing millions of dollars.

BYLINE: By ELIZABETH BLUEMINK ebluemink@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 818 words

The former chief executive of Cook Inlet Region Inc. took the witness stand in state court this week to defend an Anchorage contractor accused of illegally taking $40 million from the Native corporation.

Carl Marrs, the former CIRI executive, is a key defense witness for the contractor, John Ellsworth, targeted in the lawsuit filed by the new leaders who took over CIRI, along with its business partner, Nabors Industries of Houston.

Marrs and Ellsworth worked on business deals for about a decade and along the way became close friends -- sharing gifts, drinks and vacations. Ellsworth was his best man at his wedding in 2002, Marrs testified.

The lawsuit against Ellsworth, which lumbered into its seventh week on Monday, has been a costly priority for CIRI's leaders. The Anchorage-based corporation spent more than $2 million just to audit Ellsworth's financial transactions.

CIRI launched the lawsuit -- and some other house-cleaning projects -- after a new set of directors took charge of the company in 2004. Among other things, the new board has demanded a tight rein on lavish spending and risky investments.

The lawsuit, filed in 2005, may even have broader implications beyond CIRI and Nabors' alleged financial losses.

Late last year, federal prosecutors -- simultaneously involved in a political corruption investigation of Alaska politicians -- subpoenaed some of the evidence collected against Ellsworth.

On Monday and Tuesday, plaintiff and defense attorneys quizzed Marrs about his own conduct at CIRI, and his relationship with Ellsworth.

Marrs testified that the lawsuit is misguided, saying that Ellsworth was a reliable business partner and a trusted friend.

But CIRI and Nabors say Ellsworth took millions of dollars he did not deserve, violated corporate agreements and shredded evidence at the construction company they hired him to run, Alaska Interstate Construction.

Ellsworth is countersuing for millions. Among other things, he wants CIRI and Nabors to fork over the money compensating him for his ownership stake in AIC. He's also seeking punitive damages.

CIRI and Nabors each had a 40 percent stake in AIC. When he was ousted in 2005, Ellsworth had a 20 percent stake in AIC -- worth nearly $12 million, according to his attorneys.

Confronted with evidence that Ellsworth overbilled AIC for corporate jet expenses, Marrs told the jury that the charges -- paid to Ellsworth's own company, which leased jets and other equipment -- didn't seem excessive to him.

Ellsworth was given the freedom from CIRI and Nabors to manage AIC "as he saw fit," and as a result, made millions for the two companies, Marrs said. Under Ellsworth, AIC was one of CIRI's most profitable investments, he said.

194A-AN-13620-M:521

An audit by CIRI and Nabors alleges about $40 million in overbilled jet expenses, lost profits from an abandoned Exxon Mobil project in Russia, lost contracts due to illegal competition by Ellsworth after he was terminated, undeserved bonuses, personal credit card charges and other inappropriate costs billed to AIC.

Under cross-examination, Marrs said he never read AIC's business contracts or even its operating agreement -- the basic document that set out how AIC would be governed, and which he himself signed. Sometimes, Marrs testified, he changed contracts by oral agreement with Ellsworth but never put the changes in writing, as the contracts themselves required

Marrs trusted Ellsworth not to hide anything from him, and still does, he testified.

But on Monday and Tuesday, Tim Petumenos, an attorney for CIRI and Nabors, questioned Marrs' loyalty to CIRI. The attorney pointed out that Marrs was supposed to ensure that Ellsworth complied with his duties at AIC.

"I never even perceived the situation that we are in right now," Marrs testified.

"I've always been loyal to CIRI," he added later.

Though he said he hasn't read CIRI and Nabors' audit, Marrs told jurors that he believes that Ellsworth's expensive leases for corporate jets were justified.

Other items -- such as a company-paid ticket to the Superbowl for Randy Pugh, the father of one of Sen. Lisa Murkowski's former staffers -- were legitimate business expenses, he said.

He testified repeatedly that such expenses -- including trips on corporate jets for Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, and Murkowski, plus AIC-paid trips by Stevens and other politicians, friends and family to a Bristol Bay fishing lodge -- were justified because they help build important relationships.

"You've got to have those relationships to deal in business. It's not just about going out and bidding on contracts. ... You do have to wine and dine people," Marrs said.

After a news query this year about Stevens' stays at the lodge -- a possible Senate ethics breach -- the senator sent checks to CIRI for his 2001 and 2003 expenses at the lodge.

Find Elizabeth Bluemink online at adn.com/contact/ebluemink or call 257-4317.

LOAD-DATE: September 12, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Photos by BILL ROTH / Anchorage Daily News
Former CIRI chief executive Carl Marrs testified Monday that he gave free rein to ousted Alaska Interstate Construction executive John Ellsworth to run AIC as he saw fit; new Native corporation leaders say Ellsworth threw away $40 million on extravagance and improper expenses.
Defendant John Ellsworth, left, listens to his attorney Paul Stockler as he questions former CIRI chief executive Carl Marrs on Monday. Defense attorney Joseph Sheehan is seated at right.
Anchorage Superior Court Judge Sen Tan presides over the $40 million lawsuit CIRI and partner Nabors Industries of Houston are pursuing against contractor John Ellsworth.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

FBI - Stevens-1190

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

2 of 2 DOCUMENTS

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 13, 2007 Thursday
FINAL EDITION

Allen counted on friend;
He testifies that he gave money, favors to oil-tax ally in Juneau

BYLINE: By RICHARD MAUER and LISA DEMER Anchorage Daily News

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1266 words

More than a year after he emerged as the central figure in the Alaska corruption investigation, former Veco chairman Bill Allen at last took the witness stand Wednesday in the trial of former House speaker Pete Kott and began recounting his version of the last three decades of oil politics.

Along the way Allen, the government's chief witness, told of the money, jobs and favors he dispensed to Kott, a man he described as a friend and reliable ally but who could wind up in prison on Allen's testimony.

As word of Allen's impending visit to the courtroom got around town at lunchtime, the federal courtroom of U.S. District Judge John Sedwick began to fill, eventually drawing more than 60 people. Some were lawyers or paralegals working for other potential defendants or witnesses. The back row held gray-haired remnants of the liberal Democrats who flexed so much power in Juneau in the 1970s before oil-friendly Republicans made them largely irrelevant, while up front sat a conservative talk show host who fought Veco's efforts a few years back to pay for government out of the Permanent Fund. Other spectators just wanted a glimpse of history.

But the real business of the day was what Allen told the jury about Kott, a 14-year veteran of the state House from Eagle River. Allen and one of his vice presidents, Rick Smith, pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy and are hoping to get reduced sentences by cooperating with federal authorities.

Over nearly three hours of testimony that will resume this morning, Allen talked about overpaying a flooring job done by Kott by more than $7,000 and of scheming to get at least some of that money to Kott's son so that he could work on Kott's 2006 campaign, when a poll showed he was in surprising trouble. Even the poll itself was secretly paid for by Veco, which if true would be a hidden -- and illegal -- campaign contribution by the company to Kott.

"Why were you trying to get money to Pete Kott for his son's help in the campaign?" asked assistant U.S. Attorney James Goeke.

"He was going to run again and he needed his son to help him," Allen said.

FBI - Stevens-1191

"What would his son be doing otherwise?" asked Goeke.

"A job," Allen said. "He can do the floors as good as Pete."

"So back on July 31, 2006, do you know if Mr. Kott was going to be able to go to work on the campaign and do other work?" continued Goeke.

"He couldn't afford it," said Allen. "He has a family to take care of."

Before announcing he would run again, Kott had been making noises about retiring and had talked with Allen about work. Some of those conversations were recorded by the FBI.

In one such, on June 1, 2006, Kott joked with Allen that he wanted to be warden of the prison Veco was building in Barbados, "especially with all the women there on the beach." He said he'd do anything, even pass out beach towels.

194A-AN-13620-M ;522

Allen testified that he knew Kott was joking about that. But Kott also said on the recording that he wanted to be a lobbyist.

"For Veco?" Goeke asked in court Wednesday.

"Yes," Allen answered.

Veco lobbyists made $6,000 to $12,000 a month, Allen testified. And he would have hired Kott, he said.

But even as he provided the evidence about Kott, and along the way implicated his own company and its executives in an illegal campaign contribution scam, Allen never once acknowledged that a specific action by him or Kott broke the law.

While Allen, 70, has never been shy about appearing at public events and private fundraisers over the last quarter century as his political power grew, he has only rarely engaged in public speaking. His speech has been impaired since 2001 when, riding without a helmet, he crashed his motorcycle. On the witness stand, he said about a quarter of the part of his brain that controls speech died after the accident, and, like some stroke victims, he has trouble picking out words. He also has trouble hearing, and a court headset he wore while testifying proved balky at times.

At one point, he started to describe what the oil companies wanted most out of Juneau, then had to pause.

"Wait, I got to find this word," he said. He closed his eyes, put his head in his hands and worked something over in his mind for what seemed a small eternity while the courtroom, in silence, waited for him to speak.

"Certainty!" he finally exclaimed. "They wanted certainty." In other words, they wanted to be sure that taxes would not be raised before they would agree to build a natural gas pipeline, the thrust of the efforts on the so-called PPT -- petroleum profits tax -- that tied the 2006 Legislature in knots.

Allen took the industry lead in promoting a low profits tax -- a much bigger effort than the producers themselves were making. FBI-intercepted telephone calls and conversations at a hotel suite in Juneau show that Kott and Senate President Ben Stevens were his two most helpful soldiers.

In one conversation from June 8, 2006, played while Allen was on the stand, he recalled a discussion he had with the head of Conoco Phillips in Alaska, Jim Bowles, about the profits tax.

"I said between Pete Kott and Ben ... they won't have, they won't even have their fingerprints on the (bill)." It seemed Allen was referring to the "fingerprints" of the producers, but his remarks were ambiguous enough that they could have been those of Stevens and Kott.

As the tapes were played, Allen testified he had no idea that his phones were taped or that a secret camera had been placed in his hotel suite in Juneau by the FBI under a court order.

"If I knew that, I wouldn't have said all this stuff," Allen said, drawing smiles from the jury and chuckles around the courtroom. He learned he was the target of the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section on Aug. 30, 2006 -- a day before the FBI executed a series of raids on legislative offices.

Allen emerged as one of the industry's biggest promoters in the 1980s, when Veco began a long run as a reliable source of campaign contributions, mainly for Republicans. At the time, Allen testified, his main political hand was the former state senator and trooper head Ed Dankworth, sometimes referred to as the "21st Senator" for his efforts at organizing the Senate into blocs long after he left the body.

Allen said he and Dankworth had a thorough falling-out after he bought the Anchorage Times in 1989. One of his biggest financial supporters in his journalism venture was Chuck Robinson, the long-time executive of the telephone company ACS, Allen said. Dankworth lobbied for ACS' chief rival, GCI, and Dankworth refused Allen's pleas to switch.

"If you can't do that, Dankworth, I don't want you to be with me," Allen recalled telling his onetime friend.

Allen was born in Socorro, N.M., and left for Oregon with his family shortly after World War II, when he was 8 or 9. He missed several years of school while his family followed the fruit crops.

"We were pickers, I guess."

He quit school for good as a high school sophomore, then learned to weld, a skill that brought him to Alaska in 1968. With another oil field worker named Wayne Velti, who founded VE Construction, he worked the Cook Inlet rigs for Arco, eventually taking over the company and shortening its name. In the last few years, it had annual sales of $1 billion and 4,000 employees worldwide, about half in Alaska, he said. Last week, the company was taken over by CH2M Hill.

Find Richard Mauer at adn.com/contact/rmauer or call 257-4345. Find Lisa Demer at adn.com/contact/ldemer or 257-4390.

ONLINE AUDIO: Listen to surveillance recordings submitted as evidence in the Pete Kott trial at adn.com/fbi

LOAD-DATE: September 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: BILL ROTH / Anchorage Daily News
Ex-Veco chief Bill Allen walks outside the federal building courtroom during Pete Kott's trial Wednesday, where he spent the better part of three hours outlining his working relationship with the then-state representative.
AL GRILLO / The Associated Press
Former Alaska state House Speaker Pete Kott, right, walks through the federal court building past a row of green lights in Anchorage on Wednesday with his daughter, Pam Kott.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1193

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 14, 2007 Friday
FINAL EDITION

Kott trial defense emerges;
BILL ALLEN: Ex-Veco chief says he bribed the defendant, Kohring and Ben Stevens.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER and SEAN COCKERHAM Anchorage Daily News

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1217 words

For much of Thursday at Pete Kott's corruption trial, defense lawyer Jim Wendt tried to chip away at the story being told from the witness chair by former Veco chief executive Bill Allen.

Kott, a Republican and former House speaker from Eagle River, is accused of pushing new oil tax legislation on behalf of Veco that was also favored by North Slope oil producers. In exchange, prosecutors say he got nearly $9,000, a political poll and the promise of a job.

Wendt kept pushing to get him to say Allen's promise of a job didn't really mean much or that the money Veco executives gave to Kott was legitimate.

Allen, 70, though weary and showing the strain at times after two days on the stand, didn't go along with the defense.

He is a key prosecution witness in the trial of Kott, a man whom Allen called a close friend, almost like family.

Allen told jurors he already has admitted his guilt in a conspiracy. He testified that he pleaded guilty to bribing three former legislators: "Pete Kott, Vic Kohring and Ben Stevens."

Kohring, a Republican from Wasilla who served in the House, is awaiting trial. Stevens, a Republican and former Senate president from Anchorage, hasn't been charged. Allen didn't mention a fourth legislator, former state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, whose corruption case was split from Kott's just before the trial began.

Allen testified that he didn't always tell FBI agents who were investigating corruption among legislators what they wanted to hear, but it was the truth.

"I worked real hard trying to make the truth and everything ... to be fair," Allen said.

Allen said that he expected to be sentenced to 10 to 11 years in prison but that no promises had been made. "Whatever happens to me happens."

He was confronted by FBI agents on Aug. 30, 2006, while going to breakfast with Sen. Fred Dyson, who unknown to Allen was helping in the investigation.

Allen said he agreed to cooperate to save his three grown children from being indicted and to spare Veco, which he built from its roots on Cook Inlet rigs to an international company with more than 4,000 employees. Veco was sold last week to CH2M Hill.

From the FBI headquarters in downtown Anchorage that first day, Allen called Kott. The FBI, which was recording the call without Kott's knowledge, wanted to know more about a $7,993 payment from Allen that apparently was destined for Kott's son.

Prosecutors say the money was paid to Kott through an inflated invoice from his hardwood flooring company.

"Have you got your son took care of?" Allen asked Kott in the call, which earlier had been played for jurors.

Yeah, Kott answered.

"Did Rick get it done for you?" Allen asked, referring to former Veco vice president Rick Smith, who also has pleaded guilty to bribery and other charges.

Yeah, yeah, Kott answered.

"How did he do it or -- can you tell me?" Allen went on.

Kott reminded Allen that it was his check.

"Remember we talked about three, four or five weeks ago just add on X amount -- I forgot what it was exactly -- to your bill or something," Kott told him.

Prosecutors have played dozens of secretly made recordings for jurors that expose crude language, drinking and political deal making in which, they say, Kott was corrupted by Allen and Smith.

On Thursday, defense lawyer Wendt asked Allen if the $7,900 was an advance for future flooring work, not a bribe.

Allen said he didn't know anything about any future work. The money, he said, was for Kott's son, Peter Jr., to take time off from the flooring business and help out on his father's campaign.

The defense appeared to score a point when Wendt pressed Allen on whether he had offered Kott a lobbying job "with Veco."

Allen said in at least one of the recorded conversations that Kott would be a lobbyist. But when Wendt asked him to find on the transcript where he specifically promised that Kott would be a lobbyist for Veco, he couldn't.

"In my mind I told him he would be a lobbyist with Veco," Allen said, adding he believed that was Kott's understanding as well. Another issue concerns $1,000 cash that Allen handed to Kott in Suite 604 of Juneau's Baranof Hotel. Many of the recordings were made there.

Wendt asked Allen if that wasn't just reimbursing Kott for money he had contributed to Gov. Frank Murkowski's campaign.

Allen said he didn't owe Kott anything for that. But Wendt repeatedly asked if the $1,000 was payback for the contribution.

"Yeah, but he didn't ask for it. I just gave it to him ... goddamn," a frustrated Allen said on the witness stand.

Wendt contends Kott didn't always do Veco's bidding and was on the opposite side of matters such as workers' compensation.

But Allen testified he didn't remember if there was ever any issue where he and Kott split.

Allen said he was friendly with a few legislators, all Anchorage Republicans, including Stevens and state Reps. Mike Hawker and Norm Rokeberg.

FBI - Stevens-1195

He was especially close only to Kott and state Sen. John Cowdery, he said.

Kott was a drinking buddy who lived with him for a few months in 2005 to be closer to flooring jobs, Allen said. He related to Cowdery because both were contractors -- Cowdery used to run an excavation business -- and liked to talk shop.

Both regularly showed up at his downtown Anchorage home unannounced. He welcomed it. Cowdery would say "I'm at the front door," Allen told jurors.

Wendt asked Allen about Veco's hiring of legislators as consultants. Allen talked about two, Stevens, and former state Rep. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage. Anderson was convicted in July of seven federal charges in another corruption case, but the allegations didn't involve Veco.

Allen said another executive hired Anderson and he only found out later.

"He was supposed to be like a lawyer," Allen said. But he admitted "I don't know why we really hired him."

Allen told jurors he talked with Kott about eventually going to work for Veco -- but after he was out of office. He said Veco shouldn't hire sitting legislators and it shouldn't have happened with Anderson.

As to Stevens, he started consulting for Veco in 1995, six years before he was appointed to the Senate, Allen said. "He was real good at details. He was like Pete. He would work," Allen said.

By the time Stevens was in the Senate, he had four kids, Allen noted. "How am I supposed to say 'now that you're a senator, Ben, I can't give you more money,' " Allen testified. "I couldn't do that."

One strange moment happened at the end of Friday's testimony. Wendt asked Allen if he had threatened to have his nephew, Dave Anderson, killed for being "involved in blackmail." Allen said there was blackmail but that he never threatened to have his nephew murdered.

"I told him I'd kick the s--- out of him," Allen said on the witness stand.

The trial resumes today with Allen still on the stand. Smith also is expected to testify.

The trial is expected to take much of next week.

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call 257-2344. Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

ONLINE AUDIO: Listen to FBI wiretaps being submitted as evidence and court testimony from ex-Veco CEO Bill Allen.

adn.com/fbi

TRIAL UPDATES: Visit our political blog for the latest from the courtroom. court testimony from ex-Veco CEO Bill Allen.

adn.com/alaskapolitics

LOAD-DATE: September 14, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Dyson

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

FBI - Stevens-1196

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

ANCHORAGE

Anderson's sentencing is delayed

The sentencing of former state Rep. Tom Anderson on federal corruption charges has been delayed until Oct. 15.

Anderson's attorney, Paul Stockler, requested the date be moved from Oct. 2 so Anderson's wife, state Sen. Lesil McGuire could attend. She is to be out of the country for a private organization, the motion to the judge said. She also didn't want the sentencing to occur during an upcoming special legislative session on oil taxes, set to begin Oct. 18 in Juneau.

Anderson was convicted in July of seven felonies including bribery, extortion and money laundering.

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick approved the delay this week. The sentencing will begin at 10 a.m.

-- Anchorage Daily News
9/15/2007
SEC. B-3

FBI - Stevens-1197

194 A-AN-13620-m ; 524

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 15, 2007 Saturday
FINAL EDITION

Old letter to editor gets juror removed from trial;
VECO MONEY BLASTED: The judge says he found it "very worrisome to me."

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A10

LENGTH: 367 words

A juror was dismissed Friday in the corruption trial of former state Rep. Pete Kott.

Defense lawyers told U.S. District Judge John Sedwick they had just come across a letter to the editor by juror Lisa Polito published in the Kodiak Daily Mirror on Oct. 30, 2006, that referred to Veco Corp. campaign contributions as "scandal-tainted money."

Kott is accused of taking bribes to do Veco's bidding in the Legislature.

In the letter, Polito criticized Kodiak Rep. Gabrielle LeDoux for failing to return campaign contributions from Veco. Polito was responding to a news story that had said LeDoux intended to give the money to charities after the election. Just a "guise of 'renouncing' the funds," Polito wrote.

Polito hosts a public radio show in Kodiak called "Talk of the Rock."

On Friday morning, defense lawyer Jim Wendt showed the letter to Sedwick before jurors were brought in.

"This is very worrisome to me," Sedwick said.

The issue of Polito's ability to be impartial had come up just the day before when she sent Sedwick a note revealing that her husband was a fisherman plaintiff in the Exxon Valdez oil spill lawsuit. She didn't remember about his involvement in the suit when the jury was being picked, and said it wasn't part of her daily life. Sedwick questioned her but decided she could remain on the jury.

Not so on Friday.

"It looks to me like she made up her mind, and not only made up her mind, failed to tell us about it," Sedwick said.

But Polito said she had thought of the letter as being about the campaign, not Veco. She said she mentioned during the jury selection process that she had written letters to the editor about political campaigns. She expected the lawyers to ask more about that, but they didn't.

In the letter, Polito said, her point was that LeDoux should return the Veco money "just for good measure, not that that was any kind of indictment on Veco."

Asked how she thought the trial was going, Polito said "slow." Tedious? "No, thorough."

Ultimately, "it wasn't far enough into it that I felt like either side had totally substantiated their claims in their opening remarks," Polito said.

FBI - Stevens-1198

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

194A-AN-13620-M; 525

LOAD-DATE: September 17, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1199

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 16, 2007 Sunday
FINAL EDITION

Ex-Veco VP has more to reveal;
Smith names bribe takers, to testify again Monday in trial of Pete Kott

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 1128 words

Witnesses in the corruption trial of former state Rep. Pete Kott have provided jarring testimony about secret dirty deals, payoffs to Kott, and the remodel of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens' Girdwood home.

Most of the revelations have come out through dozens of secretly made recordings of cell phone calls and meetings in Suite 604 of the Baranof Hotel, the Juneau headquarters of Veco Corp. when the Legislature was in session. Kott is charged with taking bribes from Veco executives and conspiring with them and others to pass a new oil tax favored by North Slope oil producers in 2006.

The trial wrapped up its eighth day Friday and continues Monday.

Highlights so far:

WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 5

Just before the trial begins, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick splits Kott's case from that of his co-defendant, former Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch of Juneau. The two had been scheduled to be tried together. The split allows Kott's case to move forward while the government appeals a ruling excluding key evidence against Weyhrauch.

Jury selection for Kott begins. A few dozen people in the pool of 120 were weeded out earlier because of hardships, biases or other reasons revealed in written questionnaires.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 6

The process of picking a jury continues. It's slow going with prospective jurors questioned one by one about what they already knew about the case through news reports.

SEPT. 7

FBI - Stevens-1200

Just before noon, a jury of 10 women and two men, plus four alternatives, is picked. Eight of the regular jurors are from Anchorage. One is from Eagle River, which Kott represented for 14 years in the House. Another is a public radio talk show host from Kodiak. She comes back into the story later.

MONDAY, SEPT. 10

Prosecutor Nicholas Marsh, from the U.S. Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, and defense attorney Jim Wendt outline their versions of the case in opening statements to the jury, and the government begins to introduce the FBI's secretly made recordings into evidence.

Marsh says that Kott had betrayed the public trust by pushing an oil tax favored by industry in exchange for money, a Veco-paid-for political poll and the promise of a job from the company. In one of the recordings, Marsh tells jurors, Kott says "I sold my soul to the devil."

194A-AN-13620-M; 526

Wendt tells jurors the government has twisted what happened. Kott was just a blue-collar Republican working hard to get what most Alaskans wanted: a natural gas pipeline. There's nothing illegal about teaming up with lobbyists, the oil industry or others to work for a common goal, Wendt says.

"About the only ones that I can trust is you and ol' Ben Stevens," former Veco chief executive Bill Allen says to Kott in one of the recordings played that day. Stevens is the former Senate president.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 11

The entire day, an FBI agent from Cincinnati is on the witness stand to provide background as prosecutors introduce many more recordings into evidence. The cell phone conversations and meetings in Suite 604 reveal a crude world of political deal-making that operated on the fringes of the Alaska Legislature.

After a key vote on the oil tax rate on May 7, 2006, Kott goes to Suite 604 to celebrate with Allen, former Veco vice president Rick Smith, and others. In a grainy video, they clink glasses and Kott boasts about how he got the votes. "I use 'em and abuse 'em," he says of his colleagues.

WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 12

The government plays more recordings in the morning and then Allen takes the witness stand. It's the first time he's talked publicly about his role in the corruption investigation since it burst into public view more than a year ago. The courtroom fills with spectators.

Under questioning by prosecutor James Goeke, Allen tells about a scheme to funnel nearly $8,000 to Kott for his son so his son could take off from work to help on Kott's re-election campaign.

Allen also explains that when Kott keeps talking about going to work as a warden for a prison that Veco was building in Barbados, it's just a running joke. But Veco's promise to give Kott a job as a lobbyist once he was out of the Legislature was real, Allen testifies.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 13

Allen remains on the witness stand all day. He tells jurors he has been cooperating with the FBI since Aug. 30, 2006, when he was confronted by agents while with Sen. Fred Dyson on the way to breakfast. On Aug. 31, teams of federal agents raided offices of six legislators around the state. Allen says he pleaded guilty to bribing three: Kott, former Rep. Vic Kohring and Stevens. He does not mention Weyhrauch. Much of the day, defense lawyer Wendt pushes Allen to say that what the government calls bribes weren't that at all. But Allen doesn't go along.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 14

The most startling moment of the trial comes when Allen reveals that he or Veco provided workers and material for the 2000 building project that doubled the size of Ted Stevens' residence in Girdwood. Wendt, still doing the cross-examination, was seeking to discredit Allen and downplay the role that Kott played in the scandal.

Later in the day, former Veco vice president Rick Smith takes the stand. He also testifies about whom he pleaded guilty to bribing: Kott, Kohring, Weyhrauch, Stevens and one more, Sen. John Cowdery. In Smith and Allen's charging documents, Cowdery is believed to be Senator A, a member of the conspiracy, though not among the group that was bribed.

Also on Friday, juror Lisa Polito of Kodiak is dismissed after the judge learns she wrote a letter to the editor in October 2006 that described Veco's campaign contributions as "scandal-tainted money." One of the alternates, a child-care worker from Anchorage, is moved to the panel of 12 regular jurors.

What's next: Smith continues on the stand Monday, followed by more government witnesses. The defense is expected to begin presenting its case on Tuesday. That's expected to last at least a couple of days.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

TRIAL AUDIO: You can follow the Kott trial online. We have audio clips from the first day of testimony from ex-Veco CEO Bill Allen and many of the FBI wiretap recordings entered into evidence, some with transcripts. We're adding more every day and will eventually have all of the evidence and testimony. You'll also find an overview of the larger corruption investigation and an interactive timeline, and you can read about key players in the case.

adn.com/fbi

STAY UP TO DATE: Read updates from the trial through the day each day the trial is in session on adn.com and on our politics blog

adn.com/alaskapolitics

WHERE'S IT LEAD? For an interactive overview of the corruption investigation go online to adn.com/fbi. Click on "Corruption investigation overview" at the top of the right column.

LOAD-DATE: September 18, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: ERIK HILL / Anchorage Daily News
Former House speaker Pete Kott, right, arrives on Friday morning with daughter Pamela Kott at the Federal Building and U.S. Courthouse for his trial for bribery, extortion, fraud and conspiracy.
AL GRILLO / The Associated Press
Bill Allen, the former head of oil field services company Veco Corp., right, walks back to court at the federal court house in Anchorage on Thursday, which was his second day of testimony in former state Rep. Pete Kott's corruption trial. Allen and Veco vice president Rick Smith pleaded guilty to extortion, conspiracy and bribery of legislators in May.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1202

Untitled

Paper: Anchorage Daily News (AK)
Title: Defense disputes Kohring's FBI chats -
EVIDENCE: His lawyer asks to stifle material from an office search.
CORRUPTION CASES IN TWO ANCHORAGE COURTROOMS
Date: September 18, 2007

A battle is being fought over evidence in the case against former Rep. Vic Kohring, but that's just one of the twists.

At issue: whether prosecutors can use materials seized and statements made by Kohring during the Aug. 31, 2006, search of his legislative office in Wasilla.

His lawyer, John Henry Browne of Seattle, says they didn't get anything incriminating, but he is still fighting to stifle everything from the search. Kohring, a Republican elected seven times, talked with FBI agents for hours that day.

One revelation came after the hearing. Browne told reporters that he intended to file a motion within the next two weeks to dismiss the charges based on what he called improper interference by state Sen. Fred Dyson, R-Eagle River.

Kohring's trial is set to begin Oct. 22. He is charged with conspiracy, extortion and bribery. He is accused of accepting money from Veco Corp. executives in order to push the company's interests on oil taxes and a natural gas pipeline.

According to an FBI report filed in court by his attorney, Kohring told agents:

* He had asked for money for himself personally and for his political campaigns from Veco executives Rick Smith and Bill Allen, and also asked Smith about borrowing or renting a truck. The campaign contributions were properly reported, he said.

* He told agents about regularly meeting and dining with lobbyists while the Legislature was in session. "He likes receiving free meals and drinks from lobbyists," the FBI summary of the Aug. 31 interview said.

* Kohring had a $2,700-a-month consulting contract with developer Marc Marlow but couldn't describe his specific duties.

* Earlier, Kohring had asked Allen if Veco would hire his nephew as an intern. Veco did so. Kohring told agents he thought it was a great benefit for an 18-year-old to be paid $16 an hour.

In another revelation, former Cornell Cos. consultant Frank Prewitt and former state Rep. Tom Anderson secretly recorded conversations with Kohring for the government, according to a letter sent this summer by federal prosecutors to Browne. It was just filed in court. Anderson was convicted in July of taking bribes to do the bidding of Cornell, but it came out at his trial that he at one point was cooperating with the FBI. Prewitt was working undercover for the FBI to collect information against Anderson and, it's now known, against Kohring.

FBI - Stevens-1203

194A-AN-13620-M;527

The letter says both Prewitt and Anderson made recordings for the government in the case voluntarily, so no court authorization was needed.

KOHRING'S VOTE RECORD

Browne said all the allegations can be explained and that what's important is this: Kohring didn't vote Veco's way on the oil tax. A check of legislative records shows that was true on certain key votes. When Veco shifted strategy to support a compromise tax rate in an August 2006 special session, Kohring voted against it.

Browne said he learned only Thursday from testimony in the Kott case that Dyson had been helping the FBI investigate corruption in the Alaska Legislature. That makes him an agent of the government, Browne said. He called Dyson "a lapdog."

Browne said he takes issue with Dyson trying to persuade Kohring to at least talk to the feds, if not take a plea deal. He said he believes that the government could have been trying to interfere with Kohring's right to counsel.

But Dyson said later that he just was trying to help Kohring as a friend and wasn't asked to do so by prosecutors or the FBI.

As Browne tells it, a legislative aide to Dyson contacted an aide to Kohring to say the FBI had contacted Dyson's office and that Kohring would be "stupid to go to trial."

On Aug. 6, Craig Suffian, an attorney who works for Browne, sent Dyson an e-mail saying there may have been "an end-run around the right to counsel."

In his e-mail response the same day, Dyson said he wasn't trying to do that.

"My sense of the FBI investigations is that it is not a witch hunt and that they mostly want to nail the really bad guys who did intend to distort the Alaskan Legislative process," Dyson wrote.

He believed that Kohring never meant any harm and possibly could "avoid a good deal of stress and bad press at a trial by at least sitting down with the Feds and see if an attractive alternative was possible," he said in his e-mail. He said he figured Kohring's lawyers would go with him to talk to prosecutors.

Browne provided a copy of the e-mail exchange.

So is Kohring negotiating? Browne said that's something defense lawyers are barred from talking about.

FBI TESTIMONY

During the three-hour hearing on Monday, three FBI agents testified about the search of Kohring's office.

Five agents were involved, along with an evidence technician. But while the agents were armed, their weapons were concealed and never drawn, agents testified. They wore business clothes, not FBI raid jackets, and drove unmarked cars. While the outer door to the office was locked, it opened from the inside and Kohring was always free to go, agent Alan Vanderploeg testified.

They had a warrant, signed by federal Magistrate Judge John D. Roberts on Aug. 29, 2006.

But the warrant was never executed. Agents wanted Kohring to agree to the search, which he did.

Kohring's lawyer maintains that a search cannot be voluntary if agents tell the subject they have a warrant.

Kohring is one of six former or current legislators whose offices were searched that day. Agents testified they were instructed to get consent for the searches as "a professional courtesy."

But it also made it more difficult for defense lawyers to see the written support for the search warrant -- the application and the FBI agent's detailed affidavit. The search warrant and affidavit were sealed.

Browne told Roberts that he still wanted to see the affidavit and that prosecutors hadn't turned it over. At the hearing, prosecutors agreed to provide it, as long as he kept it confidential.

Now it is up to Roberts to recommend to District Judge John Sedwick whether the evidence taken in the search, and the statement that Kohring gave, can be used against him.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390. Reporter Tom Kizzia contributed to this story.

READ MORE: See the FBI report on the agents' search of Kohring's office, along with the e-mail from Sen. Fred Dyson, at

adn.com/fbi
Caption:
BILL ROTH / Anchorage Daily News

Ex-state Rep. Vic Kohring, R-Wasilla, leaves the federal courthouse in Anchorage after a Monday hearing. Kohring faces bribery, extortion and corruption charges for allegedly taking money from Veco in return for his support on energy issues.

Kohring's attorney John Henry Browne said all the allegations can be explained.
Caption:
Photo 2: VicKohring_091807.jpg

Graphic 1: JohnHenryBrowne_091807.eps
Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

Author: LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com Staff
Section: Main
Page: A1
Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

FBI - Stevens-1206

Untitled

Paper: Anchorage Daily News (AK)
Title: Kott trial bares Veco maneuvers -
PROSECUTION RESTS: From pig roasts to political polls, former V.P. shines light on the firm's spending.
Date: September 18, 2007

Former Veco vice president Rick Smith was at the center of company fundraising, whether it was organizing the annual pig roasts for Rep. Don Young or one of the many golf tournaments where he turned checks into cash under a special arrangement with the Buckaroo Club in Spenard known as the "Phony Account."

Smith concluded two days of testimony Monday as a government witness in the federal corruption trial of former House Speaker Pete Kott, R-Eagle River. The government later wrapped up its case, with Kott's attorneys expecting to present their defense starting this morning and running through Thursday.

After the jury was dismissed for the day, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick rejected a defense motion to throw out the case against Kott. He said the government had provided ample evidence to support its charges of bribery, extortion and conspiracy.

The day also provided an inside look into how Veco apparently broke state law by hiring Anchorage pollster David Dittman to conduct a poll for Kott in 2006. Dittman, who took the stand after Smith, said he suspected the Veco-paid poll amounted to an illegal campaign contribution from the company to Kott, but decided it wasn't his business to worry about it.

Until it was sold 11 days ago on the eve of Kott's trial, Veco was an Alaska-based oil field services company. Its former chairman, Bill Allen, was among the most politically active businessmen in the state.

Kott's trial resumed Monday with Smith on the witness stand under cross-examination by Jim Wendt, the chief defense counsel.

Smith began work at Veco in 1989 as a logistics expert in Veco's cleanup of the Exxon Valdez oil spill. Rising to vice president of community and government affairs, Smith said his most recent annual salary was $165,000 plus a bonus ranging from $20,000 to $80,000. He was also illegally reimbursed for campaign contributions totaling $20,000 to $50,000 a year, he said.

The corruption investigation, centered on Veco and its relationships with politicians, brought an end to his employment in May, but his severance package was worth $384,000. Veco continued to pay his legal bills until CH2M Hill bought the company. He settled for a one-time lump-sum payment of $500,000 for lawyers but can keep any money left over, he said.

Smith learned he was busted on Aug. 31, 2006, the day after Allen agreed to work for the government. Smith said he got an early morning call from Allen, who asked him to come to his home as soon as he could.

194A-AN-13620-M:528

He got to Allen's door about 9 a.m.

"I got some people you need to talk to," Allen said, then left. Two FBI agents approached Smith.

"They sat down and had a conversation with me, showed me the video and audio evidence they had accumulated and talked about what would happen to me if they were to prosecute and indict me," Smith testified.

He caved quickly and agreed to cooperate. Both he and Allen have pleaded guilty to bribery, extortion and conspiracy and face about 10 years in prison.

Wendt attempted to attack Smith's credibility by bringing up the dozens of charitable golf tournaments he ran over the years and his odd arrangements with the Buckaroo Club, a Spenard bar.

"The business relationship you had with them was to launder money, isn't that true?" Wendt asked.

Smith denied his conduct was illegal. He said he'd bring tournament checks from participants to the bar, which would cash them so he had money to pay expenses. Wendt suggested the amount totaled in the hundreds of thousands of dollars, and Smith didn't deny it. He also didn't deny that he called his arrangement the "Phony Account."

"Didn't the owners of the Buckaroo warn you that the IRS would catch up to you some day?" Wendt said.

"I don't recall," Smith said.

Smith said that for more than 10 years he organized the annual pig roasts that raised money for Don Young's campaigns. They were major affairs, attended by 200 to 400 people and catered by the Marx Bros. Cafe. The cost was $10,000 to $15,000, he said. He wasn't asked whether Young's campaign reimbursed the full cost.

Smith acknowledged he was the Veco employee who supervised the payments of $30,000 to Tom Anderson when Anderson served in the state House -- a "sham contract," in Wendt's words.

"We never got any work out of it," Smith said. "I asked him to work. It didn't happen."

Anderson was convicted in July of taking bribes to do the bidding of another company that wanted to build a private prison in Alaska.

FBI - Stevens-1208

Taking his turn in the witness stand, pollster Dave Dittman said Veco paid him to conduct polls for candidates, including Kott and then-Gov. Frank Murkowski. Such corporate-funded polls for candidates are illegal, according to the head of the Alaska Public Offices Commission.

Dittman indicated on the stand that he did have some concerns about the legality of the polls.

"I remember thinking that 'Oh, I hope you guys don't get yourselves in trouble over this,' " Dittman testified, speaking about Veco paying $2,750 for the July 2006 Kott poll. "I knew it was a corporate contribution; it would exceed the maximum contribution. I also felt they were big boys, had been around for a while and probably knew what they were doing."

Dittman also testified that he conducted a $20,000 poll for then-Gov. Frank Murkowski in April 2006. Veco executive Rick Smith paid for that poll, Dittman said on the witness stand.

"This one was initiated by either Jim Clark or the governor," Dittman testified. "The governor was very unpopular at the time and there was some question of whether he would run."

Clark, who was Murkowski's chief of staff, did not return a phone message seeking comment. Dittman said in an interview he thinks the poll could have been legal because Murkowski was not a declared candidate at that time. Brooke Miles, executive director of the APOC, said that is a gray area.

Dittman also said on the witness stand that Veco paid in June 2006 for a "gubernatorial primary poll" and one for state Senate District N, where then-Sen. Ben Stevens was trying to decide whether he had a chance to retain his seat.

Dittman testified he has done "four or five" political candidate polls for Veco over the past few years. In the later interview, Dittman said he could not recall any other companies that had paid for him to do candidate polls within the past several years.

Find Richard Mauer online at adn.com/contact/rmauer or call 257-4345.

REAL-TIME FROM THE TRIAL: Find the most up-to-date news from the Kott trial on our politics blog. Reporter Kyle Hopkins is posting updates throughout the day

adn.com/politics

INSIDE

COWDERY: Gov. Palin wants Senate leaders to decide if the Anchorage Republican should remain the Rules Committee chairman.

Page B-1
Caption:
AL GRILLO / The Associated Press FBI - Stevens-1209

Former Veco Corp. executive Rick Smith, left, walks from a federal courtroom on Monday during a break in his testimony in the federal corruption trial of former Alaska House Speaker Pete Kott.
Caption:
Photo 2: Video3_091807.jpg

Graphic 1: Video2_091807.eps

Graphic 3: 18corrupt_091807.eps
Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

Author: RICHARD MAUER and SEAN COCKERHAM Anchorage Daily News Staff
Section: Main
Page: A1
Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

FBI - Stevens-1210

Untitled

Paper: Anchorage Daily News (AK)
Title: Governor pressures Cowdery -
BRIBE ALLEGATION: Palin urges review of senator's leadership role.
Date: September 18, 2007

Gov. Sarah Palin said Monday that Senate leaders should review whether Anchorage Republican John Cowdery is qualified to remain the Senate's Rules Committee chairman.

On Friday, a former oil field services executive testified that Cowdery was among five lawmakers he bribed for favorable influence on oil tax legislation.

Cowdery was among six legislators whose offices the FBI raided last year. He has not been charged but was named in testimony during former Rep. Pete Kott's federal corruption trial last week.

Palin stopped short of calling for Cowdery to be stripped of his title, saying that decision rests with Senate leaders who initially put him in that position.

The rules chairman is the gatekeeper of all legislation that reaches the Senate floor for a vote.

"With that confirmation in testimony, I would think that the Senate leadership would want to address the issue," Palin said. "We haven't heard them address it yet.

"And we haven't heard what Senate leadership intends to do about the allegations, especially now that the names have been made public."

Senate President Lyda Green, R-Wasilla, did not immediately return requests for comment Monday.

Cowdery is out of town and unavailable for comment, said Jeff Turner, press secretary for the Senate majority, made up of six Republicans and nine Democrats.

After federal agents searched his office last August, Cowdery was among the first to respond.

"It's pretty bizarre," he said in a written statement at the time. "That's all I know. It's pretty bizarre. I haven't done anything wrong."

A special session is set to begin next month on oil taxes, called in part to review how the Legislature in 2006 passed a new tax on the oil industry. The issue dominated the session and is at the heart of charges against three former lawmakers, including Kott.

Having Cowdery remain as Rules Committee chairman for the session that starts Oct. 18 has some lawmakers nervous.

"At the very least the leadership needs to look at can we go through a special session and evaluate the proposal?" said Minority Leader Gene Therriault, R-North Pole,

FBI - Stevens-1211

194A-AN-13620-M;529

Cowdery's appointment came under scrutiny Jan. 16 during the first Senate floor session when committee appointments received a vote.

Therriault, whose minority group is made up of five Republicans, raised the issue then, but Cowdery was approved along coalition lines, 15-5.

Therriault believes testimony last week from former Veco Corp. vice president Rick Smith -- although Smith didn't elaborate on how he allegedly bribed Cowdery -- warrants revisiting Cowdery's leadership role.

"Now there appears even more reason to be concerned about public perception over Senator Cowdery remaining in a leadership position," Therriault said.
Caption:
Cowdery
Caption:
Graphic 1: John Cowdery CMYK_091807.eps
Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

Author: STEVE QUINN The Associated Press WIRE
Section: Alaska
Page: B1
Dateline: JUNEAU
Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

FBI - Stevens-1212

Untitled

Paper: Anchorage Daily News (AK)
Title: Marketing firm mentioned in Kott corruption trial burglarized - NORTHWEST STRATEGIES: Items worth $40,000 were stolen during the weekend.
Date: September 19, 2007

An Anchorage marketing firm whose name came up last week during the corruption trial of former Rep. Pete Kott was burglarized over the weekend, Anchorage police said Tuesday.

A thief or thieves broke into Northwest Strategies and stole a computer server, two hard drives, broadcast editing equipment and a flat screen TV, among other items, owner Tim Woolston said.

"They took a number of business equipment, office and computer equipment, and some kind of a network server that has a lot of business records on it," said Anchorage police Lt. Paul Honeman.

Police estimate the losses to be in excess of $40,000, he said.

None of the equipment contained sensitive information about clients, and no customer information was compromised, Woolston said.

The burglary took place between 3 p.m. Saturday and 11:30 a.m. Sunday, Honeman said, and it was reported Sunday by an employee.

"But then we didn't get the call until 3 in the afternoon," he said. "I don't know why there was such a delay."

Whoever broke in cracked a window on the back of the building and pulled it off the frame, Woolston said. The office did not have a security alarm, he said, but it soon will.

Police have "very few" leads, Honeman said.

Northwest Strategies was co-owned by former Sen. Jerry Mackie until earlier this year, when Woolston bought out his interest, Woolston said.

Both Northwest Strategies' and Mackie's names have surfaced during the corruption trial of Kott, who is accused of selling his influence to Veco executives.

A phone conversation between Mackie and former Veco vice president Rick Smith that took place on July 12, 2006 -- when Mackie still was with Northwest Strategies and was working as a consultant on Kott's campaign -- was played to jurors last week.

In it, they talked about a poll conducted by Dave Dittman for Kott's campaign. Mackie told Smith he had let Kott know that Smith and Veco CEO Bill Allen had agreed to help pay for the poll, and Kott said that was great.

194A-AN-13620-M;53D

After the conversation was played Sept. 11, Mackie told the Daily News he knew about the poll but wasn't a part of any bribery conspiracy involving Veco.

Woolston said he had no reason to think the timing of the testimony and the burglary had any relationship to one another.

"I can't for the life of me think about what that might be," Woolston said. "All we did for that campaign was create a few commercials and they were all out there in the public, so I don't know what the point would have been."

Find James Halpin online at adn.com/contact/jhalpin or call him at 257-4589.
Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

Author: JAMES HALPIN jhalpin@adn.com Staff
Section: Alaska
Page: B1
Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

FBI - Stevens-1214

<<Back

Cornell has no plans for new prisons in Alaska

by Jill Burke
Wednesday, Sept. 19, 2007

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- Cornell Cos. claims it will no longer attempt to sell projects here in Alaska.

The company has made big headlines in Alaska over the last several months as the private prison firm used a decoy by government informant Frank Prewitt in crafting a bribery scheme with former Anchorage lobbyist Bill Bobrick and former Anchorage Rep. Tom Anderson.

Both Anderson and Bobrick have been convicted of corruption and bribery in the scheme.

Cornell has tried building a private prison in Alaska three times -- in Delta junction, Kenai and Whittier -- and has been unsuccessful in each instance.

Now Cornell CEO James Hyman said he's done.

"We understand how the [Department of Justice] had to use bait to get what they needed. We are a little chagrined to be that bait," Hyman said.

Although the government successfully used Cornell as bait to take down Anderson and Bobrick, the company was not involved in the kickbacks and knew nothing of Prewitt's arrangement with federal agents.

Instead, Cornell was simply part of an FBI cover in order to keep the bribery framework it was monitoring with Anderson and Bobrick believable.

Unbeknownst to Cornell, Prewitt sought Anderson's help on matters key to the company's future plans, including muscling through the complex bureaucracy to prove to the state those projects were needed.

During the Anderson trial, Prewitt told the court he made an illegal campaign contribution utilizing money from a former Cornell executive.

After hearing that, Hyman said the company wanted to ensure its activities in Alaska had all been above board.

Hyman said the company talked to current and ex-employees to try and discover any wrongdoing. He said he is confident there have been no issues since he took over in 2005 and said there's no evidence it happen in prior years either.

Among the projects Cornell was pursuing in Alaska, and Prewitt was using to snare Anderson, was a new juvenile residential treatment facility for Anchorage.

The project suffered from poor community support for the Downtown location it chose for a detention facility in addition to the paperwork and bureaucratic snags.

Cornell currently operates six halfway houses across the state, including three here in Anchorage. A company executive announced that is where its focus will remain for the foreseeable future.

"We are not interested in the juvenile sector here. We are not interested in building a private prison here or operating a private prison here. That is not where we are going to focus," Hyman said.

Alaska Department of Corrections Commissioner Joe Schmidt said the department's relationship with Cornell is still strong.

"Right now, they want to work with us instead of against us, and I think we have a pretty good partnership right now," Schmidt said.

The possibility of constructing a private prison in Alaska was taken off the table three years ago when the state legislature passed a bill requiring any prison expansion in the state to be state-run and state-operated.

Plans to build a facility at Point MacKenzie in the Matanuska-Susitna Borough are moving forward, although the original mega-prison proposal has been shelved.

Contact Jill Burke at jburke@ktuu.com

WorldNow

All content © Copyright 2000 - 2007 WorldNow and KTUU. All Rights Reserved.
For more information on this site, please read our Privacy Policy and Terms of Service.

FBI - Stevens-1216

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Veco man says he worked on Stevens, Young fund-raisers

By MATT APUZZO
The Associated Press
(Published: September 19, 2007)

WASHINGTON - A construction worker who oversaw renovation of Sen. Ted Stevens' home said his company also paid him to help run fundraisers for the Alaska Republican, a practice that appears to violate federal campaign finance laws.

Contractor Robert Williams is a key witness in a bribery investigation that stretches from Alaska to Capitol Hill and threatens legal and political headaches for the Senate's longest-serving Republican. The FBI is investigating whether Stevens received illegal gifts from Veco Corp., the once-powerful Alaska oil contractor.

Williams said he was in charge of "special projects" for Veco founder Bill Allen, and the renovation of Stevens' home was one such project. Others included working three or four fundraisers for Stevens while on the clock with Veco. Federal elections laws prohibit candidates from accepting donations or free services from corporations.

Unlike other Veco employees, Williams did not itemize his time sheets with job codes so customers could be billed. When working on one of Allen's pet projects, Williams just logged his hours and Veco made sure he was paid.

"I never had any doubts about it until the FBI came down and served me with subpoenas," Williams said in a telephone interview.

At fundraisers, including at least one at the home of Stevens' brother-in-law, Williams said he was assigned odd jobs. He delivered ice, arranged for table rental or oversaw the four or five Veco employees parking cars.

"If I didn't have parking patrol, I basically just had to be there to make sure nothing got messed up," Williams recalled.

Williams said he also helped run annual fundraising pig roasts for Rep. Don Young, another Alaska Republican who has come under scrutiny in the Veco investigation. The fundraisers were among many Williams said he worked on during his more than 13 years at Veco. FBI - Stevens-1217

Stevens spokesman Aaron Saunders had no comment Wednesday. The senator has said he wants to avoid any suggestion he was trying to influence the investigation by discussing it publicly.

A spokesman for Young's office referred questions to his campaign spokesman, who did not immediately return a call.

Corporations are prohibited from donating to federal candidates, and that includes providing services, said Kenneth A. Gross, a Washington campaign lawyer and former Federal Election Commission counsel.

194-AN-13620-M;532

"The company would have had to have been paid," Gross said.

Young recently amended his campaign finance reports to reflect $38,000 in back payments to Allen for the fundraisers. A review of Stevens' campaign finance expenditures since 2000 revealed no payments to Veco or Allen for fundraising.

Robert K. Kelner, another elections attorney and former Republican National Committee lawyer, said the question is whether Stevens or his campaign workers knew the Veco employees were on the clock.

"Should a thoughtful candidate consider that possibility and look into it? Yes," Kelner said. "Do they have a legal obligation to be that thoughtful? No."

Fundraising and favors are at the heart of the corruption investigation, which has ensnared several Alaska legislators. Allen has pleaded guilty to bribing lawmakers and is cooperating with the FBI. He admitted in court last week that his employees provided "some labor" on Stevens' house in 2000, but Williams recalled the job in greater detail.

Williams remembered spending two or three days a week for about six months at Stevens' house, supervising workers and installing hardwood floors. He also recalled moving a truckload of furniture, including a bed and a rug, from Stevens' mother-in-law's house to the senator's home.

The renovation was supposed to have been just a concrete slab in the basement. But groundwater levels complicated the job, Williams said, so workers raised the house, built a new first floor and added electrical and plumbing connections.

A few other Veco employees helped on the job and Williams hired outside contractors. A garage was added, though Williams isn't sure how that idea came up.

Veco isn't in the residential construction business. Its workers build oil pipelines. But Williams said Allen often assigned him work for friends and family. Stevens and Allen are longtime friends, so Williams didn't think the renovation project was unusual.

Stevens met with workers and knew Veco was handling the job, Williams said, so he assumed the senator was reimbursing Veco for his time. Stevens has said he paid every bill he received on the house.

"Ted said he wanted to make sure everything is paid for," Williams recalled from an early meeting with Allen and Stevens.

He recalls Stevens and his wife paying for flooring and is certain the senator paid for at least some of the work. But because Williams didn't record his time at Stevens' house, he said, nobody could know for sure how much his time cost.

FBI - Stevens-1218

At the time, he assumed that when he signed off on expenses and submitted them to Veco, the company would pass those bills on to Stevens. Now, he's not so sure.

"I think Bill's ego got away from him," Williams said. "I think he did what he thought he could do."

Allen liked to do things his own way and wasn't fussy about separating business and friendship, Williams said. "Bill's personal life and the company were one and the same."

Williams testified about the house project before a federal grand jury in Anchorage. He couldn't remember the total cost of the renovation but said the Justice Department seemed to already know more about the project than he did.

Investigators were "very thorough" and had numerous documents and bills associated with the house, he said.

"I thought everything was on the up and up," Williams said. "I'm disappointed with the way things turned out, and I'm sorry for Ted."

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1219

« previous | MUCK HOME | next »

The Sound Of Silence

By Laura McGann - September 20, 2007, 1:54PM

Hear that? That silence is the sound of my phone not ringing. It's been a familiar quiet since I first started trying to get some answers about Rep. Don Young's (R-AK) Coconut Road earmark last month.

Someone, apparently acting on Young's behalf, managed to change the bill's language in the massive 2005 transportation bill after it had passed both houses of Congress, but before the President signed it into law. The change no doubt gratified real estate developer Daniel Aronoff, who'd raised $40,000 for Young earlier that year in his push for $10 million to construct a highway interchange. Young's language change steered that cash away from the community's requested use and to LifeLock.

Guarantee Your Good Name
I'm Todd Davis, CEO of LifeLock, and this is my real social security number 457-55-5462

led to figure out how, in a very technical sense, a bill's t passed both houses of Congress. Surely there must be ting the President's signature safe from tampering, or so atedly from office to office, I'm still none the wiser as changed the bill's language. It's become crystal clear, ould know don't have a ready answer -- and don't seem urrent House clerk in late August; I heard nothing. Then was in place in 2005 when the rewording occurred. cutive director of the National Fish and Wildlife e two weeks ago. When he returned, his secretary called sy to talk -- too busy indefinitely, that is. I pressed, aying no comment. "No, he is just too busy with an ssic Washington blow-off line!)

the current clerk's office last week. I explained, again, it and got an answer! I was told: call the Committee on ask for its spokesman, Kyle Anderson. (Apparently d in the same question, so the two offices worked solution.) Anderson was sympathetic, but still passed amentarian's Office.

a hard time hearing the person who answered the phone. They were having a "luncheon," that sounded like a wild party (as far as Parliamentarian Office parties go). I called back in an hour, heard loud laughter and cocktail party chatting and then a "click." The third time was the charm. Max Spitzer, an assistant parliamentarian who didn't seem to know what I was talking about, clacked away at a computer, asking me questions about the name of the bill and the date, etc. He looked through something and concluded: "There is nothing here that would indicate a language change."

Well, there you go. The Coconut Road controversy is a figment of my imagination and Lee County, Florida's too. But wait, Lee County, the area that received the funds just voted to send the money back to Congress last month, in hopes of having it reallocated for what they determined to be the original purpose. Lee County commissioned a study from a former government official to trace the earmark's history, discovering that the language change must have occurred in the limbo period between passing Congress and waiting for the president's signature.

And what about our unsuccessful efforts to find an earmark -- any earmark -- other than Young's that had undergone a similar change in the bill? I offered to send the report on to Spitzer so he could see that in fact there was a change. He gave me his email address. The next day he said he sent it on to his superiors, who are certainly working on it.

Just in case that doesn't work, I called back the House Committee on Administration to talk with Anderson again. He sounded, again, very understanding. He explained that it's hard because it's a different majority, with different people working in the various offices. He said he'd see about reaching out to the "other side of the aisle" for me.

FBI - Stevens-1220

194-AN-13620-M;533

Since I haven't heard anything from Anderson, I just called the minority staff myself. I asked the spokeswoman there, Salley Collins, if Anderson spoke with her about this: "No, not at all." Well, good thing I called. After I explained the situation, which surprised her, she offered to put in a request with the Congressional Research Service to look into the matter. Collins warned that CRS could take a while to get to it.

PERMALINK | TOPICS: Don Young PRINT SHARE

ADVERTISEMENT
ORelilly: Fair & Balanced?
Do you think he's fair or biased? Take the PollingPoint Media Poll.
www.PollingPoint.com
Clinton's girl friends
Could 'mischief maker' Bill damage Hillary's presidential campaign?
www.thefirstpost.co.uk
OEE Benchmark
Benchmark TPM effectiveness to industry and world-class standards www.Informance.com
WinBill Tracks Telecom
IT Budgeting/Tracking/Auditing Maximize Savings Minimize Errors www.winbill.com
Ads by Google

Comments (4)

GeorgeBush43 wrote on September 20, 2007 2:07 PM:

Laura,

I am awfully sorry that you went to all of that trouble. You should have called me. I wrote that line into the bill right before I signed it because a couple of my buddies told me that we needed a road there. Sorry about the trouble!

--GWB

Roberta wrote on September 20, 2007 2:08 PM:

Laura, don't you realize that a lot of people could be embarrassed if you discovered--and revealed--that other earmarks had been "tweaked" between approval and signing? You wouldn't want to do that, would you?

Just be a good girl and do what I think an awful lot of people do in Washington: put your hands over your eyes while loudly chanting "lalalalalalala." That should take care of the whole problem.

EdNSted wrote on September 20, 2007 2:12 PM:

Now that's what I call real accountability!

drational wrote on September 20, 2007 3:30 PM:

Thanks for the update and the work. It's clear that if you want something done in Washington, you should become a bike messenger carrying bills from the Hill to the White House.

FBI - Stevens-1221

Post a comment

Name:

Email Address:

URL:

☐ Remember personal info?

Untitled

Paper: Anchorage Daily News (AK)
Title: Kott says he lied to Veco executives - TESTIMONY: He did take money, defendant says, but not as bribes.
Date: September 21, 2007

Former state Rep. Pete Kott apologized to jurors Thursday for his crude talk in secretly made FBI recordings, but he also conceded that he told Veco Corp. executives whatever they wanted to hear, even if it wasn't true.

On a day he made an emotional speech from the witness stand about his shattered legacy, other revelations spilled out, including that he changed his vote on a new oil tax at the last minute and took $5,000 from former Veco executive Bill Allen as a truck loan that he never repaid.

But, Kott maintained, he never took bribes.

Kott finished testifying late in the afternoon after two grueling days on the stand in his federal corruption trial. While he seemed testy at times during aggressive cross-examination, he didn't lose his cool.

Gov. Sarah Palin quietly popped into the trial for about 10 minutes in the morning. Few seemed to spot her as she slipped into the back row during a little of Kott's testimony on oil taxes. Palin said she took the opportunity to check in during a fire drill in the governor's Anchorage office in the nearby Atwood building.

"This is one of the most important series of trials in Alaska history," Palin said after her courtroom visit.

TRIAL COMES AT GREAT COST, KOTT SAYS

Kott is being tried in U.S. District Court on charges of bribery, conspiracy, extortion and wire fraud. Veco executives Bill Allen and Rick Smith have pleaded guilty to bribing Kott and three other legislators in an effort to influence them on the tax measure in 2006.

Kott told jurors he had to go to trial because he believes he's not guilty, but that it's coming at great cost.

Jurors have seen videos from Suite 604 of the Baranof Hotel in Juneau and heard wiretapped telephone conversations in which Kott, often after drinking, plotted and cussed alongside Veco executives.

Will those videos and newspaper stories about his behavior be his legacy? defense lawyer Jim Wendt asked.

Kott, in the Legislature 14 years, including two as House speaker, choked up a bit during a monologue that lasted several minutes.

"Unfortunately, with all the things I believe I accomplished, the goals that I managed to reach, the legacy will be just that. I think people will forget about the good things and remember the bad things,"

194A-AN-13620-M;534

Kott said.

The video recordings are "extremely embarrassing," Kott said.

"Certainly to the jury, I apologize for the vulgarity that has been presented to you in the course of this trial," Kott said. "It has been an embarrassment for myself and my family." His girlfriend and grown son and daughter sat in the front row behind the defense table.

The defense slogged through the legislative record in an attempt to portray Kott as a statesman who sometimes voted against the 20 percent tax favored by Veco to reach an oil-tax compromise.

But as Kott himself explained, the unfolding of such complex bills is a "cat-and-mouse game," with lawmakers sometimes voting yes for loathsome amendments hoping to kill a bill.

The Legislature approved a 22.5 percent tax, and Kott told the jury he considered it a good compromise. "We pretty much split the baby right in half," he said.

SPIRITED CROSS-EXAMINATION

The cross-examination by assistant U.S. attorney James Goeke was heated from the start.

Goeke came close to yelling as he shot off questions rapid-fire about Kott's vote. Wendt objected time and again. And U.S. District Judge John Sedwick told Goeke to slow down, be more patient and stop making speeches.

Prosecutors also dug deep into the legislative record during their cross-examination, trying to show that Kott voted against the 22.5 percent compromise three times on the last day, when the tax measure nearly died.

Even on the final vote, Kott was a "no," switching his vote to the "yes" side only after the tally showed the measure passing.

"You changed it once the writing was on the wall," Goeke thundered. "It's good you did it so you can tell the jury you voted for 22.5."

Kott's lawyer objected.

"There was no jury then to consider," he pointed out.

FBI - Stevens-1223

It was, Goeke noted, the last vote of Kott's legislative career. He lost in the Republican primary two weeks later.

The prosecutor seemed to be portraying Kott as a hold-out for 20 percent until the bitter end -- even when some oil industry lobbyists had started pushing for 22.5 percent in fear a more onerous tax might pass instead.

During his cross-examination, Goeke replayed two FBI recordings from the Veco suite.

"Where do you want to take this, Bill? I don't want to jeopardize the gas line but I'll stay on 20," Kott says on a May 8, 2006, recording from Suite 604. Allen testified earlier that oil producers wanted certainty on oil taxes before they would commit to a multibillion-dollar gas pipeline. "Vic will be on 20 and Jay will be on 20 and Foster will be on 20. I don't know how many others will be on 20," Kott said on the recording, referring to Reps. Vic Kohring, Jay Ramras and Richard Foster.

"Tom Anderson," Smith, the former Veco vice president, chimes in with another lawmaker's name.

"Anderson will be on 20," Kott agreed.

Prosecutors also replayed an especially vulgar recording from late in the night of June 8, 2006. The men in Suite 604 spewed out f--- them repeatedly.

Goeke pressed Kott to explain why he assured Allen he'd fight for 20 percent if he was willing to go higher. Kott said he was misleading his Veco friends, choosing to "tell them what they want to hear."

That theme came up several times.

BERKOWITZ DID NOT HELP SWAY VOTE, KOTT SAYS

Wendt asked Kott to explain another secretly recorded conversation in which he boasts that he "outsmarted the fox" -- referring to then-House Minority Leader Ethan Berkowitz -- in order to get Berkowitz to persuade his fellow Democrats to vote the way Veco wanted.

Kott told jurors that he was just trying to impress Allen. He and Berkowitz had had a rational conversation on the House floor. Kott figured Allen was watching live on "Gavel to Gavel" television.

"I didn't want him to get the opinion I was just crawling in bed with the Democrats," Kott testified.

Kott said he also felt bad because he and Berkowitz had a good relationship for years and he had actually tried to deceive Berkowitz a little bit. He said Berkowitz was on his side back in 2005 when he attempted to regain the House speaker post through a coup. It failed.

That's why he talks in the recording about lying, cheating, stealing and selling his soul to the devil, Kott testified.

FBI - Stevens-1224

In reality, Berkowitz didn't do anything to help swing votes the way Veco wanted, Kott said, even though he told Allen that's what happened.

"I think I was trying to get some credit," he said.

At another point in his cross-examination, Goeke questioned Kott about a $5,000 check from Allen that jurors hadn't heard about before Thursday.

Kott told jurors that Allen loaned him the $5,000 in 2004 as a down payment on a new truck. He was supposed to pay Allen back once he paid off the truck.

But Goeke pointed out that on Aug. 31, 2006, when the FBI searched Kott's residence in Juneau, Kott told agents that he hadn't done so.

"That sounds like a gift to me," Goeke said.

Kott replied he and Allen had an agreement that Kott would pay the money back when the truck was paid off.

"It could also be characterized as a bribe," Goeke said.

"You can characterize it any way you want; it is not a bribe," Kott replied.

With a few more witnesses to go today, the case may not get to the jury until next week.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390. Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call 257-4344. Find Tom Kizzia at adn.com/contact/tkizzia.

ONLINE AUDIO: Hear court testimony from the trial from ex-Veco CEO Bill Allen and listen in on the FBI wiretaps that have been presented as evidence in the trial.

adn.com/fbi

LIVE UPDATES: Follow Kott's trial from the courtroom by reading updates on our blog.

adn.com/alaskapolitics

Correction: Correction A front-page story Friday about the corruption trial of former Rep. Pete Kott gave the wrong year in which he attempted to regain the post of House speaker. The failed coup attempt was in 2004, not 2005.

Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News FBI - Stevens-1225

Author: LISA DEMER, SEAN COCKERHAM and TOM KIZZIA Anchorage Daily News Staff
Section: Main
Page: A1
Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 22, 2007 Saturday
FINAL EDITION

Governor urges Stevens to break his silence;
INVESTIGATION: State's senior senator owes Alaskans an explanation, she says.

BYLINE: By ERIKA BOLSTAD ebolstad@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1.115 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON -

Gov. Sarah Palin said Friday that she and Alaskans are owed a more thorough explanation from U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens about why he is under federal investigation.

"Right now, Alaskans aren't hearing anything," Palin said, adding that she and many of the state's residents are willing to give Stevens more leeway than most people because of the Republican senator's long service to Alaska.

"But not hearing anything in terms of information that can be shared regarding the senator's innocence is kind of frustrating for Alaskans," Palin said in a telephone interview from Anchorage. "Alaskans are getting more anxious to hear any information that he can provide regarding his innocence."

Palin first expressed her concerns Thursday to a reporter with National Public Radio, who spoke to her after she dropped in on the federal corruption trial of former state Rep. Pete Kott. Among the trial's bigger revelations was testimony from former Veco chairman Bill Allen that he or his oil services company financed a substantial portion of the 2000 remodeling of Stevens' Girdwood home.

Palin's remarks took on greater significance when The Associated Press reported later Thursday that Allen agreed to secretly tape telephone calls with Stevens after authorities confronted the Veco executive with evidence that he had bribed Alaska lawmakers. The Washington Post on Friday confirmed the existence of the taped phone calls between Stevens and Allen. It's not clear what was said during the calls, or how many were recorded.

As part of its sweeping inquiry into public corruption in Alaska, the FBI taped thousands of hours of phone conversations between Veco executives and state lawmakers. They also recorded secret video in Suite 604 of Juneau's Baranof Hotel, where Allen and fellow Veco executive Rick Smith plotted with Kott on how to move the industry's preferred version of a new oil tax through the Legislature in 2006.

Nearly two months after federal agents' much-publicized search of the Girdwood house, Stevens has yet to comment on the investigation. He did tell Alaska reporters in Washington, before the July raid, that he paid every renovation bill that was given to him.

Stevens' spokesman Aaron Saunders said Friday that the senator would have no comment, and referred the Daily News to the statement the senator has been issuing since July.

Stevens has maintained that it would be an obstruction of justice to talk about the investigation -- or explain his role in it. In his now-familiar statement, Stevens says, "I continue to believe this investigation should proceed to its conclusion without any appearance that I have attempted to influence its outcome."

Friday afternoon, when CNN reporters staked Stevens out on Capitol Hill to ask him about the wiretapping, he strode down the hallway of the Hart Senate office building with his suit jacket slung casually over his shoulder. He would not answer questions about the investigation or the reports that the FBI had recorded his conversations with Allen.

"It's a nice day," Stevens said, in response to questions. "I hope you're enjoying it. I'm having a great day."

'ALASKA'S NAME IS MUD'

Palin said her biggest concern about the ongoing corruption investigation, being run by the FBI and Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, is that it continues to make Alaska look as though it's a place where lawmakers can be bought. That's an impediment to developing the state's resources, Palin said, including the development of a natural gas pipeline.

"I think people are just kind of asking about the commitment that Alaskans have to change the political climate up here to a climate where (residents) can trust that the decisions the state government is making are based on the best interest of Alaskans, not due to undue influence," she said.

Other than Palin, most Alaska Republicans have been reluctant to take a public position on Stevens' unwillingness to provide more information. And even fewer want to wade into a difference of political opinion between the country's longest-serving GOP senator and a governor whose election last year represented a changing of the guard in the state's politics.

"Whether the governor or senator or anyone else has an opinion, the wheels of justice are going to turn, and none of us know what the outcome is going to be," said Jim Whitaker, a former Republican state lawmaker who serves as mayor of the Fairbanks North Star Borough.

Rep. John Coghill, R-North Pole, recently attended a gathering of legislators from Western states in Wyoming. He said politicians from other states want to know how Alaska will open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil development or build a gas pipeline with a cloud hovering over its congressional delegation.

"Alaska's name is mud right now."

He said that he's not passing judgment on Stevens and that it would be wrong to simply hound him for political reasons, but that he also worries about the national backlash against the state.

Others were critical of Palin, including former Rep. Andrew Halcro, a former Republican state representative from Anchorage who ran against her last year as an independent. He said that he'd love to hear what Stevens has to say but that it makes sense for Stevens to keep quiet so it doesn't look as if he's trying to influence the inquiry.

SILENCE ROUSES SUSPICIONS

For many of his constituents, Stevens' non-answers have grown frustrating, and they've created a "whiff of wrongdoing," said state Sen. Hollis French, a Democrat and former prosecutor from Anchorage who co-chairs the state Senate Judiciary Committee.

French said it is time for Stevens to "at least give us his side of the story."

"Like a lot of folks, I think when you hold that job, you hold a public trust," French said. "Your relationship with the public is different than that of an ordinary citizen who gets pounced on by the FBI. It's not obstruction of justice to get in front of the cameras and say 'I did nothing wrong.' "

News that he was the subject of a federal wiretap hasn't changed Stevens' status in the Senate. When his home was raided, at least two government watchdog groups called for him to step down from his powerful committee posts until the federal investigation has been resolved.

But Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said last month that because Stevens "maintains his innocence" and no charges have been filed, his Republican colleagues will not ask him to step down from committees or refer the matter to the Senate Ethics committee.

Reporter Kyle Hopkins in Anchorage contributed to this story. Read Erika Bolstad and Hopkins on the Alaska Politics blog at adn.com/alaskapolitics.

LOAD-DATE: September 26, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

« previous | MUCK HOME

Senate Leaders Mum on Stevens

By Laura McGann - September 24, 2007, 4:57PM

The Senate is certainly a kinder place to mucked-up pols than the House.

Despite testimony last week from former Veco CEO Bill Allen that he bribed Sen. Ted Sevens (R-AK) and news that the FBI taped two of their phone conversations, Senate leaders haven't commented on the legal woes plaguing the longest-serving Republican senator.

That's in stark contrast to how the House leadership has reacted to news of investigations. House Republicans apparently put the squeeze on Rep. John Doolittle (R-CA) to remove him from his committee spots. Democrats gave Rep. William Jefferson (D-CA) the same treatment. Senate Republicans did react aggressively to news of Sen. Larry Craig's ov)

arently this is a much different case.

eader Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-KY) if Stevens should ittee assignments in the wake of the scandal.
a July 31 statement, in which he referred to Stevens' the Senate and said he didn't have "any e, Majority Leader Sen. Harry Reid (D-NV) was on [Sen.] Larry Craig [R-Idaho]. I'm not going

... I'm not going to get into that."

ens

PRINT SHARE

ADVERTISEMENT

Proactive Identity Theft Protection with a $1 Million Guarantee
LifeLock. Guarantee Your Good Name
Learn More
Todd Davis LifeLock CEO SSN# 457-55-5462

ctive
ty Theft Protection with a $1 Million Guarantee
LifeLock. Guarantee Your Good Name
I'm Todd Davis, CEO of LifeLock, and this is my real social security number.
457-55-5462

Comments (6)

M M wrote on September 24, 2007 5:15 PM:

In a backhanded way, Reid equates the Craig scandal with the Stevens scandal! I'm sure Stevens is pleased...

BTW, is it a bad sign that an agency (the FBI) of the most Republican politicized DoJ ends up tapping your phone calls even though you are the longest sitting Republican senator? Ouch...

Ed*ard Teller wrote on September 24, 2007 5:27 PM:

Sen. Lieberman hearted St. Ted this morning in Senate hearings on reforms in the primary process. Stevens sounded particularly tired and tiresome.

FBI - Stevens-1228

194-AW-13620-M;536

"That's in stark contrast to how the House leadership has reacted to news of investigations..."

If that's the case Laura, why so little action on Rep. Don Young? Is it because the House leadership has been tipped off about aspects of the Young investigation(s) that the general public is unaware of?

phil James wrote on September 24, 2007 5:39 PM:

No surprise that Reid had nothing to say. Reid has nothing to say about anything of real import. But he did allow the vote to condemn MoveOn. What an incredible leader.

global citizen wrote on September 24, 2007 5:40 PM:

Perhaps no action has been taken since it takes so long to get the word down the tubes all the way from Alaska.

Anonymous wrote on September 24, 2007 5:53 PM:

"McConnell referred back to a July 31 statement, in which he referred to Stevens' "four decades of service" in the Senate..."

Four decades of corruption is now a positive asset in our current Senate...

oldtree wrote on September 24, 2007 6:42 PM:

He is my friend and colleague and I can't say anything mean about him or he will tell about my involvement with the Glendale Savings and Iran Contra and Jimmy "primate" Gibbons and his cheese empire..... dirty boys and girls have a criminal in their midst and won't do anything. looks like they are criminals because they are aiding and abetting a crime or crime figure, protecting and defending same. This is how it would read in language that would be used to prosecute you or I under normal criminal statutes or RICO laws. But they allow this as doing business. It is corrupt and broken, and those benefitting will not make changes when it is so lucrative prove that the country hasn't been sold. I rest my case.

Post a comment

Name:

Email Address:

URL:

☐ Remember personal info?

Comments:

SEND»

FBI - Stevens-1229

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

State on sidelines of FBI investigation into Veco

TAKING NOTES: The attorney general's office won't interfere with the federal investigation.

By SEAN COCKERHAM
scockerham@adn.com

(Published: September 27, 2007)

Alaska Attorney General Talis Colberg said his office assigned lawyers to closely watch former-state Rep. Pete Kott's trial in federal court over the past two weeks as it revealed other possible criminal acts by politicians and Veco Corp. executives.

Colberg said the attorney general's office isn't ignoring the revelations. But he said the state has to proceed carefully before pursuing its own criminal charges. The broad federal investigation into corruption in Alaska politics doesn't appear to be close to finished. The feds don't want interference from the state, according to Colberg.

"They've made it clear enough that they appreciate us not stepping into the middle of something that's ongoing," Colberg said.

He said the federal government has also declined to share the results of its investigation with the state.

Jurors on Tuesday convicted Eagle River Republican Kott on federal charges of conspiracy, bribery and extortion. Next up are federal trials of former Republican state Reps. Vic Kohring and Bruce Weyhrauch. It's clear the federal government is investigating other Alaska politicians as well, including U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

The state is under a lot of pressure to act instead of relying on the FBI to clean up corruption here. The Alaska Public Offices Commission, a state agency known as APOC, has decided to investigate political polls Veco and possibly other companies bought for candidates.

APOC Executive Director Brooke Miles said the commissioners determined that, with all the public scrutiny and seeming unhappiness with APOC's lack of action, they wanted to find out the facts.

There was testimony at Kott's trial that Veco routinely paid for candidate's political polls, including a $20,000 poll for then-Gov. Frank Murkowski last year before he was a declared candidate for re-election. One of the federal charges against Kott was that Veco illegally bought him a poll.

It's not clear what APOC will do with the findings of its investigation into the other polls paid for by Veco. APOC says it is hindered by the one-year statute of limitations in state law on imposing civil penalties for campaign violations. The polls brought up at Kott's trial are more than a year old.

There is no one-year statute of limitations on criminal charges. APOC doesn't have the authority to pursue criminal matters but could refer its findings to the state attorney general's office. Miles, the APOC director, said that's a possibility.

APOC has only a single investigator. The attorney general's office, while lacking the manpower of the FBI, could call on state troopers and criminal prosecutors for a corruption probe.

FBI - Stevens-1230

194A-AN-13620-M;537

MORE THAN JUST POLLS

A pair of Democratic legislators from Anchorage, Les Gara and Harry Crawford, wrote APOC and the state attorney general this week to urge action. They said the state must investigate the polls and other apparent criminal acts that came up in Kott's trial and related federal indictments.

"The scope of this misconduct is unprecedented, and taking no action simply condones this conduct," their letter said.

Gara and Crawford said the illegal acts weren't limited to polls. They pointed to federal indictments in which Veco executives Bill Allen and Rick Smith pleaded guilty to paying "more than $10,000" in expenses for candidate fundraisers, knowing the money would be ultimately recorded as legitimate corporate expenses.

That violates the ban in state law on corporate contributions to candidates, Gara and Crawford said.

The indictment does not mention which fundraisers were illegal. But former Veco executive Smith testified that he organized many fundraisers, including the annual pig roast for Alaska Congressman Don Young.

'SPECIAL BONUSES'

Smith and Allen also testified about Veco's "special bonus program," where the company would reimburse Veco executives for campaign contributions.

That's also against Alaska law. Gara said that not all the former Veco executives involved in the program are under federal indictment, and maybe they should be under state indictment.

The state should also investigate what legislators besides those charged by federal prosecutors benefited from Veco in violation of state law, he said. So far, all legislators indicted have been Republicans.

"There's a lot the state can do," Gara said.

Gara said the state could pursue criminal charges on issues like illegal polls without interfering in the much broader federal investigation. Gara said, at this point, it looks like the state is doing nothing.

Colberg said he could not comment on any proposed or ongoing investigation. Colberg did not rule out the idea of the state going after side issues such as political polls without messing up the federal probe.

"We do not overlook the idea there is something they may not pursue that we may be able to," the attorney general said.

FBI - Stevens-1231

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him at 257-4344.

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

adn.com

Alaska Politics

Murkowski, Clark respond

Posted by Alaska_Politics
Posted: September 27, 2007 - 11:29 am

From Kyle Hopkins in Anchorage --

This week, we ran a story about political polls paid for by Veco. In the story, pollster David Dittman said that as best as he can remember, former Gov. Frank Murkowski's chief of staff, Jim Clark, had him bill a $20,000 poll to the company.

Yesterday, the editorial staff ran an opinion piece about the poll.

Clark called this morning with a prepared statement on behalf of himself and Murkowski.

He said:

"The allegations in the editorial are unfounded. Neither Gov. Murkowski nor I instructed David Dittman to do a poll and bill it to Veco. APOC reports show that the Murkowski campaign paid Dittman $102,000 during the primary campaign."

(Clark had declined to comment for the original story.)

After talking to Clark, I called Dittman and read him the statement.

"Wow," he said. "Wow, wow, wow. Geez, I hate to get into this ..."

I asked if the statement from Clark and Murkowski is true.

"No," he said.

A moment later he added: "The best way to say it is, that's not the way I remember it."

Dittman said he and Murkowski have been friends for 30 years and that in his view, there was nothing wrong with the poll.

He said he remembers conversations with Clark about billing Veco. "There were conversations... as I remember it. That's what I was suggested to do. And that's what we did do."

add new comment

19 September 28, 2007 - 9:26pm | Stumpy1

The totality of the corruption

Every once in a while a writer up in Fairbanks publishes work that is so well written, and insightful, that it must be shared.

The Yates piece below is as good as the piece written by Lori Backes last year in which she first used the moniker, 'Corrupt Bastards Club', or CBC, to describe VECO's corruption of the Alaska Legislature.

VECO stench corrupts GOP
By DOUGLAS YATES

"A fetid smell circulates in the forest this time of year. Rotting vegetation and decaying mushrooms forecast the change in seasons. But there's another odor slapping the faces of Alaskans these days. For many, it's unthinkable, but as details emerge from the federal court house in Anchorage, it's impossible to deny. It's like finding a freezer full of salmon after the power's been off for a week.

The spoiled legacy of Alaska's Republican Party has stained the carpet and mold is climbing the walls. The entire building

Alaska Politics

This is the place for news on Alaska politics -- state, local and national. Public life in the Last Frontier may never have been more interesting than right now -- the broad and still-evolving corruption investigation, a new governor, powerful members of Congress under scrutiny, and the usual hardball politics on the state, national and local levels. Come here for the latest news and join the discussion.

Contributors

Kyle Hopkins
Kyle Hopkins writes about Anchorage city government and politics. He covered last year's campaign for governor, and has blogged extensively about Alaska politics for the past year. He grew up in Southeast Alaska and was a reporter at the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner and Anchorage Press.
E-mail Kyle at khopkins@adn.com.

Sean Cockerham
Sean Cockerham writes about Alaska state politics. He spent three years based in Juneau for the Daily News before joining the Tacoma News-Tribune two years ago to write about Washington state politics. He went to Iraq twice for the News Tribune, and previously wrote about Alaska government and politics for the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner. Now he's back in Anchorage.
E-mail Sean at scockerham@adn.com.

Erika Bolstad
Erika Bolstad covers Alaska issues, including the congressional delegation, from Washington, D.C., for McClatchy Newspapers. Before joining the bureau this summer, she spent seven years as a reporter at the Miami Herald, where she covered politics, government and the state legislature.
E-mail Erika at ebolstad@adn.com.

Archive

PENCO plant (no, not that Penco) - 10/1/2007 3:37 pm
New sheriff in town? - 10/1/2007 3:22 pm
One Down - 10/1/2007 1:13 pm
More on Coconut Road - 10/1/2007 11:31 am
Hungry constituents - 10/1/2007 11:15 am
UPDATE: Ben Stevens on Fagan show audio - 9/28/2007 3:59 pm
APOC monday - 9/28/2007 2:05 pm
Murkowski, Clark respond - 9/27/2007 11:29 am
Final thoughts on Kott - 9/27/2007 10:47 am
Stevens talks about Palin, Allen, bridge money - 9/27/2007 10:33 am
Ethics complaint over Coconut Road earmark - 9/26/2007 7:28 pm
Colberg and the Kott trial - 9/26/2007 7:23 pm
Pools & the budget - 9/25/2007 8:17 pm
Kott guilty on three of four counts - 9/25/2007 3:05 pm
Verdict reached in Kott case - 9/25/2007 2:48 pm
Juror: Please replay Exhibit 15 - 9/25/2007 2:35 pm
Assembly: Pools, poo, money and ethics

Alaska's Top Jobs all 87 top jobs

Nursing
Nurse Practitioner
Planned Parenthood of Alaska

Driver/Transportation Driver
Corporate Express

Human Resources/Recruiting
Human Resources
Adak Telephone Utility Anchorage

Human Resources
HR Compliance Specialist
Hope Community Resources

Professional
Controller
Adak Telephone Utility Anchorage

careerbuilder
Search Jobs | Place an employment ad

Homes By Coldwell Banker more

4314 S. Pinnacle, Wasilla
Virtual Tour Available

7 of 15

Homescape

find

Search ADN Real Estate | Place a homes ad
Realtor Market Place | Valley Real Estate Guide

Top Rentals more

Terrace On The Lake
West Anchorage: A pleasant setting and voluminous floorplans will put your mind and body at ease.

6 of 12

194A-AN-13170-M;538

may need to be demolished if there's any hope of recovery.

Here's what we know. Until the FBI raided Juneau, the sellout of Alaska was a crime in progress. The state's oil and fisheries resources, as well as our integrity and sovereignty, were being auctioned off by predatory capitalists and their hired stooges. The bribery conviction on Tuesday of Pete Kott, the former Speaker of the House, confirms what many have known for years.

- 9/25/2007 2:27 pm
Notes from the jury - 9/25/2007 11:43 am
Jury quits for the day - 9/24/2007 4:56 pm
To the jury - 9/24/2007 12:24 pm
More commentary from inside Courtroom 3 - 9/24/2007 9:26 am Veco polling - 9/23/2007 6:57 am
full archive »

apartments.com
Advanced Search | Place a rentals ad
Top Autos all autos
Affordable Used Cars - Anchorage

2005 GMC Canyon
$18,994
Affordable Used Cars - Anchorage
9 of 10
Powered by Cars.com
Search for a New or Used Car | Place an auto ad

VECO was an oil field contractor. Its former chairman, Bill Allen, and Rick Smith, his lieutenant, made more than $400,000 in payoffs to elected officials. Their testimony and FBI evidence has implicated many current and former state and federal legislators for accepting bribes and favors for official actions or access.

So far, they include: state Sen. John Cowdery, former state representatives Bruce Weyhrauch and Vic Kohring, and former state Sen. Ben Stevens.

Rep. Don Young and Sen. Ted Stevens are under similar investigations. Another former legislator, Tom Anderson, was recently found guilty of accepting bribes. Anderson's wife, state Sen. Lesil McGuire, is being investigated for conflict of interest in another matter. Randy Ruedrich, Republican Party chair, was fined for political organizing while working for the state.

The major conspiracy appears to subvert legislation to the benefit of Alaska's big three oil companies, ConocoPhillips, Exxon and BP. In a phone call taped by the FBI, Allen and Jim Bowles, president of ConocoPhillips Alaska, talk about working behind the scenes to keep tax rates below a certain number.

Perhaps that's why ConocoPhillips is running diversionary TV spots headlining the chump change it throws at Creamer's Field Migratory Waterfowl Refuge and Potter Marsh. "Environmentalists" greenwashing Big Oil's white-collar crimes epitomize the depth of its influence.

Sen. Ted Stevens is the longest-serving Republican in the Senate, and fish rot from the head down. His careless lack of attention to the power of his office, his single-minded focus on grabbing money for Alaska while ignoring ethical standards, has attracted flies. It's time to clean camp.

Who in their right mind would allow VECO to act as his agent on a home-construction project? It's been an open secret for years that Allen's money greased the skids in Juneau. Did Uncle Ted think we were all blind?

A senator with a grasp of his place in the arc of history would have used his current term to groom a replacement. But at 84, Stevens has no protégés because there is no accountability in the Republican Party.

It's a free-for-all. Everyone is on their own; steal as much as you can carry. According to Allen, Ted's son Ben took more than $240,000 of VECO money while serving in the Legislature. Largely unmentioned yet is the $900,000 funneled to the younger Stevens in fees for allocating federal grants to seafood companies. Father and son wallowed in a moral cesspool and thought it smelled like roses.

Not to be outdone, Sen. Lisa Murkowski showed her family colors with a sweetheart deal for prime Kenai River property. It was sold to her by Bob Penny, a wealthy developer with a stake in fisheries legislation. When it was made public, Lisa denied special advantage but was soon overcome with buyer's remorse. She quickly dumped the property, but voters must wait until 2010 to express their regrets.

Rep. Don Young has been throwing federal transportation money around the country like a silage farmer spreading manure, apparently expecting a return on the investments. Young's $10 million Florida highway earmark was rejected by locals, except for a nearby landowner who sent $40,000 to Don's re-election campaign. With an investigation under way, Young is spending $250,000 for lawyers to shrink the stink.

Alaska's Constitution is a model of open government, but that didn't protect it from being sold down the river. Today's Republican Party is a club of glad-handers, thieves and liars, people who appear sincere then stab Alaskans in the back. Voters and the press, however, can't escape blame.

Malfeasance grows in a climate of apathy and weak journalism; it's a cancer that undermines Alaska's future. The cure is more sunlight."

Yates has made this work available for distribution. Copy/paste and email it to your friends.

This piece was also picked up and published by the News-Miner today, at the following link:

http://newsminer.com/2007/09/28/9086

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1233

18 September 28, 2007 - 8:45am | jewar79

The Murkiski -Clark pollster claims

First of all there are sevrial reasons to open an investigation under the entire Murkey administration period.We can only hopt that he and his are not allowed to just walk away from office in a very few short hours and never to be heard of until now ! think about that statement.We have heard excessive amount of news -information to be aware that his admi9n,has a lot of un answered questioins.We are 100% positive that an full investigatioin should be administered byt under the FBI,bacause every state investigation against the state or its peole will anways be tainted and in the state favor.As a 56 year citizen of Alaska ,we demand an full federal investigation be done ASAP.This guy came in here fromWA Dc and trashed every senior as his very first adminustrative act.

reply »

17 September 28, 2007 - 12:50am | pp05416

KYLE

Why is the link to the Article "Big oil fights change in tax" currently sending this message?
"Internal Server Error
The server encountered an internal error or misconfiguration and was unable to complete your request. Please contact the server administrator, support@nandomedia.com and inform them of the time the error occurred, and anything you might have done that may have caused the error.

More information about this error may be available in the server error log."

This really worries me.

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 11:31am | Alaska_Politics

Link

I don't see the link ... where did you originally see it?

Kyle

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 3:57pm | hey_georgie_girl_98

Where did you move the article on Big Oil?

Where did you move front page articles after they get bumped?

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 11:50am | leowassilie

fixed

it's fixed now.

probably a misaligned link.

reply »

16 September 27, 2007 - 8:36pm | akallegro

Kyle

does ADN have any ongoing attempt to get a response from Jim Clark and Governor Murkowski regarding the Jim Bowles and Bill Allen recording?

Bowles reveals in that recording that he is privy to Clarks schedule as it pertains to the Legislature and PPT. Bowles states that Clark has informed Bowles that he has scheduled a meeting with Representative Kelly.

Bowles tells Allen regarding that meeting "if thats the only contact he's made then thats OK" and its "OK because he (Clark) felt that Harris had asked him to have that meeting".

Those quotes from the conversation establish that the Governors chief of staff was revealing to Bowles who he was contacting in the Legislature regarding PPT and in addition was assuring Bowles that he would not have additional contact with other legislators.

I would ask Clark:
Why was he sharing with the president of Conoco Phillips, information about who in the Legislature he was meeting with to discuss PPT, when they are one of the very company's PPT was going to affect? Also, why did Clark feel compelled to assure Bowles that he would not have any other contact with legislators regarding PPT?

I would also ask Murkowski if he was aware that his chief of staff was sharing this type of info with Bowles and making commitments to him regarding who he would and would not have meetings with.

Has anyone at ADN submitted the same line of questioning to Bowles?

Another nugget that is revealed in that same conversation? Bill Allen states that he is aware of what Rep. Kelly said to Clark during that meeting. The meeting happened the very morning the phone conversation was recorded so somebody was updating Allen very quickly.

FBI - Stevens-1234

Is ADN pursuing Kelly as to why Bill Allen would have that information? Allen doesn't make it clear if he got the info from Kelly or Clark. Perhaps there was someone else in the meeting?

Given the Ruedrich incidents and Clarks failure to respond then, this issue certainly seems like it warrants the ADN's close scrutiny. I hope there is someone working on it.

Relentlessly.

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 11:23am | Alaska_Politics

Akallegro,

Editor Pat Dougherty talks about that recording on his blog ... click here.

Kyle

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 10.14pm | sewinds

While you're at it Mr. Hopkins.

Could you look into the special interest groups and their lobbyists who are advising Palin on gasline issues? Who's advice she's taking and who she refuses to talk to. With declining oil field production and investment and a huge economic disaster coming Alaska's way it seems that Palin's advisers, her special interests and their lobbyists need closer scrutiny.

reply »

15 September 27, 2007 - 7:00pm | Natalie_O

Where I sit, Palin is not the worry right now

Unless Palin does something unethical and dishonest, or criminal, she will remain Governor until her term expires. We can't change that and we have to deal with it. Personally, I think her actions so far are uncomparable to those of her predecessor, as if to say, I think she's doing a fair job. As for Murkowski, you people had voted for him in the past, not me, so you need to lay in your own bed. I have a clean conscience about that, besides, its too late to do anything about M. He should have been removed from the position long before his term expired. But right now, we have to get this corruption mess cleaned up first before we can move forward, with our without Palin. What bothers me more than Palin is the fact that we have an unethical and corrupt DC Senator and the same for a DC Congressman, of which both have not been charged with anything even though testimony has come out in the trials that would dictate that some form of legal action is required and needs to be taken. To me, this is more troubling than anything going on with Palin.

reply »

14 September 27, 2007 - 6:39pm | BravoSierra

Murky and Clark are banished

Now get rid of this guy-quick http://www.adn.com/front/story/5572779p-5504444c.html

reply »

13 September 27, 2007 - 6.38pm | leowassilla

I wonder

wow.
wOw.
woW.
Wow.
wOW.
WoW.
WOw.
WOW!

A man of many words.

reply »

12 September 27, 2007 - 3:57pm | windham

Pathological Liars

Jim Clark and Frank Murkowski are professional, pathological liars, always have been, always will be. Putting them under oath will make no difference. Dittman is obviously the truth-teller in this matter.

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 5:49pm | Ter_H

Blunt and accurate.

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 11:07pm | seewhy

he should have just had jim say that he paid every bill for polling he was presented with.

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 9:44am | realist

Good one there

Was going to say this earlier, but today's ADN editorial beat me to the punch -- legally, I'm not sure if it matters too much whether Murky himself asked for the poll. If he accepted it, then that's some kind of violation right there. Seems like Clark is already doing the lawyerly word-parsing thing.
And it makes me wonder -- how come nobody's lining up to give ME $20,000 gifts?????
How do we regular people get in on this gig?

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 10:47am | HD

Simple...

We're not Bill Allen's "friend." Murky, Kott, Kohring, Don, Ted and Ben, etc. WERE his friends. Isn't it sad to see a friendship end?

FBI - Stevens-1235

reply »

September 29, 2007 - 8:00pm | pp05416

The only time I can remember Murky getting off his a in the Senate, he sponsored one bill that is the reason direct deposits to my credit union account now don't get posted until Friday rather than Wednesday. (Unfair competition to his banking lobby who make extra $$$ on the money market!) The other is when Daschle wrote a bill to open NPR and Murkowski, seeing that he might get flack for neglecting his duty, started whining that he should be a co-sponsor. Murky is part of the Big Oil conspiracy to lock up our petroleum resources, so they can control the prices in America and greatly increase profits. All the while blaming "greenies". Prison is only too good for him. After that he became governor and bent over backwards every time multinationals came a callin'.

reply »

11 September 27, 2007 - 2:45pm | Stags_Leap

Palin-bots

the prom queen needs to start governing the state -and actually do something other than issuing press releases and blaming Frank for everything.

That's the downside to this entire scandal. Everyone is focused on the CBC and other investigations, and no one is paying attention to what the hell is happening in the Gov's mansion -or should I say in the Valley. The PPT is a fiasco, MatMaid is a joke, and AGIA is doomed to fail....

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 6:18pm | BravoSierra

first things first

I am amazed you haven't yet blamed the "Prom Queen" for global warming.

How about cleaning out all the dirt/crooks and then starting to get our house in order?

You are sinking to the same level of credibility as bobbyt. Not yet, but you are getting closer.

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 7:12pm | Stags_Leap

the point my little Palin-bots is that others' mistakes in the past are giving your queen a free pass to do nothing. Sure - they should all burn in hell.

But I am more concerned with today -and the decisions she is making now -or lack of decisions -on running the state. PPT, MatMaid, and AGIA are just the tip. What about domestic violence rates in this state? What about affordable health care for children in this state? What about doing something to improve the standards of living for all Alaskans - instead of empty rhetoric through press releases that piggyback on to the demise of the CBC boys?

reply »

September 29, 2007 - 8:45pm | pp05416

More likely

BP-bots, Conoco/Phillips-bots, and Exxon-bots. Icicle-bots, Princess Cruise-bots, etc.. You put the ads up - I do as you say masters or I'm destined to suffer your wrath! By the way Stags, when have any of your concerns been addressed in the past. Thee's no money in the offing for the CBC boys.

reply »

September 29, 2007 - 9:54pm | gilid

You Forgot

Oil-Can-Dan Fagan-bots. :-)

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 9:18pm | barracos_pizza

What is this?

Is this some kind of spam bot?

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 7:41pm | rfn

And besides....

Being governor is a man's job!

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 10:42pm | sewinds

Palin mismanagement syndrome

FBI - Stevens-1236

Being governor is a FULL-TIME job. It's blatantly obvious Palin's not focused as she chases one crises after another instead of being in front of them.

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 10:14am | rfn

However....

Being Mayor of Anchorage is also supposed to be a FULL-TIME job but the occupant moonlights as a radio talk show host. Perhaps you'd feel better about the governor if she'd take up talk show hosting, too?

Oh, but wait! I forgot....the boy mayor is male and therefore possessed of super powers so can handle multiple jobs.....but the governor refuses to shed her shoes or get pregnant.

reply »

October 1, 2007 - 10:20am | AK_Lady

Ha!

I'd pay to hear Palin host talk radio!

Can you imagine?

reply »

October 1, 2007 - 10:50am | rfn

Ambiguous but fun to guess.....

Whether one might imagine Palin hosting talk radio?

Whether one might imagine you paying for something instead of relying on government to provide it free?

One is more believable than the other....question is, "which"?

reply »

October 1, 2007 - 11:58am | AK_Lady

Huh?

What is it you think I reply on government to pay for? Talk radio?

reply »

October 1, 2007 - 12:48pm | rfn

Anything that government might be willing to pay for.

But that was choice #2.....

I really had expected you to choose #1.

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 9:01pm | F_Firkle

One day, rfn, should we ever

One day, rfn, should we ever meet, I shall make an effort to buy you a beer, or whatever fits the bill at that moment.

I've appreciated your clarity, dry sense of humor, and thoughts.

Cheers. And keep up the good work. ;^>)

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 10:46am | sewinds

The Palin Show with no edits

Ooh Baby. Like she can put thoughts together into one cohesive sentence also? She'd have to talk about more than just Piper's toothbrush and the bad ethics of everyone else but herself and anonymous bloggers and would have guests (her "special-interest" advisers and people from the valley) to fill the dead empty air.

Get real. Palin's a soundbite kind of gal. Erratic and scatterbrained.

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 10.23am | akgen

ah rfn you keep forgetting,

"chained to the stove".... I really don't understand how you of all people could forget this detail !! just joking. I did post a owl soup receipe a while back ... did you get it?

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 12:20pm | Stags_Leap

where's the humor?

FBI - Stevens-1237

I have to quote Bacon -which seems rather appropriate for the two of you -stoking your own jokes.

"Imagination was given to man to compensate him for what he is not; a sense of humor to console him for what he is."

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 12:33pm | akgen

Staggering while leaping, lets hope it doesn't ruin the rest of your day.

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 3:43pm | rfn

To the extent that such deep concern over nonsense built upon the original nonsense kept one person from jaywalking.....it was a massive success!

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 3:52pm | akgen

jaywalking ?

I hate to counterpoint or disagree with some of your fine words, but don't you mean, jayleaping? lol.

Anyhow, I guess Palin and Galvin will be on the radio this pm - 4 oclock hour on kudo1080. They're going to talk ACES and why not "go for the gross".

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 3:56pm | rfn

Jayleaping is not a problem

so long as the leaps are of sufficient breadth to go from one side of the street to t'other without touching down in the middle or bouncing off the roof of a passing police car.

I guess I'll have to read about the Palin/Galvin stuff; just tried again to tune KUDO, even in the truck which has a pretty decent radio. Just not enough signal. Now if they had some union technicians maybe things might be better?

But, alas, a union-owned station whose staff is not unionized.

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 4:06pm | akgen

Use the internet and listen online. kudo1080.com. Thats what I got to do. I've not the antanna strength to receive it. Oh well. However I do want to know why she was dragged away from the gross kicking and screaming.

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 4:28pm | rfn

Thanks!

I wish it worked....but it didn't. I did manage to get to the station's website and, after a little stumbling, found a "Listen Live" "button".

It caused the browser to churn and churn and churn and then to crash. Not only the browser, the entire cable modem! Had to restart the browser, the computer, and finally the modem just get back here. Then I tried it again....which is why I was away so long. This time it just timed out.

I'm no fan of this "ACES" thing. Anything much more complex than basing a tax on the gross is just inviting chicanery. The rate doesn't bother me....make it whatever great minds agree upon....but make damn sure the determination of what's owed is simple and as near to possible as being diddle-proof!

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1238

September 28, 2007 - 12.23pm | seewhy

mmmmmm.
bacon.

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 1:38pm | Stags_Leap

or instead of "imagination" in that quote I should use "the ADN Blog" -as you Palin-bots obviously got some serious issues.

Let me know when Palin does something other than screw up MatMaid, the PPT, or AGIA. Her press releases are meaningless.

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 9.29pm | barracos_pizza

PPT..
Okay Stags, you're right. PPT is fowled up.We need to get to the bottom of this Palin PPT connection now. Let's send in a team of investigators.

Let me see, was Governor Palin the governor when PPT was enacted? I think I would first check the last number in the year PPT was passed, and the year when she was inagurated which is 7.

Let call up some of my "deep throat " connections in the Gov't and see if I can get any information.

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 1:50pm | sewinds

Sound of silence
LOL. You're going to wait a long time Stags. Palin can't even get Piper to brush her teeth.

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 10:29am | rfn

No, No, NO!
Can't keep 'em chained to the stove! A chain long enough to let 'em get to the backyard to split the firewood would damage the vinyl on the kitchen floor! Worse, it would wake the master of the house from his nap.

Thanks for the recipe....though it turned out I didn't need it. My son found the box of "Spotted Owl Helper" I gave him way back when.

Any takers for the recipe for the special sauce as made on The Seward Penninsula?

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 10.42am | akgen

vinyl ?
must be nice... but plywood holds the heat in better, but I suppose vinyl helps avoid wood splinters in the tootsies. lol

That whole conversation about 'special sauses' started a entirely new set of recordings from grams on good foods, from "way back in the day".

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 10:48am | rfn

Vinyl over plywood!
Ya gets it both ways....no splinters and it does allow the use of somewhat longer chains as it mildly controls some of the noise. Now if somebody would just invent a light-weight vinyl covered chain the concept of "chained to the stove" might work whilst still allowing enough length for the wench to reach the woodpile!

Besides, wood floors imply hiring a flooring contractor who deals in hardwoods! Any reader of this blog KNOWS that all hardwood floor installers are corrupt.

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 11:20am | prey

ovaries, both these chicks got them. And a pair of chain cutters and link crimpers. I wouldn't put it beyond them to cut those chains off and recrimp them to another unsuspecting ankle.

FBI - Stevens-1239

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 3:57pm | akgen

hey prey,

How about some of them old cb radio jokes you used to do? Sometimes we need a good laugh around here.

reply »

1 2 next › last »

© Copyright 2007, The Anchorage Daily News, a subsidiary of The McClatchy Company

Contact Us | Newsroom Contacts | Communication Forms | Subscriptions | Advertising | Terms of Use

Daily News Jobs | RSS Feeds | ADN Store | Newspapers in Education | Privacy Agreement

A member of the
Real Cities Network

FBI - Stevens-1240

Help ALASKA'S NEWSPAPER alaska.com

adn.com

Anchorage Daily News
ELECTRONIC EDITION
THE COMPLETE PAPER, DAILY

Get your paper online!
To sign up: CLICK HERE

Search in All for find

News Sports Outdoors Features Money Entertainment Opinion Blogs Multimedia Classified

Home | Alaska Newsreader | Obituaries | Archives Movies | Music | Restaurants | Submit an Event Deals Jobs Homes Cars Rentals

Alaska Politics

Murkowski, Clark respond

Posted by Alaska_Politics
Posted: September 27, 2007 - 11:29 am

From Kyle Hopkins in Anchorage --

This week, we ran a story about political polls paid for by Veco. In the story, pollster David Dittman said that as best as he can remember, former Gov. Frank Murkowski's chief of staff, Jim Clark, had him bill a $20,000 poll to the company.

Yesterday, the editorial staff ran an opinion piece about the poll.

Clark called this morning with a prepared statement on behalf of himself and Murkowski.

He said:

"The allegations in the editorial are unfounded. Neither Gov. Murkowski nor I instructed David Dittman to do a poll and bill it to Veco. APOC reports show that the Murkowski campaign paid Dittman $102,000 during the primary campaign."

(Clark had declined to comment for the original story.)

After talking to Clark, I called Dittman and read him the statement.

"Wow," he said. "Wow, wow, wow. Geez, I hate to get into this ..."

I asked if the statement from Clark and Murkowski is true.

"No," he said.

A moment later he added: "The best way to say it is, that's not the way I remember it."

Dittman said he and Murkowski have been friends for 30 years and that in his view, there was nothing wrong with the poll.

He said he remembers conversations with Clark about billing Veco. "There were conversations... as I remember it. That's what I was suggested to do. And that's what we did do."

add new comment

September 27, 2007 - 6:11pm | gilld

Stags_Leap

Was Governor Palin mentioned in this article? I've read it twice now; both times it seems to be only about Murkowski, Clark and polls conducted by Mr. Dittman.

Did I miss something?

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 6:28pm | sewinds

Good point Gill

What about ALL the polls Big-Boy Dittman has done for Palin during and after her campaign? Did he share them with her? You know, during the campaign? Did she disclose ALL of them as campaign donations? How much? Since becoming governor BB Dittman has been polling. Is he sharing them with her? How much? Palin disclose these gifts too? Were is the report on gifts to the governor?

reply »

Alaska Politics

This is the place for news on Alaska politics -- state, local and national. Public life in the Last Frontier may never have been more interesting than right now -- the broad and still-evolving corruption investigation, a new governor, powerful members of Congress under scrutiny, and the usual hardball politics on the state, national and local levels. Come here for the latest news and join the discussion.

Contributors

Kyle Hopkins
Kyle Hopkins writes about Anchorage city government and politics. He covered last year's campaign for governor, and has blogged extensively about Alaska politics for the past year. He grew up in Southeast Alaska and was a reporter at the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner and Anchorage Press.
E-mail Kyle at khopkins@adn.com.

Sean Cockerham
Sean Cockerham writes about Alaska state politics. He spent three years based in Juneau for the Daily News before joining the Tacoma News-Tribune two years ago to write about Washington state politics. He went to Iraq twice for the News Tribune, and previously wrote about Alaska government and politics for the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner. Now he's back in Anchorage.
E-mail Sean at scockerham@adn.com.

Erika Bolstad
Erika Bolstad covers Alaska issues, including the congressional delegation, from Washington, D.C., for McClatchy Newspapers. Before joining the bureau this summer, she spent seven years as a reporter at the Miami Herald, where she covered politics, government and the state legislature.
E-mail Erika at ebolstad@adn.com.

Archive

PENCO plant (no, not that Penco) - 10/1/2007 3:37 pm
New sheriff in town? - 10/1/2007 3:22 pm
One Down - 10/1/2007 1:13 pm
More on Coconut Road - 10/1/2007 11:31 am
Hungry constituents - 10/1/2007 11:15 am
UPDATE: Ben Stevens on Fagan show audio - 9/28/2007 3:59 pm
APOC monday - 9/28/2007 2:05 pm
Murkowski, Clark respond - 9/27/2007 11:29 am
Final thoughts on Kott - 9/27/2007 10:47 am
Stevens talks about Palin, Allen, bridge money - 9/27/2007 10:33 am
Ethics complaint over Coconut Road earmark - 9/26/2007 7:28 pm
Colberg and the Kott trial - 9/26/2007 7:23 pm
Pools & the budget - 9/25/2007 6:17 pm
Kott guilty on three of four counts - 9/25/2007 3:05 pm
Verdict reached in Kott case - 9/25/2007 2:48 pm
Juror: Please replay Exhibit 15 - 9/25/2007 2:35 pm
Assembly: Pools, poo, money and ethics

Alaska's Top Jobs all 87 top jobs

Professional
Senior Appraiser
Municipality of Anchorage

Aviation
Stock Clerk
Lynden Air Cargo, LLC

Admin Support Services
Program Project Coordinator
Assist Alaska Network on Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault

Computer/IT
Web Developer
Alaska USA Federal Credit Union

Health Care Services
Clinical Supervisor
Southcentral Foundation

careerbuilder
Search Jobs | Place an employment ad

Homes by Coldwell Banker more

23346 Creek Rd., Chugiak
Virtual Tour Available

14 of 15

Homescape

find

Search ADN Real Estate | Place a homes ad
Realtor Market Place | Valley Real Estate Guide

Top Rentals more

Foxwood Condominiums
South Anchorage: heated garage parking, woodburning fireplaces, shopping and fine dining nearby!

3 of 12

FBI - Stevens-1241

September 27, 2007 - 7:28pm | gilid

Tutorial

Excuse me if this posting sounds overly much like a lesson, as that is what I do in my professional life and I sometimes fall into the habit post-workday. Let me just post this hyperlink to a tutorial on hyperlinks.

You can use hyperlinks to give the reader a clickable link to another web site where you, the poster, have found information that you want the reader to, uh, read. The reader, then, is able to verify what it is that you, the poster, are stating or claiming.

For example, you could hyperlink to a site listing "...ALL the polls" Mr. Dittman (I don't know him personally and so can't refer to him as "Big-Boy") has done for Gov. Palin. Or you could link your reader to a site detailing Gov. Palin's gifts, or the APOC documents showing her (or any politician's) campaign contributions.

Or are you just asking rhetorical questions in your postings?

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 10:25pm | sewinds

More rhetoric

You'll have to excuse me gilid. I'm new to this blog thing and remember when typewriters were the only machines around. Good ideas about the links to the polls and the guv's gift report on her website. (I didn't find anything close on her website.) Enjoy your youth gilidy.

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 6:27pm | gilid

Thanks, sewinds

But the important question I (and perhaps others) have: did you find anything you could link us to? Poll reports, gift reports, anything? Anything that would support, or not support, the claims you make in your posts?

And an additional thanks: I did enjoy my youth! It's just possible I may have a year or two on you, sewinds. Just this week I completed paperwork for my second retirement from working life: yep, I'm a double-dipper. And son-of-a-gun, I learned to type on manual typewriters, too! And when personal computers became widely available, learned how to use them (also discovered this feature called a spell checker; I recommend it to all my friends).

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 6:16pm | HD

All symptoms are present...

Stags is suffering from PDS - Palin Derangement Syndrome. Apparently incurable. Sad. Let's hope the suffering won't be long...

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 6:58pm | gilid

True, HD

Stags (and sewinds, too) do suffer mightly from PDS. I'm sure the Service High School quarterback's recent broken leg will be shown to have been caused by Sarah Palin, no, really!

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 7:05pm | Ter_H

Sarah did NOT cuase the quarterback's leg to be broken.....

because it is Frank's fault. ;-)

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 7:20pm | gilid

...And Clark!

:-)

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 7:47pm | Ter_H

Ding!

HaHa.

reply »

10 September 27, 2007 - 2:44pm | hey_georgie_girl_98

Murkowski, Clark respond

- 9/25/2007 2:27 pm
Notes from the jury - 9/25/2007 11:43 am
Jury quits for the day - 9/24/2007 4:56 pm
To the jury - 9/24/2007 12:24 pm
More commentary from inside Courtroom 3 - 9/24/2007 9:26 am Veco polling - 9/23/2007 6:57 am

full archive »

apartments.com
Advanced Search | Place a rentals ad

Top Autos all autos
Affordable Used Cars - Anchorage

2004 Chevrolet Tracker
$11,994
Affordable Used Cars - Anchorage

9 of 10

Powered by Cars.com
Search for a New or Used Car | Place an auto ad

FBI - Stevens-1242

Sworn testimony, under oath vs. a prepared statement.

reply »

9 September 27, 2007 - 2:39pm | Stags_Leap

pointless

it's a he said -she said issue. And the state laws are so vague on this issue anyway -it's not something that would send Frank to jail -even if they could show VECO paid for $20K in polls. He would do a Don Young and revise his his campaign reports.

This is a non issue.

reply »

September 28, 2007 - 9:17pm | F_Firkle

A non issue? Perhaps so.

A non issue?

Perhaps so.

But if it's shown that he and Marquez conspired when APOC was reportedly instructed by Marquez to not investigate Ray Metcalfe's complaints about Benny Stevens, then perhaps a federal conspiracy or obstruction charge might stick.

And that's assuming that no evidence is uncovered re. 'other gifts, promises, or payments' that VECO or others might've slopped frankie's way.

Then there's that letter from Murky's office to U.S. Sen. Pete Domenici, then chair of the Senate Energy Committee (and currently also under investigation), stating that GW's plan (page 118 of Shrubco's energy bill that year) to empower the Secretary of the Interior to waive up to 100% of revenues from drilling in NPR-A was just fine and dandy, as it would be one method of "stimulating exploration and development on the North Slope." A field that was surveyed as having 13 Billion recoverable barrels of oil (as of approximately 3-4 years ago).

Murky's dirty, in my opinion, and I hope that he fries hot.

reply »

8 September 27, 2007 - 2:09pm | edgefinder

Vegas should be making odds on this.

Indictments pay 3 to 1.

and 10 to 1 Frank walks the plank.

Or I guess would those odds be too generous?

I guess it depands on how the syncophants bet.

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 2:22pm | leowassilla

Kinda like..Nenana Ice Classic

The real odds should be placed in these guys not only getting indicted, but in them getting PARDONED before GW leaves office.

Tune in.. December 26, 2008.

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 10:55pm | barracos_pizza

Yeah, talk to the

Yeah, talk to the oddsmakers. See if they can cut a deal to get the federal taxes in on it , too.

And how about do those football chance polls for the numbers on the sentences.. $5 bucks sign a square at your local cantina. Voc, Pete,TA, Weyrach, any number of 'em. Double digit sentencing splits the pot between the digits.

reply »

7 September 27, 2007 - 1:26pm | Ter_H

Clark is a POS that, along with Murkowski, have..... done more to harm our State than 100 Rick Smith's and Bill Allen's combined.

reply »

5 September 27, 2007 - 12:58pm | leowassilla

Moment...

Pete Kott $2,000

Frank Murkowski $20,000.

These guys claiming innocent.. priceless!

reply »

4 September 27, 2007 - 12:48pm | Alaalik

FBI - Stevens-1243

APOC?
Simple matter. Get Dittman's invoice records, and VECO's accounts payables or Allen's checking account statement.

reply »

3 September 27, 2007 - 12:45pm | raingod

$102K
Wow - $102,000. I thought he only worked on the campaign for a few months: http://community.adn.com/adn/blogs/thetrail/dittman

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 8:24pm | seewhy

102,000, just on polls and the incumbent governor came in a distant third in a closed primary. blows my mind, man.

reply »

2 September 27, 2007 - 12:43pm | leowassilie

pfft.
These guys are priceless.

reply »

1 September 27, 2007 - 12:22pm | adnak

VECO-Gate!
What are we going to call this sad episode in Alaskan history?

VECO-Gate.

This whole sick era of seeing our legislative representation crumble needs a name for posterity?

VECO-Gate!

What we will we name this shameful period, for history, so that all Alaskans need to just hear it mentioned to know exactly what people are talking about many years from now?

VECO-Gate!

So that it never happens again, and Alaskan pols shudder when they are offered a chance to go astray with our trust?

VECO-Gate.

reply »

September 27, 2007 - 5:13pm | staufen

Maybe it's VECO-DOME
the Thunder cage where lying politicians fight it out - where "two enter, only one leaves" ...

Clark is sitting on the shoulders of the Frankenonsense, Dittman puts them down ...

reply »

« first ‹ previous 1 2

© Copyright 2007, The Anchorage Daily News, a subsidiary of The McClatchy Company

Contact Us | Newsroom Contacts | Communication Forms | Subscriptions | Advertising | Terms of Use

Daily News Jobs | RSS Feeds | ADN Store | Newspapers in Education | Privacy Agreement

A member of the
Real Cities Network

FBI - Stevens-1244

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Senate panel asked to take new look at Young's Florida earmark

FLORIDA: Highway money may be unconstitutional, critics say.

By GREG GORDON
McClatchy Newspapers

(Published: September 27, 2007)

WASHINGTON -- A watchdog group asked the House ethics committee on Wednesday to investigate how a $10 million earmark for a Florida highway interchange, which was backed by Alaska Rep. Don Young, was inserted into a bill that already had won final congressional approval.

In a letter to the committee's leaders, Ryan Alexander, president of Taxpayers for Common Sense, called "the actions taken by Young's staff ... an apparent violation" of the Constitution that undermined the integrity of the House of Representatives.

"In the absence of an accounting and explanation, the public is left to assume the worst, further degrading the already low public regard for Congress," Alexander wrote the committee chairwoman, Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones, D-Ohio, and the ranking Republican, Rep. Doc Hastings of Washington. The committee is scheduled to meet Friday.

McClatchy Newspapers reported recently that the FBI is investigating the 2005 earmark for a $10 million study of a proposed Coconut Road interchange near Bonita Springs, Fla., as part of an inquiry into whether Young, R-Alaska, traded his influence as chairman of the House Transportation Committee for campaign contributions or other favors.

On Feb. 19, 2005, three weeks before the House passed a massive, six-year transportation bill, Young visited the site of the proposed interchange along Interstate 75, which was sought by real estate developer Daniel Aronoff. Young also attended a political fundraiser, netting more than $40,000 in donations from builders and developers, including Aronoff, whose land would soar in value if linked to I-75.

The bill that won final passage later that summer earmarked $10 million for "widening and improvements for I-75" in Collier and Lee counties. But on Aug. 10, the language was altered to read: "Coconut Rd. Interchange I-75/Lee County."

Alexander noted in his letter that the earmark was the only one of 6,371 allocations for congressional pet projects to be substantially changed during the "bill enrollment process," in which the House clerk makes technical corrections.

FBI - Stevens-1245

Young has maintained that he earmarked the money for the Coconut Road interchange because residents told him they wanted it in 2005 when he attended one of their community transportation meetings.

Alexander said that in 1854, an alleged tiny, but substantive, alteration of a House land grant bill for the Territory of Minnesota after final congressional passage led to an inquiry that concluded that the perpetrator should face "severe censure."

Alexander called on the ethics committee to investigate who substituted the earmark language, who knew of the change and on whose authority it was made.

194A-AN-13620-M;539

Print Page Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1246

« previous | MUCK HOME

Alaska Lawmakers Want Info on Veco Ties From Big Oil

By Laura McGann - September 28, 2007, 6:24PM

Two Democratic state legislators in Alaska wrote to three major oil companies today asking whether they were involved in Veco's bribe-laden lobbying effort last year on an oil tax law.

Former Veco CEO Bill Allen pleaded guilty to bribing officials to get a reduction in the tax rate for oil companies, hoping it would encourage them to build a lucrative pipeline. During the trial of former state Rep. Pete Kott (R-AK) last week, the prosecution played a tape of Allen telling ConocoPhillips President Jim Bowles about the lobbying effort. On the tape, Allen is heard saying, "Hey Jim, I told you we would-between-with Pete Kott and Ben we wouldn't have a bill. I know you're probably talking to someone else, but remember what I told you. We got it done."

In their letter, the two state lawmakers asked for reassurance from the oil companies that they were not involved:

> We do not know if anyone at Conoco Phillips, or any of the oil companies engaged in criminal conduct, and do not suggest such conduct occurred. But we have an obligation to the public to make sure we receive reliable assurances that nobody from your companies participated in the improper influence peddling attempts made in 2005 and 2006.

PERMALINK | TOPICS: Veco

PRINT SHARE

ADVERTISEMENT

WHAT DO YOU STAND FOR?

Home | Submit | Watch | Trailer

Click on submit for a chance to win for your cause.

UPLOAD YOUR VIDEO NOW

Comments (10)

anonymouse wrote on September 28, 2007 11:16 PM:

Wow... more Alaskan politics.

" We're sorry to bother you, but did any of you upstanding gentlemen break the law? We wouldn't even ask if we weren't under scrutiny from the voters right now, so please do not take this personally. Just say NO and all of us will be off the hook..."

It's pretty easy to see (if this letter is any indication) just who these legislators are representing...

Kuparuk wrote on September 29, 2007 12:31 AM:

I think you underestimate the balls it takes for anyone in a political position in Alaska to make direct accusations against the oil industry.

Just as the Bushies will paint anyone who disagrees with the war as "traitors," so do Alaskans paint anyone who appears to be the slightest bit "anti-oil."

The letter is diplomatically worded because these two men are well-educated professionals, written to well-educated professionals. You can't expect something like, "HAI BP UR TEH SUXXORS!!!1111lol!"

WT wrote on September 29, 2007 1:06 AM:

Guiliani fundraiser funded CA electoral scam

FBI - Stevens-1247

194A-AN-13620-M 540

http://latimesblogs.latimes.com/washington/2007/09/breaking-news-g.html

BREAKING NEWS: Giuliani fundraiser was mystery initiative backer
A close friend and major fundraiser of former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani has identified himself as the mystery financer of the proposed California initiative to apportion the state's 55 electoral votes by congressional district instead of winner-take-all.

He is New York hedge fund billionaire Paul Singer. He said he provided the $175,000 to initially finance the petition drive to get the measure on the June 2008 ballot. But as The Times' Dan Morain revealed in an exclusive story on this website last night, the drive has foundered on internal disputes and lack of further financing.

itsjustme wrote on September 29, 2007 1:52 AM:

Anonymouse really missed the mark here. Anyone who would cast aspersions on the ethics of Les Gara and Hollis French (and Harry Crawford, too) is COMPLETELY ignorant. Anyone who suggests that they're beholden to the oil companies is COMPLETELY insane. Gara may be the biggest thorn in the sides of the oil companies in Alaska, if the tape recorded conversations in Suite 604 are any indication.
Gara and French are former prosecutors and know what they're doing. Crawford, an ironworker, isn't a lawyer, but he's a pretty smart cookie, too. If Gara, French, Crawford and a few others, like Ethan Berkowitz, had been running the state, we'd be in a way different situation here.

Anonymous wrote on September 29, 2007 5:12 PM:

What is Lisa Murkowski's husbands background? Verne Martell, does he have prior convictions?

How many people in Alaska politics are convicted felons or are they just all losers on the run?

JD21 wrote on September 29, 2007 6:39 PM:

People are fed up with this.

Maybe that's why Obama is gaining steam. He reminds me of Clinton in '92. Obama now leads Clinton in likely Iowa caucus-goers. Let's not forget Dean, McCain and all the other early leaders who nearly always flame out by the end. Right on the war when it mattered, a uniter and very principled, Obama is a good one to watch.

http://rawstory.com//news/2007/Obama_leads_pack_among_Iowa_likely_0929.html

Steve wrote on September 29, 2007 10:27 PM:

I agree with anonymous that the letter does sound timid, but I the (I assume) Alaskans are right about Gara, Hollis, etc. I'd like to think that Alaska is a view of what is to happen in the US as a whole. The Republican lock on the Senate, House, Governorship, and national delegation caused them to think they were untouchable. The Dems - and there are good ones - are so used to being such minor players while the Republican caucus meets in private, are just starting to get their voices back.

Maybe the same rotting on the national level will be exposed the way it is happening here - through trials where some of the dirt is exposed, indisputably, to the world for what it is.

FBI - Stevens-1248

But it isn't just corrupt people, it's a whole system that isn't simply going to go away by electing new people.

ebeneezer wrote on September 30, 2007 12:23 AM:

I agree there is systemic corruption in politics but the fact remains you cannot legislate morality. Either public officials come to the job with altruistic motives and integrity to match, or they come to line their pockets.

Life is made up of mega temptations, but every one of us, when presented with one or the other of them, make those hard choices that let us keep looking at ourselves in the mirror.

anonymous wrote on September 30, 2007 12:33 AM:

"I agree there is systemic corruption in politics but the fact remains you cannot legislate morality"

I beg to differ.

The reason there are not thousands mmore bank robberies than there is now is directly because of the penalties involved. As long as we continue to allow the politicians to rip off our nation.. they will continue.

On the other hand... if we instill harse punishments (take away retirement... ban from future government positions and lobbying... prison) the crimes will decrease.

I learned a long time ago that folks do not practice unacceptable behavior for two reasons. First, it is against their principles and values. Second, they fear the consequences. If you take away the consequences bad behavior will ALWAYS increase, not diminish.

"You cannot legislate morality" does sound pretty cool, though... IMHO

PalmerBuyer wrote on September 30, 2007 3:00 PM:

One of the biggested problems is not 'morality' per se, it is the feelings of 'entitlement' these people have in common, politicians AND oil companies.

Once upon a time they may have been 'moral', but through the years they have ceased to be able to discern the difference between RIGHT and WRONG. They have compromised for so long GRAY areas became BLACK -- and they didn't even notice! (and the voters didn't either!) Again, the sense of entitlement makes them think that because THEY did it, it is OKAY. And they are doing it for 'our' good.

Well, these persons are WRONG. If it looks like a duck, walks like a duck, and sounds like a duck -- it is still a duck ---- even if you call it a peacock and try to sell it as such.

Be warned: Alaskans are getting ready to TAKE BACK THEIR STATE. And I praise the internet age to allow COMMUNICATION to take place where 'behind closed doors' was a mantra.

SO, If you can't tell the difference between a duck and a peacock, please don't bother running for office. WE know the difference.

Post a comment

Name:

Email Address:

URL:

☐ Remember personal info?

Comments:

FBI - Stevens-1249

Click here to return to the original story

Kott's phone bill raises concerns

Sitka man accuses former lawmaker of tapping calls

While FBI tapes of former Rep. Pete Kott's phone conversations were a major factor in his conviction on corruption charges earlier this week, it wasn't Kott's first involvement with the issue of phone tapping.

A Sitka man is accusing Kott of inappropriately recording calls between the man and his daughter, and using the tapes in a bitter custody dispute involving visitation rights.

Rand Bigelow of Sitka, a former Juneau resident, said those tapes were devastating to his attempts to maintain contact with his now-14-year-old daughter. Bigelow was married in the 1990s to Debora Stovern of Juneau, Kott's girlfriend for a number of years.

Bigelow said those tapes caused a state official appointed by the Office of Public Advocacy to recommend he not be allowed to see his daughter.

In the last session he was in office, Kott sponsored legislation making it legal for parents to tape their children's phone calls. The legislation also established rules for when evidence obtained in such a manner could be admitted in child-custody proceedings. The bill was the only one he succeeded in passing in the 2005-06 Legislature.

Kott, a Republican who formerly represented Eagle River, was found guilty on Tuesday of conspiracy to solicit financial benefits, extortion and bribery. He was acquitted on wire fraud.

Bigelow acknowledged the tapes involved in his custody case sounded bad.

FBI - Stevens-1250

"I've worked construction all my life and I cuss like a sailor. I said some things I shouldn't have said," Bigelow said.

He said any state official confronted with the tapes should have turned them over to law enforcement authorities for an investigation of illegal tapping.

Instead, they were used in court against him.

The state official's supervisor, attorney Janine Reep of the Department of

194A-AN-13620-~~Proc~~M; 541

Law, who supervises the state's Advocates for Children in Court Cases, did not return calls.

Based on the state recommendation and those tapes, Juneau Superior Court Judge Larry Weeks denied Bigelow visitation with his daughter.

Weeks has since retired. He did not return messages left at his Douglas home.

Kott served in the Legislature from 1992 until he was defeated for re-election in 2006, frequently campaigning as a fiscally conservative, family-values Republican.

He had once been a power in the House of Representatives, even serving as its speaker during the 2003-04 Legislature.

While Kott's wife remained in Eagle River, his official residence, he was actually living in Juneau for a number of years with his girlfriend, Stovern.

Bigelow said Kott inappropriately taped as many as 14 hours of calls between Bigelow and his daughter. Bigelow and Stovern were disputing custody.

The tapes Stovern used in court began with Kott announcing when each one was being made, Bigelow said.

"I've got tapes with Pete Kott's voice on them," he said.

Neither Kott nor Stovern responded to separate interview requests relayed through Kott's criminal lawyer.

State Rep. Beth Kerttula, D-Juneau said she knows Kott, along with Stovern, Bigelow and their daughter.

What she said she didn't know when she voted for Kott's parental phone recording bill was Kott's alleged personal involvement in the issue.

"I wish I'd known what else was going on," Kerttula said.

Despite Kott's involvement, the bill does still appear to have merit, she said.

Bigelow said the Office of Public Advocacy and the judge weren't persuaded by his allegations of heavy alcohol use in the Kott-Stovern household.

FBI - Stevens-1251

Since then, Kott's federal court trial has documented extensive alcohol use by Kott in drunken, profane conversations with fellow conspirators. In addition, a former Kott legislative staffer testified she was so concerned about his drinking she'd considered an intervention.

Bigelow said he put his faith in the Office of Public Advocacy to look out for his daughter's interests, but said he made a mistake showing up in court without an attorney, while Stovern had one.

"A guy who shows up in court without a lawyer is a complete idiot," he said.

Bigelow said he has a lawyer now, and is continuing to seek visitation with his daughter.

• Contact Pat Forgey at 523-2250 or patrick.forgey@juneauempire.com.
Click here to return to story:
http://www.juneauempire.com/stories/093007/sta_20070930053.shtml

FBI - Stevens-1252

2 of 2 DOCUMENTS

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 2, 2007 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

Trial stirs watchdog agency;
POLITICAL CORRUPTION: APOC's five commissioners call for serious action.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 609 words

The Alaska Public Offices Commission promised Monday to aggressively investigate corruption in state politics.

The commission, a state agency, is already looking into political polls Veco Corp. bought for candidates. But commissioners said at a Monday meeting they don't plan to stop there.

The scope of the APOC investigation will also include issues such as Veco fundraisers and the "special bonus program" in which Veco reimbursed its executives for making political contributions. Those came up at the recent federal trial of former state Rep. Pete Kott, as did the political polls.

"I want names. I want money," said commissioner Elizabeth Hickerson of Anchorage, a Democratic retired state attorney whose APOC term began last year. "I want every violation."

APOC has five commissioners: two Democrats, two Republicans and one chosen by the rest of the commission. One of the Republicans, Larry Wood, is a retired Alyeska Pipeline Service Co. assistant general counsel.

APOC's aggressive attitude marks a major shift for the watchdog agency, which has been considered largely toothless for years.

APOC Chairman Roger Holl, who doesn't represent a political party, said the typical ways of business are changing. Holl said the ongoing federal corruption probe into Alaska politics has shown the need for APOC to dig deeper.

Holl said the corruption in Alaska is "sort of like a low-grade fever that has suddenly erupted in the body." An Anchorage lawyer, Holl said he feels a new energy and thinks the commission is rising to the challenge.

It remains to be seen just how effective APOC can really be. The agency faces statute of limitations issues on civil penalties and doesn't have the authority to pursue criminal charges. Commissioners said they would refer evidence of criminal acts to the state attorney general's office, but Attorney General Talis Colberg has said the state needs to tread carefully because the FBI doesn't want interference in its investigation.

APOC also has only a single investigator, Jeff Berliner, and he's new. The agency didn't have any investigators before the Legislature funded Berliner's position earlier this year.

Commission member Hickerson said she wants APOC staff to dig through the agency's budget and see if any money can be found to bring on an experienced investigator to help Berliner.

FBI - Stevens-1253

"This is a high priority. This is the No. 1 priority," Hickerson said of APOC's investigation.

Anchorage Democratic state Rep. Les Gara said at the meeting that APOC should consider asking the governor and Legislature for more money. Gara said the Legislature has traditionally been hostile to APOC and he doesn't blame the commission for its inability to act up to this point. But he said the state shouldn't rely on the FBI to come in and clean up the mess that is Alaska politics.

194A-AN-13620-M;542

Gara also said APOC's concern about a one-year statute of limitations on imposing civil penalties might not be warranted. Gara, a lawyer, argued the one-year clock doesn't start running until the crime is found out, rather than when it was committed. The state Department of Law is looking into that.

Commissioner Hickerson said, regardless of the statute of limitations, nothing is stopping APOC from investigating to bring evidence of crimes to light.

Alaska Republican Party Chairman Randy Ruedrich suggested that APOC also look into polls purchased for political candidates by labor unions.

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him at 257-4344.

Talk about it: Keep up with all things political, discuss them and hear what others have to say on our Alaska politics blog at

adn.com/alaskapolitics

LOAD-DATE: October 2, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1254

Rep. Don Young (R-AK) (Donyoung.house.gov)

Watchdog Group May File Lawsuit over Coconut Road

By Laura McGann - October 2, 2007, 4:36PM

If the House ethics committee doesn't investigate the Coconut Road earmark that someone slipped in to a 2005 highway bill at the behest of then-transportation chair Rep. Don Young (R-AK), then a watchdog group may file a lawsuit to get to the bottom of it.

The non-partisan Taxpayers for Common Sense called on the House ethics committee to review how $10 million listed for a highway widening project ended up making its way to a project benefiting a developer and major Young campaign contributor after both chambers voted on the bill. But despite the fact that the change seems a blatant violation of House rules, chances are the infamously inert ethics committee won't jump to action.

Watchdog group Public Citizen told The Hill that it would consider taking the matter before a judge if the ethics committee doesn't act.

The group once filed a similar lawsuit after the Senate clerk inserted a typo into a budget-reconciliation bill that cut $39 billion from health, education and other programs. Public Citizen lost before a U.S. District Court in D.C., which upheld the typo as law. The group is appealing the decision to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Craig Holman of Public Citizen said the Coconut Road scandal might make for a better case because the edit appears deliberate.

> "This is a very obvious change," Holman said. "This is not a typo. This is actually dealing with $10 million for such an unpopular project that the Florida County doesn't even want it."

PERMALINK | TOPICS: Don Young PRINT SHARE

ADVERTISEMENT
OReilly: Fair & Balanced?
Do you think he's fair or biased? Take the PollingPoint Media Poll.
www.PollingPoint.com
State Farms Insurance
Save Money on Your Insurance Bill. Get S. Farm Quotes and Compare.
StateFarm.NetQuote.com
Zicam - Wrongly Attacked
Get the whole story here. The truth about Zicam!
www.zicam.com
Alaska Brain Injury
The Law Offices Of Steve Sims Over 25 Years of Experience
www.alaskaaccidentlaw.com/
Ads by Google

Comments (5)

anonymouse wrote on October 2, 2007 5:38 PM:

See folks... neither the Republicans NOR the Democrats actually have a desire to clean up Congress... it is nothing but window dressing that they are willing to change. "We the People" are no longer involved in the process. We are but obstacles to push aside as the tyrany plows on... IMHO anonymouse wrote on October 2, 2007 5:41 PM:

Sorry... tyranny

FBI - Stevens-1255

194-AN-13620-M; 543

Ed*ard Teller wrote on October 2, 2007 6:25 PM:

Diane Benson, who wants to help clean up the US House by defeating Young in November, filed a query/complaint with the House Ethics Committee on September 17. Taxpayers for Common Sense followed Benson's lead a week later, and now Public Citizen is interested in the merits of this case. I do hope this is cleared up, or all sorts of Congressmen will be doing this, which would be absurd.

Kuparuk wrote on October 2, 2007 7:38 PM:

Yeah, yeah, Diane always wants to defeat somebody....

Wonder if she'd work as hard to defeat him if she weren't running?

betty wrote on October 2, 2007 9:26 PM:

Young's Secret Tweak? Young's Secret Tweak!

I wish someone would tweak me 10 million.

I can not believe that Nancy Pelosi and the rest of the democrats are just letting this slide by. Why haven't they sent this crook home in shame? When do we get our government back from these crooks?
Nancy and Harry have a new trick now - their mail box is always full so you can't leave a message. I guess I'll have to get a fax machine.

Post a comment

Name:

Email Address:

URL:

☐ Remember personal info?

Comments:

SEND»

Peter Sheehy
Adrianne Jeffries

FBI - Stevens-1256

Copyright 2007 TPM Media LLC. All Rights Reserved.

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 2, 2007 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

Oil companies' ties to Veco eyed;
PRODUCTION TAX: What the "big boys" knew about an effort to alter legislation is questioned.

BYLINE: By TOM KIZZIA tkizzia@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 3539 words

On June 6 of last year, with the state House of Representatives poised to adopt a new 23.5-percent tax on oil production, Veco Corp. chief Bill Allen placed a phone call to the president of Conoco Phillips Alaska. The FBI was listening in.

"If there's any way we can get this thing stopped, that's the best possible outcome," says Conoco Alaska president Jim Bowles.

"It's just between me and you, but I got Pete Kott and Ben doing it," Allen tells the oil company executive.

Bowles doesn't ask how or why. Instead he stresses the importance of getting the House to adjourn. Later in the call, Allen returns to Kott and Ben Stevens, who at the time was president of the state Senate, and boasts they planned to force adjournment in a way that can't be traced.

"Well, that's ideal," says Bowles.

There's nothing in the brief conversation to indicate that Conoco knew Allen had paid bribes to Kott and Stevens, as Allen admitted doing in Kott's corruption trial in federal court in September.

But the wiretap recording of the call, along with other audio and video evidence presented by prosecutors in the Kott case, has raised new questions about oil company lobbying in last year's tax debate, drawing attention to relations between Alaska's major oil producers, Veco and the still-unfolding federal corruption investigation.

Was Veco lobbying on its own behalf or under instructions from BP, Conoco and Exxon -- "the three big boys," as anxious Veco officials call them on surveillance tapes? Did Veco have a long-standing agreement by which it received benefits for its political work, such as North Slope oil field service contracts?

And did the companies, whose officers and lobbyists worked side-by-side with Veco on the big oil-tax and natural gas-pipeline bills of 2006, know how far the company was willing to go?

FBI - Stevens-1257

SUSPICIONS AROUSED

Allen and another former Veco executive, Rick Smith, have pleaded guilty to conspiracy, bribery and extortion, and a jury convicted Kott on those charges last week. Since the conviction, local blogs and talk radio have been filled with questions about how much the oil producers knew.

Democratic legislators jumped into the fray Friday, calling on oil company chiefs to spell out any "coordination" between their companies and Veco during the oil tax debate. They said it is important to clear the air before the Legislature convenes in special session Oct. 18 for another look at the oil tax system. Republican Gov. Sarah Palin has said the tax eventually passed last year was "tainted" by corruption.

Rep. Les Gara and Sen. Hollis French, both Anchorage Democrats, wrote oil companies a letter asking if their representatives "ever discussed whether Veco would seek to influence legislators with campaign donations or other payments." They cited evidence from the Kott trial.

194A-AN-13620-m;544

"How can you not ask the question with that evidence? Was Bill Allen their henchman?" said French.

In recent statements, all three oil companies denied knowing anything about the bribes or other crimes. Exxon, BP and Conoco said they have been told their employees are not under suspicion or being investigated.

"BP had no knowledge of any illegal activity that was taking place, and we condemn the behavior in the strongest possible terms," said BP Alaska spokesman Daren Beaudo .

Conoco Phillips Alaska president Bowles has declined to answer questions about Veco. His company released a statement that Bowles issued to company employees in the wake of the evidence presented in the Kott trial, in which he said he had no knowledge of illegal activities.

"Unfortunately, the government's corruption investigation of certain legislators and several former executives of Veco has cast a pall on the image of our company and our industry in Alaska," Bowles said. "It is impossible to prevent false rumors and innuendo, but times like these reinforce the importance of our absolute commitment to open, honest and ethical behavior."

As to any long-standing agreements with Veco about political influence, the companies declined to say anything.

CAMPAIGN MONEY TRAIL

Examination of the FBI recordings and trial testimony available so far in the federal corruption investigation reveals no clear evidence that the oil companies knew anything about bribed legislators.

That's not to say the record is complete, however. Recordings played for jurors in the Kott trial, relating specifically to the charges against him, add up to only a few hours. FBI officials say total intercepts in the Veco investigation, which covers other political figures as well, include more than 17,000 phone calls and at least 400 hours of video recordings from the company's bugged suite at Juneau's Baranof Hotel.

Veco, which started as an oil field services company, has been a prominent political player in Alaska for two decades.

The company has long been the biggest source of campaign money in Alaska, both on the state and federal levels. In the three campaign cycles before the 2006 tax fight, for instance, Veco officials donated five times as much money as officials from Conoco, Exxon and BP combined. Veco multiplied its influence by holding political fundraisers and bringing in checks from other sources.

Much of this money, Allen now admits, was reimbursed illegally to Veco officials through a special bonus program, in which the company provided executives money to give to favored candidates.

In the past, Veco officials said they were involved in campaigns because they wanted to see pro-development candidates elected. Allen offered a second reason for raising Veco's profile, when he testified in Kott's trial: growing competition for oil field work from Native corporations. And aside from its involvement in campaigns, Veco for many years had been a heavy, visible lobbying presence in Juneau, with Allen sometimes flying in to personally lobby lawmakers on bills affecting the oil industry.

But some dispute that Veco became a major political player strictly on its own.

Two former legislators told the Daily News in interviews last week they'd been told by Allen he answered to the major producers as he lobbied the Legislature -- at least in the years before 2006.

FBI - Stevens-1258

"There may be, and I think there is, culpability on the part of the producers," said Jim Whitaker, a former Republican state representative who is now the Fairbanks North Star Borough mayor and a proponent of a gas pipeline opposed by the major producers. "They were certainly aware of much of what Veco is doing. These are not naive people."

Whitaker recalled a conversation with Allen around 2000 about prospects for a gas pipeline.

"What Bill Allen told me in the course of that conversation was that the only person he listened to in regard to the gas line was the then-president of Arco Alaska, Kevin Meyers," Whitaker said. "He was the person that told Bill what to do regarding gas line issues."

Rick Halford, a longtime Eagle River lawmaker and former Senate president, said Veco's role was evident to most legislators.

"Everybody knew that Veco was representing the majors, but they were never saying it directly," Halford said.

Halford said he considered Allen a personal friend after taking him on a moose hunt, even though they clashed increasingly over oil policies. He recalled a meeting in his Senate office after BP proposed to buy Arco. Halford was a leader in the legislative opposition to the purchase.

"I can remember him telling me directly how much pressure BP was putting on him," Halford said. "Some people used to say Bill Allen was their designated hostage, to be tortured when the majors needed something. They tortured him with the contracts he needed to keep his people working."

Another perspective in circulation is that, by 2006, BP had come to view Veco with apprehension. Sen. Fred Dyson, R-Eagle River, said he heard as much from then-BP Alaska president Steve Marshall in a Capitol parking lot conversation during the oil-tax session. Dyson said he asked about the common perception in Juneau that Allen was working for the oil producers.

"He kind of scares us," Dyson recalled Marshall as saying. "We worry he'll screw up someday." The impression of Allen as chief political fixer was one promoted by Allen himself, the BP chief told him.

Dyson, who recently disclosed that he was working with the FBI during the 2006 sessions, added that he had no way of knowing whether Marshall's depiction was accurate, or an attempt to preserve a safe distance from Veco.

PRESSURE IN JUNEAU

In 2006, with oil taxes and a gas line deal looming, the oil companies hired additional lobbyists and sent officials to Juneau. Exxon reported spending more than $500,000 that year on lobbyists, Conoco $750,000, BP $1.2 million.

One picture that emerges from the FBI recordings is of Allen and Veco vice president Rick Smith, wound tight with anxiety as they weighed how their actions might be perceived by the oil companies. Plotting votes on the oil tax, they seem afraid to budge from the 20 percent tax to which they are somehow bound -- even when Kott, in May, says it would be good damage-control strategy to move higher.

"Pete, you might be right as rain, but how do we make a living?" Smith asked the legislator. Smith called their inability to move "a huge predicament."

The Veco bosses expressed resentment when other industry lobbyists take credit for their access to key legislators on Capitol Hill.

"They forget how they got introduced to them," Smith lamented in May.

"I think ol' Jim Bowles will remember me," Allen said. "That's all I care about, is ol' Jim Bowles."

Veco was pushing for a long-term tax deal on oil, which the major oil producers described as an essential step toward winning their support for a gas line.

A gloomy late-night conversation between Allen and Smith over drinks in the Baranof suite back in March seemed to set the tone for the months to come.

"Me and you, we have to f---ing produce. Right now," Allen says.

"Have to get dirty and have to produce. I understand that," Smith says.

FBI - Stevens-1259

"But our clients have to know what we've done," Allen says. "... Because it's so important to us. Your life and my life. Whatever the f--- I got to do, I'll do it. Right here, we've got to produce."

The recordings are revealing in subtle ways too, with Allen being deferential to Bowles just as Kott was deferential to Allen. In both relationships, the man higher up the food chain directs the conversation, the lower one listens for cues, seems to crave recognition and makes sure to claim credit.

Two days after his conversation with Bowles, the Legislature adjourned its first special session without a bill and Allen called the oil company president back. He left a voice mail message, mentioning Kott and Stevens again. "Remember what I told you," Allen said. "We got it done."

CASHING POLITICAL FAVORS

Critics, including French and Gara, have homed in on Allen's comments to Bowles about leaving no trace of who was responsible for killing the bill.

"There were rumors around the session that Veco was involved in vote-buying," Gara said. "Why would Jim Bowles be concerned about a legislator leaving fingerprints on a bill? That is an indication that somebody knew something was going on."

The secret recordings also turn up evidence of how political influence was seen by Veco as a kind of currency. In March, Smith received a call from Kott, who was in Washington, D.C., having drinks with Marathon Oil's director of government affairs. Marathon, with oil and gas operations in Cook Inlet, was concerned about how new oil taxes aimed at the North Slope would affect them.

"We've got to take care of Marathon in this deal. We can carve them out something," Kott says.

Smith evades the subject at first, then sternly tells Kott not to promise anything to Marathon.

"We went to bat for those guys in Cook Inlet, and they dumped us on the maintenance contract," Smith says.

Kott seems to snap to attention. "All right, you know where my allegiance is," he says.

As the basis for a criminal charge of wire fraud, the recording fell flat. Kott later voted in favor of a Cook Inlet deal helping Marathon, and this was the one count on which the jury acquitted Kott. But it seems revealing as a window into Veco's motivations and the dog-yard hierarchies among the companies.

OIL COMPANIES RESPOND

Exxon responded tersely to inquiries about the investigation with a written response that said only, "To the best of our knowledge, ExxonMobil is not the subject of any inquiry and we have received no indication from the government or other sources to suggest any actions by company employees were unlawful."

Exxon noted that Veco had contracts with the company cleaning up after the Exxon Valdez oil spill and on oil projects in Sakhalin, Russia. The company declined to answer specific questions.

BP was more forthcoming. Beaudo, the company spokesman, said federal investigators have been in touch with BP Alaska employees as part of the broader inquiry into Veco. Federal officials have indicated that no one at BP is under investigation or suspicion, he said.

"There has been a level of contact as part of the investigation," he said. "Any further detail about the extent of those contacts is best left to the investigating agencies."

As operator of most North Slope oil fields, BP had "significant" contracts with Veco, said Beaudo. Their lobbyists talked, and BP's name appears to have been on Veco's lips frequently. But the company had not asked Veco to do anything in Juneau on its behalf regarding the 2006 oil tax, he said.

"We were not asking others to carry our water," Beaudo said. "No one should be surprised that there was an exchange of information on an important policy position like this."

Beaudo declined to answer questions about pre-2006 relationships between his company and Veco regarding campaign finance and lobbying.

FBI - Stevens-1260

Contact reporter Tom Kizzia at adn.com/contact/tkizzia or call him in Homer at 1-907-235-4244.

VECO'S BIG DOLLARS

Here's how much Veco executives and employees gave to Alaska candidates, compared to what executives and workers with the big North Slope oil producers contributed, during the first three campaign cycles of the decade. The totals include money from political action committees.

2000 Veco's big dollars

Veco $ 222,425

Exxon $ 1,950

Arco $ 10,290

BP $ 18,605

2002 Veco's big dollars

Veco $ 265,858

Exxon $ 2,250

Conoco $ 9,200

BP $ 33,472

2004 Veco's big dollars

Veco $ 211,085

Exxon $ 1,700

Conoco $ 22,805

BP $ 31,310

Source: National Institute on Money in State Politics, www. followthemoney. org KEVIN POWELL / Anchorage Daily News

Veco and the oil industry: FBI recordings from the Kott case

Here are transcripts of FBI wiretaps and surveillance videos that show Veco executives dealing with oil industry officials or talking about them. All were played for the jury in the corruption trial of former Rep. Pete Kott. Transcripts were produced by the Daily News. To listen and watch yourself, go online to adn.com/fbi

JUNE 6, 2006

Oil lobbyists were scrambling after the state House suddenly bumped a proposed oil tax up from 20 percent to 23.5 percent. Then-Veco CEO Bill Allen called Conoco Phillips Alaska president Jim Bowles to discuss strategy, which involved getting the Legislature to adjourn its special session before the House and Senate could agree on a number.

Allen: Uh, we want to just see if we can't stop this thing, don't we, Jim?

Bowles: Yes, sir. If there's any way we can get this thing stopped, that's the best possible outcome.

Allen: OK. Well, I got working, and it's just between me and you, but I got Pete Kott and uh Jim, uh I meant, Ben doing it. And hopefully, we can, they're gonna try.

Bowles: Well ...

FBI - Stevens-1261

Allen: (Unintelligible) Go ahead.

Bowles: Well, Bill, one thing that I think what we had talked about is that probably the best outcome for us is to get the House to go ahead and gavel out and finish up and get them out of town.

Allen: Right, that's what I'm trying to do.

Bowles: OK, well good. I think we're supportive of that. Because if we can get them out of town, we've got a better chance. Then all we've got to do is just work the Senate by themselves.

Allen: Right. Uh, you know, the governor, he's gonna try to get a goddamn, you know, uh, a tax. S---, let me slow down. You know, like a 20, I think they're trying to find 221/2, is what I think the governor is wanting.

Bowles: Well, that's not a good answer, and ...

Allen: I know it is. I know it is, and why ... if we can get it shut down then he may call another special session real quick.

Bowles: Well, we can deal with that next. But we told ... Look, we met with the governor yesterday and we told him, 221/2 is not a good answer to this. No one's gonna be happy with 221/2. And, I mean -- Actually Bill, I think our belief is 231/2 is better than 221/2 because it just provides us the basis to say we've just really got a terrible, you know, terrible answer.

Allen: Right. Right:

Bowles: So I don't ... We're not trying to push to get this thing moved to 221/2 right now.

Allen: Yeah. What I'm just trying to tell you, Jim, is that you can bet that (Murkowski chief of staff) Jim Clark and them are gonna try to get a PPT somehow.

Bowles: Well, you know we've talked with Clark, we've talked with him several times about don't push through 221/2. That's not what we want to see as an outcome. So if he's doing that, he's doing it against conversations we've had.

Allen: OK.

Bowles: But are ... Do you think that's what he's doing, Bill?

Allen: Yes. Yes. He tried this morning.

Bowles: Well, now I understood he had a meeting with (Fairbanks Rep. Mike) Kelly.

Allen: Yeah.

Bowles: But I think that's the only meeting he's had, isn't it?

Allen: That's all I know of. But ... Kelly told him hell, told him no.

Bowles: And if that's the only contact he's made. He did tell us he was gonna have that meeting with Kelly.

Allen: OK, OK.

Bowles: So, but if that's the only one he's doing, that's OK because he told us he felt that Harris had asked him to have that meeting.

Allen: Right.

Allen: OK. Well, uh, I, you know, they're gonna do it so they don't know that they, with Pete Kott and Ben, they're gonna do it so they don't know who, who it came from.

Bowles: Well, that's ideal. And it needs to catch them by surprise because otherwise they'll stay in session just so they can, you know, cause problems.

FBI - Stevens-1262

Allen: Maybe they can't get it done, but they think, they told me they thought they could.

Bowles: OK, well that's good news. Bill, I tell you what, I think if we can get this killed this time we can come back and package up something that works better for the governor and for ourselves.

Allen: OK. All right. It's not 100 percent. But they're really ... probably we got 80 percent of getting the House shut down.

Bowles: Well, that would be good if we could. So we'll stay in touch then. Thanks for the call, Bill.

Allen: You bet. Bye.

JUNE 8, 2006

Two days later, a compromise failed, the Legislature adjourned and Allen called Bowles back to take credit. This is from surveillance video from Veco's Suite 604 of the Baranof Hotel in Juneau. The recording starts with Allen on his cell phone leaving a message.

Allen: Hey, Jim, I told you we would, uh, between ... Pete Kott and with Ben we wouldn't have a bill. So I know you're probably talking to somebody else. But remember what I told you, that we got it done. (hangs up)

Rick Smith walks into the picture during the call and sits down. Kott is sitting next to the camera.

Allen: And that's what I told him. I just had a voice mail but he'll understand. I told him between Pete Kott and Ben, it doesn't matter whether Ben or you did it, but we won't have a goddamn bill.

Kott: We don't know what would have happened in the Senate, to be honest Bill ...

Allen: What I told Jim, Jim Bowles, I said between Pete Kott and Ben, we won't have, I said they ... won't even have their fingerprints on the son of a bitch.

MARCH 4, 2006

Veco chief Bill Allen and vice president Rick Smith are drinking in Suite 604 midway through the legislative session. They're talking about the need to pass legislation that would help develop a natural gas pipeline.

Allen: Let me tell ya. We gotta produce. ... Me and you have to (expletive) produce...

Smith: You have to get dirty and you have to produce. I understand that.

Allen: Right here ...

Smith: We have to be careful how we do it.

Allen: For sure.

Smith: Yes, we have to do it. It's -- and we're doing it.

Allen: But our clients have to know what we've done.

Smith: I know. But they don't (expletive) pay any attention ...

Allen: Somewhere here with Jim Mulva (Conoco Phillips president), and with the big wheel with BP and Exxon and all that stuff, we got to (expletive) produce.

INSIDE

TRANSCRIPTS: Read conversations recorded by the FBI between Veco and oil industry players.

Page A-5

APOC: Which politicians had Veco pay for polls?

FBI - Stevens-1263

Page B-1

AUDIO AND VIDEO: Hear and see FBI wiretaps and surveillance videos from the Kott corruption case at

adn.com/fbi

TALK ABOUT IT: Keep up with all things political, discuss them and hear what others have to say on our Alaska politics blog at

adn.com/alaskapolitics

LOAD-DATE: October 2, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Illustrated by Kevin Powell
ILLUSTRATION SHOWS HOW MUCH VECO EXECUTIVES AND EMPLOYEES GAVE TO ALASKA CANDIDATES AND POLITICAL PARTIES, COMPARED TO WHAT EXECUTIVES AND WORKERS WITH THE BIG NORTH SLOPE OIL PRODUCERS CONTRIBUTED.
Jim Bowles is president of Conoco Phillips Alaska, Inc.
Dyson
AL GRILLO / Associated Press archive 1996
Former VECO Corp. president Bill Allen, right, talks with then-Senate Finance Committee chairman Rick Halford in May 1996 in Juneau. Halford said Veco's role in energy legislation was evident to most lawmakers. "Some people used to say Bill Allen was their designated hostage, to be tortured when the majors needed something."

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1264

Chevy.
Do more. Use less.
Fuel Efficiency E85 Ethanol Hybrid Electric Fuel Cell
SEE HOW AT CHEVY.COM

Alaska: Northern Exposure

Newsweek

Oct. 8, 2007 Issue - Hillary Clinton and other Democrats recently returned hefty campaign contributions after learning that top "bundler" Norman Hsu was a fugitive. Now Republicans on Capitol Hill are wrestling with how to handle their own embarrassment: Bill Allen, a former oil executive who pleaded guilty in May to bribery and extortion charges and is the central witness in a massive FBI probe in Alaska. Allen provided key testimony leading to last week's bribery conviction of former Alaska speaker of the House Peter Kott, one of a group of local lawmakers who dubbed themselves the "Corrupt Bastards Club." Allen, who served as Alaska's Bush-Cheney 2000 campaign-finance chairman, testified that he paid $4,000 per month in consulting fees to GOP Sen. Ted Stevens's son and subsidized remodeling on the senator's house. (Stevens's home was raided by the FBI in July; he has denied any wrongdoing.)

Story continues below ↓

advertisement

194-AN-13620-M;545

The Boomer Files
Columnists
Letters & Live Talks
Multimedia/Photos
Search Archives
Xtra.newsweek.com
Multimedia
Most Popular
NBC NEWS
Today Show
Nightly News
Dateline NBC
Meet the Press
MSNBC TV
• Disable Fly-out SUBSCRIPTIONS

Subscribe
Give a Gift
Renew Change Address
Classroom Subscriptions

Newsweek
Business Directory
Stop searching, start finding!
401K Plans
Accounting
Advertising & Marketing
Air Charter
Air Travel
Annuities
Answering Service
Antivirus / Antispar Solutions
Apartment Loans
Apartment Rentals
Apartments
Appliances
Apply for Jobs
POWERED BY DIRECTORY

According to court documents, Allen also told the Feds that, beginning in 2004, he gave bonuses to executives of his oil-services firm, Veco, to reimburse them for donations to federal candidates—a violation of campaign-finance laws. The Center for Responsive Politics reports that Allen and other Veco execs have given more than $363,000 in federal contributions since then, nearly all of it to GOP lawmakers and President Bush. The National Republican Senatorial Committee, which received a total of $75,000 from Veco execs, confirmed to NEWSWEEK it has donated $25,000 it got directly from Allen to a veterans' charity; Stevens is donating $18,000 from Allen and another convicted co-conspirator to charity but is keeping, for now, more than $50,000 from other Veco contributors. U.S. Rep. Don Young returned $38,000 from Allen that covered the cost of an annual "Pig Roast" fund-raiser, but he isn't giving back $70,000 in direct donations from Allen and Veco execs. A spokesman for Young declined to explain, saying, "It would be inappropriate to comment on an ongoing investigation."

—Michael Isikoff and Tony Hopfinger

© 2007 Newsweek, Inc. | Subscribe to Newsweek

Mary Gordon
Claire Messud
Jonathan Safran Foer
Jon Krakauer
Natasha Trethewey

E-MAIL NEWSWEEK

Send us a topical quote from your local media and we'll run our favorite submission--along with the name of the reader who sent it--in next week's magazine. To be eligible, your quote must have been reported in the last seven days and you must include its source.

Your name
Your city & state
Your phone number
Your e-mail address
Send

Your e-mail address and/or phone number will not be published. Leave your name or hometown blank if you do not want it published.

EDITOR'S CHOICE

Samuelson: A Quick Solution to Social Security?
Real Estate: Five Ways to Boost Your Home's Value
Burma: Why Sanctions Won't Work
Starr: Baseball Playoff Preview
Gross: Big Losers in the Subprime Mess

advertisement

SEARCH THE SITE
Search

FBI - Stevens-1266

Rate this story Low ☆☆☆☆☆ High

Current rating: 4.5 by 6 users • View Top Rated stories

Print this Email this Blog this IM this

Sponsored Links

Are You Nursing Material?
Take this Quiz to Find Out if Nursing is the Career For You!
www.LearnAndBecome.com

Albany Law School
Interested in Politics? Study Law In New York's Powerful Capital.
www.AlbanyLaw.edu

Online Law School
Juris Doctor JD & LLM Masters Low Tuition, Free Textbooks www.edu-onlinedegree.org

Online Law Schools
Directory of online law schools. Request free information today.
lawonlineschool.com

advertisement

What do you like best about fuel-efficient vehicles? (Choose one.)

Better for the environment
Cheap on gas
Stylish

VIEW RESULTS

Chevy. Gas-friendly to gas-free.

Subscribe to Newsweek—Guaranteed Low Rate

Add Newsweek RSS Feeds

Mobile.newsweek.com

ARCHIVES | MY NEWSWEEK (BETA) | NEWSWEEK RADIO | ABOUT NEWSWEEK | SUBSCRIBER SERVICES
PRESSROOM | ADVERTISING INFORMATION | CONTACT US | EDUCATION PROGRAM
BACK COPIES | RIGHTS AND REPRINT SALES | SHOWCASE ADS | ONLINE AND DISTANCE LEARNING DIRECTORY

Cover | U.S. News | Politics | World News | Business | Sports | Tech/Science | Entertainment | Travel | Health | Blogs Etc. | Weather | Local News
Newsweek | Today Show | Nightly News | Dateline NBC | Meet the Press | MSNBC TV

About | Alerts | Newsletters | RSS | Mobile | Podcasts | Site Map | Help | News Tools | Jobs | Contact Us | Terms & Conditions | Privacy

© 2007 MSNBC.com

FBI - Stevens-1267

© 2007 Microsoft MSN Privacy Legal Advertise Feedback | Help

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Alaska Newsreader

Today's news for the Last Frontier

By Terry Carr | tcarr@adn.com

(Published: October 3, 2007)

News for Wednesday, Oct. 3

25 years later, multiple murderer still free. The Bellingham Herald in Washington has a fascinating, richly detailed story recounting one of the most famous murder cases in Alaska history: the killing of eight people, including children aged 5 and 4, near Craig in Southeast Alaska.

Laurie Hart lost a brother in the Investor slayings. A print depicting the vessel is behind her. (Philip A. Dwyer/The Bellingham Herald) ( )

John Kenneth Peel was tried twice for the 1982 slayings aboard the purse seiner Investor, which was destroyed by a fire so intense it was impossible to say precisely how some of the eight died. A jury in Peel's 1986 trial deadlocked. Another jury in 1988 acquitted him.

Today, the case is not being actively investigated, Alaska State Trooper spokesperson Beth Ipsen. "We do believe that we had our guy," she said.

***

Fairbanks election results. Fairbanks voters on Tuesday shot down a borough sales tax and approved a city tax cap, but no candidate got enough votes to avoid a runoff in the race for city mayor, according to stories in the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner. Here's links to the stories:

- Sales tax. Only about 29 percent of voters approved the plan, which would have cut Fairbanks North Star Borough property taxes in half.
- Mayor's race. Terry Strle won 37 percent of the vote, but needed 40 to avoid a runoff. Vivian Stiver got 22 percent; Don Seeliger got 21 percent.
- Tax cap. About two-thirds of voters approved the proposal.

***

Ketchikan voting. A story in the Ketchikan Daily News reports that voters there soundly rejected an initiative that would have limited future jewelry store density. Initiative backers argued the community had too many jewelry stores downtown, but foes said business restrictions set a bad precedent.

About 63 percent of those voting came down against the measure, the Daily News says.

***

Juneau voting. Voters in Alaska's capital city said "no" to the return of fluoride to city water, the Juneau Empire reports. The proposal went down soundly, with 61 percent of those voting saying they opposed it.

194-AN-13620-M-546

FBI - Stevens-1268

The Empire story called the issue "one of the most hotly contested and expensive ballot initiatives in the city's history." The American Dental Association funded most of the pro-fluoridation's $151,000 campaign, the story says.

***

"Alaska: Northern Exposure." A Newsweek Periscope item says the federal probe into corruption in Alaska is presenting problems for Republicans, who are wrestling with what to do about contributions from Bill Allen and other Veco Corp. executives. The story cites Center for Responsive Politics numbers that say Allen and other Veco people have given more than $363,000 in federal contributions since 2004.

As of now, the National Republican Senatorial Committee and Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens have given some of their Veco money to charity and Alaska Rep. Don Young has returned some that he got, according to the story.

***

World War II veterans. An APRN story features several former soldiers, now living in Juneau, who served in the 10th Mountain Division during World War II. The division suffered one of the highest casualty rates of the war, with more than one-third of the division's 13,000 troops either killed or wounded in fighting in Europe, according to the story.

The division's troops were primarily skilled in skiing and climbing and pioneered the ski industry and outdoor gear companies back in the U.S., the story says.

***

Missile system "up and running." A story in The New York Times reports that those overseeing the nation's antimissile system — a system that includes the missiles based in Alaska — conducted a successful test last week and is ready to respond to an emerging crisis in Asia.

"We can bring missiles up or take them down as need be so that they can continue doing the testing," said General Renuart, commander of the military's Northern Command, based in Colorado Springs. But, he added, "I'm fully confident that we have all of the pieces in place that, if the nation needed to, we could respond."

Critics have contended the system is flawed and isn't needed.

***

AK on PFD. With Permanent Fund dividend money going into the bank accounts today of those who met the filing deadline and chose direct deposit, an "AK" story on a number of features of the program is timely. The radio program (it's almost an hour long, but the dividend material is the first in the lineup of stories) looks at some of the basics of how the program works, how the amount of the dividend is determined, and how the state tries to deal with fraud.

The story also airs the personal plans of a number of Alaskans on what they intend to do with their $1,654 check.

FBI - Stevens-1269

***

The earmark that won't go away. A story in The Hill says that lawyers and watchdog groups are asking for an investigation and thinking about a lawsuit involving a change to an earmark in the 2005 transportation bill. The change, which came after the bill passed Congress, involved Coconut Road in South Florida and benefited a campaign contributor of Alaska Rep. Don Young, who has refused to say anything about the issue.

Also on the lawsuit question, TPMMuckraker.com has a story saying that Taxpayers for Common Sense is threatening to file one if the House ethics committee doesn't investigate the Coconut Road earmark. The story has an opinion about how events could go: "... (D)espite the fact that the change seems a blatant violation of House rules, chances are the infamously inert ethics committee won't jump to action."

***

Amazing fish tag journey. Scientists are trying to figure out how an electronic fish tag, which was originally implanted in a steelhead at a Washington state fish hatchery, made its way to New Zealand, where in April it was found in the belly of a sooty shearwater chick, according to an Associated Press story. The tag had traveled 7,700 miles.

"We know (the tag) went into the ocean, and we know it ended up in New Zealand," said Dave Marvin, who tracks Columbia River PIT tags for the Pacific States Marine Fisheries Commission in Portland. "But what happened in between is speculation."

***

Steamed over bridge demise. An Alaska Journal of Commerce story airs views from Ketchikan area lawmakers and community leaders who are hot over Gov. Sarah Palin's order ending work on the Gravina Island bridge. Some critics said they never saw the order coming and, in fact, had been talking in recent weeks with state officials about ways to slice the cost of the bridge.

"Not to communicate with local legislators and communities on a major project like this is just not done," said Sen. Bert Stedman, a Sitka Republican.

And in Juneau ... Community leaders and lawmakers there wonder what the "bridge to nowhere" decision means for a Juneau access road, according to a Juneau Empire story. The Juneau Access Project, as it's called, has been a source of contention for years, and cutting the bridge money could mean there won't be money for the road project either or it could mean there's money available now.

Trouble is, answers aren't easy to come by. "I haven't the slightest idea," Sen. Kim Elton, a Juneau Democrat, said of the meaning of the Gravina bridge cancellation.

***

FBI - Stevens-1270

Sean Penn vs. Barrow's vampires. Sean Penn's movie "Into the Wild," the story of the wanderings and death of Chris McCandless, is getting a ton of media attention. But there's another movie due in the next couple weeks that features Alaska: "30 Days of Night." The publicity accompanying this one says it's about a gang of bloodthirsty vampires who move in on Barrow during its weeks of darkness and start trimming the population.

Want a peek? IESB.net has a minute-and-a-half cut and a ton of still pictures. Don't look unless you're prepared for lots of fire and blood.

***

Ted Stevens at the movies. The Washington Post's Reliable Source columnists took note of the fact that Sen. Ted Stevens was spotted at a Georgetown movie theater in Washington, D.C., over the weekend. (The Stevens item ran down the page from the Britney Spears one, which detailed her personal, professional and family problems.)

And no, Stevens wasn't at the movies to see "Into the Wild." The senator was going to see "3:10 to Yuma."

Print Page Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1271

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 4, 2007 Thursday
FINAL EDITION

Burglars targeted their take;
EQUIPMENT: Owner says firm's mention in Kott trial irrelevant.

BYLINE: By JAMES HALPIN jhalpin@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 556 words

The thief or thieves who burglarized an Anchorage marketing firm that was mentioned during the corruption trial of former state Rep. Pete Kott may have planned to steal specific equipment, according to Anchorage police who are asking for the public's help in cracking the case.

"The person involved in this theft may have had knowledge of the specific equipment they were after," police Lt. Paul Honeman said. "If they were looking for just high-dollar items, there were certainly more lucrative items to take."

A computer server, two hard drives, broadcast editing equipment and a flat-screen TV, among other items, were stolen from Northwest Strategies, owner Tim Woolston said. Losses were estimated at more than $50,000.

Many pricey items that were out in the open, including desktop computers, were untouched in the burglary, Honeman said.

Police have very few leads in the case and are asking anyone with information to call them at 786-8500, he said.

The equipment that was stolen was specialized and wasn't of the sort one would expect a common thief to typically go after, Woolston said.

"It seems like it would be very difficult for someone to be able to sell that kind of stolen equipment," Woolston said.

But he said it could just as easily have been someone randomly grabbing things as someone seeking specific equipment.

None of the equipment contained sensitive information about clients, and no customer information was compromised, Woolston said.

The crime took place between 3 p.m. Sept. 15 and 11:30 a.m. Sept. 16, Honeman said. It was reported Sept. 16 by the office manager.

A back window had been pulled off its frame, which was not protected by a security alarm. The office now has an alarm, Woolston said.

Detectives are awaiting the results of forensics tests that were conducted at the scene and are compiling a list of serial numbers of the stolen items, Honeman said.

Some of the stolen equipment was in a small room that is next to the back door, Woolston said, and the thieves probably wouldn't have come across it unless they left through the back door.

"It's certainly off the beaten path," Woolston said. "It doesn't look like an office, so I think it's a little surprising that someone would end up in there to steal things."

Northwest Strategies was co-owned by former state Sen. Jerry Mackie until earlier this year, when Woolston bought out his interest.

194A-AN-13620-M; 547

Northwest Strategies' and Mackie's names surfaced during Kott's trial several days before the break-in, when a phone conversation between Mackie and former Veco vice president Rick Smith was played for jurors.

The call took place on July 12, 2006 -- when Mackie still was with Northwest Strategies and was working as a consultant on Kott's campaign -- and in it the two talked about a poll conducted by Dave Dittman for Kott's campaign.

Mackie told Smith he had let Kott know that Smith and Veco chief executive Bill Allen had agreed to help pay for the poll.

After the conversation was played in court Sept. 11, Mackie said in an interview that he knew about the poll but wasn't a part of any bribery conspiracy involving Veco.

Woolston said he doesn't think there is any connection between the burglary and the mention in court of the company and Mackie.

Find James Halpin online at adn.com/contact/jhalpin or call him at 257-4589.

LOAD-DATE: October 4, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1273

Best Western REST EASY WITH OUR LOWEST RATES GUARANTEED. BOOK NOW. OUR LOWEST RATES ARE AT BESTWESTERN.COM.

adn.com

Alaska Politics

Cowdery protest

Posted by Alaska_Politics
Posted: October 4, 2007 - 4:53 pm

From Kyle Hopkins in Anchorage --

Bill Scannell, a Democrat working on the Jake Metcalfe campaign, and Scott McNurren, a Daily News travel columnist who Scannell describes as a "big, honkin' ass Republican" plan to demonstrate in front of Sen. John Cowdery's Lake Otis home tomorrow.

Scannell says they're calling on Cowdery to step down, saying he's not representing his district. They plan to grill pork sausages.

add new comment

12 October 5, 2007 - 3:19pm | concerned1voter

Thank you Dan Fagan

For getting Metcalf to fire Scannell, but as far as I am concerned, it is too little too late. It should have been done yesterday!!!!! Timing is everything. Jake only did it because of the political fallout which has occurred today. This protest was planned before today, so you are no hero, Jake.

reply »

11 October 5, 2007 - 3:00pm | Stags_Leap

Metcalf just fired Scannell

according to Big Dan aka Big Man. Good on Jake.

Now can we all just head on over to Mad Myrna's and have a cold one? I'm ready to dance, baby!!!

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 3:08pm | fishwrapper

Can I get a good B-B-Q'ed

Can I get a good B-B-Q'ed Pork Sandwich at Myrna's? " Disclaimer Dan's" gonna ruin my dinner plans!

reply »

10 October 5, 2007 - 2:41pm | fishwrapper

Cowdery Protest

Lookout you protester's! "Big Man" Dan Fagan is pissed! He should do a remote for the pork roast. :-)

reply »

9 October 5, 2007 - 2:40pm | concerned1voter

Does this Surprise Anyone

This is the most dispicable thing I have ever heard. An old man is in the hospital and has not been convicted of anything. His elderly wife is home alone or maybe she will have her grandchildren there. These protesters have NO class and will do anything to get someone out of office. Jake Metcalf, you should be ashamed. Please everyone remember that when you vote. Get rid of Scannell, but from what I have heard about you, you probably support this demonstration.

reply »

8 October 5, 2007 - 12:31pm | rfn

Alaska Politics

This is the place for news on Alaska politics -- state, local and national. Public life in the Last Frontier may never have been more interesting than right now -- the broad and still-evolving corruption investigation, a new governor, powerful members of Congress under scrutiny, and the usual hardball politics on the state, national and local levels. Come here for the latest news and join the discussion.

Contributors

Kyle Hopkins
Kyle Hopkins writes about Anchorage city government and politics. He covered last year's campaign for governor, and has blogged extensively about Alaska politics for the past year. He grew up in Southeast Alaska and was a reporter at the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner and Anchorage Press.
E-mail Kyle at khopkins@adn.com.

Sean Cockerham
Sean Cockerham writes about Alaska state politics. He spent three years based in Juneau for the Daily News before joining the Tacoma News-Tribune two years ago to write about Washington state politics. He went to Iraq twice for the News Tribune, and previously wrote about Alaska government and politics for the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner. Now he's back in Anchorage.
E-mail Sean at scockerham@adn.com.

Erika Bolstad
Erika Bolstad covers Alaska issues, including the congressional delegation, from Washington, D.C., for McClatchy Newspapers. Before joining the bureau this summer, she spent seven years as a reporter at the Miami Herald, where she covered politics, government and the state legislature
E-mail Erika at ebolstad@adn.com.

Archive

Cowdery protest - 10/4/2007 4:53 pm
Veco contributions - 10/4/2007 3:07 pm
Lying politicians - 10/4/2007 12:56 pm
War of the Worlds - 10/4/2007 10:23 am
Talking Democrats - 10/4/2007 9:43 am
UPDATED: How much for that sixpack? - 10/3/2007 5:11 pm
Passing the gavel - 10/3/2007 3:31 pm
Meyer vs. Cowdery - 10/3/2007 10:25 am
Alcohol tax - 10/3/2007 10:16 am
The Trail - 10/3/2007 9:24 am
$429.2 million (UPDATED) - 10/2/2007 1:29 pm
McCarthyism? - 10/2/2007 12:26 pm
Oil tax road show - 10/2/2007 12:05 pm
Did the North Slope producers know what Veco was doing? - 10/2/2007 6:52 am
"What amounts to a contribution and what doesn't?" - 10/1/2007 6:58 pm
Budget tomorrow - 10/1/2007 5:33 pm
PENCO plant (no, not that Penco) - 10/1/2007 3:37 pm
New sheriff in town? - 10/1/2007 3:22 pm
One Down - 10/1/2007 1:13 pm

Alaska's Top Jobs all 86 top jobs

Social Services
Family Support Services
Hope Community Resources

Aviation
Stock Clerk
Lynden Air Cargo, LLC

Management/Professional
Code Compliance Officer
Matanuska-Susitna Borough

Engineering
Fire & Gas Engineers
NanaCoil Engineering

Construction/Skilled/Trades
Materials Superintendent
Coeur Alaska, Inc

careerbuilder

Search Jobs | Place an employment ad

Homes By Prudential more

10000 Hillside Drive
$1,575,000
5BR, 6.5BA, 3-car garage, 81,760SF lot, 8,767SF residential, 960SF garage.

4 of 11

Homescape

find

Search ADN Real Estate | Place a homes ad
Realtor Market Place | Valley Real Estate Guide

Top Rentals more

Alpine
South Anchorage: We are minutes away from employment, banking, shopping, dining and great entertainment.

7 of 12

FBI - Stevens-1274

194A-AN-13670- n,548

Should not the same standard apply, in this instance, as applied to the picketing of a social occasion at another home? That of a private citizen who doesn't even hold elective office?

Seems like the right to picket anywhere at any time is well established.

But that "grilled pork" idea seems discriminatory. Equality demands some grilled tofu be proffered as well.

reply »

More on Coconut Road - 10/1/2007 11:31 am
Hungry constituents - 10/1/2007 11:15 am
UPDATE: Ben Stevens on Fagan show audio - 9/28/2007 3:50 pm
full archive »

apartments.com
Advanced Search | Place a rentals ad
Top Autos all autos
Anchorage Chrysler Center

2006 Chevrolet Silverado
$29,900
Anchorage Chrysler Center
4 of 7
Powered by
Search for a New or Used Car | Place an auto ad

7 October 5, 2007 - 10:17am | fsajw9

Maybe they should protest in Maybe they should protest in Canada? Or is Cowdery back already?

reply »

6 October 5, 2007 - 10:11am | turtle3

Home invasion
Standing outside someone's home and protesting is disgusting. I don't care who that person is. No one should ever bring a protest to the family of the person you are targeting. Has anyone even considered that being outside of someone's home protesting, could be perceived as a threatening, or at the least, an intimidating tactic? Grow up guys. Protests should be at more appropriate locations, such as a business or a public building, but not at a home, where the family resides. Am I wrong?

http://anthonylemons.blogspot.com

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 11:36am | leowasslife

hey guess what
He represents the public.

Everywhere he goes, he is in the public domain. When they run for office, privacy goes out the window.

What is appropriate is relieving himself from his position until the appearance of impropriety is either proved or disproved.

Criminals need people to defend them too though.

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 12:24pm | realist

relieving himself
Not taking issue with your argument, which I think is quite valid, but don't you want to say something like "releasing" himself? The "relieving himself" wording just caused me to experience a very unpleasant mental image!

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 11:18am | gr8landclay

Politicians always use their homes and families to demonstrate why we should trust them and vote for them, in every repetitive election commercial we've ever seen... It seems THEY choose to waive symbolic protest immunity when they do so... If it became harrasment that would be a different kettle of fish, but a small, one-day symbolic protest does not, at least to me seem unreasonable when it involves a public official who is uder corruption investigation..... He alwasy has a forum through which to respond with protest of innocence if that is his choice... or, he can maintain silence and willingly choose more public scrutiny and questions - or, he can step down... the choices are his..

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 10:24am | Stumpy1

Assembly
Just a reminder for you folks more concerned with where this protest is occurring than the actual corruption:

From the Alaska Constitution, Inherent Rights:

6. Assembly; Petition

The right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government shall never be abridged.

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 10:30am | flabbyface

right and wrong 101 for losers
Just because you have the right to, does not make it right.

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1275

October 5, 2007 - 10:24am | AK_Lady
I agree with you.
Well stated.
reply »

October 5, 2007 - 10:36am | Stumpy1
Of course you do
Still waiting for you neo-con nitwits to spend half as much energy criticizing the actual fraud... committed by the neo-con nitwits of course.
reply »

October 5, 2007 - 11:12am | flabbyface
Totally lost
How on earth can you bring the label neo-con into this conversation about protesting at the man's home?

What does being a neo-con have to do with protesting in front of his house?
reply »

October 5, 2007 - 11:57am | leowassilla
you don't get it so don't ask.

Neo-cons stick up for their principles. Both GOOD and BAD.

This just happens to be one of those circumstances.

Therefore, you don't understand that when being in public office, you allow yourself to be scrutinized in public.

You guys always go back to the same core blinding principles. get a clue
reply »

October 5, 2007 - 10:41am | AK_Lady
Fraud?
Who, Cowdery? Was he charged and convicted already?
reply »

October 5, 2007 - 11:38am | turtle3
They just like to make smoke where theres no fire.
These so-called protesters are simply following the herd. They have no real direction, just zombies looking for free pork sausages, and not the grilling kind either. This classless tactic of going to a man's home has nothing to do with politics, so do not label people who dissagree with this childish protest. We are simply Americans, who do not feel that it is appropriate to harass anyone at there home. People who live in glass houses, should never throw stones. There is nothing anyone can say that will make this tasteless home protest seem right.

http://anthonylemons.blogspot.com
reply »

October 5, 2007 - 12:13pm | leowassilla
private matters
yes, I would agree. however, when it deals with public officials, they are held to, and labeled with different standards than ordinary Americans.
reply »

October 5, 2007 - 11:58am | leowassilla
you know what?
then the person shouldn't run for office.

You just don't get it.
reply »

October 5, 2007 - 12:00pm | flabbyface
Get what what doesn't he get?
reply »

October 5, 2007 - 12:08pm | leowassilla
that a person shouldn't run that a person shouldn't run for office if they can't handle the pressure of being in the public domain.

FBI - Stevens-1276

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 12:10pm | flabbyface

People

So people who run for office should expect protesters outside their home? Is this what you're saying?

What is your address?

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 12:16pm | leowassilla

Public officials have to Public officials have to post their address. It's public knowledge.

Private individuals have different standards.

You could sue someone for saying things or could be considered causing public nuisance.

reply »

5 October 5, 2007 - 6:09am | lawschoolgrad

COUNTDOWN FOR ANDERSON SENTENCING+++++++++

Ten days of freedom for Tom Anderson.

Mr. Kohring consider saving your family the embarrasment of a trial. How can you put your elderly parents? Haven't we all been humiliated enough?

There are so many good people in State service. The Kohring trial is the third in a series which will only further hurt Alaska.

reply »

4 October 5, 2007 - 1:26am | Stumpy1

What Cowdery cost us...

BTW, when you see Cowdery remind him that you expect him to make restitution payments to each and every Alaskan who has been robbed of thousands of dollars- each, so far, due to his support for the bribery induced PPT.

It'll never happen, of course. Besides not having the hundreds of millions he and his crooked pals cost us, Cowdery's first priority will be to gather enough money to pay for his legal defense.

More info on Cowdery here:

http://property.muni.org/cics/cwba/dfhwbtta/TX1P+0201421107000

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 3:03pm | AK_Lady

Gees

You're quick to disclose everyone's personal info, but you won't post under your real name. You're a wuss.

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 1:27am | flabbyface

Question

Do you wish harm to come to this man?

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 1:34am | Stumpy1

Consider the testimony

Under oath, we have heard that Cowdery sold out the people of Alaska. That betrayal has harmed all Alaskans.

By Cowdery's refusal to step down he is harming his constituents who do deserve representation.

If he is convicted, I do want harm to come to this POS. The harm should be by his spending the rest of his life as an inmate in a Federal Prison- just like the others who have been convicted so far: Anderson and Kott.

What is your connection to Cowdery, Flab?

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 1:39am | flabbyface

follow-up questions

1. And if he is not convicted?

2. When you speak of harm, do you include physical harm?

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1277

October 5, 2007 - 1:59am | Stumpy1

You didn't answer my question, Flab

What is your connection to Cowdery?

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 10:32am | flabbyface

none

I do not have a connection to him.

OH WAIT, I DO!

I once saw him at costco I think, so that makes us co-costco shoppers.

Will you now answer my two questions?

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 11:06am | Stumpy1

You still have not answered my question, Flab

Flab, I see a lot of people I know at Costco, but you do not see me getting all hysterical on these blogs with capital letters and exclamation points like you.

I really want to know what motivates people like you. Are you a Republican? Are you a neighbor of Cowdery? Do you work for the oil industry?

Why are you so passionate about a silly protest, but express zero passion about the real problem- namely that we have been betrayed by those who took an oath to defend our constitution?

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 11:10am | flabbyface

unbelievable

No (Nor am I a dem)

No

No

Why do you assume I have zero passion about the real problem?

Will you answer my follow-up questions?

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 11:22am | Stumpy1

660,000 people, and you Flab

660,000 people in Alaska, Flab. And you are about the only one criticizing a small protest with capital letters, vitriol, and exclamation points.

It is hard to imagine that an average person would be as sensitive as you are about a small protest that is:

A. On a public right of way.

B. A protest that is fully consistent with our inherent rights that are recognized within our Bill of Rights.

So what do you do?

And what do you think of the fact that the DOJ is investigating, arresting, and convicting a significant number of our elected officials?

Are you angry that we've lost billions because crooked politicians have allowed our natural resources to be given away for chump change?

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1278

October 5, 2007 - 11:26am | flabbyface

answers

I will gladly answer your questions if and when you take the time to answer mine.

Deal?

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 11:32am | Stumpy1

Deal, Flab

I made my position crystal clear: "The harm should be by his spending the rest of his life as an inmate in a Federal Prison- just like the others who have been convicted so far: Anderson and Kott."

If he isn't convicted, then the prosecution was not able to prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt.

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 11:41am | flabbyface

questions

you did not answer my questions.

:(

When you do, I will answer your questions.

reply »

3 October 5, 2007 - 12:52am | flabbyface

Is this some kind of Sick Joke?

what kind of LOSER goes to someone's home to protest?

Are you flippin kidding me?

FYI - If you're stupid enough to think it's a swell idea to show up at his home to protest, then you are a LOSER. Got that? A LLOOSSEERR!

Maybe some of you should go get a pen and write this down.

Don't LOSERS go to people's homes in the south sometimes - and bring firewood in the shape of a cross to keep all the "protesters" warm?

LOOOOOOOOSERS!

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 1:00am | geefour907

Yes, it is sick...

It's sick that Cowdry was fingered, under oath and in court, for taking bribes and he didn't have the decency to resign. It's time Alaskans got out their pitchforks and protested against all of this corruption. Go Scannell and McMurren!

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 1:08am | flabbyface

Give me an LI

What's your address? What? You won't give it to me? Why is that? Oh, you don't want people standing outside your house?

You can talk all you want about how bad Cowdry is and how he isn't doing this or is doing that, but to show up at the man's home - only a LOSER could have the lack of taste and dignity to do something so low.

As for bringing your pitchforks, don't also forget to bring your white hoods!

reply »

2 October 4, 2007 - 10:08pm | Stumpy1

Kudos to Scannell, and McMurren

While most Alaskans are content sitting on their asses watching TV while our resources are allowed to be stolen by corrupt politicians, it sure is great to know that there are a few Alaskans left who are willing to take to the streets to demand reform.

I would hope that this protest would have hundreds of people in front of Cowdery's home.

Is it proper?

You bet your ass it is. The testimony we heard, under oath, that Cowdery took bribes makes him unfit to hold public office.

The protesters will be on a legal public right of way, not on Cowdery's property, trying to get this guy to do what he should have done years ago- resign.

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1279

October 5, 2007 - 12:54am | flabbyface

Hey stump

What's your address?

reply »

October 4, 2007 - 10:17pm | Stumpy1

To join the protest...

According to public records, available on the Internet from MOA, this is John Cowdery's home address:

COWDERY JOHN J
8120 LAKE OTIS PKWY
ANCHORAGE AK 99507 3116

If you can not make the Friday protest, consider organizing other protests here.

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 11:53am | undeclared

Let's expose Stumpy's identity!

Sounds like Stumpy will be there...I may go just to find out who Stumpy is and reveal it on this blog. Who cares about Cowdery - exposing Stumpy will be more fun!

reply »

October 4, 2007 - 10:20pm | AK_Lady

Ugh.

The fact that it's available online doesn't mean you should post it on this blog. You're an ass.

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 7:36am | jcpage

misrepresenting

Name calling is un-lady like. You are really John Cowdery aren't you?

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 10:09am | AK_Lady

Tell your mama that,

Dick.

reply »

October 4, 2007 - 10:33pm | Stumpy1

Journalism 101

Who, what, when, where, why.

Kyle should have published the address within the story as it is where this protest is occurring that makes this little protest newsworthy.

The home addresses of all elected officials in Alaska are part of the public record and available on-line 24/7/365.

Is the Municipality of Anchorage wrong for making this information available?

Certainly not.

reply »

1 2 next » last »

© Copyright 2007, The Anchorage Daily News, a subsidiary of The McClatchy Company

Contact Us | Newsroom Contacts | Communication Forms | Subscriptions | Advertising | Terms of Use

Daily News Jobs | RSS Feeds | ADN Store | Newspapers in Education | Privacy Agreement

A member of the
Real Cities Network

FBI - Stevens-1280

Sometimes it takes a little fiction to get you closer to the truth:

adn.com

Alaska Politics

Cowdery protest

Posted by Alaska_Politics
Posted: October 4, 2007 - 4:53 pm

From Kyle Hopkins in Anchorage --

Bill Scannell, a Democrat working on the Jake Metcalfe campaign, and Scott McMurren, a Daily News travel columnist who Scannell describes as a "big, honkin' ass Republican" plan to demonstrate in front of Sen. John Cowdery's Lake Otis home tomorrow.

Scannell says they're calling on Cowdery to step down, saying he's not representing his district. They plan to grill pork sausages.

add new comment

1 October 4, 2007 - 5:06pm | KatRock_AK

Awwww...c'mon

can't they leave the guy's home alone?

I agree, John should step down...thought so for years now for a number of reasons...

But for pity's sake...protest at his office, and allow his home some sanctity will ya?

I have no love, and very little respect quite frankly, for John Cowdery and hope he gets his due.

But his wife is a wonderful lady and doesn't deserve to have her home be the location of a protest against her husband's violation of his office.

So, cook your pork sausage in the parking lot of the LIO, heck, throw some limberger cheese on it for good measure (there's nuthin' smellier)...but protesting at his home is in very poor taste.

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 10:27am | chilcoot

Agreed

I agree with KatRock. There are a zillion ways for Alaskans to express their displeasure with Sen. Cowdery. Staging a protest in front of the man's home should be dang near the bottom of the list of acceptable ones. This advances nothing other than anger, something we don't need more of.

Protest, yes. Disturb him, his family, and their neighbors in his home, no.

reply »

October 4, 2007 - 5:41pm | bob_the_contractor

oh yes

there is.

perhaps a nice casu marzu is a bit more apropo for an event such as this.

reply »

October 4, 2007 - 5:45pm | KatRock_AK

Alaska Politics

This is the place for news on Alaska politics -- state, local and national. Public life in the Last Frontier may never have been more interesting than right now -- the broad and still-evolving corruption investigation, a new governor, powerful members of Congress under scrutiny, and the usual hardball politics on the state, national and local levels. Come here for the latest news and join the discussion.

Contributors

Kyle Hopkins
Kyle Hopkins writes about Anchorage city government and politics. He covered last year's campaign for governor, and has blogged extensively about Alaska politics for the past year. He grew up in Southeast Alaska and was a reporter at the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner and Anchorage Press.
E-mail Kyle at khopkins@adn.com.

Sean Cockerham
Sean Cockerham writes about Alaska state politics. He spent three years based in Juneau for the Daily News before joining the Tacoma News-Tribune two years ago to write about Washington state politics. He went to Iraq twice for the News Tribune, and previously wrote about Alaska government and politics for the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner. Now he's back in Anchorage.
E-mail Sean at scockerham@adn.com.

Erika Bolstad
Erika Bolstad covers Alaska issues, including the congressional delegation, from Washington, D.C., for McClatchy Newspapers. Before joining the bureau this summer, she spent seven years as a reporter at the Miami Herald, where she covered politics, government and the state legislature.
E-mail Erika at ebolstad@adn.com.

Archive

Cowdery protest - 10/4/2007 4:53 pm
Veco contributions - 10/4/2007 3:07 pm
Lying politicians - 10/4/2007 12:56 pm
War of the Worlds - 10/4/2007 10:23 am
Talking Democrats - 10/4/2007 9:43 am
UPDATED: How much for that sixpack? - 10/3/2007 5:11 pm
Passing the gavel - 10/3/2007 3:31 pm
Meyer vs. Cowdery - 10/3/2007 10:25 am
Alcohol tax - 10/3/2007 10:16 am
The Trail - 10/3/2007 9:24 am
$429.2 million (UPDATED) - 10/2/2007 1:29 pm
McCarthyism? - 10/2/2007 12:26 pm
Oil tax road show - 10/2/2007 12:05 pm
Did the North Slope producers know what Veco was doing? - 10/2/2007 8:52 am
"What amounts to a contribution and what doesn't?" - 10/1/2007 6:56 pm
Budget tomorrow - 10/1/2007 5:38 pm
PENCO plant (no, not that Penco) - 10/1/2007 3:37 pm
New sheriff in town? - 10/1/2007 3:22 pm
One Down - 10/1/2007 1:13 pm

PLAY GAMES ONLINE
INCLUDING:
+ crossword
+ sudoku
+ word roundup
+ play 4
+ jigsaw puzzles
play FREE at www.adn.com/games

Alaska's Top Jobs all 86 top jobs

Social Services
Family Support Services
Hope Community Resources

Aviation
Stock Clerk
Lynden Air Cargo, LLC

Management/Professional
Code Compliance Officer
Matanuska-Susitna Borough

Engineering
Fire & Gas Engineers
NanaCoit Engineering

Construction/Skilled/Trades
Materials Superintendent
Coeur Alaska, Inc

careerbuilder
Search Jobs | Place an employment ad

Homes By Prudential more

5835 Prominence Pointe Drive $985,000
5BR, 5BA, 14,493SF residential, 4,715SF lot.

9 of 11

Homescape

find

Search ADN Real Estate | Place a homes ad
Realtor Market Place | Valley Real Estate Guide

FBI - Stevens-1281

Never tried it... and am happy to take your word for it.

reply »

October 4, 2007 - 5:25pm | amoeba

More on Coconut Road - 10/1/2007 11:31 am
Hungry constituents - 10/1/2007 11:15 am
UPDATE: Ben Stevens on Fagan show audio - 9/28/2007 3:59 pm
full archive »

Cowdery asked for it
No offense, KatRock, but I think you are suffering from a touch of Stockholm Syndrome. John Cowdery doesn't deserve your sympathy. He signed up to represent Alaskans and now he wants to "sit out" the special session oil tax rewrite. He is abdicating his duties and should step down and allow the thousands of Alaskans he represents to get a legislator who will work for their interests in Juneau.
Yes, protesting on his front lawn is a provocative step. But Cowdery signed up to be a representative of the people and now he has unilaterally decided they won't have representation in the State Senate during what could be the most important debate for decades to come.
OK, maybe I overestimate the willingness of the Republican Majority to actually DO something in Juneau. But in any circumstance, he should resign and allow Alaskans their due representation or else be prepared to deal with the public backlash.

reply »

October 5, 2007 - 2:47pm | moyerpj

Old Lady
The only one home is his wife of 80+ years.....he's in the hospital. It takes a low lif sob to harass an old lady. What are you gonna do for fun afterwards? Perhaps there's some elderly down at the Pioneer Home in need of some political correction.

reply »

« first ‹ previous 1 2

FBI - Stevens-1282

« previous | MUCK HOME | next »

Veco Loves Don Young Best

By Laura McGann - October 4, 2007, 6:14PM

It looks like Veco plays favorites. Since 1993 the oil services company tangled in several of the Alaska corruption investigations has given Rep. Don Young (R-AK) more than two and a half times what it's donated to Sen. Ted Stevens (R-AK), the AP reports.

Young's raked in $180,630, while Stevens has only pocketed $70,500 (but that presumably doesn't include other perks like Veco employees remodeling his house or parking cars at his fundraisers.) Young and Stevens are both under federal investigation for their ties to the corporation. The FBI is particularly interested in the annual pig roast former Veco CEO Bill Allen would host for Young.

Sen. Lisa Murkowski has only pulled in a pittance ($41,250), but she's only been in Congress since late 2002, when her father bequeathed his seat to her to become governor of Alaska.

PERMALINK | TOPICS: Don Young, Lisa Murkowski, Ted Stevens PRINT SHARE

ADVERTISEMENT
WHAT DO YOU STAND FOR?
Home Submit Watch Trailer
Click on submit for a chance to win for your cause.
UPLOAD YOUR VIDEO NOW

Comments (5)

Kuparuk wrote on October 4, 2007 7:56 PM:

Uh. Year for year, I'd say Ted is the favorite.

Yon Dung has to run every two years, Ted every six... On a per-cycle basis, Ted actually comes out on top.

AKGuy wrote on October 4, 2007 9:53 PM:

Yet another reason to support Jake Metcalfe:

www.jake2008.com

anonymouse wrote on October 5, 2007 1:05 AM:

Murkkowski's income doesn't include her little real estate deal...

FBI - Stevens-1283

Ed*ard Teller wrote on October 5, 2007 2:15 PM:

When Mr. Metcalfe was chairman of the Alaska Democratic Party, during the winter of 2005-2006, he was unable, perhaps even unwilling, to enlist a candidate from the front ranks of Alaska Democrats to run against Young in the 2006 election. Yet, at that time, with the ongoing Abramoff investigation disclosures and other published reports, much of the information so visible now on Young was already available to an intrepid party chairman. When Diane Benson won the '06 Democratic Party primary, Metcalfe offered little substantive support to the campaign. Although he claimed two weeks ago that the Party gave Benson $25,000 for the 2006 general election, the accuracy of that figure is under question.

194-AN-13620-M;550

Metcalfe has stated recently he felt compelled to support Benson little beyond a level recommended by Rahm Emanuel at DCCC. Over the winter of 06-07, Metcalfe used materials donated to the Alaska Democrats from members of the 06' Benson crew to help create the dropdon.com site. Soon after the site went up, Metcalfe resigned his post and announced his candidacy from out-of-state.

Since filing for the '08 primary, Metcalfe has blogged hard, but Benson has formally called for an investigation of Young's 2005 transportation bill earmark changes. Since filing, Metcalfe has blogged a little about our veterans, Benson has set up a stringent schedule of contacts, fact-finding visits, queries and meetings with Vets, disabled Vets and military families, not just in Alaska, but in other parts of the country. One could go on - the list of comparisons between Metcalfe and Benson on actually getting to grips with Young's inadequacies is long, and not favorable to Metcalfe.

Alaska is fortunate, though, to have two progressive contestants from the Democrats for this seat. There will probably be at least one more entry. Metcalfe appears to have told CQPolitics.com's Rachel Kapochunas in an interview on September 19, that former Alaska Representative Ethan Berkowitz will be entering the race soon.

Kuparuk wrote on October 5, 2007 3:00 PM:

And this is why I can't support either Diane or Jake (unless they're the only chance to get Don out).

Ethan should step up. He's the only one I saw on the floor questioning Veco's BS, and he's smart and a good administrator.

Diane has been a potential candidate for years and years, but she never does anything with government. Her community efforts are legendary, but that doesn't mean she'd be a good congresswoman.

Someone needs to poke Ethan with a cattle prod and get him into the game.

Post a comment

Name:

Email Address:

URL:

Remember personal info?

Comments:

SEND»

FBI - Stevens-1284

Automated Serial Permanent Charge-Out
FD-5a (1-5-94)

Date: 01/31/08 Time: 19:45

Case ID: 194A-AN-13620-M Serial: 549

Description of Document:

Type : NEWSPAPE
Date : 10/04/07
To : ANCHORAGE
From : ANCHORAGE DAILY NEWS
Topic: ALASKA POLITICS - VECO CONTRIBUTIONS

Reason for Permanent Charge-Out:

FILED IN WRONG FILE

Employee: [redacted] b6 b7C

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 5, 2007 Friday
FINAL EDITION

Kohring faces older claims;
2002: New indictment says ex-representative got bribes from Allen.

BYLINE: By RICHARD MAUER rmauer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 901 words

Federal prosecutors unsealed a new indictment Thursday against former Rep. Vic Kohring, adding allegations that he was so beholden to former Veco chairman Bill Allen that he fired an aide at Allen's request.

The new indictment doesn't add any counts to the four-count public corruption case against Kohring, originally handed up by a federal grand jury in May. Both allege he broke federal bribery, extortion and conspiracy laws in 2006.

But in expanding the charging document by three pages, the government took the alleged conspiracy back to 2002, when it says Kohring first began receiving illegal cash payments of $500 to $1,000 from Allen and another Veco official, Rick Smith. The indictment now includes the story of former Kohring aide Eric Musser, who angered Allen when he filed a complaint with the Alaska Public Offices Commission against another legislator Allen supported, Bev Masek.

The new indictment also says Kohring acted on Allen's behest in 2003 by releasing an oil bill he had bottled up in a committee he chaired.

The indictment now calls $17,000 that Kohring allegedly sought from Allen to pay off a credit card debt a "payment" instead of a "loan."

Kohring, a Republican from Wasilla, is set to be the third ex-legislator tried as a result of a broad federal public corruption investigation in Alaska.

Former Reps. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage, and Pete Kott, R-Eagle River, have been found guilty by juries and are awaiting sentencing. Ex-Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, R-Juneau, is awaiting the outcome of a dispute over a legal issue before his bribery and conspiracy trial can be scheduled.

FBI - Stevens-1286

Kohring's trial is set for Oct. 22. His arraignment on the new indictment is scheduled for Oct. 9.

Kohring's attorney, John Browne of Seattle, couldn't be reached for comment. Earlier this week, he filed notice to the court and government that he would be unavailable from Oct. 3 to Oct. 10 and asked that no matters be scheduled during that time.

In May, Allen and one of his vice presidents, Smith, pleaded guilty to bribing lawmakers and are providing evidence in the cases.

Veco, an oil field service company, and its officials were leading political forces in Alaska. Their campaign contributions were well documented over the years -- the evidence has shown they only sometimes scoffed at disclosure laws, so the record of most of their donations has been publicly available since the early 1980s.

But Allen and Smith's backroom money and booze operation, centered in a suite in Juneau's Baranof Hotel where it was secretly filmed by the FBI, has added new civics lessons about how bills became laws in the real world of the Alaska Legislature.

The FBI case has focused on an oil-tax bill that tied the Legislature in knots in 2006 and forced two special sessions. Allen sought the lowest possible tax rate he could get for BP, Conoco Phillips and Exxon, and enlisted legislators on his secret payroll to help. According to testimony, he hoped to curry favor with the industry and induce construction of a gas pipeline, which could have meant millions upon millions of dollars in contracts for Veco.

194A-AN-13620-M;551

But the new Kohring indictment goes well beyond the 2006 battle over oil taxes. Starting in January 2002, the revised charges say, "Kohring received the first of several cash payments" from Allen "to influence and reward him" in his official capacity.

The new indictment alleges that Allen collected on the debt in April 2003 when Kohring was chairman of the House Special Committee on Oil and Gas. Kohring was holding up a controversial Senate bill that drastically lowered state royalties on older Cook Inlet wells and gave tax credits to some new North Slope exploration wells.

In April or May of 2003, Allen asked Kohring to release the bill so it could pass. Kohring not only complied, he signed on as a co-sponsor, the charges said.

The next year, Allen had a beef against Musser, the Kohring aide who brought APOC and legislative ethics charges against Masek, his previous employer, then a Republican representative from Willow. (Masek lost the Republican primary in 2004.)

Both agencies eventually sided with Musser. The public offices commission fined Masek $1,000 for spending campaign contributions on personal expenses. And the House ethics committee ruled she improperly demanded personal loans from Musser "under threat of termination," including a loan of $99.25 to pay off her food bill at a lounge in the state Capitol.

But being right didn't help Musser. According to the new indictment, Allen told Kohring "he was upset" about Musser's complaints and mad that Kohring was employing Musser. Kohring laid off Musser, then made the termination permanent "despite requests by the aide that he be re-hired."

Reached in Houston, where he now lives, Musser said he was surprised to learn he had become part of the case against Kohring. He acknowledged talking to the FBI, but said he hadn't heard anything from agents in a long time. He said he had to take a walk to think about what it all meant.

"It was a surprise reading it," Musser said.

Find Richard Mauer online at adn.com/contact/rmauer or call 257-4345. Daily News reporter Sean Cockerham contributed to this report.

TRIAL DATE: Former Rep. Vic Kohring faces trial on Oct. 22 on bribery, conspiracy and extortion charges.

ONLINE: Read more about the investigation into political corruption in Alaska.

adn.com/corruption

LOAD-DATE: October 5, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

FBI - Stevens-1287

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

2 of 2 DOCUMENTS

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 9, 2007 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

Anderson admits he broke the law; COURT MEMO: Ex-lawmaker facing 6 years for corruption concedes role, seeks leniency.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 689 words

Three months after a federal jury convicted him of seven felonies including bribery, former state Rep. Tom Anderson acknowledges that he broke the law, violated the public trust and must be punished.

Anderson didn't testify during the 10-day trial this summer. But he fought the charges, and until now maintained publicly that he was innocent.

His sentencing hearing is set for Oct. 15 before U.S. District Judge John Sedwick. A pre-sentence investigation report recommends he serve five to six years.

In a memo filed with the court on Monday, Anderson's lawyer says he is seeking "leniency, compassion and mercy." Except for the circumstances in the corruption case, Anderson has been a "tireless and selfless representative and advocate for the people of the State of Alaska," wrote defense lawyer Paul Stockler.

Anderson, a Republican who represented East Anchorage for two terms, shouldn't be sentenced to any more than two years and nine months, his lawyer argues.

"I accept full responsibility for the choices I've made and the damage I've done and the damage here transcends the personal loss and pain that has been suffered by my wife and family," Anderson says in the sentencing memorandum. His wife is state Sen. Lesil McGuire, and his father is former director of Alaska State Troopers.

Anderson was convicted of participating in a scheme in 2004 and 2005 with former Cornell Cos. lobbyist Bill Bobrick and consultant Frank Prewitt in which payments were funneled to him in exchange for his pushing the company's interests. Prewitt was working undercover for the FBI, and Cornell was unaware of the scheme, the U.S. Justice Department has said.

"Mr. Anderson believed at the time, that his actions were not in any way unlawful," Stockler says in the 47-page sentencing memorandum.

"Rather, he erroneously and indeed naively thought that he could properly serve two masters: the people of the State of Alaska, and a private consulting client seeking to capitalize on access to a legislator."

Anderson now realizes no one could do that, his lawyer says.

By the time the conspiracy began, Anderson was friends with Bobrick. Their families socialized often, from "informal game nights" to outings at the Alaska Center for the Performing Arts. "Over time, Mr. Anderson permitted that personal relationship to cloud his moral and ethical judgment," Stockler wrote.

FBI - Stevens-1288

Anderson has no prior criminal convictions, his lawyer wrote.

194A-AN-13620-M;552

Prosecutors have not yet filed their sentencing memorandum but will be seeking somewhere in the range of five years and three months to six years and six months, as recommended by the probation office in its report, Assistant U.S. Attorney Joe Bottini said Monday.

It's a little late for Anderson to acknowledge what he did wrong, Bottini said. He could have pleaded guilty.

"He put us through a trial," the prosecutor said. "In our view he is not entitled to any consideration for acceptance of responsibility."

Efforts to reach Anderson and Stockler were unsuccessful Monday.

But in the new court filing, Stockler wrote that there is no need to hand Anderson a long sentence to deter others. The story already is known to politicians, lobbyists and public officials.

"Moreover, they are aware that, as a result of his misdeeds, Tom Anderson was publicly disgraced, is now deeply in debt, and has lost his professional reputation, job, financial security, Alaska Permanent Fund dividend and right to vote."

The document also quotes letters of support from Anderson's friends, family and colleagues. One is from House Speaker John Harris, R-Valdez.

"Tom was a good legislator. In my opinion, he had the best interest of Alaskans on his moral and ethical compass," Harris is quoted as saying. Anderson got himself into a fix, Harris says, because he was "too naive or ill-prepared to recognize that politics and business are often comparable to a jungle."

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

CORRUPTION: For more on the investigation and trial of Tom Anderson, including past stories, FBI surveillance video and official indictments and trial motions, visit

adn.com/fbi

LOAD-DATE: October 9, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Anderson

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1289

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 10, 2007 Wednesday
FINAL EDITION

Kott wants acquittal, new trial;
LAWYER ARGUES: Bill Allen was a friend; so-called bribes were gifts.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 771 words

Former House Speaker Pete Kott wants a federal judge to throw out the jury decision last month to convict him of three corruption charges or, at the least, to grant him a new trial.

In a 12-page memorandum filed last week, Kott's lawyer argues that, among other reasons, Kott should be acquitted because former Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen was foremost his friend and anything Kott received was simply a gift.

A jury convicted Kott on Sept. 25 of bribery, conspiracy and extortion but acquitted him of wire fraud. During the 15-day trial, jurors heard dozens of secretly made recordings that prosecutors used to prove that Kott plotted with former Veco Corp. executives Allen and Rick Smith to push through a new oil tax rate favored by North Slope producers in 2006.

Allen, who along with Smith has pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy, testified in Kott's trial that oil producers wanted tax stability before they would commit to a natural gas pipeline. Veco could have made millions off the pipeline. The oil field services company was taken over by CH2M Hill right before Kott's trial.

Defense lawyer Jim Wendt argues in the new court filing that there was no evidence of a connection between the Petroleum Profits Tax and anything that Kott received.

"There was no nexus to the PPT legislation established and as a result any alleged benefits that the defendant received could have been construed as simply gifts from a benefactor that Pete Kott has known for years," Wendt says.

Wendt raises some of the same points the defense brought up before U.S. Judge John Sedwick during the trial, especially as it relates to how the jury was instructed to consider the evidence. The judge rejected the arguments at the time.

Prosecutors will respond in court, said Bryan Sierra, U.S. Justice Department spokesman. They haven't yet filed a response, but will soon, he said.

Testimony and other evidence at the trial showed that Kott received the promise of a job from Veco, $1,000 cash, a $7,993 check for an inflated flooring invoice, and a $2,750 political poll for his re-election bid.

Kott, a Republican who represented Eagle River in the House for seven terms, lost in the 2006 primary election.

The conspiracy conviction, Wendt argues, makes no sense on its face. To convict Kott of that charge, jurors were told they had to find that Kott, Allen and Smith conspired to commit at least one other crime, extortion, bribery or wire fraud. But Wendt asks how could Allen, Smith and Veco be both victims of extortion and part of the conspiracy to commit it?

FBI - Stevens-1290

"A 'victim' cannot 'conspire' to be extorted. It is inherently illogical," the defense lawyer says.

Prosecutors could have put on a case to show a bigger conspiracy including state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch and former Senate President Ben Stevens, but they didn't, Wendt says. Now they are stuck with a conspiracy limited to Kott and the Veco executives, the defense says.

194A-AN-13620-M;553

Weyhrauch was to be tried alongside Kott but his case was split off so the government could appeal a ruling on evidence. Stevens has not been charged but both Allen and Smith testified that they pleaded guilty to bribing Stevens, along with Kott.

Still, if jurors thought that Kott received bribes as part of the conspiracy, that argument appears to deflate.

As to extortion itself, Wendt argues that the government should have had to prove Kott explicitly promised to do what Veco wanted in exchange for benefits, and that he did as promised -- quid pro quo. That's because much of what he received could be considered campaign contributions, and there's a different standard as to what amounts to extortion of campaign contributions, the defense says.

Both sides agree that the flooring invoice was inflated to get money to Kott's son, Peter M. Kott, so he could manage his father's 2006 re-election campaign, the defense filing says. And the poll obviously was for the campaign.

Still, in the trial, the defense tried to convince jurors the nearly $8,000 check was for future flooring work. That strategy didn't play well with jurors when witnesses gave different stories about the flooring work. Kott and his son have a hardwood flooring business.

At any rate, the defense says that the evidence showed that the money and other things were to reward Kott, not to influence him. He wasn't bribed, the defense maintains.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

INSIDE

VIC KOHRING: Former legislator appeared in court Tuesday to hear amended charges against him that go back to 2002.

Back Page

CORRUPTION: Learn more about the investigation.

adn.com/fbi

LOAD-DATE: October 10, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Kott

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1291

Marketplace
Wednesday, October 10, 2007

Washington won't return dirty money

Before pleading guilty to bribing state legislators, Alaskan oil tycoon Bill Allen very actively spread his wealth around Congress. So far, a lot of his government beneficiaries haven't given the money back. Steve Henn reports.

Senator Ted Stevens (R-AK) leaves the weekly Republican policy luncheon at the U.S. Capitol, July 2007. Stevens received hefty contributions from Alaska contractor Bill Allen, who pleaded guilty to bribing Alaska state legislators. (Chip Somodevilla/Getty Images)

TEXT OF STORY

DOUG KRIZNER: Hillary Clinton and other leading Democrats suffered a fund-raising nightmare last month. One of the party's most prolific fundraisers or bundlers, Norman Hsu, was a fugitive from justice in California. And as Marketplace's Steve Henn reports other Washington politicians have become entangled with a felonious fundraiser.

STEVE HENN: Bill Allen was a big bundler. As the founder and former CEO of an Alaskan oil services company, he encouraged his employees to donate generously to political campaigns. And they did, giving more than a million dollars since the late 80's, according to federal campaign finance reports.

But today, Allen and his former company, called VECO, are at the center of a tangle of corruption scandals. In May, Allen and one of his executives pleaded guilty to bribing Alaskan state legislators. And that wasn't all.

MELANIE SLOAN: Executives there have pleaded guilty to crimes including making conduit contributions to politicians -- basically giving employees money to make contributions to politicians.

Melanie Sloan's the executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. She said politicians often return money when a donor turns out to have serious legal problems.

SLOAN: Members generally want to be careful about where their campaign contributions are coming from.

But so far, few who received money from Allen or his former employees have given it back. Allen is now cooperating with federal authorities.

SLOAN: VECO's a big donor, they spread money around. If I were any member of Congress receiving VECO contributions, I'd be very nervous that the feds would be looking at me.

VECO focused much of its largesse and attention on the Senate appropriations committee, giving more than $200,000 to the campaign funds of committee members.

KEN BOEHM: There are bad actors in the appropriations business, and VECO was certainly one of them.

Ken Boehm is chairman of the conservative National Legal and Policy Center.

FBI - Stevens-1292

BOEHM: Any time you have a player like VECO, it raises issues.

In the Senate, by far the largest share of these contributions flowed to Ted Stevens of Alaska. Stevens headed the appropriations committee for six of the last 10 years, and still has enormous influence over how federal dollars are spent.

Steven's staffers told reporters this spring that some contributions from VECO executives had been given to charity. But federal campaign finance reports filed later this summer, don't reflect that.

In the last eight years, Allen's company landed more than $200 million in federal contracts.

In Washington, I'm Steve Henn for Marketplace.

194-AN-13620-M:554

Marketplace
Thursday, October 11, 2007

Bill Allen: A tale of tainted funds

Marketplace's Steve Henn continues his report on Alaskan oilman Bill Allen's illegal contributions to various political campaigns and state legislators.

Bill Allen, second from left, is pictured in 2006 with Republican Senators Trent Lott of Mississippi, left, Lamar Alexander of Tennessee, and Phil Gramm of Texas (Marketplace source)

TEXT OF STORY

DOUG KRIZNER: Yesterday, our reporter Steve Henn told us the story of Bill Allen. The Alaskan businessman pleaded guilty this year to illegally funneling corporate money into federal political campaigns and bribing state legislators.

Today, Steve reports that before his guilty pleas, Allen and Alaska's powerful Senator Ted Stevens formed a political partnership to try to influence elections across the country.

STEVE HENN: Bill Allen was a big bundler for the Republican Party. His money reached dozens of candidates.

This spring, Allen pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges and admitted to illegally funneling corporate contributions into federal campaigns.

MEREDITH MCGEHEE: When you go and shake the money tree as hard as these candidates are shaking it, you're gonna have some bad apples fall down as well.

Meredith McGehee is at the Campaign Legal Center.

For years, Allen focused his donations on Senate appropriators. And his company, called VECO, benefited from hundreds of millions of dollars in federal contracts.

MCGEHEE: Any average American just would shake their head and say, "Oh, that's the way they do things in Washington."

But in the summer of 2002, Allen began to branch out. Within a few months, about $70,000 from Alaskan donors poured into the campaigns of seven Republican Senate challengers. Most came directly from VECO executives.

These gifts closely mirrored cash gifts from Senator Stevens' leadership PAC.

Ken Boehm is chairman of the Conservative National Legal and Policy Center:

KEN BOEHM: The closer you look, you really see a small circle of very powerful elected officials, surrounded by a small circle of political givers who appear to have very heavy legislative interests.

Two of those givers, including Bill Allen, pleaded guilty this year to making illegal donations. Two others fit the descriptions of unnamed co-conspirators in Allen's own guilty plea.

The Senate campaign funds of Norm Coleman of Minnesota and John Sununu of New Hampshire both got bundles from these donors totaling about $10,000 each.

Meredith McGehee:

MCGEHEE: You have to make clear there is not at this point any legal requirement that any of these donations be returned. There is a perception issue definitely at play here that when you take tainted money, you are in fact then tainted by it.

Working in concert, Ted Stevens, Bill Allen and VECO executives used half a dozen political committees to raise about $25,000 for Coleman's 2002 campaign, and $50,000 for Sununu's. Both Coleman and Sununu are running for reelection this year.

Sununu announced last week he'd donate $2,000 received from convicted VECO employees to charity. Coleman's campaign staff say the money's been spent, and the account is closed.

In Washington, I'm Steve Henn for Marketplace.

FBI - Stevens-1293

194A-AN-13620-M,555

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 11, 2007 Thursday
FINAL EDITION

Two more join race to unseat Don Young;
VULNERABLE? Berkowitz, LeDoux also to run for House seat he's held since 1973.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 841 words

Alaska Congressman Don Young, under federal investigation and in the minority party in the U.S. House, is facing more competition for his seat than in well over a decade.

Ethan Berkowitz, former minority leader of the state House, and Kodiak state Rep. Gabrielle LeDoux both said on Wednesday they are entering next year's U.S. House race.

LeDoux plans to challenge Young in the Republican primary. Berkowitz joins a Democratic field that already includes former state Democratic party chief Jake Metcalfe and Diane Benson, who received 40 percent of the vote against Young in 2006.

Young welcomes the competition, said his campaign manager, Steve Dougherty. He said Young is absolutely planning to run for re-election and is fully engaged in his campaign.

"We don't take anything for granted. We have never taken anything for granted," Dougherty said.

The 74-year-old Young has been Alaska's sole member of the U.S. House of Representatives since 1973. Young has so long been a leading figure in Alaska politics that often he's only faced token opposition, with prominent Democrats not wanting to waste time with what seemed a lost cause. That is not the case this time around.

"He's a wounded bear," Metcalfe said.

Young, who chaired the powerful House Transportation Committee from 2000 to 2006, now serves as the ranking Republican on the House Resources Committee. He says he's still plenty effective in Congress, and doesn't see himself as vulnerable in the 2008 election. In an August interview with the Associated Press, Young warned challengers against mudslinging when he campaigns for re-election.

Berkowitz, of Anchorage, wasn't slinging mud as he entered the race Wednesday. He said there's a need to restore integrity to government but had no critical words for Young personally.

FBI - Stevens-1294

"I am not really running against Don Young," Berkowitz said. "I am running for the United States House of Representatives."

Berkowitz said Young deserves a lot of credit for serving Alaska well for many years. But it is time for a change, he said.

Berkowitz, who was in the state Legislature for 10 years, said he has shown an ability to forge alliances with people from both parties.

LeDoux also said she's running for Young's seat because voters want someone who can work both with Republicans and Democrats.

The Democrats are in control of Congress now, she noted, and Young is in the minority.

"I think people are concerned about some of the strident partisanship we see there," LeDoux said.

194A-AN-13620-M; 556

LeDoux, who was once a Democrat herself, was first elected to the state Legislature after beating Dan Ogg in the Republican primary in 2004.

LeDoux is also a former Kodiak borough mayor. She didn't bring up the federal investigation of Young but, in response to a question, said it's an indication this is the right time for her to run against him.

Young still has a lot of influence in Alaska politics. State House Speaker John Harris, a Valdez Republican, said he is interested in the Congressional seat but would run for it only if Young decided not to seek re-election.

"I have a lot of respect for both Ted Stevens and Don Young. I know both are under a lot of scrutiny," Harris said.

Berkowitz might not be slamming Young, but the congressman has been taking heat from the other Democrats running against him.

Benson recently sent a letter to the U.S. House Ethics Committee asking its members to look into a controversial Young earmark for a Florida interchange known as Coconut Road. People are disgusted, Benson said, and Democrats have for too long been afraid to challenge for Young's seat.

Metcalfe said Young deserves respect but scandal and his "back bencher" status in Congress nowadays mean he's not giving Alaska the representation that it deserves.

Various national news organizations have reported in recent weeks that Young is under federal investigation for his ties to Veco Corp., for fundraising activities and for his role in specific congressional earmarks. Young has repeatedly declined to discuss the investigation.

He reported spending $262,137 in attorney fees from his campaign treasury during the first six months of this year. Young still has far more campaign money than any of his challengers, with more than $1.6 million cash on hand listed on his June 30 campaign disclosure report, the latest available.

Metcalfe and Benson welcomed Berkowitz into the Democratic primary race, saying they expected him to run and it won't change their strategies.

National Democrats will be keeping a close eye on the primary as well as gearing up for the general election battle against the Republican nominee.

"Democrats are extremely high on this seat," said Doug Thornell, national press secretary for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

"We view this seat as a prime pickup opportunity."

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him at 257-4344.

BLOG: Read the latest on Alaska politics, including corruption coverage, and talk back to the Daily News and others.

adn.com/alaskapolitics

LOAD-DATE: October 11, 2007

FBI - Stevens-1295

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: The Challengers: Four have thrown hats in the ring
Ex-legislator Ethan Berkowitz, D-Anchorage
Diane Benson, '06 Democratic challenger
Ex-Democratic party chairman Jake Metcalfe
Rep. Gabrielle LeDoux, R-Kodiak
Young

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1296

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 12, 2007 Friday
FINAL EDITION

Support for Anderson arrives as sentencing nears;
LETTERS: Colleagues and friends say ex-representative deserves a break.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1159 words

With his sentencing on bribery and other charges just days away, former state Rep. Tom Anderson wants the judge to consider that people who know him well don't see him as a corrupt politician.

So far, his lawyer has filed 22 letters of support in court, from former legislative aides, friends, and colleagues from his days on the Anchorage School Board and in the Legislature.

Prosecutors are seeking a maximum sentence of more than eight years.

Anderson was the first of four indicted former legislators to go to trial, and on Monday will become the first to be sentenced. He was convicted in July of seven felonies, including bribery, extortion, conspiracy and money laundering.

His young son's godmother wrote what a good father Anderson is to the boy, whose name was deleted in the letters as filed.

Anderson's first in line to feed the child, he uses quick trips to the grocery store or the gas station as a chance to tell stories, and he's even happy to get up in the middle of the night when the toddler awakens, godmother Joanne Lytle wrote.

Glenn Clary, a pastor at Anchorage Baptist Temple, wrote that Tom is anguished over humiliating his parents and wife and feels like he damaged the integrity of the Legislature as an institution.

House Speaker John Harris said Anderson's eager-to-please personality may have gotten him into trouble, but he was a good legislator and did more than anyone else to modernize the State Crime Lab.

"No one would deny he has a good heart, and means well. I definitely feel he has been thrown into a pool of 'bigger fish' and hope you will equate his mindset and actions in contrast to other indicted individuals respectively," Harris wrote.

SEEKING 33-MONTH MAXIMUM SENTENCE

FBI - Stevens-1297

Anderson, who contended in his trial that he had been set up by the government, now is admitting that he did wrong and is asking for mercy. His lawyer, Paul Stockler, is asking for a sentence of no more than two years, nine months.

Prosecutors are seeking the maximum, or eight years and one month, which is even more time than recommended by the federal probation office in its pre-sentencing report. They say the judge shouldn't give him credit for accepting responsibility at this point.

"We submit that, in evaluating Anderson's eve-of-sentencing claims of contrition, the Court should consider the fact that Anderson elected to go to trial and have the charges decided by a jury of his peers," prosecutors Nicholas Marsh and Joe Bottini say in their sentencing memorandum.

Anderson seems to recognize that he'll end up in federal prison. Just this week, he paid his ex-wife $9,250 in child support for their two sons, both now teenagers living in Texas, according to the ex, Janet Alexander.

194A-AN-13620-M; 557

In all, he has four sons. His oldest, from an earlier relationship, lives in South Carolina and visits in the summer. The 17-year-old attended the last day of his father's trial. He's upset by what's happening, his mother, Stephanie Webb, said in an e-mail.

On Thursday, Anderson was taking care of essentials: eye exam, dentist, a checkup for his young son Grayson, he wrote in an e-mail Wednesday night.

ELECTED OFFICIALS ARE THE TROPHY

Around the country, defendants in public corruption cases are being hit with hefty sentences, said Peter Henning, a law professor at Wayne State University in Michigan who blogs on white collar crime.

"At one point a sentence over five years would have been almost unheard of in a public corruption case. Now you are seeing it with some regularity," Henning said in a telephone interview.

In ongoing cases, prosecutors may seek more prison time for the first defendants to go down, he said.

"In part they will seek a substantial sentence to send a message to other potential defendants, to try to get their cooperation. There is such a benefit to cooperating," he said. Some who cooperate don't even get prison time, he said.

Big corruption cases are like a spider web, he said. The government works them from the outside in, trying to get the individuals with private interests who paid the bribes to cooperate and reel in elected officials. "They are the trophy," Henning said.

Bottini, one of the prosecutors in the Anderson case, said they aren't trying to make an example out of him.

But there are several reasons why prosecutors are seeking eight-plus years, as laid out in their sentencing memo.

For one, Anderson was convicted of three money-laundering counts. Jurors found that Anderson participated in a scheme in which a phony Web site was used to funnel payments to him that he thought came from a private prison company. In reality, the money came from the FBI, through a Cornell Cos. consultant working undercover. The company didn't know about the scheme.

The probation office concluded it was "sophisticated laundering" involving a shell company, which means more prison time. The defense disputes that. The Web site for political news started out as a real idea but just never materialized, Stockler noted.

Prosecutors also want Anderson to serve more time because they contend he took multiple bribes, though he was convicted of one bribery count. That's because he sought additional money from the consultant, former state Corrections Commissioner Frank Prewitt, working undercover for the FBI. Prewitt testified that he paid Anderson an extra $2,000 in a side deal.

In all, Anderson received nearly $26,000 in bribe payments, according to evidence in the trial. Prosecutors say that his sentence should include "a fine of $26,000, totaling the amount of the corrupt payments."

Anderson plans to speak at his sentencing hearing, his lawyer said. His supporters will mainly be represented through the letters. Among the others who wrote in:

* Joshua Fink, who is director of the state Office of Public Advocacy. Anderson asked him to send a letter, and he did so as a private individual. They were roommates years ago as legislative aides in Juneau. He described Anderson as loyal, a loving family man, a legislator who fought for vulnerable Alaskans.

FBI - Stevens-1298

* Jim Patton, a friend who says there was an attitude of entitlement among legislators that Anderson witnessed during the years he served as a legislative aide. "Tom was more a product of his predecessors, and his ill-equipped gullibility meter, than of corruption."

* John Floyd, who served with Anderson on the Anchorage School Board and the Big Brothers Big Sisters board of directors. As a legislator, Anderson dealt with community concerns, including vandalism at Susitna Elementary, obtrusive snow mounds and funding for a traffic calming study on Muldoon Road, Floyd wrote.

Stockler said Anderson has done lots of soul searching in the last few months.

"I don't think it's ever too late to admit you made a mistake," he said.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

ONLINE: Read letters sent in support of Anderson and find more on the public corruption investigation.

adn.com/fbi

LOAD-DATE: October 12, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Anderson

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1299

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 13, 2007 Saturday
FINAL EDITION

Agents lawfully searched Kohring's office, magistrate finds; RECOMMENDATION: Judge rejects defense bid to throw out evidence.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 863 words

FBI agents operated within the law when they searched former state Rep. Vic Kohring's office last year, and the evidence they obtained, including a statement from him, should be allowed in his upcoming corruption trial, according to a recommendation from a magistrate judge.

The decision on whether to throw out the evidence ultimately rests with U.S. District Judge John Sedwick, who likely will issue his ruling next week.

The trial of Kohring, a seven-term Republican from Wasilla who resigned in July, is scheduled to begin Oct. 22.

Kohring's lawyer, John Henry Browne of Seattle, said Friday he still intends to file a separate motion to throw out the case based on what he calls interference by state Sen. Fred Dyson.

Dyson had suggested through an aide that Kohring talk to the FBI. Dyson, R-Eagle River, has said he thought Kohring might be able to work out a deal for his own benefit but that the FBI never asked him to intervene. Browne said Dyson had helped the FBI in another case so was acting as a government agent and shouldn't have approached Kohring's office.

Prosecutors say they will respond if Browne files his motion in court.

The search was conducted at Kohring's legislative office in Wasilla on Aug. 31, 2006, the day FBI agents raided some 20 locations around the state, including the offices of six legislators. Kohring gave his consent, according to testimony from FBI agents at a hearing last month.

Browne had argued that the search nevertheless was no good. He contended that Kohring was forced into agreeing after an agent told him that the FBI had a warrant and would just execute it if he refused.

FBI agents testified at a Sept. 17 hearing that Kohring took about an hour before agreeing to the search. They acknowledged they told him that if he gave his consent, it might minimize attention from news reporters and that he could in any event issue a statement saying he was cooperating.

FBI - Stevens 1300

"Mr. Kohring well understood the choice he was being given regarding the execution of the search and he took full advantage of that when he made his press release later that day by indicating his cooperation with the agents," Magistrate Judge John D. Roberts wrote in his report, filed on Friday.

Browne called no witnesses at the hearing. After the agents testified, he dropped his effort to throw out Kohring's statement on a different basis, that Kohring was illegally detained and not read his rights. The agents said he was free to go at any time.

Roberts believes the search was legal because agents had a warrant that they were prepared to execute on the spot. He's the judge who signed it. The defense effort to suppress the evidence "may be decided on the basis of inevitable discovery," he wrote.

TAKING ON GOLIATH

194A-AN-13620-M;558

Browne said Friday it won't be a big deal if the judge follows the recommendation and allows the evidence.

"My opinion is that Mr. Kohring didn't say anything incriminating to begin with," he said. "But I was just filing the motions in order to be a good lawyer and to make a record because I think what the government did when they told him 'You give us consent or we'll use the search warrant' is not legal."

According to an FBI report filed in court by Browne, Kohring told agents that he had asked for money for himself personally and for his political campaigns from Veco executives Rick Smith and Bill Allen. He also had asked Smith about borrowing or renting a truck. The campaign contributions were properly reported, Kohring told agents.

Prosecutors wanted Browne to agree to allow a single FBI agent to authenticate any secretly made recordings involving Kohring before they are played for jurors.

No way, Browne responded.

That means prosecutors must call as witnesses an FBI employee directly involved with any recording they want jurors to hear. Agents from all over the country were involved in monitoring telephone calls of Veco Corp. executives as well as happenings in Suite 604 of the Baranof Hotel.

Kohring faces four felonies, including bribery, extortion and conspiracy. He is accused of accepting cash payments from Veco executives totaling more than $2,000, soliciting $17,000 to pay off credit card debt, and securing an internship for a nephew. In exchange, prosecutors assert, he pushed Veco's interests on an oil tax bill in 2006.

In an e-mail interview with the Mat-Su Valley Frontiersman, Kohring called the case against him weak but said he still knows he's taking a chance.

"Going to trial is a huge risk because the government has unlimited resources (I heard they're wasting literally millions prosecuting me) and slick, smooth-talking, highly educated prosecutors with expensive suits who can sound very convincing. But this is something I must do to prove my innocence. It reminds me of the biblical match-up between David and Goliath. I just hope my aim is accurate and I find a smooth stone," he is quoted as saying.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

ONLINE: Read more about the corruption investigation, including past stories and an interactive overview.

adn.com/fbi

TALK ABOUT IT: Discuss the latest news on our Alaska politics blog.

adn.com/alaskapolitics

LOAD-DATE: October 15, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

FBI - Stevens-1301

GRAPHIC: Kohring

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 14, 2007 Sunday
FINAL EDITION

Will Palin's oil tax bid succeed in session?;
MANY PLANS: Parties, industry disagree on best move for Alaska.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 2837 words

In her first 10 months in office, Gov. Sarah Palin has seen stratospheric approval ratings in Alaska and glowing media coverage Outside. Polls have shown support from as high as 90 percent of Alaskans. She's in the current issue of Newsweek (featured prominently in a piece about women governors) and was recently on Self magazine's list of "10 Most Inspiring Women."

But she's about to confront what could be her toughest political challenge since taking office.

Palin has called a special session of the state Legislature, beginning Thursday, to consider her plan to raise the state tax on oil company profits. Palin says the current state Petroleum Profits Tax, or PPT, was tainted by corruption when it passed last year and isn't bringing in enough money.

The governor will have to grapple with fellow Republicans who want to leave the oil tax alone, Democrats who say she's not going far enough, and an oil industry that's threatening less investment in Alaska if her plan passes.

The only thing for sure is it won't be easy.

The North Slope oil producers, who face the prospect of paying billions of dollars in additional taxes in coming years if Palin has her way, are trying to figure out the political landscape.

"I think there's just so many different factions on this," Conoco Phillips Alaska president Jim Bowles said in an interview last week. The Palin administration, even "with as much stroke as they have," is in a tough spot, he said.

"I think it's going to be very difficult to get a majority to do anything," he said.

That means either stalemate or wheeling and dealing, according to legislators of all political stripes.

"Everybody is going to have to move off their current position because nobody's position has a majority of votes right now," said Rep. Les Gara, D-Anchorage. He's among a group of legislators pushing to collect more on the big oil fields than Palin wants.

Palin's best chance to get a bill passed could be to find a compromise with the Democrats that doesn't alienate those Republicans who are on her side. Such a fluid situation, with so much money at stake, is making the oil industry nervous.

The companies are calling Palin's plan Alaska's third tax increase in as many years, and say the state needs to think about what balance it wants between taxes and investment. For weeks, the oil producers and their supporters have blanketed the state in a don't-raise-taxes advertising blitz.

Palin counters that the state is clearly not getting a fair share for its resources and can raise the tax rate carefully without killing the "golden goose" of continued oil industry investment.

FBI - Stevens-1302

The governor seems determined to not let the 30-day special session fizzle into a lot of talk, as many state legislators are predicting it will.

194A-AN-13620-M;559

"Doing nothing is not an option," Palin said as she unveiled her oil tax plan to legislators last month.

IS CURRENT TAX TAINTED?

Palin said the public lacks confidence in the current oil tax system because of the corruption present at its birth last year.

Former Eagle River Rep. Pete Kott was convicted in September of taking bribes from executives of the oil field services company Veco. They tried to influence Kott and other lawmakers to pass a tax favored by the North Slope producers -- and to avoid a higher rate the companies didn't like.

Other legislators have been implicated in the scandal. The trial of one of them, former Wasilla Rep. Vic Kohring, who chaired the House Special Committee on Oil and Gas, is set to start in Anchorage on Oct. 22. That's four days after the special session begins. Coverage of Kohring's Anchorage trial -- with the FBI's evidence of alleged backroom misdeeds as the PPT was debated in 2006 -- could hang heavy on the legislators debating the new oil tax plan down in Juneau.

Some legislators bristle when the current oil tax is tied to corruption. Palin's revenue commissioner, Pat Galvin, found that out last week as he briefed state Senate majority members on the governor's tax plan.

Senate President Lyda Green stopped Galvin cold when he said the public lacks confidence in the tax. Green said she hasn't heard members of the public saying that, only the Palin administration.

"The lack of public confidence comes from repeated statements by the administration that everything is tainted, that it's corrupt," the Wasilla Republican said.

Rep. Jay Ramras, R-Fairbanks, said there's an atmosphere of "McCarthyism," with Palin painting legislators as tainted.

But other legislators said the corruption issue has to be addressed. Democrats urged Palin to call special session after two Veco executives pleaded guilty in May to bribing legislators.

House Speaker John Harris, a Valdez Republican, said he doesn't think the final oil tax would have been much different without the corruption of a few legislators. Harris nevertheless agreed with Palin there's a need to deal with public concern about the tax.

KICKING AND SCREAMING

Palin said the other reason she's calling the special session is that the tax system passed last year, pushed by former Gov. Frank Murkowski, is not bringing Alaska its fair share of oil money.

Palin administration officials have said that, in fiscal year 2007, the tax brought in $1 billion more than the old oil tax but $200 million less than had been predicted when it passed.

Unless the tax is changed, rising deductions from the oil industry will bring the state $800 million less than predicted for the next fiscal year, state Revenue Commissioner Galvin said.

The centerpiece of Palin's plan is a basic increase in the state's net profits tax on North Slope oil from 22.5 percent to 25 percent.

FBI - Stevens-1303

It's not a fixed formula, though. The companies would pay more when prices are high, as they are now. Even if oil prices plummet, there would be a minimum gross tax imposed on the big Prudhoe and Kuparuk fields.

Palin's plan also includes tax credits for oil exploration and maintenance and construction in the oil patch. The companies would no longer be able to get a deduction for replacing old pipelines and equipment that unexpectedly fail, though, a change meant to keep from rewarding negligence.

Palin had previously called for a more dramatic overhaul of the state oil tax than what she ended up proposing. She once favored switching the system entirely from a tax on net company profits to one on the gross value of the oil.

It's a big difference. Proponents of the gross tax, including Democrats in the Legislature, argue it's simpler and would prevent oil companies from using sharp accountants to manipulate their deductions and their final tax bill.

Palin said she was dragged "kicking and screaming" away from proposing a gross tax. She said it turned out to be unworkable to create a simple gross tax that still offered the types of credits for industry investment that are needed to keep the petroleum pumping.

A DUD?

Palin has yet to persuade Democrats in the Legislature that a gross tax cannot work. House Democrats will open the special session by introducing their own bill imposing a gross tax on the big fields -- Prudhoe Bay, Kuparuk and Alpine and leaving open the possibility of a profits tax on smaller, less profitable fields on the North Slope.

That approach might have a chance, at least in the state House. There are 16 House Democrats and they'll only need to pick up five Republican votes to pass it over to the Senate, where it would be viewed with more suspicion.

The Democrats will tout a new poll they commissioned from the Hays Research Group that says most Alaskans prefer a tax on the gross market value to one on the net profits. Democrats think they can strike a deal with Palin.

House Minority Leader Beth Kerttula, D-Juneau, said she believes Palin and the Democrats have the same goal "at the 30,000 foot level" of achieving the maximum value for the resources.

"We're not unwilling to listen and understand and work together," Kerttula said.

Kerttula said Alaska is highly profitable for the oil industry and she believes the companies are bluffing when they talk about less investment.

The oil industry will argue it's a bad idea for the state to particularly target fields like Prudhoe and Kuparuk, where the companies hope to someday get the currently uneconomic vast "heavy oil" deposits out of the ground.

The Republican majority in the state House is all over the place on the oil tax. House speaker Harris is positive toward Palin's proposal to increase the net profit tax. But the House majority leader, Ralph Samuels, R-Anchorage, is in the camp that believes it is likely too soon to declare a tax passed only a year ago to be a dud.

Palin is likely to face an even bigger challenge in the state Senate. Several members of the Senate majority coalition of Republicans and Democrats were openly skeptical when Palin's revenue commissioner briefed them on her plan last week.

Sen. Lyman Hoffman, D-Bethel, said the Legislature spent months last year on some of the issues covered in Palin's plan. Now legislators have just a 30-day special session.

"I find it hard to believe we're going to be able to accomplish this in 30 days," Hoffman said.

Senate President Green said in an interview that she doesn't see the rush to change the tax rate.

But Green said she did expect the special session would include quick agreement on some proposals made by Palin other than the tax rate.

Those include raising salaries to recruit state oil tax auditors and demanding details from the oil companies on how they figured their tax bill.

FBI - Stevens-1304

There are state senators who want to increase the oil tax rate. Senate Minority Leader Gene Therriault, R-North Pole, said he needs more detail but could get behind Palin's plan.

Anchorage Democratic Sen. Hollis French is among those pushing for a gross tax, although he conceded that would not be easy.

French said it's important to look at changing the tax because the projections on how much it would bring the state turned out so far wrong. He said, realistically, if the state doesn't do it now the tax will likely stay as is.

"This is probably our last chance for a decade," he said.

BIG DECISION

Conoco Phillips Alaska president Bowles said the state will be living for a long time with whatever decision it makes on the oil tax.

"I think it's a bigger decision for the state than what the state perceives it to be right now," Bowles said.

Conoco Phillips and other companies said the current high oil prices are masking a fundamental problem here. Alaska's oil production is declining and it's not a time to drive away investment, they say.

Oil industry representatives said the proposed tax increase appears driven by politics, rather than an actual need for state government to have the additional revenue right now.

State officials said the oil tax hike has nothing to do with the potential pipeline tapping the giant natural gas reserves on the North Slope.

But Bowles said the unease the company feels about the oil tax change will impact the prospects for a gas line.

"It will have to have some kind of carryover in our viewpoint of gas and how do you view certainty going forward on a gas pipeline project," Bowles said.

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him at 257-4344.

THE PLAYERS

Gov. Sarah Palin

Called the 30-day special session to raise the state's oil tax rate. She wants to replace the year-old PPT with her ACES plan. "Doing nothing is not an option," she said.

Sen. Lyda Green

Wasilla Republican is president of the state Senate, presiding over a coalition of Republicans and Democrats who are split on what they want to happen. She sees no rush to change the current oil tax rate. "We really need to kind of hold on and review it some more."

Rep. John Harris

Valdez Republican is speaker of the House. His Republican majority is divided over the governor's plan but he wants to give Palin a chance. "I'm open. I'm not against it."

Sen. Gene Therriault

North Pole Republican is the minority leader of the state Senate, and at odds with Green. He wants more information on Palin's plan but could be a helpful ally for her. "I think initially I may be OK with the direction the governor has chosen."

Rep. Beth Kertulla

Juneau Democrat is the minority leader in the House. She and other Democrats are pushing to change the tax system to collect more money from the big oil fields than what Palin is proposing. "I'm going to go in trying, because I don't like what we've got."

FBI - Stevens-1305

The Oil Industry

The oil companies, led by the three North Slope producers -- BP, Conoco Phillips and Exxon Mobil -- warn of less investment in Alaska if Palin's tax passes. They'll be fighting it hard. "We have to call on every Alaskan to think really hard about the future," said BP Alaska president Doug Suttles.

Bill Allen and Veco

The former Veco Corp. chief, long a force in Alaska elections and legislative politics, awaits sentencing for bribing legislators during last year's oil tax battles. But he's still a force in Juneau: The corruption scandal, and questions about whether the tax plan passed last year was tainted by it, is cited by Palin as a key reason she's calling the special session to revisit the issue.

WHAT'S ACES?

The governor's plan is called Alaska's Clear and Equitable Share, or ACES. It would make significant changes to the current system, the Petroleum Profits Tax, or PPT. If passed, most ACES provisions would become effective Jan. 1, 2008.

The 46-page bill would:

* Raise the state's current net profits tax on North Slope oil from a 22.5 percent to 25 percent base. There's also a "progressivity" surcharge where generally, when oil prices rise above roughly $50 a barrel, the tax rate increases by another .2 percent for each additional dollar a barrel. The PPT has a surcharge that kicks in at a higher oil price than ACES but at a greater rate once it does go into effect.

* Impose a 10 percent gross tax floor on the Kuparuk and Prudhoe fields. That would kick in when oil prices are low, probably $40 a barrel and under.

* Change the tax credits the state receives for oil exploration, maintenance and construction. That includes eliminating the credits allowed under the PPT for replacing old pipelines and equipment that unexpectedly fail. This change would be retroactive so no oil producer could claim a deduction for work on the corrosion that led to a partial shutdown of Prudhoe Bay last year or the recent fires at BP facilities on the North Slope.

* Eliminate the oil companies' ability under PPT to get retroactive tax credits for construction and maintenance they conducted in previous years.

* Allow the state to pay higher salaries to recruit oil tax auditors.

* Require the companies to turn over more information to the state on the costs they use to calculate their tax bills.

FORUM

TODAY: Palin administration is hosting a public forum on its proposed overhaul of the state's oil tax today at 2 p.m. in the Marston Theatre of the Loussac Library.

INSIDE

SCHEDULE: Find out when and where public hearings are scheduled.

KEY PLAYERS: Who to watch in the special session.

VOCABULARY: What's ACES and how is it different?

Page A-4

ONLINE

POLITICS: Keep abreast of Alaska politics and comment on the issues on our blog at

FBI - Stevens-1306

adn.com/alaskapolitics

HEARING SCHEDULE

Gov. Sarah Palin's oil and gas tax team is hosting a series of public briefings on the proposed rewrite of a key state oil tax, including sessions today in Anchorage and Monday in Kenai.

Today in Anchorage 2 p.m. in the Z.J. Loussac Public Library, Wilda Marston Theatre, 3600 Denali St.

Monday in Kenai 6 p.m. in the Challenger Learning Center, 9711 Kenai Spur Highway.

Thursday in Sitka 3 p.m. in Harrigan Centennial Hall, 330 Harbor Drive.

The special session of the Legislature officially starts Thursday in Juneau at 8:30 p.m. But there will be a Legislative Budget and Audit Committee meeting starting at 10:30 a.m. Thursday where lawmakers will hear from their consultants about how the current oil tax system compares with others around the globe.

The House oil and gas committee is then scheduled to hear a presentation from the governor's team at 1:30 p.m. on Friday.

The session will be broadcast on "Gavel to Gavel" on cable, Channel 17 in Anchorage.

For more on the governor's bill, go to www.gov.state.ak.us/aces and click on the ACES link.

GLOSSARY

ACES -- Alaska's Clear and Equitable Share. That's what Gov. Sarah Palin is calling her oil tax proposal.

PPT -- Petroleum Profits tax. It's the state's current oil tax system, passed last year and pushed by former Gov. Frank Murkowski.

GROSS TAX -- This is a tax on the market value of the oil minus pipeline and tanker charges.

NET PROFITS TAX -- A tax on oil company profits. Basically this is a tax on the market value of the oil minus pipeline and tanker charges, as well as North Slope operating costs. The existing state tax system is a net profits tax.

PROGRESSIVITY -- The concept that Alaska's oil tax rate goes up as oil prices rise.

LOAD-DATE: October 15, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: ERIK HILL / Anchorage Daily News
Revenue Commissioner Pat Galvin and Gov. Sarah Palin field questions on the plan for a new state oil and gas tax at the Consortium Library last month. A public forum is scheduled for 2 p.m. today at the Wilda Marston Theatre at the Loussac Library in Anchorage.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1307

SEATTLE POST-INTELLIGENCER
http://seattlepi.nwsource.com/local/6600AP_WST_Anderson_Trial.html
Last updated October 15, 2007 3:56 p.m. PT

Judge sentences Anderson to five years on corruption convictions

By DAN JOLING
ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- Former state Rep. Tom Anderson helped the FBI investigate a half dozen other cases of suspected public corruption in Alaska.

That got him no consideration from federal prosecutors after he abruptly stopped cooperating.

Anderson, convicted July 9 of seven counts of conspiracy and bribery, was sentenced Monday to five years in prison, a term prosecutors considered too short.

Anderson's sentencing hearing took two hours as witnesses described how the former lawmaker, after being confronted with evidence in his own corruption case, agreed to help investigators by recording conversations with a half dozen or so others under investigation.

According to witnesses Monday, that stopped after Anderson told his future wife, state Sen. Lesil McGuire, R-Anchorage, that he was cooperating with investigators. She learned he would be expected to plead guilty to one felony count, and that investigators expected him to continue assisting them with secret recordings in the 2006 legislative session.

Shortly after that meeting, Anderson fired his attorney and stopped wearing a wire.

Anderson, 40, a two-term Republican from Anchorage who chose not to run for re-election in 2006, was convicted of taking nearly $24,000 he thought was coming from a private prison firm, Cornell Industries, Inc., in exchange for his assistance on legislation.

The money was supplied by the FBI through an informant under contract to Cornell, Frank Prewitt, a former Alaska Department of Corrections commissioner. Prewitt secretly recorded his conversations with Anderson and a coconspirator, lobbyist Bill Bobrick, between July 2004 and March 2005. Cornell Industries was not aware of the investigation.

Anderson did not immediately comment after the sentence was announced. He remains free and afterward hugged friends and family members - many in tears - who lined the gallery.

Prosecutors sought a sentence of more than eight years. Assistant U.S. Attorney Joe Bottini said the evidence showed Anderson did more than succumb to temptation to take money. Anderson solicited the bribe, betrayed his public trust and actively took part in concealing the money, Bottini said.

"The public's faith in the integrity of our legislative system is eroded," Bottini said.

He urged U.S. District Court Judge John Sedwick to restore the public's faith. FBI - Stevens-1308

"They have to know it was serious, and when they're caught they're going to be punished, and they're going to be punished to the extent they deserve," Bottini said.

194A-AN-13620-M;560

Anderson's lawyer, Paul Stockler, asked for a sentence of no more than three years, which he said was "more than enough time."

The difference between five and three years would have no affect as a deterrent, Stockler said. But it would make a significant difference in Anderson's ability to support his three children from previous relationships and in the life of his young son - the difference between taking him to his first day of kindergarten or the first day of second grade, Stockler said.

Sedwick decision for a 60-month sentence fell within the pre-sentencing report guidelines of the 51 to 63 months. The judge noted the volume of support letters that had poured in for Anderson and said the matter likely was heartbreaking for Anderson's family. Anderson is the son of a former director of the Alaska State Troopers.

"I have no idea how Mr. Anderson's apple fell so far from the tree, but it did," Sedwick said.

The judge said he took into account Anderson's long record of community and legislative service and his eagerness to help constituents, but ultimately, Anderson did not take a bribe to help someone else.

"He took the money because he wanted the money," Sedwick said.

Anderson's former attorneys testified about his cooperation with investigators.

Craig Howard, a 22-year public defender now in private practice, said he was called from his son's Little League game in summer 2005 to Anderson's legislative office as the FBI was about to serve a search warrant. Anderson had been confronted by investigators that afternoon.

The government made it clear from the outset, Howard said, that Anderson would have to plead guilty to one felony charge even as he cooperated. There was an understanding he might be able to say which charge, Howard said, but the arrangement called for nothing less than a felony.

"From day one, no way was it going to be a misdemeanor in this case," Howard said.

Anderson cooperated with investigators throughout the summer. Anderson's father had been informed of the investigation, Howard said.

After learning that McGuire was pregnant, Howard said, Anderson insisted that she be told of his situation. Prosecutors gave their consent and Anderson's cooperation with the government, as well as his connection to Howard, ended.

"I was dismissed," Howard said.

FBI - Stevens-1309

Howard's replacement, Jeffrey Feldman, testified that without a written agreement between Anderson and prosecutors, he negotiated for a "pass" for his client, such as a misdemeanor plea, in exchange for Anderson's cooperation. He tried to pin prosecutors down as to the exact considerations Anderson would receive for his cooperation.

"That became the goal," Feldman said. "It wasn't the goal initially."

By September 2005, the investigation was Anderson's "job," consuming all of his time, Feldman said.

"It was the only thing he was doing. It was really stressful," he said.

Anderson had misgivings about extending his cooperation to the legislative session in Juneau.

"The people in his district had not elected him to be an undercover agent," Feldman said.

Anderson's willingness to save himself bumped up against what he felt was duplicitous to his legislative colleagues, he said, and Anderson stopped cooperating.

Anderson knew the consequences of ending his cooperation, Feldman said, and it happened.

"There was no ambiguity about what would unfold," Feldman said.

Anderson was arrested Dec. 7 and charged with conspiracy, bribery, money laundering and interfering with commerce, a charge connected to a demand for payments.

He was the first of four former Alaska lawmakers arrested on federal corruption charges. Former House Speaker Pete Kott, R-Eagle River, was convicted last month of conspiracy to solicit financial benefits, extortion and bribery.

Former Rep. Vic Kohring, R-Wasilla, is scheduled to go on trial on corruption charges next week.

The corruption trial of former state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, R-Juneau, has been delayed. Federal prosecutors are appealing a decision on the case that said they could not claim that Weyhrauch were required to disclose to fellow legislators or the public that he was seeking employment from VECO.

FBI - Stevens-1310

• Refinance • Pay Off Debt
• Cash Out Refinance • 15-Year Fixed Rates
• Compare Low Rates • Home Improvement
*Terms & Conditions Apply
Current Offers from LendingTree®
Refinance $400,000 for Only $1,875/Mo*
Refinance $300,000 for Only $1,406/Mo*
Refinance $200,000 for Only $938/Mo*
LendingTree

Alaska Politics

Feds to state: Hold off probe into Veco polling

Posted by Alaska_Politics
Posted: October 16, 2007 - 4:25 pm

The U.S. Justice Department sent Alaska's attorney general a letter discouraging the state from doing its own investigation of corruption involving election polling, and Gov. Sarah Palin put out a press release this afternoon saying the state intends to comply with the request. Here's the AP story:

By DAN JOLING
The Associated Press
State prosecutors will back off an investigation of election campaign polling practices to avoid interfering with an ongoing federal corruption probe, Gov. Sarah Palin announced Tuesday.

Palin, who championed ethics reform while winning office last November, released a letter from the U.S. Department of Justice that said a state investigation could interfere with the federal effort.

"Because of the long-standing federal investigation into these matters, we believe that concurrent state investigative activity will have the effect of compromising certain aspects of the ongoing federal public corruption investigation," said Brenda K. Morris, deputy chief of the Justice Department's public integrity section.

She commented in a letter to Alaska Attorney General Talis Colberg.

Attorneys from the Public Integrity Section are prosecuting four former Alaska legislators, including Pete Kott, who was convicted of bribery and other counts last month.

State officials announced they would investigate after testimony emerged from Kott's trial that Kott and possibly others had illegally received campaign polls paid for by officials of Veco Corp., a major oil field services company that spent thousands of dollars supporting pro-development candidates.

Veco CEO Bill Allen and a company vice president, Rick Smith, have pleaded guilty to bribing public officials. Their plea agreements require them to cooperate with investigators.

They testified at Kott's trial that Veco paid $2,750 for a poll that showed Kott where he stood in his re-election campaign in 2006. Kott subsequently lost in the Republican primary.

Smith testified that Veco had paid for other polls over the years, including a $20,000 poll in 2006 for former Gov. Frank Murkowski before he was a declared candidate for re-election.

Colberg assigned lawyers to closely watch Kott's trial in federal court to see if it revealed other possible criminal acts.

But he cautioned that the state would have to proceed carefully before pursuing its own criminal charges because federal authorities did not want interference from the state.

The Justice Department letter, dated Friday, puts the brakes on state investigators.

Palin said she has directed the attorney general to continue to monitor alleged illegal activities by public officials but that her office will not impede or compromise the federal investigation.

Former state Rep. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage was sentenced

Alaska Politics

This is the place for news on Alaska politics -- state, local and national. Public life in the Last Frontier may never have been more interesting than right now -- the broad and still-evolving corruption investigation, a new governor, powerful members of Congress under scrutiny, and the usual hardball politics on the state, national and local levels. Come here for the latest news and join the discussion.

Contributors

Kyle Hopkins
Kyle Hopkins writes about Anchorage city government and politics. He covered last year's campaign for governor, and has blogged extensively about Alaska politics for the past year. He grew up in Southeast Alaska and was a reporter at the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner and Anchorage Press.
E-mail Kyle at khopkins@adn.com.

Sean Cockerham
Sean Cockerham writes about Alaska state politics. He spent three years based in Juneau for the Daily News before joining the Tacoma News-Tribune two years ago to write about Washington state politics. He went to Iraq twice for the News Tribune, and previously wrote about Alaska government and politics for the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner. Now he's back in Anchorage.
E-mail Sean at scockerham@adn.com.

Erika Bolstad
Erika Bolstad covers Alaska issues, including the congressional delegation, from Washington, D.C., for McClatchy Newspapers. Before joining the bureau this summer, she spent seven years as a reporter at the Miami Herald, where she covered politics, government and the state legislature.
E-mail Erika at ebolstad@adn.com.

Archive

Busy budget day - 10/19/2007 9:29 am
Big ticket - 10/18/2007 6:01 pm
Let's play nice - 10/18/2007 3:07 pm
It's on - 10/18/2007 1:24 pm
City claims court victory - 10/18/2007 11:42 am 4th Ave, lobbying - 10/18/2007 5:23 pm
Feds to state: Hold off probe into Veco polling - 10/16/2007 4:25 pm
Ad plays clip of Bowles, Allen - 10/16/2007 1:32 pm
Veco grilling - 10/15/2007 5:50 pm
Which prison? - 10/15/2007 5:24 pm
You-know-who on Charlie Rose - 10/15/2007 4:23 pm
What do you want to know about the budget? - 10/15/2007 3:44 pm
Tom Anderson sentenced to five years - 10/15/2007 12:14 pm
Anchorage oil tax meeting (Updated) - 10/14/2007 5:28 pm
Sunday Newsreader (Special session edition) - 10/14/2007 1:15 pm
You want a gross? - 10/12/2007 7:23 pm
'I'm not trying to be difficult' - 10/12/2007 3:30 pm

PLAY GAMES ONLINE
INCLUDING:
+ crossword
+ sudoku
+ word roundup
+ play 4
+ jigsaw puzzles
play FREE at www.adn.com/games

Alaska's Top Jobs all 80 top jobs

Construction/Skilled/Trades
Safety Officer
Alutiiq International Solutions LLC

Health Care Services
Community Health Aide, Kodiak
Kodiak Area Native Association

Management/Professional
City and Borough Administrator
City and Borough of Sitka, Alaska

Professional
Junior Clerk-Payroll
Municipality of Anchorage

Construction/Skilled/Trades
Project Manager
TCC, LLC

careerbuilder
Search Jobs | Place an employment ad

Homes by EveryAlaskaHome.com more

2930 Legacy Drive
$399,000
Kempton Hills Hagmeier Home priced to sell.

12 of 15
Homescape
find
Search ADN Real Estate | Place a homes ad
Realtor Market Place | Valley Real Estate Guide

Top Rentals more

Greenbriar Apartments
East Anchorage: Our oversized living spaces feature a dishwasher, a disposal and spacious closets.

10 of 12
apartments.com

13620-M ; 561

Monday to five years in prison following his conviction in July on seven counts of conspiracy and bribery. He was convicted of taking nearly $24,000 that he thought was coming from a Houston-based company, Cornell Industries Inc., which hoped to build a private prison in Alaska.

The money was supplied by the FBI through an informant under contract to Cornell who secretly recorded his conversations with Anderson in 2004 and 2005. The company was not aware of the investigation.

Former House Speaker Pete Kott, R-Eagle River, was convicted last month of conspiracy to solicit financial benefits, extortion and bribery.

Former Rep. Vic Kohring is scheduled to go on trial on corruption charges Monday. The corruption trial of former state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch has been delayed.

add new comment

Parnell endorses Romney - 10/12/2007 12:14 pm
Stars and stripes forever - 10/12/2007 6:26 am
Money wars begin - 10/11/2007 4:03 pm
Round-up: Young, oil company ads, Coffey & liquor - 10/11/2007 3:49 pm Challengers to Don Young - 10/10/2007 5:27 pm
full archive »

Advanced Search | Place a rentals ad
Top Autos all autos
Lybergers Car and Truck Sales
2007 Dodge Ram
Lybergers Car & Truck Sales, LLC.
8 of 10
Powered by
Search for a New or Used Car | Place an auto ad

3 October 17, 2007 - 3:39am | Special_Agent_Roswell

Frank NEVER listened..

Should have known....Coulda shoulda woulda. Are you there Frank? Out there reading the blog with your stomach in knots knowing that someone is enforcing the laws instead of stonewalling? Coulda Shoulda woulda now, huh Frank?

Maybe ADN needs to open up a new thread on "The Last Word" blog for what is comming up.

And I hear that 'Vic's WAR' is going to require that more of the Feds' SA return to testify. Good plan, but be careful it doesn't backfire.

Maybe bring more search warrants with you, compadres. And then the Alaska Corruption Probe can finally extend to the Knowles admin revolving doors and conflicts of interest, Loren's FERC concerns, Ogan, Renkes, Ruedrich, PERS, CEA?

Some real pieces of work scurried out of that Knowles sinking ship. Get the excavator, Let's have a dig!

Investigate corruption in Alaska's courts and Attorney General's office? Absolutely Federal Jurisdiction!

As Paul Harvey says " Stay tuned for NEWS!"

reply »

October 17, 2007 - 9:54am | Special_Agent_Honeybucket

not to worry folks,

Agent Roswell and I, vow to "get her done" and "I'm not trying to be difficult" about it at all.... but "if there's anyway we can get this thing stopped, well thats the best possible outcome..."

for you wonderful people of Alaska....

reply »

October 18, 2007 - 1:21pm | hpwells

If you assholes

are not from Alaska, stay out of the picture.

reply »

October 18, 2007 - 2:03pm | Special_Agent_Honeybucket

Again, I'm just stating the facts, sir.

If it will appease your anger, I am from Alaska. Born here before the state became a state. This detail does provide me with nearly endless visions or "pictures", of Alaska's political environment, past and present.

"well, ah, I got work and its just between me and you...", that I provide as much humor as possible in this mess...

"Godspeed", hpwells, "Godspeed"

reply »

October 18, 2007 - 4:11pm | hpwells

My apologies to you Mr. Honeybucket.

My freshmanship is revealing, is it not? By the way, what year did Alaska become a State?

reply »

October 18, 2007 - 4:21pm | Special_Agent_Honeybucket

Ah, that would be Miss Agent Honeybucket to you.

Early 1959, but that statehood act came a couple seasons earlier. When it was announced (acceptance into the union) the neiboring homesteaders stayed up all night shooting off thier rifles. When I asked my grandfather what that was all about, he said "We're in and I wonder when the rest of the United States will figure it out."

FBI - Stevens-1312

reply »

October 19, 2007 - 5:36am | Special_Agent_Roswell

"neighboring homesteadores?

So was Gramapah in on any of kicking the "fried egg flag" butt off of the Aleutian homelands?

reply »

October 17, 2007 - 10:53am | jauntmag

LOL!!!

LOL!!!

reply »

October 17, 2007 - 11:48am | Special_Agent_Honeybucket

just stating the facts sir ...

reply »

October 17, 2007 - 2:33pm | Special_Agent_Roswell

Breaking "the Bank"

Yep, it's a target rich environment out there. 79 convictions are kind of hard to beat but Alaska has the making for #1 corrupt state.

Frank never did have much respect for any laws, he just made money making them for other people to follow.

Here's one the "lame duck" broke. I guess he's soon to be dead duck.

Chief Executive of the State always burdening someone else to enforce the law. What an astonishing ruse.

reply »

October 17, 2007 - 3:48pm | Special_Agent_Honeybucket

Agent Roswell

We have another bumper sticker issue.

Similiar in color and font style of the blue 'Thank You FBI' bumper sticker, ah, you know the one with the big dipper in the background. Well this latest one is blue with a fish outline in yellow.

The words state "I wanna see the guppy perp walk !".

reply »

October 17, 2007 - 4:21pm | Special_Agent_Roswell

Ahh yes. constituant pressure...

Don't forget what you learned in training. Go by the book and not by the bumper sticker.

Assure them that we've got enough on Benito to where even a lenient Judge could quadruple TA's sentence.

It's just waiting for the cookie to crumble. And that involves the D.C. HQ now. And the guys on his tail are assure me he's constantly looking over his shoulder at their non-descript blue ford sedan. As much as he "doesn't anticipate anything like that," he knows better than freezin france that things are not good.

The modern 2006 update of Ephram Zimbalist Jr's ford sedan in his rear view mirror wherever he goes. They're just having fun and killing time shadowing the paranid perp.

reply »

October 17, 2007 - 7:33pm | pixieteeth

How much is that costing us?

The ford sedan going whereever he goes and the guys on his tail what's their names, start date, and job titles; and how much are they costing us per hour with overtime and benefits having a fun time...do you know or are you just playing devil's advocate here...Ask Kyle to figure out if the budget people or human resources will get you their names and particulars on an updated spreadsheet...thanks. Oh. They won't? Why not? That's public information. Kyle says it's the most important public information of all times. This is expensive lurking on the publics' dime isn't it in descript and nondescript vehicles all day and noted everywhere - especially "improved" neighborhood parks with 30 parking spaces. Well, we gotta spend that money somewhere; EFZ notwithstanding. Although Alaskans don't pay an income tax at all at this time. We are such gentle people. Civics - you say? Oh the clamor...I'm sensing a headache...do you need a napkin?

FBI - Stevens-1313

reply »

October 17, 2007 - 8:15pm | Special_Agent_Honeybucket

We're here just to state the facts sir.

Headache you say? Napkin be dammed. Agent Honeybucket is here to stay!

I'm not sure Agent Roswell got the memo from Headquarters (yet), but we have been given clearance to reveal a bit about ourselves. This is a demonstrated effort to provide clear and transparent communication to the gentle people of Alaska.

We understand that presenting the facts doesn't always reveal the softer side of the any Agent. Hence the clearance to reveal a bit about ourselves.

I am survivor. Of the cheap, horribly failed campaign promise of former Governor Knowles' attempt to eleminate me by the year 2000. Sad, crude, but true.

Godspeed, Pixie, Godspeed.

reply »

October 19, 2007 - 6:45am | pixieteeth

They don't trust 'em.

Why would they. The state hasn't done jack 'til now. That's why the feds told the state to stay out of it.

reply »

2 October 16, 2007 - 6:32pm | Natalie_O

More Fed business??

Sounds like they're not finished. This whole corruption business is like a spiders web and you don't know where its going to spin towards next. All of it, every single bit of it, needs to be brought out so I hope Palin keeps her word and not let the State impede on the investigation until the Feds are done. And even once done, I hope she implements some kind of plan for the State to do some investigating of their own and thoroughly investigate polls and campaign violations, even if it means going against party lines. I hear alot of people talking as if they are outraged by this corruption but you never know what frame of mind they will adopt once the "Federal" dust settles.

reply »

1 October 16, 2007 - 4:33pm | adnak

The Feds

Feds and Frank!

Who all gets to go hang out with Tom Anderson?

reply »

October 16, 2007 - 7:52pm | pp05416

(Music) It's a family affair!

It's a family affair.

reply »

October 16, 2007 - 9:48pm | gilid

"Feds and Frank[s]!"

Sounds like a failed test product from Campbells.

"Yeah, the R&D guys tried it out in Alaska, worked some deals though Carrs, free samples, 2-for-1, the whole thing, but you know? Everybody that tried it said it tasted too much like fish! Whataya gonna do?"

Or something like that.

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1314

© Copyright 2007, The Anchorage Daily News, a subsidiary of The McClatchy Company

Contact Us | Newsroom Contacts | Communication Forms | Subscriptions | Advertising | Terms of Use

Daily News Jobs | RSS Feeds | ADN Store | Newspapers in Education | Privacy Agreement

A member of the
Real Cities Network

<<Back

inAlaska.com

Democrats debut oil tax ads

Democratic Party-sponsored ads take aim at the oil industry prior to this week's special session. (File Photo)

Alaska Democratic Party Chair Patti Higgins (Jason Kohler/KTUU-TV)

Alaska Oil and Gas Association Director Marilyn Crockett (Jason Kohler/KTUU-TV)

The challenge for the industry is delivering its message through all the recent media coverage of the corruption trials. (File Photo)

by Jason Moore
Tuesday, Oct. 16, 2007

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- FBI wire taps are finding their way onto the airwaves in advertisements aimed at influencing the upcoming legislative session.

The ads are produced by the Alaska Democratic Party and use the voices of former VECO boss Bill Allen and the head of ConocoPhillips Alaska, Jim Bowles.

The ads feature wire tap evidence that was introduced in the Pete Kott corruption trial, which ended with the former State House Speaker convicted on several felony counts. They make their debut as the oil industry attempts to frame and oil tax the debate on different terms.

The spots hit the airwaves Tuesday morning and include sound bytes like this:
"We want to see if we can just stop this thing don't we Jim ... Yes sir, if there's any way we can get this thing stopped that's the best possible outcome."

The advertisement continues:
"That's former VECO Corp. chief executive Bill Allen talking with ConocoPhillips President Jim Bowles last year about how to keep the Alaska Legislature from passing a fair oil tax."

Alaska Democratic Party Chair Patti Higgins said the campaign is a response to numerous ads being run by the oil industry and the Alaska Oil and Gas Association.

"The industry is sort of taking on Alaskans," Higgins said. "They're playing all these ads in the newspaper and on radio and on TV and we just feel we need to remind Alaskans that this is our oil and we need to get our fair share of taxes."

Industry officials said the Democratic ad doesn't do anything to inform the public about the oil tax debate going into the special legislative session.

FBI - Stevens-1315

"It feels more like a scare tactic sort of an ad and frankly it's sort of picking at a scab that's been festering for awhile," Marilyn Crockett, executive director of the Alaska Oil and Gas Association, said. "That doesn't really get to the real heart of what's important in this upcoming session."

The challenge for the industry is delivering its message through all the recent media coverage of the corruption trials and the debate it has caused amongst Alaskans.

1-3620-M; 562

Paul Laird, the general manager of the Alaska Support Industry Alliance (Jason Kohler/KTUU-TV)

Oil industry officials said the message is urgent: higher taxes will lead to less investment and ultimately less oil production within the state.

"There's no question right now that the popularity of the oil industry is not at high tide," said Paul Laird, the general manager of the Alaska Support Industry Alliance, a group that advocates on behalf of oil support companies. "I think the important thing for us, for the industry, is to keep reminding people that you don't kill the goose that lays the golden egg."

But will lawmakers and the public be influenced by economic arguments or criminal evidence?

"I think the conversation speaks for itself and that's why we used their voices in the ad," Higgins said.

The special legislative session on an oil tax overhaul begins Thursday.

Contact Jason Moore at jmoore@ktuu.com

WorldNow

All content © Copyright 2000 - 2007 WorldNow and KTUU. All Rights Reserved.
For more information on this site, please read our Privacy Policy and Terms of Service.

FBI - Stevens-1316

<<Back

inAlaska.com

Anderson could have received lighter sentence

Tom Anderson might have served less prison time had he continued cooperating with the FBI. (Jason Kohler/KTUU-TV)

Prosecutors say Anderson's cooperation ended when his wife was informed. (Court artist Pat Gillin)

Sen. Lesil McGuire, R-Anchorage (Jason Kohler/KTUU-TV)

Anderson was sentenced to five years in prison on Monday for bribery-related charges. (File Photo)

by Bill McAllister
Tuesday, Oct. 16, 2007

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- Former lawmaker Tom Anderson might have served only one year in prison, rather than the five he was sentenced to Monday, had he continued to cooperate with the FBI in 2005.

Federal prosecutors have left the impression that Anderson's wife might have played a role in his decision, highlighting that the reversal came soon after Lesil McGuire, now a state senator, became aware of her husband's situation.

Anderson did not get any credit against his sentence for helping the FBI with other investigations in the summer of 2005 because he reversed course in September of that year.

Anderson was sentenced to five years in prison Monday, based on the seven felony charges a jury convicted him of in July.

U.S. attorneys said Anderson's participation in a bribery conspiracy in 2004 and 2005 could have resulted in a single felony plea, which Anderson's former attorney said he understood would have meant about a year in prison.

That's the scenario prosecutors said could have unfolded if Anderson had continued cooperating with the FBI, participating in recorded conversations beyond the summer of 2005, when he spent two and a half months working with the public corruption probe.

They said his attitude changed when McGuire, who was his then-fiancé, learned of the investigation and Anderson's cooperation with it.

During the sentencing hearing, Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph Bottini questioned Anderson's former counsel, Craig Howard, about McGuire's involvement and understanding of the FBI investigation.

FBI - Stevens-1317

Howard confirmed that Anderson did in fact inform his wife of his ongoing cooperation with federal agents.

"At that point did things start to unravel as far as his continued cooperation with the government?" Bottini asked.

"You could say unravel," Howard replied.

Howard then testified that he was dismissed as Anderson's defense counselor shortly after she found out about her husband's cooperation with the FBI.

13620-M:563

Anderson's former attorney, Craig Howard (Court artist Pat Gillin)

Anderson said he reversed course with the FBI for a few reasons, including potential reprisals against him and his family, specifically McGuire, who was pregnant with his son.

He said McGuire did not advise him.

"Lesil is a victim of this and I can say nothing else," Anderson said. "It was completely my decision and she knew none of the details. Never did."

Anderson said he now regrets cooperating with the FBI at all.

"I think at the end it was probably not the right decision to do that," Anderson said. "If I did not believe in the charges, I should have fought and if I did believe in the charges, I should have pled."

Anderson did not have any bitter words for the FBI, saying it's a good organization with good people and that as a long-time supporter of law enforcement he understands the agency's role.

The sentencing hearing was scheduled Monday so that it would not conflict with the special legislative session beginning Thursday and so Sen. McGuire could support her husband.

McGuire will take part in the special session on overhauling the profits-based oil tax.

Anderson's case had nothing to do with the Petroleum Profits Tax, which has already been the subject of three bribery convictions and an upcoming trial on Monday.

Contact Bill McAllister at bmcallister@ktuu.com

WorldNow

All content © Copyright 2000 - 2007 WorldNow and KTUU. All Rights Reserved.
For more information on this site, please read our Privacy Policy and Terms of Service.

FBI - Stevens-1318

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 16, 2007 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

Informant had wire, no deal;
ANDERSON: Cooperation details shared by lawyers during sentencing hearing.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A6

LENGTH: 505 words

While hints of former Rep. Tom Anderson's undercover work for the FBI came out during his trial, testimony Monday by his two former defense lawyers gave new dimensions to his role as a wired informant.

The revelations by Jeff Feldman and Craig Howard came during his sentencing hearing.

Anderson secretly recorded conversations in Anchorage and the Mat-Su with maybe a half- dozen people -- private individuals and public officials -- for the FBI's ongoing investigation into corruption, Feldman testified. The lawyer wasn't allowed to name them. But eventually, it all fell apart.

Howard was Anderson's first lawyer. He said he began representing Anderson after taking an urgent call while at his son's Little League game in June 2005. He rushed to Anderson's legislative office in Anchorage. FBI agents were there and about to undertake a search.

Prosecutors eventually told him they had significant evidence and if Anderson wanted to cut a deal he would have to plead guilty to a felony, Howard said.

"No way it was going to be a misdemeanor in this case. Absolutely no way," he testified.

Anderson soon agreed to cooperate in the hope of getting leniency. By all accounts, the government was highly pleased with Anderson's undercover effort, which lasted 2 1/2 months.

In a meeting at Howard's office with an FBI agent and prosecutors, he told his then-girlfriend, Lesil McGuire, about the investigation, which few knew about at the time. Anderson had to tell her, Howard said, because she was pregnant and they were getting married. McGuire, then a state representative, is now a state senator.

Prosecutor Joe Bottini asked Howard: "At that point did things start to unravel as far as his continued cooperation with the government?"

FBI - Stevens-1319

Howard: "Yeah, you could say unravel."

McGuire and Anderson started questioning why he had to plead guilty to a felony, Howard agreed when asked. McGuire also wanted to see his written cooperation agreement, laying out what he would get in exchange for his help.

"And Tom informed her that there was not a firm agreement," Feldman testified.

Howard was terminated. Feldman was hired. At that point Anderson was still helping the FBI.

"It was all he was doing during that period of time," Feldman said. "This was his job."

The undercover work was "highly stressful" for Anderson, he said. There were indications he could get as little as a year or so if he continued to cooperate, but no promises, Feldman testified.

194A-AN-13620-MA-564

Anderson never came to an agreement with prosecutors. The government wanted Anderson to keep up the undercover work indefinitely, including during the 2006 legislative session.

"It felt duplicitous to him to go down to Juneau and sit in the Legislature or sit in caucuses and do his legislative work with other legislators and tape people," Feldman said.

In December 2006, Anderson was arrested on seven felonies. Feldman, overloaded with cases, turned Anderson's over to defense lawyer Paul Stockler.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

LOAD-DATE: October 16, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1320

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 16, 2007 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

Legal spending mounts for Young;
CAMPAIGN FINANCE: Congressman hasn't revealed what sort of advice he's buying.

BYLINE: By ERIKA BOLSTAD ebolstad@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 729 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON -

U.S. Rep. Don Young continued to spend thousands of dollars of campaign donations on attorneys through the summer, according to financial reports filed by his campaign on Monday.

The reports, to the Federal Election Commission, show that over the past three months, Young spent $184,708 on legal fees.

That brings Young's total spending on legal advice this year to $446,845.

Young, a Republican who has been Alaska's sole congressman since 1973, has not said what kind of legal work or defense the campaign money is buying. He has been under federal investigation for his ties to Veco Corp., for fundraising activities and for his role in specific congressional earmarks, according to various media reports.

Young has not spoken publicly about the investigation. In April, his campaign manager said that the campaign had retained a Washington, D.C., firm for advice in connection with campaign contributions from a trucking executive under federal indictment in Wisconsin.

In the three-month period ending Sept. 30, Young paid the firm, Akin Gump Strauss and Hauer, $177,607 for legal advice, according to the report filed Monday. The firm got $242,306 of his business last quarter.

Tobin, O'Connor, Ewing and Richard earned $7,100 from Young this quarter; last quarter, they billed him $19,831.

Federal election law allows lawmakers and candidates to pay legal bills with campaign finance accounts. They have fairly broad discretion to spend the money on legal fees, as long as the legal bills are connected to their role as an elected official or candidate for office.

Young reported collecting $143,421 in contributions during the three-month period ending Sept. 30. Young raised about $111,000 during the second quarter this year, according to an earlier report.

FBI - Stevens-1321

"We've had some good fundraisers, and we're encouraged by where we are," said Young's campaign manager, Steven Dougherty.

But even as he brought in money from events such as his annul pig roast in Anchorage this summer, Young was clearly spending money too. His reports show he had $1.4 million on hand at the end of the reporting period. Last quarter, he had $1.6 million in the bank.

The 74-year-old congressman faces a spirited field of candidates seeking to unseat him, encouraged in part by the ethics cloud that has made him vulnerable to a challenger.

Republican state Rep. Gabrielle LeDoux of Kodiak plans to take on Young in the GOP primary, and three Democrats have said they're running for his seat: his 2006 opponent, Diane Benson; former state House minority leader Ethan Berkowitz; and former state Democratic Party chief Jake Metcalfe.

194A-AN-13620-m; 565

Metcalfe has raised $61,625 so far, according to his report, and Benson has $28,205 in the bank, according to her report. Berkowitz announced his candidacy last week and hasn't released any fundraising numbers to the FEC yet.

U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, who also has been drawn into the Veco investigation, has not used any of his campaign money on criminal lawyers, said Tim McKeever, Stevens' campaign treasurer.

A report released Monday night covers the period when the FBI and IRS raided the senator's home in Girdwood this summer. Stevens hired Brendan Sullivan, one of the best-known criminal defense lawyers in Washington, but his fees are not coming out of the senator's campaign money.

The only lawyers who are being paid out of campaign funds are those who review the campaign finance reports for accuracy, McKeever said. McKeever released on Monday only the first four summary pages of Stevens' 290-page document. Unlike U.S. House members, who must file campaign disclosure forms electronically, U.S. senators are allowed to mail their reports the day they're due.

The summary report shows that Stevens has just over $1 million in the bank. So far, three little-known candidates have filed to run against him: Democrats Rocky Caldero of Dutch Harbor and Frank Vondersaar of Homer, and Republican Gerald "Jerry" Heikes of Palmer.

Stevens' campaign raised $463,020 over the past three months, making it one of the senator's most fruitful fundraising quarters in recent years, McKeever said.

"The pace is running ahead of what we raised in 2001," McKeever said, adding that the approach is no different from Stevens' 2002 campaign. "It's basically the same kind of fundraising -- if anything, we've done more fundraisers in Alaska."

LOAD-DATE: October 16, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Rep. Young reported collecting $143,421 in the three-month period.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1322

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 16, 2007 Tuesday
Correction Appended
FINAL EDITION

Anderson gets five years;
Remorse, friends fail to sway judge who wanted to send a message

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 996 words

A federal judge on Monday said that former state Rep. Tom Anderson "sold the public trust" and sentenced him to five years in prison for seven felonies involving corruption in office.

The two-hour sentencing hearing came with a surprise: Anderson's two former defense lawyers testified that he worked undercover nearly full time for the FBI in the summer of 2005 in the hope of leniency. Ultimately, the deal fell apart. Prosecutors asked for a long sentence.

In a courtroom crowded with Anderson's friends and family on one side and FBI agents and prosecutors on the other, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick said the former lawmaker didn't have much respect for the position once he got into office, regarding it as something that paid poorly and demanded much time.

A federal jury convicted Anderson on July 9 of three counts of money laundering, two counts of extortion and a count each of bribery and conspiracy.

"He took the money because he wanted the money," Sedwick said.

The judge said he doesn't think Anderson, 40, will get in trouble again. "But I have a very considerable concern for sending a message to the community that we really can't tolerate the kind of behavior in which he engaged," the judge said.

Sedwick said he knew the case was heartbreaking for Anderson's large crowd of supporters. Most defendants who come before him have no one, the judge said.

Among those who showed up for Anderson: his wife, state Sen. Lesil McGuire, and his father, also Tom Anderson, former director of Alaska State Troopers.

"I have no idea how Mr. Anderson's apple fell so far from the tree, but it did," Sedwick said.

FBI - Stevens-1323

FOLLOWING HOHMAN IN BRIBERY

Anderson, a Republican, represented East Anchorage for two terms in the Legislature. He didn't run in 2006. He's only the second Alaska legislator to be convicted of bribery, after the late Sen. George Hohman in 1981.

Before Anderson's hearing, the defense had asked for mercy and a sentence of less than three years. Prosecutors had sought the maximum they thought he could get under advisory sentencing guidelines, or more than eight years.

Sedwick found that some areas underscored by prosecutors to support a longer sentence didn't apply.

A longer sentence for Anderson won't deter others, Paul Stockler, Anderson's defense attorney, told the judge. But it matters to Anderson's ability to restart his life. If he got three years, he'd be able to take his and McGuire's young son to the first day of kindergarten,

194A-AN-13620-M; 566

Stockler said.

As it is, Anderson's career as a legislator is finished, Stockler said.

Anderson knows now that he's brought shame "to the entire state of Alaska and the Legislature," Stockler said.

Prosecutor Joe Bottini told Sedwick he thought Anderson's late show of remorse was a facade.

"What's resulted from this conviction and the overall investigation as a whole is that the public's faith in the integrity of our legislative system is eroded seriously," Bottini said. "People are looking at this going, 'Are they all dirty?' "

Anderson was the first Alaska legislator convicted in the ongoing political corruption investigation that burst into view last year with the FBI raids on lawmakers' offices. Another, former Rep. Pete Kott, was convicted last month and two others are awaiting trial.

Anderson told Sedwick he was sorry for what he did, apologizing to the judge, his family and the state of Alaska. He spoke in a quiet voice that quavered at times.

"I've let her down," he said about McGuire, "and I've let my family down."

SCHEME FOR PRISON COMPANY

Evidence in the trial showed that he participated in a scheme to push the interests of a private prison company in exchange for what turned out to be nearly $26,000 in payments. A consultant for Cornell Cos. was working undercover for the FBI, and the company wasn't involved in the scheme, the U.S. Justice Department has said.

Anderson said he didn't get the full impact of the evidence until he saw undercover videos at his trial of him scheming with a Cornell lobbyist and consultant.

"I was embarrassed," Anderson said. The conspiracy involved a sham company that was supposed to operate a Web site on which Cornell would place advertisements.

When he took money from the consultant knowing that Cornell didn't need or want the ads, "I don't know how much more wrong that could have been," Anderson told the judge.

As Sedwick made it clear that Anderson would go to prison, his wife, mother and others cried in the courtroom. Sedwick allowed him to remain out of custody as details of his confinement are worked out. The judge said he'll recommend that Anderson serve his time in Sheridan, Ore., as Anderson requested, though there's no guarantee he'll get that. It's a medium security prison with a prison camp next door.

Besides five years in prison, Sedwick also ordered two years of supervised release. He didn't order a fine.

When the hearing ended, Anderson slowly walked over to his family and friends. He and McGuire embraced.

Lingering outside the courtroom with supporters, Anderson thanked everyone. Friends assured McGuire they would be OK. "Will we?" McGuire wondered.

Later, as Anderson and McGuire got into a waiting vehicle, his face crumpled with the strain of the day.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

INSIDE

FBI - Stevens-1324

WIRED: Anderson secretly recorded talks as an FBI informant, according to testimony.

Back Page

ONLINE: Listen to Anderson's pre-sentencing remarks, the judge handing down the sentence and Anderson's ex-lawyers discussing their role in their client's cooperation with the FBI, and find more corruption coverage at

adn.com/fbi

* Former state Rep. Vic Kohring is set to stand trial in Anchorage's federal court starting Monday on bribery and other charges.

* Former state Rep. Pete Kott, convicted in September of corruption charges, is set for sentencing Dec. 7.

* The Justice Department/FBI investigation into public corruption in Alaska continues.

What's next?

LOAD-DATE: October 17, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

CORRECTION-DATE: October 16, 2007

CORRECTION: Correction A story and photo caption on Tuesday's front page about the sentencing of former state Rep. Tom Anderson on corruption charges indicated that only two Alaska lawmakers have been convicted of bribery. While Anderson was the second state legislator convicted of bribery in state history, a third, former Rep. Pete Kott, has since been convicted as well. The first was the late state Sen. George Hohman, in 1981.

GRAPHIC: Photos by JIM LAVRAKAS / Anchorage Daily News
Former state legislator Tom Anderson enters the Anchorage federal courthouse Monday. Anderson was in court for sentencing after a federal jury convicted him of money laundering, extortion, bribery and conspiracy in July. He is the second Alaska legislator convicted of bribery, after George Hohman in 1981.
Anderson and his wife, state Sen. Lesil McGuire, drive away from the courthouse after sentencing. According to Anderson's former lawyers, his role as a wired informant for the FBI fell apart soon after he told then-girlfriend McGuire about his involvement.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1325

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 17, 2007 Wednesday
FINAL EDITION

Hunt for big fish hooked Kohring by mistake, lawyer says; TRIAL MONDAY: Former lawmaker faces federal charges of bribery, extortion.

BYLINE: By STEVE QUINN The Associated Press

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 862 words

DATELINE: JUNEAU -

"You dun got the wrong man."

That was the folksy conclusion Vic Kohring's attorney presented to federal prosecutors last January in an otherwise very serious letter turning down a plea deal for the former Alaska state lawmaker.

The letter, obtained by The Associated Press, was sent to assistant U.S. attorney Joseph Bottini by Kohring's lawyer, Wayne Anthony Ross, who said Kohring had done nothing wrong.

Federal prosecutors four months later charged Kohring, then a state representative, and two former lawmakers with bribery and extortion.

Kohring is accused of demanding and accepting up to $2,600 in cash and a $3,000 job for a relative from former Veco Corp. executives in exchange for his support. The indictment also alleges Kohring sought but did not receive a $17,000 payment for credit card debt.

Prosecutors claim Kohring's cozy relationship with Veco executives Bill Allen and Rick Smith went back to 2002. Ross claimed in the letter this is nothing more than a decade-old friendship, not a pay-for-play relationship.

Kohring's trial starts Monday in Anchorage.

Kohring declined Tuesday to talk about specifics of the case, but did say, "This is becoming more and more of a reality, now that it's here. Of course, I'm fighting for my life here."

Charged along with Kohring were former Republican Reps. Pete Kott, who was convicted on three counts last month, and Bruce Weyhrauch, whose trial has been postponed.

FBI - Stevens-1326

Since the May indictments, U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens and U.S. Rep. Don Young have also come under federal scrutiny for their relationship with Veco executives.

Seattle-based John Henry Browne, another attorney for Kohring, told the AP on Tuesday that Kohring got ensnared in a wider federal probe that was after bigger trophies, Stevens and his son, Ben Stevens, a former state Senate president.

"What happened was this little fish named Vic Kohring got caught in it. There's not much meat in this hamburger," Browne said.

Ted Stevens is under investigation for remodeling work done by Veco employees at his Alaska home. Ben Stevens had his office searched in an FBI raid last year, but he hasn't been charged. Bill Allen testified in Kott's trial last month that his bribery conviction included allegations of payments to Ben Stevens through a consulting contract. Ben Stevens has denied any wrongdoing. Ted Stevens has said he won't discuss the investigation for fear it will look like he's trying to influence it.

194A-AN-13620-M; 567

A spokesman for the Department of Justice, which is prosecuting the Kohring case, declined comment Tuesday.

Ross' five-page letter will essentially serve as an outline for the defense, his lawyers said.

Ross notes in the letter that Kohring went against Veco's wishes and never endorsed the final petroleum profits tax passed by the Legislature last year.

However, a number of times Kohring voted against amendments to raise the tax above the 20 percent that Veco was strongly pushing. The tax, which Gov. Sarah Palin has called tainted by corruption exposed by the investigation, will be revisited during a special session that starts Thursday.

"We respectfully decline your offer to have Vic Kohring plead to a criminal charge," Ross wrote Bottini in January. "Vic did not sell his vote(s) to anyone. ... We strongly disagree with your assertion that what Vic did was criminal in nature."

He conceded, however, that Kohring now understands he foolishly placed himself in a position where he and his actions could be subjected to scrutiny and misinterpretation.

In the letter, Ross also countered the importance of several videotapes and recordings Bottini played to them in an earlier meeting.

In one, Kohring visited Smith and Allen at the Baranof Hotel in Juneau, seeking their advice on how he could deal with a past due credit card debt. "Vic was interested in a loan or a legitimate job and these things were discussed," Ross wrote.

But he said Kohring several times emphasized "that everything had to be legitimate and on the up and up. Allen and Smith listened but seemed unenthusiastic about helping, so Vic dropped the matter and did not bring it up to them again."

Ross also noted recorded phone conversations, which he said showed Kohring's typical behavior.

"Vic often asks constituents, 'What can I do to help,' " he wrote. "He says those same words to anyone or everyone.

"There were never any agreements expressed or implied between Vic and Allen for Vic's vote."

He also discounted the allegation that Kohring arranged a job for a relative. He said Smith broached the subject of Kohring's nephew applying for a Veco engineering internship over small talk during a chance meeting at a hotel lounge.

"Smith's offer was unexpected. Vic was not even aware such a program existed," Ross wrote. "Smith asked for nothing from Vic when he made the offer and nothing later."

Ross told Bottini that Kohring was supportive of efforts to clean up politics in Alaska. "However in this instance, as they say in the movies, 'You dun got the wrong man,' " he wrote.

Daily News reporter Lisa Demer contributed to this story.

KOHRING: Read the letter from the Department of Justice and find more on the investigation.

adn.com/fbi

FBI - Stevens-1327

LOAD-DATE: October 17, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Kohring

DOCUMENT-TYPE: WIRE

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1328

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 17, 2007 Wednesday
FINAL EDITION

State will give feds clear field in probes;
CORRUPTION: Washington wants Alaska not to muddle investigation.

BYLINE: By DAN JOLING The Associated Press

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 560 words

State prosecutors will back off an investigation of election campaign polling practices to avoid interfering with an ongoing federal corruption probe, Gov. Sarah Palin announced Tuesday.

Palin, who championed ethics reform while winning office last November, released a letter from the U.S. Department of Justice that said a state investigation could interfere with the federal effort.

"Because of the long-standing federal investigation into these matters, we believe that concurrent state investigative activity will have the effect of compromising certain aspects of the ongoing federal public corruption investigation," said Brenda K. Morris, deputy chief of the Justice Department's public integrity section.

She commented in a letter to Alaska Attorney General Talis Colberg.

Attorneys from the Public Integrity Section are prosecuting four former Alaska legislators, including former House Speaker Pete Kott, R-Eagle River, who was convicted of bribery and other counts last month.

State officials announced they would investigate after testimony emerged from Kott's trial that Kott and possibly others had illegally received campaign polls paid for by officials of Veco Corp., a major oil field services company that spent thousands of dollars supporting pro-development candidates.

Veco CEO Bill Allen and a company vice president, Rick Smith, have pleaded guilty to bribing public officials. Their plea agreements require them to cooperate with investigators.

They testified at Kott's trial that Veco paid $2,750 for a poll that showed Kott where he stood in his re-election campaign in 2006. Kott subsequently lost in the Republican primary.

Smith testified that Veco had paid for other polls over the years, including a $20,000 poll in 2006 for former Gov. Frank Murkowski before he was a declared candidate for re-election.

Colberg assigned lawyers to closely watch Kott's trial in federal court to see if it revealed other possible criminal acts.

But he cautioned that the state would have to proceed carefully before pursuing its own criminal charges because federal authorities did not want interference from the state.

The Justice Department letter, dated Friday, puts the brakes on state investigators.

Palin said she has directed the attorney general to continue to monitor alleged illegal activities by public officials but that her office will not impede or compromise the federal investigation.

FBI - Stevens-1329

Former state Rep. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage was sentenced Monday to five years in prison following his conviction in July on seven counts of conspiracy and bribery. He was convicted of taking nearly $24,000 that he thought was coming from a Houston-based company, Cornell Industries Inc., which hoped to build a private prison in Alaska.

194A-AN-13620-M; 568

The money was supplied by the FBI through an informant under contract to Cornell who secretly recorded his conversations with Anderson in 2004 and 2005. The company was not aware of the investigation.

Kott was convicted last month of conspiracy to solicit financial benefits, extortion and bribery.

Former Rep. Vic Kohring is scheduled to go on trial on corruption charges Monday. The corruption trial of former state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch has been delayed.

UPDATES: For up-to-date news on the federal corruption investigation, check adn.com. Talk about it on our politics blog,

adn.com/alaskapolitics

LOAD-DATE: October 17, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: WIRE

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1330

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 18, 2007 Thursday
FINAL EDITION

Kohring's lawyer chided for antics;
SCOLDING: Judge says defense should focus on court, not the press.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 987 words

Former state Rep. Vic Kohring's lawyer got a scolding Wednesday from the judge.

U.S. District Court Judge John Sedwick seemed exasperated by tactics being used by John Henry Browne, a Seattle criminal defense lawyer. He described the defense efforts as troublesome, worrisome and unusual for Anchorage. And the judge warned Browne to stop trying his case in the press.

Jury selection begins Monday in Kohring's trial on four federal felony charges, including bribery, extortion and conspiracy.

Kohring's main trial lawyer is Browne, and he's also represented by Wayne Anthony Ross, a well-known Anchorage lawyer. Kohring, a Wasilla Republican, was elected seven times. He resigned in July to concentrate on his defense.

At a court hearing Wednesday to discuss jury selection and other matters before the trial, prosecutor Joe Bottini told Sedwick that the defense lawyers were behaving unprofessionally and needed to be called on it.

Bottini pointed to an Associated Press story that was published in the Daily News on Wednesday. It was based on a five-page letter that Ross sent to him back in January rejecting any plea deal and outlining the defense in detail.

Among other things, Ross wrote, "As they say in the movies, 'You dun got the wrong man.' "

Besides that, Bottini told Sedwick, Browne was making outrageous claims in various legal motions that weren't supported by evidence but were getting lots of publicity. He was "using court filings to work the press," Bottini said.

MIRANDA RIGHTS

For instance, Browne filed a motion to throw out a statement that Kohring gave to FBI agents on Aug. 31, 2006 -- the day agents served search warrants at legislative offices around the state, including his. Browne contended that the agents detained the lawmaker in his office, then failed to read him his Miranda rights. But at a hearing, Browne called no witnesses and dropped that issue, Bottini noted.

Then on Tuesday, Browne filed a motion to dismiss the case based on what he calls "prosecutorial misconduct." He contends that Sen. Fred Dyson, R-Eagle River, was acting as an agent of the government in June when he suggested through an aide that Kohring consider negotiating with prosecutors. Browne said that interfered with Kohring's right to counsel.

"Mr. Kohring, on account of and in direct response to the government's excessive overreaching, decided to refuse to negotiate, opting instead for trial," Browne's motion said.

But Dyson has said that he approached Kohring on his own, as a friend -- not at the request of the FBI, Bottini said.

Browne told the judge he's concerned about whether Kohring can get a fair trial because of all the publicity about the case -- much of it the government's allegations.

Browne mentioned a story that included the judge's comments Monday in sentencing former state Rep. Tom Anderson to prison on bribery and other charges. Sedwick said at Monday's sentencing that he was concerned with "sending a message to the community that we really can't tolerate the kind of behavior in which he engaged."

Sedwick said Anderson's case had nothing to do with Kohring's. He said he reviewed the coverage on Kohring item by item and found it for the most part "professional and extremely fair."

The judge said the defense behavior was "unusual, to say the least." It appeared the letter from Ross was given to reporters in an effort to obtain favor before the trial, he said.

Ross wasn't at the court hearing. He said earlier this week that he's mainly the local contact.

As to the claim regarding Dyson, Sedwick said, "there is precious little to support it." The evidence consists mainly of two things: An aide to Kohring saying that an aide to Dyson told him that an FBI agent had suggested Kohring call her because things would go easier if he cooperated, and a photocopy of FBI agent Mary Beth Kepner's business card.

Sedwick said he'd rule later on that matter.

But it did appear that the defense was casting aspersions without basis and that was "very troublesome," the judge said.

Browne hasn't filed a trial memo, giving some glimpse of the defense, even though it was due Monday. Browne said he would do so and noted that he didn't have a team of lawyers working on it, perhaps a reference to the four prosecutors in the courtroom.

Browne said he was trying to keep the case on track even though a new indictment in the case was unsealed Oct. 4. He noted that was during a period in which he was out of town and had asked for no activity in the case.

Don't expect any sympathy on that point, Sedwick said. In Anchorage, lawyers don't take a week off just before a trial, he said. And Browne knew about the allegations in the new indictment for some time, Sedwick said.

"You are not going to pull the wool over my eyes on that one," Sedwick said.

Kohring is accused of being in a conspiracy with executives from oil field services company Veco Corp. to push their interests. The new indictment takes the conspiracy further back, to 2002.

The judge said he wasn't going to formally issue a finding but warned Browne not to try his case in the press.

QUESTIONNAIRES STUDIED

Sedwick and the attorneys on both sides also went through questionnaires that had been sent in by prospective jurors to see if any were obviously biased or had other reasons they couldn't serve.

Of 120 potential jurors in the pool, 49 were excused on Wednesday. Many had hardships related to work, children, travel or medical issues. Two didn't speak English well. A couple had potential conflicts of interest. One worked for the court.

While the questionnaires weren't made public, it appeared from the lawyers' discussion that around 20 people were excused because they indicated they couldn't be fair to Kohring.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

READ THE LETTER: Go online to see the letter from Kohring's defense lawyer turning down a plea deal.

adn.com/fbi

LOAD-DATE: October 18, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

FBI - Stevens-1332

GRAPHIC: Kohring lawyer John Henry Browne

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1333

NewsBank inc. America's Newspapers

Paper: Anchorage Daily News (AK)
Title: Opinions clash on Day 1 -
DUELING EXPERTS: Consultants disagree on need for increase.
SPECIAL SESSION OPENS ON OIL TAXES
Date: October 19, 2007

The special session of the Legislature on raising oil taxes began Thursday with international experts clashing on whether the proposal would damage oil industry investment in Alaska.

The 30-day session was called by Gov. Sarah Palin after the FBI charged that legislators were bribed to support a tax rate the petroleum industry wanted when the Legislature passed a new oil tax last year.

The special session formally began Thursday night. But lawmakers first heard advice at a daylong hearing from a pair of dueling international oil and gas consultants hired by the Legislature.

Consultant Pedro Van Meurs said he believes the proposed North Slope natural gas pipeline no longer makes financial sense because of cost increases and changes in the market, a statement that took the air out of the hearing room. Van Meurs also noted Alaska's declining oil production and said the state needs to think hard about what it wants for the future.

Van Meurs urged legislators to reject Palin's proposal to boost the oil production tax rate. Although Alaska could reasonably have a higher tax rate, it would be its third oil tax increase in three years, he said, and oil investment in Alaska could suffer.

"Quite frankly, you become a basket case of instability," Van Meurs said.

Daniel Johnston, another oil expert hired by the Legislature, said that's not so. He said the oil industry would have to understand the "cloud of corruption" over the existing Petroleum Profits Tax, or PPT, provides a good reason to change it.

"If you were to make a change this year as a result of the cloud, I see that as the pure, perfect justification," Johnston said.

He also told lawmakers that the state doesn't need to make all the oil companies happy to still have healthy investment.

Johnston, in an interview, also disagreed with Van Meurs' statement the gas pipeline is not economic. He said it all depends on the terms and how much profit whoever builds it requires.

Johnston's testimony to the Legislative Budget and Audit Committee focused on oil taxes, though. He said Alaska has a relativ-ely low government take of oil industry profits compared to other regions around the world.

Alaska is a lot more stable area for investment than places like Libya or Russia, where the industry is putting a lot of money in spite of much heavier government taxes, Johnston said.

Van Meurs, in an interview, said he sees Alaska's take of oil industry profits as "average, right down the middle," worldwide.

FBI - Stevens-1334

CHANGE TAX NOW OR WAIT?

Van Meurs said that Alaska is considered the least stable and most confrontational oil tax regime among developed countries. He also said he doesn't see the corruption as reason to change the oil tax, unless it is proven the bribes from oil field services company Veco Corp. were what determined the tax rate adopted last year.

Van Meurs said the Legislature should wait four years and get some information about how the 1-year-old oil tax is working before abandoning it.

But Johnston countered that legislators have a "ton more information" now than when they passed the tax.

VAN MEURS ATTACKED

Legislators, staff, lobbyists and reporters packed the hearing Thursday where Johnston and Van Meurs testified. The room was hot and the hearing started out combative, with Sen. Johnny Ellis, D-Anchorage, challenging Van Meurs.

194A-AN-13620-M;570

"I have to say that I'm upset and somewhat stunned Mr. Van Meurs is back before us," Ellis said.

He said that Van Meurs has no credibility. During the oil tax debate last year, Van Meurs said one thing in public and told Murkowski something different about what's best for the state, Ellis said.

Van Meurs denied he was two-faced. Sen. Charlie Huggins, R-Wasilla, said no matter whether legislators agree with Van Meurs, he is a world-class oil expert.

"Everybody in this debate has baggage attached to them one way or another," said Budget and Audit Committee head Ralph Samuels, an Anchorage Republican representative who led the hearing.

Senate President Lyda Green, R-Wasilla, said she thinks Van Meurs is right that the state shouldn't rush to change the tax rate. But Senate Minority Leader Gene Therriault, R-North Pole, said Alaska didn't change its tax rate much over the decades and one more for the long term won't make it the "basket case of instability" Van Meurs described.

Anchorage Democratic Rep. Mike Doogan said he was "bumfuzzled" by Van Meurs' statement that Alaska is considered too confrontational with the oil industry.

"Is the problem that we're striking Exxon Mobil's fists too vigorously with our face?" he asked.

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham.

The oil tax debate

The Legislature on Thursday began a special session of up to 30 days to consider Gov. Sarah Palin's proposal to raise oil taxes. Her Alaska's Clear and Equitable Share bill would boost the basic tax rate passed last year and end some tax credits that lower oil company tax bills.

Thursday: Two oil consultants, Pedro Van Meurs and Daniel Johnston, gave lawmakers opposing views of Palin's tax plan. Van Meurs said changing the tax would discourage oil investments. Johnston said changing a tax tainted by a bribery scandal makes sense.

Today: The Palin administration briefs the Senate Resources Committee at 9 a.m. and the House Oil and Gas Committee at 1:30 p.m. on the ACES proposal.

Online: To listen to or watch today's briefings, or listen to the Van Meurs and Johnston presentations, go to w3.legis.state.ak.us/index.php, click on "Media Center."

Caption:
Photos by SEANNA O'SULLIVAN / The Associated Press

Oil industry expert Pedro Van Meurs told lawmakers Thursday that he believes the proposed natural gas pipeline no longer makes financial sense. Daniel Johnston, another expert hired by the Legislature, disagreed.

Lawmakers converse before a committee meeting Thursday.

Caption:
Photo 1: 18AKSO101Oil_Tax222814_101907.jpg FBI - Stevens-1335

Photo 2: 18AKSO102Oil_Tax222817_101907.jpg

Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

Author: SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com Staff
Section: Main
Page: A1
Dateline: JUNEAU
Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 20, 2007 Saturday
FINAL EDITION

Kohring's case will not be dismissed;
TRIAL BEGINS MONDAY: Judge says state Sen. Dyson did not interfere.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 250 words

A federal judge on Friday shot down former state Rep. Vic Kohring's effort to dismiss the case against him.

Kohring's trial on public corruption charges begins Monday.

In a written decision, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick said Kohring's motion, filed Tuesday, came too late. Beyond that, the judge ruled that he didn't find any basis for Kohring's assertions of interference with his right to counsel.

Kohring's lawyer, John Henry Browne of Seattle, claimed that state Sen. Fred Dyson was acting as an agent of the government in June when he suggested through an aide that Kohring talk with prosecutors. Dyson gave the aide a business card of an FBI agent to pass along.

In statements filed in court by prosecutors, Dyson said he was acting on his own, and the agent, Mary Beth Kepner, said she never asked Dyson or his staff to contact Kohring. Kepner said she didn't know he would be doing that.

The motion is "based entirely on conjecture," the judge wrote.

"Senator Dyson's possession of an FBI agent's business card no more supports the inference that Dyson is a government agent than his possession of a doctor's business card would support the inference that Senator Dyson is a physician," Sedwick wrote.

Dyson did wear a wire and was working for the FBI when he persuaded another defendant, former Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen, to talk with agents. But the situation in the Kohring case was entirely different, the judge found.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer.

LOAD-DATE: October 22, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

FBI - Stevens-1336

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

194A-AN-13620-M;571

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 20, 2007 Saturday
FINAL EDITION

Harris targets oil tax 'cloud';
LEGISLATURE: House speaker says public lacks confidence.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 838 words

DATELINE: JUNEAU -

The Legislature has to change state oil taxes to remove the stain of corruption caused by the Veco bribery scandal, House Speaker John Harris said Friday.

"If we don't do anything we still have the cloud over us," Harris said on the first full day of the 30-day special session on oil taxes.

Harris said "the cloud" would come from the media, members of the public and Gov. Sarah Palin, who has said that corruption tainted the oil tax passed last year.

Harris also acknowledged that the FBI could still be watching legislators in the wake of the scandal. The agency has described its broad investigation of Alaska political corruption as ongoing.

"Every bit of our action is being scrutinized to this day. There very well could be wiretaps, there very well could be bugs in this building or anywhere else," Harris said, speaking at the state Capitol.

Harris said he can't watch legislators 24 hours a day.

"They all have their own integrity they have to live up to, and hopefully they all will," the Valdez Republican said.

The speaker said he wasn't asking legislators to do anything different during the special session. "Except stay out of the Baranof over there," Harris said, not seriously.

Executives of the oil field services company Veco met with legislators in Suite 604 of the Baranof Hotel in Juneau last year during the debate that resulted in the existing oil tax system. Two Veco executives subsequently pleaded guilty to bribing four legislators in an attempt to get a tax rate favored by the big oil companies.

FBI - Stevens-1337

Former state Rep. Pete Kott has been convicted and former Rep. Vic Kohring goes to trial next week.

IS TAX TAINTED?

Legislators at this special session are focusing on highly technical matters of building an oil tax. But the corruption issues are looming huge, with the ugly reason lawmakers are back considering the tax again a tangible force in the session.

Palin cited the taint as she called the special session to consider her proposal to raise the tax.

Legislators can be defensive about the corruption talk, and many of them don't agree with Harris that the oil tax has to be changed to remove a taint. Harris' own House Republican caucus is divided.

194A-AN-13620-m ;572

Legislators such as Senate President Lyda Green dispute there is really a taint on the tax at all.

"I think the cloud has been vastly overrated," said Green, a Wasilla Republican. "I'm sorry, I just don't think you have to go back and change anything."

Green noted the legislators arrested were pushing for a lower tax rate than what actually passed. But lawmakers such as Fairbanks Republican Rep. Mike Kelly argue that doesn't mean the bribed lawmakers didn't influence the process and keep the final tax rate from going higher.

Kenai Republican Sen. Tom Wagoner, a member of the Senate minority, said there isn't enough information to tell for sure at this point.

"I don't think we've seen the last of the indictments come down," Wagoner said. "And when we see those indictments come down we may know more."

House Majority Leader Ralph Samuels, R-Anchorage, said the oil tax decision needs to be made based on what's best economically for the state, not on a perception that the current system is tainted.

"My vote wasn't tainted," he said. "I never asked Pete Kott or Vic Kohring advice on tax policy."

FRUSTRATION

Samuels is clearly frustrated about legislators being painted as a corrupt bunch.

He grew a little heated at a House Oil and Gas Committee meeting Friday, repeatedly telling Revenue Commissioner Pat Galvin that no one is angrier about corrupt legislators like Kott than other elected officials who worked honestly and are left with the mess.

Speaker Harris said he doesn't know if he'll end up supporting the governor's specific proposal to raise the state oil tax rate. But he said the Legislature needs to do something about the public confidence problem.

"For us to really get the majority of the Alaska public behind us we're going to have to probably make some tweaks, and maybe some bigger changes," the speaker said.

Anchorage Democratic Rep. Harry Crawford said he's feeling optimistic about securing a greater state share for the oil. He said the feeling in the Capitol is much different than last year, and he hasn't seen anyone take Veco's place as corrupter.

"There were people here that were tainted, and I think we cleared them out," Crawford said. "Without that influence here I think we'll do a much better job."

Crawford said he just put one of his rental properties up for sale so he'd have money to finance a ballot initiative if the Legislature refuses to change the oil tax system.

House Minority Leader Beth Kerttula said the public will have something to say about it if the Legislature doesn't act on the tax.

"If it has to be an initiative, that is what it has to be," the Juneau Democrat said.

FBI - Stevens-1338

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/online/scockerham.

CATCH THE LATEST: Turn to our politics blog for news and opinion on the special session and other Alaska politics.

adn.com/alaskapolitics

LOAD-DATE: October 22, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Photos by SEANNA O'SULLIVAN / The Associated Press
Sens. Thomas Wagoner, R- Kenai, left, and Gene Therriault, R-North Pole, talk outside the House Finance Committee room where hired consultant Daniel Johnston holds an informational meeting about oil taxes.

From left, Sens. Charlie Huggins, R-Wasilla; Gary Stevens, R-Kodiak; Lesil McGuire, R-Anchorage; and Lyda Green, R-Mat-Su, listen to speakers from an energy consulting firm during a Senate Resources Committee meeting on Friday.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1339

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page | Close Window

Alaska Ear

The divine appendage

(Published: October 21, 2007)

OH BABY ... She's everywhere. Charlie Rose. Newsweek. Fortune.

An earwig reports the Gov got a good laugh from Charlie when she referred to Todd as the first dude. This was in response to his question about what Bill's role might be if Hillary wins.

The Newsweek story is worth checking out just for the accompanying photo: Sarah leaving the mansion in Juneau, a Blackberry in one hand and a Red Bull in the other. Trailing a couple of kids and her sister Molly.

The best quote in the story, however, is from Rep. Beth Kerttula, D-Juneau, House minority leader, talking about having a woman governor: "I finally get to go to the restroom and talk business with the governor," Kerttula said. "The guys have been doing this for centuries."

Want more? Watch for future editions of "O" and Saveur.

QUESTION ... By now, everyone with a pulse knows morning talk radio host Eddie Burke got canned Friday. But really, darlings, how rude was it of the bosses to fire him on his 25th wedding anniversary? He says management feared losing oil advertising because of his pro-Sarah, pro-ACES speechifying. He says Dan Fagan, who bad-mouths Sarah on his popular p.m. talk show on the same station, stuck in the knife.

Dan says "Not me."

Management says nothing.

If you want to express condolences, you'll have to send them to Las Vegas. Eddie and the missus are on an anniversary vacation.

"Most people are broke when they leave Vegas," he quipped Friday. "I'm going to Vegas broke."

SOFT LANDINGS ... Janet Ogan, wife of ex-legislator, now state employee Scott Ogan, is a staffer for Wes Keller, the appointee to Vic Kohring's seat.

VERBATIM ... From an Alaska state trooper incident report:

"Location: Juneau, Echo Cove Case Number: 07-87922 Type: Littering Text: On 10/12/07, Alaska Wildlife Troopers from Juneau found a discarded 24' Bayliner cabin cruiser in the parking lot at Echo Cove. The registration numbers and hull identification numbers were removed to prevent recognition. Investigation led Troopers to the responsible owner, Michael Frank, age 48, of Juneau. Frank agreed to remove the vessel and dispose of it properly. On 10/13/07, a summons for littering was issued to Frank with a court appearance set for 11/8/07 in Juneau District Court."

194-AN-13620-M;573

TOURIST SPECIAL ... Just for fun, ask Google Maps for the best route from Anchorage to Whittier. You'll be directed east onto the Glenn, then 147 miles to the Old Richardson Highway, to Valdez, to a long ferry ride from there to the little burg on the other side of the mountains.

Close to 400 miles.

Maybe Mr. Google is afraid of tunnels?

JUDGMENT ... Media types, including The Divine Appendage, read with some misgiving a 40-page ruling issued last week by U.S. District Judge John Sedwick, who is presiding over the political corruption cases snaking their way through federal court. In brief, the defense in the Vic Kohring trial wanted a change of venue, claiming that Alaska media were wicked, biased and otherwise out to convince prospective jurors to convict poor Vic.

Reporters and judges don't always view "publicity" through like eyes. So imagine the relief that greeted Sedwick's conclusion: "What emerges from an assessment of the media reports in their totality is a picture of factual, fair and non-inflammatory reporting and commentary stained only here and there with an inflammatory remark or story which gives a glimpse of information that will not be admitted as evidence at the trial."

That said, The Divine Appendage must be fair and note that the judge, when reviewing a Kohring item from a July column, concluded Ear "may be a bit too humble."

Well, he can't be right all the time.

WELCOME TO THE WORLD ... as we know it, Beatrix Brogan, daughter of ADN editors Kirsten Schultz and Casey Brogan, born Tuesday at Regional. Wee Bea Brogan?

HUH? ... An Anchorage earmite sent us a story from the Alaska Airlines in-flight magazine that includes the following statement: "Thanks to long daylight hours, farmers in the nearby Matanuska Valley raise giant vegetables, including cabbages the size of basketballs."

Basketballs? What Matanuska Valley are they talking about? Any self-respecting Mad-Zoo farmer would be ashamed to grow cabbages as tiny as a basketball. How about "the size of a small truck?"

Compiled by Sheila Toomey. See Ear online at adn.com/ear.

Print Page | Close Window

FBI - Stevens-1341

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 22, 2007 Monday
FINAL EDITION

Kohring trial set to begin today;
BRIBES OR GIFTS? Secret tapes of ex-lawmaker will be at center of arguments.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 932 words

Was former state Rep. Vic Kohring another Alaska politician with his hand out, or a guy who accepted cash as a gift from a friend?

That's the question facing jurors in Kohring's trial on public corruption charges. Jury selection starts today in U.S. District Court, and jurors should begin hearing the government's side of the case by midweek.

Kohring, a Wasilla Republican, was elected seven times before resigning in July to concentrate on his defense.

Prosecutors intend to rely on secretly made recordings of meetings and phone calls to convince jurors, as well as testimony from those who say they paid bribes. That is the same approach the government used in two previous Alaska corruption trials that resulted in convictions this year.

In Kohring's case, the two sides have very different interpretations of the recordings.

Kohring is accused of accepting cash payments totaling as much as $2,600, seeking another $17,000, and soliciting an internship for his nephew in exchange for doing the bidding of Veco Corp. The oil field services company was sold in September to CH2M Hill.

A trial memorandum outlining the defense says that Kohring's friendship with former Veco chief executive Bill Allen began more than 12 years ago.

The two men were particularly close because Kohring's wife is from Russia, as was Allen's girlfriend, says the memo by Kohring's lawyer, John Henry Browne. Both women came to Alaska with their daughters.

"This common bond involving their Russian families created a special camaraderie between Vic and Allen that made the nature of their relationship more personal than professional," the trial memo says.

During the 2006 legislative session, Veco was pushing a new oil tax favored by North Slope oil producers as a step toward building a natural gas pipeline that could have been enormously lucrative for Veco.

Prosecutors charge that Kohring received payments to push the oil tax, but the defense says the money was a personal gift.

Both sides agree that on March 30, 2006, Kohring met with Allen and former Veco vice president Rick Smith in Suite 604 of Juneau's Baranof Hotel.

In a video recording of that meeting, Kohring brought up the topic of a "personal financial matter that ... potentially, could hurt me politically," the defense memo says. He told Allen and Smith that he owed $17,000 on a credit card for a surgery. Prosecutors say the debt was in collection.

Kohring asked about a job or loan and stressed that it had to be legitimate, according to the defense.

194A-AN-13620-M;574

"As Allen and Smith seemed unenthusiastic about helping Mr. Kohring, he dropped the issue and did not bring it up to them again," the defense says.

Prosecutors say in their trial memo that the trio also talked at length about how to structure the deal to avoid "red flags."

During that meeting, prosecutors say, Kohring continued to talk about his finances and his family. Allen asked Smith if he had any "hundreds." Smith opened his wallet and handed at least $100 to Allen, who gave it to Kohring. Allen then opened his wallet and handed Kohring a second handful of cash, totaling $500 to $1,000, the prosecution says.

After getting the money, Kohring brought up the oil tax, which was being pushed by then-Gov. Frank Murkowski. Here's a snippet of conversation, according to the prosecution memo:

Kohring: "What can I do at this point to help you guys? Anything?"

Allen: "Whatever you, you know, uh, uh ..."

Kohring: "Just keep lobbying my colleagues for the governor's plan, right?"

The defense memo says the money wasn't a bribe for support on the tax, but just a gift between friends.

Kohring told Allen and Smith he was going to be able to spend Easter with his stepdaughter for the first time, the memo says.

"Allen suggested that Kohring sponsor an Easter egg hunt for his daughter, but with the surprise of presents in the eggs. It was then that Allen provided Kohring with an undetermined sum of money, to be used specifically for the Easter egg hunt," the memo says.

Before Kohring left, he mentioned that his family had given Allen a bottle of Russian vodka.

"This exchange of presents amongst close friends, therefore, had nothing to do with any official action," the defense contends.

Kohring was completely unaware that the gifts "were ever intended to influence Mr. Kohring's work as a legislator."

Later, in an April 20, 2006, conversation with Smith, Kohring thanked Smith and Allen for their support over the years. He wanted to hug Allen, he said. His family thoroughly enjoyed the Easter egg hunt, with the money in the eggs as Allen suggested, he said, according to the defense memo.

The extensive recordings, according to the defense, "demonstrate Mr. Kohring's continued dedication to his constituents and his unwavering stance against tax increases."

The trial is expected to take about two weeks. Prosecutors say they expect to call 20-25 witnesses including a dozen or more FBI agents. That's because Browne wouldn't agree to let a single FBI agent authenticate all the recordings, as was done in the recent trial of former state Rep. Pete Kott. The defense lawyer said he didn't want to make the government's job easier.

Prosecutors will be allowed to use a statement that Kohring gave to FBI agents as well as materials seized in an Aug. 31, 2006, search of his legislative office. U.S. District Judge John Sedwick ruled last week that the search was legal.

FBI - Stevens-1343

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

FOLLOW THE SCANDALS: Keep up with the latest on the Kohring trial and the overall corruption investigation at

adn.com/fbi

LOAD-DATE: October 22, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Kohring

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1344

SEARCH BLOG | FLAG BLOG | Next Blog» Create Blog | Sign In

WHAT DO I KNOW?

.....THIS AND THAT AS THINGS COME UP

MONDAY, OCTOBER 22, 2007

Kohring Trial Day 1 - Jury Selection and the Defense Attorney

9:00 AM	3:07-CR-00055-JWS	Judge Sedwick	Anchorage Courtroom 3

USA vs. VICTOR H. KOHRING
TRIAL BY JURY - DAY 1

Today was devoted to jury selection. Judge Sedwick used the same process he used in the Kott and Anderson trials. The first part already happened - the elimination of potential jurists based on their questionnaires. From what I understand, those who expressed bias about the case there, have been eliminated. When I walked into court today, about 9:15 am, the gallery was packed by people with little blue stickers on their chests that said "Juror."

I missed the first part, but I imagine it was the same as the Kott trial - jurors were introduced to the various parties, told the charges, given instructions about their job and restrictions about talking to others or viewing news about the case. Another court observer told me that one of the potential witnesses, Fred James, was given permission to

CAN'T FIND IT?

1. try the search blog button, upper left
2. Try Edit on toolbar, then Find in this Page
3. Try the labels list on the lower right.

ADD THIS BLOG TO MY Technorati FAVORITES

ABOUT ME

STEVE

I started this blog just to find out what the blogworld was all about. I figured I needed to actually blog, not just read other people's blogs, to understand how it works, and what ways it could be used. This is all experimental. A learning exercise for me. It's turning out to be a look at one person's (mine) life in Anchorage. November was devoted to posts from India. February and March were from Thailand. Back in Anchorage now.

VIEW MY COMPLETE PROFILE

FBI - Stevens-1345

BLOG ARCHIVE

▼ 2007 (388)
▼ October (41)
Kohring Trial Day 4 - Morning Report

194-AN-13620-M; 575

be in the courtroom for the jury selection process. He's one of the two writers of the USA v. Victor H. Kohring blog I mentioned yesterday. What I hadn't realized was that the two writers have different views on the defendant and the blog will reflect this. James, I was told, is a long time, good friend of Kohring's.

Anyway, the jury was sent out and then they were brought back in, one-at-a-time to answer questions about their awareness of the case, the people involved in the case, and whether they could be fair and unbiased. The basic questions the judge asked were:
1. Where do you get your news?
2. Do you remember anything from the news about Kohring or Veco, Bill Allen, Rick Smith?
If they did, then
3. What do you know, have you formed an opinion, could you give a fair hearing. One question he asked along these lines to one or two jurors was, "If you were the defendant, would you want someone like you on the jury?"

Most of the jurors said they don't pay much attention to politics and don't know much or anything about the case. My sense this time round - I stayed for the first 29 jurors and the lunch break - was that even when they said they knew nothing, they tended not to be as oblivious as that suggested. When pressed they often knew something

Two jurors, while I was there, were dismissed. One because she had a back problem and sitting for long times caused her pain. Another, a full time student who works full time hadn't asked to be dismissed. The judge asked if this would affect his studies. He said he'd miss some midterms. The judge asked why he hadn't asked to get out. "Several people told me it wouldn't do any good." The judge said, "Well this court is a little friendlier. A two day trial would be ok, but a two week trial would really affect your studies. I'm going to excuse you."

One juror met Rick Smith, a likely witness, smoking outside Reilly's Bar several times. Another juror who works at Cal Worthington Ford, met Bill Allen there. A third juror had been at meetings of his Community Council when Vic Kohring attended. Alaska is a small place.

Jury Composition

The jury looked different from the Anderson and Kott jury pools. The most striking difference was the relative balance of genders. The Kott

Kohring Trial Day 3 - The Tapes
Kott Trial Day 3 - PM - FBI Investigation Team Re...
Kohring Trial Day 3: Technical Stuff
Do Bloggers Count as Media?
Is John Henry Browne really Eddie Haskell 50 years...
Kohring Trial Day 2 - PM Opening Arguments
Kohring Trial Day 2 - Jury Selected
Mark Twain's "The War Prayer"
Kohring Trial Day 1 - Jury Selection and the Defen...
Chicago Today - Circa 1935
Michael Clayton
New Blog to Cover Kohring Trial
Hijacked Linksys Routers
Will Putting Individuals in Prison Change the Syst...
Thoughts on the Alaska Political Corruption Trials...
Chinese Blocks on Blogspot Gone?
Before You Set Up A Blogspot Blog
Alaska Electronic Health Record Initiative
Potter Marsh Swans
Lazy Sunday - and shameless pandering pet pics
Tom Anderson Sentencing - Five Years
John Henry Browne's Response to Magitstrate's Ruli...
Kohring Trial - Prosecution's Response
A Hint of What is to Come in the Kohring Trial trial ended up with ten women and two men. But today, in the first 29 jurors questioned, 15 were men, 14 were women. There were two African Americans, a person from Bethel and one from Unalaska, if I understood right. The ages of the jurors seemed more evenly distributed than the prior two jurors - the Anderson jury being particularly young looking. And there was even one gentleman who had on a tie!

John Henry Browne

For me the big unknown was the defense attorney. When I walked in, I saw him from behind and thought he was younger until he turned and faced the gallery. He was wearing what looked like an expensive light grey suit with just a touch of green. His shirt was just barely pink. The prosecutors, in comparison, were in dark, dark grey to black suits with white shirts, except for Mr. Goeke who had a beige shirt. Even Agent Mary Beth Kepner [Thanks, Steve, I was getting tired when I did that] had on a grey suit. And Mr. Browne's hair also looked expensive - basically brown with what would have been called surfer blond streaks where I grew up near Venice Beach. OK, I know what some of you are thinking. But this is not intended as a fashion evaluation of the attorneys. I do think, however, that the dress does tell us something about people. Browne very definitely pays attention to how he looks. He also has trouble talking without moving. If his arms aren't moving, or his hands, then his fingers are moving. A few times I could even see the muscles in his back moving through his jacket. And this was just very low key questions to the jury.

His voice is radio quality deep and his intonation is precise, more articulated than most American speakers naturally talk. Perhaps he's done some acting or had other voice coaching.

When he asked questions of the jurors, or even when he didn't, he would say, "Good morning" in the same exact tone which sounded warm and interested the first time, but after hearing it repeated precisely many times, it began to sound canned. For two jurors, he said something like, "Your comments were much more extensive than the other jurors" which I thought sounded like calculated flattery, and which caused Prosecutor Botinni to object to the "unnecessary editorial comments" about juror performance. The judge concurred.

He also addressed the court twice, between jurors, with two questions that I thought seemed inappropriate. The first time he wanted to know about jurors who came from outside of Anchorage -

Installation of Rabbi Michael Oblath
Where did all those falling leaves fall?
Alaska Apple Users Group
Dialogue Alaska
In with the new (CH2M Hill) and Out with the old (...
It's Autumn, The Leaves are Falling
Who's Writing Dan Fagan's Oil Columns?
World's Northernmost Hindu Temple?
First Frost
Hair - Forty Years Later
Google Hits and Misses People Lose - Dot Com Wins
More Fall Views
October 1 - Eastern Promises
October 1, 2007 - Leadership Anchorage and Clerk's...
Crown Maker

► September (69)
► August (53)
► July (48)
► June (36)
► May (34)
► April (23)
► March (23)
► February (30)
► January (31)
► 2006 (93)

FBI - Stevens-1347

ALASKA BLOGS

Alaskan Abroad
#ライフ ウィズ CCキッズ (Life with CC) Alaska blog in Japanese
Globe of Blogs

who paid for them? (The court pays their airfare and hotel, but they don't go back for weekends the judge replied.) The second question was whether the jurors came from all of Alaska. The judge explained that they only came from the Anchorage district, which was a large district, stretching from Cordova to the Aleutians. It just seemed to me that these were curiosity items, that I would have written down and checked on later. Or, as the Outside defense attorney, I would have found out before the trial. And being an Outside attorney - the local attorney Wayne Anthony Ross was not there today - he wouldn't understand the implications of what local talk show hosts the jurors said they listened to.

Overall, his behavior reinforced the impression I've gotten in the pretrial press coverage. This is the Seattle attorney who is coming to the boondocks to try a case. If that really is the way he's thinking, I suspect he's in for a big surprise. Judge Sedwick has run very tight, but fair, trials. His excusing of the full time student today is an example of his practical understanding of what makes sense and what doesn't. The prosecution has done an overwhelming amount of work and have been extremely well prepared. The teams at the previous two trials were one local attorney and one from the DC based Public Integrity Section. These guys do their homework. The pairing for this trial is Joe Botinni, whose been in the Anchorage US Attorney Office for many years, and Edward P. Sullivan from DC. On the other hand, it does seem that the taped evidence is likely to be not as damaging as in the other cases, and that Kohring might appear to have been less calculating than Kott or Anderson in working out ways to get paid. We will see.

POSTED BY STEVE AT 5:25 PM

LABELS: JOHN HENRY BROWNE, JURY SELECTION, KOHRING TRIAL

6 COMMENTS:

s j heimel said...

Kepner

TUE OCT 23, 10:31:00 AM PDT

Tea N. Crumpet said...

Keep up the comments on the dress of these guys. I have been on juries and I watch everything that the attorneys do. Scruffy looking ones are the ones you have to be most careful of-- they are usually the sleeping cats, like McCavity. You think they aren't paying

Alaska Blog Roll

LINKS

The Next Hurrah
readytoimpeach.com
how to talk to a Global Warming Skeptic
DFM Free Interactive Radio
Anysoldier.com
Bestest Tacky Blog of All-Time

BLOGS OF FRIENDS AND ACQUAINTENCES

Ropi's Blog
The New La is Bella Vita "I Hope You Feel Just Like I Feel"
UPC Tech Blog
草原两棵树

SITE METER

7,205

LABELS

Alaska (98)
ethics/corruption (97)
Anchorage (92)
Photos (76) politics (57)
India (53)
Kott Trial (50)
people (50)
religion (44)
Knowing (43)
Thailand (39)
cross cultural (38)
blogging (37)
video (34)
community (31)
Bush/Cheney (24)

FBI - Stevens-1348

attention, yet they don't miss a thing. They try to psych each other out more than they try things on the jury. A spiffy lawyer is a man who steals the show.

I am a woman and I distrust unattractive, unfriendly women. I don't believe a thing that comes out of their mouths. They are the bullies, the former fat girls in junior high who made good and now exercise their angst on people. A woman who doesn't act like a lady has a hard time in front of me, especially if she makes the wittinesses stress out. I will fight her during deliberations without her being in the room. When it comes to lawyers, they have a better chance of winning if the women are people I want to have lunch with and the men become my alpha males. Sexist-but-true.

Gray is not a good color on a woman. Neither is black.

TUE OCT 23, 11:11:00 AM PDT

J/A/S said...

My past dealings with Kohring have always been cordial. I do know that he is not the nicest person to his staff. His tirades towards them are legendary among staff in Juneau.

TUE OCT 23, 11:56:00 AM PDT

Anonymous said...

Very Interesting,

Much more insiteful reporting than the ADN.

Thank you for your efforts, they are appreciated.

TUE OCT 23, 12:13:00 PM PDT

Greg said...

I have much more confidence in Alaskan juries recently than I have in the past. I will be watching this trial closely. Thank you for reporting the details. It is very interesting. This judge sounds like a real professional man.

TUE OCT 23, 12:25:00 PM PDT

Anonymous said...

I think that Kohring's trial being right after Kott's is helpful for him. Kott is sheer sleaze.

art/music/theater (24) Nature (23)
stevens (19)
Peace Corps (17)
Movies (16)
birds (16)
Tom Anderson Trial (15) garden (15)
Kohring Trial (13)
business (13)
environment (13)
seasons (13)
Wales/Nome (12)
books (12)
the world (11)
Laos (10) media (10)
change (9)
food (9)
Consumer (7)
Home (7)
snow (7)
travel (7)
Flowers (6)
Seattle (6)
alaska. weather (6)
Dan Fagan (5)
Kott/Weyhrauch Trial (5)
Umphang (5)
moose (5)
mushrooms (5)
John Henry Browne (4)
family (4) media. photos (4)
FBI tapes (3)
Intimate Partner Violence (3)
Juneau (3)
Veco (3)
audio (3)
mental health (3)
music (3)

FBI - Stevens-1349

I've met Vic at some fundraisers in Town and he is very knowledgeable, extremely likable. I never understood why his wife didn't join him in the Valley though-- the Valley would have loved her and really spruced up his image as being boring.

TUE OCT 23, 01:51:00 PM PDT

Post a Comment

LINKS TO THIS POST

Create a Link

Newer Post Home Older Post

Subscribe to: Post Comments (Atom) trucks (3)

weather (3)
Anchorage Airport Railroad Depot (2) cruises (2) health (2)
jury selection (2) shaggy mane (2)
teaching (2) writing (2)
AkPirg (1)
Apple User Group (1)
Biking (1)
CH2M Hill (1)
Chicago (1)
China (1)
Clive Thomas (1)
Congregation Beth Sholom (1)
Conspiracy (1)
Corrupt Bastards Club (1)
Deborah Stovern (1)
Dena'ina language (1)
Deptartment of Justice (1)
Dittman (1)
Eastern Promises (1)
Electronic Health Records (1)
Extortion (1)
Gov. Palin (1)
Interfaith Council (1)
Internet (1)
Jim MacKenzie (1)
Joe Botinni (1)
John McKay (1)
LA (1)
Linksys (1)
Mayor Begich (1)
Rabbi Oblath (1)
Rick Smith (1)
Shri Ganesh Mandir (1)
Steve Cleary (1)
Wire Fraud (1)

FBI - Stevens-1350

Yom Kippur (1)
alaska weather (1)
biiking (1) bribery (1) cat (1) charity (1)
chocolate lily (1)
closing arguments (1)
compost (1)
conflict of interest (1) dental (1) dialogue (1) dog (1)
downey woodpecker (1) drosera sundew (1)
dyson (1)
education (1) energy (1) focus group (1) fox (1) haiku (1) history (1)
improper influence (1)
jury instructions (1)
long tailed duck (1) lunar eclipse (1) oil (1) photo (1) problems (1) routers (1)
sports (1)
spruce grouse (1)
stamps (1)
steller jay (1) FBI - Stevens-1351
sunset (1) swans (1) undue gain (1)
war (1)

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 23, 2007 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

Kohring's jurors queried;
Lawyers pick from 70 to decide bribery, corruption charges

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 376 words

On one side of the courtroom Monday, former state Rep. Vic Kohring and his lawyer whispered with their trial consultant about potential jurors.

On the other side, two federal prosecutors and an FBI agent jotted notes about who they wanted to judge their public corruption case against the defendant. They got help from two other prosecutors sitting behind them.

Kohring's trial on four federal felonies including bribery and conspiracy began in U.S. District Court on Monday with prospective jurors being brought in one by one for questioning about whether they already had an opinion about the case.

The defense team includes Alan Cohen, a Seattle communications psychologist who has worked as a consultant on hundreds of trials. Cohen said he's just looking for people with an open mind.

A few news reporters and bloggers showed up, but otherwise most seats in the courtroom were empty for the dull but important first stage of the trial. Lawyers consider jury selection perhaps the most crucial part of any case that goes to trial. A powerful, opinionated juror can sway the rest of the group; a lone rogue can mean a hung jury.

The proceedings should liven up today. U.S. District Court Judge John Sedwick said that he expects to seat a jury by noon. If everything stays on track, lawyers will make their opening statements this afternoon and prosecutors will call their first witnesses.

Most jurors in the original pool of 120 who held strong opinions about Kohring or politicians in general already had been weeded out through written questionnaires.

Of 70 who came to U.S. District Court on Monday, Sedwick, and occasionally the lawyers, questioned 57. Five were excused, only one because of concerns about fairness. The rest either had medical issues or other reasons.

Those in the pool still being considered include a neighbor of prosecutor Joe Bottini, a son of former Gov. Wally Hickel, and a woman who told Sedwick that she is skeptical about wiretap evidence. The judge noted that she said she would still consider all the evidence and didn't excuse her.

Much of the case against Kohring is from secretly made recordings.

The case is expected to take about two weeks.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

FBI - Stevens-1352

LOAD-DATE: October 23, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

194A-AN-13620-M;576

GRAPHIC: JIM LAVRAKAS / Anchorage Daily News
If everything goes as planned, lawyers in former Rep. Vic Kohring's trial will make opening statements this afternoon.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1353

2 of 2 DOCUMENTS

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 23, 2007 Sunday
FINAL EDITION

Political poll bills covered by Veco;
MURKY LEGALITY: When, why, for whom determine lawfulness.

BYLINE: By KYLE HOPKINS khopkins@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1366 words

In April 2006, then-Gov. Frank Murkowski's popularity sagged among the worst of any governor in the nation, and the state waited to see if he would run for re-election.

Anchorage pollster David Dittman -- who later became Murkowski's campaign strategist -- said he came up with an idea. While everyone was mad at Murkowski, Dittman would conduct a poll asking people about good things Murkowski had done as governor.

The poll cost $20,000. Dittman said in an interview last week that, as best as he can remember, Murkowski's chief of staff told him to send the bill to Veco Corp.

Wait. Is that legal?

In the corruption trial of former House Speaker Pete Kott, a former Veco executive testified that the oil field services company routinely paid for all or parts of political polls -- usually at the request of candidates. The executive said the company paid for "upwards of 100" polls over the years.

Wait. Will any of those politicians get in trouble? The answer last week appeared to be no. At least not with the state. Not under Alaska's current campaign laws.

The trial of Kott on federal bribery and conspiracy charges has put former Veco chief Bill Allen, one of the premier campaign donors and kingmakers in Alaska history, in front of a jury under oath. Secret recordings played in court, along with the testimony of Allen and his lieutenant, ex-Veco vice president Rick Smith, exposed a series of what appear to be under-the-table campaign contributions by the company to Alaska politicians.

Just don't expect the state watchdog agency that oversees campaigns to investigate. Every poll that's been mentioned in the trial is more than a year old -- just past the statute of limitations -- said Brooke Miles, director of the Alaska Public Offices Commission.

FBI - Stevens-1354

And other polls that sound fishy could be perfectly legal.

Murkowski, for example, wasn't yet officially a candidate for governor when Veco paid for the $20,000 poll. So even though corporations are banned from giving contributions to candidates, campaign disclosure rules likely wouldn't have applied because Murkowski hadn't formally declared he was running for re-election, Miles said.

Now APOC wants some of those rules to change. The commission voted unanimously earlier this month to ask to increase the statute of limitations on campaign finance rules from one to four years.

On Friday, Sen. Bill Wielechowski, D-Anchorage, said he planned to file a bill that would do just that.

The statute of limitations was already four years in Alaska until 2003, when it was shortened at Murkowski's request. That year, Murkowski introduced legislation to reduce it from four years to two. The Legislature ended up passing a bill that cut it to one.

194A-AN-13620-M;577

ANYBODY CAN BUY A POLL

In an interview last week, Dittman said he rarely worked for Veco and someone else must have done most of the polls that Rick Smith, the former Veco executive, talked about on the witness stand.

Dittman said he performed a Veco-paid survey on behalf of Sen. John Cowdery in 2004. Last June, Veco also paid Dittman for a $3,200 poll about then-Sen. Ben Stevens, who had already filed a declaration of candidacy with the state but eventually decided not to run for re-election.

Around the same time, Dittman worked as a Murkowski strategist, helping steer the direction of the governor's underdog re-election bid. At a June 16, 2006, party celebrating the launch of Murkowski's campaign, Dittman stood on a desk and predicted the unpopular governor would pull off an upset.

About two weeks later, Veco paid for a poll in Murkowski's primary race that cost $5,200, Dittman said.

Murkowski, who was a registered candidate by then, did not report the poll as a campaign contribution.

Another Anchorage pollster who often works with Republican candidates is Marc Hellenthal. He said he's conducted "quite a few" polls paid for partly by Veco, plus a few that the company paid for entirely, over the past 30 years.

Like Dittman, Hellenthal said Veco paid him for a poll last year on Ben Stevens.

He said he told his clients, including Veco, not to share poll results.

Did he have an inkling there was a problem in Veco paying for the polls?

"I assumed they were doing it to handicap races. They have been a major, major, major source of political contributions for 25, 25-plus years," he said. "When they're playing that heavy, they really need knowledge to know how to effectively channel their funds."

Miles, the APOC director, said any company or association can pay for political polls about candidates. It becomes illegal when they give those poll results to one candidate but not another. Political action committees are allowed to donate polls to one or more candidates as long as the cost doesn't exceed campaign contribution limits and the costs are reported as donations.

Dittman and Hellenthal said Veco wasn't the only special interest paying for polls -- labor unions and other groups do it too.

Hellenthal said he knows, for example, that the state teachers union -- NEA-Alaska -- frequently polls in political races because "they share results with my clients."

NEA-Alaska president Bill Bjork said the union's political action committee paid for poll questions in about half the legislative races in last year's elections to help it decide which campaigns to get involved in. The poll results were then told to dozens of people on the political action committee.

"Our (Political Action Committee for Education) is given instructions that this is confidential information. That said, there's 52 people who know in broad strokes what the poll says," Bjork said.

Anchorage pollster Ivan Moore works for NEA and said the union conducts surveys only for its own internal purposes, not to help out politicians. "They conduct themselves to the letter of the law, and any attempt to compare their conduct to the admitted illegal behavior we have seen from Veco is frankly outrageous."

FBI - Stevens-1355

VECO PAID FOR MULTIPLE SURVEYS

Ray Metcalfe, a campaign finance watchdog and potential U.S. Senate candidate, called on APOC last week to poll all 60 Alaska lawmakers to see if Veco paid for polls in their elections.

One of the accusations against Kott is that Veco bought him a $2,750 poll, though Kott said on the witness stand that he didn't want the poll and didn't use it.

To make their case, prosecutors played a phone conversation secretly recorded between Smith and Allen talking about Kott.

"We got him a poll, 'cause his guy (Kott's campaign consultant, former Rep. Jerry Mackie) wanted him to have a poll. ... So he was getting it done, and I called Dittman and says we'll take care of it," Smith tells Allen.

In one of the wiretapped phone calls played for the jury, Smith asks Dittman about a poll he was doing for Kott. "We want to take care of that, OK?" Smith asks.

"OK," Dittman responds.

Smith then instructs him to "do what you have to, bill it though us, send it to my attention, that kind of thing." Dittman says OK.

In another call, Smith called Kott.

"Hey I just got off the phone with, with Bill (Allen). You know, we did a poll for you. ... You know that, don't you?" Smith asks.

"Yeah," Kott replies.

Later in the conversation, Smith mentions another candidate: Earl Mayo.

"We did a poll for Earl too," he says.

Mayo, who ran unsuccessfully for the state Senate against Wielechowski, said he leaves all the polling details up to Hellenthal's company. "Nobody tells me nothing and I don't ask," he said.

Hellenthal acknowledged there was talk of Veco paying for a Mayo poll, but said it never happened.

On the witness stand, Smith, the Veco executive, said poll results paid for by the company were given to candidates. In fact, he couldn't remember a Veco poll that didn't end up in the hands of a candidate or a candidate's consultant or staff member.

As for why Veco would pay for the polls in the first place?

"In most the cases, we were probably asked by candidates," Smith said.

Find Kyle Hopkins' political blog online at adn.com/alaskapolitics or call him at 257-4334.

ONLINE AUDIO: Hear recordings of Veco executives talking with each other and to former Rep. Pete Kott about political polls.

adn.com/alaskapolitics

LOAD-DATE: September 26, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

FBI - Stevens-1356

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 24, 2007 Wednesday
FINAL EDITION

Defense aims to discredit Allen;
KOHRING: Attorneys outline cases as state's latest corruption trial opens.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1320 words

Former state Rep. Vic Kohring's trial on federal public corruption charges opened in full gear Tuesday with surprises from both sides.

Kohring's lawyer, John Henry Browne of Seattle, reeled off a list of prominent Alaskans who he said Veco executives claimed to "own," including U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, U.S. Rep. Don Young and Stevens' son, former state Senate President Ben Stevens.

"All these big names," Browne said, but in the defendant's chair is Kohring -- a man, the attorney noted, who slept on his office couch in Juneau and who lives in a trailer in Wasilla.

Neither Ted nor Ben Stevens nor Young has been charged.

Prosecutor Joe Bottini offered a twist of his own. He told jurors about an idea hatched by former Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen to kill an oil tax bill with Kohring's help. Legislators were closing in on a rate far above what the North Slope oil producers wanted, he said.

Kohring is being tried in U.S. District Court on four felonies: bribery, conspiracy, extortion and attempted extortion. He is accused of conspiring with Allen and former Veco vice president Rick Smith to push through the oil industry's favored new tax. The oil field services company was sold in September to CH2M Hill.

Kohring, a Wasilla Republican, was elected seven times then resigned in July to concentrate on his defense.

A jury was picked just before noon. Half are from Anchorage, and others are from Eagle River, Palmer, Nikiski, Dillingham and a rural address on the Glenn Highway.

FULL COURTROOM

The big courtroom filled up for opening statements with defense lawyers, prosecutors, news reporters and more.

FBI - Stevens-1357

The prosecution wants jurors to see Kohring as a man who sold his public office. Allen gave Kohring handfuls of cash because he felt sorry for him but also to win his loyalty, Bottini said. Kohring had such strong anti-tax sentiments that Allen felt he had to buy him off to make sure he wouldn't go "wacko" and vote against Veco's preferred oil tax, the prosecutor said.

"This case is about the misuse of a position of public trust for personal financial gain," Bottini told jurors.

The defense is trying to portray Kohring as a guy who was broke and accepted cash as gifts from Allen, someone he thought was his friend. But he didn't sell his office and never voted for the petroleum profits tax, Browne said.

"He refused to be bought," the defense lawyer told jurors.

The votes on the oil tax legislation are complicated. There were multiple votes in the full House, often in the form of amendments to raise the tax beyond the 20 percent tax proposed by then-Gov. Frank Murkowski and then pushed hard by Veco. Kohring voted against the amendments.

194A-AN-13020-IN-578

Allen was long a powerful player in state politics and, along with other Veco executives, a generous contributor to both state and federal political candidates. Then he fell, hard. Allen and Smith pleaded guilty in May to bribery and other charges and are cooperating with the FBI in its ongoing corruption investigation.

At the recent corruption trial of former House Speaker Pete Kott, Allen testified that he had bribed Kott, Kohring and Ben Stevens. He also has admitted that Veco executives were paid illegal special bonuses in exchange for making campaign contributions.

Prosecutors told jurors that Kohring's own words will be used against him in secretly made recordings, including numerous telephone calls and a March 30, 2006, meeting in Suite 604 of Juneau's Baranof Hotel.

In that meeting, Kohring asked Allen and Smith for money to pay off a $17,000 credit card bill headed for collection. He accepted cash when both opened their wallets for him, Bottini said.

Browne told jurors that Allen will be testifying against Kohring to save his children and to get a lighter prison sentence. The defense lawyer mentioned Allen's heavy drinking and his head injury from a motorcycle crash. Yet "he is going to come in and tell you he remembers things specifically," Browne said.

On some points, Allen's testimony is all the government has, Browne said. There are no recordings, no wiretaps "no nothing."

He talked about Allen as a "multi multi multimillionaire."

"Mr. Allen thought he owned the world," Browne told jurors. Allen even bragged that "I own so and so's ass," the lawyer said, and said Allen included on that list Ted Stevens and Young along with various former and current state legislators. Some of the names have not come up publicly in the investigation before now. Browne dropped Stevens' and Young's names a number of times.

Allen will tell jurors that he made a deal with the government, Browne said, and now "the government owns his ass."

Jurors will be hearing Allen cuss a lot on the recordings, Browne said. But not Kohring. He doesn't swear, drink or smoke, his lawyer said.

When Allen and Smith opened their wallets to Kohring on March 30, 2006, it was so he could put on an Easter egg hunt for his stepdaughter at Allen's suggestion, Browne said.

Other people -- Kott, Ben Stevens, and former Rep. Tom Anderson -- got much more from Veco, Browne said. Stevens and Anderson both had consulting contracts that they didn't have to work for, he said.

"And they are giving Vic Kohring money for Easter eggs," Browne said.

Prosecutors seemed taken aback by Browne bringing up Stevens and Young but didn't say much about it afterward. The information was "out of context," Bottini said.

PROSECUTION'S CASE

Bottini walked jurors through a complex narrative in which Veco executives worked hard to get Kohring on their side.

FBI - Stevens-1358

The North Slope producers wanted "certainty" on taxes before they would commit to a natural gas pipeline that would have been very lucrative to Veco, Bottini said. Worried that Kohring might foul up the oil tax bill, Allen and Smith took him out to dinner at the Island Pub in nearby Douglas on Feb. 23, 2006, two days after the oil tax legislation was introduced, the prosecutor said. At the dinner, Allen handed Kohring $1,000 cash, Bottini told jurors.

Later, Allen's plan to kill the higher version of the tax involved getting Kohring away from the Capitol building in Juneau in the last hours of a special session in June 2006, Bottini told jurors.

As the prosecutor told the story to jurors, Allen thought the bill would die because every member of the House was supposed to be there. He asked Kohring to go for a ride and skip the floor vote. They agreed to meet at the McDonald's in Juneau.

But other people told Allen that idea wouldn't work and would just hurt Kohring politically, Bottini said. Allen couldn't reach Kohring to call it off so went ahead and met him at McDonald's where they bought "a bunch of food."

On the way back to the hotel, Bottini said, Allen pulled out $500 or $600 and handed it to Kohring. Over hamburgers in the suite, Allen told Kohring he wouldn't do anything to hurt him. In the prosecutor's telling, Kohring answered that he would have done what Allen asked anyway.

The McDonald's story came as a surprise to the defense. Browne told jurors he hadn't heard it before.

Browne called Kohring -- who's 6 foot 61/2 inches -- "a gentle giant" and told jurors they'll be hearing from him later in the trial.

"He's like Andy Griffith," Browne told reporters after court ended for the day, referring to the television star who played the folksy and honest sheriff of fictional Mayberry, N.C.

Kohring is the third state legislator to be tried in the corruption investigation. Anderson was sentenced to five years in prison last week on bribery and other charges involving a scheme with a private prison company. Kott was convicted in September of four felonies including bribery. Former state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch is awaiting trial.

Kohring's trial continues today in federal court.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

ONLINE: Read the charges against Vic Kohring and find more on the corruption investigation.

adn.com/fbi

LOAD-DATE: October 24, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Kohring

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1359

<<Back

FBI agents testify in Kohring trial

More than a half dozen FBI agents took the stand today in the government's corruption trial against Kohring. (Rich Jordan/KTUU-TV)

Kohring is just one of the people the FBI caught on tape talking with Bill Allen and Rick Smith. (Rich Jordan/KTUU-TV)

The FBI obtained surveillance video from Suite 604 of the Baranof Hotel in Juneau. (KTUU-TV)

The FBI says in a recording last year, Kohring is seen taking two handfuls of cash from Allen. (Rich Jordan/KTUU-TV)

by Jill Burke
Wednesday, Oct. 24, 2007

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- The FBI began their surveillance of VECO Corp. executives by monitoring the cell phone calls of Rick Smith, a former company vice president.

Next, the federal government began monitoring Bill Allen, the company's founder and former chief executive.

Eventually, they planted a bug in suite 604 of the Westmark Baranof Hotel in Juneau.

And during the early months of 2006, Vic Kohring is just one of the people the feds caught on tape talking with Allen and Smith, both of whom have since been convicted of corrupting public officials.

More than a half dozen FBI agents stationed around the country took the stand today in the government's corruption trial against Kohring.

The agents were brought to Alaska during the spring 2006 legislative session to monitor the electronic surveillance FBI agents here had put in place in its search for political corruption.

Prosecutors contend the surveillance shows Kohring is among the legislators Allen and Smith bribed.

With the FBI secretly listening in, Kohring made repeated calls and visits to Allen and Smith over a seven month period.

In the calls, Kohring most times thanks the men for their continued support and indicates his door is always open should they ever need help.

Allen and Smith are intently focused on their mission: getting then Gov. Frank Murkowski's favored version of the Petroleum Profits Tax passed.

In many of his calls, Kohring pledges his support to the cause.

Kohring sat and watched during the trial as prosecutors played surveillance video captured from suite 604 of the Baranof Hotel.

In one clip, dated Mar. 4, 2006, Allen tells Smith he gave Kohring $1,000 the night before during dinner.

FBI - Stevens-1360

194-AN-13620-M;579

Kohring's attorney, John Henry Browne, says the cash exchange was nothing more than a legal gift. (Rich Jordan/KTUU-TV)

In a separate recording later that month published to jurors but not yet released to Channel 2 News, Kohring joins Allen and Smith in the infamous hotel suite.

In it, he seeks help dealing with a $17,000 credit card debt, and after the conversation switches to Kohring's family plans for the Easter holiday, Kohring can be seen taking two handfuls of cash from Allen.

As the 22 minute visit wraps up, Kohring thanks the two men, and then asks: "What can I do at this point to help you guys? Anything?"

"Whatever you, you know," Allen replies.

Kohring then answers his own questions by adding: "Just keep lobbying my colleagues for the governor's plan, right?"

In opening statements, Kohring's attorney, John Henry Browne, said that cash exchange was nothing more than a perfectly legal gift from Allen, who genuinely considered Kohring a friend.

Browne also said Allen knew Kohring struggled financially, and further, Allen wanted Kohring's family to have an "extra special Easter holiday."

The defense argued in opening statements that the pre-Easter cash handout was not illegal; rather, it was merely a gift from one good friend to another.

Today Browne also elicited testimony from the chief clerk of the House of Representatives that Kohring never voted for any of the final versions of PPT, while other lawmakers, including two that have already been convicted on corruption charges, did.

Prosecutors allege that, while Kohring may not have voted on the final version, he did help by advocating for favorable amendments to be incorporated into the bill and also by lobbying other members of the Legislature to align themselves with the version of the PPT bill the governor had negotiated with the oil producers.

Contact Jill Burke at jburke@ktuu.com

WorldNow

All content © Copyright 2000 - 2007 WorldNow and KTUU. All Rights Reserved.
For more information on this site, please read our Privacy Policy and Terms of Service.

FBI - Stevens-1361

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Video recordings show former lawmaker taking cash

By DAN JOLING, Associated Press Writer
(Published: October 24, 2007)

ANCHORAGE, Alaska (AP) - Jurors in the corruption trial of former Alaska state Rep. Vic Kohring on Wednesday watched a video recording of the veteran lawmaker taking money from an executive for an oil field services company.

Now they have to decide if it was a bribe.

In a secret recording made by the FBI on March 30, 2006, Kohring is seen meeting with executives of VECO Corp. in a Juneau hotel room rented by the company. Kohring requested the meeting with CEO Bill Allen and Rick Smith, the company's vice president for government affairs, to seek a loan or a job to pay off a $17,000 credit card bill he ran up paying for neck surgery at the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota.

As the meeting winds down, Kohring tells the men he's getting ready to visit his wife and stepdaughter in Oregon, and it would be the first time he's been able to spend Easter with the girl because legislative business usually kept him in Juneau.

The mention of the holiday and the child sent Allen reaching for his wallet. He told Kohring he used to hide money and candy in plastic eggs for his children. After turning to Smith, to ask, "Have you got any hundreds?" he hands bills over to Kohring.

"Let her find the egg," he said in the recording.

The cash Allen handed over as well as the solicitation for the loan are a major part of the federal case against Kohring, elected seven times from Wasilla, a city about an hour north of Anchorage.

Prosecutors contend he demanded and accepted at least $2,600 from the VECO officials in exchange for support on legislation needed before major petroleum producers would agree to construct a multibillion dollar natural gas pipeline from Alaska's North Slope to Lower 48 states.

VECO built, repaired and maintained facilities for Alaska's three major oil companies, ExxonMobil, BP and ConocoPhillips, the companies with whom former Gov. Frank Murkowski was negotiating for construction of a natural gas pipeline. VECO would have been in line for hundreds of millions of dollars in contracts if a natural gas pipeline was built or if oil production expanded because of a revised Alaska production tax.

Kohring contends the money he received from Allen was a gift between friends. Kohring's wife and daughter are from Russia. A woman Allen once had a relationship with also was from Russia and also had a daughter, according to Kohring.

Kohring said he sought the loan because his credit card company had turned his debt over to a collection agency that was demanding payment in full. Kohring would have sought a bank loan, he said on the recording, but his credit was shot. He also had not been able to sell a house he owned,

he said.

The debt would likely become a campaign liability if he ended up in court, he told Allen and Smith.

The executives were recorded telling Kohring it would also be a campaign liability if Allen co-signed for a bank loan with the legislator. Allen flatly refused to have VECO itself make the loan.

Kohring repeatedly stressed he wanted assistance to be within the law.

"I want to do everything above board, of course ... Please don't feel like I'm abusing my relationship with you guys," he said.

He inquired about whether he could earn the money by doing work for VECO. He insisted it would have to be legitimate work.

"I don't want any freebies from you," Kohring said.

The matter ended with Allen and Smith telling Kohring they would figure something out and get back to him - "where it won't come back and bite me and bite your ass," Allen said.

There has been no indication from prosecutors that a loan or a payment was ever made by VECO.

In testimony Wednesday morning, Allen makes a passing reference to giving other money to Kohring.

"I gave him a thousand," Allen told Smith in a conversation March 4, 2006 in the same hotel room.

Allen and Smith pleaded guilty in May to bribing Alaska lawmakers and are cooperating with federal prosecutors.

During the trial last month of former state Rep. Pete Kott, R-Eagle River, Allen testified he made illegal payments to Kohring, Kott and former state Senate President Ben Stevens, the son of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska. Allen also testified he sent VECO employees to work on the renovation of the elder Stevens' home in Girdwood.

Ted Stevens has said he paid every bill he received and has denied any wrongdoing. Neither Ted Stevens nor Ben Stevens have been charged.

The March 4, 2006, comment by Allen was part of an animated discussion in which he and Smith state the urgency of the Alaska Legislature passing a revised oil tax. That measure was a focus of the 2006 legislative session and was considered a gateway bill that would lead to construction the natural gas pipeline stretching from Alaska's North Slope to customers in the Midwest.

Smith said on the recording that he and Allen might have to "get dirty" to make sure the bill passed. In profanity-laced remarks, Allen says, "We have to produce" and, "Our clients have to know what we're doing."

Prosecutors Wednesday also played more than a dozen phone calls between Kohring and Smith, all initiated by Kohring, between January and August 2006.

Kohring was recorded thanking VECO executives for their support. Kohring repeatedly told Smith he was willing to lobby for their mutual cause, the natural gas pipeline, and that that he could provide company officials with useful information.

Print Page Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1364

NewsBank inc. America's Newspapers

Paper: Anchorage Daily News (AK)
Title: Video shows Kohring taking cash -
CORRUPTION TRIAL: Ex-legislator told Veco executives that he had a $17,000 credit card debt.
Date: October 25, 2007

Jurors hearing the public corruption case against former state Rep. Vic Kohring on Wednesday watched a video secretly made last spring that showed two executives with Veco Corp. open their wallets and hand him cash.

On the big screen in the federal courtroom, Kohring was clearly visible front and center accepting the money. Then-Veco chief executive Bill Allen and vice president Rick Smith were off to the side. Both later resigned, and Veco as a corporation no longer exists.

"Well, thank you very much," Kohring told them in the March 30, 2006, video. He shook Allen's hand and slipped the money into his jacket pocket.

Prosecutors presented the heart of their case Wednesday: 25 recordings from telephone wiretaps and a bug planted in Suite 604 of Juneau's Baranof Hotel.

In many of the calls, Kohring calls Smith on his cell phone and does most of the talking. He asks what he can do for Veco. He gives mini-political speeches about how conservative and anti-tax he is. He rants at times about the "damn media."

And he asks Smith and sometimes Allen for things: help with a Veco internship for his nephew, a loaner truck, a campaign fundraiser, a way to pay off a $17,000 credit card debt from surgery.

Kohring is being tried on four federal felonies including bribery and conspiracy. Prosecutors accuse him of conspiring with Smith and Allen to push Veco's interests on a new oil tax. Kohring, a Republican from Wasilla, resigned in July during his seventh term.

The defense contends that Kohring simply accepted gifts from his friends and never took bribes.

The recording from March 30, 2006, is remarkable on several levels.

The day before, Kohring called Smith. He said he was stressed and that people were pulling his arm in about "10 different directions." The pace of the legislative session had picked up. He was staying up until 2, 3 a.m. and was getting burned out.

He asked to talk to Smith and Allen about "a relatively serious matter" not involving Veco or the oil industry but something important to him.

Around midafternoon on March 30, Kohring went to Suite 604 to tell Smith and Allen his troubles.

He was in a financial hole that could hurt him politically, he told them on the video. He had had back surgery at the Mayo Clinic and maxxed out several credit cards to cover the bill. Kohring said later, outside of court, that he had spinal fusion surgery in 2002.

FBI - Stevens-1365

He still owed $17,000 on one card, he told Smith and Allen. He had been paying $500 a month, but the debt went to a collection agency that had demanded payment in full. He was worried his financial situation would become public.

He asked them for advice and threw out some ideas. Maybe he could get paid for some sort of project. He wanted real work, not a "freebie," he said. Maybe they could refer him to somebody. Maybe give him a "modest loan."

He told Smith and Allen that he didn't want them to feel like he was applying pressure. He said on the video he wanted everything to be "completely above board."

"I am not coming to the well," Kohring told them. Still, he said that he was living paycheck to paycheck. He couldn't qualify for a loan. He was trying to sell his ranch house in Wasilla, but it was only appraised at $110,000 and wasn't attracting a buyer.

194A-AN-13620-M;581

Allen mused about it. What if he was a cosigner on a loan? Kohring would have to be careful about that, Allen said.

Kohring agreed. He said he didn't want to raise any red flags.

Didn't he have state health insurance? Allen asked. Kohring said he did, but the Mayo Clinic wasn't on the preferred provider list.

Allen said he'd think about Koh-ring's request.

One of the charges against Kohring is attempted extortion, stemming from that request for help with the debt.

Kohring's lawyer, John Henry Browne, has said the issue didn't amount to anything. Smith and Allen didn't seem interested so Kohring dropped it, Browne told jurors in his opening statement.

In the same meeting, Kohring mentions that he's about to spend his first Easter with his stepdaughter. His wife and daughter live in Beaverton, Ore. Usually he can't get away from the Legislature then, he said.

Allen suggested Kohring put money in plastic Easter eggs. Allen asked Smith if he had any hundreds. Smith is seen on the video standing up, taking out his wallet and peeling off some bills, at least $100, according to prosecutors. Allen handed the cash to Kohring.

Kohring thanked them.

He said he had just sent his stepdaughter a card and some money for her Girl Scout uniform.

Allen said he wanted to help on her uniform and pulled out some more bills, totaling $500 to $1,000, prosecutors say. Kohring thanked them again and shook Allen's hand.

In the courtroom as the scene played, some of the jurors scribbled notes. All seemed glued to the screen.

"What can I do at this point to help you guys? Anything?" Kohring asked on the video.

Allen, who has a head injury from a motorcycle wreck, stumbled a bit. Kohring answered his own question.

"Just keep lobbying my colleagues for the governor's plan, right?" Kohring said.

He then discussed a number of specific legislators he could talk to. The House Finance Committee members were particularly important. Kohring reeled off most of their names.

He said he could find out where they stood then "politely and gently try to influence them."

Kohring also told Allen that he had passed along to his wife that Allen liked their gift of Russian vodka. Kohring, portrayed by his attorney as a man who doesn't drink, swear or smoke, said on the recording that he enjoyed vodka, too. He said it helped him escape the "woes of the world."

Kohring's wife is Russian and outside of court Kohring explained that they may share a drink as part of her culture. He's not seen drinking on any of the recordings.

FBI - Stevens-1366

Kohring discussed an internship at Veco for his nephew -- a 17-year-old high school basketball star -- in various calls to Smith.

The defense says that Smith initially brought it up and that the nephew was well-qualified. But it's clear that Kohring was relying on Smith to guide him and to secure the position.

Kohring dropped off his nephew's resume at the Baronof front desk and phoned Smith to let him know. His nephew came to visit him in Juneau, and Kohring mentioned to Smith in a recorded call that he had a "bunch of lobbyists all lined up to buy my nephew dinner."

In an April 20, 2006, phone call, Smith told Kohring that his nephew had landed the internship.

"Wow! Outstanding," Kohring responds. "Thank you so very much for arranging that, Rick."

Kohring asked Smith to let him know what he could do "on the legislative end of things."

"You got it, partner," Smith answered.

In a call to Smith on July 1, 2006, Kohring passed along how much his nephew appreciated the job. Veco had sweetened the pot by giving him some overtime at $24 an hour. The nephew ultimately ended up with $3,000, Kohring told Smith at summer's end.

On July 23, 2006, as the campaign season geared up, Kohring called Smith again.

Would it be too forward to ask him to set up a luncheon fundraiser at the Petroleum Club in Anchorage? Kohring asked. No problem, Smith answered.

Kohring later reported back that the fundraiser brought in $4,000.

As to the pickup truck, Kohring called Smith a couple of times to ask for a loaner he could use during his campaign. His own vehicle wasn't reliable, he said in recorded calls.

The last call was on Aug. 30, 2006. Smith said he'd get back to him.

The next day, FBI agents raided offices of six legislators, including Kohring's.

The trial continues today. Smith may be on the stand first thing.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

LATEST FROM TRIAL: We'll be blogging updates from the Kohring trial all day today; catch up by reading Wednesday's dispatches.

adn.com/alaskapolitics

AUDIO: Listen to Tuesday's opening statements.

adn.com

Find more at adn.com

Find additional material on adn.com as the case unfolds:

* Live blogging from the courthouse. Reporter Kyle Hopkins will be in the trial every day filing multiple dispatches to our politics blog: adn.com/alaskapolitics.

* Audio testimony. Unlike in state court, cameras or recorders aren't allowed in federal courtrooms. Audio recordings of each day's court proceedings are produced by the court and made available to the public, usually the following day. We usually have them in hand each afternoon. We'll be finding interesting clips and expect to be posting them by late afternoon or early evening each day. Today we have the complete audio from Tuesday's opening statements.

* FBI audio and video. The phone wiretaps and hotel-suite surveillance video recordings will be available eventually, as they were in the Kott trial, but not the next day. They're being played in court but are generally difficult to hear clearly. We will post these when the easier-to-understand original-source recordings are made available -- we're hoping within the next several days.

* Background on the case. Go to adn.com/fbi for past stories, an overview of the corruption investigation, previous audio and video.

-- David Hulen, state/local news editor

FBI - Stevens-1367

dhulen@adn.com

Caption:

Kohring
Caption:
Graphic 1: Vic Kohring CMYK_102507.eps

Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

Author: LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com Staff
Section: Main
Page: A1
Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

FBI - Stevens-1368

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 25, 2007 Thursday
FINAL EDITION

APOC says it will not back down;
POLLS INVESTIGATION: Justice Department asks that agency stay out of probe.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 632 words

DATELINE: JUNEAU -

The Alaska Public Offices Commission plans to keep investigating polls that Veco Corp. bought for state politicians. That's despite the U.S. Department of Justice asking state prosecutors to stay out of the corruption probe.

The commissioners who direct APOC said the state campaign watchdog agency should push on at least until hearing itself from the Justice Department. APOC is having some trouble, though, getting polling firms to cooperate in its investigation.

"We certainly have not gotten all the polling information that we should have," said Jeff Berliner, investigator for the public offices commission.

Former Veco executive Rick Smith acknowledged in the recent corruption trial of former state Rep. Pete Kott that the company paid for "upwards of 100 polls" over the years. It's not clear how many of those represent illegal corporate campaign contributions. Smith, who has pleaded guilty to bribing state legislators and is cooperating with the FBI, has refused to provide information to APOC.

The federal Justice Department wrote state Attorney General Talis Colberg on Oct. 12 saying a state investigation into the political polls could compromise aspects of the broad, ongoing federal investigation of corruption in Alaska politics. Gov. Sarah Palin said state prosecutors would back off as a result. .

But the Alaska Public Offices Commission is a semi-independent agency and the governor considers it inappropriate to say what it can investigate. State lawyers suggested APOC should contact the Justice Department, according to Brooke Miles, public offices commission executive director.

UNANSWERED CALLS

Miles said APOC staff has attempted without success to reach William Welch, chief of the public integrity section at the department.

"I have personally left two messages on Mr. Welch's voice mail," Miles said at a Wednesday APOC meeting.

Miles said she would keep trying to get in touch.

"We go ahead until they tell us no," said Claire Hall, an APOC commissioner from Fairbanks.

FBI - Stevens-1369

A Justice Department spokeswoman had no immediate comment on the matter Wednesday.

APOC investigator Berliner updated the commissioners Wednesday on how the polling investigation is going so far. He did not give any specifics, since it's ongoing.

194A-AN-13620-M;582

But Berliner said he's been contacting polling firms, including a couple from out of state, and believes there's a lot more information than pollsters are willing to provide.

Three major polling firms in Alaska, Dittman Research Corp., Hellenthal and Associates, and Ivan Moore Research, all told the Daily News they've completely cooperated in the public offices commission investigation.

COMPELLING COOPERATION

David Dittman and Marc Hellenthal have acknowledged that Veco executives paid them to do polls. Known recipients of Veco polls include convicted former state Rep. Pete Kott, then-Gov. Frank Murkowski, state Sen. John Cowdery and former state Sen. Ben Stevens.

Moore said Veco has never paid him to do a poll and he told that to the commission.

"If APOC hasn't been receiving the level of cooperation they anticipated it doesn't surprise me at all," he said. "Because people are accustomed to the idea of thumbing their nose at APOC and their requests. ... Their teeth aren't sharp enough."

APOC can impose civil fines and refer matters to the attorney general's office for possible criminal prosecution. But the agency has been criticized for not doing enough about the corruption in Alaska politics.

APOC commissioners said they should look into legal methods to compel people to cooperate in their investigation.

"Actually our next move is issuing subpoenas on several different entities," said Miles, the executive director.

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him in Juneau at 1-907-586-1531.

LOAD-DATE: October 25, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1370

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 25, 2007 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

Kott's fate is in hands of the jury;
IN CLOSING: Defense says Allen and Smith cannot be trusted; prosecutor says the evidence is "overwhelming."

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER and SEAN COCKERHAM Anchorage Daily News

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1375 words

Lawyers laid out two opposite views of former state Rep. Pete Kott Monday during their closing arguments to jurors in his federal public corruption trial: hardworking with a drinking problem or greedy and looking out for himself.

Defense lawyer Jim Wendt told jurors to think of Kott as a legislator who pushed hard for oil development and got himself into trouble by spouting off when he drank too much.

He especially puffed himself up to his friends from Veco Corp. in Suite 604 of Juneau's Baranof Hotel, Wendt said. The nickname for the suite that served as Veco's headquarters during the Legislature was Animal House, Wendt reminded jurors.

"I'll tell you what it was. It was a place for boasting and banter, fueled by alcohol," Wendt told jurors in U.S. District Court. "The government is resting its case on the Animal House as if what goes on there is somehow reliable."

Assistant U.S. Attorney James Goeke told jurors that Kott took bribes from Veco and was guilty of putting his own self-interest before that of his constituents. Kott is charged with four felonies: conspiracy, extortion, bribery and honest services wire fraud.

The prosecutor said the case was unusual because jurors were able to watch and listen as the alleged crimes took place.

"Through the hours and hours of electronic surveillance that you've heard in this courtroom over the past few weeks, you the members of the jury have been able to sit in a ringside seat," Goeke told jurors.

No one knew during 2005 and 2006 that the FBI had put a bug in Suite 604 and wiretaps on phones of Veco executives.

The defense reminded jurors that the government focused on only the worst out of hundreds of hours of video recordings and thousands of intercepted phone calls. Prosecutors took "little snippets" out of context, Wendt said.

FBI - Stevens-1371

But Goeke told jurors "the evidence in this case is overwhelming."

The courtroom was nearly full of FBI agents, other defense lawyers, legislators and aides, reporters and Kott's friends and family. The case went to the jury around 12:30 p.m. on the trial's 14th day.

Kott is a former Republican House speaker from Eagle River who served 14 years in the Legislature.

Bill Allen, former Veco chief executive, and Rick Smith, former Veco vice president, have pleaded guilty and were key witnesses for the prosecution, testifying that they bribed Kott.

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick told jurors that Allen and Smith's guilty pleas in themselves are not evidence that Kott did anything wrong. In fact, the testimony of both Allen and Smith should be considered with more caution than that of other witnesses, he told them.

194A-AN-13620-M; 583

Wendt told jurors that Smith and Allen will say whatever the government wants to save themselves. Neither has been sentenced.

The stakes in the oil tax debate were high. The Murkowski administration was pushing a new state oil tax, a first step toward a natural gas pipeline that could have been worth millions to Veco in construction contracts. Kott is accused of pushing a 20 percent tax favored by North Slope oil producers in exchange for money, a political poll and Veco's promise of a job.

LAWYERS SUMMARIZE THE EVIDENCE

Goeke walked jurors through carefully picked highlights from nearly five dozen audio and video recordings played during the trial.

In a Sept. 26, 2005, call between Kott and Smith, the legislator said he needed a job. "You got a job. Get us a pipeline," Smith responded.

Later, the prosecution played a series of video recordings from the night of May 7 and into the early morning of May 8, just after key votes on the oil tax. "I'd vote for a 30 percent tax if it wasn't for this guy here," Kott says in one, pointing to Allen.

And in a video secretly recorded on June 1, 2006, Allen counts out what he later testified was $1,000 in cash for Kott. In another video from the same night, Allen asked Kott what he wanted to be. After joking about passing out beach towels in Barbados, where Veco was building a prison, Kott said he wanted to be a lobbyist. "Well, you will be," Allen tells him.

Allen later testified that Kott's job prospects with Veco all depended on him doing the right thing on the oil tax, Goeke reminded jurors.

During his closing, Wendt was frustrated at times by technical difficulties but forged ahead, focusing on a timeline displayed for jurors that included key votes.

Wendt emphasized that it was the defense, not the prosecution, who brought in two legislators to explain their dealings with Kott, which he said was better than relying on "some grainy tape" because they know what really happened.

The wire fraud charge, Wendt pointed out, is based on a single telephone conversation in which Kott assures Smith "you know where my allegiance is."

"Where is the plan or scheme in that telephone conversation?" Wendt asked.

Kott just wanted a gas pipeline, the same as Veco, but there was no criminal conspiracy, no intent to extort money from Allen or Veco, he said.

Others got so much more from Veco than Kott, Wendt said. Former Senate President Ben Stevens got hundreds of thousands of dollars in consulting work. U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens had his whole house redone with the help of Veco workers. Former Rep. Tom Anderson had Veco contracts too.

But Kott was working on his hands and knees doing flooring, Wendt said.

"Pete Kott never got anything," he said.

The last word came from prosecutor Nicholas Marsh, from the U.S. Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, D.C.

He told jurors that it made no sense to think that Kott got nothing from Veco. He received $1,000 in cash, a check for $7,993, a political poll that cost $2,750 and the promise of a job, all from Veco, Marsh said.

Kott's defense, Marsh said, appears to be that what he said in 11 months of secretly made recordings are "either lies or they are not true or the rantings of an alcoholic."

Kott, Marsh told jurors, "tried to snooker you."

Jurors finished deliberations for the day at 4:30 p.m. They return today.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390. Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call 257-4344.

INSIDE

THE CLOSING ARGUMENTS: A look at the key points made by the defense and the prosecution.

Back Page

VERDICT: Read about it first at adn.com or sign up to have it sent directly to your inbox at adn.com/newsletters.

ONLINE AUDIO: Hear closing statements along with other exhibits from the trial at

adn.com/fbi

Kott trial closing arguments at a glance

Prosecution

KOTT'S OWN WORDS: Assistant U.S. Attorney James Goeke replayed secretly made audio and video recordings. They included Kott talking to Veco executives about a possible job and asking Veco chief Bill Allen for instructions on the eve of the legislative session.

VECO TESTIMONY: Goeke said the testimony of Allen and former Veco executive Rick Smith, who are cooperating with the prosecution, matches what jurors heard on those FBI recordings.

OUTRAGE: Goeke hammered on the argument that Kott sold out the public trust by turning to Veco, instead of his Eagle River constituents, for direction on how to vote and act.

KOTT'S CREDIBILITY: Prosecutor Nicholas Marsh said Kott's explanations for his words and deeds made no sense. He "tried to snooker you," Marsh told the jury.

Defense

OUT OF CONTEXT. Kott's attorney, Jim Wendt, argued prosecutors plucked the worst statements out of hundreds of hours of video and thousands of intercepted phone conversation.

ANIMAL HOUSE. Wendt argued that Veco's Suite 604 at the Baranof Hotel in Juneau was known as the "Animal House," and was a "place for boasting and banter fueled by alcohol." Wendt said Kott loved and admired Veco head Allen and was just trying to impress him after drinking by saying things that weren't true.

HARD WORKER. The defense painted Kott as a hard-working man who did flooring jobs and didn't ask for handouts. He also worked hard trying to get a gas pipeline for Alaska, Wendt said.

LEGISLATORS' TESTIMONY. Wendt noted that Rep. Gabrielle LeDoux and ex-House Minority Leader Ethan Berkowitz testified that, despite what Kott told Veco executives, Kott didn't manipulate them to try and get the oil tax rate Veco wanted.

Compiled by Daily News reporters Sean Cockerham and Lisa Demer

FBI - Stevens-1373

LOAD-DATE: September 26, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 26, 2007 Wednesday
FINAL EDITION

Kott found guilty;
Ex-legislator's testimony didn't ring true, jurors say

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER and SEAN COCKERHAM Anchorage Daily News

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 2190 words

Former state Rep. Pete Kott, a 14-year veteran of the Legislature and one-time House speaker, was convicted Tuesday by a federal jury of conspiring with Veco Corp. executives to push an oil tax favored by industry.

Jurors convicted the Eagle River Republican of conspiracy, bribery and extortion. They acquitted him of a fourth felony charge, wire fraud, that was based on a single cell phone conversation that went across state lines.

As the verdicts were read around 3 p.m. on the trial's 15th day, Kott sat silent and still between his defense lawyers.

He left the courtroom looking tired and drawn. He had little to say about the verdict.

"I'm disappointed," Kott said.

He didn't want to talk about what's next for him or the specifics of how he thought his corruption trial went. "It came," he sighed. "It went."

Kott walked out of the Federal Building with his girlfriend, Debora Stovern, on one arm, daughter Pamela on the other and lawyer Jim Wendt just ahead. They faced a barrage of television cameras and reporters asking questions that Kott wouldn't answer.

Wendt said Kott almost surely would appeal. He and his co-counsel, Meg Simonian, hadn't worked out all the potential grounds but he suggested the instructions the judge gave the jury could be one factor.

"The jury instructions were a little ambiguous regarding the bribery and extortion charges," Wendt said.

Then Kott's group piled into a Dodge truck and drove away.

FBI - Stevens-1374

'DEAL-MAKER,' PROSECUTORS SAID

During the trial, prosecutors Nicholas Marsh and James Goeke portrayed Kott as a deal-maker who plotted with former Veco executives Bill Allen and Rick Smith to secure the oil tax rate sought by North Slope oil producers during the 2006 regular session and special sessions that summer. They played nearly five dozen secretly made recordings during the trial.

The defense painted Kott as a hard worker with a drinking problem, an Air Force veteran, a man who got on his hands and knees laying hardwood floors but who didn't ask his wealthy friends at Veco for handouts.

This is the second victory for prosecutors in the ongoing public corruption investigation, and the first involving oil field services contractor Veco. The company was sold to Denver-based CH2M Hill just before the trial.

Deliberations began at 12:30 p.m. Monday. Most of the jurors seemed "gung-ho" and ready to convict Kott that same day on at least a couple of charges, said Donna Riley, juror No. 1. She wanted to slow things down and sent the judge a note first thing Tuesday saying she had felt pressured the day before.

194A-AN-13620-M; 584

"And I'm like, man, you guys need to go over it," Riley said after the verdict. "I need to understand. This is someone's life, you know? I need to make sure I understand everything about it to have a clear conscience."

Jurors were talking over each other on Monday when they finally got a chance to say what they thought after more than two weeks of trial, said juror Susan Pollard. By Tuesday morning, the jurors went out of their way to "cool it" and make sure Riley was included, juror Dale Hartzler said.

Riley, a custodial worker at Stevens International Airport, said she related to Kott since both do physical labor. She was moved, too, by a speech he gave on the witness stand.

"It kind of got to me when he said he was embarrassed and felt bad ... for his family," Riley said.

The defense was "trying for any emotional leverage they could get," Pollard said.

In the end, what struck Riley as particularly important: the testimony and recordings about the promise of a job to Kott and the financial rewards, especially the inflated flooring invoice through which Veco executives funneled $7,993 to Kott.

She said she went home Monday night and prayed on what to do. By Tuesday, the situation in the jury room was calmer, she said. Their decision was the right one, she said.

KOTT NOT CREDIBLE

Pollard, a former contract manager for the federal government, said it was Kott's own testimony on the stand that left the biggest mark.

Kott tried to explain to jurors that he just was telling Allen and Smith what they wanted to hear when he told them he'd push the tax rate they wanted.

Kott was saying 'I'll lie to my friends but I do have my principles,' " Pollard said. "How can you believe anything he says after that?"

As to the inflated flooring invoice, she said she was very skeptical of the defense story that the money was for future flooring work. Why were invoices created by Stovern, Kott's girlfriend, bookkeeper and a defense witness, after the fact? Why did none mention future flooring work?

Juror Hartzler said his vote to convict was a no-brainer given the evidence. Kott and his defense team couldn't blunt the FBI audio and video, he said.

The defense didn't ring true, said Hartzler, a systems analyst for Alaska Communications Systems. He said the whole tenor of the defense was just "flying in the face of the intercepts" recorded by the FBI.

He gave the example of Kott's son, who was also his campaign manager, claiming on the witness stand that the campaign didn't use political polls. The defense was trying to refute the charge that Kott received a poll illegally paid for by Veco.

Hartzler said the defense claim was contradicted by a recording of Kott talking about the poll with a Veco executive, as well as poll questions the FBI found on a computer device at Kott's residence.

FBI - Stevens-1375

As for the drinking, Kott didn't seem drunk in all of the late night recordings. Hartzler pointed to one in which Kott told Veco chief Allen that he wanted to be a lobbyist. It just seemed like a real, casual conversation, he said.

The evidence on the wire fraud charge just was too thin to support a conviction, Pollard said. It was based on a March 10, 2006, cell phone call that Kott made from Washington, D.C., to Smith. Kott, who was having drinks with a Marathon Oil lobbyist, told Smith he wanted to "take care of Marathon in this deal." But Smith said that Marathon had dumped Veco as a maintenance contractor. "You know where my allegiance is," Kott told Smith.

SENTENCING IN DECEMBER

The verdicts come just before next month's special session on oil taxes called by Gov. Sarah Palin. "I am more committed than ever to seeking a fair, untainted solution to our petroleum tax system," the governor said in a written statement.

The evidence was compelling, said state Sen. Fred Dyson, R-Eagle River, who helped the FBI in its investigation and sat in on much of the trial. The recordings of people laughing and swearing about "jerking the public process around" generate a gut level impact.

Kott is likely facing more than four years in prison, according to what prosecutors have estimated under sentencing guidelines. But he could be looking at even more time, as much as 61/2 years, if the judge determines he did not testify truthfully and obstructed justice, said prosecutor Joe Bottini, who didn't try the case but sat in on much of it. He is part of a four-person team of federal prosecutors handling Alaska public corruption cases.

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick set sentencing for Dec. 7.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390. Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call 257-4344.

ONLINE AUDIO AND VIDEO: Listen to closing arguments and secret FBI recordings and watch videos admitted as evidence in the trial.

adn.com/fbi

VERDICTS

Guilty

Conspiracy

Bribery

Extortion

Not guilty

Wire fraud

What was Kott accused of?

Being part of a conspiracy, with Veco Corp. officials and other lawmakers, to push passage of an industry-friendly oil profits tax in 2006. Among the benefits prosecutors say he received: $1,000 cash, a check for $7,993, the promise of a job as lobbyist and an illegal political poll.

What's the sentence?

Sentencing will be Dec. 7. Prosecutors estimate Kott faces 51 to 63 months in prison -- and up to 78 months if judge concludes Kott testified untruthfully to the point of obstructing justice.

WHAT'S NEXT?

Sentencing and other trials are upcoming:

FBI - Stevens-1376

* Ex-Rep. Tom Anderson faces sentencing Oct. 15. He was found guilty in July of bribery, conspiracy and other counts.

* Former Rep. Vic Kohring faces trial on Oct. 22 on bribery, conspiracy and extortion charges.

* Former Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch awaits trial. He was initially scheduled to stand trial with Kott. The cases were split shortly before Kott's trial began.

CONVICTED

Pete Kott becomes the fifth lobbyist or public official to be found guilty by a jury or to plead guilty in the corruption investigation. Read more on the investigation, Back Page

CONVICTED IN THE CORRUPTION SCANDAL

TOM ANDERSON

Former Republican state representative from East Anchorage was convicted July 9 on bribery and other charges for taking payoffs from a consultant for a private prison company. Worked as a consultant for Veco, although none of the charges against him concerned the company. Sentencing Oct. 15.

BILL BOBRICK

Longtime lobbyist at the city level and one-time head of the Alaska Democratic Party, he pleaded guilty in May to conspiracy for bribing Anderson while working for a private prison company. (The company was unaware.) He testified against Anderson and is awaiting sentencing.

BILL ALLEN

Longtime Veco CEO, pleaded guilty in May to bribery and conspiracy for his dealings with four legislators. Admitted paying a "bonus" in company funds to executives for illegal campaign contributions in 2005 and 2006. Resigned after plea. Testified against Kott and awaits sentencing.

RICK SMITH

Veco vice president who ran the company's government affairs operations. In May he pleaded guilty to the same charges as Allen. He admitted, with Allen, to making more than $400,000 in payoffs to elected officials as well as making illegal campaign contributions. Resigned after plea, testified against Kott and awaits sentencing.

THE POLITICAL CORRUPTION INVESTIGATION

The charges against Pete Kott are part of the wider investigation into political corruption in Alaska being conducted by the FBI and the Justice Department.

More than a year ago, teams of federal agents served search warrants at more than 20 locations around the state, including the offices of six state legislators. Since then, four legislators have been charged, two have been convicted, three lobbyists have pleaded guilty and several other current and former officials have been implicated.

Several people and areas are known to be under scrutiny:

* Veco's relationship with state legislators. During the Kott trial, Veco executives described bribing or otherwise exerting improper influence over several officials. Among them: Former Senate President Ben Stevens, whom Veco officials admitted paying more than $240,000 in phony consulting contracts to act on the company's behalf in the Legislature.

* U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens. FBI and IRS agents performed an extensive search of Stevens' Girdwood home in July, and ex-Veco CEO Bill Allen testified in Kott's trial that company employees oversaw and provided labor for an extensive remodeling there.

* U.S. Rep. Don Young. Young has been reported to be under scrutiny for ties to Veco and his use of earmarks. Veco executives are his largest group of political donors, and an aide pleaded guilty earlier this year in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal. Young reported spending more than $260,000 in legal fees from his campaign treasury during the first six months of this year and has declined to discuss the investigation.

* Fisheries. A number of companies involved with the North Pacific fishing industry received subpoenas from federal investigators asking about their dealings with Ben Stevens (who worked as a consultant in the industry), his ex-partner Trevor McCabe (an ex-aide to Sen. Ted Stevens), the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board (created by Ted Stevens to award federally-funded grants in the industry and chaired for a time by Ben).

THE INVESTIGATION: For a detailed, interactive overview of the corruption investigation, go online to adn.com/fbi. Click on "Corruption investigation overview" at the top of the right column.

FBI - Stevens-1377

WHATTHEY'RE SAYING

"Mr. Kott said some very unfortunate things on tape, and he voted for Veco's interests. My client, Mr. Kohring, didn't say unfortunate things on tape, never swore -- doesn't [illegible]ear, doesn't drink -- and didn't vote for Veco's [illegible]rests. So that's the difference.

-- Voice mail message in response to request for comment from John Henry Browne, Seattle lawyer for former state Rep. Vic Kohring, whose corruption trial is scheduled to begin Oct. 22.

"I think that there has been a willingness to not question very deeply or very carefully whatever that relationship might have been between Alaska's dependency on the oil industry on the one hand and our politics on the other. This trial was very significant in that way because it will allow people to put a little distance between that politics which they probably have been a little uncomfortable with or they will be more uncomfortable with now. The earthquake was the election of Gov. Sarah Palin. This is an aftershock."

-- Steve Haycox, UAA history professor

LOAD-DATE: September 26, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: BILL ROTH / Anchorage Daily News
Former Rep. Pete Kott of Eagle River leaves the U.S. Courthouse in Anchorage with his daughter Pamela, left.
AL GRILLO / The Associated Press
Former Alaska state lawmaker Pete Kott, back center, walks past reporters at the federal court building in Anchorage Tuesday with his daughter, Pam Kott, back left, Debora Stovern, back right, and Kott's attorney, Jim Wendt, front center, after Kott was convicted of conspiracy to solicit financial benefits, extortion and bribery.
BILL ROTH/Anchorage Daily News
Former Rep. Pete Kott of Eagle River leaves the U.S. Courthouse in Anchorage with his daughter Pamela, left, and his girlfriend, Debora Stovern, right, after a federal jury returned guilty verdicts on charges of bribery, conspiracy and extortion Tuesday.
Bobrick
Allen
Anderson
Smith

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1378

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 27, 2007 Thursday
FINAL EDITION

State on sidelines of Veco scandals;
TAKING NOTES: The attorney general says feds don't want interference with investigation.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 863 words

Alaska Attorney General Talis Colberg said his office assigned lawyers to closely watch former-state Rep. Pete Kott's trial in federal court over the past two weeks as it revealed other possible criminal acts by politicians and Veco Corp. executives.

Colberg said the attorney general's office isn't ignoring the revelations. But he said the state has to proceed carefully before pursuing its own criminal charges. The broad federal investigation into corruption in Alaska politics doesn't appear to be close to finished. The feds don't want interference from the state, according to Colberg.

"They've made it clear enough that they appreciate us not stepping into the middle of something that's ongoing," Colberg said.

He said the federal government has also declined to share the results of its investigation with the state.

Jurors on Tuesday convicted Eagle River Republican Kott on federal charges of conspiracy, bribery and extortion. Next up are federal trials of former Republican state Reps. Vic Kohring and Bruce Weyhrauch. It's clear the federal government is investigating other Alaska politicians as well, including U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

The state is under a lot of pressure to act instead of relying on the FBI to clean up corruption here. The Alaska Public Offices Commission, a state agency known as APOC, has decided to investigate political polls Veco and possibly other companies bought for candidates.

APOC Executive Director Brooke Miles said the commissioners determined that, with all the public scrutiny and seeming unhappiness with APOC's lack of action, they wanted to find out the facts.

There was testimony at Kott's trial that Veco routinely paid for candidate's political polls, including a $20,000 poll for then-Gov. Frank Murkowski last year before he was a declared candidate for re-election. One of the federal charges against Kott was that Veco illegally bought him a poll.

FBI - Stevens-1379

It's not clear what APOC will do with the findings of its investigation into the other polls paid for by Veco. APOC says it is hindered by the one-year statute of limitations in state law on imposing civil penalties for campaign violations. The polls brought up at Kott's trial are more than a year old.

There is no one-year statute of limitations on criminal charges. APOC doesn't have the authority to pursue criminal matters but could refer its findings to the state attorney general's office. Miles, the APOC director, said that's a possibility.

APOC has only a single investigator. The attorney general's office, while lacking the manpower of the FBI, could call on state troopers and criminal prosecutors for a corruption probe.

MORE THAN JUST POLLS

194A-AN-13620-M; 585

A pair of Democratic legislators from Anchorage, Les Gara and Harry Crawford, wrote APOC and the state attorney general this week to urge action. They said the state must investigate the polls and other apparent criminal acts that came up in Kott's trial and related federal indictments.

"The scope of this misconduct is unprecedented, and taking no action simply condones this conduct," their letter said.

Gara and Crawford said the illegal acts weren't limited to polls. They pointed to federal indictments in which Veco executives Bill Allen and Rick Smith pleaded guilty to paying "more than $10,000" in expenses for candidate fundraisers, knowing the money would be ultimately recorded as legitimate corporate expenses.

That violates the ban in state law on corporate contributions to candidates, Gara and Crawford said.

The indictment does not mention which fundraisers were illegal. But former Veco executive Smith testified that he organized many fundraisers, including the annual pig roast for Alaska Congressman Don Young.

'SPECIAL BONUSES'

Smith and Allen also testified about Veco's "special bonus program," where the company would reimburse Veco executives for campaign contributions.

That's also against Alaska law. Gara said that not all the former Veco executives involved in the program are under federal indictment, and maybe they should be under state indictment.

The state should also investigate what legislators besides those charged by federal prosecutors benefited from Veco in violation of state law, he said. So far, all legislators indicted have been Republicans.

"There's a lot the state can do," Gara said.

Gara said the state could pursue criminal charges on issues like illegal polls without interfering in the much broader federal investigation. Gara said, at this point, it looks like the state is doing nothing.

Colberg said he could not comment on any proposed or ongoing investigation. Colberg did not rule out the idea of the state going after side issues such as political polls without messing up the federal probe.

"We do not overlook the idea there is something they may not pursue that we may be able to," the attorney general said.

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him at 257-4344.

INSIDE

DON YOUNG: A watchdog group wants a probe of a $10 million earmark for a Florida highway.

Page B-1

ONLINE AUDIO AND VIDEO: Hear courtroom drama from the Kott trial and secret FBI recordings, and watch videos admitted as evidence.

adn.com/fbi

LOAD-DATE: September 27, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

FBI - Stevens-1380

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1381

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

September 30, 2007 Sunday
FINAL EDITION

CH2M Hill defends seasonal layoffs;
PRUDHOE BAY: Reduction has nothing to do with Veco acquisition, company says.

BYLINE: By PETER PORCO pporco@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 342 words

Scores of workers in the Prudhoe Bay oil fields have been laid off in a seasonal manpower reduction, including employees assigned to inspect pipelines for corrosion, according to spokesmen for BP Alaska and the workers' new Colorado-based employer, CH2M Hill.

The number of workers affected is fewer than 200, CH2M Hill communications director John Corsi said in a telephone interview Saturday night. CH2M Hill contracts with BP to perform the corrosion inspections of oil transit pipelines.

The remaining inspection crews will still be eight to 10 times the number of employees doing such work in the winter until a few years ago, said BP spokesman Daren Beaudo.

CH2M Hill's contracts for North Slope oil producers were owned by Veco Corp. until a few weeks ago, when scandal-plagued Veco was purchased by CH2M Hill. Veco's employees are now CH2M Hill's employees.

The work force downsizing "has nothing to do with the acquisition" of Veco, Corsi said. "We didn't come in with a plan that we had to be at a certain size or number of employees."

Corsi said CH2M Hill has worldwide operations. The acquisition of Veco's North Slope work is so recent that he knows few details of it, Corsi said.

Since early 2006, BP's North Slope operations have come under scrutiny from Congress, regulators and others because of a series of corrosion-related leaks and maintenance shortcomings. Four fires broke out in BP-run fields between Aug. 6 and Sept. 10. State officials said they're troubled by the fires, but the company said they were unrelated.

BP increased its work crews for pipeline corrosion inspections in August 2006, Beaudo said. "It was a big program to inspect the oil transit line, so now we're getting back to what we consider a normal staffing," he said.

Beaudo said he is pretty sure some of the laid-off workers "will switch to do winter construction activi

FBI - Stevens-1382

London-based BP manages Prudhoe Bay, the nation's largest oil field, as well as several neighboring fields.

Find Peter Porco online at adn.com/contact/pporco or call 257-4582.

LOAD-DATE: October 1, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

194A-AN-13620-M;586

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1383

Trip for Two Survivor Finale
SURVIVOR CHINA
Info
Enter Today! SUBWAY
Bailey's FURNITURE
Round trip airfare to Los Angeles - Four-star hotel for two nights - Studio tickets to finale and reunion shows - Entry deadline is December 2, 2007

WHAT MATTERS TO YOU? GIVE US YOUR FEEDBACK

Links And Information Seen On CBS 11 News

Week of October 22nd

Digg Reddit Facebook Google What's this?

Two of the state's top Republicans work the crowd at AFN

By Andrea Gusty, CBS 11 News Reporter
Article Last Updated: 10/26/2007 06:28:56 PM AKDT

A team, of sorts, made an appearance Friday at the 42nd Annual Alaska Federation of Natives Convention. Two of the state's top Republicans worked the crowd as part of their re-election campaigns.

"I love you; I want you and I need you," said Congressman Don Young.

That was an emotional Congressman Young Friday as he addressed the Alaska Federation of Natives. He broke out into tears after being honored with a video documenting his career.

Both Congressman Young and Senator Ted Stevens were on hand with speeches that described all they have done for Native people over their career and what they hope to do in the future.

"I am constantly reminded not only of how far we have come, but how much work we have left to do. I was also reminded, as we prepared for this program, of the strength of the Alaska Native people," said Stevens.

Both lawmakers are up for reelection next year, and even as talk of corruption and FBI investigations continues to swirl around them, they say they are still up for the job of representing Alaska's First People.

"There is nobody better than I at doing this job, because I believe in this state, and I believe in you. I believe in the future. And the day I cannot do this job, I will not run," said Young.

Advertisement

11 SKYTRACKER WEATHER 7 Day Forecast weather@ktva.com
MON 38 31
TUE 39 33
WED 40 32
THU 38 30
FRI 35
SAT 34
SUN 35

Breaking News: CBSNews.com
Top Breaking News Stories from CBSNews.com

U.S. General Wounded In Iraq Bombing
Doctors Urge Early Autism Screening
Deck Eyed In Deadly Beach House Fire
Supreme Court Takes On Exxon Valdez Case
12% Of High Schools "Dropout Factories"
Pope: Don't Dispense Drugs For Immoral Use
Israeli PM Olmert Has Prostate Cancer
Edwards Makes New Push Against Clinton
Storm Leaves 20 Dead In Dominican Republic
Schwarzenegger: Marijuana's Not A Drug
Life In Prison For "Chessboard Killer" Is It Bigfoot Or Just A Mangy Bear?

More Top Stories

innertube
WATCH FULL EPISODES OF YOUR FAVORITE
CSI: NY
CBS SHOWS FOR FREE
CLICK HERE TO WATCH

Wookdays at 3pm
Dr. Phil

FBI - Stevens-1384

194-AN-13620-M;587

Both Young and Stevens said the most important issue facing Alaska Natives in the coming months is the fight over federal contracts. The lawmakers say they will continue their efforts to defend the program that gives Alaska Native groups priority for government spending.

To contact Andrea, call 907-273-3186.

- AFN: search for defenders of Alaska
- Two of the state's top Republicans work the crowd at AFN
- Bear attack at Eagle River Nature Center
- Manhunt over for man accused of killing, stuffing friend in freezer
- Student arrested in connection with Colony High threats
- Alaska visitor from Mongolia
- Alaskan wins big on Price Is Right
- Oil giant agrees on monster price tag to pay for its mistakes
- 42nd Annual Alaska Federation of Natives Convention
- Member of Anchorage Fire Department helps with California wildfires
- Bad news for Mat-Maid Dairy
- Palin's approval rating

Print Email Return to Top

All contents Copyright 2006 Alaska Broadcasting Company, Inc. KTVA or other copyright holders. All rights reserved This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed for any commercial purpose. For more information on this site, please read our Privacy Policy and Terms of Service It is the policy of Alaska Broadcasting Company, Inc. and KTVA to provide equal employment opportunity to all qualified individuals without regard to their race, color, religion, national origin, age, sex, marital status, disability, military status, citizenship or any other legally-protected status in accordance with applicable local, state and federal law. Children's Programming Jobs at KTVA EEO Public File Report

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 26, 2007 Friday
FINAL EDITION

Smith tells of earlier payments;
TRIAL: Ex-Veco vice president says money was to keep "Vic on board."

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER and KYLE HOPKINS ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1168 words

Veco chief executive Bill Allen had been giving cash to former state Rep. Vic Kohring for at least a couple of years before a $1,000 payoff on Feb. 23, 2006, at the Island Pub in Douglas, another executive, Rick Smith, told jurors in federal court Thursday.

Allen had told him the payments over the years were "necessary to keep Vic on board on political issues that we were in favor of," said Smith, a former Veco vice president.

Smith, white-haired and wearing a light-gray suit, testified all day. He is one of the main prosecution witnesses in the public corruption case against Kohring. He didn't cave under aggressive questioning by defense lawyer John Henry Browne of Seattle and at times chuckled on the stand. In fact, the whole courtroom shared a joke at day's end.

The bulk of the evidence is secretly made recordings, including one from March 30, 2006, that shows Kohring accepting cash from Allen in Suite 604 of Juneau's Baranof Hotel. As he gets up to leave, Kohring reaches into a Costco-size snack container at Smith and Allen's invitation and grabs four or so treats.

On the stand, Smith, 62, explained the sometimes cryptic talk in the telephone calls and meetings that were being monitored by the FBI.

Revelations in the Kohring trial give a wider view of the corrupt tactics used by Veco during the 2006 legislative session. Prosecutors say Smith and Allen conspired with some lawmakers to push through a major new oil tax. North Slope oil producers wanted "tax certainty" before committing to a natural gas pipeline, which could have been lucrative for Veco.

Browne objected time and again to prosecutor Edward Sullivan's questions, and often U.S. District Judge John Sedwick ruled for him. When it was Browne's turn to ask the questions, Sullivan frequently objected, and it was Browne who had to rephrase.

Kohring is being tried on four felony charges including bribery and conspiracy. Smith and Allen have pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy charges and are cooperating with the government. Both resigned their posts with Veco. The company was sold in September.

FBI - Stevens-1386

Smith told jurors that he and Allen often took Kohring out for meals. He couldn't remember Kohring ever paying.

The defense maintains that anything Kohring got was simply a gift from friends.

Sullivan, from the U.S. Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, D.C., tried to chip away at that.

Had Smith ever been to Kohring's house socially?

No, Smith answered.

Had Kohring ever been to his?

Yes, to do drywall work, Smith said. That was Kohring's trade.

194A-AN-13620-M;588

They had a "friendly business-type relationship," Smith said, but Kohring was "not a best friend, no."

Smith covered a lot of ground. He talked about a bill that Kohring had bottled up in his committee in 2003, only to move it out when Allen wanted him to. He told jurors about a legislative aide laid off in 2004 by Kohring at Allen's insistence, then let go. He said Kohring offered to lobby other legislators, provide Veco with information and do what Veco wanted him to do.

Smith also testified about an internship with Veco that Kohring pursued for his nephew. After Kohring hand delivered his nephew's resume, Smith said he forwarded the paperwork along with a note that he wrote under Allen's name. Allen had "more juice" and approved, Smith said.

"I think I've got a winner here. How many spots do we have available in our program? He's Rep. Vic Kohring's nephew," said the March 24, 2006, note to Chuck O'Donnell, president of Veco Alaska, and Tom Maloney, vice president of business development.

Smith said he wanted to make sure everyone knew the candidate was the nephew of a legislator important to Veco's interests in Juneau.

The nephew got the $16-an-hour internship, making $24-an-hour with overtime, Smith said.

Jurors jotted notes as prosecutor Sullivan asked Smith to list the crimes he'd pleaded guilty to.

Then the prosecutor asked Smith to tell jurors who, specifically, he had pleaded guilty to bribing or attempting to bribe.

Smith looked at the jury. "Rep. Kohring, Rep. Kott, Rep. Weyhrauch, and Sen. Cowdery and Sen. Ben Stevens," he replied.

Former House Speaker Pete Kott, R-Eagle River, was convicted of bribery, conspiracy and other charges involving Veco in September. Former state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, R- Juneau, is awaiting trial while the government appeals a ruling on evidence.

Neither Sen. John Cowdery nor Stevens, both Anchorage Republicans, has been charged. Stevens didn't run in 2006.

After Sullivan finished with Smith, the judge jumped in with a few questions of his own.

Who participated in the conspiracy? Sedwick asked.

Smith said it was him and Allen, the ones who pleaded guilty.

Any others? the judge wanted to know.

Smith struggled with the question. When Sedwick pressed him, he couldn't say who.

When Browne got his turn, he pushed Smith on whether he was likely to get a lighter sentence for cooperating. But he couldn't take it as far as he wanted. In a closed hearing earlier in the day, the judge set some limits on how far such cross-examination could go, he later explained.

Late in the day, Browne asked Smith about a profanity-laced, March 4, 2006, recording from Suite 604. Smith and Allen are seen talking about how they "have to produce" in Juneau. Smith says they have to "get dirty."

FBI - Stevens-1387

At one point in the recording, Allen says Kohring would "kiss our ass."

In court, Browne asked Smith to address the point.

"Mr. Kohring didn't do that, did he?" Browne asked.

Sullivan objected.

"I assume it was a metaphor," Sedwick said, but added that maybe Browne was asking "if it literally happened."

To which Browne added: "Not that there's anything wrong with it."

The courtroom, usually so quiet, erupted. Some of the jurors guffawed. Smith snickered.

"Would this be a good time to break, your honor?" Browne asked.

Kohring, a Wasilla Republican, resigned in July to concentrate on his defense.

Browne's cross-examination of Smith continues today.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390. Find Kyle Hopkins at adn.com/contact/khopkins or call 257-4334.

BLOG: Follow the Kohring trial live throughout the day on our Alaska politics blog.

adn.com/alaskapolitics

More at adn.com

Find additional material from the Kohring trial online as the case unfolds:

* Live blogging from the courthouse. Reporter Kyle Hopkins is filing updates from the Kohring trial all day, every day. Read it live, and catch up on what you've missed: adn.com/alaskapolitics.

* FBI surveillance videos. You can watch all the recordings from Suite 604 that have been played for the jury. We'll be posting all the wiretap exhibits as well in the next day or two.

* Courtroom testimony. We'll be posting excerpts from courtroom testimony the day after it happens. Check back this afternoon for clips from Rick Smith's testimony on Thursday.

* Background on the case: Go to adn.com/fbi for past stories, an overview of the corruption investigation, and previous audio and video.

LOAD-DATE: October 26, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Video courtesy of the FBI
Rep. Vic Kohring, left, puts his hand out for money from Veco CEO Bill Allen (to right) in an FBI surveillance video made in March 2006 in Veco's Juneau hotel suite. It was played for jurors earlier this week in Kohring's corruption trial. Watch the video at adn.com/fbi.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1388

FAIRBANKS
Daily News - Miner

Rush job on 2002 tax break bill showed VECO enjoyed prime legislative access

By Dermot Cole
Published October 27, 2007

VECO BILL: The struggle to revise Alaska's oil taxes in 2006 was hardly the first time that VECO played a heavy-handed role in lobbying the Legislature.

Some say the company's influence was pervasive for years, founded on Bill Allen's money and connections to Alaska's most powerful people and institutions.

One of the FBI videotapes from the VECO suite played in the corruption trials of former Reps. Pete Kott and Vic Kohring captures Allen and VECO lieutenant Rick Smith drinking and discussing strategy at about 11 p.m. on March 4, 2006.

The VECO executives told each other they had to "produce" by keeping legislators from raising oil taxes too high.

"Me and you have to f—— produce," Allen said.

"You have to get dirty and you have to produce," Smith said.

Allen went on to refer to a bill that his company had written in 2002, House Bill 519, which would have provided a gas pipeline tax break worth more than $760 million to the oil companies.

"What we done with 519, right now we've gotta do more than that," Allen said.

"We have to be careful how we do it," Smith said.

"For sure," Allen said.

In both the Kott and Kohring trials, House Bill 519 has been mentioned, but not dealt with in detail. The FBI was not tapping phones or bugging hotel rooms in 2002, so it's impossible to say what Allen meant by "we've got to do more than that."

FBI - Stevens-1389

But Allen and Smith were working behind the scenes and in public to push that legislation, the history of which offers a more vivid example of VECO's political muscle than the Petroleum Production Tax fight of 2006.

The 2002 tax break bill, known to critics as the "VECO bill," did not become law, but it was within a vote or two of passing the House so its critics never allowed it to reach the floor, according to former Fairbanks Reps. Jim Whitaker and John Davies, who opposed the legislation.

The eager acceptance given to House Bill 519 by some in Juneau showed that VECO executives enjoyed a level of access and influence denied to ordinary citizens. The VECO employee who wrote the bill, a future attorney general, said he delivered the draft of the measure to "the staff of the legislator picked by VECO and its lobbyists ..."

194 AN 13620-M; 589

The official record of legislative activities, preserved on paper and through digital audio and video recordings, never includes a full picture of how decisions are made because so much takes place off the record.

But the documents, recordings and news accounts regarding House Bill 519 hint at the extent of Allen's clout.

Allen, who has been convicted of bribing legislators in connection with the PPT, testified at Kott's trial that the goal of House Bill 519 was to get the oil companies and legislators talking to one another about the gas pipeline.

The key provision in the VECO bill was a tax break for the oil companies, estimated at more than $760 million by the state Department of Revenue.

The suspension of property taxes was to be an incentive to build a natural gas pipeline. There was no evidence that a tax break of that magnitude was needed to make the project economic or if it would make a project economic at all.

Whitaker said it was not negotiating, but a giveaway in which the state was telling the oil companies "Take it."

If an ordinary Alaskan had proposed this without numbers to back it up, the idea would never have reached the legislative fast track.

But Allen was no ordinary constituent. In less than three weeks, key legislators in the state House rushed the bill through three committees with almost no analysis, but in at least one instance, some high-pressure tactics.

Kott, who is awaiting sentencing for taking bribes from VECO, introduced the bill on April 19 on behalf of VECO, though he didn't say that at the time.

VECO attorney David Marquez wrote the bill and said he went to Juneau on March 25 "to deliver the draft to the staff of the legislator picked by VECO and its lobbyists, and give a brief description."

Marquez, who later served as attorney general under Gov. Frank Murkowski, made that disclosure in a statement he gave to the Alaska Public Offices Commission. The commission had fined him $580 for not registering as lobbyist on House Bill 519 and Marquez appealed the ruling.

FBI - Stevens-1390

Marquez said that in writing the bill, delivering it to the "legislator picked by VECO," testifying before committees in favor of the bill and serving as a "technical liaison with the oil companies," he was not working as a lobbyist.

The VECO bill had its first hearing three days after it was introduced. It moved through the oil and gas committee, the resources committee, the finance committee and the rules committee in short order.

It never went to a floor vote because of opposition within the Republican caucus, which had a 28-member coalition that year.

"There were 11 members who said not only no, but hell no," Anchorage Republican Rep. Andrew Halcro told the Anchorage Daily News in 2002.

I'll have more on the VECO bill Sunday.

Dermot Cole can be reached at cole@newsminer.com or 459-7530.

This article may be accessed online at http://newsminer.com/2007/10/27/9559.
This article is copyrighted property of the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner. Unauthorized reproduction of this article other than for personal use is strictly prohibited. To obtain permission for republication in any form, please contact the News-Miner. Visit http://newsminer.com/contact/ for more information.

FBI - Stevens-1391

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 27, 2007 Saturday
Correction Appended
FINAL EDITION

Allen says he wanted loyalty, felt sympathy;
KOHRING TRIAL: Ex-Veco chief's memory, mental capacity come into question during his testimony.

BYLINE: By RICHARD MAUER rmauer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1308 words

Bill Allen normally keeps all his cash in his wallet, but on the afternoon of March 30, 2006, he knew Rep. Vic Kohring was about to come calling at Suite 604 in Juneau's Baranof Hotel.

So Allen, then Veco Corp. chairman and a man emerging in the corruption trials as the one-time Godfather of Alaska politics, moved a wad of twenties to his right side pocket where it would be more accessible. It was the "six or seven," as in $600 to $700, that he typically gave Kohring when the legislator bared his woes, Allen testified Friday in federal court in Anchorage.

Allen, the government's main witness in its wide-ranging corruption investigation, took the witness stand on the fifth day of Kohring's trial on bribery, extortion and conspiracy charges. Allen and former Veco vice president Rick Smith have pleaded guilty to bribing legislators and conspiracy and will be sentenced in the future. They are hoping to reduce their penalties by cooperating in trials and the ongoing investigation.

Wasilla voters sent Kohring, a Republican, to the Legislature seven times. He was famous for not having the money to afford a place to stay in Juneau, bedding down his tall body in a cramped legislative office. Far less known until now were his supplications to Allen and Smith, some of which were secretly recorded by the FBI.

Allen said he was able to recall three or four specific incidents in which he gave Kohring $600 to $700 in cash. The first was in Kohring's state office in 2002, after Kohring married a Russian violinist who would insist on living in Oregon.

"Mr. Allen, did you have a practice of carrying around on your person, certain denominations of currency at any time?" asked assistant U.S. attorney Joe Bottini, one of two prosecutors trying the government's case.

"Usually I'd have a thousand or two thousand," Allen replied in his gravelly Western twang, not saying specifically if he carried hundreds, twenties, or something else.

FBI - Stevens-1392

"Now when you first gave cash to Mr. Kohring, why did you give him the money?" asked Bottini.

"Well, he was sleeping in his office, and I'd say, 'Vic, you're 6-7, 6-8, how in the hell can you sleep on that couch?' He said, 'I can do it, I do it.' Then I'd see he wouldn't have a helluva lot of food, mostly it would be junk food, and I felt sorry," Allen said.

"Did you have any other reason for giving him the money?"

"To make sure he was going to be loyal to me," Allen replied.

Kohring's visit to Suite 604 in March 2006, a few weeks before the Easter recess and a visit he planned to make to his wife and stepdaughter, had a twist: Kohring was looking for more help than a small bundle of cash could fix. His Bank of America credit card was $17,000 in the hole and in collection.

194A-AN-13620-M;59D

Not only was the problem personal, it was political. It would look bad to voters if he was sued, though he also told Allen he was confident his Mat-Su constituency would keep re-electing him "short of going out and shooting somebody, 'cause I'm strong politically."

Even as he sought a loan or some other assistance that wouldn't show up in any public record, he also told Allen he wanted to be "aboveboard."

"Let me see what I can do," Allen said in the video. "Don't say anything until I can figure (it) out."

Later in the conversation, after Kohring said he couldn't afford the full cost of his stepdaughter's Girl Scout uniform, Allen reached into the right-front pocket and gave him the wad of bills he had earlier set aside.

In his testimony, Allen said he followed up Kohring's loan request by seeking advice from Veco's chief financial officer, Roger Chan, brother of an IRS criminal agent in Anchorage. Allen wasn't allowed to say what Chan told him -- that conversation ran afoul of the hearsay rule. But he was able to describe the result.

"Based on your discussion with Mr. Chan, did you decide that trying to help Mr. Kohring with a loan would not be a good idea?" Bottini asked.

"Yes."

Allen, 70, suffered a head injury in a motorcycle accident in 2001 and continues to have speech problems and other issues. At one point, Bottini asked him when the first legislative special session would have ended in 2006. Allen correctly remembered that the regular session ended mid-May and that the special session could go no more than 30 days. That would mean it ended in mid-April, Allen said.

As Bottini tried to straighten out the timeline, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick observed, "he appears to be moving backward instead of forward." Asked to recalculate, Allen again came up with April 15, confirming Sedwick's observation.

During another answer, defense attorney John Henry Browne saw Allen reach for a folded piece of paper in his pocket as he tried to remember names of legislators. Browne objected to him using notes that weren't admitted, and the paper was confiscated. Browne held on to it and showed it to reporters at the end of the day.

In large, neat handwriting, the paper had the word "certainty" written on both sides. It was a word Allen struggled to find last month when he testified in the bribery trial of Rep. Pete Kott and sought to describe the taxation and regulation climate favored by the oil industry.

Allen's "cheat sheet" also listed the charges he pleaded to, the names of wavering legislators whose votes were needed on a 2006 oil-tax measure, the name of a legislative aide to Kohring that Allen wanted fired, and the "Mayo Clinic" in Rochester, Minn., where Kohring claimed to gotten into debt having back surgery. The sheet even reminded him of the names of Kott and Smith, his former vice president who preceded him to the witness stand.

With perhaps that mental frailty in mind, Browne bore into Allen's assertions that he had been handing out cash to Kohring since 2002. Aside from the March 30, 2006, payment caught on video, it was only Allen's word for what happened, Browne asserted.

"There was no support for that other than your statement?" said Browne.

"I guess," said Allen. "Rick knew it, Rick Smith."

Under cross-examination, Allen said that on Aug. 30, 2006, the day the FBI told him he was busted, he agreed to wear a recording device and meet with two or three people. He also got on the phone with politicians and attempted to incriminate them. Browne asked him if those included "national" political figures, but the government objected and Judge Sedwick told him to rephrase the question to make it less specific.

Sen. Ted Stevens and Rep. Don Young are both under investigation in the corruption probe.

Find Richard Mauer online at adn.com/contact/rmauer or call 257-4345. Daily News reporter Lisa Demer contributed to this report.

"Now when you first gave cash to Mr. Kohring, why did you give him the money?"

-- U.S. Attorney Joe Bottini

FBI - Stevens-1393

"Well, he was sleeping in his office, and I'd say, 'Vic, you're 6-7, 6-8, how in the hell can you sleep on that couch?' He said, 'I can do it, I do it.' Then I'd see he wouldn't have a helluva lot of food, mostly it would be junk food, and I felt sorry."

-- Ex-Veco chief Bill Allen

FROM THE TRIAL: See and hear all the FBI surveillance videos and wiretaps in the Kohring corruption trial.

adn.com/fbi

Find additional material from the Kohring trial online as the case unfolds:

* FBI surveillance videos: You can watch all the recordings from Suite 604 that have been played for the jury.

* FBI audio: You can hear all the wiretaps played for the jury, and read descriptions of each one.

* Courtroom testimony: Opening statements from both sides.

* Background on the case: Go to adn.com/fbi for past stories, an overview of the corruption investigation, and previous audio and video.

* learn and comment: Want more from the courtroom? We're blogging extensively from the trial every day it's in session. Go online for more reporting and share your opinions.

adn.com/alaskapolitics

Find more at adn.com

LOAD-DATE: October 29, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

CORRECTION-DATE: October 27, 2007

CORRECTION: Correction Attorney Bob Bundy was misidentified as former Veco Corp. executive Bill Allen in the caption of a photo of the two men that appeared on Page A-10 of Saturday's newspaper.

GRAPHIC: Video courtesy of the FBI
Former Alaska legislator Vic Kohring, left, is seen in this picture taken from FBI surveillance video accepting a snack from former Veco executives Rick Smith, in dark shirt, right, and Bill Allen, hand holding jar, during a March 30, 2006, meeting in Room 604 of the Baranof Hotel in Juneau.
AL GRILLO / The Associated Press
Bill Allen; left, walks through the federal court building to testify on Friday.

FBI - Stevens-1394

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 28, 2007 Sunday
FINAL EDITION

Kohring's lawyer is known for being flamboyant, effective; JOHN HENRY BROWNE: Attorney from Washington state once defended serial killer Ted Bundy.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1261 words

One thing's for sure about John Henry Browne.

Humble he's not.

He's the Seattle lawyer defending former state Rep. Vic Kohring on federal corruption charges, and he is on a roll.

"If you can find an attorney with a better record, hire them," says a half-page ad that Browne took out in the October issue of the Washington state Bar News. There's a brooding portrait of Browne and mentions of his high ratings in a lawyer directory.

Down in Washington state, by his reckoning, he's won five criminal cases at trial since September 2006. A teenager accused of murder: not guilty. A foster father charged with child rape: not guilty. A teacher accused of messing around with kids: case dismissed by the judge after the state put on its evidence.

Now he's trying to keep Kohring out of prison, and he's up against two federal prosecutors on a team that's 2-0 against public corruption in Alaska. Kohring is accused of conspiring with two former Veco Corp. executives to push their favored version of a new oil tax in the 2006 legislative session.

What prosecutors call bribes, Browne calls gifts from friends.

WELL-KNOWN IN WASHINGTON STATE

Joe Bottini, an assistant U.S. attorney based in Anchorage, and Edward Sullivan, with the U.S. Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, D.C., are in the midst of putting on their case and didn't want to talk about themselves. They were reluctant to have their pictures made. And they certainly didn't want to talk about Browne.

FBI - Stevens-1395

In Courtroom 3, where Kohring is being tried, Browne is theatrical, funny, at ease behind the podium where lawyers ask their questions. During breaks, he pops outside for a Camel Light.

He's 61 years old, 6 foot 6 and trim, tan with highlights in his hair. He wears what look like expensive Italian suits, charcoal gray with a silver tie, a light one with a pale pink shirt. They're not so expensive, he says. He shops at the Men's Wearhouse.

"He's probably the most well-known criminal defense lawyer in the state," said Steve Berman, himself a nationally known plaintiff's lawyer based in Seattle whose cases include the tobacco class-action litigation.

Browne's reputation in court is "rather flamboyant, but effective," said Berman. "When you're a trial lawyer, you want to command the courtroom. John Henry commands the courtroom."

194A-AN-13620-M; 591

And, Berman said, he's irreverent and "not afraid to take on judges if he has to."

While Browne is rated as a "most pre-eminent lawyer" by the established Martindale-Hubbell peer review service, a new Web directory, Avvo, gave him low marks. Berman now is challenging Avvo with Browne and another lawyer as his lead plaintiffs.

"I was rated below dead and disbarred lawyers, which I thought was funny," Browne said.

'HE GENERALLY DELIVERS'

So how did a state legislator from Wasilla who lived in a trailer and slept on the couch in his Juneau legislative office hook up with a lawyer like Browne? Kohring, a Republican who resigned his House seat in July, said he was referred to him by his legislative aide.

Kohring said he cashed in his state retirement account, sold his little ranch house in Wasilla and is getting help from friends and family. He wouldn't say what his defense has cost him, other than it's in the "six figures."

At any rate, "it's paid," Browne said.

In a hearing less than a week before Kohring's trial started, prosecutors complained that Browne was taking his case to the media and making outrageous claims in court filings that he couldn't back up. U.S. District Judge John Sedwick called Browne's tactics unusual and worrisome.

Browne shot back that he was concerned about all the publicity given to the prosecution's side and even by something the judge said two days earlier in sentencing another legislator that he took to mean "this kind of corruption is going to stop here."

Sedwick, who is presiding over all the corruption cases so far, assured Browne that Kohring is presumed innocent in his court. The judge said he thought the news coverage had been fair but also warned Browne to watch himself.

In a 1998 profile that ran in the Seattle Times' Sunday Magazine, the writer said Browne was "as known for his style -- a blend of charm and arrogance, spirituality and bravado -- as for the results he generally delivers."

So far in Kohring's trial, Browne has forced prosecutors to call as witnesses FBI agents from all over the country in order to authenticate, one by one, the secretly made recordings involving Kohring before they could play them for jurors. He could have agreed to let one FBI agent talk about all the recordings.

"I am not going to sit there like some lapdog and help the government put my guy in jail," Browne said a couple of weeks before the trial.

In the end, the tactic showed jurors the size of the government's efforts in the corruption investigation, with agents from Atlanta; Chicago; Cincinnati; Columbus, Ohio; Los Angeles; Austin, Texas; Miami; Anchorage and a retired agent from New York City rotating in and out of the witness stand.

The prosecution's main witness, former Veco chief executive Bill Allen, is 70 years old and struggles on the stand to come up with the right word or name as a result of a head injury he suffered in a motorcycle wreck. Browne alerted prosecutors that he was going to object if they tried to help Allen with leading questions. But on Friday, as Allen faltered time and again, Browne eased up. .

ROCK-AND-ROLLER

FBI - Stevens-1396

Browne was born in Tennessee. The family moved around a lot. His father was a nuclear engineer for the Atomic Energy Commission. They ended up in Palo Alto, Calif.

He went to the University of Colorado in the '60s, studied philosophy and political science. He played bass in a rock band that he says opened for all the big names that came to town, The Doors, Jimi Hendrix among them.

During law school at American University in Washington, D.C., he worked as a gofer and then an associate producer on the old ABC television news program "Issues and Answers."

"Within a year of being this rock and roll person, I now had White House press credentials," Browne said.

He says the guest who most impressed him was former Alaska Gov. Wally Hickel. Hickel, as interior secretary in the Nixon administration, was getting worldwide attention after publicly criticizing the administration's handling of the Vietnam War. He later was forced out.

Browne has been married a number of times. Just how many, he didn't want to say: "It's an embarrassing number." He said he's a slow learner but is now happily married.

As a defense lawyer, he's had his share of infamous clients. He represented serial killer Ted Bundy, who was suspected of murders in Washington state and was later executed in Florida. Browne said he helped negotiate a plea deal in Florida to spare Bundy's life, but when the killer rejected it, Browne quit the case. He saved from the death penalty mass murderer Benjamin Ng, a shooter in a 1983 massacre that killed 13 in a Seattle gambling house.

In the Wenatchee child sex ring case, his successful defense of a housekeeper was credited by others with changing the tenor of an investigation since discredited as a witch hunt.

The toughest cases, he says, are when he really believes his client is innocent. If he loses then, it hits hard. "I'd much rather represent someone I think is guilty."

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

KOHRING TRIAL: Listen to Browne and prosecutor Joseph Bottini giving their opening statements. Also hear and see FBI wiretaps and videos

adn.com/fbi

LOAD-DATE: October 29, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Browne

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1397

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 28, 2007 Sunday
Correction Appended
FINAL EDITION

Is oil-tax taint real, or did PPT pass fairly?; 2006 SPECIAL SESSIONS: Senate, under Ben Stevens' leadership, thwarted efforts for a higher tax.

BYLINE: By TOM KIZZIA tkizzia@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 2276 words

Was the oil tax passed by the Legislature last year really tainted by corruption, as Alaska's governor and other critics contend?

The question has no easy answer. A piece of law can rarely be traced to one person or event, and well-reasoned arguments were raised last year for keeping taxes low as well as for raising them.

But a review of court and legislative records, and interviews with key players, suggest Veco's influence in the state Senate may have effectively kept oil taxes from going higher than they did.

The Senate chamber is where Ben Stevens presided and fought, both publicly and behind the scenes, for a lower tax rate -- all while taking payments from Veco Corp. for services that company officials now say consisted of delivering on Veco priorities.

The tax on oil production finally approved last August after two special sessions was higher than the industry wanted. But the tax might have been even greater without the Senate's resistance, according to some of the Republicans involved in last year's backroom negotiations.

"In caucus, Ben railed on us for anything over 20 (percent)," said Sen. Gene Therriault, a Fairbanks Republican who was a member of Stevens' majority. "It finally got so unpleasant we just stopped having caucuses. He worked majority and minority votes out of caucus."

Public attention has mostly focused on corruption in the House of Representatives, where four Republican lawmakers have been charged or convicted of taking bribes, three in connection with last year's oil taxes.

But the House, in fact, brushed aside those Veco-linked legislators when it approved a relatively high oil tax rate. It was the Senate that erected a barrier "like concrete" against the higher tax rate.

FBI - Stevens-1398

LAWMAKERS AT LOGGERHEADS

Consider the closing days of last year's first special session, in early June.

The House had just passed a tax rate of 23.5 percent. Each percentage point was worth another $100 million annually that oil producers would have to pay to the state, revenue experts said.

Even before the House was finished, Stevens was on the phone with then-Veco CEO Bill Allen, discussing strategies for killing the bill, according to a confession later signed by Allen. The pair also discussed, in two phone calls on June 5, secret plans to give Stevens a top executive job at Veco after the legislative year ended, Allen said in the guilty plea, prepared by prosecutors and based partly on FBI wiretaps.

Veco lobbied throughout the 2006 sessions for a tax rate of no more than 20 percent.

194A-AN-13620-M; 592

Allen now says payments of nearly $250,000 to Stevens over five years were bribes in exchange for "giving advice, lobbying colleagues, and taking official acts in matters before the Legislature."

No charges have been filed against Stevens or other senators in the broad federal corruption investigation. Stevens has denied doing anything wrong.

Two days after Stevens and Allen spoke, however, the Senate refused to go halfway to meet the higher House tax. The House balked, and the special session adjourned with no deal. The 23.5 percent tax was gone, never to return.

"Part of the reason I didn't push for a different result was I knew at the end of the day we had a stalemate with the other body," House Speaker John Harris, R-Valdez, said in an interview earlier this month. He said there had been a push from some House members to go higher. But with Stevens calling the shots, the Senate was unwilling to budge.

"He shouldn't have had that power; no one person should. But they let him," Harris said.

PRESSURE FROM GOVERNOR

For Speaker Harris, resistance from Gov. Frank Murkowski was also a consideration as he mapped House strategy in 2006. Murkowski wanted legislative approval of a contract to build a gas pipeline from Alaska's North Slope. He saw a new long-term agreement on an oil tax as an essential first step toward that goal. Industry had agreed to a 20 percent tax, and the governor was wary of going much higher.

Indeed, the multitude of vectors and influences in Juneau make it all but impossible to sort out responsibility for the outcome of any legislative session. Every lunchroom conversation or word to a committee witness adds another nudge to the process. And 2006, with its extra two special sessions on taxes in the midst of a gubernatorial election, was more chaotic than most.

This month, a new Legislature has convened in special session to reconsider the Petroleum Profits Tax, or PPT. The stakes are high, with the new tax bringing in $2.2 billion a year, or 44 percent of the state's annual nonfederal income.

Gov. Sarah Palin cited two reasons for calling the session. One, the tax has not delivered as much revenue as promised, she said. And two, the corruption probe has "tainted" the finished product in the public's eye.

Some political leaders argue that the corruption trials should not be used to impugn the Legislature as a whole or their work in 2006 on the oil tax.

They point out that the legislators convicted or charged with bribery so far were relatively minor players in the House, without the power to swing the final tax their way. Indeed, the oil producers and Veco were pushing to hold the new tax on oil production to 20 percent, but the Legislature in the end exceeded that by approving 22.5 percent.

Industry also wanted a commitment for no future tax increases and a flat rate that wouldn't rise with higher oil prices. They lost both those fights, too.

"They didn't seem to win their battle so I don't understand what the cloud is," oil consultant Pedro Van Meurs testified at the start of the special session two weeks ago. "The law was passed despite certain things going on."

Former legislator and ex-gubernatorial candidate Andrew Halcro takes the same line, calling the final bill a careful compromise. He said lawmakers shouldn't feel intimidated by critics in Juneau if they voted responsibly on the merits of the tax. FBI - Stevens-1399

"I think a lot of legislators are capitalizing on this wave of concern about corruption," he said.

Others who have questioned the influence of Veco bribes are Sen. Lyda Green, R-Wasilla, the current Senate president, and Sen. Bert Stedman, R-Sitka. Both were allied with Stevens during much of the 2006 debate.

"Most of the monkey business I've been reading about was on the House side," Stedman said.

Stedman and some other Republican senators say there were legitimate arguments for voting for a lower tax rate, such as promoting a gas line or protecting Alaska's investment climate.

"The governor has called it a culture of corruption, and that has really offended me," said Sen. Gary Stevens, R-Kodiak, the majority leader in 2006 and again under Green. (Palin has said she does not mean to tar all legislators with a broad brush.)

Critics of the tax reply that the cloud of uncertainty requires another close look by the Legislature.

They point to Veco's dominant, two-decade role in supporting political campaigns, both through secret polling and illegal corporate contributions. Many of the Legislature's current leaders have been big recipients of Veco campaign funds in the past.

And the corruption probe, they say, rolls on.

SENATE PLAYERS

In addition to Stevens, a second senator linked to the federal investigation is John Cowdery, R-Anchorage, who played a key role in 2006 as chairman of the Senate Rules Committee. Kodiak Republican Rep. Gabrielle LeDoux has accused Cowdery of using his committee position to kill her legislation protecting abandoned newborn babies as punishment for her vote on the PPT.

Former Veco vice president Rick Smith has named Cowdery as one of five lawmakers bribed by Veco. Cowdery has denied any wrongdoing and has not been charged, but said his presence could be a distraction and chose not to attend the current legislative session.

But Cowdery's influence in the Senate was clearly secondary to that of Ben Stevens, who did not run again but was leader last year of the majority Republican caucus.

As an individual senator, Stevens often voted on the losing side of amendments that would have cut taxes further. But as president, his ability to extend his influence went far beyond the recorded votes, other senators say. The Senate leader wields power over committee assignments, leadership positions and the state budget, among other things. Stevens in particular could be an intimidating figure, and was often said to have special clout in the Capitol as the son of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

"There's things you can do in the background that aren't noticeable to the general public," said Sen. Gary Wilken, R-Fairbanks, now a minority member in the Senate. "Had everything been on the up and up, I believe the number would have been 25 percent."

Stevens' private consulting contract with Veco was well-known during the 2006 sessions. It was already the subject of a formal complaint with the Alaska Public Offices Commission and a recall petition. Both were rejected by the state as based on unfounded speculation.

Stevens always refused to say what work he did for the payments of nearly $50,000 a year.

Stevens was one of six legislators whose offices were raided by the FBI on Aug. 31, three weeks after the PPT tax was passed. This May, Veco chief Allen's guilty plea said the $243,250 in consulting payments to an unnamed "state Senator B" were really in exchange for services performed as a legislator.

Last month, during testimony in Eagle River Republican Rep. Pete Kott's trial, state Senator B was identified by Allen as Ben Stevens.

Stevens, who remains uncharged with any crime, has refused to comment on Allen's accusations. The Senate was divided, with one committee in March approving a tax rate as high as 25 percent. While the Senate numbers ratcheted down with time, the House was becoming more aggressive about raising taxes.

Advocates of higher taxes faced plenty of obstacles in the House, including some measure of undue influence by Veco. Former Rep. Kott was convicted of bribery and extortion. Wasilla Republican Vic Kohring is on trial this week, with a third Republican, Bruce Weyhrauch of Juneau, awaiting trial. A fourth former legislator, Tom Anderson of Anchorage, sentenced to five years in prison for an unrelated bribery offense, also had a Veco consulting contract while in office.

FBI - Stevens-1400

FBI wiretap and surveillance tapes released in the Kott trial provide examples of legislators trying to gum up the works and slow down unfavorable legislation. But the House members tied to Veco did not appear to have the clout necessary to shove through Veco's preferred 20 percent tax rate.

SIX HELD FIRM ON LOWER TAX

A low point in futility for Veco-tied legislators -- cited in Kott's federal indictment -- appears to come in the first special session on June 4, moments after the House first passed an amendment raising the PPT rate to 23.5 percent.

Kott made a quick and desperate motion to adjourn the House before the new bill could be adopted. The motion failed miserably, drawing just six Republican votes. Four of the six have since been charged or convicted in the current federal corruption probe.

The other two votes were from Kevin Meyer and Mike Chenault, the powerful House Finance co-chairmen. Both have oil industry ties: Meyer works in procurement for Conoco Phillips, Chenault owns a construction company that does oil field work. Neither has been implicated in the Veco scandal other than as members of the so-called "Corrupt Bastards Club," identified for their past campaign contributions from Veco.

High-tax advocates in the House also had to deal with the defection of several rural Democrats, who voted consistently for lower versions of the PPT tax. A $183 million endowment for rural power subsidies, along with $70 million for rural schools, had been placed in the state budget, contingent on passage of a tax. A Veco executive discussed budget "buyoffs" in one wiretapped conversation, but rural legislators have insisted they did not sell their votes or yield to blackmail.

Despite such obstacles, a bipartisan coalition pushed through a 23.5 percent tax with a final vote of 29-9 in the House.

Ben Stevens responded by calling the Senate-passed figure of 22.5 percent non-negotiable, "like concrete."

He appointed three senators to a conference committee that agreed to 22.8 percent, but that figure was rejected by the House and the bill died.

A second special session, starting in late July, was necessary to adopt the final tax. It came in at the figure Stevens insisted on: 22.5 percent.

It's hard to say whether the 23.5-percent measure that passed the House was truly the high-water mark for PPT legislation in 2006. Small-print details in each tax bill could significantly raise or lower the state's take. No fiscal note analyzing the state's likely income was prepared for that particular House-passed bill during its brief four-day life.

But one thing was clear: The industry did not want to see it pass. This bill was the subject of a now-famous wiretapped conversation on June 6 between Veco's Allen and Conoco Phillips Alaska president Jim Bowles, in which the executives discussed how to stop it.

Two days later, Allen called Conoco Phillips again and said, "I told you ... between Pete Kott and with Ben, we wouldn't have a bill."

CORRUPTION: Learn more about the Alaska political corruption investigation, including audio and video, past coverage and an overview.

adn.com/fbi

SPECIAL SESSION: Read about the special legislative session on oil taxes.

adn.com

INSIDE

TRACKING THE TAX: See how negotiations on the Petroleum Profits Tax in 2006 relate to events that have surfaced in the corruption trials.

Page A-4

FBI - Stevens-1401

LOAD-DATE: October 30, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

CORRECTION-DATE: October 28, 2007

CORRECTION: Correction A story on Page A-1 Sunday about oil taxes identified state Sen. Gene Therriault as a Fairbanks Republican. His home district is North Pole.

GRAPHIC: Illustrated by RON ENGSTROM / Anchorage Daily News

ILLUSTRATION SHOWS TIMELINE OF HOW THE 2006 LEGISLATURE WORKED ITS WAY TO A NEW TAX ON OIL PRODUCTION.
SEANNA O'SULLIVAN / Associated Press archive 2006
Then-Senate President Ben Stevens, center, and Sen. Gary Stevens, right, listened to Sen. Kim Elton during a 2006 session. Ben Stevens withdrew his bid for re-election on July 5, 2006, saying he wanted more time with his family.
DAVID J. SHEAKLEY / Associated Press archive 2006
House Speaker John Harris gavels during a special session called by Gov. Frank Murkowski to address same-sex partner benefits on Nov. 15, 2006.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1402

FAIRBANKS
Daily News - Miner

No one else in Alaska had clout Allen demonstrated in 2002 tax break fight

By Dermot Cole
Published October 28, 2007

VECO BILL: Five years ago VECO boss Bill Allen had Rep. Pete Kott introduce a bill written by VECO to give the oil industry a break on property taxes worth $760 million on a gas pipeline project.

Though VECO never offered a detailed financial analysis, key legislators reacted with lightning speed to Allen's bidding and moved the bill through three committees in the waning days of the 2002 session. When Allen talked, legislators listened.

VECO argued that the bill wouldn't cost the state anything because without the incentive, there would never be a gas pipeline from which to collect any taxes.

Allen has now been convicted of bribing legislators and Kott has been convicted of accepting bribes from VECO in connection with the campaign to revise Alaska's oil tax law in 2006.

In one of the FBI tapes from the VECO suite in the Baranof Hotel in 2006, Allen told VECO lieutenant Rick Smith, "What we done with 519, right now we've gotta do more than that."

What did VECO do with House Bill 519? We will never know all the details, but a VECO attorney drafted the bill in 2002, presented it to a legislator picked by VECO and Allen walked the halls of the Capitol and testified three times, pressuring lawmakers to approve it. The bill did not pass, but not for lack of effort on Allen's part.

In the first hearing on the VECO bill, Kott testified he had recently been to Las Vegas and that the gas pipeline was like a slot machine — you have to put something in to get something out.

"Is there a loss of revenue?" Kott said. "No, there's nothing to be taxed right now."

Allen and his subordinates lined up the major oil companies, the Alaska State Chamber of Commerce and some municipal leaders, such as Fairbanks Borough Mayor Rhonda Boyles, to support his bill. Gov. Tony Knowles, Democratic legislators and some Republicans opposed the tax break as a giveaway.

FBI - Stevens-1403

"There may be concern that this will be viewed as a giveaway and that, instead, the state should negotiate with the gas owners before any incentives are given," said VECO attorney David Marquez, who drafted the bill.

Marquez, who later served as attorney general under Gov. Frank Murkowski, said that "VECO's position is, let's grant this incentive. Let's send a signal and negotiate later ... "

When Allen testified in favor of the bill before the House Finance Committee, he poured a glass of water and asked, "You got anything else I can put in this water?"

194-AN-13620-M; 593

"Only if you share," a committee member said.

Allen, who has a speech impediment because of a motorcycle accident in 2001, routinely asked Rick Smith to read his official testimony, but he made a few introductory comments.

"I'm not here to speak for the producers. They didn't ask me to do this. I'm an Alaskan who has fought right along with all you guys for local hire, for jobs and for your future," Allen said.

In his written testimony, Allen told the lawmakers, "I know most of you personally. Over the years, we've had the chance to work together on many issues important to Alaskans: creating jobs and local hire, improving education, encouraging business and economic development, to name just a few."

He said nothing was more important to Alaska's future than a gas pipeline and the tax waiver would send a clear signal that "Alaska is ready to step up to the plate to help build Alaska's future."

Allen testified on the bill before the resources committee. Kohring, who is now on trial for allegedly accepting bribes from Allen, was not a member of that committee, but he participated in the hearing because "I just feel very strongly about this legislation ... "

After Allen finished testifying, Kohring praised him:

"I don't have a question for you Bill, I'm not gonna put you on the spot, but just to thank VECO for their contributions to our economy, as far as the local hire issue, hiring local Alaskans that are qualified and for contributing to our economy in so many ways with the dollars that have been invested and so forth.

"And I see you guys playing a substantial role in the future here in the state, but of course part of that is conditional upon how the Legislature acts and whether we are cooperative with the industry and I think this legislation will move us in that direction."

(On Friday, Allen testified at Kohring's trial that he first gave a $600 to $700 cash payment to Kohring in 2002, the year that VECO was pushing the $760 million gas pipeline tax break.)

When the tax break bill moved to the finance committee, Fairbanks Rep. Jim Whitaker managed to amend the measure so that the tax break became a tax deferral, with repayment subject to future negotiations. Fairbanks Rep. John Davies was among those siding with Whitaker.

Angered at the decision, committee co-chairman Rep. Eldon Mulder, who had received $9,000 over two years in contributions from people with ties to VECO, halted action on the bill.

Whitaker said that before the vote, Mulder "took me aside and said that 'if this amendment passes you can forget a fiscal plan and I don't care if Fairbanks ever gets gas.'"

Mulder brought the bill up again three days later and moved to rescind Whitaker's amendment.

The deciding vote was supplied by Democratic Rep. Carl Moses of Unalaska, who said he had been "half asleep" and voted with Whitaker in the earlier meeting by mistake. The $760 million tax break was back in the bill.

Whitaker told a reporter that Moses "must have woken up when he saw the capital budget," referring to

FBI - Stevens-1404

Mulder's ability to direct projects to Moses' district.

In the end, Allen, other VECO officials, oil company executives, legislators and the governor held a full day of private negotiations, but couldn't reach agreement on payback provisions for the tax break, so it died without a floor vote.

Allen's clout evaporated with the FBI wiretaps and his conviction, but no one else in Alaska, elected or not, had the political might he demonstrated in getting that bill raised to the top of the legislative and industry agenda within a matter of days in 2002.

In one sense, Allen remains a central figure in Alaska politics, serving as a prosecution witness, forced to reveal elements of how he operated in what almost seems like a shadow government.

Dermot Cole can be reached at cole@newsminer.com or 459-07530.

This article may be accessed online at http://newsminer.com/2007/10/28/9573.
This article is copyrighted property of the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner. Unauthorized reproduction of this article other than for personal use is strictly prohibited. To obtain permission for republication in any form, please contact the News-Miner. Visit http://newsminer.com/contact/ for more information.

FBI - Stevens-1405

Alaska Newsreader

Today's news for the Last Frontier

By David Hulen
Published: October 29, 2007
Last Modified: October 29, 2007 at 04:20 PM

News for Monday, Oct. 29

Story tools
Comment on this story
E-mail a friend
Print
Digg this
Seed Newsvine
Send link via AIM
Font size : A | A | A

Supreme Court to hear Exxon Valdez punitive damages case. The big Alaska news this morning is out of Washington, where the Supreme Court has decided to consider Exxon's appeal of the $2.5 billion damages award from the 1989 oil spill. Good news for Exxon, not so good for the plaintiffs. The company's stock is up this morning. Among the early stories: Associated Press, Reuters and Bloomberg.

***

Booo! Restless spirits are wandering around downtown Anchorage. Just in time for Halloween, MSNBC has a roundup of haunted hotels, and guess who's No. 1 on the list. The Anchorage Hotel downtown.

The ghost most often reported is the city's first chief of police, John J. Sturgus. In 1921, the Anchorage sheriff was shot in the alleyway, and he died while he was being taken to the hospital. But he seems to return to the hotel frequently.

And then there's the jilted bride who supposedly hanged herself in her wedding dress and wanders the hallways.

***

PPT wasn't the first time Allen and Veco pushed lawmakers on oil taxes. The influence-peddling of Veco executives Bill Allen and Rick Smith during the 2006 debate over the oil profits tax is by now heavily documented – in their guilty pleas, in the recordings played for jurors, in their testimony in the Kott and Kohring trials.

But was that the first time Veco pushed its weight around in Juneau on oil taxes? Fairbanks Daily News-Miner columnist Dermot Cole, in columns Saturday and Sunday, makes a strong case for the answer being "no." Cole examines the journey, in 2002, of House Bill 519, a measure that would have provided oil companies nearly $800 million in tax breaks as a precursor to building a natural gas pipeline. Allen and his allies – including Rep. Pete Kott - pushed it, and pushed it hard. It quickly became known as "the Veco bill," and Cole points out that it was on a fast track, even though little backup information was provided. Critics finally put the kibosh on it.

"The eager acceptance given to House Bill 519 by some in Juneau showed that Veco executives enjoyed a level of access and influence denied to ordinary citizens. The Veco employee who wrote the bill, a future attorney general, said he delivered the draft of the measure to "the staff of the legislator picked by Veco and its lobbyists ..."

The ADN does its own dissection of the question of whether last year's oil tax was tainted by corruption -- and quickly focuses on questions about what was happening in the state Senate. There are plenty of clues – in the legislative record, in the various criminal charges and in interviews with people involved. A timeline shows what was happening in the Legislature, how the tax rate went up and down, and the various Veco-influenced acts that were occurring behind the scenes. (The color graphic online is easier to follow than the black-and-white version that appeared in print.)

Also, we've assembled all those FBI audio and video recordings being played for jurors in the Kohring trial and put them on a single Web page, with detailed descriptions. If you're following the case, these are worth browsing through. There's an explanation of how we got them posted on the Alaska Politics blog. If there's one recording to see, it's probably the March 30, 2006, video. In many ways, it's the heart of the feds' case against Kohring – it's the one where he comes to the Veco [illegible]

What's the Newsreader?

ADN editors find the news from all over Alaska every morning so you don't have to. Updated weekdays by 9 a.m. AST. (Some links may require registration)

MORE ABOUT THE NEWSREADER
SEND LINKS AND SUGGESTIONS
E-MAIL NEWSLETTER | RSS FEED

ALASKA, ETC.: Blogs, chatter, life in the North

"Know guts, know glory"

Musher Lance Mackey has known poverty, jail and cancer. And he's the only one who has known what it's like to win the Yukon Quest and the Iditarod Trail Sled Dog Race in the same year. (Alaska magazine)

A whale of a time

A 4-year-old boy and a 5-year-old beluga at Quingdao Polar Ocean World in China appear to have established a special relationship. The youngster, Yang Yang, and the beluga swim together often – and both appear to enjoy it. The story includes a series of photos of the pair. (Daily Mail)

Birds of the North Slope

A Cornell Lab of Ornithology biologist traveled recently to Alaska's Teshekpuk Lake and returned with a wealth of bird recordings. Some of the sounds he acquired and his discussion of them were featured on "Living on Earth." (loe org)

Climate warming skeptics

A small but vocal minority continues to question the contention that the increase in Earth's temperatures stems from human activity. These voices argue that findings of human-caused global warming say more about politics than about science. (The Christian Science Monitor)

"The Ballad of Chris McCandless"

"He was out on the highway smiling, A mystic in torn blue jeans. ..." So begins the Ellis Paul song on the album "The Speed of Trees." The song pays homage to McCandless, who is the subject of a new film made by Sean Penn. (ellispaul com)

Alaska video

Hot dogging in Alaska

A video about how to cook a caribou hotdog on a snowmachine muffler. The video also explores the rivalry between snowmachiners and skiers. (YouTube)

Capers the otter

Orphaned in Alaska, a male sea otter pup who was rescued and rehabilitated made his media debut recently at his temporary home - Chicago's Shedd Aquarium. (youtube com)

Caught in the act

Video is boosting the cases against vessels accused of illegally fishing with drift nets in international waters of the North Pacific. The tapes, usually shot from the air, are showing acts and rigging that indicate violations of the 15-year-old U N. ban on the technique. (CBC News)

"There is a bear in the back of our car."

The perils of open windows. "...Wonder if insurance will pay for these scratches." (YouTube)

Really dumb idea - trying to ride a moose

Video clip from one of those crazy-stunt home video shows. (YouTube)

More video »

FBI - Stevens-1406

194-HQ-13620-M;594

Sell it today ▸ Place an ad | Find an ad

Top Jobs all 88 top jobs »

Accounting/Finance
Accounting Specialist
Adak Telephone Utility

Skilled\Trades
Welders
Seward Ship Dry Dock

EMS/Law Enforcement/Security
EMS Coordinator
City of Unalaska, Alaska

Engineering/Technical
Environmental Technician
Coeur Alaska The Kensington Gold Mine

Find

Advanced search » | Place an employment ad

Homes by Northern Trust more »

Move In NOW
3BR, 2BA, 2 Car Garage town homes. Private landscaped yards.

1 of 9

Homescape

Search ADN Real Estate » | Place a homes ad

Top Rentals more

Foxwood Condominiums
South Anchorage: heated garage parking, woodburning fireplaces, shopping and fine dining nearby!

3 of 12

apartments.com

Advanced Search | Place a rentals ad

Top Autos all autos

Anchorage Chrysler Center

2004 Ford Ranger
$13,000
Anchorage Chrysler Center

5 of 7

Powered by

Search for a New or Used Car | Place an auto ad

Best Deals more deals »

Pets & Farming
Find puppies, kittens, and all pet supplies and services here. More...

Other Transportation
Find great deals on bicycles, snowmachines,

© Copyright 2007, The Anchorage Daily News, a subsidiary of The McClatchy Company
Contact Us | Newsroom Contacts | Communication Forms | Subscriptions | Advertising | Terms of Use
Daily News Jobs | RSS Feeds | ADN Store | Newspapers In Education | Privacy Agreement

A member of the
Real Cities Network

FBI - Stevens-1407

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 29, 2007 Monday
Correction Appended
FINAL EDITION

Lawmakers jumpy over guidelines;
ETHICS RULES: Can I? Should I? Tell me, morals police, what to do.

BYLINE: By KYLE HOPKINS khopkins@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 803 words

Some of their fellow politicians are on trial for corruption. They've got a thick new ethics rulebook to play by this year.

It's no wonder Alaska legislators are busy asking just what they are and aren't allowed to do in hopes of staying out of trouble.

"Calls have increased at least a third," said Joyce Anderson, administrator for the state legislative ethics committee, which answers lawmakers' questions about ethics rules.

The committee also interprets how the rules apply, and last week revealed its most recent rulings. It decided, for example, that under new laws it's OK for a legislator to eat a free meal at a lobbyist's house but not for a lobbyist to pick up the tab for a cab ride to the airport.

"You've got people asking questions that their own common sense and good judgment should answer," said Sen. Con Bunde, R-Anchorage, a member of the committee.

There's reason for the legislators to be cautious. Two former lawmakers have been found guilty this year of accepting bribes, while another two are awaiting trial. After a former Veco executive told a jury that his company paid for as many as 100 polls for politicians, a public interest group and a political activist both looked to put legislators on the spot by asking them if Veco gave them illegal benefits.

That atmosphere of suspicion, combined with about 45 pages worth of changes to the state ethics rules that took effect in July, has people checking in with the ethics committee more than usual, Bunde said.

"I've not seen people so disinclined to trust their own judgment."

Here are three questions the ethics committee tackled in late September:

Can a legislative staffer accept a gift from a spouse if the spouse is a lobbyist?

FBI - Stevens-1408

No, the ethics committee decided. Not under the current rules. It's still legal for someone who works for a legislator to be married to a lobbyist, but the lobbyist can't give the staffer-spouse a gift.

Anderson said that was an unintended side effect of the rewritten ethics code. She said the committee will ask the Legislature to change the law so that, say, a husband lobbyist could give his legislative staffer wife a birthday present.

As for legislators themselves, their spouses can't be lobbyists under the new law.

Can a lobbyist give a legislator a ride to the airport?

194A-AN-13620-M;595

No, the committee decided. While it ruled that a lobbyist can wine and dine a politician at the lobbyist's home -- as long as all the food and drink is for "immediate consumption" -- legislators apparently have to pick up the tab for their own ride home.

Paying for a legislator's taxi ride, such as a trip to the airport, is considered giving the lawmaker a free service, which is against the rules, Anderson said.

Still, she said, "It doesn't mean they can't share a cab with a lobbyist and pay their fair share."

The committee also said that while a company can pay to send a legislator on a trip, as long as the trip is for research, a lobbyist can't be the one who makes the travel arrangements.

Can legislators write letters of recommendation on their state stationery?

Bunde said this question -- whether it was all right to print character references or letters of condolences on legislative letterhead -- came from Rep. Mike Doogan, D-Anchorage.

"Even he agreed that it was asinine that he had to even ask," Bunde said.

Doogan said the confusion stemmed from an ethics briefing where it was unclear what letterhead could be used for.

"My real goal was that if they told me that the law would prevent me from doing that, I was going to change the law ... because it just seems stupid to me," he said.

No need. The committee said yes, letters of recommendation and similar uses are OK for official letterhead.

Find Kyle Hopkins' political blog online at adn.com/alaskapolitics or call him at 257-4334.

... would you know the rules? Take this true-false quiz on the new state ethics law. Answers appear on the back page.

1A legislative staffer cannot accept a gift from a spouse if that spouse is a lobbyist.

2A legislator may not accept a free meal from a lobbyist.

3A lawmaker has a conflict of interest if he or she has a $1,000 investment in a matter before the Legislature.

4A lobbyist can give a legislator a ride to the airport.

5A lawmaker may write a letter of recommendation on his or her official legislative letterhead.

If you were a legislator ...

1True. A legislative staffer may not accept a gift from a lobbyist-spouse.

2False. A legislator may accept a meal from lobbyists. However, the lobbyist must report the cost if the food or drinks exceed $15.

3False. It would take an investment of at least $5,000 before a conflict occurs.

FBI - Stevens-1409

4False. The free ride to the airport would be an improper gift.

5True. Lawmakers may write letters of recommendation on their letterhead.

Ethics quiz answers

LOAD-DATE: October 31, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

CORRECTION-DATE: October 29, 2007

CORRECTION: Correction A breakout quiz on Page A-1 Monday about what constitutes ethical behavior for public officials contained a mistake. The quiz incorrectly said a lawmaker has a conflict of interest if he or she has a $5,000 or more investment in a matter before the Legislature. That financial threshold applies to executive branch employees. For legislators, the rule is that a conflict of interest occurs if they have a "substantial" ownership interest and their action would benefit or hurt them more than it would others in their occupation or industry.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1410

2 of 2 DOCUMENTS

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 30, 2007 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

Allen drops blackmail bombshell in testimony; KOHRING TRIAL: Secret video and "Red Carpet List" also come up as prosecution rests.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER and KYLE HOPKINS Anchorage Daily News

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1320 words

Former Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen, on the witness stand for a second day Monday, revealed that his nephew tried to blackmail him over work done on U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens' home.

That bombshell, a side issue to the main event, came as one of a number of developments Monday in the public corruption trial of former state Rep. Vic Kohring, a Wasilla Republican. Among tidbits presented to jurors:

* A video from February 2005 showed Kohring talking about the possibility of consulting for Veco. It was secretly recorded by Frank Prewitt, then a consultant for the private prison firm Cornell Cos. who was working undercover for the FBI, unknown to his employer.

* A document taken off Kohring's legislative computer titled "Red Carpet List" named his favored office visitors, in four categories: lobbyists, friends, supporters, other. Allen and former Veco vice president Rick Smith were included as "supporters" but not friends. That cuts into one of the main defense arguments, that money given to Kohring by Veco executives was just a gift from friends, not a calculated bribe as prosecutors assert.

* Kohring told FBI agents in a lengthy interview during the Aug. 31, 2006, search of his Wasilla legislative office that he had accepted money from Allen and Smith for his own personal use, as well as campaign contributions. After he thought about it awhile, he described the money as a gift, FBI agent Alan Vanderploeg told jurors.

At day's end, prosecutors rested their case. To wrap up the government's evidence against Kohring, they called a flurry of quick witnesses: state Sen. Tom Wagoner, R-Kenai, who talked about a dustup from a 2003 oil bill; the legislative ethics administrator; and a couple of FBI agents.

Allen decided to cooperate with the feds the day he was first confronted by the FBI, on Aug. 30, 2006. The next day, offices of six legislators were searched by the FBI. He said he was shown the FBI's secretly made recordings, which are the backbone of the government case.

FBI - Stevens-1411

Prosecutor Joe Bottini asked Allen if seeing the recording from March 30, 2006, in which Allen hands money to Kohring, factored into his decision to cooperate.

Yes, Allen answered.

Why? Bottini said.

"I knew that was ... illegal, what I done," Allen testified.

Over the course of the day, the defense tried to discredit Allen, raise questions about the money given to Kohring and show that in the scheme of things, Kohring was a bit player.

194A-AN-13620-M;596

Allen's heated relationship with his nephew, Dave Anderson, first came into public view last month in the corruption trial of former House Speaker Pete Kott. In that trial, the defense pushed Allen on whether he had threatened to have Anderson killed because of the blackmail -- but never asked what the blackmail was all about.

On Monday, Kohring's defense lawyer, John Henry Browne of Seattle, brought up the blackmail anew.

"I was not going to kill him, no," Allen said, as he did in the earlier trial.

Allen, who suffered a head injury in a 2001 motorcycle crash and struggles with words, seemed less addled on the stand than he had been late Friday afternoon.

What was Anderson blackmailing him about? Browne asked.

"Ted Stevens' house," Allen answered.

U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens' official residence, a home in Girdwood, doubled in size during a renovation overseen by Veco in 2000. The Daily News reported in May that the remodel, and Veco's role in it, were part of the far-reaching, ongoing investigation into public corruption in Alaska. In July, FBI and IRS agents spent nearly 12 hours searching the house and documenting the addition. Stevens has denied wrongdoing and has said he paid the bills that were given to him.

Robert Williams, a Veco employee who supervised construction on the house, said in an interview last month that Anderson was a metal worker who helped construct the steel staircase for the Girdwood house.

In court on Monday, Browne asked Allen to confirm that Veco paid for the renovation. Allen said he didn't know what it cost.

Was it a gift to Sen. Stevens? Browne asked.

No, Allen said.

"I didn't know how much the house cost, and I still don't know," Allen said.

Browne asked Allen whether he had cooperated with the government in its investigation into Ted Stevens "and the money Veco gave to help with the house."

Yes, Allen answered.

Browne tried to portray Allen as someone working with federal prosecutors because he has to -- to protect himself, his grown children and his former business.

Veco was sold in September for about $400 million to CH2M Hill. Allen testified that he and his family owned 85 percent of the company at that time.

While Veco has not been charged criminally, Allen never got a written assurance from prosecutors that absolutely protects it from prosecution. He said that he could have sold Veco for more with such a commitment.

On the stand in this trial, as he did in the earlier trial of Kott, Allen said he doesn't care what happens to him.

"Hell, my life is all, all over anyway," he said. "I begged on the pass for Veco and I never got that done, so, you know, to hell with it."

Kohring rubbed his neck as he listened. A scar near his collar is a reminder of the spinal fusion surgery that he says still bothers him, and is one reason he once told the Veco executives he was in debt for medical bills.

Later, Browne asked Allen if he cares what happens to his adult children even if he doesn't care about himself. If prosecutors think Allen hasn't cooperated, can't Allen's children still be indicted? Browne asked.

FBI - Stevens-1412

Yes, Allen said, as one of his daughters, Tammy Kerrigan, watched from the gallery.

As prosecutors neared the end of their case, former Alaska corrections commissioner-turned-consultant Frank Prewitt took the stand, describing a two-hour dinner he had with Kohring on Feb. 15, 2005.

Prewitt wore a hidden camera. In a video played for the jury, he could be heard telling Kohring that Veco is "always giving people consulting contracts."

"You'd think they'd offer you one," Prewitt said.

Kohring could be seen seated across from Prewitt, eating. The camera tilted up when Prewitt took a drink from a mug.

"Well, maybe I should ask them," Kohring said.

Veco already had offered to hire him in some capacity, he said. He soon added he would want a "legitimate arrangement" and said he didn't want a "freebie."

Kohring told Prewitt that Veco had been his biggest political supporter, giving him $40,000 or $50,000 over the years.

Prewitt also asked about a former Kohring aide, Eric Musser. Kohring told Prewitt that Allen leaned on him to get Musser to drop a campaign finance complaint against another Valley legislator, Beverly Masek, a Republican from Willow.

In the tape, Kohring doesn't say he fired Musser -- something prosecutors assert -- but said he didn't like that the aide filed the complaint without telling him.

As for Masek, Kohring said: "In some ways, I wanted her to at least get a slap on the wrist and be held accountable for what she had done."

At one point in the video, Kohring said that Allen is on his "red carpet list" of friends and supporters -- people who are welcomed in his office at any time.

Prosecutors showed the jury a copy of that list. It included 22 names -- 10 lobbyists, eight people listed as "personal friends" and four people described as "supporters."

Allen, Smith and former Veco president Pete Leathard were all listed as supporters.

It wasn't clear at day's end whether Kohring would testify or whether the defense would put on a case at all. Browne told Sedwick he honestly didn't know.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390. Find Kyle Hopkins online at adn.com/contact/khopkins or call 257-4334. Daily News reporter Richard Mauer contributed to this story.

VIDEO: Frank Prewitt's secret recording of Vic Kohring. adn.com/fbi

BLOG: "Red Carpet List" and live trial updates. adn.com/alaskapolitics

LOAD-DATE: October 30, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

FBI - Stevens-1413

GRAPHIC: Former Veco chief Bill Allen was termed a "supporter" in Kohring's computer.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 30, 2007 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

Kohring earned close to $100K from two jobs; TIMING: Ex-legislator also went to Veco execs for help with a debt.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A6

LENGTH: 274 words

DATELINE: JUNEAU -

Former Wasilla state Rep. Vic Kohring, who is pleading poverty at his corruption trial, reported making almost $100,000 last year in salary and per diem as a state legislator and private consultant to Anchorage developer Marc Marlow.

The income came at the same time Kohring was going to Veco executives for help with a $17,000 debt he said was headed for collection. Ex-Veco chief Bill Allen testified he gave Kohring money both to influence him and because he didn't seem to have enough money even to eat, and Allen felt sorry for him.

Kohring reported to the Alaska Public Offices Commission that property developer Marlow paid him $25,300 in 2006, the year Kohring is accused of taking bribes from Veco.

Kohring reported that Marlow paid him to "assist with the development of construction related projects including arranging and conducting meetings, performing research, and developing plans and strategies."

The state paid Kohring $38,412 in salary as a state legislator in 2006. That breaks down to $24,012 for his base legislative salary and $14,400 he claimed for work when the Legislature was not in session.

The state gave Kohring another $31,687 in per diem meant to cover lodging and expenses during the legislative session.

Along with the salary and per diem -- which, combined with his consulting income totaled $95,399 -- the state gave Kohring thousands more in reimbursements.

* $8,000 as an allowance for general office and business expenses.

* $4,297 in reimbursement for his expenses moving to and from Juneau for the legislative session. FBI - Stevens-1414

* $9,292 in reimbursement for travel expenses he reported for state business.

LOAD-DATE: October 30, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

194A-AN-13620-m; 597

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1415

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

October 31, 2007 Wednesday
FINAL EDITION

Kohring stays off the stand;
DEFENSE RESTS: Nephew of ex-legislator, longtime friend give their testimony.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER and KYLE HOPKINS Anchorage Daily News

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1459 words

The defense case for former state Rep. Vic Kohring consisted of two witnesses who on Tuesday spent just an hour on the stand between them: Kohring's 19-year-old nephew and a longtime Kohring friend and political adviser from the Mat-Su area.

The Wasilla Republican never testified. His lawyer, John Henry Browne, hinted at several points during the trial that Kohring would do so. But it's always a gamble for a defendant to face prosecutors, and Browne said Tuesday they decided there was no need.

"It's definitely a tough call," Browne said. "We agonized until 12 or 1 o'clock last night and we were ready to go either way today. And my feeling is that they just haven't proven the case."

Closing arguments in the corruption case are set for this morning.

Jurors will have to decide whether Kohring solicited and accepted bribes from executives with the former Veco Corp. to push the oil field service company's interests on an oil tax and other matters. The defense says the money Kohring took was simply gifts from friends. Veco is no more -- it was sold to CH2M Hill in September.

If the jury believes former Veco chief executive Bill Allen, "we're in trouble," Browne said. Allen testified about making payments to Kohring during last year's legislative session -- hundreds of dollars in cash handed to him in front of a secret FBI surveillance camera in Veco's hotel suite, $1,000 in cash during dinner at a Juneau-area bar, several hundred dollars more on the last night of a special session. Allen said he gave Kohring cash multiple other times going back to 2002.

Browne said Allen shouldn't be believed, that he would lie to save his adult children, who were part owners of Veco, from prosecution.

The bribes, prosecutors say, consist of $2,100 to $2,600 in 2006, the $3,000 summer job for Kohring's nephew, and an attempt to get another $17,000 from the Veco executives to pay off a credit card bill. In all, Kohring faces four felony counts: bribery, conspiracy, extortion and attempted extortion.

FBI - Stevens-1416

NEPHEW'S TESTIMONY

On Tuesday, Aaron Kohring took the stand for the defense to tell jurors about his 2006 summer job with Veco.

Prosecutors say that Aaron was hired for a well-paying summer internship because Kohring pulled strings with Veco executives.

Aaron's a tall, athletic-looking young man with close-cropped hair. He was a basketball star in high school. He wore a tan sweater and seemed calm on the stand, though he said later said it was difficult for him.

Under questioning by Browne, he told jurors that he was exceptionally close to his uncle.

"I grew up without a father and Vic has always been there kind of filling that role, pretty much," Aaron told jurors.

194A-AN-13620-M; 598

Aaron said his Uncle Vic told him in early 2006 that positions were opening up at Veco. He was 17, about to graduate from high school, and needed a summer job. Someone at Veco, not his uncle, told him he was hired. He said his job ended up being "mainly a facility position or a facility worker, I guess you'd call it."

He worked eight hours a day, made $16 an hour, and used the money to help pay for his first year as a petroleum engineering student at the University of Alaska Fairbanks and to cover some bills at home, he said.

Then it was prosecutor Joe Bottini's turn to ask the questions. Under cross examination, Aaron said that Kohring helped him put his resume together. And his uncle either e-mailed it or hand-delivered it to Veco.

Asked by Bottini whether he ever interviewed for the job, he said he didn't.

"You basically give a resume to your uncle, as far as you know, that gets turned in to Veco?"

"Mm-hmm," Aaron responded

"And then someone calls you and says you're hired, right?"

"Mm-hmm," he said.

Wasn't the job basically moving furniture, emptying recycling bins, rearranging cubicles? Aaron agreed it was manual labor.

Prosecutors have made a point that he also got $24 an hour for overtime but Aaron said he only made that two or three times for working through lunch.

Later Tuesday after the defense wrapped up, prosecutors called Kari MacDonald, a recruiting specialist for Veco who now works for CH2M Hill.

She said the summer internship was supposed to be a mentorship for college juniors and seniors, not new high school graduates.

So why was Aaron Kohring hired? Bottini asked.

"He was referred to us by Bill Allen," MacDonald said. Former Veco vice president Rick Smith earlier testified that he wrote the referral that mentioned Aaron was Kohring's nephew, but he signed Allen's name.

Without that, MacDonald said she "highly doubted" Aaron would have been hired.

Also on Tuesday, the defense called Robert Hall, owner of Gorilla Fireworks in Houston, a lawyer and a political consultant to Kohring.

He is 49, the same age as Kohring, and they went to Dimond High together. He described Kohring as "a friend and client."

Hall, wearing black jeans and a plaid shirt with pearl buttons, spoke softly, but also conversationally, sometimes directly talking to the jury. He looks like an older version of the actor Jack Black.

Both sides seemed to use him as a surrogate for Kohring. Browne asked Hall about former Kohring aide Eric Musser.

Prosecutors say Allen asked Kohring in 2004 to get Musser to drop a campaign money complaint against then-Rep. Beverly Masek, R-Willow. They also say Kohring laid off Musser and then made the layoff permanent. But they didn't call Musser to testify.

"Was Mr. Musser ever fired by Mr. Kohring?" Browne asked.

FBI - Stevens-1417

"No, he was not," Hall replied.

After hearing about Hall's testimony, Musser called into the Mike Porcaro talk show on KENI-AM to tell his side of the story. He told Porcaro that he did, indeed, get fired.

"How would Robert know? He wasn't my boss. I mean, I didn't work for Robert Hall," Musser said. "... Mr. Hall's memory must be eluding him."

CAMPAIGN HELP

Prosecutor Edward Sullivan, with the U.S. Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, D.C., tried to show the business and political ties between Hall and Kohring in cross examining Hall.

Hall said that he and his wife and probably his father had given to Kohring's campaigns. "We loaned him a truck, but it was in my wife's name, and I declared that as a contribution," Hall said.

He said all he got out of lending the truck was a full tank of gas and a lube job.

The prosecutor asked about different businesses or companies Hall owned -- a coffee stand, fireworks stands, a company called Alaska Nanometal, a media business that placed ads for Kohring.

Since 2000, the prosecutor asked, is it true that Hall's media business has been paid more than $63,000 by Kohring's campaigns?

"That could be," Hall said, including the costs of buying ads.

Sullivan asked Hall where Kohring stayed when he was working as a legislator in Juneau.

Kohring was first elected in 1994 and at first lived with roommates, Hall said. Then Kohring slept on a boat and then in a camper, he said. The last six to eight years, Kohring slept on a couch in his office, Hall said.

Would Hall be surprised to hear that Kohring made nearly $100,000, including his base salary and consulting work? Sullivan asked.

"Well, I think that would only be one year..... I think the other years, it would have topped out at ($80,000) or so," Hall said.

Sullivan asked Hall whether Kohring performed "official acts" to help his fireworks business.

"On several occasions," Hall answered.

Sullivan asked him whether he knew of proposals to restrict fireworks after the enormous 1996 Miller's Reach fire. Hall at first said he didn't. He said there was never an official cause but that officials found bottle rockets twisted together and buried near where the fire started.

Didn't Hall remember Kohring "running around the halls of the governor's office trying to address this fireworks issue?" Sullivan asked. Hall said he remembers efforts to restrict fireworks for safety reasons.

After both sides wrapped up Tuesday morning, Kohring told reporters he felt confident but acknowledged: "There's no guarantees. You're rolling the dice when you go to trial."

He showed reporters something he's had with him throughout the trial: An icon of St. Victor. He said his wife, who is Russian, gave it to him in 2003 "to keep me safe and successful."

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390. Find Kyle Hopkins online at adn.com/contact/khopkins or call 257-4334.

FBI - Stevens-1418

INSIDE

DENIED: The judge rejects a prosecution request to get Kohring's income tax returns.

Back Page

UPDATES: Get the latest from the courtroom today with our up-to-the-minute blogs, including closing arguments.

adn.com/alaskapolitics

HEAR BILL ALLEN: Audio of his testimony, including how he was blackmailed over work on Ted Stevens' home.

adn.com/fbi

LOAD-DATE: October 31, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1419

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 1, 2007 Thursday
FINAL EDITION

Jury gets Kohring case;
Were cash and favors evidence of corruption or camaraderie?

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER and KYLE HOPKINS Anchorage Daily News

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1717 words

Jurors deliberating the corruption case against former state Rep. Vic Kohring are wrestling with two opposing pictures laid out Wednesday by lawyers on each side:

Manipulative state lawmaker on the take, or well-meaning public servant who took some gifts from friends.

The lawyers gave dramatic closing arguments -- with visual aids and stage whispers -- on the trial's eighth day in U.S. District Court. The case went to jurors just before noon.

Prosecutors told jurors they had plenty of evidence that Kohring knew how to work Veco Corp. executives with his hand out -- for free meals, an internship for his nephew, help with a credit card debt, payments of cash.

Prosecutor Edward Sullivan walked jurors through meetings and phone conversations between Kohring and Veco executives Bill Allen and Rick Smith during the 2006 legislation session. None of them knew it, but the FBI was recording them.

A freeze-frame image of Kohring smiling as he accepted a handful of cash from Allen flashed behind Sullivan on the big screen in Courtroom 3. It came from an FBI recording made on March 30, 2006, in Suite 604 of Juneau's Baranof Hotel.

"Take a look at that picture," Sullivan told jurors. "Folks, that is not a gift. That's a payoff. That is a bribe."

Sullivan, who is with the U.S. Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, D.C., reminded jurors what Kohring said after accepting two cash payments that day from the Veco executives.

"He asks for instructions. 'What can I do to help you guys at this point?'" Sullivan said.

Kohring, a Wasilla Republican elected seven times, is the third former state lawmaker to stand trial this year for bribery and other crimes in the wide-ranging federal investigation into corruption in Alaska politics. Kohring is charged with bribery, conspiracy, extortion and attempted extortion.

FBI - Stevens-1420

During the 2006 legislative session, Veco was pushing a new oil tax regime. North Slope oil producers wanted to lock in tax stability before they would commit to a natural gas pipeline that could have been enormously lucrative to Veco.

But defense lawyer John Henry Browne of Seattle told jurors that the prosecution's case was weak and that parts of it had fallen apart before their eyes. Kohring always thought the money he accepted was simply gifts from friends, not bribes, he said.

Browne put up a series of posters starting with one that said, in all caps, "NOT GUILTY MEANS NOT PROVEN."

NATURE OF FRIENDSHIP

194A-AN-13620-m; 599

Prosecutors told jurors Kohring may have socialized with Allen and Smith, but it was really a business relationship.

While Browne told jurors at the trial's start that Kohring and Allen were close because of relationships with Russian women, Allen testified that wasn't so, Sullivan told jurors. He hadn't even met Kohring's wife, who is Russian. She lives near Portland, Ore., and did not attend the trial.

"The only thing Vic Kohring brought to this party ... was his legislative hat," Sullivan said. And "he's not shy about putting it out and asking them for money."

Sullivan said Allen and Smith had a secret. The prosecutor walked closer to the jurors, talking to them in a stage whisper: They knew "this guy," who never voted for a tax, was going to support the tax rate supported by Veco and the North Slope oil producers.

Sullivan talked about how it was always Kohring who called Smith -- not the other way around -- with Kohring saying he'd lobby colleagues and advocate good things for Veco.

Kohring was playing Allen and pleading poverty, Sullivan said, while he was making about $100,000 -- counting his salary, legislative per diem money and consulting work. But he never let on to Allen about that "because that's going to stop the money train," Sullivan said.

In a March 4, 2006, video, Allen tells Smith about $1,000 that he gave to Kohring during a dinner among the three at the Juneau-area Island Pub. Prosecutors played it Wednesday so jurors could again hear Allen tell Smith that Kohring would now "kiss our ass."

Sullivan: "Is there anything else I need to say about the relationship between Veco and Vic Kohring?"

DEFENSE DIGS AT ALLEN, FBI

Browne tried hard to discredit Allen, who testified for the government that he had made cash payments to Kohring going back to 2002. The only way they can convict Kohring, Browne said, is if they believe Allen. He pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy and is cooperating with the government. Allen will say anything to protect his grown children, who were part-owners of Veco, from being prosecuted, Browne said. The company was sold last month for about $400 million.

Browne called Allen blasphemous, rude, arrogant, grandiose, intoxicated and obsessed with power.

"He has a memory problem. He has a brain injury. He obviously drinks too much," Browne said. "His demeanor on the stand was completely self-serving and basically pathetic."

Would you, Browne asked jurors, base a big life decision on what Allen had to say, or even buy a car from him?

The feds started investigating corruption in Alaska years ago with the help of Frank Prewitt -- a former corrections commissioner turned consultant -- who himself was in trouble and decided to cooperate by working undercover, Browne said.

"And when the names came out, the FBI started drooling," he said. Those names, he said, included U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens; his son, former Senate President Ben Stevens; U.S. Rep. Don Young; and former state Reps. Bruce Weyhrauch, Pete Kott, Tom Anderson.

FBI - Stevens-1421

"And one of the names they heard was Mr. Kohring," Browne said.

So the FBI cast a huge web, he said, and Kohring was caught up in it.

He told jurors he believes the government lawyers realized just before the trial that Kohring didn't vote for the oil tax that ultimately passed last August.

"The government's case was a mistake. It was falling apart," Browne said. But prosecutors told jurors that Kohring did vote Veco's way on the tax.

In the March 30, 2006, video, Kohring is asking for help from Allen and Smith in paying off a $17,000 credit card debt from a surgery. He suggests he could get a loan or work from Veco.

Allen hands Kohring $100 he got from Smith to put in a plastic Easter egg for his stepdaughter. Then, when Kohring mentions he just sent his stepdaughter money for a Girl Scout uniform, Allen reaches into his front pocket, pulls out another $600 to $700 he had stashed there for Kohring, and hands it over too.

Browne dismissed those payments as "money for Easter eggs."

Why, Browne asked, didn't the government, with all its resources, call as witnesses legislators who Kohring supposedly lobbied to help Veco?

"Let me tell you, there is absolutely no end to that deep pocket," Browne said. At the trial, "you saw FBI agents flown in from all over the country, New York, Texas, California."

PROSECUTION STRIKES BACK

Prosecutor Joe Bottini, an assistant U.S. attorney based in Anchorage, wrapped up the government's case looking to deliver a counterpunch to points made by Browne:

* If Browne thought jurors needed to hear from more witnesses, he could have called them himself, Bottini said. Subpoenas look the same for the defense as the prosecution, he said, holding up an 81/2 by 11 piece of paper. As for the prosecution only playing select parts of the Kohring tapes, Bottini said: "If he thought there was something that we were hiding from you in this trial, hit play. It's the button with the little arrow on it."

* Bottini reminded jurors that Browne called Prewitt, a government witness, a "sleazy lobbyist."

"It didn't stop this guy from going out to dinner with him, and getting his meal paid for by Mr. Prewitt," Bottini said, pointing at Kohring.

* On Browne's comments that Allen was an unreliable witness, Bottini told jurors that the brain injury affects his ability to express himself, not his thought process. Allen ran one of the biggest companies in Alaska for years after his injury, he said. He'd clearly been drinking in some of the videos, Bottini said, but wasn't incoherent.

Ultimately, Bottini said, Kohring knew "what it took to get Mr. Allen to give him things. Kohring turned this guy into a human ATM machine."

As he wound down his argument, Bottini put one of the defense lawyer's posters back on the easel. He took a black marker to it, crossing through some of the words until two were left: "GUILTY PROVEN."

After a few hours of deliberations, jurors asked to watch one of the surveillance videos again. Just after 4:30 p.m., they left for the day, still undecided.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390. Find Kyle Hopkins online at adn.com/contact/khopkins or call 257-4334.

LISTEN AND WATCH: Audio clips from closing statements, and FBI surveillance videos and wiretaps.

adn.com/fbi

FBI - Stevens-1422

THE PROSECUTION

* Kohring received multiple cash payments from Allen over the years and learned to call Veco execs when he needed something: Money, a truck, a free meal.

* Unaware he's being recorded, Allen can be heard saying he gave Kohring $1,000 in a conversation about doing whatever it takes to pass Veco's favored oil tax bill.

* Kohring unlocked a bill from his committees, let go a valued aide and stayed out of a Mat-Su Senate race, all at Allen's request.

* Everything Allen says is backed by recordings or other testimony, including a video on which Kohring tells Veco execs he'd racked up $17,000 in debt and needs help. He is seen taking cash from Allen, then promising to lobby his colleagues on Veco's behalf.

THE DEFENSE

* There's no proof Kohring was given cash for anything except Easter eggs and a Girl Scout uniform for his daughter.

* Much of the feds' case relies on the word of former Veco chief Bill Allen, who is now a convicted felon trying to protect his kids from indictments. Because of a head injury, the jury saw Allen struggling to express himself on the stand.

* In secretly made FBI recordings, Kohring says he wants any work he does for Veco to be legitimate. No freebies, he says.

* Two words: Prove it. The defense says prosecutors failed to show, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Kohring traded political influence for money.

ONLINE: Sign up for our breaking news alert and get the verdict via e-mail as soon as we get it. adn.com/newsletters

The Kohring case: Is the ex-legislator guilty or innocent?

LOAD-DATE: November 2, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: BOB HALLINEN / Anchorage Daily News
Former state Rep. Vic Kohring talks to the media at the Anchorage federal courthouse Wednesday after his federal corruption case went to the jury. "I'm at peace with myself regardless of the outcome," Kohring said. "I'm alive and I'm healthy and I've got a lot of support out there."

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1423

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 2, 2007 Friday
FINAL EDITION

Kohring convicted;
Jurors decide ex-legislator took money to sway oil tax

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER and KYLE HOPKINS Anchorage Daily News

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1649 words

Less than an hour after a federal jury convicted former state Rep. Vic Kohring of public corruption charges on Thursday, he apologized to the people of Alaska for the stress and trauma of the investigation and trial.

But he stopped short of accepting responsibility for the crimes of bribery, conspiracy and attempted extortion -- crimes he now stands convicted of committing.

Kohring is on a tightrope. If he accepts blame now, he could spoil any appeal. But if he's defiant, prosecutors are sure to point that out when it's time to be sentenced.

"I expected this as a possible outcome and, as I said yesterday, I'm going to accept it and move on regardless," said Kohring, 49.

The 12-member jury convicted Kohring, a Wasilla Republican, on three of four counts, concludingthat he sold his office to the oil-field service company Veco Corp. and former executives Bill Allen and Rick Smith, who pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy and cooperated with the government.

Jurors found that he conspired with Allen and Smith to push a new oil tax favored by North Slope oil producers through the Legislature in 2006, tried to extort them to pay his $17,000 credit card debt, and took bribes from them.

But jurors also issued one "not guilty" verdict. Kohring was acquitted of extorting money, and a summer job for his nephew, from Allen, Veco's former chief executive, and Smith, a former vice president.

Kohring's defense asserted that it was friendship, not greed and politics, that led Kohring to ask Allen and Smith for money and do Veco's bidding in Juneau.

The government says he knew what he was doing. Kohring "betrayed his oath of office and the people of Alaska when he deliberately and repeatedly took bribes in exchange for official acts," assistant attorney general Alice Fisher of the U.S. Justice Department in Washington, D.C., said in a written statement. She thanked the federal prosecutors and FBI agents.

As they left the Federal Building, jurors looked drained but relieved. Only a few would talk. They said they anguished over their decision.

One, who declined to be identified other than as "juror No. 8," said "they didn't get the sharks. They got the minnow."

Most felt sorry for Kohring and saw him as "a very sympathetic figure," said Alan Rowe, juror No. 12.

"The circumstances surrounding the case were tragic," said Rowe, a courier for Cal Worthington Ford who plays keyboard in a classic rock and soul band called Al and the Kaholics.

Kohring seemed like he really wanted what's best for Alaska but showed poor judgment when he got in cahoots with Veco executives, Rowe said.

Kohring couldn't get past the damning videotapes secretly filmed in Veco's suite in Juneau's Baranof Hotel and the telephone wiretaps.

But surprisingly, Rowe said that the most convincing FBI recording wasn't the one from March 30, 2006, where Kohring is seen twice taking cash from Allen. Defense lawyer John Henry Browne's characterization of that scene as the "Easter egg incident" resonated with jurors, Rowe said. In the video, Allen tells Kohring the money is to be put in plastic Easter eggs and to help out with a Girl Scout uniform for his stepdaughter.

"We didn't want to implicate the little girl," Rowe said.

But jurors believed that Allen slipped Kohring $1,000 during a Feb. 23, 2006, dinner at the Juneau-area Island Pub, and that the money was a bribe, Rowe said. On a surveillance video less than two weeks later, Allen and Smith talk about the payment and how Kohring would now "kiss our ass."

On the conspiracy count, Rowe said, the strongest evidence came from a June 8, 2006, recording that jurors asked to see again during deliberations.

It was the last night of a special session on the oil tax, by then at a rate higher than Veco wanted. Kohring tells Allen he would have done what Veco wanted to upend the bill, even if it hurt him politically.

Jurors didn't think much of the allegation that Kohring was bribed when he secured a summer internship at Veco for his nephew, Rowe said. "We're all thinking, 'So what?' This is the way the world works."

Talking to a few reporters outside the courtroom doors just after the verdict, Kohring described the jurors as "good people" with the right intentions, and said he wanted to thank them for their hard work. He thanked the people of Alaska too, for his more than 12 years in office. He also wanted to say he was sorry.

"Just to apologize to these same people, including my family and friends, for the trauma they experienced, as I did, over the last 14 months, leading up to today," Kohring said.

His friend Fred James, who sat behind Kohring each day of the trial, said he thought Kohring was done in by pre-trial publicity, tried and convicted in the Daily News and on television. Asked if he agreed, Kohring said, "I think in part, yes."

Browne had tried to get the trial moved outside of Alaska, but U.S. District Judge John Sedwick rejected that. The judge questioned jurors extensively and excluded those who had already made up their minds.

Kohring and his lawyer walked downstairs to face a semicircle of microphones and TV cameras and answer more questions.

Does he still maintain his innocence?

"I'd rather not go there at this point," Kohring said.

Browne said they hadn't decided whether to appeal but had several possible points, including the fact that they hadn't been allowed to put on character witnesses.

"We have an outcome here that is difficult for me, of course," Kohring said. "But I've got a great future ahead of me and I'm looking forward to that future."

His wife, Tatiana, is supportive and they've been talking regularly, he said, though she couldn't be there for the trial. She lives near Portland, Ore.

Kohring said he didn't regret not taking a plea deal. There was never a reasonable offer anyway, Browne said.

After court on Thursday, prosecutor Joe Bottini took the unusual step of singling out prosecution witness Frank Prewitt, who has been working undercover for the FBI since 2004. Prewitt was a minor witness in the Kohring trial, but his work helped investigators get the evidence they needed for wiretaps on phones and bugs planted in Suite 604 at the Baranof.

While Browne called Prewitt a "sleazy lobbyist" in his closing argument Wednesday, Bottini said that's not how the government feels about him.

"Nothing can be further from the truth," Bottini said. Prewitt has done a "tremendous" job for the government, he said. "We owe him a lot, frankly."

Kohring was the third person convicted by a jury in the government's wide-ranging corruption scandal. It has yet to lose a case. Juries took about the same amount of time to convict the first two, ex-Reps. Pete Kott and Tom Anderson.

Judge Sedwick set Kohring's sentencing for Feb. 6. Prosecutors estimated that Kohring could be facing three to five years.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390. Find Kyle Hopkins online at adn.com/contact/khopkins or call 257-4334.

AUDIO/VIDEO: Listen to clips from the closing arguments and FBI wiretaps and watch videos.

adn.com/fbi

THE BIGGER PICTURE: How does the Kohring case fit into the larger corruption investigation? Go online and click on the "Corruption investigation overview" on the upper right.

adn.com/fbi

WHERE HE WORKED AND WHERE HE LIVED: See how people reacted to the verdict in Juneau and the Valley.
Back Page

Guilty

Conspiracy

Attempted extortion

Bribery

Not guilty

Extortion

What was Kohring accused of?

Being part of a conspiracy, with Veco executives Bill Allen and Rick Smith, to push passage of an industry-friendly oil profits tax in 2006. He was charged with taking between $2,100 and $2,600 in cash in 2006, asking for help paying off a $17,000 credit card debt, and seeking and receiving a Veco summer job for a nephew, which paid $3,000.

What's the sentence?

FBI - Stevens-1426

Prosecutors estimated Kohring could receive three to five years in prison for the charges he was convicted of. His sentencing hearing was set for Feb. 6.

Reaction from Juneau

* The FBI's and U.S. Justice Department's investigation into public corruption in Alaska continues. It's unclear when, or whether, additional charges will be filed, and officials will not discuss the investigation's targets. But at least two other current or former lawmakers have been identified in charging documents and testimony as committing illegal acts in cahoots with Veco officials: former state Sen. Ben Stevens and current Sen. John Cowdery, both Anchorage Republicans.

* Sentencing for former House Speaker Pete Kott, convicted of bribery, extortion and conspiracy in September, is set for Dec. 7.

Kohring is the third former state representative convicted since the wide-ranging federal investigation of public corruption burst into view last August with the simultaneous searches of six state lawmakers' offices.

So far:

* Former Rep. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage, was convicted in July of bribery, money laundering and other charges for taking payoffs from a consultant.

* Former House Speaker Pete Kott, R-Eagle River, was convicted of bribery, extortion and conspiracy in September for his dealings with Veco executives on oil tax legislation last year.

* Former Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, R-Juneau, was charged with bribery and other crimes for his dealings with Veco executives. He's awaiting trial while questions about evidence in his case are appealed.

* Former Veco CEO Bill Allen pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy for his dealing with Kott, Kohring, Weyhrauch and other lawmakers. He's awaiting sentencing.

* Former Veco vice president Rick Smith pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy for his dealing with Kott, Kohring, Weyhrauch and other lawmakers. He's awaiting sentencing.

* Former lobbyist Bill Bobrick, a longtime lobbyist on the city level, pleaded guilty to conspiracy for bribing Anderson. He's awaiting sentencing.

LOAD-DATE: November 2, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: BILL ROTH / Anchorage Daily News
Former state Rep. Vic Kohring was convicted Thursday on three of four counts of corruption for selling influence to Veco Corp. executives. A federal jury found him guilty of conspiracy, attempted extortion and bribery. He was found not guilty of extortion.
Former state Rep. Vic Kohring, right, and attorney John Henry Browne speak to the media outside the Federal Building in Anchorage on Thursday. The former legislator was called a sympathetic figure by jurors.
Alan Rowe was juror No. 12 in Kohring's trial.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1427

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 2, 2007 Friday
FINAL EDITION

FBI tape shows Kohring with hand out;
WIRETAP: Talk with Veco execs starts on debt, turns to tax influence.

SECTION: MAT-SU WEEKLY SECTION; Pg. J1

LENGTH: 3572 words

Editor's note: On March 30 of last year, then-state Rep. Vic Kohring of Wasilla went to the Juneau hotel suite of Veco executives Bill Allen and Rick Smith and asked them for help paying off a $17,000 credit card debt.

No one in the room knew it, but the conversation was being recorded by a secret FBI camera.

What happened over the next 20 minutes became, in some ways, the centerpiece of the federal corruption case against Kohring, which has been playing out in a federal courtroom in Anchorage over the past two weeks. Kohring was convicted Thursday on three of four charges.

Prosecutors played more than 30 videos and wiretaps during the trial, and jurors heard extensive testimony from Allen, Smith and others.

But this was the one recording that showed Kohring accepting cash from Allen.

Does the recording prove Kohring solicited and took bribes? Did he promise or things in return? Prosectors say yes. Kohring and his lawyer say no.

We're printing a full transcript of the recording here. Watch the video for yourself, and see and hear all the audio and video evidence in the case, at adn.com/fbi.

The transcript was created by the Daily News. It has not been edited for profanity.

The scene: Suite 604 of the Baranof Hotel in Juneau. In the room, then-Rep. Vic Kohring of Wasilla and two executives of the Veco Corp.: CEO Bill Allen and Rick Smith, the company's vice president for government affairs. They are all seated.

Kohring: ... I've got a situation where, ah, it's a personal financial matter, that I think potentially could hurt me politically. When I had my surgery three years ago, I got in a real hole, financially, and I put a bunch of it on credit cards. And I managed to pay off a couple of those credit cards, but I have one big one where I've got a $17,000 debt and it's potentially a court situation 'cause I got overwhelmed with it, and I just couldn't make the payments and I'm now in a situation where it's gone to collections, not to court or anything, and I'm worried if it goes to that point it could hurt me politically. There'll be a public record and I don't want there to be any evidence of any public issue going on. So, what I wanted to do was ask you guys for your recommendations as to how I can deal with this. And I wanted to suggest a couple of things, with all due respect, and please don't feel like I'm applying any pressure, I've come to you guys because you're friends. And I was wondering if there would be a possibility of perhaps doing some kind of a project to make some money with you guys or you could refer me to somebody that could help me with that or as another option maybe you could help me with some financing like a modest loan or something so I could get this paid off and have it behind me and get it paid off to you folks or to whoever you can help me with.

FBI - Stevens-1428

Smith: So you say a couple, two thousand in credit cards?

Kohring: I've got one credit card with Bank of America that is way past due; I just can't keep up, I just don't have the money for it. And I've been trying to sell my Wasilla house to pay, and it was listed for a year and I wasn't able to sell it.

194A-AN-13620-M; 601

Allen: How big is your payment?

Kohring: Well, actually, it's to a point now where they're demanding full payment on the full 17 grand. I was paying 500 bucks a month on it for the last half-dozen months, and they wouldn't accept that anymore. They were demanding full payment, so they sent it to a collection agency. And I'm in a situation where the collection agency is demanding full payment and I don't have the financial wherewithal or the credit, to be honest with you, to go into a bank and get a loan to pay this off. My credit is such that I just don't have the wherewithal, the financial worthiness, if you will, because with my legislative salary and everything I'm just living paycheck to paycheck. So anyway, that's where I'm at and again, I'm not trying to come to the well, I'm only here just to ask if you guys would consider helping me and suggest some options to me as to what could be done. Anyway, just, that's what I had for you.

Allen: Let's say you got a new loan. Uh, you know, you got to be real careful, Vic on ... Say, like, I co-signed with you, you'd have to be ...

Kohring: Very discreet about it?

Allen: Oh, yeah, or it'd be, have to be ...

Kohring: I know there's the political issue of ...

Allen: APOC ...

Kohring: APOC, and the criticism that all of us, now because of our relationships and all that ...

Allen: But too, though, you know I don't want your, a record out there for you. So how quick, how much time have you got?

Kohring: It's not clear to me yet; I'm working with the collection agency. My guess is they're going to demand full payment probably within 60 days or so.

Smith: Within 60?

Kohring: That would be my guess. I had a similar experience with another ... I had several credit cards that I maxed out on in order to take care of my medical bills and one of which demanded full payment and they gave me 60 days and I paid full ...

Allen: Don't you have insurance with the state?

Kohring: I do. But with Mayo Clinic, they didn't cover all the expenses, I ended up eating a lot of the costs. It's not on the insurance company's preferred provided list so I ended up eating a lot of the costs associated with that surgery. It was at Mayo Clinic and Aetna only covers hospitals in the western part of the country, not back east.

Smith: Give Bill and me a little time to chew on it, figure it out.

Allen: Let me figure a way ...

Kohring: I want to do everything completely aboveboard, of course, I don't want anybody to get in any kind of hot water or get criticized by anybody.

Smith: Absolutely.

Kohring: And again, please don't feel like I'm abusing my relationship with you guys, OK?

Allen: Oh no, no no. That's ... I'm doing this if I can get it done because you're my friend.

Kohring: Thank you.

Allen: Not ...

Kohring: Thank you very much. That's why I came to you two, because the feeling is definitely mutual.

Allen: Let me see what I can do ... maybe, maybe, I could ... not my bank ... uh ... s---, can't say it.

Kohring: Wells Fargo?

Allen: Yeah, or something like that.

Kohring: OK. All right. Thank you, thank you for your consideration.

Allen: Let me kinda, let me see if maybe somebody could ...

Kohring: Thank you. I appreciate that.

Allen: So, if you got a loan, how much can you pay, you know, as it goes along?

Kohring: Yeah. Well I could probably uh, afford ... uh,

Allen: Five thousand ... I mean, five dollars, uh ...?

Kohring: Five hundred dollars a month? That would be a real stretch. I was going to suggest $400 a month. Five hundred would be a real stretch. But I could probably make 500 do. I could scrape together the money and make 500 do. So if you were to factor in an interest rate, that would probably amortize out over, golly, probably a couple years or so, if you're talking 17 grand. Shoot, that's 34 months without interest, so that would be almost three years, if not more.

Allen: And you owe, it's about 17?

Kohring: About $17,000, yeah.

Smith: Does that include all the penalties and interest?

Kohring: Yes it does, yes. I'm going to still try to sell that doggone house of mine in Wasilla. I had it listed for 110, and I just couldn't get it sold. I think it was more of a problem with the lack of aggressiveness on the part of the broker, but it contributed to the financial woes not having the rent that I was getting from that of $900 a month, cause I took it off the rental market. I just recently re-rented it now, I'm getting $850 right now for it, so I'm getting that income stream coming in. But if I could sell the doggone thing, I could extract 40 grand equity out of it, and use that to pay off the ...

Allen: You still owe ... you owe ... money on ...

Kohring: I owe money on the house. I have a loan on it. Yes. It's worth about 110, and I owe about, let's see, about 75, I believe it is. I've got about $45,000 equity in it.

Smith: Valued at 110?

Kohring: It's about 110, yes. Just a small ranch house in Wasilla that I used to live in until Tony Knowles and his gang reapportioned me out of it back in 2000, if you remember that fiasco.

FBI - Stevens-1430

Allen: Yeah, yeah.

Kohring: A lot of us were targeted by the Knowles administration. I built that house for my wife, and lived in there for awhile and then I got reapportioned out of it so it became rental, that was when my financial issues came up a few years ago after my surgery, tried to sell it, and after fixing it up for a couple years and just haven't been able to do so. Love to be able to just go out and get a loan and take care of this, but my credit is such and my ratios are such that I just wouldn't qualify. I'm just trying to pull myself back from the brink at this point, and as far as a potential political, it wouldn't be a disaster for me, because I think I can get elected -- short of going out shooting somebody -- 'cause I'm strong politically, but I don't want to have any blemishes on my record and this could potentially be one for me.

Allen: Let me see what I can do with it.

Kohring: Yeah. Good. All right. Thank you for the thought.

Allen: You know, I'd just give you the ... I'd just ... I mean, I'd borrow that ... but I can't do it ...

Kohring: I know, because the APOC ethic rules and all that. And I would make sure that everything was done in accordance to law too; I would research that as well and I could present a hypothetical scenario to, say, the ethics committee and they'd give me a private, confidential response. But again it would be completely hypothetical without any names mentioned or anything so nobody would know who I'm associating with. But I would do that just to make sure everything is done in accordance with law so nobody gets embarrassed later down the road.

Allen: Who you going to do? You're going to talk to who?

Kohring: Well, Joyce Anderson is the ethics committee adviser to the Legislature, and we work with her on a confidential basis where we can ask her hypothetical questions about situations, she can give us answers, just to give us guidance as to how best to conduct our financial affairs. If I ever borrow money from somebody or if I ever have any kind of financial transaction, I seek advice from her as many legislators do to make sure that we're not violating any law. So that's how it ...

Allen: If you tell her what you're going to do, or you need to, I don't know if that's real smart.

Kohring: Yeah, that's a good point. It might be better for me just simply to research the statute and just come to a conclusion myself on it.

Allen: That's the best way. And then nobody knows. ...

Kohring: Yeah, no red flags are raised, right? That's a good point. I thought of that too, and really, uh, to my knowledge the way the law works right now, say if I were to borrow money from somebody, if it's in excess of $5,000 I have to disclose it on an annual financial disclosure. So that's where it would come into play. If I borrowed it from you personally, or from Veco or some financial entity or a bank, I'd have to actually ... write everything down.

Allen: We wouldn't do that with Veco. It would have to be with me. ...

Kohring: And again, I'm not here to ask you for work, but say if we went down that road and you were able to pay me for a service that you thought I could provide you, again, don't feel any pressure but I'm just throwing that out as an example. ...

Allen: It would be too ... anything that would have Veco on it, oh s---.

Kohring: Yeah, well I'm very proud of myself. ...

Allen: But, you know, you could go work for us in the summer or something like that.

Kohring: I would want to make sure, Bill, that if you did have me do something for you that it was something you truly could benefit from. I don't want any freebie.

Allen: Well you got to ... you'd have to go to work

FBI - Stevens-1431

Kohring: I'd have to bust my butt.

Allen: ... go up to the Slope, or some goddamn thing, because you gotta ... it's gotta ...

Kohring: I want it to be above board, I don't want anybody to ever criticize our relationship and imply that somehow you're giving me some big benefit that I don't deserve.

Allen: Because it will go right to the f---ing Daily News.

Kohring: Of course, yeah. I'm not trying to pressure you. ...

Allen: Don't say anything until I can figure out where it won't come back and bite me and bite your ass and my ass.

Kohring: Yes, really. And I won't present any kind of hypothetical scenario to anybody, I'll keep it to my ...

Allen: I wouldn't say to anybody that you're in a bind.

Kohring: Well, no, I wouldn't tell anybody that I'm in a financial situation; I would just, uh, what I was thinking of doing was just simply to say, what if I borrow a loan from somebody, how is that supposed to be handled in the eyes of the law? That's all I'd present it as, but I don't even have to do that.

Allen: What do you think, Rick?

Kohring: I don't want to raise any red flags either.

Smith: Well. I wouldn't ...

Kohring: But I know the law good enough ...

Smith: Well, let's think about a way to do it ...

Kohring: OK.

Smith: ... before you do anything.

Kohring: Yeah, good.

Allen: When are you taking off for ...

Kohring: For Easter?

Allen: Yeah.

Kohring: I think Easter is about the 16th, if I remember right.

Smith: The 15th. The 13th is Thursday. The 16th.

Kohring: OK. So I'll be leaving the evening of the 13th, coming back the morning of the 17th, I believe it is. I'll be gone for four days.

Smith: Eighteenth. You guys are shut down Friday to Monday.

Kohring: I'm leaving Thursday and coming back on a Monday, so I'll be gone for four days, whatever the dates are that that represents. First time I will have been with my daughter on an Easter, after all these years. Can you believe that? Because Easter always falls during a session, and I always find myself swamped being near the end of the session. I've never had a chance to be there for Easter for her. Can you believe that?

Allen: OK, here's what I want you to do. (He leans forward toward Kohring.) With, uh, what I usually do on Christmas, I mean, and ...

Kohring: For holidays?

Allen: ... and Easters ... I always take a, when I got kids (Kohring chuckles). And always, I really, I go hide ...

Smith: Eggs.

Allen: ... an egg with ...

Kohring: Yes.

Allen: With ...

Kohring: With money in it?

Allen: Money or ...

Kohring: Or candy. Oh yeah. Nuka said, 'Daddy Daddy, can we do an Easter egg hunt?'

Allen (to Smith): Have you got any ... have you got any?

Smith: I got some.

Allen: Did you get any hundreds?

Smith: Yep. (Smith stands and takes what appears to be money out of his pocket.)

Kohring: Well, thank you very much.

Allen: I'll give you ...

Kohring: That's very kind of you; I appreciate that.

Allen (to Smith): Give me a hundred. (Smith hands Allen money.) And that way you can ...

Kohring: Put those in the Easter eggs. All right. (Allen hands cash to Kohring on the screen.) I shall do that, thank you very much. (Kohring and Allen shake hands.) Thank you so much.

Allen: And let her find the egg.

Kohring: I will. We're going to have an Easter egg hunt right at the house, and I'll put money in, I promise (Allen chuckles.) ... and she'll be thrilled. I just sent her some money for her mom to buy her a Girl Scout uniform, she's thrilled about that, and I sent her a card telling her about how much I love and miss her and 20 bucks was included in that and ...

Allen: All right, well then, let me help you on that little ... (Allen pulls more bills and hands them to Kohring. He later testified it was several hundred dollars.)

Kohring: Oh, thank you, thank you.

Allen: ... on her little uniform.

Kohring: On the uniform. The 50 I sent was a little short, so thank you. Said she needs about 100. I appreciate that, Bill, thank you so much. (Kohring and Allen shake hands.) Well, just in closing I know you guys got things to do. ...

Smith: ... See what Conoco is sort of up to here ...

Kohring: What can I do at this point to help you guys, anything? Whatever you ... you know ... just keep lobbying my colleagues for the governor's plan, right?

Allen: Are you real close with ol', any of these guys ...

Smith: Stoltze (Rep. Bill Stoltze, R-Wasilla).

Kohring: Oh, yes. Stoltze, moderately so. ...

Allen: Yeah, Stoltze. Stoltze. Can you help?

Kohring: I can. I can go to him. I'm not real close to Bill. I've got a very close relationship with Chenault (Rep. Mike Chenault, R-Kenai) and Meyer (Rep. Kevin Meyer, R-Anchorage), Meyer in particular, a good friend. Stoltze ...

Allen: I think they're on the right side.

Kohring: OK. Stoltze could go either way, then?

Allen: Well, ah ... you know, who's all on the Finance?

Kohring: House Finance?

Allen: Holm (Rep. Jim Holm, R-Fairbanks). You know Holm?

Kohring: I know Holm well. I think he's unpredictable; he's kind of like Stoltze, hard to figure out where he's coming from. I think Kelly (Rep. Mike Kelly, R-Fairbanks) is probably with us. ...

Allen: Kelly?

Kohring: I've got a good rapport with him.

Allen: Do you?

Kohring: And I've got a great relationship with Richard Foster (Rep. Richard Foster, D-Nome); who doesn't? Everybody likes Richard. And then Moses, Carl Moses (Rep. Carl Moses, D-Unalaska), he and I get along well. He's a very quiet person, doesn't say much, keeps things close to his chest. But I'm comfortable in going and talking to him.

Allen: Kinda ... kinda ... figure out ... kinda see what they're really thinking about. Kinda tell us where they're really at.

Kohring: OK. OK. Just get an honest, straightforward opinion from them, right?

Allen: Yeah, and then you can tell us where they're at and then maybe you can push 'em over on your column.

Kohring: Yes. Well, I'll make every effort to do that. My first effort will be to figure out where they're at, and then secondly I'll politely and gently and carefully as I can influence them in a positive way to see that the governor's bill is the vehicle they consider. I know that's very important to you. I know that's key to the gas line, and I know that's why you're here. I want nothing better than the governor's bill to pass and that gas line to come to fruition. Even though I'm ...

Allen: Or if you think of anybody else that we could get.

Kohring: OK, all right. You know my position is an anti-tax position and I'd just as soon the industry not be taxed any, we give credits, but I understand that this is an integral part of the whole deal here. OK, well, how about if I over the next couple days I will make an effort at talking to these people individually and then I will give you guys a report to let you know how that goes.

Allen: Kind of tell us who's really over there.

Kohring: Sure, I can do that, absolutely.

Allen: You know, the one on the oil ... the governor's ... the 20/20.

Kohring: Yes. Who is really with the governor's plan. You bet. OK. Just lastly, Tatiana (Kohring's wife, who is from Russia and lives in Oregon), I told her about the fact that you received that gift real well, you were very pleased with that, she was real excited to hear that. It was her idea, by the way. Do you like vodka?

Allen: Yeah, yeah, hell, yeah, we already drank some of it.

Kohring: We drink a lot of that in our house, believe me. I never had any vodka in my life until I met her, and now we drink a lot of it. Not excessively, but it's part of a social thing at dinner and so forth.

Smith: Sure. Yeah.

FBI - Stevens-1434

Kohring: I've discovered that it helps to escape a little bit from your woes of the world when you get buzzed. I had a tough day today; oh, man. I had a difficult constituent who's got some mental issues who threatened me today, back home in Wasilla of all things, oh brother. And then I was on a radio program, I was on a nationwide live radio program with this station owned by the NRA, the rifle association based in Washington, D.C.; they had me on their program about an hour ago.

Allen: Yeah.

Kohring: It was live, it was great. They were throwing me softballs because they like me, 'cause of my pro-gun positions, but they had picked up on the Internet that article that came out in the Frontiersman two days ago about me being an advocate of the Second Amendment right to keep and bear arms. So they asked me if I'd be on their show and I said absolutely. It was great.

Smith: Good, good. Yeah.

Kohring: So I've got nationwide exposure now; with that nationwide exposure I ought to run for president, take advantage of it. (Everyone laughs). All right, guys. (Kohring stands and extends his hand to Allen and they shake). Thank you so very much for your time and all your help; I'm very grateful for it.

Smith (pointing at jars of food on the table): And grab some of those babies. Take a pocketful.

Kohring: Oh sure, I will. I'll take a couple here, thank you. Delicious.

Allen (pushing the jar toward Kohring): Come on.

Kohring (reaching into jar and taking more of the treats): OK, I won't be shy here, for crying out loud; I'll take more of them.

Allen: There you go, there you go.

Kohring: Thank you again very much. Appreciate it. I'll be keeping in touch.

The next day, on March 31, Kohring left a message with Smith and also called him to report setting up the meetings he'd talked about, according to the FBI wiretaps played for the jury.

CHECK IT OUT: Hear and see all the evidence in the Kohring case, listen to clips from the opening and closing statements and find stories and pictures at

adn.com/fbi

LOAD-DATE: November 2, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Video from the FBI
Former Alaska legislator Vic Kohring accepts cash from Veco's Bill Allen in this secretly recorded March 2006 video.
Video from the FBI
Former Alaska legislator Vic Kohring, left, accepts a snack from former Veco executives Rick Smith, in dark shirt, right, and Bill Allen, hand holding jar, during a March 30 meeting in Room 604 of the Baranof Hotel in Juneau.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

FBI - Stevens-1435

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 3, 2007 Saturday
FINAL EDITION

Conviction snagged on one point;
KOHRING: The jury found him guilty of all but a single charge.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 650 words

The reason jurors found former state Rep. Vic Kohring not guilty on one of the four corruption charges against him boils down to a technical requirement of a federal law that dates back more than 60 years.

On Thursday, a jury convicted the Wasilla Republican of three felonies -- bribery, conspiracy and attempted extortion -- but acquitted him of extortion. Afterwards, several jurors explained.

Kohring was a sympathetic figure, even a tragic figure, but it was clear prosecutors had enough evidence, except on one detail, said jurors including the foreman, Rocky Capozzi.

The official charge is a legalistic mouthful: Interference with commerce by extortion under color of official right.

It's commonly called the Hobbs Act, enacted in 1946 to fight violence and racketeering in labor unions and disputes with management. According to the U.S. Justice Department, it's now commonly used to go after public officials in corruption cases, including in Alaska.

In Kohring's case, jurors were instructed that prosecutors had to prove four facts for the Wasilla Republican to be convicted of extortion.

What stopped them was element four, that interstate commerce was affected in some way, Capozzi said.

"Well, not that we could tell," he said.

That requirement is what gives the feds jurisdiction over extortion involving state officials. But prosecutors say it only has to be a minimal effect.

According to testimony and surveillance recordings from the trial, Kohring conspired with executives with the former Veco Corp. -- which had operations in several states and countries before its sale in September-- to push through a new oil tax favored by North Slope oil producers.

FBI - Stevens-1436

The tax, and a natural gas pipeline that could follow, would have enormous impact on Veco and the oil companies, all international, prosecutor Edward Sullivan told jurors in his closing argument on Wednesday.

But the 20 percent tax rate agreed to by the major oil producers and pushed by Veco ultimately didn't pass, so jurors said they didn't see that there was an effect.

Jurors did convict Kohring of attempted extortion. He tried to get Veco executives to help him with a $17,000 credit card debt from a surgery. He never got that money, either in a loan or otherwise, which is why prosecutors considered it attempted extortion.

194A-AN-13620-M; 602

But other elements of that charge were different too. Jurors had only to find that interstate commerce "would have been affected" in some way, not that it was, according to the written instructions given to them by U.S. District Judge John Sedwick.

When jurors began deliberating around noon on Wednesday, they didn't take an early vote to see how folks were leaning, said Capozzi, who was back at work Friday in his job as director of the University of Alaska Anchorage Aviation Technology division.

Instead, he said, "the very first thing we did was let everybody say everything you think and feel about this. Just vent. That was the starting point."

Another juror, Alan Rowe, a courier for Cal Worthington Ford, said some people hoped at the start that they could find Kohring not guilty on all counts. But as Capozzi helped them consider the various elements of each charge during nine hours of deliberations, they all realized that wouldn't be the right thing, Rowe said.

Hint to the lawyers and judge for the next trial: Jurors said they'd like the use of a machine to project documents onto the wall, so everyone can look at the same thing together. The jury only got one copy of the 26-page jury instructions.

"It was a very thorough and I thought extraordinarily fair process," Capozzi said. "There was a lot of emotion. There was a lot of empathy for, I thought, Victor Kohring the man, but the facts were the facts as we found them."

"Nobody was going to let their mind be decided on emotion alone."

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

LOAD-DATE: November 5, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 4, 2007 Sunday
FINAL EDITION

Scandal brings change to Legislature;
JUNEAU: Oil industry sends fewer lobbyists to the Capitol.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1406 words

DATELINE: JUNEAU -

State House Speaker John Harris sat in his quiet Capitol office on a recent morning, checking e-mail. Outside his door, the benches where lobbyists used to sit jammed thigh to thigh stood as empty as the T-shirt shops shut for the winter on the rainy streets of Alaska's capital city.

Harris looked up from his computer, swiveled around in his chair, and said that only a single oil lobbyist had come to see him since the special session on raising oil taxes had begun more than a week before. He said that lobbyist, Exxon Mobil's Kevin Jardell, didn't even really lobby him.

"I think they are very nervous about how much interaction they have with legislators," the Republican from Valdez said.

Alaska's state Capitol is a much different place these days. Legislators go to work every day in a building that was raided by the FBI in August 2006. They've watched former colleagues convicted of corruption and headed to federal prison. At least one sitting legislator has worked with the FBI in its investigation. A well-known lobbyist was revealed to have been wearing a hidden camera. A suite known as "Animal House" for drinking and lobbying in a popular Juneau hotel turned out to be wired with FBI recording devices.

It's not over.

The FBI has made clear its investigation into the political corruption is ongoing.

Legislators say the trauma has led to more openness in the Capitol but also greater suspicion. There's less industry lobbying in the halls, although indirect lobbying from advertisements is strong. Lawmakers are careful not to appear as though they are influenced.

Big Lake Republican Rep. Mark Neuman felt the need to declare "I haven't spoken to any lobbyist while working on this bill" during committee debate a week ago on the oil tax bill.

FBI - Stevens-1438

Some legislators also interact differently with one another.

"People are suspicious, scared, anxious, tight," said Eagle River Sen. Fred Dyson, who helped the FBI in its investigation.

Dyson said his colleagues have not shunned him for assisting the feds, at least not overtly. But he said he does regret that there's less overall camaraderie in the Capitol halls than there was before the FBI raids and subsequent trials.

Dyson said, though, it is a needed cleansing. He and other legislators also said the legislative process is more open than it used to be.

194A-AN-136620-M;603

NOT FUNNY ANY MORE

Lawmakers of all political stripes appear to be getting their questions answered inside and outside of the committee hearings, for example, instead of being blown off if they aren't in the majority. There seems to be more courtesy shown to the minority than in the past. Legislators consider that a more open decision-making process than what usually happens here.

Still, it's not clear how much of the apparent openness is a desire for good government and how much is fear of the voters and even of federal prosecutors. Legislators have acknowledged that there could be FBI bugs in the state Capitol and wiretaps on the phones.

House speaker Harris said he has told legislators -- mostly in jest -- that they'd better be careful about telling jokes that could be misinterpreted by anyone listening in.

Sen. Dyson said he has noticed legislators being more careful about what they say. He compared it to how people don't joke about bombs and guns at the airport.

"I'm guessing most of our boys are not talking about corrupt bastards and stuff," said Dyson.

The Corrupt Bastards Club started as a barroom joke last year among legislators who had been criticized for taking campaign contributions from the oil-field services company Veco Corp. A Veco executive even paid for the girlfriend of then-state Rep. Pete Kott to make "CBC" hats for club members.

But legislators don't find it very funny anymore.

Two Veco executives pleaded guilty in May to bribing Republican legislators during the debate last year that resulted in the current state oil tax system.

Kott is among three convicted legislators who are headed to federal prison. The corruption is a major reason Gov. Sarah Palin has called the Legislature into this special session to reconsider the oil tax.

$14.99 SPECIALS

Many of the legislators here collected thousands of dollars in Veco contributions over the years, a subject they are obviously sensitive about nowadays. Calls to the legislative ethics committee, which gives lawmakers advice on what's considered acceptable behavior, are up by at least one-third.

Several legislators said they have nothing to hide and are not worried at all about potential wiretaps or what they say. There's a deep frustration among legislators who say they are honest that they're all being painted as dirty.

The Legislature last spring, in response to the scandal, passed new ethics laws. Alaska didn't go so far as other states that have banned lobbyists from wining and dining legislators. But now the lobbyist has to report the cost if the tab goes over $15.

Lawmakers say some of their colleagues used to boast about never having to pay for a meal. That doesn't seem as prevalent, although there are jokes about $14.99 dinner specials.

"You don't see as many legislators with oil industry lobbyists in expensive restaurants," said Anchorage Democratic Rep. Mike Doogan.

FBI - Stevens-1439

It's more low rent nowadays. Doogan said he saw a lobbyist eating with legislators at Subway.

Prominent Alaska lobbyist Ashley Reed said most legislators don't want to see their names listed in state reports as being wined and dined, particularly in the current political environment.

Reed isn't working for an oil company at the moment. But he's spent time at this special session talking to legislators about other issues. He said lobbyists and legislators are feeling out how to interact with one another in this new world. Everyone is trying to figure out how the new ethics laws work.

"I think there's a certain degree of nervousness, a lack of understanding, and people trying to figure out what they can and can't do vis-a-vis the ethics law," Reed said.

LOBBYING VIA ADS, E-MAILS

The lobbyists working this special session on oil taxes are mostly a subset of the regular crew that works every legislative session. There aren't planeloads of oilmen in dark suits from Anchorage and Houston working the state Capitol halls like in previous Alaska oil tax debates.

Conoco Phillips Alaska President Jim Bowles conceded in an interview before the special session that the current sensitivity of Alaska politics would obviously have to affect lobbying. Oil company representatives also say their lobbyists have always been there to provide information to state legislators -- not to twist arms. The companies deny having any knowledge of Veco's bribes.

Oil company representatives have spent hours testifying before committees, trying to make their case that higher oil taxes would hurt the state in the long run by discouraging investment. Company lobbyists watch, take notes and offer advice to the executives who testify.

Anchorage Rep. Doogan said oil company representatives who testify are less "confrontational."

There are no threats of leaving the state if oil taxes go up. It is more of a soft conversation, an attempt to show legislators the companies and the state have common interests.

Doogan said the oil companies are full of smart people and they have adjusted their tactics.

"The tide has turned on them. They are not in the catbird's seat -- at the moment," he said.

Not all lobbying happens directly in the Capitol and in Juneau bars and restaurants, though.

Legislators say they are getting e-mails from employees of oil-related businesses urging them not to raise taxes on the industry. Chambers of commerce have been asking businesses to call Juneau.

Anti-tax forces are trying to counter the significant pressure being placed on legislators by the popular governor's calls for higher taxes. The oil industry launched an aggressive statewide advertising blitz with newspaper, television and radio ads arguing against the tax.

House Minority Leader Beth Kertulla said those ads are a form of lobbying. It is a change in emphasis for the oil industry, the Juneau Democrat said.

"My sense is that it's less in the hallways here and more coming from outside this time," she said, sitting on one of the Capitol benches that, at least for this moment in Alaska's history, wasn't full of lobbyists.

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him in Juneau at 907-586-1531.

LOAD-DATE: November 6, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

FBI - Stevens-1440

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 5, 2007 Monday
FINAL EDITION

High prices fuel debate over oil tax;
MORE AT STAKE: With industry profits huge but production on the decline, how much can state take?

BYLINE: By STEVE QUINN The Associated Press

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 993 words

DATELINE: JUNEAU -

If oil companies want to continue taking Alaska's oil, state officials say they need to up the ante.

In fact, Gov. Sarah Palin wants 25 percent off the top of all profits the companies make in Alaska, up from 22.5 percent and the second hike in as many years. In a special legislative session, oil giants are warning lawmakers that another increase will make the Alaska business climate look unstable.

But after Western oil companies have been effectively kicked out of Venezuela and Russia, this could be a hollow argument.

"The financial impact pales in comparison to what's going on overseas," said Greg Priddy, analyst with New York-based Eurasia Group. "In the end, with these oil prices, it will be something the industry is willing to absorb."

Already beset by federal corruption probes into last year's oil tax changes, Alaska is hardly alone in pursuing a greater state share.

Battles between governments and the industry are being played out worldwide. And with oil prices inching toward $100 a barrel -- having already surged 20 percent in one month -- the tension between the two is not likely to ease.

"It's a concern for us," said Kevin J. Mitchell, vice president of finance for ConocoPhillips' Alaska operations. "This global phenomena of increased government take continues to increase the cost of doing business"

INTERNATIONAL TREND

Throughout the year, governments have aggressively gone after some of the oil companies' staggering multibillion dollar profits.

* In April, Royal Dutch Shell PLC was forced to cede control of a project in Russia's Sakhalin island to state-controlled OAO Gazprom at the behest of the government. Shell sold Gazprom 27.5 percent of its stake, leaving it with 27.5 percent

* In May, President Hugo Chavez's government took over Venezuela's last privately run oil field, squeezing out major producers including BP PLC, ConocoPhillips, Exxon Mobil Corp., and Chevron Corp.

* In June, BP agreed to sell its stake in a giant Siberian gas field project to Gazprom. This essentially meant the end of an era when foreign oil companies could control Russia's largest hydrocarbon deposits without a strong state-controlled partner.

FBI - Stevens-1441

194A-AN-136620-m, 604

* And in a less severe blow to the industry in Canada, Alberta's provincial government just last month announced it would bump up its take from the industry by $1.45 billion starting in 2009.

"What you're seeing is a global pattern of governments trying to recoup more of the windfall," Priddy said. "What's happening in Alaska is a really mild form but a clear reflection of that."

In Juneau, the industry is balking at Palin's push to boost the tax rate for the second straight year. Last year, the industry pushed for a 20 percent net profits tax or lower; it was the first rate change in 17 years. Exxon Mobil still is pushing for a tax lower than 20 percent.

Today, the stakes remain high for both sides, especially on the North Slope, which accounts for close to 14 percent of the nation's domestic production but is also in a 6 percent annual decline.

Annual net income in Alaska has reached the $2 billion mark for companies like ConocoPhillips and BP; Exxon Mobil does not disclose financial information for its Alaska operations.

INDUSTRY WARNINGS

A second new tax in as many years could create an unstable investment climate in Alaska, industry executives caution.

Companies cite rising costs and harsh arctic conditions in Alaska as inherent risks not found in other regions such as the Gulf of Mexico.

"I do all my investments on an after-tax basis, said Claire Fitzpatrick, senior vice president for London-based BP's Alaska operations. "I have to be able to demonstrate that it's a better investment for London to give me the money rather than the Gulf of Mexico or the Rockies, and the tax is part of it."

BP, ConocoPhillips and Exxon Mobil stressed to lawmakers that there are no plans to quit the North Slope, but they must still heed their warning because production is waning.

In one case, ConocoPhillips said, changing the tax structure could affect six projects under evaluation; production would start in three years.

Kevin Book, an energy policy analyst with Friedman, Billings, Ramsey and Co., said the impasse often lies with how elected officials whose term expires in two, four or six years, think differently from oil executives who evaluate projects on a 20- and 30-year cycle.

"It leads to self-deflating policy choices," Book said. "It deters production that brings you income, or at least it delays it."

The legislative debate is entering its third week of a special session, which has been driven by much more than the need to bulk up the state's coffers. Four members of the state Legislature that passed that law have been indicted on federal bribery charges, and the federal corruption probe has stretched to the state's congressional delegation.

U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens and Rep. Don Young, both Alaska Republicans, have come under scrutiny for their ties to VECO Corp., which last year lobbied heavily for the new tax.

The measure, promoted as a way to provide a stable tax climate in Alaska, was sought by major petroleum producers before they would consider building a multibillion dollar natural gas pipeline tapping vast reserves on the North Slope.

VECO, whose top executives pleaded guilty to federal bribery charges, would have been in line to bid on lucrative construction and maintenance contracts if that project had been built.

The tax passed, but the pipeline deal never moved forward.

The issue of public trust hangs over the industry as well as the Legislature this time, said Republican John Coghill, chairman of the state's House Rules Committee.

"Because of the court action that's going on with those who were involved in the last go-around, it's going to be very important," he said. "We have to look at it from a stewardship position."

ONLINE: For more on the special session and the oil tax plan, go to

adn.com/legislature

LOAD-DATE: November 5, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: WIRE

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1443

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 7, 2007 Wednesday
FINAL EDITION

APOC to work with feds in corruption inquiry;
CONCERNS: State agency plans to pursue its investigation but will link up with Justice Department.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 269 words

The Alaska Public Offices Commission is moving forward on its investigation of what Veco illegally did to benefit Alaska politicians. But APOC is going to have its investigator liaison with the U.S. Department of Justice to try and avoid conflict with the ongoing federal investigation into corruption in Alaska politics.

The Justice Department had sent a letter in early October to state prosecutors asking them to stay out of the investigation. But APOC is a semi-independent state agency and decided to proceed with its investigation until hearing from the Justice Department itself.

William Welch, chief of the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, then wrote APOC on Oct. 26. Welch said he encourages APOC, which focuses on campaign finance violations, to continue to gather publicly available information for its investigation.

But he expressed concern APOC might get in the way of the federal investigation if it starts issuing subpoenas. APOC isn't giving up its right to issue subpoenas. But the agency decided it would be a good idea to have its investigator liaison with someone in the Justice Department to try and avoid problems.

APOC's investigation is focusing on matters such as polls Veco illegally bought for legislators and illegal Veco campaign contributions.

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him in Juneau at 1-907-586-1531.

POLITICAL SCANDALS: For coverage of the corruption investigations from Alaska to D.C., go to

adn.com/fbi

TALK BACK: See if you can hold your own with a fiery cast of characters on our political blog at

adn.com/alaskapolitics

LOAD-DATE: November 8, 2007

FBI - Stevens-1444

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

194A-AN-13620-M;605

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1445

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 7, 2007 Wednesday
FINAL EDITION

Oil tax hike likely as session nears end;
LOTS OF SPECULATION: Any result is possible, legislators say, with even no change a possibility.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 949 words

DATELINE: JUNEAU -

The stain of corrupt state legislators, reports of big oil company profits, and a tremendously popular governor are mixing into a potent political stew that's making it more likely legislators will raise taxes on the oil industry.

There are 10 days left in the 30-day special session on raising the state's main oil tax. The lower committees are done with their work. Now it's time for the real show -- the finance committees and the fights on the House and Senate floor over raising the oil tax. More than a billion dollars a year could be at stake -- for the state to get or the oil companies to keep.

The battle lines in Juneau are being redrawn this week as the special session approaches its climax. The rhetoric is less now about whether to raise oil taxes and more about how much and at what price.

Senate President Lyda Green has probably been the most powerful opponent of Gov. Sarah Palin's push to raise taxes. But even Green said she could support raising the extra tax the state collects when oil prices and company profits are high.

"I think that's where we're headed," the Wasilla Republican said.

The Republican governor, though, said the price-driven approach Green is talking about does not go nearly far enough.

Democrats call it a weak Plan B embraced by legislators who would really prefer to do nothing.

Legislators say this is a free-for-all.

The oil tax bill has many moving pieces -- tax rates, tax credits, deductions, retroactivity, etc. -- and changing any one of them affects allegiances. It's not like a lot of issues in the Legislature, where powerful leaders of the majority have the votes locked down.

FBI - Stevens-1446

This will not be a party line vote.

Palin seems confident.

"At the end of the day, Alaskans are going to be very pleased with the outcome," Palin said.

IMPETUS TO ACT

There's a lot of pressure on legislators to act. Three of their former colleagues appear headed to federal prison for taking bribes during the debate last year that ended in the current oil tax system. More indictments are expected. Consultants are telling lawmakers they can raise taxes without driving away oil investment. Many constituents don't want them to emerge from the special session empty-handed.

194A-AN-13620-M; 606

But oil company representatives say higher taxes will harm investments. That's not what's good for the state or the industry at a time when oil production is in steady decline, they say. Chambers of commerce are weighing in on their side.

There's still a very real chance that this special session will end next week with no change to the oil tax. There remain many divided factions, and getting a majority to agree on anything will be tough. Anti-tax legislators have a powerful ally: the clock.

The special session is set to end Nov. 16. Legislators can vote to extend the session. But many of them are tired of being here and Thanksgiving is coming. Eagle River Rep. Bill Stoltze, who wants a higher tax, figured there is between a "zero and negative 5 percent chance" his colleagues will vote to extend themselves for more time in Juneau.

Stoltze said delay is a useful tactic for legislators who want to leave the tax alone.

"It's a lot easier to make nothing happen than something happen," he pointed out.

There's constant speculation in the Capitol halls, but no one can credibly predict how it will turn out.

"There is a possibility that we'll get a strong oil tax out of here," said Anchorage Democratic Sen. Hollis French, whose Judiciary Committee passed a bill last weekend that would bring in even more money than the governor's plan.

83 PERCENT APPROVAL

The Palin factor will help shape the outcome. The governor had an 83 percent approval rating in one recent poll. Legislators have to think about whether they want to take her on.

Palin wrote a newspaper column last week defending her plan. But she has not visibly waded into the Capital fray during this special session.

She has not testified before a committee or given speeches to the Legislature the way that her predecessor, Gov. Frank Murkowski, did (with limited success). Palin has called only a single press conference this special session, and that was to talk about the Exxon Valdez court case.

At least one legislator, Fairbanks Republican Rep. Jay Ramras, has questioned why the governor is not more involved in pushing her oil tax. Palin brushes off the criticism.

"Things are going very well with the role that I've been playing thus far," the governor said.

Palin said her role is to speak with legislators individually and in groups when they have questions about her tax proposal.

"So far so good. And that is what we will continue to do," Palin said.

Palin said she doesn't think the majority of legislators agree with the senate president's view that taxes should go up only when oil prices are high. The governor wants also to increase the base state oil profits tax rate from 22.5 to 25 percent.

Her revenue commissioner, Pat Galvin, said $80- and $90-a-barrel oil prices are a very recent phenomenon. Legislators need to raise the base tax rate and not bank on high prices, he said.

But lawmakers who want to only raise the surcharge at high prices say it's a way to get money without hurting investment. Several who previously didn't want to change the tax at all said consultants have helped convince them this could work. Details of how it would look are under construction.

"I think our finance (committee) guys are working on a very ambitious plan to increase the take in a way that's a little less painful," said Green, the Senate president. "Then everybody shares on the upside."

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him in Juneau at 907-586-1531.

LOAD-DATE: November 8, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1448

|SEARCH BLOG| | FLAG BLOG|Next Blog» Create Blog | Sign In

WHAT DO I KNOW?

.....THIS AND THAT AS THINGS COME UP

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 09, 2007

DOJ Press Release on Kohring Trial

Again (as with the Kott verdict), the Department of Justice tells the world that the defendant was convicted of three counts (bribery, conspiracy, and attempted extortion) but doesn't mention that he was NOT convicted of one count (extortion.) It's one thing for private companies to omit important information to make themselves look good, but it's entirely different when the government does that.

Also of interest is that they say he faces a maximum of 35 years in prison (20 years on the attempted extortion charge, 10 years on the bribery charge, and five years on the conspiracy charge.) If the attempted extortion charge means up to 20 years, what would he have been facing if convicted for extortion? Not only did the DOJ not mention that he was acquitted on one charge, but that he was acquitted on the most significant charge - Extortion.

The last paragraph is also of interest:

> This case was prosecuted by trial attorneys Nicholas A. Marsh and Edward P. Sullivan of the Criminal Division's Public Integrity Section, headed by Chief William M. Welch, II, and Assistant U.S. Attorneys Joseph W. Bottini and James A. Goeke of the District of Alaska. The case is being investigated by the FBI and the Internal Revenue Service Criminal Investigative Division.

The first sentence includes all four attorneys, though only Sullivan and Bottini actually tried the case. Marsh was there for the first couple of days. He said he was returning to DC after that. Goeke was in Courtroom 3 during most of the Kohring trial, sitting in the back.

The last sentence says the IRS is investigating the case with the FBI. One question that has been raised about the Veco contributions to remodeling Ted Stevens' Girdwood house has been about what Stevens did for Veco in return. Can the Government prove a direct connection? There is the National Science Foundation grant that Veco got. But if the IRS is investigating too, perhaps they are checking on whether Stevens declared the $100,000 worth of work Allen says Veco did for Stevens on his income tax forms.

CAN'T FIND IT?

1. try the search blog button, upper left
2. Try Edit on toolbar, then Find in this Page
3. Try the labels list on the lower right.

ADD THIS BLOG TO MY Technorati FAVORITES

ABOUT ME

STEVE

I started this blog just to find out what the blogworld was all about. I figured I needed to actually blog, not just read other people's blogs, to understand how it works, and what ways it could be used. This is all experimental. A learning exercise for me. It's turning out to be a look at one person's (mine) life in Anchorage. November was devoted to posts from India. February and March were from Thailand. Back in Anchorage now.

VIEW MY COMPLETE PROFILE

BLOG ARCHIVE

▼ 2007 (431)
▼ November (26)
Assembly Work Session on Anti-Sanctuary Ordinance

FBI - Stevens-1449

194A-AN-13620-M;607

Department of Justice

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 2007
WWW.USDOJ.GOV
CRM
(202) 514-2007
TDD (202) 514-1888

Former Alaska State Representative
Victor Kohring Convicted on Public Corruption Charges

WASHINGTON – A federal jury in Anchorage, Alaska, has found former Alaska State Representative Victor H. Kohring guilty of conspiracy, bribery and attempted extortion, Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher of the Criminal Division announced today.

Following an eight-day jury trial, Kohring, a member of the Alaska State House of Representatives from 1994 to 2007, was convicted of conspiracy, bribery and attempted extortion, for corruptly soliciting and receiving financial benefits from a company in exchange for performing official acts in the Alaska State Legislature on the company's behalf.

On May 4, 2007, Kohring was arrested following the unsealing of two indictments charging him and two former Alaska representatives with various public corruption offenses.

At trial, the jury heard evidence that Kohring, while serving as a member in the state legislature, solicited bribes from and took action to benefit the financial interests of VECO Corporation, a major Alaska oil services company. Trial evidence, including more than 25 recordings of conversations involving Kohring and former VECO executives, showed that Kohring repeatedly agreed to lobby his colleagues and, if needed, cast votes in VECO's favor on a key petroleum production tax proposal pending before the Alaska legislature. In exchange, Kohring received multiple cash payments and solicited a $17,000 payment.

"Former Representative Victor Kohring betrayed his oath of office and the people of Alaska when he deliberately and repeatedly took bribes in exchange for official acts," said Assistant Attorney General Fisher. "I thank the federal prosecutors and FBI agents who have worked so hard on this case. Their efforts demonstrate that the Department of Justice will pursue public officials who abuse their positions of power for their own financial gain."

The VECO executives who testified at trial, former Chief Executive Officer Bill J. Allen and former Vice President of Community Affairs and Government Relations Richard L. Smith, pleaded guilty in May 2007 to providing more than $400,000 in corrupt payments to public officials from the state of Alaska.

- Charlie Wilson's War
- Library Day, Anchorage is Our Home
- Mountain Ash Berries on Ice
- Big Oil's Still Big Oil
- State Censoring Blogs?
- Watching the Snow Fall
- Refugee Nation
- Jack Dalton - My Heart Runs in Two Directions
- Darjeeling Limited
- DOJ Press Release on Kohring Trial
- Back into the Real World - Chester Creek
- Trial Leftovers - Access to Courts and Credentiali...
- Liberty Watch 2
- Talk of Alaska
- Blog Meets Radio - KSKA Tuesday at 10am
- Liberty Watch - Who Reads Your Email?
- Dan Fagan on Vic Kohring
- Paul Kendall on Hydrogen
- More Horror Stories from Naomi Wolf
- Naomi Wolf - Ten Steps to Dismantling a Democracy
- Day Light Savings
- Web Surfing Tip
- Buddhist Influence on my Views of Anger
- Let he who is without sin, cast the first stone.
- Kohring Jury Says Guilty Three Times out of Four

▶ October (58)
▶ September (69)
▶ August (53)
▶ July (48)
▶ June (36)

FBI - Stevens-1450

Kohring is the third former member of the Alaska House of Representatives to be convicted this year of corruption crimes. Thomas T. Anderson, a former elected member of the Alaska state House of Representatives, was sentenced to 5 years in prison for extortion, conspiracy, bribery and money laundering for soliciting and receiving money from an FBI confidential source in exchange for agreeing to perform official acts to further a business interest represented by the source. Peter Kott, a former Speaker of the House of Representatives, was convicted in September 2007 of extortion, bribery and conspiracy, and is scheduled to be sentenced on Dec. 7, 2007.

Kohring faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison on the attempted extortion charge, a maximum sentence of 10 years on the bribery charge, and a maximum sentence of five years on the conspiracy charge. U.S. District Judge John W. Sedwick of the District of Alaska set sentencing for Feb. 6, 2008.

This case was prosecuted by trial attorneys Nicholas A. Marsh and Edward P. Sullivan of the Criminal Division's Public Integrity Section, headed by Chief William M. Welch, II, and Assistant U.S. Attorneys Joseph W. Bottini and James A. Goeke of the District of Alaska. The case is being investigated by the FBI and the Internal Revenue Service Criminal Investigative Division.

###

07-878

POSTED BY STEVE AT 5:52 PM

LABELS: ETHICS/CORRUPTION, KOHRING TRIAL, TED STEVENS

1 COMMENTS:

Elaine said...

The IRS is investigating, too?
How interesting.
When they come after somebody, that person is TOAST.
This just gets more and more interesting. I will lay in a supply of pop corn for the next few months.
Keep up the good work - Steve - it's going to be a long and dark winter.
Elaine

SAT NOV 10, 01:27:00 PM PST

Post a Comment

LINKS TO THIS POST

Create a Link

Newer Post Home Older Post

- ► May (34)
- ► April (23)
- ► March (23)
- ► February (30)
- ► January (31)
- ► 2006 (93)

ALASKA BLOGS

Alaskan Abroad
#ライフ ウィズ CCキッズ (Life with CC) Alaska blog in Japanese
Progressive Alaska
Radical Catholic Mom
Globe of Blogs
Alaska Blog Roll

LINKS

The Next Hurrah
readytoimpeach.com
how to talk to a Global Warming Skeptic
DFM Free Interactive Radio
Anysoldier.com

BLOGS OF FRIENDS AND ACQUAINTENCES

Ropi's Blog
The New La is Bella Vita "I Hope You Feel Just Like I Feel"
UPC Tech Blog
草原两棵树

FBI - Stevens-1451

SITE METER

9,317

LABELS

ethics/corruption (108)

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 11, 2007 Sunday
FINAL EDITION

Earmarks and favors;
Rep. Don Young used his influential position to win donations and fund donors' projects

BYLINE: By GREG GORDON and ERIKA BOLSTAD McClatchy Newspapers

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 2775 words

As chairman of the House transportation committee, Alaska Congressman Don Young crisscrossed America to view proposed highway projects -- and to collect campaign contributions from road builders, real estate developers, lobbyists and business people. With weak opposition in his elections in Alaska, he spent campaign money to fly in corporate jets and stay in luxury resorts and hotels. Back in Washington, he steered hundreds of millions of dollars in federal highway money to pet projects that benefited people who gave him campaign cash.

WASHINGTON -- As chairman of the House transportation committee, Alaska Congressman Don Young flew at least three times to upstate New York aboard a jet owned by Robert Congel, an ambitious shopping mall developer seeking federal highway money.

With Young's help, Congel got millions of dollars to boost his dream of building the largest mall in North America. The veteran Republican congressman got something, too: more than $33,000 in political contributions from Congel, his family and his associates.

For Young, the Congel story was hardly unusual. Time after time in recent years, Young approved millions of dollars for highway projects for people who in turn fattened his campaign treasury.

With money pouring in from transportation interests, Young amassed $6.5 million in political contributions from 2001 to 2005. Facing weak political opposition at home, he didn't need much for his campaign. Instead, Young tapped his campaign fund to travel the country, often lavishly and in corporate jets, to meet with more developers and view their proposed highway projects.

Now Young's campaign donations are going for another purpose. He's spent nearly $450,000 on criminal defense lawyers so far this year after he learned of an FBI investigation into his relationships with political donors, who include a Florida real estate developer seeking a highway ramp near his undeveloped land.

Young has plenty of company in Congress when it comes to parlaying federal contracts and grants into campaign donations. But few have taken richer advantage of a controversial process called "earmarking."

During his six years as chairman of the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, Young transformed the massive 2005 highway spending bill by dramatically increasing the use of earmarks, which set aside billions in federal money for pet projects.

With Young in charge, the number of earmarks more than tripled -- from 1,850 projects worth $9.35 billion in 1998 to 6,371 projects valued at $24.2 billion in 2005. Federal auditors have found that thousands of these new earmarks weren't priorities for state transportation officials.

A McClatchy Newspapers investigation has found just how lucrative Young's earmarks were:

FBI - Stevens-1452

194A-AN-13620-M;608

* Of the $6.5 million in contributions that Young collected -- $5.5 million for his campaign and $1 million for his leadership political action committee, or PAC -- about 85 percent came from people who didn't live in Alaska and couldn't vote for him.

* While the number of donors who got earmarks is hard to determine, an analysis of Young's campaign finance reports show that beneficiaries of just seven earmarks with a total price of $259 million gave the veteran congressman at least $575,000. None of the projects was in Alaska.

* As hundreds of lobbyists sought to influence the massive highway-spending bill from 2003 to 2005, Young accepted at least 20 trips aboard private aircraft provided by corporations currying favor with the powerful congressman. He also stayed at such luxury hotels and resorts as the posh Four Seasons hotel in Newport Beach, Calif., MGM's five-diamond Bellagio casino in Las Vegas and the Lodge and Ranch at Chama, N.M., which offers pricey hunting and fly-fishing excursions.

ACTION 'BEARS SCRUTINY'

Young, 74, who has been Alaska's only member of the House of Representatives for 35 years, declined to be interviewed for this story, to comment about specific earmarks or to answer questions about his political donors.

In a written statement, he said that if members of Congress didn't earmark funding, "then federal agencies (would) decide where the money is best spent in that district." He didn't say why that system would be worse than Young himself deciding the fate of projects across the country.

Young's financial relationships with those seeking specific earmarks have created some unseemly appearances. For example, dozens of transportation lobbyists fly to Alaska each year for a fundraiser, where they join Young for a day of salmon fishing.

One aspect of the pending FBI investigation centers on Young's role in securing a $10 million earmark in the $286.5 billion highway bill passed in 2005. The earmark, which was inserted in the bill after final passage by the House of Representatives and Senate, was for a study of a highway ramp sought by a Florida real estate developer. At a fundraiser while on a trip to Bonita Springs, Fla., to inspect the site, Young received more than $40,000 in donations.

The FBI also has looked into Young's connections to an indicted Wisconsin trucking executive who benefited from the provisions in the highway bill, and into his relationship with executives of Veco Corp., the Alaska oil field services company that has been Young's top source of campaign donations over the past two decades. Two top Veco officials have pleaded guilty to bribing Alaska state legislators and using company money to make illegal campaign contributions to state and federal candidates.

Young's legal problems reflect a rise in political corruption investigations by the Justice Department in recent years, which have focused on the connections between campaign contributions and the funding of pet projects through earmarks. So far, more than a dozen members of Congress have come under federal scrutiny.

Ronald Levin, a law professor at Washington University in St. Louis who has studied congressional ethics, called Young's issuance of earmarks benefiting donors who weren't his constituents "unusual" and said that it "bears scrutiny."

One question, he said, is "did he arrange favors for them because they were contributors?" Even if there's no evidence that Young exchanged legislative favors for donations, Levin said that the House ethics committee members would have to decide "whether they can identify some act or conduct on his part that sets him apart from conduct generally tolerated."

Daniel Lowenstein, a University of California, Los Angeles, law professor who's written extensively about election law, declined to comment on Young's fundraising but called the earmarks system "a serious problem" because some campaign donors "are or seem to be ... interested in very specific projects."

The surge in earmarking has been a bonanza for Alaska. Young and Republican Sen. Ted Stevens, at the time the chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, played central roles in landing $1 billion in earmarks for Alaska, the equivalent of about $1,500 for every man, woman and child in the state. It was the third highest amount in the nation.

Among the earmarks: $449 million for what critics have ridiculed as two "bridges to nowhere" -- one in Ketchikan and one across Knik Arm in Anchorage formally named Don Young's Way. Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin, also a Republican, last month refused to use any more money for the Ketchikan project, redirecting it for other purposes.

EARMARKS HAD FEW FINGERPRINTS

In his statement to McClatchy Newspapers, Young said that Alaska is "more than twice the size of Texas" and "a relatively new state that did not start building its infrastructure until World War II," while "most other states have had a few hundred years to do what we've been trying to do." He said it would have been "irresponsible" for him, as chairman, to pass over less populated states that otherwise "would be overlooked by the Washington bureaucracy."

But in the wake of a deadly interstate highway bridge collapse in Minnesota, U.S. Transportation Secretary Mary Peters said in September that Congress' "addiction to earmarks" is diverting funds urgently needed for bridge and road maintenance and to address mounting traffic congestion in big cities.

Unlike today's rules, which require House members to disclose their sponsorship of earmarks, many of the 2005 transportation earmarks were attached to the five-year spending bill in a secretive, closed-door process that left few fingerprints.

Helping move the bill along were 1,117 lobbyists who were paid tens of millions to seek earmarks on behalf of corporations, institutions and even state and local governments, says the nonprofit watchdog group Taxpayers for Common Sense. Among the lobbyists were several former Young aides.

While some congressmen and senators publicly touted earmarks to their constituents, the rationale behind many earmarks is difficult to determine. State and federal transportation officials are loath to criticize publicly those earmarks that they didn't seek for fear of angering Young and other senior legislators.

About 5,600 of the earmarks, worth $17 billion, ordered specific uses for money that states were due to receive under a formula based on size and population. In a recent audit, the U.S. Transportation Department's Office of Inspector General quoted Federal Highway Administration officials as saying that many of those earmarks went for projects "that would not have been high-priority candidates for funding" by state officials.

"They paved the legislation with political pork, ignoring real transportation needs," charged Keith Ashdown, chief investigator for Taxpayers for Common Sense. He pointed to Cincinnati's Brent Spence Bridge, which needs to be rebuilt but received only a few million dollars.

"The 150,000 people who drive over Brent Spence every day is likely to be the number of people that drive over one of the Alaska 'bridges to nowhere' in a year," Ashdown said.

More than 700 other earmarks, costing $6.9 billion, drew even bigger jeers from policy watchdogs because they didn't undergo the kind of rigorous cost-benefit analyses that states usually are required to perform to receive federal highway money.

WIDELY TRAVELED

In addition to the Florida highway ramp, Young's earmarks include:

* Two $5 million allotments benefiting Syracuse, N.Y., shopping mall developer Congel, one for a state study of transportation projects near where Congel hopes to build North America's largest mall and one to develop digital construction technology. Congel, his employees, family members and friends donated more than $33,000 to Young.

FBI - Stevens-1454

* $100 million sought by road builders from Virginia and elsewhere to kick-start a multibillion-dollar project to add four truck lanes to a 325-mile span of Interstate 81, a plan that was scaled back dramatically after an environmental review. Executives of many of the 40 companies backing the plan, their family members and political action committees gave Young $237,000.

* $32 million for five central California projects backed by Young's friend and colleague, then-Republican Congressman Richard Pombo, including a highway interchange in Pombo's hometown of Tracy, where he and his family had extensive real estate holdings. Young collected more than $34,000 at a San Jose area fundraiser in April 2004. Road builder URS Corp. helped pay for a dinner reception; Young's campaign finance report showed he reimbursed the company $845 for the cost.

Young's spokeswoman, Meredith Kenny, said recently that as chairman, the congressman traveled far and wide to view proposed highway and transit projects. "If he's going to fund a project, he wants to see it," she said.

During a standoff with the White House that delayed the transportation bill's passage by nearly two years -- Young wanted to spend more money than the administration was willing to allow -- he crisscrossed the country, often accompanied by his wife, Lu (for whom he named the highway bill SAFETEA-LU). He traveled to Arizona, Arkansas, California, Florida, New Jersey, Texas, Washington and Puerto Rico.

Between 2003 and 2005, Young rode in jets owned or leased by companies seeking earmarks. At the time, a House rule allowed congressional campaigns to reimburse the firms the equivalent of first-class airfare instead of the actual cost for the more expensive private flight.

Young's campaign aides frequently scheduled fundraisers to coincide with his visits, and the delays in passage of the highway bill allowed a second round of fundraisers in a new campaign cycle.

Young also helped Arkansas' congressional delegation procure a $72 million earmark for a highway link between Pine Bluff and a future Interstate 69. Making two trips to Arkansas -- one in each election cycle -- he collected $60,000 in January 2004 and $147,000 in March 2005.

Young also got at least $24,000 from executives of Arkansas-based Wal-Mart Stores and its PAC. Wal-Mart, which hired former Young legislative director Levon Boyagian to lobby on its behalf, benefited from a $35 million earmark for widening a road in front of its Bentonville, Ark., headquarters.

A QUESTION OF PRIORITIES

Florida Transportation Secretary Stephanie Kopelousos, whose agency opposes earmarks, said the funds usually amount to no more than seed money. States then must come up with millions of dollars to finish low-priority projects. Some cities and counties whose projects were rejected in the resulting budget squeeze then hire their own lobbyists to push for congressional earmarks, she said.

Ronald Utt, a Heritage Foundation scholar who has studied wasteful spending in transportation bills, said many earmarked projects are of such low priority that billions of dollars in earmarked money has gone unused.

Until the late 1990s, the U.S. Transportation Department issued reports listing earmarks that were never used, he said, but that practice was ended because Congress didn't want the results known.

"What they were finding was that about half the earmarks that were authorized by Congress were never done," Utt said, calling that a logical conclusion. "Usually the reason you have an earmark is that these are projects that would never get done under normal circumstances."

Among earmarks' chief defenders is the House committee's new Democratic chairman, Jim Oberstar of Minnesota, who waited 40 years as a congressional aide and congressman for his turn in the chairman's seat. Oberstar believes that ending earmarks wouldn't remove politics from the process, but only cede to state governors and transportation commissioners decisions over how to spend federal tax dollars, an aide said.

A number of fiscal conservatives in Congress are pushing for reforms to rein in earmarking, and President Bush has used his veto power to protest earmarks, which he says reflect a lack of "fiscal discipline."

FBI - Stevens-1455

But outlawing them will be tough, as exemplified by the attitude of City Commissioner Ben Nelson of Bonita Springs, Fla., who supported Young's controversial earmark for a highway ramp study. Nelson said he wouldn't "pass moral judgment on the way the process works" in Congress.

"The city of Bonita Springs is supportive of the earmark," he said, "regardless of how 'dirty' it is."

Greg Gordon is a reporter in the Washington bureau of McClatchy Newspapers, and Erika Bolstad covers Alaska issues from Washington for McClatchy and the Daily News. E-mail them at ggordon@mcclatchydc.com and ebolstad@adn.com

WHAT DO YOU THINK?: Talk about this story and hear what others have to say. Click on the story and go to the reader comment section at the bottom.

INSIDE: A closer look at some of the projects that Rep. Don Young went to bat for. See Page A-6

SOME PROJECTS YOUNG HELPED

IN VIRGINIA: Road builders and others pushing a multibillion-dollar truck highway project gave Rep. Don Young more than $230,000 in campaign contributions. Young supported spending $100 million to kick-start the project.

IN SYRACUSE, N.Y.: More than $33,000 in campaign contributions came to Young from a real estate developer, his family and friends. Young supported $10 million in federal spending to benefit the developer, including paying for a traffic study where he hopes to build North America's largest mall.

IN ARKANSAS: More than $200,000 came to Young from Arkansas fundraisers and Arkansas-based Wal-Mart executives. Young helped fund a $72 million highway project between Pine Bluff and a planned interstate, and $35 million for widening a road leading to Wal-Mart's Bentonville headquarters.

IN FLORIDA: Developers met with Young and donated more than $40,000. Young earmarked $10 million to study an offramp.

LOAD-DATE: November 12, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: ILLUSTRATION SHOWS INCREASE IN EARMARKS BETWEEN 1982 AND 2005 AND SUGGESTS THEY'RE OUT OF CONTROL.
ILLUSTRATION SHOWS DON YOUNG'S FUNDRAISING TRAIL AND PROJECTS.
BOB HALLINEN / Daily News archive 2006
Use of earmarks tripled during Rep. Don Young's six years as chairman of the House transportation committee.
LAUREN VICTORIA BURKE / Associated Press archive 2006
As chairman of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, Young oversaw a tripling in the use of earmarks.
BILL ROTH / Daily News archive 2007
Congressman Don Young reacts to protesters gathered where food was being served at his meet and greet at the Delaney Park Strip last August. Young said, "It's America; they can do what they want to do."

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1456

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 11, 2007 Sunday
FINAL EDITION

Legislators try to plug break for line repairs;
SESSION: Lawmakers want loophole closed that allows oil firms to deduct fix-it expenses.

BYLINE: By STEVE QUINN The Associated Press

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 737 words

DATELINE: JUNEAU -

As the state Legislature spends its last week of a special session wrangling over a tax hike on oil companies' net profits, there still is the matter of a certain $130 million tax break to resolve.

That's essentially the amount current state laws says BP can legally deduct for replacing 16 miles of transit pipeline that sustained two corrosion-related leaks last year and caused a partial shutdown at Prudhoe Bay, the nation's largest oil field.

Many legislators say the law has a loophole that must be closed. Others say a hasty change could create more problems. More than one year later, the issue remains highly charged.

Corrosion was to blame for a leak that spilled more than 200,000 gallons in March 2006 in a section of the transit line. BP recently pleaded guilty to a criminal violation of the federal Clean Water Act for that record spill.

A much smaller spill in another part of the line occurred in August 2006, while state lawmakers were debating oil taxes. That spill triggered the Prudhoe closures and sent oil prices toward $80 per barrel, stirring fears of escalating gasoline prices.

"The price of oil had gone up, so the shutdown wasn't leaving us destitute," said Sen. Gene Therriault, R-North Pole. "But what we immediately started talking about was, should they be able to deduct that expense. That debate continues."

Since then, two state lawmakers have pushed for a tax law change that would keep oil companies from passing repair costs stemming from improper maintenance back to the state through deductions and tax credits.

Bills sponsored by Sen. Tom Wagoner of Kenai and House Rep. Kurt Olson of Soldotna, both Republicans, were stalled in separate committees during the regular session that ended in May.

Last year Wagoner unsuccessfully tried to push this consideration into the state's new tax bill just a few days after the partial shutdown.

WHO SHOULD PAY?

The two lawmakers are now pinning their hopes on similar provisions in Gov. Sarah Palin's bill being debated in a special legislative session scheduled to end Friday.

"Bad maintenance or lack of maintenance should not be passed back to the citizens of Alaska. It's that simple," said Olson. "If they end up taking these deductions, then we end up paying for that poor maintenance, and that needs to be fixed."

FBI - Stevens-1457

194A-AN-13620-M;609

BP spokesman Ronnie Chappell said lawmakers need to be mindful that BP's transit pipeline is a $260 million investment into new infrastructure designed to last decades.

"This is a significant upgrade and capital investment in the future of that oil field," Chappell said. "We will continue to take any and all deductions we are allowed under the law."

• The federal government hasn't missed its chance to hold BP accountable. Congress has held hearings on the corrosion, including one in May while Wagoner's bill languished in a House committee.

In late October, BP entered into a plea agreement on the misdemeanor violation of the federal Clean Water Act. The agreement with the U.S. Attorney's Office will cost BP more than $20 million.

LOOPHOLES

State lawmakers, however, have been less successful than the federal government, a setback Wagoner deems, "an embarrassment."

"Big brother has got to take care of state of Alaska," Wagoner said. "That doesn't look very good to me."

BP's federal criminal negligence is not covered as a deduction exemption under the state's current tax law.

Palin's new bill proposes a change in who should pay for petroleum equipment maintenance repairs that stem from an "unscheduled interruption of, or reduction in the rate of, oil or gas production."

The plea agreement enhances the urgency to rewrite the law, Palin said.

"It's been clear by the evidence in this case as to why we need to close the loopholes," Palin said. "That's what this bill covers."

If lawmakers can't find room for provisions under Palin's plan, House Finance Committee Mike Chenault, R-Nikiski, said he would revisit Wagoner's bill.

That bill was referred to Chenault's committee with less than a week remaining in the regular session last May. Chenault said there was no time to hold a hearing because the House was still dealing with other pressing matters, including a multibillion-dollar state budget.

"Some of the deductions need to be looked at and they need to be tightened," Chenault said. "I don't think they should be given a free ride. If they had shoddy maintenance, it shouldn't be deductible."

LOAD-DATE: November 12, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: WIRE

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

FBI - Stevens-1458

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

washingtonpost.com

Advertisement

CORRECTION TO THIS ARTICLE
Previous editions of this article in print and on the Web incorrectly identified state Rep. Jay Ramras (R) as Ray Ramras. This version has been corrected.

'I'll Sell My Soul to the Devil'

Corruption Scandals Involve Alaska's Biggest Political Names

By Karl Vick
Washington Post Staff Writer
Monday, November 12, 2007; A01

ANCHORAGE -- When the FBI came looking for corruption in Alaska politics, it found an excellent perch in Suite 604 of the Baranof Hotel in Juneau, the state capital. There, a profane septuagenarian named Bill Allen did business throughout a 2006 special session called to set taxes on the oil industry. With hundred-dollar bills in his front pocket for ease of access when lawmakers turned up with their hands out, the oil-services company executive turned in a bravura performance before the pinhole camera that federal agents installed opposite his favorite chair.

"Let me count first here," Allen said, shushing a former statehouse speaker as he counted out a bribe in video footage entered as evidence in the lawmaker's September trial, one of several crowding the docket of the federal court here.

On another tape, Pete Kott, the former Republican speaker of the Alaska House of Representatives, crowed as he described beating back a tax bill opposed by oil companies. "I had to cheat, steal, beg, borrow and lie," Kott said. "Exxon's happy. BP's happy. I'll sell my soul to the devil."

"Well, that will stay in this room," one lobbyist said as a midnight session wound down.

It did not, of course. Since breaking into public view a year ago when federal agents raided lawmakers' offices and homes -- finding $32,200 neatly stacked in a closet of Kott's condo -- the federal probe has produced four indictments, three convictions, three guilty pleas and a rapt audience keen to see how high into Alaska's political hierarchy the rot reaches.

Officially, the scandal has remained confined to Juneau, where Alaska lawmakers had grown so accustomed to operating under the presumption of impropriety that several of them embroidered ball caps with the letters CBC, for "Corrupt Bastards Club." (An Anchorage coffeehouse now offers Corrupt Bastards Brew.) But with signs that the investigation is brushing against Alaska's lone congressman, Don Young (R), and its longtime and venerated senator Ted Stevens (R), residents of the Last Frontier are experiencing a rare spasm of soul-searching.

"These disclosures have come as a real shock, because of revelations of what was going on, and because Alaskans have always felt that they are special," said Vic Fisher, 83, one of four surviving members of the convention that only a half-century ago wrote Alaska's state constitution. "And that this thing is ruining our national reputation."

FBI - Stevens-1459

194A-AN-13620-M;610

Young, who has represented the nation's largest state in the U.S. House for 34 years, has not been named in the proceedings -- yet he reports spending $450,000 on legal fees over the past six months. Veco, the oil-field services company that Allen owned, was Young's largest campaign contributor.

Stevens, an iconic figure who has dominated Alaska politics for decades, has said little publicly since agents swarmed over his mountainside home, the renovation of which was overseen by Allen.

But Ben Stevens, the senator's son and a former Alaska Senate president, has been at the center of the scandal from the start. When Allen pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy charges, he stated that almost a quarter of a million dollars in consulting fees paid to the younger Stevens was in fact bribery.

"About the only ones that I can trust is you and ol' Ben Stevens," the oil executive told Kott on one tape.

The younger Stevens maintains his innocence, most recently in a call to an Anchorage radio talk show that noted he had received fees from fishing companies that benefited from federal grants his father engineered.

"I'm under investigation by the Department of Justice, the FBI, the IRS, the National Marine Fisheries Service," Ben Stevens told KFQD-AM. "This is a feeding frenzy. Anybody who says anything, this is an environment where any accusation is . . . is automatic guilt."

The probe has delivered low humor as well as bad behavior. In one exchange the FBI captured by wiretap, Allen handed a sexual potency pill and a sleeping pill to Kott -- who later phoned, confused and upset, after mixing them up.

"Sometimes you try to come up with an exaggeration to make a point," said Les Gara, an Anchorage Democrat. "It's hard to do that here."

Not all the indictments rose from oil money. Former representative Tom Anderson last month was sentenced to five years for taking money from a consultant for a company hoping to build a prison in Alaska; the consultant was working undercover for the FBI. The Republican lawmaker's only previous brush with the law came when his girlfriend, a fellow legislator, summoned police as they fought over bowling scores.

But Alaskans appreciate, on a personal level, the role of petroleum in their state. When vast deposits were discovered on the North Slope, the government negotiated a share of royalties that now accounts for 85 percent of the state budget. The windfall not only lets Alaska do away with personal income tax but also offers annual payments to every one of its 670,000 residents. This year's check: $1,654.

Dependence on such a mammoth scale naturally affected the dynamic in Juneau, where the Petroleum Club became the preferred site for political fundraisers.

FBI - Stevens-1460

"You get this frontier image of individualism, stereotypical bluster, self-reliance, and it plays right into corrupt politics," said historian Steve Haycox, author of several books on Alaska. " 'We don't need advice from anybody else. We don't give a damn about traditional institutions of American culture. We're just going to do it our way.' "

The bluster roared in Suite 604, where Allen and his chief lobbyist plotted strategy and dispensed cash.

"You got any hundreds?" Allen asks an associate before passing a wad to then-Rep. Vic Kohring, convicted early this month of bribery and extortion.

"I appreciate that, Bill. Thank you so much," Kohring says warmly. "What can I do at this point to help you guys? Anything? Just keep lobbying my colleagues for the governor's plan?"

The footage unspools like a Thomas Nast cartoon come to life, the grainy images punctuated by Allen's bray, the pop and squeak of a cork leaving a wine bottle and the sycophantic chortles of lawmakers vying for Veco's favor.

Veco Vice President Rick Smith, who also pleaded guilty, tried on one tape to coax Allen toward discretion. But Allen waved him off, referring to pressure from "clients."

Smith relents: "You have to get dirty and you have to produce; I understand that."

Alaskans' disappointment with all this has taken several forms.

Few profess shock.

"It was common knowledge that everything was corrupt," said Ray Metcalfe, a former Republican legislator known as "Disco Ray" while in office, but known in later years for his vain efforts to persuade state officials to investigate Ben Stevens. "It was common knowledge, but nobody wanted to talk about it."

The brazenness evident on the tapes has taken many aback, however.

"There's a whole kind of culture of unreality," said Michael Carey, former editorial page editor of the Anchorage Daily News, whose Web site, http://www.adn.com, posted much of the evidence. "I always thought there were people on the take, but in the way of campaign contributions -- traditionally legitimate ways to game the system."

Indeed, the fallout has some officials wondering what "normal" means in Alaska politics. Last month, a Fairbanks Republican accused a mining company of bribing private citizens by flying them to Anchorage and giving them spending money.

"I don't know if this is immoral behavior, illegal behavior, unethical behavior or just raw capitalism," said Rep. Jay Ramras. In the end, upon encountering one of the men he had accused, "we hugged it out, like they say on the HBO show 'Entourage.' "

Veco's bribes went to public officials, totaling $400,000, Allen testified. But some residents expressed dismay at the puny size of individual transactions. Kohring was convicted of taking around $2,000.

FBI - Stevens-1461

"The fact of the matter is, we all want to bribe a politician," said Mr. Whitekeys, an Anchorage entertainer whose long-running political cabaret is called the Whale Fat Follies. "We all thought it'd take a Mercedes or a Porsche. Nobody knew you could buy a politician for the cost of a used riding lawn mower."

Alaskans also express a regret bordering on shame that the misdeeds were uncovered by the feds. The state is deeply ambivalent about Washington. Thanks in large part to Ted Stevens's seniority, Alaska receives more federal money per capita than any other state, a situation that tends to undermine the image of flinty self-reliance.

It also encourages cronyism. Bob Kaufman, a Web tourism entrepreneur who moved to Anchorage as a venture capitalist, said that every one of a half-dozen businesses he researched for acquisition depended on a government subsidy for profitability.

"Most of the companies up here, I look at them and say, 'I'm not as valuable as an owner up here, because I don't have any buddies in politics,' " Kaufman said.

Still, the tapes produced sentiments that overwhelm even resentment toward Washington. "I spoke at a meeting of Alaska Conservation Voters recently, mentioned the FBI -- and people applauded!" said Vic Fisher.

The outrage helped Democrats push through ethics legislation last session, and in November catapulted a reformer into the governor's chair. Republican Sarah Palin was already running on clean government when the first indictments landed; right between the primary and general election.

In office, Palin has kept up the drumbeat, last month summoning lawmakers back for a new special session on the very oil-tax issue that brought the FBI to Juneau. In an interview, Palin said she wanted to "clear the legislature's name" by "allowing legislators the opportunity to revote.

"Those who are left," she added.

Post a Comment

View all comments that have been posted about this article.

You must be logged in to leave a comment. Log in | Register

Submit

Comments that include profanity or personal attacks or other inappropriate comments or material will be removed from the site. Additionally, entries that are unsigned or contain "signatures" by someone other than the actual author will be removed. Finally, we will take steps to block users who violate any of our posting standards, terms of use or privacy policies or any other policies governing this site. Please review the full rules governing commentaries and discussions. You are fully responsible for the content that you post.

FBI - Stevens-1462

© 2007 The Washington Post Company

Ads by Google

Alaska State Ferry
Official Alaska State Ferry Site Reservations Schedules and Specials dot.state.ak.us/amhs

Alaska Gays & Lesbians
Official site. For relationships. Meet local singles. 100% join free.
AlaskaGaySingles.com

Need Chiropractic Care?

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 12, 2007 Monday
FINAL EDITION

House OKs 25 percent oil tax bill;
SEVERAL INCREASES: Revenue Department says the package could be worth $1.5 billion more for state.

BYLINE: BY SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 840 words

DATELINE: JUNEAU -

The state House passed a major oil tax increase Sunday night after a debate that included allegations of conflicts of interest and calls to restore the damaged public trust in state leaders.

The bill would raise the state oil tax rate from 22.5 to 25 percent, the increase sought by Gov. Sarah Palin. The bill would also increase the extra charge the state collects when oil prices and company profits are high. The total package could bring in $1.5 billion more yearly in these times of high prices, the Revenue Department said.

Representatives voted 27 to 13 to pass the bill in the waning days of the special session, which was called by the governor to address the issue. The fight is not over, though. The House has to reconcile the bill with whatever the state Senate wants. The Senate hasn't come out with its version of the oil tax yet.

Legislators have argued emotionally during the special session about whether to raise the base oil tax rate as Palin wanted. But Sunday's House vote on the amendment to do so passed easily.

The vote in favor of the amendment was 26 to 14. Fairbanks Republican Rep. Mike Kelly argued in favor of it, saying the oil tax the Legislature passed last year was tainted. He was referring to the bribes then-Veco Corp. executives admitted they paid legislators in an effort to keep the tax rate low.

"This sets us on a course to restoring trust," he said.

Not even one rose to speak against Kelly.

A group of oil industry lobbyists walked out of the Capitol after the amendment vote, looking glum and wondering aloud if the vote would stand.

FBI - Stevens-1463

It was a bad night for opponents of raising the oil tax. They were on the defensive as soon as the House floor session began. Kodiak Republican state Rep. Gabrielle LeDoux, who is running for Congress, argued that some of them shouldn't even get to vote.

"It is absolutely essential to restore the public trust," LeDoux said in a speech on the House floor. "One way we can do that is if people with clear ties to the oil industry recuse themselves from voting."

It's tradition in the Legislature to require lawmakers who declare a conflict of interest to vote anyway. House Rules Chairman John Coghill, a North Pole Republican, rose and said it's a citizen Legislature and everyone has conflicts on one issue or another.

194A-AN-13620-M; 611

"Just because somebody works in a particular industry, I don't know if you can paint them ... as an industry shill, if you will," he said.

Anchorage Republican Rep. Kevin Meyer, who works in purchasing for Conoco Phillips, said he doesn't have a conflict under state law. That's because he doesn't have a "substantial equity ownership" in the oil company.

Meyer asked to be excused from voting anyway, but he was told to vote. Republican Reps. Mike Chenault of Nikiski and Mike Hawker of Anchorage also declared potential conflicts. Both were required to vote. Hawker's wife works in the oil industry and Chenault owns a construction firm that has done oil field work in the past.

"I'm not afraid to admit I work in the oil industry," Chenault said. "I have all my life."

Chenault had managed to keep the tax rate down at 22.5 percent in the House Finance Committee, where he argued it could save jobs. But Chenault was repeatedly on the losing end Sunday in the votes on the House floor.

House Democrats won two significant amendments Sunday night. One was a compromise in the debate over what kind of tax Alaska should have.

The Democrats object to the state having an oil tax based on net profits, which they say allows the oil companies to reduce their tax burden by claiming lots of deductions.

Many Democrats had instead wanted a tax system based just on gross production at the big North Slope oil fields. That wasn't getting any traction in the Legislature. So they instead offered an amendment to have a standard deduction on operating expenses for the Prudhoe and Kuparuk fields, rather than letting the companies itemize those costs.

The amendment passed 21-19. Anchorage Democratic Rep. Les Gara then successfully pushed another amendment to do away with the companies' ability to get retroactive tax deductions for investments made in previous years.

The final debate over the bill included tax hike opponents saying it goes too far, taking even more money than the governor's original proposal. House Majority Leader Ralph Samuels, an Anchorage Republican, painted a bleak vision of a potential future of economic problems and declining property values.

"The consequences of us being wrong, they are dreadful consequences," Samuels said.

Fairbanks Republican Rep. Kelly downplayed such talk. He said the oil company public relations effort has been successful, persuading some legislators to be scared of the future. Kelly said he's studied the tax, and Alaska will be fine.

"I'm very confident we have done the right thing here," he said.

The governor released a statement saying "all Alaskans can be proud of the bill."

LEGISLATURE: For more on the special session and oil tax, go to

adn.com/legislature

LOAD-DATE: November 12, 2007

FBI - Stevens-1464

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

CBS NEWS

BACK PRINT

Alaska Rocked By Political Scandals

ANCHORAGE, Nov. 12, 2007

(Washingtonpost.com) This story was written by Karl Vick.

When the FBI came looking for corruption in Alaska politics, it found an excellent perch in Suite 604 of the Baranof Hotel in Juneau, the state capital. There, a profane septuagenarian named Bill Allen did business throughout a 2006 special session called to set taxes on the oil industry. With hundred-dollar bills in his front pocket for ease of access when lawmakers turned up with their hands out, the oil-services company executive turned in a bravura performance before the pinhole camera that federal agents installed opposite his favorite chair.

"Let me count first here," Allen said, shushing a former statehouse speaker as he counted out a bribe in video footage entered as evidence in the lawmaker's September trial, one of several crowding the docket of the federal court here.

On another tape, Pete Kott, the former Republican speaker of the Alaska House of Representatives, crowed as he described beating back a tax bill opposed by oil companies. "I had to cheat, steal, beg, borrow and lie," Kott said. "Exxon's happy. BP's happy. I'll sell my soul to the devil."

"Well, that will stay in this room," one lobbyist said as a midnight session wound down.

It did not, of course. Since breaking into public view a year ago when federal agents raided lawmakers' offices and homes -- finding $32,200 neatly stacked in a closet of Kott's condo -- the federal probe has produced four indictments, three convictions, three guilty pleas and a rapt audience keen to see how high into Alaska's political hierarchy the rot reaches.

Officially, the scandal has remained confined to Juneau, where Alaska lawmakers had grown so accustomed to operating under the presumption of impropriety that several of them embroidered ball caps with the letters CBC, for "Corrupt Bastards Club." (An Anchorage coffeehouse now offers Corrupt Bastards Brew.) But with signs that the investigation is brushing against Alaska's lone congressman, Don Young (R), and its longtime and venerated senator Ted Stevens (R), residents of the Last Frontier are experiencing a rare spasm of soul-searching.

"These disclosures have come as a real shock, because of revelations of what was going on, and because Alaskans have always felt that they are special," said Vic Fisher, 83, one of four surviving members of the convention that only a half-century ago wrote Alaska's state constitution. "And that this thing is ruining our national reputation."

Young, who has represented the nation's largest state in the U.S. House for 34 years, has not been named in the proceedings -- yet he reports spending $450,000 on legal fees over the past six months. Veco, the oil-field services company that Allen owned, was Young's largest campaign contributor.

Stevens, an iconic figure who has dominated Alaska politics for decades, has said little publicly since agents swarmed over his mountainside home, the renovation of which was overseen by Allen.

But Ben Stevens, the senator's son and a former Alaska Senate president, has been at the center of the scandal from the start. When Allen pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy charges, he stated that almost a quarter of a million dollars in consulting fees paid to the younger Stevens was in fact bribery.

"About the only ones that I can trust is you and ol' Ben Stevens," the oil executive told Kott on one tape.

The younger Stevens maintains his innocence, most recently in a call to an Anchorage radio talk show that noted he had received fees from fishing companies that benefited from federal grants his father engineered. FBI - Stevens-1465

"I'm under investigation by the Department of Justice, the FBI, the IRS, the National Marine Fisheries Service," Ben Stevens told KFQD-AM. "This is a feeding frenzy. Anybody who says anything, this is an environment where any accusation is . . . is automatic guilt."

The probe has delivered low humor as well as bad behavior. In one exchange the FBI captured by wiretap, Allen handed a sexual potency pill and a sleeping pill to Kott -- who later phoned, confused and upset, after mixing them up.

"Sometimes you try to come up with an exaggeration to make a point," said Les Gara, an Anchorage Democrat. "It's hard to do that here."

Not all the indictments rose from oil money. Former representative Tom Anderson last month was sentenced to five years for taking money from a consultant for a company hoping to build a prison in Alaska; the consultant was working undercover for the FBI. The Republican lawmaker's only previous brush with the law came when his girlfriend, a fellow legislator, summoned police as they fought over bowling scores.

194A-AN-13620-M;612

But Alaskans appreciate, on a personal level, the role of petroleum in their state. When vast deposits were discovered on the North Slope, the government negotiated a share of royalties that now accounts for 85 percent of the state budget. The windfall not only lets Alaska do away with personal income tax but also offers annual payments to every one of its 670,000 residents. This year's check: $1,654.

Dependence on such a mammoth scale naturally affected the dynamic in Juneau, where the Petroleum Club became the preferred site for political fundraisers.

"You get this frontier image of individualism, stereotypical bluster, self-reliance, and it plays right into corrupt politics," said historian Steve Haycox, author of several books on Alaska. " 'We don't need advice from anybody else. We don't give a damn about traditional institutions of American culture. We're just going to do it our way.' "

The bluster roared in Suite 604, where Allen and his chief lobbyist plotted strategy and dispensed cash.

"You got any hundreds?" Allen asks an associate before passing a wad to then-Rep. Vic Kohring, convicted early this month of bribery and extortion.

"I appreciate that, Bill. Thank you so much," Kohring says warmly. "What can I do at this point to help you guys? Anything? Just keep lobbying my colleagues for the governor's plan?"

The footage unspools like a Thomas Nast cartoon come to life, the grainy images punctuated by Allen's bray, the pop and squeak of a cork leaving a wine bottle and the sycophantic chortles of lawmakers vying for Veco's favor.

Veco Vice President Rick Smith, who also pleaded guilty, tried on one tape to coax Allen toward discretion. But Allen waved him off, referring to pressure from "clients."

Smith relents: "You have to get dirty and you have to produce; I understand that."

Alaskans' disappointment with all this has taken several forms.

Few profess shock.

"It was common knowledge that everything was corrupt," said Ray Metcalfe, a former Republican legislator known as "Disco Ray" while in office, but known in later years for his vain efforts to persuade state officials to investigate Ben Stevens. "It was common knowledge, but nobody wanted to talk about it."

The brazenness evident on the tapes has taken many aback, however.

"There's a whole kind of culture of unreality," said Michael Carey, former editorial page editor of the Anchorage Daily News, whose Web site, http://www.adn.com, posted much of the evidence. "I always thought there were people on the take, but in the way of campaign contributions -- traditionally legitimate ways to game the system."

Indeed, the fallout has some officials wondering what "normal" means in Alaska politics. Last month, a Fairbanks Republican accused a mining company of bribing private citizens by flying them to Anchorage and giving them spending money.

"I don't know if this is immoral behavior, illegal behavior, unethical behavior or just raw capitalism," said Rep. Ray Ramras. In the end, upon encountering one of the men he had accused, "we hugged it out, like they say on the HBO show 'Entourage.' "

Veco's bribes went to public officials, totaling $400,000, Allen testified. But some residents expressed dismay at the puny size of individual transactions. Kohring was convicted of taking around $2,000.

"The fact of the matter is, we all want to bribe a politician," said Mr. Whitekeys, an Anchorage entertainer whose long-running political cabaret is called the Whale Fat Follies. "We all thought it'd take a Mercedes or a Porsche. Nobody knew you could buy a politician for the cost of a used riding lawn mower."

Alaskans also express a regret bordering on shame that the misdeeds were uncovered by the feds. The state is deeply ambivalent about Washington. Thanks in large part to Ted Stevens's seniority, Alaska receives more federal money per capita than any other state, a situation that tends to undermine the image of flinty self-reliance.

It also encourages cronyism. Bob Kaufman, a Web tourism entrepreneur who moved to Anchorage as a venture capitalist, said that every one of a half-dozen businesses he researched for acquisition depended on a government subsidy for profitability.

"Most of the companies up here, I look at them and say, 'I'm not as valuable as an owner up here, because I don't have any buddies in politics,' " Kaufman said.

FBI - Stevens-1466

Still, the tapes produced sentiments that overwhelm even resentment toward Washington. "I spoke at a meeting of Alaska Conservation Voters recently, mentioned the FBI -- and people applauded!" said Vic Fisher.

The outrage helped Democrats push through ethics legislation last session, and in November catapulted a reformer into the governor's chair. Republican Sarah Palin was already running on clean government when the first indictments landed, right between the primary and general election.

In office, Palin has kept up the drumbeat, last month summoning lawmakers back for a new special session on the very oil-tax issue that brought the FBI to Juneau. In an interview, Palin said she wanted to "clear the legislature's name" by "allowing legislators the opportunity to revote.

"Those who are left," she added.

© 2007 The Washington Post Company

Feedback > Terms of Service > Privacy Statement

FBI - Stevens-1467

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 13, 2007 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

Anderson to prison on Dec. 3;
5-YEAR SENTENCE: First ex-legislator convicted in FBI sting will go to Oregon.

BYLINE: The Associated Press

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 281 words

A former Alaska lawmaker convicted of seven counts of conspiracy and bribery will begin his five-year federal prison sentence next month.

Former Rep. Tom Anderson on Monday told Anchorage television station KTUU that he will report to a federal prison south of Portland, Ore., on Dec. 3.

Anderson, 40, a two-term Republican from Anchorage who chose not to run for re-election in 2006, was convicted in July of taking nearly $24,000 he thought was coming from a private prison firm, Cornell Industries Inc., in exchange for his assistance on legislation.

The money was supplied by the FBI through an informant under contract to Cornell, Frank Prewitt, a former Alaska Department of Corrections commissioner. Prewitt secretly recorded his conversations with Anderson and a co-conspirator, lobbyist Bill Bobrick, between July 2004 and March 2005. Cornell Industries was not aware of the bribery scheme or investigation.

The 60-month sentence fell within the presentencing report guidelines of 51 to 63 months.

Anderson was the first of four former Republican Alaska lawmakers arrested on federal corruption charges.

Former House Speaker Pete Kott was convicted in October of conspiracy to solicit financial benefits, extortion and bribery. He will be sentenced Dec. 7.

Former state Rep. Vic Kohring was convicted earlier this month of bribery, conspiracy to commit extortion and attempted interference with commerce by extortion. He was acquitted of another count of interference with commerce by extortion. Sentencing was set Feb. 6.

FBI - Stevens-1468

The corruption trial of former state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch has been delayed.

CORRUPTION: Read more about the trials and FBI investigations at

adn.com/fbi

LOAD-DATE: November 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Anderson

194A-AN-13620-M;613

DOCUMENT-TYPE: WIRE

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1469

Golf Tournaments Eyed in Corruption Case

By MATT APUZZO
KTVA

Article Last Updated:11/14/2007 03:15:45 PM AKST

WASHINGTON (AP) The Justice Department is investigating whether an Alaska oil contractor used golf tournaments to funnel cash to Rep. Don Young, people close to the corruption investigation said.

The contractor, Rick Smith, told investigators that Young personally received cash at the events. Once an important ally who helped raise tens of thousands of dollars for Young's election committee, Smith has become a key government informant.

As part of his cooperation, Smith allowed FBI agents to record his telephone calls with the Republican congressman in a corruption sting. The former VECO Corp. vice president has pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers to support oil-friendly legislation.

Details of Smith's cooperation against Alaska's 18-term congressman were confirmed by people close to the case who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss it publicly.

The case, which surfaced last year as a state bribery investigation, has spread from Alaska to Capitol Hill, where Young and Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens are under scrutiny. Two of the most powerful Republicans in Congress, Young and Stevens are influential figures in setting U.S. energy policy and have close ties to VECO, which services pipelines and builds oil exploration equipment. Young has spent more than $446,000 on legal fees this year, campaign finance reports show.

Golf outings have often been used by lobbyists and interest groups to curry favor with lawmakers. Politicians, including Young, also use them as fundraisers.

The events under FBI scrutiny, however, were different. Unlike the dollar-for-dollar accounting of golf fundraisers in Alaska, Washington state and Virginia, the events at the Moose Run Golf Course just outside Anchorage were informal and the prizes were cash. There is no record of them on the campaign or personal financial reports that federal lawmakers are required to file.

"That tournament had nothing to do with the campaign or anything official. It was just people getting together to play golf," said Young's campaign spokesman, Mike Anderson, who declined to discuss the tournaments or how often Young won. "The congressman finds it inappropriate to discuss anything connected to an ongoing investigation."

Moose Run manager Gary Sanford said he recalls the tournament being held about three times over the past several years. About 16 to 24 people played, mostly Anchorage businessmen, at maybe $100 each, Sanford said. Smith made the arrangements, handled the money and doled out the cash prizes, Sanford recalled.

Sanford said he was sometimes around when prize money was handed out and said he doesn't remember ever seeing Young receive cash he didn't win.

Sanford said he doesn't know whether records were kept. VECO attorney Amy Menard said she hasn't seen any documents related to the tournaments and Smith's attorney, John Murtagh, did not return messages seeking comment.

The events were normally held in August, shortly after Young's annual pig roast fundraiser, which has also attracted FBI attention. Smith organized that event, which drew up to 400 people and cost up to $15,000. The events, which Smith organized for years, were lucrative. The day after the 2006 event, Young's campaign reported nearly $45,000 in donations.

After the investigation surfaced, Young amended his campaign finance reports to show he reimbursed VECO founder Bill Allen about $38,000 for event expenses.

At a recent corruption trial, defense attorneys suggested Smith laundered money by cashing golf tournament checks at a bar under what he called a "phony account."

FBI - Stevens-1470

Some golf managers around Anchorage received letters from the Justice Department alerting them they'd been recorded on wiretaps of Smith's phone.

Jeff Barnhart, manager of the Settlers Bay Golf Course in Wasilla, Alaska, received such a letter. He said he's not surprised authorities are eyeing Smith's golf tournaments, but he said the businessman will be remembered in golf circles for his good deeds.

"He's done a lot for the community," Barnhart said, "and raised money for more charities than you can imagine."

Close Window | Send To Printer

194A-AN-13620-M; 614

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 14, 2007 Wednesday
FINAL EDITION

Session nears end with no new oil tax;
PALIN: Governor says she'll call for another 30 days if needed.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 895 words

DATELINE: JUNEAU -

The special session is set to end in two days, and it is increasingly looking as if there might be no oil tax bill the House and Senate can agree on.

That doesn't mean the fight would end, though. Gov. Sarah Palin said Tuesday she would call the Legislature into another 30-day special session if lawmakers do not send her a bill by the Friday midnight deadline. She wouldn't say if the next special session would come right after this one.

The state House passed a bill Sunday night that would give Palin the oil tax increase she wants. But it has stalled in the Senate Finance Committee, which has yet to come up with its own version of the oil tax.

Legislative leaders agreed Tuesday that there is not enough time left to have a conference committee work out the differences between whatever the Senate decides and the bill the House passed.

That means unless the Senate passes a bill by midnight Friday that the House can accept without major changes, there will be no oil tax measure this special session.

Leaders of the House and Senate weren't giving up hope of finding a compromise by the deadline.

"I think the most likely scenario is the Senate passes something we can accept and we all go home," said House Speaker John Harris, a Valdez Republican.

Senate President Lyda Green said she also thinks there is a good chance of reaching an agreement with the House in time.

"There is a will in both bodies to not have to continue to work on this issue," the Republican from Wasilla said.

FBI - Stevens-1471

Green said there is a "50-50" chance the Senate will pass a measure substantially similar to what the House passed on Sunday night. That bill would increase the oil tax rate from 22.5 to 25 percent of net profits, with an additional 0.4 percentage point increase for each dollar the price of oil is above about $52 per barrel.

That bill would bring in around $1.5 billion more a year to the state in these times of high oil prices, according to the Revenue Department.

SENATE IS SPLIT

Green herself thinks it taxes too much. But her bipartisan Senate majority is deeply split over this issue. Green said there might be a way to find some tradeoffs enough members of the Senate can agree on that the House accepts as well.

194A-AN-13620-M; 615

Senate Finance Committee Co-Chair Bert Stedman is talking about a plan to keep the base oil tax rate at 22.5 percent but take more than the House is proposing when oil prices and company profits are high.

The House likely would not agree to that approach.

The governor does not like it either, arguing the state needs more protection for when oil prices drop.

But the immediate issue is that Stedman's committee has not emerged with any bill it can send to the floor for a vote. There has been talk of such a bill appearing in the Finance Committee for the past few days, but it keeps getting pushed back.

Stedman, R-Sitka, said the staff that drafts the actual language has been backed up, particularly the legislative lawyers who research the statutes in putting together bills. Stedman is in charge of the bill in the Senate at this point in the process.

Stedman said he was frustrated by the delay and is not trying to run out the clock to keep a tax bill from passing.

"I had Senator Green call legislative legal at noon today and ask them to get the bill out faster," he said.

Tam Cook, director of legal services for the Legislature, declined to comment.

COUNTING VOTES

Republicans in the Senate minority said they are skeptical of the drafters-are-behind argument.

They said Senate majority Republicans are either trying to run out the clock to avoid raising the oil tax or just cannot figure out what to do. The Republicans in the majority have to deal with Democrats they share power with as well as the governor, minority members said.

"My guess is the majority sees themselves in an untenable position and is trying to see a way out of it," said Eagle River Republican Sen. Fred Dyson.

Senate Minority Leader Gene Therriault said majority members have tried to stall on oil taxes before. He said FBI tapes from 2006, when lawmakers were writing the current oil tax law, show that former Veco Corp. chief Bill Allen asked then-Senate President Ben Stevens to run out the clock during a conference committee in one of the special sessions over oil taxes.

Allen has testified to bribing Stevens to try to keep the oil tax low. Stevens has not been charged and denies any wrongdoing.

Juneau Democratic Sen. Kim Elton said he didn't think Stedman was trying to run out the clock. But Elton, a member of the Senate majority, was frustrated it was taking so long to get a bill out.

Elton said the Senate was taking too much time trying to figure out what had enough votes to pass. At some point, he said, the Senate has to just put something on the floor and see where the votes are.

Stedman said he was pushing hard to get a bill done so legislators can go home for Thanksgiving. He had consultants draw up charts detailing the effect of his oil tax plan and held committee meetings Monday and Tuesday to discuss it, even though the bill had not arrived from the drafters.

FBI - Stevens-1472

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him in Juneau at 907-586-1531.

DISCUSS: Is a 22.5 percent oil tax enough, or should legislators pass the governor's requested 25 percent tax? Sound off on our political blog.

adn.com/alaskapolitics

LOAD-DATE: November 14, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Photos by SEANNA O'SULLIVAN / The Associated Press
Senate Finance Committee member Fred Dyson, R-Eagle River, listens to testimony during a committee meeting Tuesday. The oil tax bill was stalled in the committee Tuesday.
Senate Finance Committee members Donny Olson, D-Nome, left, and Charlie Huggins, R-Wasilla, watch a presentation of proposed oil tax legislation Tuesday.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1473

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 15, 2007 Thursday
FINAL EDITION

25 percent goes forward;
CONCESSIONS: Higher take likely to pass full Senate vote, but stage is set for debate with House over details.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1024 words

DATELINE: JUNEAU -

Leaders of the state Senate backed down Wednesday night and agreed to the major oil tax increase Gov. Sarah Palin and the state House demand.

Senators said they expect to pass the bill today and send it back to the House to have a vote on a final agreement.

The Senate Finance Committee voted late Wednesday to increase the oil tax rate from 22.5 percent to 25 percent of net profits. The senators also agreed to the House formula of charging an additional 0.4 percent more tax for each dollar price of oil above about $52 per barrel.

The revenue department had estimated the House version could bring in around $1.5 billion more a year to the state in these times of high oil prices.

But there are other differences between the House and Senate versions. It is not a sure bet the House will accept the bill.

Still, agreeing to the oil tax rates pushed by the House and governor represents a huge concession by leaders of the Senate.

Senate President Lyda Green said she still thinks the bill taxes too much and does not expect to vote for it. But it came down to which side had the votes.

The Wasilla Republican said Democrats in her bipartisan majority coalition pushed for the tax increase. So did almost all the Republicans in the Senate minority.

"There were enough people who wanted it to change," Green said.

FBI - Stevens-1474

Legislators were saying as recently as Tuesday that the 30-day special session could end Friday at midnight with no agreement on an oil tax. But the momentum shifted Wednesday against the state Senate leadership.

"I think they finally counted the votes and realized they were on the short side of things," said Sen. Tom Wagoner, a Kenai Republican who is part of the Senate minority.

Gov. Sarah Palin had said Tuesday she would call the Legislature into another special session if she doesn't get an oil tax bill by the Friday deadline.

The ticking clock and a desire among lawmakers to get done with this painful debate helped prod the bill forward

194A-AN-13620-m; 6166

Wednesday.

Legislators have been arguing over oil taxes for more than a year; they passed an oil tax bill last year but the governor asked for a new one after former executives of oil-field services company Veco pleaded guilty to bribing some lawmakers to support a low rate.

It's still not over. There are a lot of parts to the oil tax bill, and disagreement over any one of them could still kill it.

"Time is running thin. You start to worry, is the Senate going to give us enough time to deal with it?" said House Minority Leader Beth Kerttula, a Juneau Democrat.

House Democrats might not accept the Senate version of the bill. If they don't, it's liable to be dead.

The sticking point could be a proposed limit on how much the oil companies can claim as tax deductions for operating costs at the Prudhoe and Kuparuk oil fields. The House bill includes a standard deduction that can go up only 3 percent a year.

It's not in the Senate version at the moment. That could be a deal breaker.

House Democrats say there has to be at least one nonmoving piece in this oil tax based on net profits. How much money the state gets each year varies depending on price, tax credits, industry costs and other factors.

That's one of the issues with the net profits tax passed last year. It's not bringing in nearly as much money as the state thought it would because of rising industry cost deductions.

Anchorage Democratic Sen. Hollis French said he would work on getting a limit on deductions into the final Senate bill.

French, a member of the Senate majority, was happy as he worked in his legislative office on Wednesday night. He was meeting with state revenue commissioner Pat Galvin and readying amendments with fellow Anchorage Democratic Sen. Bill Wielechowski.

"We're cooking up an oil tax bill," French said.

The Senate Finance Committee accepted the higher tax rate with no objections from its members on Wednesday night. Sitka Republican Sen. Bert Stedman had been pushing an alternative plan that kept the tax rate at the lower 22.5 percent but increased the surcharge at high oil prices more than the House bill.

Stedman, co-chair of the finance committee, said he still thinks his idea is better for the state. But it just didn't have the support, he said.

The progress on a tax increase came despite testimony in the Senate on Wednesday from oil company officials saying the move would limit industry investment in Alaska's oil patch. They said the tax plans being considered in the Legislature include many aspects that amount to "hidden taxes" in addition to the rate, and increased surcharges at times of high oil prices.

"It is unrealistic to expect an increase in taxes of this magnitude will not have an impact," said Conoco Phillips Alaska vice president Kevin Mitchell. He and BP Alaska senior vice president Claire Fitzpatrick said their companies will review current and future investment plans.

FBI - Stevens-1475

"There is a lot of stuff which we will now have to question," Fitzpatrick said. "When you're adding that much tax it will no longer be attractive."

But their testimony didn't seem to have its intended effect.

Sen. Kim Elton, D-Juneau, said oil investment decisions are made in a global context. Oil taxes are rising around the world as company profits go up.

"It is fairly predictable what they are going to say," Elton said

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him in Juneau at 1-907-586-1531.

SO FAR

Special session on oil taxes

The session began Oct. 18, and since then six committees -- three in the House and three in the Senate -- have worked through the bill. On Sunday, the House adopted a tax increase worth about $1.5 billion at high oil prices, according to the state.

ON WEDNESDAY

Oil companies told the Senate Finance Committee that boosting the tax will hurt their investment plans for Alaska oil fields. The committee paved the way for a bill to raise taxes anyway.

STILL TO COME

The special session ends no later than midnight Friday. Gov. Palin said she will call lawmakers back into session if they don't send her a tax increase by Friday's deadline.

Go to adn.com for the latest news from Juneau on oil taxes.

LOAD-DATE: November 15, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: SEANNA O'SULLIVAN / The Associated Press
Sens. Lyman Hoffman, left, D-Bethel, and Donny Olson, D-Nome, look over details of proposed oil tax legislation Wednesday at the State Capitol Building in Juneau.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1476

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 16, 2007 Friday
FINAL EDITION

Late vote brings optimism;
NEGOTIATIONS: Senate's version of bill contains key points favored by House, Palin.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 947 words

DATELINE: JUNEAU -

The state Senate voted late Thursday night to grant Gov. Sarah Palin and the state House the oil tax increase they want.

"This is sweeping, this is historic, this is powerful legislation we are passing here tonight," said Anchorage Democratic Sen. Hollis French.

The final Senate vote at nearly 11 p.m. makes it likely that the special session will end by midnight tonight with a state oil tax rewrite that would raise billions in additional dollars in the coming years.

The Senate passed the bill on a 14 to 5 vote, with Sens. Lyda Green, Lyman Hoffman, Charlie Huggins, Bert Stedman and Con Bunde voting against it.

The Senate bill will need to go back to the House today for final agreement. There's no time for negotiations, so the House will have to take it or leave it. The Senate bill does include some differences from the bill the House passed Sunday night. So it's possible there might still be sticking points.

House Speaker John Harris said he needed to watch and see all the amendments the Senate passed Thursday night. But, just based on what it looked like earlier in the day, he was confident the House would accept it.

"In a heartbeat," he said.

The basic taxing parts of the House and Senate bills are the same. They would increase the base state oil tax rate from 22.5 to 25 percent of net profits. They also charge an additional 0.4 percentage points more tax for each dollar the price of oil goes above about $52 per barrel.

FBI - Stevens-1477

The state revenue department hasn't had a chance to estimate how much money the bill the Senate passed could bring in. But the department said the House version of the oil tax could raise $1.5 billion a year more in these times of high oil prices.

The Senate version of the bill makes the tax increase retroactive to June 30. That would bring an additional $450 million to the state this year.

Sitka Sen. Stedman said the pieces in the bill add up to a "staggering" increase in tax, far above what it seems by just looking at the base rate. Stedman was among the senators who voted against it.

Some legislators have said the tax needed to be changed to restore public trust. Former executives of Veco Corp. have admitted to bribing some lawmakers last year when the current oil tax was being debated. One state senator, Anchorage Republican John Cowdery, had been mentioned in the corruption investigation and stayed away from the special session. He has not been charged with anything.

194A-AN-13620-M;617

Anchorage Democratic Sen. Johnny Ellis said this tax should last for a long time.

"It has taken extraordinary circumstances, a political crisis in the state of Alaska for us to muster the political will to make these adjustments," he said.

Anchorage Republican Sen. Con Bunde suggested, though, that it's "a bit of a fool's errand" to focus on re-establishing public faith in the Legislature. Bunde said it seems like the national sport is to go after political figures.

Senators spent more than three hours talking about amendments Thursday. One that passed could make it easier to win acceptance in the House. It would limit tax deductions the oil companies can claim for operating costs at the Prudhoe and Kuparuk fields on the North Slope.

The deductions could only rise by 3 percent a year. This represents a line in the sand for House Democrats, some of whom suggested they might vote against the entire bill if it was not included in the final version.

French, the Anchorage Democrat, pushed the amendment through the Senate.

He argued the oil tax system based on net profits that the Legislature set up last year needs at least one nonmoving piece the state can count on.

How much money the tax brings in depends on oil prices, tax credits, deductions, and other factors. That's one of the big issues state officials have with the tax. It's not bringing in nearly as much money as the state thought it would because of rising oil industry cost deductions.

French's amendment calls for the limit on tax deductions to go away after three years. He said that would allow more flexibility for costly "heavy oil" production on the North Slope to get going.

The Senate later rejected a non-binding proposal to suggest that much of the money from the oil tax increase go into the earnings reserve of the Alaska Permanent Fund. North Pole Republican Sen. Gene Therriault argued for it.

But Stedman, the Sitka Republican, and others countered that Alaska has a lot of needs in schools, roads and the like. They said the Legislature would be responsible with the money but needs to weigh it more carefully than just as an amendment on the Senate floor.

The Senate did pass other amendments to the bill on Thursday night including measures that would:

* Prevent companies from deducting costs arising from breaking the law or failing to comply with their lease obligations. That's retroactive to March 31 of last year to keep BP from deducting costs related to corrosion that led to a partial shutdown of Prudhoe Bay last year. It's in the House version as well, but with different language.

* Allow oil tax auditors to indefinitely be in a new job classification that allows higher salaries so the state can recruit them. The House version takes a different approach to getting auditors paid more.

* Allow the state revenue department discretion in deciding what lease expenses the companies can deduct from their taxes; rather than having the Legislature set all the allowable deductions. This is also in the House version.

FBI - Stevens-1478

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him in Juneau at 907-586-1531.

UPDATES: Check the Web tonight to see if the session ends with an agreement before the midnight deadline.

adn.com

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: SEANNA O'SULLIVAN / The Associated Press

Senate Finance Committee Co-Chair Lyman Hoffman, D-Bethel, talks on the phone outside the committee room at the Capitol building in Juneau on Thursday.
Members of the Senate bipartisan coalition gather for a closed-door meeting in the office of Senate President Lyda Green, R-Matanuska-Susitna, seated at the desk in center, to discuss proposed oil tax legislation before a floor session Thursday at the Capitol in Juneau.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1479

2 of 2 DOCUMENTS

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 16, 2007 Friday
FINAL EDITION

Stevens lays blame on media;
INVESTIGATION: Alaska senator hints of retribution after investigation ends.

BYLINE: ERIKA BOLSTAD ebolstad@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 820 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON -

U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens said Thursday he has no fear of a Democratic opponent in next year's election, and he blamed overzealous reporters for the continued interest in the federal investigation both he and his son have been caught up in.

His comments about the investigation came toward the end of a wide-ranging interview in which Stevens touched on his concerns about access to health care in Alaska, mental health care for returning veterans and coastal erosion caused by global warming.

Stevens has said little about the investigation since the FBI and IRS raided his home in Girdwood in late July as part of a wider probe into corruption in Alaska politics.

So far, the corruption investigation has led to the conviction of three state lawmakers, two oil executives and a lobbyist. They include former Veco CEO Bill Allen, a major political fundraiser who has pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers and who has been a witness in the ongoing corruption trials. Allen oversaw the renovations to Stevens' home in 2000; Stevens has long maintained that he did nothing wrong and paid every remodeling bill he was given.

Stevens said Thursday that he intends to remain tight-lipped about the investigation, in part because he doesn't want to be accused of obstructing justice. As a former U.S. attorney, Stevens said "I think I know the law and the consequences of making comments about this investigation better than any other senator does.

"I'm not about to get myself into a worse situation by commenting on something I don't think needs any comment," he added.

But Stevens also suggested that the scrutiny he has faced is politically motivated. He pointed to four other senators who went through investigations, and said that those colleagues failed to draw the same sort of attention. He did not identify which senators he was referring to.

FBI - Stevens 1480

"I don't see any reason why we should have had this massive press interest in what's going on," Stevens said. "It's just an investigation of a federal agency. They go on all the time. No one else talks about them the way they talk about the one involving me."

He also said that he was unconcerned about the efforts of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, which sees him as a vulnerable candidate and is actively recruiting candidates to run against him. Their top prospect, Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, has flown to Washington to meet with top Senate Democrats, including the DSSC chairman, Sen. Charles Schumer of New York.

"Well that's because they seem to think that they've got some inside knowledge about the outcome of the investigation I can't talk about," Stevens said. "I'm not worried about this campaign. Not in the least."

194A-AN-13620-M;618

"We're not in the rush to raise any money," he added. "We are raising money. We can raise money after this cloud goes away, which I hope will go away soon."

But Stevens grew testy when a reporter suggested that the level of interest in the state's senior senator was high because so many Alaska politicians and public figures had been caught in the wider corruption probe. Also, as the longest-serving GOP senator in history, and the former chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, Stevens has a higher profile than the average Washington politician.

In the interview, Stevens made vague threats to the people who have suggested that he and his son, former state Senate President Ben Stevens, might be guilty of some sort of wrongdoing. The younger Stevens hasn't been charged with a crime, but his name has come up repeatedly in court proceedings. Plea documents in Allen's own case say that payments of $243,250 the Veco CEO made to Ben Stevens were bribes in exchange for "giving advice, lobbying colleagues, and taking official acts in matters before the Legislature" when the younger Stevens was a state lawmaker.

"Your papers print (the names of) those people who have been convicted and my son's name and mine at the same time. As far as the public is concerned, it's all the same ball of wax," Stevens said. "I'm not going to comment on that ball of wax."

"But we've been included in a way that I hope people understand the laws that are doing it," he said. "Because when it's all over, some people are going to have to account for what they've said and what they've charged us with."

It was unclear whom Stevens was threatening. When asked if he meant libel or perjury, Stevens said: "No. I'm just saying there are ways to account for this in the future."

When asked if he meant political retribution, he remained vague:

"I think the people out there ought to worry about that the way I worry about the investigation. There are myriad things you can do. Just a myriad of things."

When pressed, he wouldn't elaborate further:

"I've said it," Stevens said.

STEVENS: Listen to him talk about his re-election, funding for post-traumatic stress for returning soldiers and federal spending in Alaska.

adn.com

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Stevens

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

FBI - Stevens-1481

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 19, 2007 Monday
FINAL EDITION

Oil industry clout pushed back by Palin, legislators; BIPARTISAN: GOP, Democrats link up to capture more for state.

BYLINE: By STEVE QUINN The Associated Press

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B6

LENGTH: 647 words

DATELINE: JUNEAU -

The State of Alaska got about $1.5 billion richer Friday -- and all of it thanks to a governor unafraid of the powerful oil industry, a handful of convicted felons, and a state Legislature that opted not to vote along party lines.

In 30 days, the Legislature rewrote its tax laws for the second time in as many years, banking not only the billions but also the belief that it hasn't taxed too much to discourage investment into North Slope fields currently at a 6 percent annual production decline.

With less than eight hours left in the special session, the House adjourned, bringing an end to a monthlong tug-of-war over a tax increase from 22.5 percent to 25 percent -- a debate set against the backdrop of a federal corruption probe and national scrutiny.

"This was historic because we must learn soon to stand on our own," said Sen. Hollis French, D-Anchorage. "We will not get the federal help we have gotten in the past. That help has got to come from our own resources, from our own efforts, from our own oil. This is another step."

BRIBERY BACKDROP

It started with Gov. Sarah Palin calling lawmakers back to Juneau to review statutes strongly tied to federal corruption probes that have so far produced the bribery convictions of three former state lawmakers.

"I recognize that Alaska's position of strength when we deal with the oil companies is our state constitution," Palin said. "That allows optimism for this administration when we go into the discussions with the industry."

While companies were crying foul on the tax hike these last 30 days, market oil prices inched closer to $100 a barrel per day and companies were posting multibillion profits.

FBI - Stevens-1482

Meanwhile, news that the U.S. Supreme Court agreed to hear Exxon Mobil Corp.'s punitive damages appeal for spilling 11 million gallons of oil into Alaska waters in 1989 didn't help.

Nor did BP's plea agreement with federal authorities to pay $373 million in fines linked to energy price-fixing, a deadly refinery blast in Texas and pipeline leaks in Alaska.

"You have to find out who is credible, who is believable," said House Rules Chairman John Coghill, R-North Pole.

"Quite frankly, I don't think the oil companies are credible right now," he said. "I probably listened to consultants more than I would have otherwise."

194A-AN-13620-M;619

Coghill, however, said the distrust might have had a chilling effect on lawmakers who legitimately believed the state's tax rewrite efforts were onerous and created an unstable investment climate.

One of those lawmakers was Rep. Mike Hawker, R-Anchorage, whose wife works for Conoco Phillips' Cook Inlet operations, about 800 miles south of the North Slope.

"We have a guilt-by-association political environment in this building right now," said Hawker, who voted against the bill. "It's been exploited by factions, as opposed to parties.

"Folks who voted against this bill did so because they are fundamental believers in a conservative economic philosophy. Those folks felt constrained."

CROSS-PARTY ALLIANCES

While Hawker was kept in check, Republicans and Democrats came out of their hard-line positions and found common ground. Unlikely alliances formed and held firm upon final passage Friday afternoon.

There may not be another day when Anchorage Democrat Les Gara and Fairbanks Republican Mike Kelly share space on an amendment to raise taxes.

"On this one, we had a common interest, which was to take the state's sovereignty back," Gara said. "We needed to clear the cloud of corruption and take our fair share for our oil. This was one bill where we could do all of those things at one time."

Kelly assured his colleagues the changes will pay off.

"I'm cool as a cucumber; my blood pressure is 120 over 60, and I'm very confident we've done the right thing," he said. "I have no fear whatsoever, and I say that in front of people who are going to hold us to those statements."

LOAD-DATE: November 19, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: WIRE

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1483

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 22, 2007 Thursday
FINAL EDITION

Bobrick likely to spend time behind bars;
SENTENCE: Ex-lobbyist snared in political corruption probe.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1181 words

Once-prominent lobbyist Bill Bobrick almost surely is going to prison.

But not for long.

His sentencing on a single felony charge of conspiracy, part of an ongoing federal investigation of political corruption in Alaska, is set for Tuesday morning before U.S. District Judge John Sedwick.

Bobrick has been cooperating with the government, so will get much less time than the five years slapped on the only other defendant sentenced so far in the corruption probe, former state Rep. Tom Anderson.

"I take full responsibility for my crime," Bobrick, 52, said in a brief telephone call on Wednesday. "I can never apologize too much to my fellow Alaskans for the damage I have done to our political system."

Prosecutors are asking that he be sentenced to a year and a day, which triggers a rule that requires he do all the time in prison, less only good time. With good behavior, he could be out after about 101/2 months.

They also want two years of probation, prosecutors wrote in a memo to the judge.

The defense wants a sentence of less than a year and is asking that Bobrick be allowed to serve at least part of it under house arrest or in a halfway house. That would allow him to do community service as he's serving his time, which is what his attorney said he really wants.

Federal prisoners don't get "good time" for sentences of less than a year.

"Bobrick is not pleading for mercy," his attorney, Doug Pope, wrote in his sentencing memorandum. "He is requesting that the court credit him with providing substantial assistance to the government, and give him a chance to atone for his crime."

FBI - Stevens-1484

If he hadn't cooperated, he'd be facing two years or longer for the conspiracy conviction under sentencing guidelines.

Bobrick is married and has lived in Alaska for 32 years. His wife is in her third year of medical school.

Pope filed in court more than 50 letters of support, many trying to convince the judge to fashion a sentence that puts Bobrick to work doing community service rather than serving time in prison.

At least six former Anchorage Assembly members and several law enforcement representatives are among the dozens who wrote in. Bobrick's not the type to get in trouble again, his supporters said. Many mentioned good work he's done as a volunteer for years. They said he apologized to his friends, clients and colleagues one by one long before his case became public.

194A-AN-13620-M;620

"I believe that Bill Bobrick knows that his actions were wrong and that he is full of remorse about the choices he made," wrote Jane Angvik, a former Anchorage Assembly member. She met him in 1986 through political activity and has served on boards with him. She wrote that she's talked with him about the crime and he wept as he described his regret. "He said he had 'lost his way,' that he has changed, and that he is prepared to accept whatever punishment the court deems appropriate."

Bobrick pleaded guilty in May to conspiring with Anderson to push the interests of a private prison firm in exchange for money. He became one of the main government witnesses against Anderson in a trial this summer.

A consultant to Cornell Cos. funneled $24,000 to Bobrick in the scheme, and Bobrick eventually passed almost all of it on to Anderson. The consultant, former state Corrections Commissioner Frank Prewitt, was working undercover for the FBI and Cornell knew nothing of the bribes, officials have said.

Until he was caught up in the ongoing, multipronged FBI investigation last year, Bobrick was a powerful player in the city. He didn't lobby the state Legislature but was active politically and served as executive director of the Alaska Democratic Party in the late 1980s. He then registered as a lobbyist in the municipality. For years, he had more clients than anyone with city business. He's lost all that now.

The FBI confronted him in late September 2006 with secretly recorded telephone calls and meetings about the scheme with Anderson. He began cooperating on Sept. 28, 2006.

The defense expects the government to agree that his help "has been as broad and as extensive as the government requested, that his assistance extended beyond the 'Cornell Corrections conspiracy' which was the subject of the Anderson indictment and trial, and involved actively assisting in collecting evidence, including recording conversations."

Bobrick was vaguely threatened before the Anderson trial, according to Pope. He described it as "contacts implying threats of economic injury."

"Those threats were credible," Pope wrote. "It is reasonable to conclude that they were an attempt to influence Bobrick's testimony or to dissuade him from testifying at all."

Pope didn't provide details but indicated in his memo that more information was in another filing, which was not made public.

The government is seeking a $5,000 fine. But Bobrick no longer can make a living and should not be fined, Pope wrote.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

His friends step forward

Here's a sampling of the 52 letters of support filed in court in support of former lobbyist Bill Bobrick:

* Several mentioned his work for Standing Together Against Rape, or STAR. He served as board chairman and helped it through some shaky times.

"When he became STAR's Chair, it began to restructure and re-build credibility in the community, especially with law enforcement," wrote Dennis McMillian, a longtime leader in Anchorage's nonprofit world. "When Bill finally left the board, STAR had transformed from a weak organization almost closing its doors, to one of the strongest, most respected nonprofits in our community."

FBI - Stevens-1485

* Rainbow Connection Therapeutic Horseback Riding Program looked into hiring him but Bobrick volunteered his services, wrote Colleen Burgh, the board secretary. Rainbow Connection was supporting a ballot issue to lease city land for the program.

"The ballot measure was successful, with credit going to Mr. Bobrick for his assistance and sound advice," wrote Daniel Rogers, board president.

* At least six former Assembly members wrote in: Janice Shamberg, Fay Von Gemmingen, Brian Whittle, Pamela Jennings, Jane Angvik and Ted Carlson.

"I am very disappointed and saddened by his actions in this case. I know he is working to right a terrible wrong, but the sting of this will be with him, his family and friends for many years to come," Von Gemmingen wrote. She asked the judge to consider that he has apologized to those he's hurt, shown remorse, helped the government. And "now he is working daily to completely turn his life around."

* Among the former or present police officers supporting Bobrick is Anchorage Police Chief Rob Heun. He knew Bobrick through the police union, which he used to head and Bobrick lobbied for, and through STAR. He was writing as a private citizen, he said.

"There is value to society when others who break the law recognize the importance of admitting to a crime, accepting responsibility for it, and cooperating with law enforcement to ensure a thorough and complete investigation. I believe Mr. Bobrick did just that," Heun wrote.

LOAD-DATE: November 23, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Bobrick

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1486

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 23, 2007 Friday
FINAL EDITION

Young phones home for town hall meetings;
HIGH TECH: Computer dialing can reach 50,000 people simultaneously.

BYLINE: By ERIKA BOLSTAD ebolstad@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 1122 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON -

Guess who's on the line, from the nation's capital? That's right, your congressman, Rep. Don Young.

There may be dozens of new ways of reaching out to voters, but the telephone town hall has become one of the most popular for lawmakers. With the help of sophisticated computer dialing programs and a database of phone numbers, voters are getting an earful from lawmakers, who can use the technology to reach out to thousands of constituents at a time.

The technology has proven especially valuable for lawmakers like Young, who represent Western states. Geography means that frequent trips home from the Capitol aren't always easy or practical.

"He loves them," said Meredith Kenny, a spokeswoman for the Alaska Republican. "It's hard being in Washington, D.C., and so far away and not being able to get back to the district as often."

Here's how the town halls work: Autodialing computer programs call up to 50,000 people at once, to alert them to the town hall. They can either stay on the line, or choose to hang up. And if no one is home, they'll be left a sorry-we-missed-you message.

"Even people who really care about politics, are they going to drive to a town meeting?" asked David Jacobs, a partner with the Franking Group, the Utah company that Young's office uses for the telephone town halls. "You're sitting in the convenience of your own home, the phone rings. If you want to answer you can. If you want to stay on the phone you can. It's convenient."

Once the call is live, the format is up to the congressman. People can queue up to ask questions, or they can leave messages for staffers if they hear something that requires a follow-up. Generally, several hundred people are on the line at once.

Occasionally, Young connects with people he and his wife, Lu, know personally, outside of politics. On one recent call, one of the people on the line was Lu Young's priest as a child, Kenny said.

And just like radio hosts who want to end especially annoying calls, the lawmakers running the calls have the power to cut off obnoxious callers.

Not Young, though. Alaska's congressman takes the call and makes the most of it, Kenny said. He did two town halls late this summer and early fall, and was so enamored with the process that he hopes to make them regular events, Kenny said.

"He's very engaging," Kenny said. "We have the option of dropping callers, but we don't do that with him. He likes the back and forth."

FBI - Stevens-1487

194A-AN-13620-M;621

TAXPAYERS FOOT THE BILL

Some senators use the town halls, too, but they are especially popular for House members, whose two-year re-election cycle pressures them to keep in close contact with constituents.

The technology is a few years old, but it took off before the 2006 election and has proved popular since then. The town halls are covered under the "franking" privileges held by each member of Congress, which allows them to send mail at taxpayer expense to update their constituents on their activities.

The main evangelist for telephone town halls has been Rep. Dan Lungren, R-Calif., who conducts a monthly call with his constituents. A former radio talk show host, Lungren started the town halls in 2005. He was introduced to the concept by his friend, Rodney Smith, the former finance chairman of the Republican National Committee and one of the leading providers of the technology.

"If you can't fly back to California, or Alaska, you're able to have an interaction with your constituents while sitting in your office in Washington," said Lungren's spokesman, Brian Kaveney. "It's a very personal touch, because you're calling them at their home."

Traditional town halls just don't guarantee the kind of predictable turnout that's possible with one of the telephone town halls, Kaveney said. A recent call from Lungren had 400 people listening and 30 people waiting to ask a question.

And when a congressman sends out a franked mailer, well, it just as often ends up in the trash. They have to be careful not to make too many of the calls, because no one wants to be put in the same category as a telemarketer. But people in Lungren's district have come to expect the calls.

"People know he does them, so they don't treat them like a robocall," he said. "Democrats will say, "You know I don't appreciate your views, but I appreciate that you took the time to call me.""

For about $2,500, it's possible to reach about 50,000 people, whether it's direct contact or a message, Kaveney said. The company that does Young's costs about 17 cents a call, Kenny said, far less than postage.

Critics of franking say that it gives an advantage to incumbents, who can use their congressional accounts to pay for the telephone town halls.

E-TOWN HALLS ALSO GROWING

But many of the people who use the technology disagree -- both Republicans and Democrats. It's so inexpensive that it's accessible even to challengers on shoestring budgets, said Ed Patru, a spokesman for the House Republican Conference.

"I disagree with the notion, in this day and age when technology is so cheap and so available, that incumbents have access to more technology, and greater communication abilities," Patru said.

Plus, added Kenny, it's a congressman's duty to stay in touch with the people he represents.

"It's his duty to report back to people," she said. "Part of his job is to stay in touch with constituents." The telephone town halls are popular with both Republicans and Democrats, although GOP advisers acknowledge that their Democratic counterparts seem to have been quicker to embrace other technologies, such as e-town halls.

FBI - Stevens-1488

E-town halls allow members of Congress to chat online with constituents -- also from home, from a comfortable spot in front of their computer. It's also a little less intrusive than a phone call in the middle of dinner.

"They're great, because a lot of people get involved, and because people can participate at home," said Nick Papas, a spokesman for the House Democratic Caucus, "And it's nice for members, because they can do it from Washington."

There's no question that one of the most attractive things about telephone town halls is that politicians are able to target who they want to speak to. Some of the companies that run telephone town halls are able to pinpoint voters by age and other identifiers, making it easy to tailor a message. They also get to speak directly to voters, without the filter of the media.

Even so, it doesn't mean they shouldn't make the trek home to speak with people personally, said Jacobs, who worked in the office of Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kansas, before he started at the Franking Group.

"These are a wonderful tool when used with traditional mail and e-mail," Jacobs said. "But nothing beats face time in your district."

LOAD-DATE: November 23, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Young

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1489

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 24, 2007 Saturday
FINAL EDITION

Ethics training lacks a final test;
NEW LAW: Lobbyists simply say they've viewed presentation.

BYLINE: By KYLE HOPKINS khopkins@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 397 words

A new state law that makes lobbyists take ethics training is being carried out partly on the honor system.

Lobbyists who want to register to influence state politicians and decision-makers can choose to take the new ethics course online. There is no test.

Lobbyists simply print out a form promising they clicked through the roughly hourlong presentation, sign it and send it in.

The training is required as part of an ethics reform package passed by the Legislature and signed into law by Gov. Sarah Palin in July. The new rules say the Alaska Public Offices Commission must provide the training, though APOC wasn't given any money to do so, said executive director Brooke Miles.

APOC is offering the training in person, too, with classes beginning in December, Miles said.

But the agency needed to offer the service online because people must complete training before they register as a lobbyist, and people can register at any time, she said.

In fact, someone who lobbies for more than 10 hours in a month must register with the state almost immediately, meaning they couldn't wait for periodical training sessions, she said.

"This was the only practical approach," Miles said of the online training.

Rep. John Coghill, R-North Pole, said that he worked on the training requirement for lobbyists with Rep. Max Gruenberg, an Anchorage Democrat.

Coghill said his goal wasn't necessarily to have lobbyists sit through a class, but to know the rules and to sign some kind of affidavit saying they'd reviewed the laws.

FBI - Stevens-1490

"Lobbyists these days are going to be under the highest scrutiny," Coghill said.

He said the Legislature likely will include money for the training next year.

So why no test for the online ethics course?

Miles said APOC staff talked about that idea, but it would take time to grade the exams --about 180 lobbyists are registered with the state this year, according to the APOC Web site -- and the new law doesn't require a test, only training.

But couldn't people lie and say they took the online training when they didn't?

194A-AN-13620-M;622

"You're never going to know what people are going to do ... there's always ways to get around everything, if that's the goal," Miles said.

Find Kyle Hopkins' political blog online at adn.com/alaskapolitics or call him at 257-4334.

GO TO ETHICS CLASS: Want to take the online ethics training for lobbyists? Go to www.state.ak.us/apoc

LOAD-DATE: November 26, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1491

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Young's earmark helps three fishing companies

CAMPAIGN DONORS: Provision was tucked in bill without review.

By WESLEY LOY
wloy@adn.com

(Published: November 25, 2007)

An earlier bill carrying Rep. Don Young's earmark to help three fishing companies with their Alaska crabbing operations failed to pass; the earmark then got through in the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Reauthorization Act of 2006. (ERIK HILL / Daily News archive 1992)

Some of the toughest money in America is made fishing for king and snow crab in the tempestuous Bering Sea.

But some crab boat owners also do well on the opposite coast in Washington, D.C.

A case in point is an arcane section written into a bill Congress passed in December, just hours before adjourning for the year. President Bush signed the bill into law about a month later.

Section 122 of the act, an updated version of the nation's main ocean fisheries law, gives three fishing companies -- and only three -- the right to exchange certain rights to catch and process Bering Sea crab for a new and potentially more profitable kind of right. The change could lower the costs of running crab boats and hauling catches to an onshore processing plant.

Al Chaffee ( )

The three companies -- Yardarm Knot, Blue Dutch and Trident Seafoods -- are all headed by people who have made substantial political contributions to U.S. Rep. Don Young, the Alaska Republican who inserted Section 122 into the legislation.

Two of the companies, Yardarm Knot and Trident, also have long-standing ties with Young and U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, employing firms with lobbyists who used to work as aides to the two lawmakers. Yardarm also has paid the senator's son, Ben Stevens, for consulting and business services while he was a state legislator.

Some competing seafood companies fought the section, but their managers declined to discuss their complaints publicly.

Alaska's crab fishing industry is a distant and dangerous trade that has become household entertainment across the country, thanks to the popular Discovery Channel reality show "Deadliest Catch."

The crab fisheries are lucrative, worth well over $100 million at the docks in recent years.

Craig Holman, of the congressional watchdog group Public Citizen, said Section 122 is the same kind of earmarking tactic that has stirred lots of trouble recently for Young on bills that benefited associates or campaign contributors elsewhere in the country.

FBI - Stevens-1492

194A-AN-13620-m;623

The provision smacks of political favoritism, sidestepped the normal process for changing federal fishery rules, wasn't subject to a public debate or hearing, and was inserted into a major bill at the last minute, he said.

"This section is typical of Don Young-style legislating," Holman said. "He appears to view his role on Capitol Hill as protecting the interests of those who will give him campaign contributions. He's been doing that extensively through the earmarking practice, and he did it in this case in legislation that was otherwise a very noble act."

Young declined repeated requests for an interview.

"Unfortunately I just do not think Congressman Young's schedule is going to allow for an interview, though I appreciate your interest," his press aide, Meredith Kenny, said in an e-mail.

She provided another e-mail, however, in defense of Section 122, saying part of the reasoning behind it was to "make participants in the fishery more economically viable."

CRABBING REVOLUTION

The law, the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Reauthorization Act of 2006, on the whole won widespread praise from fishermen, environmentalists and others concerned with safeguarding the nation's ocean fish stocks.

It was the first overhaul in a decade for the law, which originally was passed in 1976 and is partly named for Ted Stevens, who made the act's passage a personal priority last year.

The law helps govern the Bering Sea crab fisheries, which in 2005 switched from a derby style of fishing to one in which boats and processing plants effectively own individual shares of the catch.

Normally, the Anchorage-based North Pacific Fishery Management Council helps make changes in federal fisheries management off Alaska.

But Young's Section 122, amounting to about a page and a half in a 91-page act, never got a council review.

That troubles Kodiak fisherman Terry Haines, who said vessel crewmen often have been ignored or disadvantaged when corporate fishing companies lobby policy-makers for changes in fishing rules.

The Young provision, he said, should have been subject to a public review "simply to avoid any appearance of impropriety and to give other stakeholders a chance to be involved."

FBI - Stevens-1493

A version of the language appeared last year in a U.S. Coast Guard bill Young sponsored as chairman of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee. But Congress didn't pass the bill.

The language reappeared in the Magnuson-Stevens Act in early December. The House Resources Committee had jurisdiction over the bill, and Young was a senior committee member.

The act would be one of the last Congress passed in 2006.

Regulators with the National Marine Fisheries Service are working now to implement Section 122, which would take effect with next year's crab fisheries.

CHANGING THE RULES

According to a NMFS analysis, the law qualifies just three seafood companies to convert their existing crab fishery shares into a new type -- one that will allow them to catch as well as process crab aboard boats equipped to do both jobs.

Such a consolidated operation could save the three crab producers sizable costs. For instance, they don't need to run separate boats to catch crab and haul them to port for processing in a packing house.

Crab rights also can be sold or leased, and the combo catch and processing quota created under Section 122 likely would be worth up to 25 percent more than straight catch quota, said Jeff Osborn of Dock Street Brokers in Seattle.

The federal analysis says the three companies each can switch up to 1 million pounds of crab annually to the new kind of shares. It does not estimate the financial benefits the companies could realize.

The three companies, all based in Seattle, are:

- Yardarm Knot, a unit of Yardarm Knot Inc., whose president is Al Chaffee.
- Blue Dutch, a unit of parent company Blue North Fisheries.
- Trident Seafoods Corp., one of the largest Bering Sea crab fishing and processing companies.

A potential loser under Section 122 was St. Paul, an island town in the middle of the Bering Sea that relies heavily on tax revenue from local crab processing. But a provision says companies that catch and then process crab offshore must compensate St. Paul by paying a fee of 5 percent on the crab's value.

Dave Whaley, a Republican fisheries staffer on the House Resources Committee, said a lobbyist for Yardarm Knot -- he said he couldn't recall the name -- came to see him last year about the crab provision.

One concern was that the St. Paul harbor was clogging with winter ice that could keep crab boats from delivering crab to the docks, and the goal was to find a way to process the crab at sea and still protect St. Paul's interests, he said.

"This was viewed as a legitimate policy concern," one Congress could handle faster than the North Pacific Fishery Management Council, Whaley said. FBI - Stevens-1494

CAMPAIGN CASH

Chaffee did not respond to repeated requests for comment.

He has made campaign contributions to several members of Congress in both parties, with Young among the most frequent recipients. In the past five years, Chaffee gave Young a total of $4,500, according to Federal Election Commission records compiled by the Center for Responsive Politics. Employees of his companies gave $8,500 more.

Chaffee has other connections to Alaska's congressional delegation. In the past two years, Yardarm Knot has paid a total of $100,000 to two law firms for lobbying: Robertson, Monagle & Eastaugh, in which former Stevens staffer Brad Gilman is a partner, and Blank Rome, which counts former Young chief of staff C.J. Zane and former Young aide Duncan Smith as principals.

Ben Stevens, in financial disclosures required of legislators, said Chaffee's companies paid him $121,800 total from 2002 through last year for consulting and business services.

Chaffee was among four men, including Young's son-in-law, Art Nelson, and former Stevens fisheries aide Trevor McCabe, who together bought 60 acres on mostly undeveloped Point MacKenzie across Knik Arm from Anchorage.

Young earmarked $229 million in a 2004 highway bill for a commuter bridge across the arm, which could make Point MacKenzie land more valuable. Critics nationally lambasted the project as a "bridge to nowhere."

Executives with Trident Seafoods, a titan among seafood companies operating in Alaska, offered limited comment on Section 122.

"Trident did not push for the conversion language," Trident general counsel Joe Plesha said in an e-mail. "Congressman Young was really trying to find an answer that helped everyone."

Top Trident executives including company president Chuck Bundrant, his wife and son, and Plesha have given $12,900 to Young in the last five years, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Trident also has employed Robertson, Monagle & Eastaugh for lobbying.

'WORST OF LEGISLATION'

The center says Mike Burns, president of Blue North Fisheries, and his brother, Patrick Burns, have given Young $3,500 since 2003.

But Mike Burns said his company also didn't seek Section 122 -- and has no plans to take advantage of it.

"When I first got a written version of it, it took me about a week to understand what it was," he said. "Obviously it serves some purpose."

Burns added that Young a couple of years ago helped his company win initial crab fishery shares it wasn't able to get through the North Pacific Fishery Management Council.

"As a last resort we went to Congressman Young, who looked at it, saw an injustice there, and went to bat for us and fixed it," Burns said. "I have nothing but the highest regard for the man. He didn't ask for any favors or anything like that."

But Holman, of Public Citizen, said earmarks or last-minute "riders" on major bills -- items such as Section 122 -- are "usually done to benefit special interests or campaign contributors."

"This is an example of the worst of legislation and the legislating process -- representatives producing legislation specifically designed to benefit a very small sector, either friends, colleagues or campaign contributors, which indirectly benefits the lawmaker himself."

Find Wesley Loy's commercial fishing blog online at adn.com/highliner or call 257-4590.

Crab coup

U.S. Rep. Don Young, R-Alaska, last year pushed obscure legislation through Congress qualifying three seafood companies for potentially lucrative new rights in the Bering Sea crab fisheries.

Company: Yardarm Knot, a unit of Yardarm Knot Inc.

Headquarters: Seattle

Leadership: Al Chaffee, president

Politics: In the last five years, Chaffee made campaign contributions totaling $4,500 to U.S. Rep. Don Young of Alaska. Employees gave $8,500 more.

Company: Blue Dutch, a unit of Blue North Fisheries

Headquarters: Seattle

Leadership: Mike Burns, president, and brother Patrick Burns

Politics: In the last five years, the Burns brothers have given Young a total of $3,500 in campaign contributions.

Company: Trident Seafoods Corp.

Headquarters: Seattle

Leadership: Chuck Bundrant, president

Politics: In the last five years, Bundrant, his wife and son, and other company executives have given Young a total of $12,900 in campaign contributions.

Sources: Center for Responsive Politics, company Web sites

Print Page Close Window

FBI - Stevens-1496

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

2 of 2 DOCUMENTS

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 25, 2007 Sunday
FINAL EDITION

Young's earmark boosts 3 fish firms;
CAMPAIGN DONORS: Provision was tucked in bill without review.

BYLINE: By WESLEY LOY wloy@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1867 words

Some of the toughest money in America is made fishing for king and snow crab in the tempestuous Bering Sea.

But some crab boat owners also do well on the opposite coast in Washington, D.C.

A case in point is an arcane section written into a bill Congress passed in December, just hours before adjourning for the year. President Bush signed the bill into law about a month later.

Section 122 of the act, an updated version of the nation's main ocean fisheries law, gives three fishing companies -- and only three -- the right to exchange certain rights to catch and process Bering Sea crab for a new and potentially more profitable kind of right. The change could lower the costs of running crab boats and hauling catches to an onshore processing plant.

The three companies -- Yardarm Knot, Blue Dutch and Trident Seafoods -- are all headed by people who have made substantial political contributions to U.S. Rep. Don Young, the Alaska Republican who inserted Section 122 into the legislation.

Two of the companies, Yardarm Knot and Trident, also have long-standing ties with Young and U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, employing firms with lobbyists who used to work as aides to the two lawmakers. Yardarm also has paid the senator's son, Ben Stevens, for consulting and business services while he was a state legislator.

Some competing seafood companies fought the section, but their managers declined to discuss their complaints publicly.

Alaska's crab fishing industry is a distant and dangerous trade that has become household entertainment across the country, thanks to the popular Discovery Channel reality show "Deadliest Catch."

The crab fisheries are lucrative, worth well over $100 million at the docks in recent years.

Craig Holman, of the congressional watchdog group Public Citizen, said Section 122 is the same kind of earmarking tactic that has stirred lots of trouble recently for Young on bills that benefited associates or campaign contributors elsewhere in the country.

The provision smacks of political favoritism, sidestepped the normal process for changing federal fishery rules, wasn't subject to a public debate or hearing, and was inserted into a major bill at the last minute, he said.

"This section is typical of Don Young-style legislating," Holman said. "He appears to view his role on Capitol Hill as protecting the interests of those who will give him campaign contributions. He's been doing that extensively through the earmarking practice, and he did it in this case in legislation that was otherwise a very noble act."

Young declined repeated requests for an interview.

FBI - Stevens-1497

194A-AN-13620-M;624

"Unfortunately I just do not think Congressman Young's schedule is going to allow for an interview, though I appreciate your interest," his press aide, Meredith Kenny, said in an e-mail.

She provided another e-mail, however, in defense of Section 122, saying part of the reasoning behind it was to "make participants in the fishery more economically viable."

CRABBING REVOLUTION

The law, the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Reauthorization Act of 2006, on the whole won widespread praise from fishermen, environmentalists and others concerned with safeguarding the nation's ocean fish stocks.

It was the first overhaul in a decade for the law, which originally was passed in 1976 and is partly named for Ted Stevens, who made the act's passage a personal priority last year.

The law helps govern the Bering Sea crab fisheries, which in 2005 switched from a derby style of fishing to one in which boats and processing plants effectively own individual shares of the catch.

Normally, the Anchorage-based North Pacific Fishery Management Council helps make changes in federal fisheries management off Alaska.

But Young's Section 122, amounting to about a page and a half in a 91-page act, never got a council review.

That troubles Kodiak fisherman Terry Haines, who said vessel crewmen often have been ignored or disadvantaged when corporate fishing companies lobby policy-makers for changes in fishing rules.

The Young provision, he said, should have been subject to a public review "simply to avoid any appearance of impropriety and to give other stakeholders a chance to be involved."

A version of the language appeared last year in a U.S. Coast Guard bill Young sponsored as chairman of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee. But Congress didn't pass the bill.

The language reappeared in the Magnuson-Stevens Act in early December. The House Resources Committee had jurisdiction over the bill, and Young was a senior committee member.

The act would be one of the last Congress passed in 2006.

Regulators with the National Marine Fisheries Service are working now to implement Section 122, which would take effect with next year's crab fisheries.

CHANGING THE RULES

According to a NMFS analysis, the law qualifies just three seafood companies to convert their existing crab fishery shares into a new type -- one that will allow them to catch as well as process crab aboard boats equipped to do both jobs.

Such a consolidated operation could save the three crab producers sizable costs. For instance, they don't need to run separate boats to catch crab and haul them to port for processing in a packing house.

Crab rights also can be sold or leased, and the combo catch and processing quota created under Section 122 likely would be worth up to 25 percent more than straight catch quota, said Jeff Osborn of Dock Street Brokers in Seattle.

The federal analysis says the three companies each can switch up to 1 million pounds of crab annually to the new kind of shares. It does not estimate the financial benefits the companies could realize.

The three companies, all based in Seattle, are:

FBI - Stevens-1498

* Yardarm Knot, a unit of Yardarm Knot Inc., whose president is Al Chaffee.

* Blue Dutch, a unit of parent company Blue North Fisheries.

* Trident Seafoods Corp., one of the largest Bering Sea crab fishing and processing companies.

A potential loser under Section 122 was St. Paul, an island town in the middle of the Bering Sea that relies heavily on tax revenue from local crab processing. But a provision says companies that catch and then process crab offshore must compensate St. Paul by paying a fee of 5 percent on the crab's value.

Dave Whaley, a Republican fisheries staffer on the House Resources Committee, said a lobbyist for Yardarm Knot -- he said he couldn't recall the name -- came to see him last year about the crab provision.

One concern was that the St. Paul harbor was clogging with winter ice that could keep crab boats from delivering crab to the docks, and the goal was to find a way to process the crab at sea and still protect St. Paul's interests, he said.

"This was viewed as a legitimate policy concern," one Congress could handle faster than the North Pacific Fishery Management Council, Whaley said.

CAMPAIGN CASH

Chaffee did not respond to repeated requests for comment.

He has made campaign contributions to several members of Congress in both parties, with Young among the most frequent recipients. In the past five years, Chaffee gave Young a total of $4,500, according to Federal Election Commission records compiled by the Center for Responsive Politics. Employees of his companies gave $8,500 more.

Chaffee has other connections to Alaska's congressional delegation. In the past two years, Yardarm Knot has paid a total of $100,000 to two law firms for lobbying: Robertson, Monagle and Eastaugh, in which former Stevens staffer Brad Gilman is a partner, and Blank Rome, which counts former Young chief of staff C.J. Zane and former Young aide Duncan Smith as principals.

Ben Stevens, in financial disclosures required of legislators, said Chaffee's companies paid him $121,800 total from 2002 through last year for consulting and business services.

Chaffee was among four men, including Young's son-in-law, Art Nelson, and former Stevens fisheries aide Trevor McCabe, who together bought 60 acres on mostly undeveloped Point MacKenzie across Knik Arm from Anchorage.

Young earmarked $229 million in a 2004 highway bill for a commuter bridge across the arm, which could make Point MacKenzie land more valuable. Critics nationally lambasted the project as a "bridge to nowhere."

Executives with Trident Seafoods, a titan among seafood companies operating in Alaska, offered limited comment on Section 122.

"Trident did not push for the conversion language," Trident general counsel Joe Plesha said in an e-mail. "Congressman Young was really trying to find an answer that helped everyone."

Top Trident executives including company president Chuck Bundrant, his wife and son, and Plesha have given $12,900 to Young in the last five years, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Trident also has employed Robertson, Monagle and Eastaugh for lobbying.

FBI - Stevens-1499

'WORST OF LEGISLATION'

The center says Mike Burns, president of Blue North Fisheries, and his brother, Patrick Burns, have given Young $3,500 since 2003.

But Mike Burns said his company also didn't seek Section 122 -- and has no plans to take advantage of it.

"When I first got a written version of it, it took me about a week to understand what it was," he said. "Obviously it serves some purpose."

Burns added that Young a couple of years ago helped his company win initial crab fishery shares it wasn't able to get through the North Pacific Fishery Management Council.

"As a last resort we went to Congressman Young, who looked at it, saw an injustice there, and went to bat for us and fixed it," Burns said. "I have nothing but the highest regard for the man. He didn't ask for any favors or anything like that."

But Holman, of Public Citizen, said earmarks or last-minute "riders" on major bills -- items such as Section 122 -- are "usually done to benefit special interests or campaign contributors."

"This is an example of the worst of legislation and the legislating process -- representatives producing legislation specifically designed to benefit a very small sector, either friends, colleagues or campaign contributors, which indirectly benefits the lawmaker himself."

Find Wesley Loy's commercial fishing blog online at adn.com/highliner or call 257-4590.

Crab coup

U.S. Rep. Don Young, R-Alaska, last year pushed obscure legislation through Congress qualifying three seafood companies for potentially lucrative new rights in the Bering Sea crab fisheries.

Company: Yardarm Knot, a unit of Yardarm Knot Inc.

Headquarters: Seattle

Leadership: Al Chaffee, president

Politics: In the last five years, Chaffee made campaign contributions totaling $4,500 to U.S. Rep. Don Young of Alaska. Employees gave $8,500 more.

Company: Blue Dutch, a unit of Blue North Fisheries

Headquarters: Seattle

Leadership: Mike Burns, president, and brother Patrick Burns

Politics: In the last five years, the Burns brothers have given Young a total of $3,500 in campaign contributions.

Company: Trident Seafoods Corp.

Headquarters: Seattle

Leadership: Chuck Bundrant, president

Politics: In the last five years, Bundrant, his wife and son, and other company executives have given Young a total of $12,900 in campaign contributions.

Sources: Center for Responsive Politics, company Web sites

LOAD-DATE: November 26, 2007

FBI - Stevens-1500

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Illustrated by Ron Engstrom Anchorage Daily News
ILLUSTRATION SHOWS MAP.
ILLUSTRATION SHOWS EXCERPT FROM SECTION 122 OF THE MAGNUSON-STEVENS FISHERY CONSERVATION AND MANAGEMENT REAUTHORIZATION ACT OF 2006 THAT BENEFITED THREE COMPANIES WHOSE EXECUTIVES MADE CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS TO REP. DON YOUNG.
Chaffee
ERIK HILL / Daily News archive 1992
An earlier bill carrying Rep. Don Young's earmark to help three fishing companies with their Alaska crabbing operations failed to pass; the earmark then got through in the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Reauthorization Act of 2006.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1501

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 28, 2007 Wednesday
FINAL EDITION

Sen. Lesil McGuire accused of threatening witness; CALLS: Ex-lobbyist Bobrick was due to testify against her spouse, former Rep. Tom Anderson.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1191 words

State Sen. Lesil McGuire was accused Tuesday of making veiled threats to dissuade a lobbyist from testifying in the corruption case against her husband, former state Rep. Tom Anderson.

The surprising information came up during the sentencing hearing of Bill Bobrick, a once-prominent lobbyist who began cooperating in September 2006 with the FBI in its investigation of corruption in Alaska politics.

In an interview after the hearing, McGuire denied making any threats and said Bobrick was deflecting attention from himself onto her "on the day of his reckoning with the public."

Bobrick, 52, pleaded guilty in May to conspiring with Anderson to push the interests of a private prison firm in exchange for money. He funneled nearly $24,000 to Anderson, money put up by a prison consultant who was working undercover for the FBI. In all, Anderson received nearly $26,000. The prison company, Cornell Cos., didn't know about the scheme, federal officials have said.

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick ordered Bobrick to serve five months in prison, followed by five months of house arrest on the felony conspiracy conviction. That's the minimum sentence under federal guidelines, which are advisory. It's far less than the two years to 30 months that Bobrick would have faced if he didn't cooperate.

And it's much less than the five years that Sedwick sentenced Anderson to serve. The Republican who represented East Anchorage in the Legislature for two terms also initially cooperated with the FBI, then decided to fight the charges against him. He was indicted in December 2006 and a jury convicted him in July of seven felony counts including bribery and money laundering.

Anderson reports to a federal prison on Monday in Oregon.

At Anderson's trial last summer, Bobrick testified for hours to help the government put the former legislator away.

"Certainly his testimony cemented the deal for the government," Sedwick said at Tuesday's sentencing.

He also wore a wire, helped the FBI investigate other people, and did as much as any witness could be expected to do, the judge said.

Prosecutor Joe Bottini also praised Bobrick but said he needed to be punished for being a catalyst for the scheme that got him and Anderson in trouble to begin with.

Before all this, Bobrick had a long list of clients who paid him to represent them before the city of Anchorage. His clients included at various times the police union, the firefighters' union, developers, Wal-Mart and many more.

FBI - Stevens-1502

194A-AN-13620-m; 625

Bobrick's attorney, Doug Pope, told Sedwick the threats by McGuire were real. He asked the judge to consider a lighter sentence since Bobrick helped the government despite the attempts at intimidation. On New Year's Day, less than a month after Anderson was indicted, McGuire called Bobrick, the judge was told. Bobrick's wife, Jessica Bury, was in medical school at Mayo Medical School in Minnesota. McGuire wanted her number to tell her "about efforts to bar Jessica from obtaining her license to practice in Alaska," Pope said.

"Bobrick understood the call to be a threat that, if he testified favorably for the government, Lesil McGuire would take steps to see that Jessica did not obtain her medical license," Pope said.

McGuire dug up Bury's number on her own and left similar messages on her voice mail, Pope said.

Pope had asked that the portion of the hearing dealing with the threats be closed to the public. But Sedwick ruled it had to be open.

Pope told reporters outside of court that he considered McGuire's actions "witness tampering."

McGuire is someone to be reckoned with, he told the judge. Not only is she a state senator, but her father is David McGuire, a prominent and influential orthopedic surgeon in Anchorage, Pope said. He served on the Alaska State Medical Board from 1992 to 1995 and was chairman much of that time. The board licenses doctors in Alaska.

Pope said he immediately alerted prosecutor Bottini. Prosecutors took the veiled threats very seriously, Bottini said.

Bobrick was walking on the Coastal Trail when McGuire reached him on his cell phone, Bottini said, so there was no recording of that call, but he said he believes Bobrick's recollection of it.

"It was for the purpose of trying to rattle his cage, which in part she succeeded in doing," Bottini told the judge, referring to McGuire.

He said it took him until the next day to get hold of Anderson's attorney, Paul Stocker. If anything like that happened again, prosecutors would try to revoke Anderson's release on bond, Bottini said he told Stockler.

Stockler said in an interview that he conveyed that to Anderson and McGuire.

"She had an innocent explanation for the contact. I said I don't care," Stockler said. Defendants shouldn't be contacting witnesses, he said.

The calls stopped, everyone agrees.

McGuire said she didn't even know that Bobrick was working with the government until Stockler told her.

She doesn't remember exactly why she was so eager to talk to Bury that day but thinks she wanted to commiserate. The two couples were friends. They went out to dinner at Sullivan's Steakhouse, got together to play Cranium, talked about intimate family things, McGuire said.

"I can just tell you this. I didn't threaten her. And I wish the best for her," McGuire said.

She said she felt empathy for Bury and still is struggling to deal with what happened.

FBI - Stevens-1503

"I just feel like every time I get my sea legs back something hits me again," McGuire said.

The judge said that it was hard to know just what to make of the reported threats and that "the facts may not be exactly as they've been suggested today."

"With respect to the threat against Mr. Bobrick's wife, I cannot place a great deal of stock in it but I think it is worth considering," Sedwick said.

Ultimately, he said, it did seem that Bobrick had cause to worry about his wife's future, even if McGuire had no ability to actually carry out any threat. And Bobrick "soldiered on," the judge said.

Under Tuesday's sentence, Bobrick also must serve two years on probation. He also must do 800 hours of community service and pay a $3,000 fine.

Bobrick told the judge he's lived in Alaska for 32 years and he'll try to spend the next 32 making up for what he did, if he lives that long.

"I don't really have the words to convey the depths of my shame and my remorse," Bobrick said. Sedwick said he's never seen a defendant so remorseful.

Bobrick said he knows he has contributed to the view that the Alaska political system is corrupt.

"I'll carry that scar for the rest of my life," Bobrick said.

As the hearing ended, both Bobrick and Bury seemed overcome, maybe with relief. She cried and they hugged. They walked with friends out of the Federal Building. They had nothing to say to the mass of reporters who surrounded them.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

ONLINE AUDIO: Hear clips from Bill Bobrick's sentencing, including the alleged threat made by Sen. Lesil McGuire to Bobrick's wife.

adn.com/fbi

Bobrick's sentence

* Five months in prison

* Five months of house arrest

* Two years on probation

* 800 hours community service

* $3,000 fine

LOAD-DATE: November 28, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1504

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

November 28, 2007 Wednesday
FINAL EDITION

Distrust in Wasilla City Hall;
MALL PROJECTS: Council questions city officials' dealings with developer.

BYLINE: By ZAZ HOLLANDER zhollander@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 465 words

DATELINE: WASILLA

City Council plans to order an investigation of the relationship between city employees and the developer building two mega-malls along the Parks Highway.

Among the questions councilors want answered is whether city officials, including Mayor Dianne Keller, have been secretly working with Meritage Development Group LLC.

Meritage hopes to build two shopping centers that together would roughly equal the Anchorage 5th Avenue mall in size. The first, Creekside Town Square, sits just east of a new Target store. The second, Gateway Crossing, would overlook Wasilla's Sears store.

City Council member Steve Menard proposed an independent review of the city's relationship with Meritage at the council's Monday night meeting.

Council members unanimously agreed to have city attorney Tom Klinkner conduct the review but postponed further action until Dec. 10, when Klinkner can provide an estimate of the cost of his services. The council could change its instructions at that time.

City officials have worked with Meritage, planning roads around and within the center and across private property flanking the malls. The city drew fire from local business owners, however, who said the city threatened to use part of their properties for a road accessing Meritage's development. The city later scrapped plans for the road.

Menard, in a memo proposing the review, said he hoped to answer nine questions, including:

* Did city employees engage in "inappropriate behavior ... in their assistance with the development of Creekside Town Square"?

FBI - Stevens-1505

* Did Keller and economic development director Casey Reynolds violate personnel or ethical policies during a May trip to Las Vegas, where the pair met with Meritage officials?

* Did Keller act inappropriately when she sent a letter in August vaguely threatening to use some private property near Town Square?

Councilors -- and even the mayor -- backed Menard's idea.

"I agree wholeheartedly. We need to find out what happened and (ensure) that this doesn't happen again," council member Marty Metiva said, though he noted that only the Vegas trip question appeared to have a legal basis.

194A-AN-13620-M:626

Reynolds, in an interview Tuesday, called the trip "a typical business trip marketing the city" that also involved another local developer. The pair had one dinner with Meritage, but no business was discussed.

"It's not like they bought us tickets for shows, or paid for hotel rooms or anything," he said.

Keller was absent from Monday night's meeting, attending her grandmother's 96th birthday party in Texas, she said at a previous meeting.

In previously written comments, Keller said she had no objections to Menard's proposal but "wanted clear outcomes and a finite budget."

Find Zaz Hollander online at adn.com/contact/zhollander or call 907-352-6711.

LOAD-DATE: November 28, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Illustrated by Ron Engstrom
ILLUSTRATION SHOWS MAP

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1506

NewsBank inc. America's Newspapers

Paper: Anchorage Daily News (AK)
Title: Bobrick's lawyer releases McGuire's phone messages -
RECORDINGS: Senator said she had heard that lobbyist's wife's career could be in jeopardy.
Date: November 30, 2007

The lawyer representing convicted lobbyist Bill Bobrick on Thursday played for reporters two telephone messages left by state Sen. Lesil McGuire, confirming she indeed made the calls reported in court Tuesday but not entirely dispelling the ambiguity over whether they were threats.

In the Jan. 1 calls, left on the cell phone of Bobrick and the answering machine of his wife, Jessica Bury, McGuire sounds like she's trying to be Bury's friend in reporting that "some people" are saying bad things about her.

Just what McGuire said, and what she meant by it, has become a topic of heated debate on blogs, talk radio and other forums after the issue first was raised Tuesday when Bobrick was sentenced for conspiracy. McGuire, R-Anchorage, served three terms in the state House before being elected to the Senate last year.

Bobrick was a key witness in the corruption trial last summer of McGuire's husband, former Rep. Tom Anderson. Bobrick's lawyer, Doug Pope, said in court Tuesday that McGuire's phone calls sounded like witness tampering. Prosecutors agreed that her words were threatening.

Anderson was convicted of seven felonies, including bribery. He starts his five-year prison sentence Monday.

In the phone messages, McGuire clearly asserts that Bury's career would be jeopardized by what the unnamed people were saying about her.

Bury is in her third year of medical school in Minnesota and hopes to return to Alaska to serve as a doctor.

"What this person said was not kind, it was awful, and they made an implication that could affect her potential medical career and I was very upset by it and I defended her," McGuire said on the message left on Bobrick's cell phone.

"But I would like to relay the information to her and the person that said it just so she's aware that there is this contingency of people that I would just simply say are hoping for her to not succeed."

In the call, McGuire appears to refer to a 10-year-old lawsuit that was settled in Bury's favor, Pope said.

The recorded messages contradict two statements made by McGuire in an interview Tuesday with the Daily News. In that interview, McGuire said she never mentioned anything medically related in the January calls. She also said she wasn't aware at the time that Bobrick was working for the FBI.

Bobrick said Thursday that though McGuire was trying to sound like a pal in the calls, she was never a good friend and was just trying to intimidate him.

"I took it as a direct attempt to influence my testimony about Tom Anderson's corruption," Bobrick said Thursday evening.

The first of three related calls that McGuire made on New Year's Day was to Bobrick. She was at the Hotel Captain Cook and reached him on his cell phone as he walked his old poodle Archie on the Coastal Trail.

Before she even identified herself, McGuire asked him "are you recording this?" Bobrick said. He wasn't. He asked who it was; she said it was Lesil McGuire and that "Jessica needs to know some things that could affect her ability to get her license," Bobrick recalled Thursday. She wanted Bury's number in Minnesota, where she was attending Mayo Medical School.

Bobrick said he told her he was walking his dog and would call her back. He then called the FBI.

The copy of the recording on Bury's answering machine is barely audible. In it, McGuire tells Bury that "horrible things were said about you that I know were not true."

"I just want to talk to you about it. I think there's a way to strategize around it," McGuire says.

McGuire then called Bobrick back and left the second message, saying at the start that she was not the subject of the FBI investigation.

FBI - Stevens-1507

194A-AN-13620-M;627

"If anyone's listening to this recording, I have a feeling you're required to report who called here but I'm not in that category," McGuire said. "I'm calling you on a personal matter about Jessica. I left her a message but I would like an opportunity to talk to you about it. It's very disturbing and it could impact her, in a way, professionally that bothers me."

The FBI made copies of both recordings and told Bobrick and his wife not to have contact with McGuire. Assistant U.S. Attorney Joe Bottini called Anderson's attorney, Paul Stockler, and warned him that if anything like that happened again, prosecutors might try to revoke Anderson's bail.

The calls stopped.

McGuire's role first came under scrutiny during Bobrick's sentencing hearing Tuesday.

Bobrick pleaded guilty in May to conspiring with Anderson to support a private prison company. Tuesday, he was sentenced to five months in prison and five months of house arrest.

Pope asked the judge to consider that Bobrick and his wife felt threatened by McGuire, yet he testified anyway. Taking a risk justifies a lighter sentence, Pope said.

"I felt she was tampering with a witness, your honor. I thought she should've been indicted," the defense lawyer told the judge.

Reporters then began pressing for the recordings. On Thursday, the FBI gave copies to Pope, who shared them.

Under conditions Bobrick and his wife set for reporters, the particulars of the matter that McGuire referred to as personal for Bury could only be described in general terms.

McGuire, on Tuesday, denied ever talking about Bury's ability to work as a doctor in Alaska.

"I never talked about her ability to practice at all. That never happened," McGuire said.

She said she couldn't recall why she was so intent on reaching Bury on New Year's Day, but said maybe she just wanted to commiserate. Anderson had been arrested just weeks before.

"That is what is so bizarre. ... I don't even know what I said but nothing about medical," McGuire said.

"I didn't even know that Bill was working for the government then," McGuire said.

But back in December 2006, only Anderson was under indictment, and no public charges were filed against Bobrick. It was easy for McGuire to figure out Bobrick's role, prosecutor Bottini said in court.

Bobrick said he wanted to release the recordings "to show that Lesil McGuire is not telling the truth, once again."

McGuire did not return phone messages about the recordings Thursday night.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390. Find Richard Mauer online at adn.com/contact/rmauer or call 257-4345.

LISTEN: Hear excerpts from phone messages left by Sen. Lesil McGuire.

adn.com

Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

FBI - Stevens-1508

Author: LISA DEMER and RICHARD MAUER Anchorage Daily News Staff
Section: Main
Page: A1
Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

December 1, 2007 Saturday
FINAL EDITION

Prosecution wants max for Kott;
10 TO 121/2 YEARS: Defense is seeking less than three years in prison.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 657 words

Prosecutors want to put former House Speaker Pete Kott away -- for more than 10 years.

The defense says less than three years is plenty.

A federal jury convicted Kott in September of three felony charges: conspiracy, bribery and extortion. He was acquitted of wire fraud. Jurors found that he was bribed by executives with oil field services company Veco Corp. to push a version of an oil tax favored by North Slope oil producers.

Kott's sentencing hearing is scheduled for Dec. 7, and prosecutors filed their recommendation to the judge on Friday. Defense lawyer Jim Wendt said his recommendation should be filed today. He expected to ask for a range of 33 to 41 months.

"It's an adversarial system. They argue for as much as they think they can possibly get. The defense argues for the minimum amount. Everybody knows that," Wendt said.

A decision will be up to U.S. District Judge John Sedwick, who is presiding over all the corruption cases so far.

Kott, 58 and Republican, represented Eagle River in the Legislature for seven terms, including one as House speaker. He now lives with his girlfriend in Juneau.

During his trial, prosecutors played dozens of secretly made recordings for jurors. On many, Kott came across as a heavy-drinking ally of Veco. But the defense claimed he was just a hard-working blue collar Republican, a man who got on his knees laying hardwood floors for a living, someone who didn't ask for handouts.

Prosecutors are seeking double the sentence handed down to convicted former state Rep. Tom Anderson, who reports to federal prison Monday. And their recommendation is far above the four to six years they initially estimated Kott might face.

Now they say Kott should get about 10 to 121/2 years, several more than what a U.S. probation officer suggested. They argued to the judge in a memorandum that he deserves more time because he took multiple bribes and was an organizer of a criminal conspiracy.

As the government sees it, Kott in effect took three bribes: a promised job as a Veco lobbyist or consultant, talked about in 2006 and earlier; a $5,000 payment in 2004 that Kott testified was a truck loan still unpaid; and three other benefits that Kott received in 2006, which prosecutors count as one bribe for sentencing purposes. That last item includes $1,000 cash, a political poll for Kott that cost Veco $2,750, and an inflated flooring invoice for $7,993.

What's more, prosecutors say, Kott was "a critical organizer and manager within the larger conspiracy." Then-Veco chief executive Bill Allen, who has pleaded guilty to bribery and testified against his old friend Kott, placed high value on Kott's role, they say.

FBI - Stevens-1509

194A-AN-13620-M; 628

That's clear, they say, from a June 6, 2006, secretly recorded telephone call between Allen and Jim Bowles, president of Conoco Phillips Alaska. Allen told Bowles that he was using Kott and then-Senate President Ben Stevens to kill the tax bill, which at that point was too high for the industry.

Beyond that, prosecutors say, "Kott attempted to evade responsibility for his crimes by blatantly lying to the jury about his actions down to the very last vote he took as a legislator."

They go on:

"It cannot be disputed that Kott's crimes, particularly given his past leadership role as Speaker of the Alaska State House and his long tenure in that body, have struck a severe blow to the public's faith in the Alaska State Legislature and their elected leaders."

The government also is seeking a $16,473 fine, which totals the amount of the corrupt payments, and three years probation.

So far, in the multi-pronged federal corruption investigation, three former legislators have been convicted by juries, two Veco Corp. executives and a former lobbyist in Anchorage have pleaded guilty; a fourth legislator is awaiting trial while the government appeals a ruling on evidence. The investigation is continuing.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

LOAD-DATE: December 3, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Kott

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1510

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

December 2, 2007 Sunday
FINAL EDITION

Corruption scandal scared off gas line bid;
MIDAMERICAN: Company CEO says ongoing investigation puts in question all Alaska projects.

BYLINE: By WESLEY LOY wloy@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 879 words

A major Midwest energy company cites Alaska's political corruption scandal for its unexpected decision not to submit a natural gas pipeline application.

In a Friday letter to Gov. Sarah Palin, the chief executive of MidAmerican Energy Holdings Co. suggests that criminal investigations, performance lapses by one major North Slope oil producer and other factors stand in the way of a gas line.

"As you are painfully aware the ongoing corruption investigations coupled with previous indictments, guilty pleas and convictions draw into question virtually every major Alaskan project participant and governmental levels from State to Federal," says the letter from MidAmerican CEO David Sokol. "Obviously your administration had no involvement in these previous shenanigans nor did we; however, you and we alone cannot develop the pipeline project through AGIA's expected process."

MidAmerican was expected to be among the companies applying by Friday's deadline for a package of financial and other pipeline incentives under Palin's Alaska Gasline Inducement Act.

Palin is the latest in a string of governors to try to spur construction of a multibillion-dollar gas line.

Such a project would be a tax and jobs boon to Alaska, but the cost and risk of laying pipe as far as Chicago have for decades sidelined the project. Three oil companies, BP, Conoco Phillips and Exxon Mobil, hold the rights to most of the Slope's enormous gas reserves.

Palin late Friday announced the state had received five pipeline bids, plus a proposal from Conoco that didn't meet minimum application requirements.

The bids came amid a federal investigation that has resulted in criminal charges against four former state legislators, two of whom have been convicted of taking bribes from executives of oil field services firm Veco Corp. who were trying to influence last year's debate on raising oil taxes. Other state and federal lawmakers have been named but not charged in the probe.

State taxation rates factor heavily into political efforts to encourage either the oil companies or an independent pipeline company to build a gas line.

In his letter, Sokol said that while gas demand makes a pipeline costing up to $30 billion a compelling project, MidAmerican declined to bid due to problems in Alaska.

Aside from ongoing criminal investigations, Sokol cites the "performance issues" of one major oil company -- an apparent reference to BP, which last week pleaded guilty in Anchorage to a federal environmental crime for allowing oil to spill last year from a neglected pipeline in the giant Prudhoe Bay oil field.

FBI - Stevens-1511

194A-AN-13620-M;629

Sokol also mentions a legal battle in which the state is trying to take away leases in the rich Point Thomson oil and gas field for lack of development by Exxon and others.

MidAmerican, based in Des Moines, Iowa, is a subsidiary of billionaire investor Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway Inc. MidAmerican runs gas and electric power utilities, and says its pipelines carried about 8 percent of the natural gas consumed in the United States in 2006.

This isn't the first time Sokol has pointedly withdrawn from Alaska's stumble-prone gas pipeline derby.

In 2004, after Palin's predecessor, former Gov. Frank Murkowski, refused to grant MidAmerican exclusive rights for five years to pursue a gas line, Sokol openly criticized Murkowski and declared his company was withdrawing from negotiations.

"On one hand your leadership and that of your administration has been outstanding and your integrity and transparent style are a breath of fresh air in what has proven to be a rather shady and smoke filled past in regard to energy issues in Alaska," Sokol wrote Palin.

"On the other hand the deepening and ongoing investigations into political and corporate corruption in Alaska make a thorough and thoughtful proposal in compliance with AGIA an unrealistic exercise for our organization. For a project of this magnitude to proceed, integrity must be the foundation upon which all project elements are based."

Sokol suggested the Alaska and U.S. governments will need to team with "a proven and nonconflicted project development partner" to deliver Alaska gas to the nation.

Allan Urlis, a MidAmerican spokesman, declined Saturday to elaborate on Sokol's letter.

Members of Palin's gas pipeline team couldn't be reached for comment Saturday.

The five pipeline bids received Friday came from TransCanada Corp., Chinese energy giant Sinopec, a little-known California firm called AEnergia, the Alaska Gasline Port Authority and the Alaska Natural Gas Development Authority.

Industry watchers had speculated another major energy company, England-based BG Group, might also submit an application. The company plans to drill exploratory wells on the North Slope this winter.

In a Thursday letter to Palin explaining why BG didn't bid, company executive Martin Houston predicted a gas line will be developed but "there was still too much economic uncertainty for us at this stage."

However, the company offered to share its project analysis with the governor, and indicated the BG and Palin gas teams will meet Dec. 12.

Find Wesley Loy online at adn.com/contact/wloy or call 257-4590.

ONLINE: Read the letters explaining why MidAmerican and BG opted out of the AGIA process.

adn.com

LOAD-DATE: December 3, 2007

FBI - Stevens-1512

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

HOMER TRIBUNE

Own the Moment
Purchase the Homer Tribune's museum-quality photos here

Subscribe | Advertise With Us

THIS WEEK'S HEADLINES

- Muckraker Ray makes bid for U.S. Senate
- Blade-wielding trio rob Anchor Point resident
- LeDoux seeks local support in race against Young
- State denies late hospital permit
- FYI
- Club eyes outlook for Lookout
- The 59th minute
- Announcements

ARTS & ENTERTAINMENT

- Finding nature in First Friday
- Friends plan farewell gathering for Gail Baker – Artmaker
- Flow down, good times

SPORTS

- Harlem Hoopsters swoop through Homer
- Nikolaevsk volleyball team earns first State berth at 'big dance'
- Building experience
- Sports Briefs

FEATURE

BUSINESS

YOUTH

Muckraker Ray makes bid for U.S. Senate

•Homer honors Metcalfe for shining light on corruption

By Layton Ehmke
Homer Tribune
December 5, 2007

HOMER TRIBUNE/Layton Ehmke

Ray Metcalfe accepts the 2007 Muckraker Award, presented by Cook Inletkeeper's Bob Shavelson on Saturday night at Alice's Champagne Palace.

Considering the powerful people he's taken on, you'd figure Ray Metcalfe might have mysteriously disappeared — never to take up another row with corruption again. Instead, Metcalfe is out and about, shaking hands as he rallies Alaskans to support his bid to take on Ted Stevens and his 60-plus years worth of power and connection in the U.S. Senate. Of course, Metcalfe will first have to win the Democrat primary here to move up to the main event.

Metcalfe is the man who shined a million-candle-power spotlight on the bribes that oil company, Veco Corp., slipped into the pockets of Alaska lawmakers. As a result, Alaska politicians are being investigated for extortion, tax evasion and bribery.

Stevens remains entangled with FBI and IRS investigations, specifically for billing Veco for the remodeling of his Girdwood home — the one the FBI raided July 30. Former executives of the oil company testified they bribed many lawmakers —including Stevens's son, Ben, to the tune of $243,250.

Metcalfe's duties of raking the muck out of politics is far from over, he said Saturday night as he accepted the 2007 Muckraker award presented by Bob Shavelson, of Homer. Metcalfe likened his battle to that of fighting a 17-headed hydra, saying all of its heads must be destroyed in order to kill off the 30-year streak of corrupt politics that fundamentally "gave away Prudhoe Bay." He added that the Alaska Permanent Fund would be worth $100 billion today, had it not been for corruption.

Metcalfe was elected to the Alaska Legislature in 1978 and 1980. In 1986, he attempted to form the Republican Moderate Party to rival the ideological movements he began to see within the Republican party.

FBI - Stevens-1513

194A-AN-13620-M; 630

Today, he said he intends to set a balance to politics by being to the Democratic party what Sarah Palin has been to the Republicans – fresh air. His campaign slogan makes the following promise: He'll "cut out the bribery and pass the savings on to you."

The Homer Tribune and Metcalfe had a candid conversation at his coffee-shop rally on Sunday to find out what he's about — and what he's not.

Homer Tribune: If you were to form a political party today, what would it be?
Ray Metcalfe: Well, what I tried to do was form a party based in ethics. It had no platform. But as far as issues went, it had a statement of principals that said if you were going to be a member of good standing, you had to abide by these principals. And you could agree or disagree with me on all kinds of things, but if you were abiding by these principals and if you were open and honest, then the voter could decide if they wanted you. I'd do the same again. I want the straight scoop and I want the voters to make the choice with good information.

HT: How would you define your role in the U.S. Senate?
RM: I have done more to expose corruption in this state than any political figure in the state's history. I'm just good at it. It takes tenacity, thick skin and the willingness to take on the very, very, very powerful..

HT: Why hasn't anyone found you mysteriously dead and buried in the desert?
RM: I get asked that question every day, and sometimes I wonder myself. But think about it. How many other people would have had the knowledge to do what I did? I have enough knowledge about how government works to read between the lines, and I knew that nobody else was going to fix it. And to a large degree, nobody else would have known how to fix it. So, when you know that you're only one to do it, you kind of have a duty to.
If I'm elected to the U.S. Senate, I will spend the rest of my political career, and probably the rest of my life, doing the same thing nationally that I've done in Alaska.

HT: Starting with?
RM: Corruption is wherever you look. You'll find it. I'm just as quick to expose a dirty Democrat as I am to expose a dirty Republican. When I see it, I'll expose it.

HT: Who was the first person you investigated and exposed?
RM: Ben Stevens was the first person I tore apart, filleted and staked out in the sun to dry.

HT: If you were to meet Ben Stevens in this coffee shop in Homer, how would that exchange go down?
RM: I'd probably put a table up on end between him and me so that any saltshakers coming my way would be deflected. [laughs]

HT: Teddy Roosevelt said muckrakers are too busy cleaning up filth and are completely unaware of any celestial beauty and glory above them. Are you?

RM: I saw it last night at the Muckrakers Ball. As I was standing there getting this award — you know, wasn't that a shining moment?

HT: Who's going to make a good president?
RM: Hillary would be fine — Obama would be better. I like his judgment. Anybody that can be bamboozled into voting for Iraq, knowing what I know she knew, appalls me. I was appalled when I watched all those Democrats roll over and vote for the Patriot Act. I was more appalled when they rolled over and supported George Bush on the invasion of Iraq. I just look at those things as disgusting. And I don't believe there was a single senator that wasn't well aware that Saddham Hussein had absolutely nothing to do with the knocking down of our towers — meanwhile our military was directed down the wrong way from the guy who really did it.
If you're concerned about war on terror — as you should be — you're No. 1 worry should be that a nuclear weapon will be detonated in an American city. What have we done to prevent that? Nothing.
Have we secured a single port? Nope. The nukes have been proliferated, and we pulled our troops off the North Korean border. As soon as we did that, they started building nukes right and left. And we have no way of knowing whether or not they've sold them to Osama. If they did, all he has to do is stick an address to a city near you on the backside of a sea-land container and drop it in the mail — because there are no checks. The most likely place to get a nuke is in the mail.

- We also played a short round of free-word association. The rules are simple: the Homer Tribune said a word, and Metcalfe said the first thing that popped into his head. Here's what happened:

Homer Tribune	Metcalfe
Oasis	Water
Pebble	Mine
Sheep	Montana
APOC	Corrupt
Politics	Corrupt
Prosperity	Getting our fair share
Pitfall	Veco
Rock N' Roll	Me
Permanent Fund	Make it shine
Kickback	Ben Stevens
Gamble	Listening to lobbyists
John Cowdery	More crooked than a dog's kind leg
Sarah Palin	Absolutely delightful
The war	Stinks

FBI - Stevens-1515

© 2007 The Homer Tribune

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

December 7, 2007 Friday
FINAL EDITION

Senate doesn't intend to take action against McGuire; CALLS: Lawmaker is accused of threatening wife of trial witness.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 744 words

The state Senate has no plans to take action against Sen. Lesil McGuire over allegations she threatened the wife of a witness in the corruption trial against her husband.

The Senate majority spokesman, Jeff Turner, said the bipartisan majority caucus has not discussed the matter. Turner said it does not seem to be an issue for the caucus. Senate President Lyda Green hasn't returned repeated phone calls about McGuire.

Anchorage Democratic Sen. Hollis French said that "there is a lot of smoke here," but he doesn't think what McGuire did was witness tampering. French is a former prosecutor and chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee, of which McGuire is a member.

McGuire, an Anchorage Republican, made the calls on New Year's Day to lobbyist Bill Bobrick and his wife, Jessica Bury.

"Was it good judgment?" French said. "Probably not."

Bobrick was a key witness in the bribery and corruption trial last summer of McGuire's husband, former state Rep. Tom Anderson. Bobrick's lawyer, Doug Pope, said at Bobrick's sentencing last week for his involvement in the bribery that McGuire's phone calls sounded like witness tampering. Prosecutors agreed her words were threatening, but didn't pursue charges.

Pope made public copies of two phone messages that McGuire left Bobrick and his wife. Eagle River Republican Sen. Fred Dyson, who assisted the FBI in its investigation of corruption in the state Legislature, said he listened to the messages after the media released them.

Dyson said he couldn't tell if they were threats.

"Listening to the tape, I think that could be taken either way," Dyson said.

FBI - Stevens-1516

Dyson, a member of the Senate minority, said he probably wouldn't recommend the majority take action against McGuire.

Potential actions could range from a formal reprimand or loss of committee positions to expulsion from the majority caucus. In 1982, senators expelled from the Legislature one of their own, George Hohman, after he was convicted of bribery.

McGuire sounds on a message as though she is attempting to be Bury's friend by reporting "some people" are saying awful things that could hurt Bury's ability to get an Alaska medical license. Bury is in her third year of medical school in Minnesota and hopes to return to Alaska to serve as a doctor. McGuire and Bury know one another but there's dispute about whether they were friends.

194A-AN-13620-M;631

The recorded messages contradict a statement McGuire made to the Daily News that she never mentioned anything medically related in the calls.

McGuire also said she wasn't aware at the time of the calls that Bobrick was cooperating with the FBI. But in her message left on Bobrick's phone, McGuire feels the need to say she isn't a subject of an FBI investigation.

"If anyone's listening to this recording, I have a feeling you're required to report who called here but I'm not in that category," McGuire said in the message.

McGuire's husband, Anderson, began his federal prison sentence on Monday.

McGuire has refused requests for comment on the alleged threats since the audio of the phone messages was made public a week ago. She'd earlier said the messages weren't threats.

Senate Minority Leader Gene Therriault said it appears as though what McGuire did was inappropriate.

"Whether it was something that rises to the level of censure from the body, I don't know," the North Pole Republican said.

Therriault said other cases in the Legislature have been more clear-cut. Therriault's Senate minority has urged that the majority reconsider having Anchorage Republican Sen. John Cowdery in the powerful position of rules chair.

Former Veco Corp. executives have implicated Cowdery in their scheme to bribe state legislators during a 2006 debate on an oil-tax rewrite. The Senate majority caucus has not taken action against Cowdery, but he did not attend last month's special session on oil taxes.

Gov. Sarah Palin has also said the Senate majority should review keeping Cowdery as rules chair.

Palin declined to weigh in on McGuire last week and said it's up to the Legislature to police its own.

Therriault said the McGuire phone calls might be something for the legislative ethics committee to look into. Ethics committee members wouldn't comment, saying it is confidential whether or not they are considering any kind of investigation.

Generally, the committee deals with issues related to misuse of legislative office.

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him at 257-4344.

LOAD-DATE: December 7, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

FBI - Stevens-1517

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

December 7, 2007 Friday
FINAL EDITION

29 letters attempt to lighten Kott's sentence; JUDGE RULES TODAY: Ex-legislator called "fatherly," "common drunk."

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 891 words

In letter after letter, friends, relatives and colleagues of convicted former state Rep. Pete Kott urge a federal judge to go easy when sentencing him today.

The bad stuff wasn't him, it was the booze, said one.

He's a good man, an involved father and grandfather, a good son to his 82-year-old mother, who is in poor health, said others.

They portray him as generous and compassionate, not someone looking out for himself. His flooring business required hard, physical labor and he did it free for friends. Even the money he was convicted of taking as bribes mainly went to others, some said.

A former legislative aide, Patrick Harman, wrote that Kott was corrupted not by money, but by alcohol. In his trial, prosecutors played recordings of Kott plotting with Veco Corp. executives after he had been drinking, sometimes heavily.

"If I were to numerically judge his rapid decline from Speaker of the House to common drunk, he would earn a perfect 10," Harman wrote.

A federal jury in September convicted Kott, 58, of bribery, conspiracy and extortion for his role in pushing an oil tax favored by North Slope oil producers. In exchange, he received nearly $9,000, a political poll for his re-election campaign and the promise of a job, all from Veco Corp. and its two top executives, according to testimony from the trial.

Prosecutors want U.S. District Judge John Sedwick to put Kott away for more than 10 years. The defense is asking for no more than 33 months.

Kott represented Eagle River for seven terms in the House, including one as speaker. He lost in the Republican primary last year. He now lives in Juneau.

FBI - Stevens-1518

In all, 29 people wrote in to support Kott.

"Pete was once one of the most influential politicians in Alaska; today he has lost his career, his marriage, his integrity, his reputation, and disappointed many, including myself," Harman wrote.

The former aide urged the judge to require that Kott get alcohol treatment and be allowed to pay back society through public service, not a stint in prison, maybe by teaching ethics classes to politicians.

"The monies that Pete received were, in reality, pretty meager. Personally, I believe he 'sold his vote' for alcohol," Harman wrote.

194A-AN-132620-M; 632

Last year, Kott's daughter, Pamela, a former Miss Alaska USA and model, was bitten in the face by a friend's boxer. "Mr. Kott took time to console me as I was in tears ... being ever so fatherly to me and looking back, I appreciate it," Audrey Burke wrote to the judge.

Burke said she became friends with Pamela when both worked as Alaska Airlines flight attendants. Kott was many attendants' favorite legislator, she wrote.

Former legislative candidate Earl Mayo, who along with his wife owns the How How restaurant and Ramada Inn in Muldoon, wrote that he and Kott are good friends going back 17 years. When Mayo needed to fix up a house to sell, Kott spent a month doing the interior work and "never asked for anything in return." Same thing when they did the interior of the How How, Mayo wrote.

Kott even accompanied the Mayos to Stanford Hospital when his wife needed treatment there, Mayo wrote.

The hard-drinking, cussing man seen on the FBI surveillance tapes isn't who Kott really is, several letter writers said.

"The real Pete is a model of decorum and respect," Debra Stovern, his girlfriend, wrote to the judge. "He normally treats people with kindness, speaks kindly, and does not use profane language."

Kott -- Scotty to his family -- was born in Flint, Mich. His parents had a stormy marriage and his younger brother Michael grew up in "fear for his mother's safety," wrote Michael's wife, Elizabeth. Kott took on a fatherly role toward Michael and helped him turn out to be a good man. Kott was the cornerstone of the family and still is, Michael Kott wrote. When their mother was ill with cancer in 2001, Kott spent nights with her at the hospital and stayed with her at home as she recovered. She's now ill again.

Kott joined the Air Force, turned the military into a career, got college degrees along the way, and retired after 22 years as a captain.

Former Rep. Bill Williams, a Republican from Ketchikan, described how fair and dedicated Kott was in the Legislature, no matter who he was dealing with. There was also an element of charm.

"When he spoke, you would have to listen very carefully due to his sense of humor that he used constructively to change the views of others without causing resentment," Williams wrote. Kott also did the floors in Williams' home, at the cost of the materials.

As for the bribes, he didn't get much, according to his lawyer.

Kott received $1,000 from Veco's Bill Allen in cash, but it was to reimburse him for a contribution he made to then-Gov. Frank Murkowski's campaign, Kott's lawyer, Jim Wendt, argues in his sentencing memorandum.

And the $7,993 paid by Allen through an inflated flooring invoice went to Kott's son so the younger Peter Kott could work on his dad's campaign, Wendt wrote.

Another $5,000 Kott received from Allen -- which Kott testified was a loan not ever repaid -- shouldn't be counted at all since Allen never testified about it, Wendt maintained. And the promised job wasn't worth nearly as much as the government contended, Wendt wrote.

FBI - Stevens-1519

The sentencing hearing begins today at 8:30 a.m.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

LOAD-DATE: December 7, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Kott
AL GRILLO / Associated Press archive 2007
Former legislator Pete Kott, center, exits the federal courthouse in Anchorage with his daughter, Pam Kott, left, and girlfriend

Debra Stovern after he was convicted of conspiracy, extortion and bribery in September.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1520

2 of 2 DOCUMENTS

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

December 8, 2007 Saturday
FINAL EDITION

Kott gets 6 years;;
Severity of crime, perjury on stand earn longer sentence

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1393 words

A federal judge sentenced former state House Speaker Pete Kott to six years in prison on Friday for his role in a corrupt scheme to push an industry-backed oil tax.

In a courtroom crowded with Kott's family, friends, reporters, defense lawyers, prosecutors and FBI agents, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick said that Kott should serve a longer than typical sentence because of the seriousness of the matter. The judge also ordered a $10,000 fine and three years' probation.

In addition, Sedwick found that Kott lied on the witness stand during his trial in September and factored that in too.

A federal jury in September convicted Kott, 58, of bribery, conspiracy and extortion for his role in advocating an oil tax pushed by Veco Corp. executives and favored by North Slope oil producers. He received nearly $9,000, a political poll for his re-election campaign and the promise of a lobbying job, all from Veco executives, according to testimony.

The stakes in Juneau during the 2006 legislative session were huge. Kott and other Veco allies were trying to keep the proposed new oil tax on profits at 20 percent, as the industry wanted. But others were pushing for a higher rate. Even a 1 percent change in the tax rate meant tens of millions to the state, if not even more.

"What we have here is an offense that has caused the entirety of the population of this (statewide judicial) district and a few kibitzers from Outside to question the integrity of the very political system here in Alaska," Sedwick said.

Kott's behavior "causes all of us to wonder what really does go on in Juneau," the judge said.

Kott's trial was packed with revelations. Prosecutors played for jurors FBI telephone wiretaps and surveillance videos that exposed a seamy world of heavy drinking, foul language and political deal-making.

"What we saw here, and what the jury convicted Mr. Kott of, was an unusual and extraordinary, outrageous, egregious pattern of self-serving conduct," said prosecutor Nicholas Marsh, of the U.S. Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, D.C.

FBI - Stevens-1521

But defense lawyer Jim Wendt argued that Kott is a hardworking man with an exceptional character who served 14 years in the state House and 22 years in the U.S. Air Force.

"It's not the mere fact that he's been a public servant for so many years. It's the fact that he's a thoroughly decent human being that will treat the garbageman and the governor the same. He treats them fairly," Wendt said.

In all, the bribes to Kott were worth nearly $30,000, counting the $2,750 for the poll paid for by Veco and an estimated $18,000 that Kott could have made lobbying during one legislative session for Veco, Sedwick determined.

Former Veco chief executive Bill Allen and a former company vice president, Rick Smith, pleaded guilty to bribing Kott and other lawmakers, and are cooperating with the government. Both testified against Kott.

194A-AN-13620-M;633

The judge said he didn't know whether the tax rate Veco so fiercely wanted was best for Alaska. Allen testified oil producers wanted to lock in a rate before they would move forward with a natural gas pipeline. Allen was motivated by greed, the judge said. Veco could have made millions off a pipeline contract. The company was sold in September.

Sedwick said he also had to consider the five-year sentence handed to former Rep. Tom Anderson. Anderson was convicted of taking bribes that he thought were from a private prison company.

"I think Mr. Marsh is correct in pointing out that although Mr. Anderson's conduct was bad, Mr. Kott's was even worse," Sedwick said.

Kott, a Republican from Eagle River, was someone with real stature, a former House speaker, a leader whom others turned to for advice, Sedwick said. The judge said Anderson struck him "as basically a lightweight."

Kott must serve more time, the judge said.

Assistant U.S. attorney James Goeke said that Kott lied on the stand about several matters, including $7,993 paid by Allen to Kott's hardwood flooring business. According to Allen and Smith's testimony, and to surveillance recordings, they came up with a phony invoice and paid the money to free up Kott's son in the summer of 2006 to work on his father's re-election campaign. Kott lost in the Republican primary.

Kott concocted stories that the work was actually going to be done at Smith's house or maybe Allen's, Goeke told the judge. He co-opted his son and girlfriend to testify that way, too, prosecutors said.

Wendt said Kott did not lie about anything material to the case and could have done the work.

Sedwick said Kott knew what he was doing when he took the stand.

"Having listened to that testimony, I am utterly convinced that at the trial, with respect to this payment, Mr. Kott gave false testimony under oath," Sedwick said.

Kott wasn't confused, the judge said. He didn't have a bad memory.

"The testimony appeared to me to have been carefully crafted to deceive the jury," Sedwick said.

In court Friday, Kott spoke for less than 80 seconds, reading from something he wrote ahead of time. His voice shook. He sounded nervous.

He said he was sorry.

"However, all my actions that I took while a member of the Legislature on the House floor, I took and truly felt that I did so in the best interests for the citizens of Alaska and the state of Alaska," Kott told the judge.

He appeared to refer to the drinking and scheming shown on FBI surveillance recordings from Suite 604 of the Baranof Hotel, Veco's Juneau's headquarters.

"For my statements, my association, my behavior away from the floor of the Legislature, I do deeply regret and apologize," Kott said.

He said he hopes people's opinion of him softens over time.

"It's always been my goal to be involved with bringing out the great potential of this state and the people, and I believe I'll continue to do so to the best of my ability," he said.

Kott did not specifically admit any guilt. He still may appeal, Wendt said after the hearing.

Kott's attorney had argued that he should receive 33 months in prison -- a little less than three years -- while prosecutors had sought at least 10 years before Friday's hearing.

FBI - Stevens-1522

The judge did not set a date for Kott to report to prison. He said he'll recommend that Kott serve his time at the federal prison in Sheridan, Ore., the same place where Anderson is incarcerated. With time off for good behavior, Kott will serve more than five years.

"Disappointed," was all Kott would say as he left the courtroom, his daughter Pamela and his lawyer by his side. His son, his brother, his girlfriend and other friends all came to his sentencing.

A crush of reporters surrounded Kott as he walked away in the dark morning light on a slippery downtown sidewalk.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

SENTENCING: Hear Judge John Sedwick discuss Kott's perjury, and listen to Kott's apology.

adn.com/fbi

LETTERS: Read the 29 letters written in support of Kott.

adn.com/politics

Already sentenced

Former Rep. Tom Anderson:

Five years in prison after conviction in July for bribery, extortion, conspiracy and money laundering. Began serving sentence on Monday at Sheridan, Ore., federal prison.

Former lobbyist Bill Bobrick: Five months in prison plus five months' house arrest after pleading guilty to conspiracy for bribing Anderson. He hasn't yet begun serving the sentence. He cooperated with authorities and testified against Anderson.

Awaiting sentencing

Former Rep. Vic Kohring: Convicted in October of bribery, conspiracy and attempted extortion. Sentencing is scheduled for February.

Former Veco CEO Bill Allen: Pleaded guilty in May to bribery and conspiracy for his dealings with five state legislators. Is cooperating with authorities; no sentencing date scheduled.

Former Veco vice president Rick Smith: Pleaded guilty in May to bribery and conspiracy for his dealings with five state legislators. Is cooperating with authorities; no sentencing date scheduled.

Awaiting trial

Former Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch: Charged with bribery, attempted extortion, conspiracy and mail fraud. Was originally scheduled to be tried with Kott. The case was split off, and no trial date has been set while an appeal is considered over what evidence can be used.

FBI - Stevens-1523

What's next?

Authorities will only say that the federal investigation into corruption in Alaska politics continues.

LOAD-DATE: December 10, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: MARC LESTER / Anchorage Daily News
Former state Rep. Pete Kott, flanked by his daughter Pamela and attorney Jim Wendt, leaves the Federal Courthouse in Anchorage on Friday after being sentenced to six years in federal prison. "Disappointed," was all he said as he left.

A crowd of reporters and others follows Pete Kott as he walks away from the Federal Courthouse in downtown Anchorage on Friday. Kott was sentenced to six years in federal prison and fined $10,000 for his conviction on bribery and other corruption charges.
Kott apologized for "my statements, my association, my behavior away from the floor of the Legislature."

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1524

NewsBank, Inc. America's Newspapers

Paper: Anchorage Daily News (AK)
Title: State watchdog agency wants $130,000 increase - APOC: After scandals in Juneau and small budgets, more staffing is sought.
Date: December 14, 2007

The Alaska Public Offices Commission is looking for an additional $130,000 in the coming year as it tries to beef up its role as the state's watchdog over politicians.

APOC executive director Brooke Miles said she thinks legislators recognize the need to give more money to the agency as the corruption scandal involving bribed lawmakers continues to unfold.

"In response to the question of, 'why didn't APOC do something?' " Miles said.

There's a lot of criticism over the fact it's taken the FBI to come in and clean up Alaska's mess. It's not APOC's fault, defenders of the campaign finance agency say.

"Their staff has been cut to the bone and they need some help," said Anchorage Democratic Rep. Bob Buch.

It was just four years ago that then-Gov. Frank Murkowski tried to get rid of APOC. Times have changed, though, and APOC is almost sure to get the money it wants.

"I just think that with everything that's happened down in Juneau, I think they could catch things in the early stage before they progress or mature into a federal offense," said Anchorage Republican Rep. Kevin Meyer.

Meyer is co-chair of the House Finance Committee. He said $130,000 is a modest amount for what APOC can do with it.

The agency's annual budget is around a million dollars. The Legislature this spring funded a single investigator for the agency. Miles said the additional $130,000 would allow contract work or a temporary staffing increase.

That could include maybe another investigator, paralegal or hearing officer. The agency could need help with the upcoming campaign season, Miles said.

Miles said an obstacle to hiring another permanent investigator is lack of space in the agency's office on Northern Lights Boulevard.

APOC's investigator, Jeff Berliner, is currently investigating polls that Veco Corp. illegally purchased polling for state political candidates. Former Veco executives have admitting bribing legislators in an attempt to keep oil taxes low last year.

"I really can't tell you anything, except that it's ongoing and the commission is using all the tools at its disposal, including subpoena powers," Miles said.

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him at 257-4344.

Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

Author: SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com Staff
Section: Alaska
Page: B1
Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

FBI - Stevens-1525

194A-AN-13620-M;634

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

December 19, 2007 Wednesday
FINAL EDITION

Senator wants earmark inquiry;
FLORIDA: Alaska's Don Young headed panel during fund shift.

BYLINE: By ERIKA BOLSTAD ebolstad@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 1120 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON -

An Oklahoma senator who has been a strident critic of the "earmark favor factory" has asked for an investigation into how money was set aside to study a highway interchange next to environmentally sensitive land in Florida..

The $10 million earmark was slipped into the 2005 highway spending bill, a $286 billion behemoth overseen by U.S. Rep. Don Young, R-Alaska, then chairman of the House Transportation Committee.

Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., has asked for an investigative panel with subpoena power to determine who placed the earmark for the so-called Coconut Road study into the highway bill.

"Those who perverted and distorted the explicit will of the U.S. Congress must also be held to account," Coburn said in a letter. "A full investigation into this matter is necessary to ensure that this does not happen again."

The earmark first drew the attention of Florida road planners when they learned they had received $10 million for the study even though it wasn't one of their priorities. But they had sought $10 million to widen Interstate 75 in Lee County, Fla.

The language in this original earmark was changed after Congress voted on it, erasing I-75 and adding the words "Coconut Road" as it was being cleaned up in the bill-enrollment process before being sent to President Bush.

That fact, uncovered by a community activist in Florida nearly two years after the highway bill was signed into law, has infuriated Coburn and congressional watchdogs, who see it as a breach of the public's trust in the legislative process. Congress voted for one thing, they point out, but the bill signed by the president said something else.

"For Dr. Coburn it's not necessarily about Coconut Road," said his spokesman, John Hart. "What happened was an assault against constitutional authority. It begs the question: Is there a secretive branch of government that can alter bills?"

Young has long maintained that the interchange was asked for by Florida Gulf Coast University, and has said that he earmarked the money because residents told him they wanted it in 2005 when he attended one of their community transportation meetings with a local congressman, Rep. Connie Mack, R-Fla.

Tuesday, Young's spokesman Meredith Kenny said only that Young "has consistently welcomed an open earmark process." Kenny pointed to an October article in a Capitol Hill newspaper that suggested the legislative change was made by Mack, then a junior Republican on the Transportation Committee.

But many, including the FBI, have questioned the timing of the earmark, one of 6,371 approved on Young's watch.

DONATIONS TO YOUNG

FBI - Stevens-1526

194A-AN-13620-M; 635

The FBI interviewed at least one community activist who said he thought a Coconut Road interchange would open for development environmentally sensitive land owned by Daniel Aronoff, a friend of Young's who organized a March 2005 fundraiser in Bonita Springs, Fla., for the congressman.

"Almost everybody here who's been involved in this kind of stuff reached the conclusion that it was the contributions and the funding that turned out to benefit Aronoff," said Dan Eslick, a community activist who helped draw attention to the unusual earmark and outlined what he knew to an FBI agent.

In the two weeks before and after the Coconut Road earmark was inserted in the spending bill, Young's campaign and political action committee collected contributions from Aronoff, his lobbyist and other Florida business executives. The Florida donations, mainly from real estate interests, totaled more than $40,000.

A McClatchy Newspapers investigation in November documented Young's extensive travels as Transportation Committee chairman. Young amassed $6.5 million in political contributions from 2001 to 2005. With weak opponents during his re-election bids, he tapped his campaign funds to travel the country to meet with developers and view their proposed highway projects.

Mack's office did not return phone calls, but the Florida Republican has said that he will work to get the money shifted from the Coconut Road study and back toward the original freeway widening project.

Until he gets at least the promise of an investigation into the earmark change, Coburn will continue his hold on what's known as "glitch bill," legislation that fixes technical problems in the 2005 highway bill, Hart said. Coburn requested the investigation in a letter to the Senate minority leader explaining his hold on the glitch bill.

Individual U.S. senators have the power to hold up legislation. But the glitch bill has already passed the House and many senators will want to see it move forward in the Senate, because they have local projects dependent on money in it. One of the fixes in it shifts money back to the I-75 widening project -- and away from the Coconut Road study.

OTHER COMPLAINTS

Coburn, long a crusader against wasteful spending, has a history of singling out Alaska projects championed by Young and U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

After Hurricane Katrina, Coburn suggested that Congress shift $452 million for Alaska bridge projects toward rebuilding an Interstate 10 bridge in Louisiana.

It drew a dramatic outcry from Stevens, who threatened on the Senate floor to quit his job and vowed that if his colleagues passed the bill, "I will be taken out of here on a stretcher." Coburn was able to muster only 15 votes in the face of Stevens' threats.

But Tuesday, Coburn's spokesman pointed out that even though the Oklahoma senator was unsuccessful at removing money for the bridges, the national uproar over the projects was such that this year Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin cancelled plans for the bridge from Ketchikan to Gravina Island.

Coburn expects to be successful with solving the Coconut Road mystery too, Hart said.

The Coconut Road earmark has already drawn calls for an investigation by one of Young's 2008 political opponents, Democrat Diane Benson, who filed a complaint with the House committee on Standards of Official Conduct.

It also drew an ethics complaint from Taxpayers for Common Sense, a federal budget watchdog group based in Washington, D.C.

It was the nonpartisan organization's first-ever ethics complaint, said the group's vice president, Steve Ellis, but they felt it was an important move because their organization had particular interest in the highway bill. Investigators with Taxpayers for Common Sense spent thousands of hours analyzing wasteful spending in it and are largely credited with coining the term "bridge to nowhere."

"We need to get to the bottom of this and hold people accountable," Ellis said.

Find Erika Bolstad online at adn.com/contact/ebolstad or call her in Washington, D.C., at 202-383-6104.

READ Sen. Coburn's letter about the Coconut Road provision at adn.com/news

LOAD-DATE: December 19, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1528

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

December 19, 2007 Wednesday
FINAL EDITION

APOC decides McGuire earned consulting fees;
PROVIDENCE: Evidence shows that she produced work for the $10,500 that she was paid.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A3

LENGTH: 1094 words

A claim that Anchorage state Sen. Lesil McGuire did nothing to earn $10,500 in consulting fees from Providence Health System four years ago was unanimously dismissed Tuesday by the Alaska Public Offices Commission.

But a commission member believes the work done by McGuire, R-Anchorage, amounted to lobbying the state for Providence and wasn't appropriate for a legislator.

"To me this is conflict, conflict, conflict. Sen. McGuire should not have engaged in developing a lobbying strategy," said commission member Elizabeth Hickerson, a retired state attorney and a Democrat.

Documents released as part of the APOC investigation show McGuire's consulting job included working with Providence's lobbyist, former Rep. Eldon Mulder, on how the hospital could get money from the state as part of a deal involving the old Alaska Psychiatric Institute.

Hickerson wanted the commission to refer the matter immediately to the Legislative Ethics Committee to consider. But she was outvoted 3 to 2. The commissioners instead voted to postpone any possible referral until their February meeting. APOC staff is to look into it in the meantime.

Assistant attorney general Jan De- Young told the commission that she did not think what McGuire did counts as lobbying under the law. State legislators are not allowed under law to act as lobbyists.

McGuire's lawyer, Charles Dunnagan, was visibly frustrated with the way things went Tuesday. He said with some heat after Hickerson's call to refer it to the Legislative Ethic Committee that APOC was "out of line." Dunnagan said the commission shouldn't suddenly just charge off on a brand new probe of McGuire after spending months on an investigation that cleared her of the previous allegations.

He said McGuire did no lobbying and he does not see conflict of interest in what she did.

FBI - Stevens-1529

"I think it is exceedingly unfair," he said.

SCOPE OF WORK

Providence Health System in Alaska gave McGuire a $10,500 contract in October 2003 for three months of consulting work.

McGuire, who was in the state House at the time, was hired to help the hospital acquire the Alaska Psychiatric Institute.

Her contract said she would develop a plan "that requires the state of Alaska to release the existing Alaska Psychiatric Institute to Providence and pay Providence the sum of $7 million for said structure."

194A-AN-13620-M;636

Providence would in return release the state from its obligation to demolish the building, according to McGuire's contract with the hospital.

That all came to pass about a year after McGuire's contract ended.

Providence had purchased the old API land from the Alaska Mental Health Trust Authority for $8 million. The state was supposed to demolish and remove the old asbestos-filled building at a cost estimated between $11 million and $14 million.

But Providence decided the building would be salvageable as administrative offices once the asbestos was removed. The state health and resources departments then reached a written agreement in December of 2004 to pay Providence $7 million to waive the state's liability to take out the asbestos and demolish the building.

The Public Offices Commission started investigating McGuire's contract this summer. The complaint came from Ray Metcalfe, who is now a Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate, and who lost to McGuire in a 2000 race for the state House.

Metcalfe's original complaint claimed McGuire kept changing her description of what she did for the money.

The commission, after hearing from Metcalfe, expanded the investigation to whether McGuire actually did any work to earn it.

APOC investigator Jeff Berliner found no evidence McGuire was guilty of either accusation. He said there is substantial evidence, including sworn statements, that she produced work for Providence.

STRATEGY

But commission member Hickerson said a McGuire "work product" released as part of the investigation show that she was paid to help create a strategy for influencing state officials and legislators.

She's talking about a December 2003 memo from McGuire to Providence chief executive Al Parrish. Providence submitted it to APOC as McGuire's work product. In it, McGuire outlines strategies for negotiating a cash payment from the state in return for relieving the state of its liability to remove the old asbestos-laden API building.

"As the state of Alaska is facing recurring financial difficulties, negotiating for a lump sum cash payment will be difficult, at best," her memo said.

The memo gives several suggestions for how Providence can "maximize opportunity for resolution." That includes engaging the state health department to find common interest. The memo also said then-state health commissioner Joel Gilbertson was very close to the governor at the time, Frank Murkowski. So whatever conclusion Gilbertson reached would likely win favor, the memo said.

Gilbertson ended up leaving the state in September of 2005 for a job with Providence.

APOC said McGuire worked on the memo with Providence lobbyist Mulder, a former Republican lawmaker from Anchorage, as well as Laurie Herman, regional government affairs director for the hospital.

An APOC report said Mulder told the investigator that he met with McGuire twice to discuss her work and that he and Herman passed drafts back and forth until everyone was satisfied and McGuire signed off on it. Mulder described his role as "basically clean-up with Lesil,'" according to the report prepared by APOC staff members.

DeYoung, the assistant attorney general, said she didn't think what McGuire did was lobbying because there's no evidence McGuire had communication with lawmakers on behalf of her client.

McGuire's lawyer, Dunnagan, agreed, and said he did not see a conflict of interest,

"I don't think it's a conflict for legislators to have business interests or be involved with things that have a relationship to government," he told the commission.

Dunnagan said it happens all the time in a citizen Legislature. He gave the example of commercial fishermen who are also members of the Legislature.

Metcalfe, who filed multiple complaints with the commission against former Sen. Ben Stevens over his consulting contracts said a sitting legislator being paid to strategize equals bribery.

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him at 257-4344.

INSIDE

DON YOUNG: A U.S. senator wants to find out who slipped a $10 million earmark into a huge highway bill overseen by Alaska's congressman.

Page B-1

ALL POLITICS, ALL THE TIME: Read our Alaska politics blog at

adn.com/alaskapolitics

LOAD-DATE: December 19, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: State Sen. Lesil McGuire, R-Anchorage

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1531

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page | Close Window

Did oil producers know about Veco illegal acts?

PRODUCTION TAX: What the "big boys" knew about an effort to alter legislation is questioned.

By TOM KIZZIA
tkizzia@adn.com

(Published: October 2, 2007)

On June 6 of last year, with the state House of Representatives poised to adopt a new 23.5-percent tax on oil production, Veco Corp. chief Bill Allen placed a phone call to the president of Conoco Phillips Alaska. The FBI was listening in.

"If there's any way we can get this thing stopped, that's the best possible outcome," says Conoco Alaska president Jim Bowles.

"It's just between me and you, but I got Pete Kott and Ben doing it," Allen tells the oil company executive.

Bowles doesn't ask how or why. Instead he stresses the importance of getting the House to adjourn. Later in the call, Allen returns to Kott and Ben Stevens, who at the time was president of the state Senate, and boasts they planned to force adjournment in a way that can't be traced.

"Well, that's ideal," says Bowles.

There's nothing in the brief conversation to indicate that Conoco knew Allen had paid bribes to Kott and Stevens, as Allen admitted doing in Kott's corruption trial in federal court in September.

But the wiretap recording of the call, along with other audio and video evidence presented by prosecutors in the Kott case, has raised new questions about oil company lobbying in last year's tax debate, drawing attention to relations between Alaska's major oil producers, Veco and the still-unfolding federal corruption investigation.

Was Veco lobbying on its own behalf or under instructions from BP, Conoco and Exxon -- "the three big boys," as anxious Veco officials call them on surveillance tapes? Did Veco have a long-standing agreement by which it received benefits for its political work, such as North Slope oil field service contracts?

And did the companies, whose officers and lobbyists worked side-by-side with Veco on the big oil-tax and natural gas-

Former VECO Corp. president Bill Allen, right, talks with then-Senate Finance Committee chairman Rick Halford in May 1996 in Juneau. Halford said Veco's role in energy legislation was evident to most lawmakers. "Some people used to say Bill Allen was their designated hostage, to be tortured when the majors needed something." (AL GRILLO / Associated Press archive 1996)

Jim Bowles is president of Conoco Phillips Alaska, Inc. ( )

FBI - Stevens-1532

194A-AN-13620-M; 637

275K501.0th

pipeline bills of 2006, know how far the company was willing to go?

SUSPICIONS AROUSED

Allen and another former Veco executive, Rick Smith, have pleaded guilty to conspiracy, bribery and extortion, and a jury convicted Kott on those charges last week. Since the conviction, local blogs and talk radio have been filled with questions about how much the oil producers knew.

Democratic legislators jumped into the fray Friday, calling on oil company chiefs to spell out any "coordination" between their companies and Veco during the oil tax debate. They said it is important to clear the air before the Legislature convenes in special session Oct. 18 for another look at the oil tax system. Republican Gov. Sarah Palin has said the tax eventually passed last year was "tainted" by corruption.

Fred Dyson (Seanna O'Sullivan/AP)

Rep. Les Gara and Sen. Hollis French, both Anchorage Democrats, wrote oil companies a letter asking if their representatives "ever discussed whether Veco would seek to influence legislators with campaign donations or other payments." They cited evidence from the Kott trial.

"How can you not ask the question with that evidence? Was Bill Allen their henchman?" said French.

In recent statements, all three oil companies denied knowing anything about the bribes or other crimes. Exxon, BP and Conoco said they have been told their employees are not under suspicion or being investigated.

"BP had no knowledge of any illegal activity that was taking place, and we condemn the behavior in the strongest possible terms," said BP Alaska spokesman Daren Beaudo .

Conoco Phillips Alaska president Bowles has declined to answer questions about Veco. His company released a statement that Bowles issued to company employees in the wake of the evidence presented in the Kott trial, in which he said he had no knowledge of illegal activities.

FBI - Stevens-1533

"Unfortunately, the government's corruption investigation of certain legislators and several former executives of Veco has cast a pall on the image of our company and our industry in Alaska," Bowles said. "It is impossible to prevent false rumors and innuendo, but times like these reinforce the importance of our absolute commitment to open, honest and ethical behavior."

As to any long-standing agreements with Veco about political influence, the companies declined to say anything.

CAMPAIGN MONEY TRAIL

Examination of the FBI recordings and trial testimony available so far in the federal corruption investigation reveals no clear evidence that the oil companies knew anything about bribed legislators.

That's not to say the record is complete, however. Recordings played for jurors in the Kott trial, relating specifically to the charges against him, add up to only a few hours. FBI officials say total intercepts in the Veco investigation, which covers other political figures as well, include more than 17,000 phone calls and at least 400 hours of video recordings from the company's bugged suite at Juneau's Baranof Hotel.

Veco, which started as an oil field services company, has been a prominent political player in Alaska for two decades.

The company has long been the biggest source of campaign money in Alaska, both on the state and federal levels. In the three campaign cycles before the 2006 tax fight, for instance, Veco officials donated five times as much money as officials from Conoco, Exxon and BP combined. Veco multiplied its influence by holding political fundraisers and bringing in checks from other sources.

Much of this money, Allen now admits, was reimbursed illegally to Veco officials through a special bonus program, in which the company provided executives money to give to favored candidates.

In the past, Veco officials said they were involved in campaigns because they wanted to see pro-development candidates elected. Allen offered a second reason for raising Veco's profile, when he testified in Kott's trial: growing competition for oil field work from Native corporations. And aside from its involvement in campaigns, Veco for many years had been a heavy, visible lobbying presence in Juneau, with Allen sometimes flying in to personally lobby lawmakers on bills affecting the oil industry.

But some dispute that Veco became a major political player strictly on its own.

Two former legislators told the Daily News in interviews last week they'd been told by Allen he answered to the major producers as he lobbied the Legislature -- at least in the years before 2006.

"There may be, and I think there is, culpability on the part of the producers," said Jim Whitaker, a former Republican state representative who is now the Fairbanks North Star Borough mayor and a proponent of a gas pipeline opposed by the major producers. "They were certainly aware of much of what Veco is doing. These are not naive people."

Whitaker recalled a conversation with Allen around 2000 about prospects for a gas pipeline.

"What Bill Allen told me in the course of that conversation was that the only person he listened to in regard to the gas line was the then-president of Arco Alaska, Kevin Meyers," Whitaker said. "He was the person that told Bill what to do regarding gas line issues."

FBI - Stevens-1534

Rick Halford, a longtime Eagle River lawmaker and former Senate president, said Veco's role was evident to most legislators.

"Everybody knew that Veco was representing the majors, but they were never saying it directly," Halford said.

Halford said he considered Allen a personal friend after taking him on a moose hunt, even though they clashed increasingly over oil policies. He recalled a meeting in his Senate office after BP proposed to buy Arco. Halford was a leader in the legislative opposition to the purchase.

"I can remember him telling me directly how much pressure BP was putting on him," Halford said. "Some people used to say Bill Allen was their designated hostage, to be tortured when the majors needed something. They tortured him with the contracts he needed to keep his people working."

Another perspective in circulation is that, by 2006, BP had come to view Veco with apprehension. Sen. Fred Dyson, R-Eagle River, said he heard as much from then-BP Alaska president Steve Marshall in a Capitol parking lot conversation during the oil-tax session. Dyson said he asked about the common perception in Juneau that Allen was working for the oil producers.

"He kind of scares us," Dyson recalled Marshall as saying. "We worry he'll screw up someday." The impression of Allen as chief political fixer was one promoted by Allen himself, the BP chief told him.

Dyson, who recently disclosed that he was working with the FBI during the 2006 sessions, added that he had no way of knowing whether Marshall's depiction was accurate, or an attempt to preserve a safe distance from Veco.

PRESSURE IN JUNEAU

In 2006, with oil taxes and a gas line deal looming, the oil companies hired additional lobbyists and sent officials to Juneau. Exxon reported spending more than $500,000 that year on lobbyists, Conoco $750,000, BP $1.2 million.

One picture that emerges from the FBI recordings is of Allen and Veco vice president Rick Smith, wound tight with anxiety as they weighed how their actions might be perceived by the oil companies. Plotting votes on the oil tax, they seem afraid to budge from the 20 percent tax to which they are somehow bound -- even when Kott, in May, says it would be good damage-control strategy to move higher.

"Pete, you might be right as rain, but how do we make a living?" Smith asked the legislator. Smith called their inability to move "a huge predicament."

The Veco bosses expressed resentment when other industry lobbyists take credit for their access to key legislators on Capitol Hill.

FBI - Stevens-1535

"They forget how they got introduced to them," Smith lamented in May.

"I think ol' Jim Bowles will remember me," Allen said. "That's all I care about, is ol' Jim Bowles."

Veco was pushing for a long-term tax deal on oil, which the major oil producers described as an essential step toward winning their support for a gas line.

A gloomy late-night conversation between Allen and Smith over drinks in the Baranof suite back in March seemed to set the tone for the months to come.

"Me and you, we have to f---ing produce. Right now," Allen says.

"Have to get dirty and have to produce. I understand that," Smith says.

"But our clients have to know what we've done," Allen says. "... Because it's so important to us. Your life and my life. Whatever the f--- I got to do, I'll do it. Right here, we've got to produce."

The recordings are revealing in subtle ways too, with Allen being deferential to Bowles just as Kott was deferential to Allen. In both relationships, the man higher up the food chain directs the conversation, the lower one listens for cues, seems to crave recognition and makes sure to claim credit.

Two days after his conversation with Bowles, the Legislature adjourned its first special session without a bill and Allen called the oil company president back. He left a voice mail message, mentioning Kott and Stevens again. "Remember what I told you," Allen said. "We got it done."

CASHING POLITICAL FAVORS

Critics, including French and Gara, have homed in on Allen's comments to Bowles about leaving no trace of who was responsible for killing the bill.

"There were rumors around the session that Veco was involved in vote-buying," Gara said. "Why would Jim Bowles be concerned about a legislator leaving fingerprints on a bill? That is an indication that somebody knew something was going on."

The secret recordings also turn up evidence of how political influence was seen by Veco as a kind of currency. In March, Smith received a call from Kott, who was in Washington, D.C., having drinks with Marathon Oil's director of government affairs. Marathon, with oil and gas operations in Cook Inlet, was concerned about how new oil taxes aimed at the North Slope would affect them.

"We've got to take care of Marathon in this deal. We can carve them out something," Kott says.

Smith evades the subject at first, then sternly tells Kott not to promise anything to Marathon.

"We went to bat for those guys in Cook Inlet, and they dumped us on the maintenance contract," Smith says.

Kott seems to snap to attention. "All right, you know where my allegiance is," he says.

As the basis for a criminal charge of wire fraud, the recording fell flat. Kott later voted in favor of a Cook Inlet deal helping Marathon, and this was the one count on which the jury acquitted Kott. But it seems revealing as a window into Veco's motivations and the dog-yard hierarchies among the companies.

FBI - Stevens-1536

OIL COMPANIES RESPOND

Exxon responded tersely to inquiries about the investigation with a written response that said only, "To the best of our knowledge, ExxonMobil is not the subject of any inquiry and we have received no indication from the government or other sources to suggest any actions by company employees were unlawful."

Exxon noted that Veco had contracts with the company cleaning up after the Exxon Valdez oil spill and on oil projects in Sakhalin, Russia. The company declined to answer specific questions.

BP was more forthcoming. Beaudo, the company spokesman, said federal investigators have been in touch with BP Alaska employees as part of the broader inquiry into Veco. Federal officials have indicated that no one at BP is under investigation or suspicion, he said.

"There has been a level of contact as part of the investigation," he said. "Any further detail about the extent of those contacts is best left to the investigating agencies."

As operator of most North Slope oil fields, BP had "significant" contracts with Veco, said Beaudo. Their lobbyists talked, and BP's name appears to have been on Veco's lips frequently. But the company had not asked Veco to do anything in Juneau on its behalf regarding the 2006 oil tax, he said.

"We were not asking others to carry our water," Beaudo said. "No one should be surprised that there was an exchange of information on an important policy position like this."

Beaudo declined to answer questions about pre-2006 relationships between his company and Veco regarding campaign finance and lobbying.

Contact reporter Tom Kizzia at adn.com/contact/tkizzia or call him in Homer at 1-907-235-4244.

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1537

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page | Close Window

Donations from Veco employees fall from favor

ALASKA: Sens. Murkowski, Stevens divest some of what they got; Rep. Young doesn't.

By MATT APUZZO
The Associated Press

(Published: October 5, 2007)

WASHINGTON -- For years, while Veco Corp. was flush with oil profits and in a giving mood, Capitol Hill politicians happily accepted hundreds of thousands of dollars in campaign donations from employees of the oil contractor.

But now that two Alaska lawmakers are under FBI scrutiny as part of a growing corruption scandal involving Veco, the friendly feelings have faded and some in Washington are shedding the campaign donations connected with the company.

Veco was the most generous source of support for Alaska's current congressional delegation. Company employees donated more than $360,000 to candidates and their political action committees since 1993

Sen. Lisa Murkowski donated to charity the $8,000 her campaign received from convicted Veco executives Bill Allen and Rick Smith but not the $33,000 or so it got from other employees.

Sen. Ted Stevens donated to a veterans charity $18,000 his campaign received from Allen and Smith, said Timothy McKeever, Stevens' campaign treasurer. The senator plans to keep more than $50,000 from Veco employees.

Alaska Rep. Don Young, who has also come under scrutiny in the case, has made no move to return more than $180,000 in donations from Veco employees, including more than $34,000 from Allen and Smith.

Veco was generous far beyond Alaska: President Bush's campaign received more than $22,000, including $5,500 from Allen and Smith. Sen. Daniel K. Inouye, D-Hawaii, received thousands of dollars for his campaign. So did several Republicans senators including Richard Burr of North Carolina, Norm Coleman of Minnesota, Jim DeMint of South Carolina, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, John Sununu of New Hampshire, John Thune of South Dakota, Kit Bond of Missouri, David Vitter of Louisiana, George Voinovich of Ohio and John Ensign of Nevada.

Even Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., an outspoken critic of the Alaska delegation's ability to steer money to the state without going through the normal appropriations process, received Veco-linked donations.

Lawmakers are divided on how to handle the money.

Bond's office said the senator recently donated about $9,000 to charity. That included not just the contributions received from Allen and Smith, but also donations from their wives and Veco employees.

DeMint spokesman Wesley Denton said the senator was "appalled to learn about these admitted

FBI - Stevens-1538

282KS04-04th 194A-AN-13620-M:638

crooks" and would donate all Veco contributions to the Citizens Against Government Waste, a nonprofit group he said is "dedicated to shining a light on this type of government corruption."

The National Republican Senatorial Committee said it donated to charity about $25,000 it got directly from Allen. Spokeswoman Rebecca Fisher said Thursday the committee plans to return or donate an additional $50,000 from Veco employees.

Thune's spokesman said Wednesday the senator would donate to charity $2,000 the campaign received from Allen and Smith because they pleaded guilty, but will keep $4,000 from other Veco employees. Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev., said he donated to charity $500 his campaign received from Allen.

Inouye, a close friend of Stevens, also plans to keep $13,000 in Veco-related contributions. Coleman's office said his campaign books were closed and the money was already spent.

Coburn, too, plans to keep his donations. Spokesman John Hart said the senator "has more than demonstrated his independence on spending, particularly related to projects in Alaska."

Others did not return messages asking about the contributions.

Where the bucks stopped

A look at campaign contributions by Veco Corp. to elected officials in Washington since 1993. The list does not include donations to political action committees.

- Rep. Don Young, R-Alaska: $180,630
- Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska: $70,500
- Sen. Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska: $41,250
- President Bush: $22,050
- Sen. Frank Murkowski, R-Alaska $17,000
- Sen. Daniel K. Inouye, D-Hawaii: $13,000
- Sen. Richard Burr, R-N.C.: $6,000
- Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla. : $6,000
- Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn.: $6,000
- Sen. Jim DeMint, R-S.C.: $6,000
- Sen. John Sununu, R-N.H.: $6,000
- Sen. John Thune, R-S.D.: $6,000
- Sen. David Vitter, R-La.: $6,000

FBI - Stevens-1539

- Sen. Kit Bond, R-Mo.: $5,016.
- Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa.: $4,000
- Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio: $3,750
- Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev.: $2,000
- Rep. Steve Pearce R-N.M.: $1,000
- Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev.: $1,000.
- Rep. Dennis Rehberg, R-Mont.: $1,000
- Rep. Barbara Cubin, R-Wyo.: $500
- Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho: $200

Source: Center for Responsive Politics.

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1540

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Anderson admits he broke law, violated trust

COURT MEMO: Ex-lawmaker facing 6 years for corruption concedes role, seeks leniency.

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com

(Published: October 9, 2007)

Three months after a federal jury convicted him of seven felonies including bribery, former state Rep. Tom Anderson acknowledges that he broke the law, violated the public trust and must be punished.

Anderson didn't testify during the 10-day trial this summer. But he fought the charges, and until now maintained publicly that he was innocent.

His sentencing hearing is set for Oct. 15 before U.S. District Judge John Sedwick. A pre-sentence investigation report recommends he serve five to six years.

In a memo filed with the court on Monday, Anderson's lawyer says he is seeking "leniency, compassion and mercy." Except for the circumstances in the corruption case, Anderson has been a "tireless and selfless representative and advocate for the people of the State of Alaska," wrote defense lawyer Paul Stockler.

Anderson, a Republican who represented East Anchorage for two terms, shouldn't be sentenced to any more than two years and nine months, his lawyer argues.

"I accept full responsibility for the choices I've made and the damage I've done and the damage here transcends the personal loss and pain that has been suffered by my wife and family," Anderson says in the sentencing memorandum. His wife is state Sen. Lesil McGuire, and his father is former director of Alaska State Troopers.

Anderson was convicted of participating in a scheme in 2004 and 2005 with former Cornell Cos. lobbyist Bill Bobrick and consultant Frank Prewitt in which payments were funneled to him in exchange for his pushing the company's interests. Prewitt was working undercover for the FBI, and Cornell was unaware of the scheme, the U.S. Justice Department has said.

"Mr. Anderson believed at the time, that his actions were not in any way unlawful," Stockler says in the 47-page sentencing memorandum.

"Rather, he erroneously and indeed naively thought that he could properly serve two masters: the people of the State of Alaska, and a private consulting client seeking to capitalize on access to a legislator."

Anderson now realizes no one could do that, his lawyer says.

By the time the conspiracy began, Anderson was friends with Bobrick. Their families socialized often, from "informal game nights" to outings at the Alaska Center for the Performing Arts. "Over time, Mr. Anderson permitted that personal relationship to cloud his moral and ethical judgment," Stockler wrote.

FBI - Stevens-1541

282KS02.0th 194A-AN-13620-M:639

Anderson has no prior criminal convictions, his lawyer wrote.

Prosecutors have not yet filed their sentencing memorandum but will be seeking somewhere in the range of five years and three months to six years and six months, as recommended by the probation office in its report, Assistant U.S. Attorney Joe Bottini said Monday.

It's a little late for Anderson to acknowledge what he did wrong, Bottini said. He could have pleaded guilty.

"He put us through a trial," the prosecutor said. "In our view he is not entitled to any consideration for acceptance of responsibility."

Efforts to reach Anderson and Stockler were unsuccessful Monday.

But in the new court filing, Stockler wrote that there is no need to hand Anderson a long sentence to deter others. The story already is known to politicians, lobbyists and public officials.

"Moreover, they are aware that, as a result of his misdeeds, Tom Anderson was publicly disgraced, is now deeply in debt, and has lost his professional reputation, job, financial security, Alaska Permanent Fund dividend and right to vote."

The document also quotes letters of support from Anderson's friends, family and colleagues. One is from House Speaker John Harris, R-Valdez.

"Tom was a good legislator. In my opinion, he had the best interest of Alaskans on his moral and ethical compass," Harris is quoted as saying. Anderson got himself into a fix, Harris says, because he was "too naive or ill-prepared to recognize that politics and business are often comparable to a jungle."

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1542

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Kott seeks acquittal or chance in new trial

LAWYER ARGUES: Bill Allen was a friend; so-called bribes were gifts.

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com

(Published: October 10, 2007)

Former House Speaker Pete Kott wants a federal judge to throw out the jury decision last month to convict him of three corruption charges or, at the least, to grant him a new trial.

In a 12-page memorandum filed last week, Kott's lawyer argues that, among other reasons, Kott should be acquitted because former Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen was foremost his friend and anything Kott received was simply a gift.

A jury convicted Kott on Sept. 25 of bribery, conspiracy and extortion but acquitted him of wire fraud. During the 15-day trial, jurors heard dozens of secretly made recordings that prosecutors used to prove that Kott plotted with former Veco Corp. executives Allen and Rick Smith to push through a new oil tax rate favored by North Slope producers in 2006.

Allen, who along with Smith has pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy, testified in Kott's trial that oil producers wanted tax stability before they would commit to a natural gas pipeline. Veco could have made millions off the pipeline. The oil field services company was taken over by CH2M Hill right before Kott's trial.

Defense lawyer Jim Wendt argues in the new court filing that there was no evidence of a connection between the Petroleum Profits Tax and anything that Kott received.

"There was no nexus to the PPT legislation established and as a result any alleged benefits that the defendant received could have been construed as simply gifts from a benefactor that Pete Kott has known for years," Wendt says.

Wendt raises some of the same points the defense brought up before U.S. Judge John Sedwick during the trial, especially as it relates to how the jury was instructed to consider the evidence. The judge rejected the arguments at the time.

Prosecutors will respond in court, said Bryan Sierra, U.S. Justice Department spokesman. They haven't yet filed a response, but will soon, he said.

FBI - Stevens-1543

Testimony and other evidence at the trial showed that Kott received the promise of a job from Veco, $1,000 cash, a $7,993 check for an inflated flooring invoice, and a $2,750 political poll for his re-election bid.

Kott, a Republican who represented Eagle River in the House for seven terms, lost in the 2006 primary election.

The conspiracy conviction, Wendt argues, makes no sense on its face. To convict Kott of that charge, jurors were told they had to find that Kott, Allen and Smith conspired to commit at least one other crime, extortion, bribery or wire fraud. But Wendt asks how could Allen, Smith and Veco

283K503.0tn 194A-AN-13620-m;640 be both victims of extortion and part of the conspiracy to commit it?

"A 'victim' cannot 'conspire' to be extorted. It is inherently illogical," the defense lawyer says.

Prosecutors could have put on a case to show a bigger conspiracy including state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch and former Senate President Ben Stevens, but they didn't, Wendt says. Now they are stuck with a conspiracy limited to Kott and the Veco executives, the defense says.

Weyhrauch was to be tried alongside Kott but his case was split off so the government could appeal a ruling on evidence. Stevens has not been charged but both Allen and Smith testified that they pleaded guilty to bribing Stevens, along with Kott.

Still, if jurors thought that Kott received bribes as part of the conspiracy, that argument appears to deflate.

As to extortion itself, Wendt argues that the government should have had to prove Kott explicitly promised to do what Veco wanted in exchange for benefits, and that he did as promised -- quid pro quo. That's because much of what he received could be considered campaign contributions, and there's a different standard as to what amounts to extortion of campaign contributions, the defense says.

Both sides agree that the flooring invoice was inflated to get money to Kott's son, Peter M. Kott, so he could manage his father's 2006 re-election campaign, the defense filing says. And the poll obviously was for the campaign.

Still, in the trial, the defense tried to convince jurors the nearly $8,000 check was for future flooring work. That strategy didn't play well with jurors when witnesses gave different stories about the flooring work. Kott and his son have a hardwood flooring business.

At any rate, the defense says that the evidence showed that the money and other things were to reward Kott, not to influence him. He wasn't bribed, the defense maintains.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1544

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Kohring trial to stay in Alaska; judge denies venue change

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com

(Published: October 10, 2007)

Former state Rep. Vic Kohring was back in federal court Tuesday for a quick hearing on a new indictment handed up last week.

His trial is set to begin in less than two weeks, and it won't be moved to the Seattle area the way his lawyer wanted.

He is still charged with the same four felonies -- conspiracy, extortion, attempted extortion and bribery -- and is accused of pushing Veco Corp.'s interests in exchange for money and a job for a relative.

But the new document adds details. It alleges that Kohring fired an aide at the request of Veco executive Bill Allen, and it takes the conspiracy much further back, to 2002.

Kohring told Magistrate Judge John Roberts he would plead the same way as he did in May.

"Not guilty, your honor," Kohring said.

Prosecutors gave the judge and defense lawyer Wayne Ross a copy of the new indictment that listed changes in red.

Roberts said he saw nothing to justify delaying the trial, now set to begin Oct. 22 in Anchorage.

Ross, who represented Kohring at the hearing, said afterward that he thought the government added the allegations so close to trial because "I think they're worried."

Kohring made out like he was in good spirits. He shook hands with prosecutors. He gave a thumbs-up to a TV crew.

"I'm feeling good and it's a beautiful day. I'm optimistic and healthy and that's 90 percent of it."

FBI - Stevens-1545

He said he didn't want to talk about the case, though.

Kohring's chief defense lawyer, John Henry Browne of Seattle, had sought to have the trial moved to the Seattle area because of what he called "local media saturation and the resulting impossibility of seating a fair and impartial jury for this case anywhere in Alaska."

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick, in a 40-page written order that serves as a critique of the coverage to date, denied that request on Tuesday.

While there's been "a barrage of publicity" about Kohring, three other indicted legislators, Veco and its executives, it hasn't been inflammatory, the judge concluded.

283KS04.0th 194A-AN-13620-M;641

The court was able to seat juries with relative ease in the corruption trials of former Reps. Tom Anderson and Pete Kott, Sedwick noted. He'll use the same procedure in the Kohring trial, including intensive, individual questioning of each prospective juror about publicity.

He's learned that people just don't follow the news the way they used to.

"To put it bluntly, a surprising number of prospective jurors are just not interested in, and do not follow, local news," Sedwick wrote. "Many don't even read local newspapers. Many do not watch the local news on television. Among those who do read the newspaper, many simply glance at the local news headlines while moving on to areas of interest such as sports or gardening."

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

Print Page Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1546

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Anderson supporters push for leniency

LETTERS: Colleagues and friends say ex-representative deserves a break.

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com

(Published: October 12, 2007)

With his sentencing on bribery and other charges just days away, former state Rep. Tom Anderson wants the judge to consider that people who know him well don't see him as a corrupt politician.

So far, his lawyer has filed 22 letters of support in court, from former legislative aides, friends, and colleagues from his days on the Anchorage School Board and in the Legislature.

Prosecutors are seeking a maximum sentence of more than eight years.

Anderson was the first of four indicted former legislators to go to trial, and on Monday will become the first to be sentenced. He was convicted in July of seven felonies, including bribery, extortion, conspiracy and money laundering.

His young son's godmother wrote what a good father Anderson is to the boy, whose name was deleted in the letters as filed.

Anderson's first in line to feed the child, he uses quick trips to the grocery store or the gas station as a chance to tell stories, and he's even happy to get up in the middle of the night when the toddler awakens, godmother Joanne Lytle wrote.

Glenn Clary, a pastor at Anchorage Baptist Temple, wrote that Tom is anguished over humiliating his parents and wife and feels like he damaged the integrity of the Legislature as an institution.

House Speaker John Harris said Anderson's eager-to-please personality may have gotten him into trouble, but he was a good legislator and did more than anyone else to modernize the State Crime Lab.

"No one would deny he has a good heart, and means well. I definitely feel he has been thrown into a pool of 'bigger fish' and hope you will equate his mindset and actions in contrast to other indicted individuals respectively," Harris wrote.

FBI - Stevens-1547

SEEKING 33-MONTH MAXIMUM SENTENCE

Anderson, who contended in his trial that he had been set up by the government, now is admitting that he did wrong and is asking for mercy. His lawyer, Paul Stockler, is asking for a sentence of no more than two years, nine months.

Prosecutors are seeking the maximum, or eight years and one month, which is even more time than recommended by the federal probation office in its pre-sentencing report. They say the judge shouldn't give him credit for accepting responsibility at this point.

"We submit that, in evaluating Anderson's eve-of-sentencing claims of contrition, the Court should consider the fact that Anderson elected to go to trial and have the charges decided by a jury of his peers," prosecutors Nicholas Marsh and Joe Bottini say in their sentencing memorandum.

285K501.0th 194A-AN-13620-M;6442

Anderson seems to recognize that he'll end up in federal prison. Just this week, he paid his ex-wife $9,250 in child support for their two sons, both now teenagers living in Texas, according to the ex, Janet Alexander.

In all, he has four sons. His oldest, from an earlier relationship, lives in South Carolina and visits in the summer. The 17-year-old attended the last day of his father's trial. He's upset by what's happening, his mother, Stephanie Webb, said in an e-mail.

On Thursday, Anderson was taking care of essentials: eye exam, dentist, a checkup for his young son Grayson, he wrote in an e-mail Wednesday night.

ELECTED OFFICIALS ARE THE TROPHY

Around the country, defendants in public corruption cases are being hit with hefty sentences, said Peter Henning, a law professor at Wayne State University in Michigan who blogs on white collar crime.

"At one point a sentence over five years would have been almost unheard of in a public corruption case. Now you are seeing it with some regularity," Henning said in a telephone interview.

In ongoing cases, prosecutors may seek more prison time for the first defendants to go down, he said.

"In part they will seek a substantial sentence to send a message to other potential defendants, to try to get their cooperation. There is such a benefit to cooperating," he said. Some who cooperate don't even get prison time, he said.

Big corruption cases are like a spider web, he said. The government works them from the outside in, trying to get the individuals with private interests who paid the bribes to cooperate and reel in elected officials. "They are the trophy," Henning said.

Bottini, one of the prosecutors in the Anderson case, said they aren't trying to make an example out of him.

But there are several reasons why prosecutors are seeking eight-plus years, as laid out in their sentencing memo.

For one, Anderson was convicted of three money-laundering counts. Jurors found that Anderson participated in a scheme in which a phony Web site was used to funnel payments to him that he thought came from a private prison company. In reality, the money came from the FBI, through a Cornell Cos. consultant working undercover. The company didn't know about the scheme.

The probation office concluded it was "sophisticated laundering" involving a shell company, which means more prison time. The defense disputes that. The Web site for political news started out as a real idea but just never materialized, Stockler noted.

Prosecutors also want Anderson to serve more time because they contend he took multiple bribes, though he was convicted of one bribery count. That's because he sought additional money from the consultant, former state Corrections Commissioner Frank Prewitt, working undercover for the FBI. Prewitt testified that he paid Anderson an extra $2,000 in a side deal.

FBI - Stevens-1548

In all, Anderson received nearly $26,000 in bribe payments, according to evidence in the trial. Prosecutors say that his sentence should include "a fine of $26,000, totaling the amount of the corrupt payments."

Anderson plans to speak at his sentencing hearing, his lawyer said. His supporters will mainly be represented through the letters. Among the others who wrote in:

• Joshua Fink, who is director of the state Office of Public Advocacy. Anderson asked him to send a letter, and he did so as a private individual. They were roommates years ago as legislative aides in Juneau. He described Anderson as loyal, a loving family man, a legislator who fought for vulnerable Alaskans.

• Jim Patton, a friend who says there was an attitude of entitlement among legislators that Anderson witnessed during the years he served as a legislative aide. "Tom was more a product of his predecessors, and his ill-equipped gullibility meter, than of corruption."

• John Floyd, who served with Anderson on the Anchorage School Board and the Big Brothers Big Sisters board of directors. As a legislator, Anderson dealt with community concerns, including vandalism at Susitna Elementary, obtrusive snow mounds and funding for a traffic calming study on Muldoon Road, Floyd wrote.

Stockler said Anderson has done lots of soul searching in the last few months.

"I don't think it's ever too late to admit you made a mistake," he said.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1549

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Ex-legislator Anderson sentenced to 5 years

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com
(Published: October 15, 2007)

A federal judge on Monday said that former state Rep. Tom Anderson "sold the public trust" and sentenced him to five years in prison for seven felonies involving corruption in office.

The two-hour sentencing hearing came with a surprise: Anderson's two former defense lawyers testified that he worked undercover nearly full-time for the FBI in the summer of 2005 in the hope of leniency.

Ultimately, the deal fell apart. Prosecutors asked for a long sentence. In a courtroom crowded with Anderson's friends and family on one side and FBI agents and prosecutors on the other, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick said the former lawmaker didn't have much respect for the position once he got into office, regarding it as something that paid poorly and demanded much time.

A federal jury convicted Anderson on July 9 of three counts of money laundering, two counts of extortion and a count each of bribery and conspiracy.

"He took the money because he wanted the money," Sedwick said. The judge said he doesn't think Anderson, 40, will get in trouble again. "But I have a very considerable concern for sending a message to the community that we really can't tolerate the kind of behavior in which he engaged," the judge said.

Sedwick said he knew the case was heartbreaking for Anderson's large crowd of supporters. Most defendants who come before him have no one, the judge said.

Among those who showed up for Anderson: his wife, state Sen. Lesil McGuire, and his father, also Tom Anderson, former director of Alaska State Troopers.

"I have no idea how Mr. Anderson's apple fell so far from the tree, but it did," Sedwick said.

Anderson, a Republican, represented East Anchorage for two terms in the Legislature. He didn't run in 2006. He's only the Former state legislator Tom Anderson strides past members of the Anchorage media on the way to the Anchorage federal courthouse Monday, Oct. 15, 2007. Anderson was in court for sentencing after a federal jury convicted him in July of money laundering, extortion, bribery and conspiracy. ()

Former Alaska legislator Tom Anderson, flanked by media cameras, enters the Anchorage federal courthouse today. Anderson was sentenced to five years in federal prison after his conviction on conspiracy and bribery charges. (JIM LAVRAKAS / Anchorage Daily News)

FBI - Stevens-1550

Anderson and his wife, state Sen. Lesil McGuire, drive away from the courthouse after sentencing.

289K501.0th 194A-AN-13620-m;643

second Alaska legislator to be convicted of bribery, after the late Sen. George Hohman in 1981.

According to Anderson's former lawyers, his role as a wired informant for the FBI fell apart soon after he told then-girlfriend McGuire about his involvement. (JIM LAVRAKAS / Anchorage Daily News)

Before Anderson's hearing, the defense had asked for mercy and a sentence of less than three years. Prosecutors had sought the maximum they thought he could get under advisory sentencing guidelines, or more than eight years.

Sedwick found that some areas underscored by prosecutors to support a longer sentence didn't apply.

A longer sentence for Anderson won't deter others, Paul Stockler, Anderson's defense attorney, told the judge. But it matters to Anderson's ability to restart his life. If he got three years, he'd be able to take his and McGuire's young son to the first day of kindergarten, Stockler said.

As it is, Anderson's career as a legislator is finished, Stockler said. Anderson knows now that he's brought shame "to the entire state of Alaska and the Legislature," Stockler said.

Prosecutor Joe Bottini told Sedwick he thought Anderson's late show of remorse was a facade.

"What's resulted from this conviction and the overall investigation as a whole is that the public's faith in the integrity of our legislative system is eroded seriously," Bottini said. "... People are looking at this going "Are they all dirty?'"

Anderson was the first Alaska legislator convicted in the ongoing political corruption investigation that burst into view last year with the FBI raids of lawmakers' offices. Another, former Rep. Pete Kott, was convicted last month and two others are awaiting trial.

Anderson told Sedwick he was sorry for what he did, apologizing to the judge, his family and the state of Alaska. He spoke in a quiet voice that didn't waiver.

"I've let her down," he said about McGuire, "and I've let my family down."

Evidence in the trial showed that he participated in a scheme to push the interests of a private prison company in exchange for what turned out to be nearly $26,000 in payments. A consultant for Cornell Cos. was working undercover for the FBI, and the company wasn't involved in the scheme, the U.S. Justice Department has said.

Anderson said he didn't get the full impact of the evidence until he saw undercover videos at his trial of him scheming with a Cornell lobbyist and consultant.

"I was embarrassed," Anderson said. The conspiracy involved a sham company that was supposed to operate a Web site on which Cornell would place advertisements.

When he took money from the consultant knowing that Cornell didn't need or want the ads, "I don't know how much more wrong that could have been," Anderson told the judge.

As Sedwick made it clear that Anderson would go to prison, his wife, mother and others cried in the courtroom. Sedwick allowed him to remain out of custody as details of his confinement are worked out. The judge said he'll recommend that Anderson serve his time in Sheridan, Ore., as Anderson requested, though there's no guarantee he'll get that. It's a medium security prison with a prison camp next door.

Besides five years in prison, Sedwick also ordered two years of supervised release. He didn't order a fine.

When the hearing ended, Anderson slowly walked over to his family and friends. He and McGuire embraced.

Lingering outside the courtroom with supporters, Anderson thanked everyone. Friends assured McGuire they would be OK. "Will we?" McGuire wondered.

Later, as Anderson and McGuire got into a waiting vehicle, his face crumbled with the strain of the day.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

Print Page Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1552

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Legal spending mounts, Young campaign reports

CAMPAIGN FINANCE: Congressman hasn't revealed what sort of advice he's buying.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(Published: October 16, 2007)

WASHINGTON -- U.S. Rep. Don Young continued to spend thousands of dollars of campaign donations on attorneys through the summer, according to financial reports filed by his campaign on Monday.

The reports, to the Federal Election Commission, show that over the past three months, Young spent $184,708 on legal fees.

That brings Young's total spending on legal advice this year to $446,845.

Young, a Republican who has been Alaska's sole congressman since 1973, has not said what kind of legal work or defense the campaign money is buying. He has been under federal investigation for his ties to Veco Corp., for fundraising activities and for his role in specific congressional earmarks, according to various media reports.

Young has not spoken publicly about the investigation. In April, his campaign manager said that the campaign had retained a Washington, D.C., firm for advice in connection with campaign contributions from a trucking executive under federal indictment in Wisconsin.

In the three-month period ending Sept. 30, Young paid the firm, Akin Gump Strauss and Hauer, $177,607 for legal advice, according to the report filed Monday. The firm got $242,306 of his business last quarter.

Tobin, O'Connor, Ewing and Richard earned $7,100 from Young this quarter; last quarter, they billed him $19,831.

Federal election law allows lawmakers and candidates to pay legal bills with campaign finance accounts. They have fairly broad discretion to spend the money on legal fees, as long as the legal bills are connected to their role as an elected official or candidate for office.

Young reported collecting $143,421 in contributions during the three-month period ending Sept. 30. Young raised about $111,000 during the second quarter this year, according to an earlier report.

FBI - Stevens-1553

"We've had some good fundraisers, and we're encouraged by where we are," said Young's campaign manager, Steven Dougherty.

But even as he brought in money from events such as his annul pig roast in Anchorage this summer, Young was clearly spending money too. His reports show he had $1.4 million on hand at the end of the reporting period. Last quarter, he had $1.6 million in the bank.

The 74-year-old congressman faces a spirited field of candidates seeking to unseat him, encouraged in part by the ethics cloud that has made him vulnerable to a challenger.

289K503.0th 194A-AN-13620-M;644

Republican state Rep. Gabrielle LeDoux of Kodiak plans to take on Young in the GOP primary, and three Democrats have said they're running for his seat: his 2006 opponent, Diane Benson; former state House minority leader Ethan Berkowitz; and former state Democratic Party chief Jake Metcalfe.

Metcalfe has raised $61,625 so far, according to his report, and Benson has $28,205 in the bank, according to her report. Berkowitz announced his candidacy last week and hasn't released any fundraising numbers to the FEC yet.

U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, who also has been drawn into the Veco investigation, has not used any of his campaign money on criminal lawyers, said Tim McKeever, Stevens' campaign treasurer.

A report released Monday night covers the period when the FBI and IRS raided the senator's home in Girdwood this summer. Stevens hired Brendan Sullivan, one of the best-known criminal defense lawyers in Washington, but his fees are not coming out of the senator's campaign money.

The only lawyers who are being paid out of campaign funds are those who review the campaign finance reports for accuracy, McKeever said. McKeever released on Monday only the first four summary pages of Stevens' 290-page document. Unlike U.S. House members, who must file campaign disclosure forms electronically, U.S. senators are allowed to mail their reports the day they're due.

The summary report shows that Stevens has just over $1 million in the bank. So far, three little-known candidates have filed to run against him: Democrats Rocky Caldero of Dutch Harbor and Frank Vondersaar of Homer, and Republican Gerald "Jerry" Heikes of Palmer.

Stevens' campaign raised $463,020 over the past three months, making it one of the senator's most fruitful fundraising quarters in recent years, McKeever said.

"The pace is running ahead of what we raised in 2001," McKeever said, adding that the approach is no different from Stevens' 2002 campaign. "It's basically the same kind of fundraising -- if anything, we've done more fundraisers in Alaska."

Print Page Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1554

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

State will give feds clear field in investigations

CORRUPTION: Washington wants Alaska not to muddle investigation.

By DAN JOLING
The Associated Press

(Published: October 17, 2007)

State prosecutors will back off an investigation of election campaign polling practices to avoid interfering with an ongoing federal corruption probe, Gov. Sarah Palin announced Tuesday.

Palin, who championed ethics reform while winning office last November, released a letter from the U.S. Department of Justice that said a state investigation could interfere with the federal effort.

"Because of the long-standing federal investigation into these matters, we believe that concurrent state investigative activity will have the effect of compromising certain aspects of the ongoing federal public corruption investigation," said Brenda K. Morris, deputy chief of the Justice Department's public integrity section.

She commented in a letter to Alaska Attorney General Talis Colberg.

Attorneys from the Public Integrity Section are prosecuting four former Alaska legislators, including former House Speaker Pete Kott, R-Eagle River, who was convicted of bribery and other counts last month.

State officials announced they would investigate after testimony emerged from Kott's trial that Kott and possibly others had illegally received campaign polls paid for by officials of Veco Corp., a major oil field services company that spent thousands of dollars supporting pro-development candidates.

Veco CEO Bill Allen and a company vice president, Rick Smith, have pleaded guilty to bribing public officials. Their plea agreements require them to cooperate with investigators.

They testified at Kott's trial that Veco paid $2,750 for a poll that showed Kott where he stood in his re-election campaign in 2006. Kott subsequently lost in the Republican primary.

Smith testified that Veco had paid for other polls over the years, including a $20,000 poll in 2006 for former Gov. Frank Murkowski before he was a declared candidate for re-election.

Colberg assigned lawyers to closely watch Kott's trial in federal court to see if it revealed other possible criminal acts.

But he cautioned that the state would have to proceed carefully before pursuing its own criminal charges because federal authorities did not want interference from the state.

The Justice Department letter, dated Friday, puts the brakes on state investigators.

Palin said she has directed the attorney general to continue to monitor alleged illegal activities by public officials but that her office will not impede or compromise the federal investigation.

FBI - Stevens-1555

290K502.0th

194A-AN-136620-M:645

Former state Rep. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage was sentenced Monday to five years in prison following his conviction in July on seven counts of conspiracy and bribery. He was convicted of taking nearly $24,000 that he thought was coming from a Houston-based company, Cornell Industries Inc., which hoped to build a private prison in Alaska.

The money was supplied by the FBI through an informant under contract to Cornell who secretly recorded his conversations with Anderson in 2004 and 2005. The company was not aware of the investigation.

Kott was convicted last month of conspiracy to solicit financial benefits, extortion and bribery.

Former Rep. Vic Kohring is scheduled to go on trial on corruption charges Monday. The corruption trial of former state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch has been delayed.

UPDATES: For up-to-date news on the federal corruption investigation, check adn.com. Talk about it on our politics blog,

adn.com/alaskapolitics

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1556

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Hunt for bigger fish hooked Kohring, lawyer tells court

TRIAL MONDAY: Former lawmaker faces federal charges of bribery, extortion.

By STEVE QUINN
The Associated Press

(Published: October 17, 2007)

JUNEAU -- "You dun got the wrong man."

That was the folksy conclusion Vic Kohring's attorney presented to federal prosecutors in January in an otherwise serious letter turning down a plea deal for the former Alaska lawmaker.

The letter, obtained by The Associated Press, was sent to assistant U.S. attorney Joseph Bottini by Kohring's lawyer, Wayne Anthony Ross, who said Kohring had done nothing wrong.

Federal prosecutors four months later charged Kohring, then a state representative, and two former lawmakers with bribery and extortion.

Kohring is accused of demanding and accepting up to $2,600 in cash and a $3,000 job for a relative from former Veco Corp. executives in exchange for his support. The indictment also alleges Kohring sought but did not receive a $17,000 payment for credit card debt.

Prosecutors claim Kohring's cozy relationship with Veco executives Bill Allen and Rick Smith went back to 2002. Ross claimed in the letter this is nothing more than a decade-old friendship, not a pay-for-play relationship.

Kohring's trial starts Monday in Anchorage.

Kohring declined Tuesday to talk about specifics of the case, but did say, "This is becoming more and more of a reality, now that it's here. Of course, I'm fighting for my life here."

Charged along with Kohring were former Republican Reps. Pete Kott, who was convicted on three counts last month, and Bruce Weyhrauch, whose trial has been postponed.

Since the May indictments, U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens and U.S. Rep. Don Young have also come under federal scrutiny for their relationship with Veco executives.

Seattle-based John Henry Browne, another attorney for Kohring, told the AP on Tuesday that Kohring got ensnared in a wider federal probe that was after bigger trophies, Stevens and his son, Ben Stevens, a former state Senate president.

"What happened was this little fish named Vic Kohring got caught in it. There's not much meat in this hamburger," Browne said. FBI - Stevens-1557

Ted Stevens is under investigation for remodeling work done by Veco employees at his Alaska home. Ben Stevens had his office searched in an FBI raid last year, but he hasn't been charged. Bill Allen testified in Kott's trial last month that his bribery conviction included allegations of payments to Ben Stevens through a consulting contract. Ben Stevens has denied any wrongdoing. Ted

290K501.0th

194A-AN-13620-M; 646

Stevens has said he won't discuss the investigation for fear it will look like he's trying to influence it.

A spokesman for the Department of Justice, which is prosecuting the Kohring case, declined comment Tuesday.

Ross' five-page letter will essentially serve as an outline for the defense, his lawyers said.

Ross notes in the letter that Kohring went against Veco's wishes and never endorsed the final petroleum profits tax passed by the Legislature last year.

However, a number of times Kohring voted against amendments to raise the tax above the 20 percent that Veco was strongly pushing. The tax, which Gov. Sarah Palin has called tainted by corruption exposed by the investigation, will be revisited during a special session that starts Thursday.

"We respectfully decline your offer to have Vic Kohring plead to a criminal charge," Ross wrote Bottini in January. "Vic did not sell his vote(s) to anyone. ... We strongly disagree with your assertion that what Vic did was criminal in nature."

He conceded, however, that Kohring now understands he foolishly placed himself in a position where he and his actions could be subjected to scrutiny and misinterpretation.

In the letter, Ross also countered the importance of several videotapes and recordings Bottini played to them in an earlier meeting.

In one, Kohring visited Smith and Allen at the Baranof Hotel in Juneau, seeking their advice on how he could deal with a past due credit card debt. "Vic was interested in a loan or a legitimate job and these things were discussed," Ross wrote.

But he said Kohring several times emphasized "that everything had to be legitimate and on the up and up. Allen and Smith listened but seemed unenthusiastic about helping, so Vic dropped the matter and did not bring it up to them again."

Ross also noted recorded phone conversations, which he said showed Kohring's typical behavior.

"Vic often asks constituents, 'What can I do to help,' " he wrote. "He says those same words to anyone or everyone.

"There were never any agreements expressed or implied between Vic and Allen for Vic's vote."

He also discounted the allegation that Kohring arranged a job for a relative. He said Smith broached the subject of Kohring's nephew applying for a Veco engineering internship over small talk during a chance meeting at a hotel lounge.

"Smith's offer was unexpected. Vic was not even aware such a program existed," Ross wrote. "Smith asked for nothing from Vic when he made the offer and nothing later."

Ross told Bottini that Kohring was supportive of efforts to clean up politics in Alaska. "However in this instance, as they say in the movies, 'You dun got the wrong man,' " he wrote.

Daily News reporter Lisa Demer contributed to this story.

Print Page Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1559

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Judge scolds Kohring's lawyer, cites lack of professionalism

SCOLDING: Judge says defense should focus on court, not the press.

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com

(Published: October 18, 2007)

Kohring lawyer John Henry Browne ()

Former state Rep. Vic Kohring's lawyer got a scolding Wednesday from the judge.

U.S. District Court Judge John Sedwick seemed exasperated by tactics being used by John Henry Browne, a Seattle criminal defense lawyer. He described the defense efforts as troublesome, worrisome and unusual for Anchorage. And the judge warned Browne to stop trying his case in the press.

Jury selection begins Monday in Kohring's trial on four federal felony charges, including bribery, extortion and conspiracy.

Kohring's main trial lawyer is Browne, and he's also represented by Wayne Anthony Ross, a well-known Anchorage lawyer. Kohring, a Wasilla Republican, was elected seven times. He resigned in July to concentrate on his defense.

At a court hearing Wednesday to discuss jury selection and other matters before the trial, prosecutor Joe Bottini told Sedwick that the defense lawyers were behaving unprofessionally and needed to be called on it.

Bottini pointed to an Associated Press story that was published in the Daily News on Wednesday. It was based on a five-page letter that Ross sent to him back in January rejecting any plea deal and outlining the defense in detail.

Among other things, Ross wrote, "As they say in the movies, 'You dun got the wrong man.' "

Besides that, Bottini told Sedwick, Browne was making outrageous claims in various legal motions that weren't supported by evidence but were getting lots of publicity. He was "using court filings to work the press," Bottini said.

FBI - Stevens-1560

MIRANDA RIGHTS

For instance, Browne filed a motion to throw out a statement that Kohring gave to FBI agents on Aug. 31, 2006 -- the day agents served search warrants at legislative offices around the state, including his. Browne contended that the agents detained the lawmaker in his office, then failed to read him his Miranda rights. But at a hearing, Browne called no witnesses and dropped that issue, Bottini noted.

Then on Tuesday, Browne filed a motion to dismiss the case based on what he calls "prosecutorial misconduct." He contends that Sen. Fred Dyson, R-Eagle River, was acting as an agent of the government in June when he suggested through an aide that Kohring consider negotiating with prosecutors. Browne said that interfered with Kohring's right to counsel.

291K501.0th 194A-AN-136620-M; 647

"Mr. Kohring, on account of and in direct response to the government's excessive overreaching, decided to refuse to negotiate, opting instead for trial," Browne's motion said.

But Dyson has said that he approached Kohring on his own, as a friend -- not at the request of the FBI, Bottini said.

Browne told the judge he's concerned about whether Kohring can get a fair trial because of all the publicity about the case -- much of it the government's allegations.

Browne mentioned a story that included the judge's comments Monday in sentencing former state Rep. Tom Anderson to prison on bribery and other charges. Sedwick said at Monday's sentencing that he was concerned with "sending a message to the community that we really can't tolerate the kind of behavior in which he engaged."

Sedwick said Anderson's case had nothing to do with Kohring's. He said he reviewed the coverage on Kohring item by item and found it for the most part "professional and extremely fair."

The judge said the defense behavior was "unusual, to say the least." It appeared the letter from Ross was given to reporters in an effort to obtain favor before the trial, he said.

Ross wasn't at the court hearing. He said earlier this week that he's mainly the local contact.

As to the claim regarding Dyson, Sedwick said, "there is precious little to support it." The evidence consists mainly of two things: An aide to Kohring saying that an aide to Dyson told him that an FBI agent had suggested Kohring call her because things would go easier if he cooperated, and a photocopy of FBI agent Mary Beth Kepner's business card.

Sedwick said he'd rule later on that matter.

But it did appear that the defense was casting aspersions without basis and that was "very troublesome," the judge said.

Browne hasn't filed a trial memo, giving some glimpse of the defense, even though it was due Monday. Browne said he would do so and noted that he didn't have a team of lawyers working on it, perhaps a reference to the four prosecutors in the courtroom.

Browne said he was trying to keep the case on track even though a new indictment in the case was unsealed Oct. 4. He noted that was during a period in which he was out of town and had asked for no activity in the case.

Don't expect any sympathy on that point, Sedwick said. In Anchorage, lawyers don't take a week off just before a trial, he said. And Browne knew about the allegations in the new indictment for some time, Sedwick said.

"You are not going to pull the wool over my eyes on that one," Sedwick said. FBI - Stevens-1561

Kohring is accused of being in a conspiracy with executives from oil field services company Veco Corp. to push their interests. The new indictment takes the conspiracy further back, to 2002.

The judge said he wasn't going to formally issue a finding but warned Browne not to try his case in the press.

QUESTIONNAIRES STUDIED

Sedwick and the attorneys on both sides also went through questionnaires that had been sent in by prospective jurors to see if any were obviously biased or had other reasons they couldn't serve.

Of 120 potential jurors in the pool, 49 were excused on Wednesday. Many had hardships related to work, children, travel or medical issues. Two didn't speak English well. A couple had potential conflicts of interest. One worked for the court.

While the questionnaires weren't made public, it appeared from the lawyers' discussion that around 20 people were excused because they indicated they couldn't be fair to Kohring.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1562

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Kohring corruption trial jury selection is today

BRIBES OR GIFTS? Secret tapes of ex-lawmaker will be at center of arguments.

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com

(Published: October 22, 2007)

Was former state Rep. Vic Kohring another Alaska politician with his hand out, or a guy who accepted cash as a gift from a friend?

That's the question facing jurors in Kohring's trial on public corruption charges. Jury selection starts today in U.S. District Court, and jurors should begin hearing the government's side of the case by midweek.

Kohring, a Wasilla Republican, was elected seven times before resigning in July to concentrate on his defense.

Prosecutors intend to rely on secretly made recordings of meetings and phone calls to convince jurors, as well as testimony from those who say they paid bribes. That is the same approach the government used in two previous Alaska corruption trials that resulted in convictions this year.

In Kohring's case, the two sides have very different interpretations of the recordings.

Kohring is accused of accepting cash payments totaling as much as $2,600, seeking another $17,000, and soliciting an internship for his nephew in exchange for doing the bidding of Veco Corp. The oil field services company was sold in September to CH2M Hill.

A trial memorandum outlining the defense says that Kohring's friendship with former Veco chief executive Bill Allen began more than 12 years ago.

The two men were particularly close because Kohring's wife is from Russia, as was Allen's girlfriend, says the memo by Kohring's lawyer, John Henry Browne. Both women came to Alaska with their daughters.

"This common bond involving their Russian families created a special camaraderie between Vic and Allen that made the nature of their relationship more personal than professional," the trial memo says.

FBI - Stevens-1563

During the 2006 legislative session, Veco was pushing a new oil tax favored by North Slope oil producers as a step toward building a natural gas pipeline that could have been enormously lucrative for Veco.

Prosecutors charge that Kohring received payments to push the oil tax, but the defense says the money was a personal gift.

Both sides agree that on March 30, 2006, Kohring met with Allen and former Veco vice president Rick Smith in Suite 604 of Juneau's Baranof Hotel.

295RS01.0th

194A-AN-13620-M;648

In a video recording of that meeting, Kohring brought up the topic of a "personal financial matter that ... potentially, could hurt me politically," the defense memo says. He told Allen and Smith that he owed $17,000 on a credit card for a surgery. Prosecutors say the debt was in collection.

Kohring asked about a job or loan and stressed that it had to be legitimate, according to the defense.

"As Allen and Smith seemed unenthusiastic about helping Mr. Kohring, he dropped the issue and did not bring it up to them again," the defense says.

Prosecutors say in their trial memo that the trio also talked at length about how to structure the deal to avoid "red flags."

During that meeting, prosecutors say, Kohring continued to talk about his finances and his family. Allen asked Smith if he had any "hundreds." Smith opened his wallet and handed at least $100 to Allen, who gave it to Kohring. Allen then opened his wallet and handed Kohring a second handful of cash, totaling $500 to $1,000, the prosecution says.

After getting the money, Kohring brought up the oil tax, which was being pushed by then-Gov. Frank Murkowski. Here's a snippet of conversation, according to the prosecution memo:

Kohring: "What can I do at this point to help you guys? Anything?"

Allen: "Whatever you, you know, uh, uh ..."

Kohring: "Just keep lobbying my colleagues for the governor's plan, right?"

The defense memo says the money wasn't a bribe for support on the tax, but just a gift between friends.

Kohring told Allen and Smith he was going to be able to spend Easter with his stepdaughter for the first time, the memo says:

"Allen suggested that Kohring sponsor an Easter egg hunt for his daughter, but with the surprise of presents in the eggs. It was then that Allen provided Kohring with an undetermined sum of money, to be used specifically for the Easter egg hunt," the memo says.

Before Kohring left, he mentioned that his family had given Allen a bottle of Russian vodka.

"This exchange of presents amongst close friends, therefore, had nothing to do with any official action," the defense contends.

Kohring was completely unaware that the gifts "were ever intended to influence Mr. Kohring's work as a legislator." FBI - Stevens-1564

Later, in an April 20, 2006, conversation with Smith, Kohring thanked Smith and Allen for their support over the years. He wanted to hug Allen, he said. His family thoroughly enjoyed the Easter egg hunt, with the money in the eggs as Allen suggested, he said, according to the defense memo.

The extensive recordings, according to the defense, "demonstrate Mr. Kohring's continued dedication to his constituents and his unwavering stance against tax increases."

The trial is expected to take about two weeks. Prosecutors say they expect to call 20-25 witnesses including a dozen or more FBI agents. That's because Browne wouldn't agree to let a single FBI agent authenticate all the recordings, as was done in the recent trial of former state Rep. Pete Kott. The defense lawyer said he didn't want to make the government's job easier.

Prosecutors will be allowed to use a statement that Kohring gave to FBI agents as well as materials seized in an Aug. 31, 2006, search of his legislative office. U.S. District Judge John Sedwick ruled last week that the search was legal.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1565

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Potential Kohring jurors questioned

Lawyers pick from 70 to decide bribery, corruption charges

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com

(Published: October 23, 2007)

If everything goes as planned, lawyers in former Rep. Vic Kohring's trial will make opening statements this afternoon, Oct. 23, 2007. (JIM LAVRAKAS / Anchorage Daily News)

On one side of the courtroom Monday, former state Rep. Vic Kohring and his lawyer whispered with their trial consultant about potential jurors.

On the other side, two federal prosecutors and an FBI agent jotted notes about who they wanted to judge their public corruption case against the defendant. They got help from two other prosecutors sitting behind them.

Kohring's trial on four federal felonies including bribery and conspiracy began in U.S. District Court on Monday with prospective jurors being brought in one by one for questioning about whether they already had an opinion about the case.

The defense team includes Alan Cohen, a Seattle communications psychologist who has worked as a consultant on hundreds of trials. Cohen said he's just looking for people with an open mind.

A few news reporters and bloggers showed up, but otherwise most seats in the courtroom were empty for the dull but important first stage of the trial. Lawyers consider jury selection perhaps the most crucial part of any case that goes to trial. A powerful, opinionated juror can sway the rest of the group; a lone rogue can mean a hung jury.

The proceedings should liven up today. U.S. District Court Judge John Sedwick said that he expects to seat a jury by noon. If everything stays on track, lawyers will make their opening statements this afternoon and prosecutors will call their first witnesses.

Most jurors in the original pool of 120 who held strong opinions about Kohring or politicians in general already had been weeded out through written questionnaires.

FBI - Stevens-1566

Of 70 who came to U.S. District Court on Monday, Sedwick, and occasionally the lawyers, questioned 57. Five were excused, only one because of concerns about fairness. The rest either had medical issues or other reasons.

Those in the pool still being considered include a neighbor of prosecutor Joe Bottini, a son of former Gov. Wally Hickel, and a woman who told Sedwick that she is skeptical about wiretap evidence. The judge noted that she said she would still consider all the evidence and didn't excuse her.

Much of the case against Kohring is from secretly made recordings.

296KS01.0Th

194A-AN-13620-M;649

The case is expected to take about two weeks.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

Print Page Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1567

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Kohring defense aims to discredit ex-Veco chief

ALLEN: Attorneys outline cases as state's latest corruption trial opens.

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com

(Published: October 24, 2007)

Former state Rep. Vic Kohring's trial on federal public corruption charges opened in full gear Tuesday with surprises from both sides.

Kohring's lawyer, John Henry Browne of Seattle, reeled off a list of prominent Alaskans whom he said Veco executives claimed to "own," including U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, U.S. Rep. Don Young and Stevens' son, former state Senate President Ben Stevens.

"All these big names," Browne said, but in the defendant's chair is Kohring -- a man, the attorney noted, who slept on his office couch in Juneau and who lives in a trailer in Wasilla.

Neither Ted nor Ben Stevens nor Young has been charged.

Prosecutor Joe Bottini offered a twist of his own. He told jurors about an idea hatched by former Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen to kill an oil tax bill with Kohring's help. Legislators were closing in on a rate far above what the North Slope oil producers wanted, he said.

Kohring is being tried in U.S. District Court on four felonies: bribery, conspiracy, extortion and attempted extortion. He is accused of conspiring with Allen and former Veco vice president Rick Smith to push through the oil industry's favored new tax. The oil field services company was sold in September to CH2M Hill.

Kohring, a Wasilla Republican, was elected seven times then resigned in July to concentrate on his defense.

A jury was picked just before noon. Half are from Anchorage, and others are from Eagle River, Palmer, Nikiski, Dillingham and a rural address on the Glenn Highway.

FULL COURTROOM

The big courtroom filled up for opening statements with defense lawyers, prosecutors, news reporters and more.

FBI - Stevens-1568

The prosecution wants jurors to see Kohring as a man who sold his public office. Allen gave Kohring handfuls of cash because he felt sorry for him but also to win his loyalty, Bottini said. Kohring had such strong anti-tax sentiments that Allen felt he had to buy him off to make sure he wouldn't go "wacko" and vote against Veco's preferred oil tax, the prosecutor said.

"This case is about the misuse of a position of public trust for personal financial gain," Bottini told jurors.

The defense is trying to portray Kohring as a guy who was broke and accepted cash as gifts from

297K501.0th

194A-AN-1362D-M;650

Allen, someone he thought was his friend. But he didn't sell his office and never voted for the petroleum profits tax, Browne said.

"He refused to be bought," the defense lawyer told jurors.

The votes on the oil tax legislation are complicated. There were multiple votes in the full House, often in the form of amendments to raise the tax beyond the 20 percent tax proposed by then-Gov. Frank Murkowski and then pushed hard by Veco. Kohring voted against the amendments.

Allen was long a powerful player in state politics and, along with other Veco executives, a generous contributor to both state and federal political candidates. Then he fell, hard. Allen and Smith pleaded guilty in May to bribery and other charges and are cooperating with the FBI in its ongoing corruption investigation.

At the recent corruption trial of former House Speaker Pete Kott, Allen testified that he had bribed Kott, Kohring and Ben Stevens. He also has admitted that Veco executives were paid illegal special bonuses in exchange for making campaign contributions.

Prosecutors told jurors that Kohring's own words will be used against him in secretly made recordings, including numerous telephone calls and a March 30, 2006, meeting in Suite 604 of Juneau's Baranof Hotel.

In that meeting, Kohring asked Allen and Smith for money to pay off a $17,000 credit card bill headed for collection. He accepted cash when both opened their wallets for him, Bottini said.

Browne told jurors that Allen will be testifying against Kohring to save his children and to get a lighter prison sentence. The defense lawyer mentioned Allen's heavy drinking and his head injury from a motorcycle crash. Yet "he is going to come in and tell you he remembers things specifically," Browne said.

On some points, Allen's testimony is all the government has, Browne said. There are no recordings, no wiretaps "no nothing."

He talked about Allen as a "multi multi multimillionaire."

"Mr. Allen thought he owned the world," Browne told jurors. Allen even bragged that "I own so and so's ass," the lawyer said, and said Allen included on that list Ted Stevens and Young along with various former and current state legislators. Some of the names have not come up publicly in the investigation before now. Browne dropped Stevens' and Young's names a number of times.

Allen will tell jurors that he made a deal with the government, Browne said, and now "the government owns his ass."

FBI - Stevens-1569

Jurors will be hearing Allen cuss a lot on the recordings, Browne said. But not Kohring. He doesn't swear, drink or smoke, his lawyer said.

When Allen and Smith opened their wallets to Kohring on March 30, 2006, it was so he could put on an Easter egg hunt for his stepdaughter at Allen's suggestion, Browne said.

Other people -- Kott, Ben Stevens, and former Rep. Tom Anderson -- got much more from Veco, Browne said. Stevens and Anderson both had consulting contracts that they didn't have to work for, he said.

"And they are giving Vic Kohring money for Easter eggs," Browne said.

Prosecutors seemed taken aback by Browne bringing up Stevens and Young but didn't say much about it afterward. The information was "out of context," Bottini said.

PROSECUTION'S CASE

Bottini walked jurors through a complex narrative in which Veco executives worked hard to get Kohring on their side.

The North Slope producers wanted "certainty" on taxes before they would commit to a natural gas pipeline that would have been very lucrative to Veco, Bottini said. Worried that Kohring might foul up the oil tax bill, Allen and Smith took him out to dinner at the Island Pub in nearby Douglas on Feb. 23, 2006, two days after the oil tax legislation was introduced, the prosecutor said. At the dinner, Allen handed Kohring $1,000 cash, Bottini told jurors.

Later, Allen's plan to kill the higher version of the tax involved getting Kohring away from the Capitol building in Juneau in the last hours of a special session in June 2006, Bottini told jurors.

As the prosecutor told the story to jurors, Allen thought the bill would die because every member of the House was supposed to be there. He asked Kohring to go for a ride and skip the floor vote. They agreed to meet at the McDonald's in Juneau.

But other people told Allen that idea wouldn't work and would just hurt Kohring politically, Bottini said. Allen couldn't reach Kohring to call it off so went ahead and met him at McDonald's where they bought "a bunch of food."

On the way back to the hotel, Bottini said, Allen pulled out $500 or $600 and handed it to Kohring. Over hamburgers in the suite, Allen told Kohring he wouldn't do anything to hurt him. In the prosecutor's telling, Kohring answered that he would have done what Allen asked anyway.

The McDonald's story came as a surprise to the defense. Browne told jurors he hadn't heard it before.

Browne called Kohring -- who's 6 foot 6 1/2 inches -- "a gentle giant" and told jurors they'll be hearing from him later in the trial.

"He's like Andy Griffith," Browne told reporters after court ended for the day, referring to the television star who played the folksy and honest sheriff of fictional Mayberry, N.C.

Kohring is the third state legislator to be tried in the corruption investigation. Anderson was sentenced to five years in prison last week on bribery and other charges involving a scheme with a private prison company. Kott was convicted in September of four felonies including bribery. Former state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch is awaiting trial.

FBI - Stevens-1570

Kohring's trial continues today in federal court.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

Print Page Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1571

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Video shows Kohring accepting Veco cash

CORRUPTION TRIAL: Ex-legislator told Veco executives that he had a $17,000 credit card debt.

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com

(Published: October 25, 2007)

Jurors hearing the public corruption case against former state Rep. Vic Kohring on Wednesday watched a video secretly made last spring that showed two executives with Veco Corp. open their wallets and hand him cash.

On the big screen in the federal courtroom, Kohring was clearly visible front and center accepting the money. Then-Veco chief executive Bill Allen and vice president Rick Smith were off to the side. Both later resigned, and Veco as a corporation no longer exists.

"Well, thank you very much," Kohring told them in the March 30, 2006, video. He shook Allen's hand and slipped the money into his jacket pocket.

Prosecutors presented the heart of their case Wednesday: 25 recordings from telephone wiretaps and a bug planted in Suite 604 of Juneau's Baranof Hotel.

In many of the calls, Kohring calls Smith on his cell phone and does most of the talking. He asks what he can do for Veco. He gives mini-political speeches about how conservative and anti-tax he is. He rants at times about the "damn media."

And he asks Smith and sometimes Allen for things: help with a Veco internship for his nephew, a loaner truck, a campaign fundraiser, a way to pay off a $17,000 credit card debt from surgery.

Kohring is being tried on four federal felonies including bribery and conspiracy. Prosecutors accuse him of conspiring with Smith and Allen to push Veco's interests on a new oil tax. Kohring, a Republican from Wasilla, resigned in July during his seventh term.

The defense contends that Kohring simply accepted gifts from his friends and never took bribes.

The recording from March 30, 2006, is remarkable on several levels.

The day before, Kohring called Smith. He said he was stressed and that people were pulling his arm in about "10 different directions." The pace of the legislative session had picked up. He was staying up until 2, 3 a.m. and was getting burned out.

He asked to talk to Smith and Allen about "a relatively serious matter" not involving Veco or the oil industry but something important to him.

Around midafternoon on March 30, Kohring went to Suite 604 to tell Smith and Allen his troubles.

He was in a financial hole that could hurt him politically, he told them on the video. He had had back surgery at the Mayo Clinic and maxxed out several credit cards to cover the bill. Kohring said later, outside of court, that he had spinal fusion surgery in 2002.

He still owed $17,000 on one card, he told Smith and Allen. He had been paying $500 a month, but the debt went to a collection agency that had demanded payment in full. He was worried his financial situation would become public.

He asked them for advice and threw out some ideas. Maybe he could get paid for some sort of project. He wanted real work, not a "freebie," he said. Maybe they could refer him to somebody. Maybe give him a "modest loan."

He told Smith and Allen that he didn't want them to feel like he was applying pressure. He said on the video he wanted everything to be "completely above board."

"I am not coming to the well," Kohring told them. Still, he said that he was living paycheck to paycheck. He couldn't qualify for a loan. He was trying to sell his ranch house in Wasilla, but it was only appraised at $110,000 and wasn't attracting a buyer.

Allen mused about it. What if he was a cosigner on a loan? Kohring would have to be careful about that, Allen said.

Kohring agreed. He said he didn't want to raise any red flags.

Didn't he have state health insurance? Allen asked. Kohring said he did, but the Mayo Clinic wasn't on the preferred provider list.

Allen said he'd think about Kohring's request.

One of the charges against Kohring is attempted extortion, stemming from that request for help with the debt.

Kohring's lawyer, John Henry Browne, has said the issue didn't amount to anything. Smith and Allen didn't seem interested so Kohring dropped it, Browne told jurors in his opening statement.

In the same meeting, Kohring mentions that he's about to spend his first Easter with his stepdaughter. His wife and daughter live in Beaverton, Ore. Usually he can't get away from the Legislature then, he said.

Allen suggested Kohring put money in plastic Easter eggs. Allen asked Smith if he had any hundreds. Smith is seen on the video standing up, taking out his wallet and peeling off some bills, at least $100, according to prosecutors. Allen handed the cash to Kohring.

Kohring thanked them.

He said he had just sent his stepdaughter a card and some money for her Girl Scout uniform.

Allen said he wanted to help on her uniform and pulled out some more bills, totaling $500 to $1,000, prosecutors say. Kohring thanked them again and shook Allen's hand.

In the courtroom as the scene played, some of the jurors scribbled notes. All seemed glued to the screen.

"What can I do at this point to help you guys? Anything?" Kohring asked on the video.

FBI - Stevens-1573

Allen, who has a head injury from a motorcycle wreck, stumbled a bit. Kohring answered his own question.

"Just keep lobbying my colleagues for the governor's plan, right?" Kohring said.

He then discussed a number of specific legislators he could talk to. The House Finance Committee members were particularly important. Kohring reeled off most of their names.

He said he could find out where they stood then "politely and gently try to influence them."

Kohring also told Allen that he had passed along to his wife that Allen liked their gift of Russian vodka. Kohring, portrayed by his attorney as a man who doesn't drink, swear or smoke, said on the recording that he enjoyed vodka, too. He said it helped him escape the "woes of the world."

Kohring's wife is Russian and outside of court Kohring explained that they may share a drink as part of her culture. He's not seen drinking on any of the recordings.

Kohring discussed an internship at Veco for his nephew -- a 17-year-old high school basketball star -- in various calls to Smith.

The defense says that Smith initially brought it up and that the nephew was well-qualified. But it's clear that Kohring was relying on Smith to guide him and to secure the position.

Kohring dropped off his nephew's resume at the Baronof front desk and phoned Smith to let him know. His nephew came to visit him in Juneau, and Kohring mentioned to Smith in a recorded call that he had a "bunch of lobbyists all lined up to buy my nephew dinner."

In an April 20, 2006, phone call, Smith told Kohring that his nephew had landed the internship.

"Wow! Outstanding," Kohring responds. "Thank you so very much for arranging that, Rick."

Kohring asked Smith to let him know what he could do "on the legislative end of things."

"You got it, partner," Smith answered.

In a call to Smith on July 1, 2006, Kohring passed along how much his nephew appreciated the job. Veco had sweetened the pot by giving him some overtime at $24 an hour. The nephew ultimately ended up with $3,000, Kohring told Smith at summer's end.

On July 23, 2006, as the campaign season geared up, Kohring called Smith again.

Would it be too forward to ask him to set up a luncheon fundraiser at the Petroleum Club in Anchorage? Kohring asked. No problem, Smith answered.

Kohring later reported back that the fundraiser brought in $4,000.

As to the pickup truck, Kohring called Smith a couple of times to ask for a loaner he could use during his campaign. His own vehicle wasn't reliable, he said in recorded calls.

The last call was on Aug. 30, 2006. Smith said he'd get back to him.

The next day, FBI agents raided offices of six legislators, including Kohring's. FBI - Stevens-1574

The trial continues today. Smith may be on the stand first thing.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

Find more

LATEST FROM TRIAL: We'll be blogging updates from the Kohring trial all day today; catch up by reading Wednesday's dispatches.

adn.com/alaskapolitics

Find additional material on adn.com as the case unfolds:

• Live blogging from the courthouse. Reporter Kyle Hopkins will be in the trial every day filing multiple dispatches to our politics blog: adn.com/alaskapolitics.

• Audio testimony. Unlike in state court, cameras or recorders aren't allowed in federal courtrooms. Audio recordings of each day's court proceedings are produced by the court and made available to the public, usually the following day. We usually have them in hand each afternoon. We'll be finding interesting clips and expect to be posting them by late afternoon or early evening each day. Today we have the complete audio from Tuesday's opening statements.

• FBI audio and video. The phone wiretaps and hotel-suite surveillance video recordings will be available eventually, as they were in the Kott trial, but not the next day. They're being played in court but are generally difficult to hear clearly. We will post these when the easier-to-understand original-source recordings are made available -- we're hoping within the next several days.

-- David Hulen, state/local news editor dhulen@adn.com

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1575

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Allen drops blackmail bombshell in Kohring trial testimony

HOME WORK: Secret video and "Red Carpet List" also come up as prosecution rests.

By LISA DEMER and KYLE HOPKINS
Anchorage Daily News

(Published: October 30, 2007)

Former Veco chief Bill Allen was termed a "supporter" in Kohring's computer. ( )

Former Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen, on the witness stand for a second day Monday, revealed that his nephew tried to blackmail him over work done on U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens' home.

That bombshell, a side issue to the main event, came as one of a number of developments Monday in the public corruption trial of former state Rep. Vic Kohring, a Wasilla Republican. Among tidbits presented to jurors:

• A video from February 2005 showed Kohring talking about the possibility of consulting for Veco. It was secretly recorded by Frank Prewitt, then a consultant for the private prison firm Cornell Cos. who was working undercover for the FBI, unknown to his employer.

• A document taken off Kohring's legislative computer titled "Red Carpet List" named his favored office visitors, in four categories: lobbyists, friends, supporters, other. Allen and former Veco vice president Rick Smith were included as "supporters" but not friends. That cuts into one of the main defense arguments, that money given to Kohring by Veco executives was just a gift from friends, not a calculated bribe as prosecutors assert.

• Kohring told FBI agents in a lengthy interview during the Aug. 31, 2006, search of his Wasilla legislative office that he had accepted money from Allen and Smith for his own personal use, as well as campaign contributions. After he thought about it awhile, he described the money as a gift, FBI agent Alan Vanderploeg told jurors.

At day's end, prosecutors rested their case. To wrap up the government's evidence against Kohring, they called a flurry of quick witnesses: state Sen. Tom Wagoner, R-Kenai, who talked about a dustup from a 2003 oil bill; the legislative ethics administrator; and a couple of FBI agents.

Allen decided to cooperate with the feds the day he was first confronted by the FBI, on Aug. 30, 2006. The next day, offices of six legislators were searched by the FBI. He said he was shown the FBI's secretly made recordings, which are the backbone of the government case.

Prosecutor Joe Bottini asked Allen if seeing the recording from March 30, 2006, in which Allen hands money to Kohring, factored into his decision to cooperate.

Yes, Allen answered.

Why? Bottini said.

FBI - Stevens-1576

303KS01.0th 194A-AN-13620-M; 652

"I knew that was ... illegal, what I done," Allen testified.

Over the course of the day, the defense tried to discredit Allen, raise questions about the money given to Kohring and show that in the scheme of things, Kohring was a bit player.

Allen's heated relationship with his nephew, Dave Anderson, first came into public view last month in the corruption trial of former House Speaker Pete Kott. In that trial, the defense pushed Allen on whether he had threatened to have Anderson killed because of the blackmail -- but never asked what the blackmail was all about.

On Monday, Kohring's defense lawyer, John Henry Browne of Seattle, brought up the blackmail anew.

"I was not going to kill him, no," Allen said, as he did in the earlier trial.

Allen, who suffered a head injury in a 2001 motorcycle crash and struggles with words, seemed less addled on the stand than he had been late Friday afternoon.

What was Anderson blackmailing him about? Browne asked.

"Ted Stevens' house," Allen answered.

U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens' official residence, a home in Girdwood, doubled in size during a renovation overseen by Veco in 2000. The Daily News reported in May that the remodel, and Veco's role in it, were part of the far-reaching, ongoing investigation into public corruption in Alaska. In July, FBI and IRS agents spent nearly 12 hours searching the house and documenting the addition. Stevens has denied wrongdoing and has said he paid the bills that were given to him.

Robert Williams, a Veco employee who supervised construction on the house, said in an interview last month that Anderson was a metal worker who helped construct the steel staircase for the Girdwood house.

In court on Monday, Browne asked Allen to confirm that Veco paid for the renovation. Allen said he didn't know what it cost.

Was it a gift to Sen. Stevens? Browne asked.

No, Allen said.

"I didn't know how much the house cost, and I still don't know," Allen said.

Browne asked Allen whether he had cooperated with the government in its investigation into Ted Stevens "and the money Veco gave to help with the house."

FBI - Stevens-1577

Yes, Allen answered.

Browne tried to portray Allen as someone working with federal prosecutors because he has to -- to protect himself, his grown children and his former business.

Veco was sold in September for about $400 million to CH2M Hill. Allen testified that he and his family owned 85 percent of the company at that time.

While Veco has not been charged criminally, Allen never got a written assurance from prosecutors that absolutely protects it from prosecution. He said that he could have sold Veco for more with such a commitment.

On the stand in this trial, as he did in the earlier trial of Kott, Allen said he doesn't care what happens to him.

"Hell, my life is all, all over anyway," he said. "I begged on the pass for Veco and I never got that done, so, you know, to hell with it."

Kohring rubbed his neck as he listened. A scar near his collar is a reminder of the spinal fusion surgery that he says still bothers him, and is one reason he once told the Veco executives he was in debt for medical bills.

Later, Browne asked Allen if he cares what happens to his adult children even if he doesn't care about himself. If prosecutors think Allen hasn't cooperated, can't Allen's children still be indicted? Browne asked.

Yes, Allen said, as one of his daughters, Tammy Kerrigan, watched from the gallery.

As prosecutors neared the end of their case, former Alaska corrections commissioner-turned-consultant Frank Prewitt took the stand, describing a two-hour dinner he had with Kohring on Feb. 15, 2005.

Prewitt wore a hidden camera. In a video played for the jury, he could be heard telling Kohring that Veco is "always giving people consulting contracts."

"You'd think they'd offer you one," Prewitt said.

Kohring could be seen seated across from Prewitt, eating. The camera tilted up when Prewitt took a drink from a mug.

"Well, maybe I should ask them," Kohring said.

Veco already had offered to hire him in some capacity, he said. He soon added he would want a "legitimate arrangement" and said he didn't want a "freebie."

Kohring told Prewitt that Veco had been his biggest political supporter, giving him $40,000 or $50,000 over the years.

Prewitt also asked about a former Kohring aide, Eric Musser. Kohring told Prewitt that Allen leaned on him to get Musser to drop a campaign finance complaint against another Valley legislator, Beverly Masek, a Republican from Willow.

FBI - Stevens-1578

In the tape, Kohring doesn't say he fired Musser -- something prosecutors assert -- but said he didn't like that the aide filed the complaint without telling him.

As for Masek, Kohring said: "In some ways, I wanted her to at least get a slap on the wrist and be held accountable for what she had done."

At one point in the video, Kohring said that Allen is on his "red carpet list" of friends and supporters -- people who are welcomed in his office at any time.

Prosecutors showed the jury a copy of that list. It included 22 names -- 10 lobbyists, eight people listed as "personal friends" and four people described as "supporters."

Allen, Smith and former Veco president Pete Leathard were all listed as supporters.

It wasn't clear at day's end whether Kohring would testify or whether the defense would put on a case at all. Browne told Sedwick he honestly didn't know.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390. Find Kyle Hopkins online at adn.com/contact/khopkins or call 257-4334. Daily News reporter Richard Mauer contributed to this story.

VIDEO: Frank Prewitt's secret recording of Vic Kohring. adn.com/fbi

BLOG: "Red Carpet List" and live trial updates. adn.com/alaskapolitics

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1579

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Defense rests without Kohring's testimony

DEFENSE RESTS: Nephew of ex-legislator, longtime friend give their testimony.

By LISA DEMER and KYLE HOPKINS
Anchorage Daily News

(Published: October 31, 2007)

Bill Allen ( )

The defense case for former state Rep. Vic Kohring consisted of two witnesses who on Tuesday spent just an hour on the stand between them: Kohring's 19-year-old nephew and a longtime Kohring friend and political adviser from the Mat-Su area.

The Wasilla Republican never testified. His lawyer, John Henry Browne, hinted at several points during the trial that Kohring would do so. But it's always a gamble for a defendant to face prosecutors, and Browne said Tuesday they decided there was no need.

"It's definitely a tough call," Browne said. "We agonized until 12 or 1 o'clock last night and we were ready to go either way today. And my feeling is that they just haven't proven the case."

Closing arguments in the corruption case are set for this morning.

Jurors will have to decide whether Kohring solicited and accepted bribes from executives with the former Veco Corp. to push the oil field service company's interests on an oil tax and other matters. The defense says the money Kohring took was simply gifts from friends. Veco is no more -- it was sold to CH2M Hill in September.

If the jury believes former Veco chief executive Bill Allen, "we're in trouble," Browne said. Allen testified about making payments to Kohring during last year's legislative session -- hundreds of dollars in cash handed to him in front of a secret FBI surveillance camera in Veco's hotel suite, $1,000 in cash during dinner at a Juneau-area bar, several hundred dollars more on the last night of a special session. Allen said he gave Kohring cash multiple other times going back to 2002.

Browne said Allen shouldn't be believed, that he would lie to save his adult children, who were part owners of Veco, from prosecution.

The bribes, prosecutors say, consist of $2,100 to $2,600 in 2006, the $3,000 summer job for Kohring's nephew, and an attempt to get another $17,000 from the Veco executives to pay off a credit card bill. In all, Kohring faces four felony counts: bribery, conspiracy, extortion and attempted extortion.

NEPHEW'S TESTIMONY

FBI - Stevens-1580

On Tuesday, Aaron Kohring took the stand for the defense to tell jurors about his 2006 summer job with Veco.

Prosecutors say that Aaron was hired for a well-paying summer internship because Kohring pulled strings with Veco executives.

304KS01.04h 194A-AN-13620-M;653

Aaron's a tall, athletic-looking young man with close-cropped hair. He was a basketball star in high school. He wore a tan sweater and seemed calm on the stand, though he said later said it was difficult for him.

Under questioning by Browne, he told jurors that he was exceptionally close to his uncle.

"I grew up without a father and Vic has always been there kind of filling that role, pretty much," Aaron told jurors.

Aaron said his Uncle Vic told him in early 2006 that positions were opening up at Veco. He was 17, about to graduate from high school, and needed a summer job. Someone at Veco, not his uncle, told him he was hired. He said his job ended up being "mainly a facility position or a facility worker, I guess you'd call it."

He worked eight hours a day, made $16 an hour, and used the money to help pay for his first year as a petroleum engineering student at the University of Alaska Fairbanks and to cover some bills at home, he said.

Then it was prosecutor Joe Bottini's turn to ask the questions. Under cross examination, Aaron said that Kohring helped him put his resume together. And his uncle either e-mailed it or hand-delivered it to Veco.

Asked by Bottini whether he ever interviewed for the job, he said he didn't.

"You basically give a resume to your uncle, as far as you know, that gets turned in to Veco?"

"Mm-hmm," Aaron responded

"And then someone calls you and says you're hired, right?"

"Mm-hmm," he said.

Wasn't the job basically moving furniture, emptying recycling bins, rearranging cubicles? Aaron agreed it was manual labor.

Prosecutors have made a point that he also got $24 an hour for overtime but Aaron said he only made that two or three times for working through lunch.

Later Tuesday after the defense wrapped up, prosecutors called Kari MacDonald, a recruiting specialist for Veco who now works for CH2M Hill.

FBI - Stevens-1581

She said the summer internship was supposed to be a mentorship for college juniors and seniors, not new high school graduates.

So why was Aaron Kohring hired? Bottini asked.

"He was referred to us by Bill Allen," MacDonald said. Former Veco vice president Rick Smith earlier testified that he wrote the referral that mentioned Aaron was Kohring's nephew, but he signed Allen's name.

Without that, MacDonald said she "highly doubted" Aaron would have been hired.

Also on Tuesday, the defense called Robert Hall, owner of Gorilla Fireworks in Houston, a lawyer and a political consultant to Kohring.

He is 49, the same age as Kohring, and they went to Dimond High together. He described Kohring as "a friend and client."

Hall, wearing black jeans and a plaid shirt with pearl buttons, spoke softly, but also conversationally, sometimes directly talking to the jury. He looks like an older version of the actor Jack Black.

Both sides seemed to use him as a surrogate for Kohring. Browne asked Hall about former Kohring aide Eric Musser.

Prosecutors say Allen asked Kohring in 2004 to get Musser to drop a campaign money complaint against then-Rep. Beverly Masek, R-Willow. They also say Kohring laid off Musser and then made the layoff permanent. But they didn't call Musser to testify.

"Was Mr. Musser ever fired by Mr. Kohring?" Browne asked.

"No, he was not," Hall replied.

After hearing about Hall's testimony, Musser called into the Mike Porcaro talk show on KENI-AM to tell his side of the story. He told Porcaro that he did, indeed, get fired.

"How would Robert know? He wasn't my boss. I mean, I didn't work for Robert Hall," Musser said. "... Mr. Hall's memory must be eluding him."

CAMPAIGN HELP

Prosecutor Edward Sullivan, with the U.S. Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, D.C., tried to show the business and political ties between Hall and Kohring in cross examining Hall.

Hall said that he and his wife and probably his father had given to Kohring's campaigns. "We loaned him a truck, but it was in my wife's name, and I declared that as a contribution," Hall said.

He said all he got out of lending the truck was a full tank of gas and a lube job.

The prosecutor asked about different businesses or companies Hall owned -- a coffee stand, fireworks stands, a company called Alaska Nanometal, a media business that placed ads for Kohring.

Since 2000, the prosecutor asked, is it true that Hall's media business has been paid more than $63,000 by Kohring's campaigns?

"That could be," Hall said, including the costs of buying ads.

FBI - Stevens-1582

Sullivan asked Hall where Kohring stayed when he was working as a legislator in Juneau.

Kohring was first elected in 1994 and at first lived with roommates, Hall said. Then Kohring slept on a boat and then in a camper, he said. The last six to eight years, Kohring slept on a couch in his office, Hall said.

Would Hall be surprised to hear that Kohring made nearly $100,000, including his base salary and consulting work? Sullivan asked.

"Well, I think that would only be one year. ... I think the other years, it would have topped out at ($80,000) or so," Hall said.

Sullivan asked Hall whether Kohring performed "official acts" to help his fireworks business.

"On several occasions," Hall answered.

Sullivan asked him whether he knew of proposals to restrict fireworks after the enormous 1996 Miller's Reach fire. Hall at first said he didn't. He said there was never an official cause but that officials found bottle rockets twisted together and buried near where the fire started.

Didn't Hall remember Kohring "running around the halls of the governor's office trying to address this fireworks issue?" Sullivan asked. Hall said he remembers efforts to restrict fireworks for safety reasons.

After both sides wrapped up Tuesday morning, Kohring told reporters he felt confident but acknowledged: "There's no guarantees. You're rolling the dice when you go to trial."

He showed reporters something he's had with him throughout the trial: An icon of St. Victor. He said his wife, who is Russian, gave it to him in 2003 "to keep me safe and successful."

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390. Find Kyle Hopkins online at adn.com/contact/khopkins or call 257-4334.

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1583

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Ex-legislator's call for new trial disputed by federal attorneys

CORRUPTION: His lawyer says jurors convicted him on an incorrect charge.

By PAT FORGEY
Juneau Empire
(Published: October 31, 2007)

Pete Kott (Erik Hill)

Federal prosecutors are urging the judge who presided over the trial in which former state House Speaker Pete Kott was convicted of bribery to reject Kott's request for a new trial.

They said Kott knew what he was doing when he accepted bribes for taking official action.

Kott represented Eagle River as a Republican in the state House of Representatives for seven terms but moved to Juneau after losing a 2006 re-election bid.

Prosecutor James Goeke, an assistant U.S. attorney with the Department of Justice's Public Integrity Sections, said the verdict was clear.

"The jury heard evidence of Kott's receipt of things of value, Kott's performance of official acts, and Kott's own words connecting the two," he said.

After Kott's conviction on multiple criminal counts, his attorney called the verdict flawed, and asked Judge John Sedwick to set it aside.

Attorney James Wendt claimed Kott's conviction was actually for taking "illegal campaign contributions," which prosecutors hotly disputed.

"The government stridently disagrees with Kott's characterization as such, and noted that it is in fact Kott, who repeatedly, and for his own benefit, attempted to portray these payments as a benefit to Kott's campaign," Goeke said.

The federal prosecutors said they presented evidence that, despite Kott's claims, the payments had been made as bribes, not campaign contributions.

FBI - Stevens-1584

Goeke also said that Kott's claims of a "legislative immunity doctrine" were without merit, or even without an explanation of what such a doctrine was supposed to be.

"To the extent that Kott claims that his official acts as a legislator cannot be used against him in a criminal trial, the law is squarely to the contrary," Goeke said.

Kott was convicted on three felony counts in late September. His attorney filed a request for a new trial a week later.

Sentencing is set for Dec. 7 in Anchorage.

304KS02.07th 194A-AN-13620-M1,654

Print Page Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1585

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Jury begins deliberations in Kohring trial

Were cash and favors evidence of corruption or camaraderie?

by LISA DEMER and KYLE HOPKINS

(Published: October 31, 2007)

Jurors deliberating the corruption case against former state Rep. Vic Kohring were wrestling with two opposing pictures laid out Wednesday by lawyers on each side:

Manipulative state lawmaker on the take, or well-meaning public servant who took some gifts from friends.

Former state Rep. Vic Kohring talks to the media at the Anchorage federal courthouse Wednesday Oct. 31, 2007, after his federal corruption case was sent to the jury. "I'm at peace with myself regardless of the outcome," Kohring said. "I'm alive and I'm healthy and I've got a lot of support out there." (BOB HALLINEN / Anchorage Daily News)

The lawyers gave dramatic closing arguments -- with visual aids and stage whispers -- on the trial's eighth day in U.S. District Court. The case went to jurors just before noon.

Prosecutors told jurors they had plenty of evidence that Kohring knew how to work Veco Corp. executives with his hand out -- for free meals, an internship for his nephew, help with a credit card debt, payments of cash.

Prosecutor Edward Sullivan walked jurors through meetings and phone conversations between Kohring and Veco executives Bill Allen and Rick Smith during the 2006 legislation session. None of them knew it, but the FBI was recording them.

A freeze-frame image of Kohring smiling as he accepted a handful of cash from Allen flashed behind Sullivan on the big screen in Courtroom 3. It came from an FBI recording made on March 30, 2006, in Suite 604 of Juneau's Baranof Hotel.

Bill Allen ( )

"Take a look at that picture," Sullivan told jurors. "Folks, that is not a gift. That's a payoff. That is a bribe."

Sullivan, who is with the U.S. Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, D.C., reminded jurors what Kohring said after accepting two cash payments that day from the Veco executives.

"He asks for instructions. 'What can I do to help you guys at this point?' " Sullivan said.

Kohring, a Wasilla Republican elected seven times, is the third former state lawmaker to stand trial this year for bribery and other crimes in the wide-ranging federal investigation into corruption in Alaska politics. Kohring is charged with bribery, conspiracy, extortion and attempted extortion.

FBI - Stevens-1586

305K501.0th 194A-AN-13620-m;655

During the 2006 legislative session, Veco was pushing a new oil tax regime. North Slope oil producers wanted to lock in tax stability before they would commit to a natural gas pipeline that could have been enormously lucrative to Veco.

Vic Kohring and his lawyer Henry Browne talk to the media and leave the courthouse after his federal bribery case went to the jury on today. (BOB HALLINEN / Anchorage Daily News)

But defense lawyer John Henry Browne of Seattle told jurors that the prosecution's case was weak and that parts of it had fallen apart before their eyes. Kohring always thought the money he accepted was simply gifts from friends, not bribes, he said.

Browne put up a series of posters starting with one that said, in all caps, "NOT GUILTY MEANS NOT PROVEN."

NATURE OF FRIENDSHIP

Prosecutors told jurors Kohring may have socialized with Allen and Smith, but it was really a business relationship.

While Browne told jurors at the trial's start that Kohring and Allen were close because of relationships with Russian women, Allen testified that wasn't so, Sullivan told jurors. He hadn't even met Kohring's wife, who is Russian. She lives near Portland, Ore., and did not attend the trial.

"The only thing Vic Kohring brought to this party ... was his legislative hat," Sullivan said. And "he's not shy about putting it out and asking them for money."

Sullivan said Allen and Smith had a secret. The prosecutor walked closer to the jurors, talking to them in a stage whisper: They knew "this guy," who never voted for a tax, was going to support the tax rate supported by Veco and the North Slope oil producers.

Sullivan talked about how it was always Kohring who called Smith -- not the other way around -- with Kohring saying he'd lobby colleagues and advocate good things for Veco.

Kohring was playing Allen and pleading poverty, Sullivan said, while he was making about $100,000 -- counting his salary, legislative per diem money and consulting work. But he never let on to Allen about that "because that's going to stop the money train," Sullivan said.

In a March 4, 2006, video, Allen tells Smith about $1,000 that he gave to Kohring during a dinner among the three at the Juneau-area Island Pub. Prosecutors played it Wednesday so jurors could again hear Allen tell Smith that Kohring would now "kiss our ass."

Sullivan: "Is there anything else I need to say about the relationship between Veco and Vic Kohring?"

FBI - Stevens-1587

DEFENSE DIGS AT ALLEN, FBI

Browne tried hard to discredit Allen, who testified for the government that he had made cash payments to Kohring going back to 2002. The only way they can convict Kohring, Browne said, is if they believe Allen. He pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy and is cooperating with the government. Allen will say anything to protect his grown children, who were part-owners of Veco, from being prosecuted, Browne said. The company was sold last month for about $400 million.

Browne called Allen blasphemous, rude, arrogant, grandiose, intoxicated and obsessed with power.

"He has a memory problem. He has a brain injury. He obviously drinks too much," Browne said. "His demeanor on the stand was completely self-serving and basically pathetic."

Would you, Browne asked jurors, base a big life decision on what Allen had to say, or even buy a car from him?

The feds started investigating corruption in Alaska years ago with the help of Frank Prewitt -- a former corrections commissioner turned consultant -- who himself was in trouble and decided to cooperate by working undercover, Browne said.

"And when the names came out, the FBI started drooling," he said. Those names, he said, included U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens; his son, former Senate President Ben Stevens; U.S. Rep. Don Young; and former state Reps. Bruce Weyhrauch, Pete Kott, Tom Anderson.

"And one of the names they heard was Mr. Kohring," Browne said.

So the FBI cast a huge web, he said, and Kohring was caught up in it.

He told jurors he believes the government lawyers realized just before the trial that Kohring didn't vote for the oil tax that ultimately passed last August.

"The government's case was a mistake. It was falling apart," Browne said. But prosecutors told jurors that Kohring did vote Veco's way on the tax.

In the March 30, 2006, video, Kohring is asking for help from Allen and Smith in paying off a $17,000 credit card debt from a surgery. He suggests he could get a loan or work from Veco.

Allen hands Kohring $100 he got from Smith to put in a plastic Easter egg for his stepdaughter. Then, when Kohring mentions he just sent his stepdaughter money for a Girl Scout uniform, Allen reaches into his front pocket, pulls out another $600 to $700 he had stashed there for Kohring, and hands it over too.

Browne dismissed those payments as "money for Easter eggs."

Why, Browne asked, didn't the government, with all its resources, call as witnesses legislators who Kohring supposedly lobbied to help Veco?

"Let me tell you, there is absolutely no end to that deep pocket," Browne said. At the trial, "you saw FBI agents flown in from all over the country, New York, Texas, California."

FBI - Stevens-1588

PROSECUTION STRIKES BACK

Prosecutor Joe Bottini, an assistant U.S. attorney based in Anchorage, wrapped up the government's case looking to deliver a counterpunch to points made by Browne:

• If Browne thought jurors needed to hear from more witnesses, he could have called them himself, Bottini said. Subpoenas look the same for the defense as the prosecution, he said, holding up an 8 1/2 by 11 piece of paper. As for the prosecution only playing select parts of the Kohring tapes, Bottini said: "If he thought there was something that we were hiding from you in this trial, hit play. It's the button with the little arrow on it."

• Bottini reminded jurors that Browne called Prewitt, a government witness, a "sleazy lobbyist."

"It didn't stop this guy from going out to dinner with him, and getting his meal paid for by Mr. Prewitt," Bottini said, pointing at Kohring.

• On Browne's comments that Allen was an unreliable witness, Bottini told jurors that the brain injury affects his ability to express himself, not his thought process. Allen ran one of the biggest companies in Alaska for years after his injury, he said. He'd clearly been drinking in some of the videos, Bottini said, but wasn't incoherent.

Ultimately, Bottini said, Kohring knew "what it took to get Mr. Allen to give him things. Kohring turned this guy into a human ATM machine."

As he wound down his argument, Bottini put one of the defense lawyer's posters back on the easel. He took a black marker to it, crossing through some of the words until two were left: "GUILTY PROVEN."

After a few hours of deliberations, jurors asked to watch one of the surveillance videos again. Just after 4:30 p.m., they left for the day, still undecided.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390. Find Kyle Hopkins online at adn.com/contact/khopkins or call 257-4334.

The Kohring case: Is the ex-legislator guilty or innocent?

THE PROSECUTION

• Kohring received multiple cash payments from Allen over the years and learned to call Veco execs when he needed something: Money, a truck, a free meal.

• Unaware he's being recorded, Allen can be heard saying he gave Kohring $1,000 in a conversation about doing whatever it takes to pass Veco's favored oil tax bill.

• Kohring unlocked a bill from his committees, let go a valued aide and stayed out of a Mat-Su Senate race, all at Allen's request.

• Everything Allen says is backed by recordings or other testimony, including a video on which Kohring tells Veco execs he'd racked up $17,000 in debt and needs help. He is seen taking cash from Allen, then promising to lobby his colleagues on Veco's behalf.

THE DEFENSE

FBI - Stevens-1589

• There's no proof Kohring was given cash for anything except Easter eggs and a Girl Scout uniform for his daughter.

• Much of the feds' case relies on the word of former Veco chief Bill Allen, who is now a convicted felon trying to protect his kids from indictments. Because of a head injury, the jury saw Allen struggling to express himself on the stand.

• In secretly made FBI recordings, Kohring says he wants any work he does for Veco to be legitimate. No freebies, he says.

• Two words: Prove it. The defense says prosecutors failed to show, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Kohring traded political influence for money.

Print Page Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1590

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Kohring neither defiant nor remorseful

Jurors decide ex-legislator took money to sway oil tax

By LISA DEMER and KYLE HOPKINS
Anchorage Daily News

(Published: October 31, 2007)

Less than an hour after a federal jury convicted former state Rep. Vic Kohring of public corruption charges on Thursday, he apologized to the people of Alaska for the stress and trauma of the investigation and trial.

But he stopped short of accepting responsibility for the crimes of bribery, conspiracy and attempted extortion -- crimes he now stands convicted of committing.

Kohring is on a tightrope. If he accepts blame now, he could spoil any appeal. But if he's defiant, prosecutors are sure to point that out when it's time to be sentenced.

"I expected this as a possible outcome and, as I said yesterday, I'm going to accept it and move on regardless," said Kohring, 49.

The 12-member jury convicted Kohring, a Wasilla Republican, on three of four counts, concluding that he sold his office to the oil-field service company Veco Corp. and former executives Bill Allen and Rick Smith, who pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy and cooperated with the government.

Jurors found that he conspired with Allen and Smith to push a new oil tax favored by North Slope oil producers through the Legislature in 2006, tried to extort them to pay his $17,000 credit card debt, and took bribes from them.

But jurors also issued one "not guilty" verdict. Kohring was acquitted of extorting money, and a summer job for his nephew, from Allen, Veco's former chief executive, and Smith, a former vice president.

Kohring's defense asserted that it was friendship, not greed and politics, that led Kohring to ask Allen and Smith for money and do Veco's bidding in Juneau.

The government says he knew what he was doing. Kohring "betrayed his oath of office and the people of Alaska when he deliberately and repeatedly took bribes in exchange for official acts," assistant attorney general Alice Fisher of the U.S. Justice

Former state Rep. Vic Kohring and his attorney John Henry Browne speak to the media outside the Federal Courthouse in Anchorage on Thursday, after Kohring was convicted on three of four counts of corruption for selling influence to Veco Corp. executives. A federal jury found him guilty of conspiracy, attempted extortion and bribery. He was found not guilty of extortion.. ( )

Former state Rep. Vic Kohring talks to the media at the Anchorage federal courthouse Wednesday Oct. 31, 2007, after his federal corruption case was sent to the jury. "I'm at peace with myself regardless of the outcome," Kohring said. "I'm alive and I'm healthy and I've got a lot of support out there." (BOB HALLINEN / Anchorage Daily News)

FBI - Stevens-1591

309KS01.0th 194A-AN-13620-M:656

Department in Washington, D.C., said in a written statement. She thanked the federal prosecutors and FBI agents.

Former state Rep. Vic Kohring was convicted today on three of four counts of corruption for selling influence to Veco Corp. executives. A federal jury found him guilty of conspiracy, attempted extortion and bribery. He was found not guilty of extortion. (BILL ROTH / Anchorage Daily News)

As they left the Federal Building, jurors looked drained but relieved after roughly nine hours of deliberations over two days. Only a few would talk. They said they anguished over their decision.

One, who declined to be identified other than as "juror No. 8," said "they didn't get the sharks. They got the minnow."

Most felt sorry for Kohring and saw him as "a very sympathetic figure," said Alan Rowe, juror No. 12.

"The circumstances surrounding the case were tragic," said Rowe, a courier for Cal Worthington Ford who plays keyboard in a classic rock and soul band called Al and the Kaholics.

Kohring seemed like he really wanted what's best for Alaska but showed poor judgment when he got in cahoots with Veco executives, Rowe said.

Kohring couldn't get past the damning videotapes secretly filmed in Veco's suite in Juneau's Baranof Hotel and the telephone wiretaps.

But surprisingly, Rowe said, the most convincing FBI recording wasn't the one from March 30, 2006, in which Kohring is seen twice taking cash from Allen. Defense lawyer John Henry Browne's characterization of that scene as the "Easter egg incident" resonated with jurors, Rowe said. In the video, Allen tells Kohring the money is to be put in plastic Easter eggs and to help out with a Girl Scout uniform for his stepdaughter.

"We didn't want to implicate the little girl," Rowe said.

But jurors believed that Allen slipped Kohring $1,000 during a Feb. 23, 2006, dinner at the Juneau-area Island Pub, and that the money was a bribe, Rowe said. On a surveillance video less than two weeks later, Allen and Smith talk about the payment and how Kohring would now "kiss our ass."

On the conspiracy count, Rowe said, the strongest evidence came from a June 8, 2006, recording that jurors asked to see again during deliberations.

It was the last night of a special session on the oil tax, by then at a rate higher than Veco wanted. Kohring tells Allen he would have done what Veco wanted to upend the bill, even if it hurt him politically.

FBI - Stevens-1592

Jurors didn't think much of the allegation that Kohring was bribed when he secured a summer internship at Veco for his nephew, Rowe said. "We're all thinking, 'So what?' This is the way the world works."

Talking to a few reporters outside the courtroom doors just after the verdict, Kohring described the jurors as "good people" with the right intentions, and said he wanted to thank them for their hard work. He thanked the people of Alaska too, for his more than 12 years in office. He also wanted to say he was sorry.

"Just to apologize to these same people, including my family and friends, for the trauma they experienced, as I did, over the last 14 months, leading up to today," Kohring said.

His friend Fred James, who sat behind Kohring each day of the trial, said he thought Kohring was done in by pre-trial publicity, tried and convicted in the Daily News and on television. Asked if he agreed, Kohring said, "I think in part, yes."

Browne had tried to get the trial moved outside of Alaska, but U.S. District Judge John Sedwick rejected that. The judge questioned jurors extensively and excluded those who had already made up their minds.

Kohring and his lawyer walked downstairs to face a semicircle of microphones and TV cameras and answer more questions.

Does he still maintain his innocence?

"I'd rather not go there at this point," Kohring said.

Browne said they hadn't decided whether to appeal but had several possible points, including the fact that they hadn't been allowed to put on character witnesses.

"We have an outcome here that is difficult for me, of course," Kohring said. "But I've got a great future ahead of me and I'm looking forward to that future."

His wife, Tatiana, is supportive and they've been talking regularly, he said, though she couldn't be there for the trial. She lives near Portland, Ore.

Kohring said he didn't regret not taking a plea deal. There was never a reasonable offer anyway, Browne said.

After court on Thursday, prosecutor Joe Bottini took the unusual step of singling out prosecution witness Frank Prewitt, who has been working undercover for the FBI since 2004. Prewitt was a minor witness in the Kohring trial, but his work helped investigators get the evidence they needed for wiretaps on phones and bugs planted in Suite 604 at the Baranof.

While Browne called Prewitt a "sleazy lobbyist" in his closing argument Wednesday, Bottini said that's not how the government feels about him.

"Nothing can be further from the truth," Bottini said. Prewitt has done a "tremendous" job for the government, he said. "We owe him a lot, frankly."

Kohring was the third person convicted by a jury in the government's wide-ranging corruption scandal. It has yet to lose a case. Juries took about the same amount of time to convict the first two, ex-Reps. Pete Kott and Tom Anderson.

Judge Sedwick set Kohring's sentencing for Feb. 6. Prosecutors estimated that Kohring could be facing three to five years.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390. Find Kyle Hopkins online at adn.com/contact/khopkins or call 257-4334.

FBI - Stevens-1593

Reaction from Juneau

• The FBI's and U.S. Justice Department's investigation into public corruption in Alaska continues. It's unclear when, or whether, additional charges will be filed, and officials will not discuss the investigation's targets. But at least two other current or former lawmakers have been identified in charging documents and testimony as committing illegal acts in cahoots with Veco officials: former state Sen. Ben Stevens and current Sen. John Cowdery, both Anchorage Republicans.

• Sentencing for former House Speaker Pete Kott, convicted of bribery, extortion and conspiracy in September, is set for Dec. 7. Kohring is the third former state representative convicted since the wide-ranging federal investigation of public corruption burst into view last August with the simultaneous searches of six state lawmakers' offices. So far:

• Former Rep. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage, was convicted in July of bribery, money laundering and other charges for taking payoffs from a consultant.

• Former House Speaker Pete Kott, R-Eagle River, was convicted of bribery, extortion and conspiracy in September for his dealings with Veco executives on oil tax legislation last year.

• Former Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, R-Juneau, was charged with bribery and other crimes for his dealings with Veco executives. He's awaiting trial while questions about evidence in his case are appealed.

• Former Veco CEO Bill Allen pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy for his dealing with Kott, Kohring, Weyhrauch and other lawmakers. He's awaiting sentencing.

• Former Veco vice president Rick Smith pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy for his dealing with Kott, Kohring, Weyhrauch and other lawmakers. He's awaiting sentencing.

• Former lobbyist Bill Bobrick, a longtime lobbyist on the city level, pleaded guilty to conspiracy for bribing Anderson. He's awaiting sentencing.

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1594

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Former legislator set to enter Oregon federal prison Dec. 3 5-YEAR SENTENCE: Anderson was first convicted in FBI investigation.

The Associated Press

(Published: November 13, 2007)

A former Alaska lawmaker convicted of seven counts of conspiracy and bribery will begin his five-year federal prison sentence next month.

Former Rep. Tom Anderson on Monday told Anchorage television station KTUU that he will report to a federal prison south of Portland, Ore., on Dec. 3.

Anderson, 40, a two-term Republican from Anchorage who chose not to run for re-election in 2006, was convicted in July of taking nearly $24,000 he thought was coming from a private prison firm, Cornell Industries Inc., in exchange for his assistance on legislation.

The money was supplied by the FBI through an informant under contract to Cornell, Frank Prewitt, a former Alaska Department of Corrections commissioner. Prewitt secretly recorded his conversations with Anderson and a co-conspirator, lobbyist Bill Bobrick, between July 2004 and March 2005. Cornell Industries was not aware of the bribery scheme or investigation.

The 60-month sentence fell within the presentencing report guidelines of 51 to 63 months.

Anderson was the first of four former Republican Alaska lawmakers arrested on federal corruption charges.

Former House Speaker Pete Kott was convicted in October of conspiracy to solicit financial benefits, extortion and bribery. He will be sentenced Dec. 7.

Former state Rep. Vic Kohring was convicted earlier this month of bribery, conspiracy to commit extortion and attempted interference with commerce by extortion. He was acquitted of another count of interference with commerce by extortion. Sentencing was set Feb. 6.

The corruption trial of former state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch has been delayed.

Print Page Close Window

FBI - Stevens-1595

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

317KS01.0th 194A-AN-13620-M:657

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) C-1 & C-3
FRONTIERSMAN

Date: 9/21/2007
Edition:

Title: FORMER LAWMAKER APOLOGIZES FOR LANGUAGE, BUT PROCLAIMS INNOCENCE

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ;658
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

Former lawmaker apologizes for language, but proclaims innocence

BY DAN JOLING
Associated Press Writer

ANCHORAGE, (AP) — A former state legislator on Thursday apologized to jurors for foul language the FBI secretly caught him spouting in wiretaps and a hidden camera while investigating him on corruption charges.

Former state Rep. Pete Kott, a seven-term Republican who represented Eagle River on Anchorage's north side, said going to trial has cost him relationships with people and probably his legacy. It has been a tremendous embarrassment to him and his family, he said.

However, "I believe I had to go through this," he said. "I don't believe the charges are correct, that I'm not guilty, but I had to go through this no matter what."

Kott is charged with conspiracy to solicit financial benefits for his service as a legislator, extortion "under color of official right" and bribery. A fourth charge, wire fraud, is based on a phone call he made from Washington, D.C., while on legislative business. In the phone call, he sought the phone number of a lobbyist and ended up speaking about official business that prosecutors contend was part of a conspiracy.

Kott stands accused of accepting nearly $9,000, a political poll and the promise of a future job from officials of VECO Corp., a major oil field services company.

Former VECO chairman Bill Allen and Rick Smith, a vice president for legislative affairs, have pleaded guilty to bribing Kott and other lawmakers. They testified last week that they used Kott to push a revised crude oil tax with terms favorable to clients in the petroleum industry.

The measure was considered a law that could lead producers to begin negotiating for construction of a natural gas pipeline tapping Alaska's vast North Slope reserves. That project carries a price tag in the tens of billions of dollars. VECO would have been in position to bid on the pipeline or other oil field work.

Prosecutors could get their chance to question Kott as early as Thursday afternoon.

Defense attorney James Wendt acknowledges that Kott worked with VECO officials as documented in the secret recordings made by the FBI. However, he says it was not against the law for a lawmaker to work with company officials on legislation desired by most Alaskans.

See KOTT, Page C3

KOTT

Continued from Page C1

In painstaking detail starting Wednesday afternoon and continuing into Thursday morning, Wendt led Kott through the history of the crude oil tax bill, seeking to establish that Kott was not acting in lockstep with VECO officials.

VECO officials backed a version of the bill calling for a 20 percent tax rate. Kott, reviewing the official House record of votes during the regular legislative session and two special sessions, noted that he had never had the opportunity to vote on that rate.

Kott initially backed the 20 percent level, he said, but compromised as it became apparent that some of his colleagues and the state Senate would hold out for a higher rate.

"We were just looking for a way to bring closure to the issue," he said.

At one point late in the regular session in May 2006, Kott himself offered an amendment that would have set the tax rate at 21.5 percent. Kott also voted for the final version of the measure in the second special session that ended in July 2006 and carried a rate of 22.5 percent.

Kott's polite testimony was in contrast to the vulgarities displayed in the recordings, and Kott addressed that directly to jurors.

"I apologize for the videos that have been presented during the course of this trial," he said.

His 22-year Air Force career and 14 years in the legislature, including two as speaker, likely will be overshadowed by the trial, he said.

"I think people will forget about the good things and remember the bad things," Kott said.

FBI - Stevens-1596

AN-13620-M;658

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) B-1
ANCHORAGE DAILY NEWS

Date: 10/31/2007
Edition:

Title: KOTT'S CALL FOR NEW TRIAL DISPUTED BY FEDERAL ATTORNEYS

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ; 659
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

FBI - Stevens-1597

194A-AN-13620-M; 659

Kott's call for new trial disputed by federal attorneys

CORRUPTION: His lawyer says jurors convicted him on an incorrect charge.

By PAT FORGEY
Juneau Empire

Federal prosecutors are urging the judge who presided over the trial in which former state House Speaker Pete Kott was convicted of bribery to reject Kott's request for a new trial.

They said Kott knew what he was doing when he accepted bribes for taking official action.

Kott represented Eagle River as a Republican in the state House of Representatives for seven terms but moved to Juneau after losing a 2006 re-election bid.

Kott

Prosecutor James Goeke, an assistant U.S. attorney with the Department of Justice's Public Integrity Sections, said the verdict was clear.

"The jury heard evidence of Kott's receipt of things of value, Kott's performance of official acts, and Kott's own words connecting the two," he said.

After Kott's conviction on multiple criminal counts, his attorney called the verdict flawed, and asked Judge John Sedwick to set it aside.

Attorney James Wendt claimed Kott's conviction was actually for taking "illegal campaign contributions," which prosecutors hotly disputed.

"The government stridently disagrees with Kott's characterization as such, and noted that it is in fact Kott, who repeatedly, and for his own benefit, attempted to portray these payments as a benefit to Kott's campaign," Goeke said.

The federal prosecutors said they presented evidence that, despite Kott's claims, the payments had been made as bribes, not campaign contributions.

Goeke also said that Kott's claims of a "legislative immunity doctrine" were without merit, or even without an explanation of what such a doctrine was supposed to be.

"To the extent that Kott claims that his official acts as a legislator cannot be used against him in a criminal trial, the law is squarely to the contrary," Goeke said.

Kott was convicted on three felony counts in late September. His attorney filed a request for a new trial a week later.

Sentencing is set for Dec. 7 in Anchorage.

FBI - Stevens-1598

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) C6

FRONTIERSMAN

Date: ~~01/15/2008~~ 9/16/2007

Edition:

Title: PALIN WANTS REVIEW OF SENATE RULES CHAIRMAN

Character:

or

Classification: AN-13620-M ;660

Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

FBI - Stevens-1599

194A-AN-13620-M;660

Palin wants review of Senate rules chairman

BY STEVE QUINN
Associated Press Writer

JUNEAU, Alaska (AP) — Gov. Sarah Palin said on Monday that Senate leaders should review whether Anchorage Republican John Cowdery is qualified to remain the Senate's Rules Committee chairman.

On Friday, a former oil field services executive testified that Cowdery was among five lawmakers he bribed for favorable influence on oil tax legislation.

Cowdery was among six legislators whose offices the FBI raided last year. He has not been charged, but was named in testimony during former Rep. Pete Kott's federal corruption trial last week.

Palin stopped short of calling for Cowdery to be stripped of his title, saying that decision rests with Senate leaders who initially put him in that position.

The rules chairman is considered the gatekeeper of all legislation that reaches the Senate floor for a vote.

"With that confirmation in testimony, I would think that the Senate leadership would want to address the issue," Palin said. "We haven't heard them address it yet.

"And we haven't heard what Senate leadership intends to do about the allegations, especially now that the names have been made public."

Senate President Lyda Green, R-Wasilla, did not immediately return requests for comment Monday.

Cowdery is out of town and unavailable for comment, said Jeff Turner, press secretary for the Senate majority, made up of six Republicans and nine Democrats.

After federal agents searched his office last August, Cowdery was among the first to respond.

"It's pretty bizarre," he said in a prepared statement. "That's all I know. It's pretty bizarre. I haven't done anything wrong."

A special session looms next month on oil taxes, called in part to review how the Legislature in 2006 passed a new tax on the oil industry. The issue dominated the session and is at the heart of charges against three former lawmakers, including Kott.

"At the very least the leadership needs to look at can we go through a special session and evaluate the proposal?"

- Gene Therriault, Minority Leader R-North Pole

Having Cowdery remain as Rules Committee chairman for the session that starts Oct. 18 has some lawmakers nervous.

"At the very least the leadership needs to look at can we go through a special session and evaluate the proposal?" said Minority Leader Gene Therriault, R-North Pole.

Cowdery's appointment came under scrutiny Jan. 16 during the first Senate floor session when committee appointments received a vote.

Therriault, whose minority group is made up of five Republicans, raised the issue then, but Cowdery was approved along coalition lines, 15-5.

Therriault believes testimony last week from former VECO Corp. Vice President Rick Smith — in which Smith didn't elaborate on how he allegedly bribed Cowdery — warrants revisting Cowdery's leadership role.

"Now there appears even more reason to be concerned about public perception over Senator Cowdery remaining in a leadership position," Therriault said.

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) C-1 & C-6
FRONTIERSMAN

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

Date: 09/18/2007
Edition: TUESDAY

Title: VECO OFFICIAL ACKNOWLEDGES ORGANIZING FUNDRAISER FOR YOUNG

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ; 6661
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

FBI - Stevens-1601

194A-AN-13620-M; 6661

STATE

Mat-Su Valley Frontiersman

PAGE C1 TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 2007

VECO official acknowledges organizing fundraiser for Young

BY DAN JOLING
Associated Press Writer

ANCHORAGE, (AP) — The corruption trial of a former Alaska state legislator Monday continued to pop out names of prominent national politicians.

A former oil field services company official convicted of bribing Alaska state legislators testified Monday he was instrumental in organizing an annual pig roast fundraiser that brought in thousands of campaign dollars to U.S. Rep. Don Young.

Rick Smith, the vice president of governmental affairs for VECO Corp. until he resigned in May, mentioned no wrongdoing in regard to Young.

The pig roast was held annually at the home of former VECO Corp. Chairman Bill Allen. After Allen and Smith pleaded guilty in May to bribing Alaska lawmakers, this summer's fundraiser moved to the home of former Gov. Bill Sheffield, where it drew about 70 protesters.

Smith has pleaded guilty to bribing former state Rep. Pete Kott, who represented Eagle River, an Anchorage bedroom community, and other state lawmakers.

Allen testified during Kott's trial last week that he had assigned one to four employees for up to six months to work on the home of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens. Allen also testified that his bribery conviction included allegations of payments to Stevens' son, former state Senate President Ben Stevens, R-Anchorage, through a consulting contract. Ben Stevens has not been charged.

Both Smith and Allen pleaded guilty to conspiracy and bribery and agreed to cooperate with federal investigators in the widespread corruption probe.

Like Allen, Smith acknowledged he made a number of calls after Aug. 31, 2006, that he knew would be recorded on the government's behalf.

"Wild guess, 20 to 40," Smith estimated of the number of calls he made.

He also wore a recording device for meeting with people five to 10 times at the government's behest, he said.

VECO is one of Alaska's largest oil field services companies, providing engineering, construction, operation and maintenance services to petroleum producers. During the 2006 Alaska legislative session, which ran from January to June, VECO officials including Allen and Smith spent days in Juneau pushing lawmakers, with Kott's assistance, to approve legislation that could lead major oil producers to approve a natural gas pipeline taking Alaska's North Slope natural gas to Midwest markets.

VECO would have been eligible to bid on contracts connected to the pipeline, estimated to cost $20 billion to $30 billion.

Smith testified last week he helped hatch a plan to funnel cash to Kott for Kott's re-election bid. He said he and Kott agreed that Kott's hardwood flooring business should submit a $7,993 bill on top of another invoice for refinishing work done at Allens' home. That bill, eventually paid with a personal check by Allen, forms one of the legs of the case against Kott.

Kott's attorney, James Wendt, on Monday tried to draw distinctions between Kott and other lawmakers who had financial connections to VECO.

Smith acknowledged that Kott had never signed any sort of a contract for payments as had others VECO was accused of bribing, such as the younger Stevens.

Smith said he had arranged for a payment to be made to another state lawmaker, Rep. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage, who was convicted July of conspiracy and bribery in a separate case. He has not been charged with taking illegal money from VECO.

Smith said he hired Anderson to perform legal work. Anderson held a law degree but has not passed the bar in Alaska.

See YOUNG, Page C6

Hirsch gives vibrant performance as doomed wanderer

BY CHRISTY LEMIRE
AP Movie Critic

You probably don't know the ıame Emile Hirsch. Not yet at east.

He's a young, good-looking, ıp-and-coming actor who's ›een working steadily for the ›ast few years now — he was he guy who lusted after Elisha Cuthbert in "The Girl Next Door," maybe that'll ring a bell.

All that should change, howver, with "Into the Wild," and deservedly so.

ate and idealistic but also impetuous, stubborn and self-righteous. Penn depicts this flawed figure with all the richness and complexity you'd find in the unforgiving Alaskan terrain, presenting McCandless in both his selflessness and selfishness without once judging him or turning him into a martyr.

At the same time, there's an innocence to "Into the Wild," with its notions about the purity of freed status-conscious mom and dad (Marcia Gay Harden and William Hurt, both strong in just a few flashback glimpses) that he's interested in Harvard Law School, and already has saved $24,000 toward tuition.

Then he ends up giving the bulk of his money to charity and burning the rest of his cash, literally, before hopping into his beat-up car for points unknown. He aspires to be a modern-day Thoreau or Jack London, communing with the wilderness and coming out enlightened for the experience, and even adopts the name "Alexander Supertramp" to signal his bold, new persona.

But he's clearly still mired in adolescence in many ways; his journal entries — rambling, self-important — include oversized exclamation points dotted with little circles at the bottom. That boyish enthusiasm often works to his advantage, though, especially as he enjoys the kindness of strangers during his travels.

Photo courtesy/Paramount Vantage

Christopher McCandless, played by Emile Hirsch, begins his trek into the wild.

There's the hippie couple (Catherine Keener and Brian Dierker) who take him under their wing and treat him like a son; a South Dakota farmer (Vince Vaughn, comparatively between all these strongly acted adventures and the destination that would become Chris' last: an abandoned bus in middle-of-nowhere Alaska. He reads, he hunts, he tries to stay warm, tries to stay alive. There's the crunch of snow beneath his feet, the sound of printing Chris' words in capital letters on the screen; on the flip side, original music from Eddie Vedder complements the action beautifully and is an ideal choice for its own sense of insatiability.)

As in the previous films he's directed, including 2001's

YOUNG

Continued from Page C1

"It was a sham contract, wasn't it?" Wendt asked.

"We never got any work out of it," Smith replied.

"I asked him to produce things for us. It didn't happen," Smith said.

As for Young's pig roast fundraiser, Smith said he had helped organize the yearly events for a decade.

"I came in the loop early on," Smith said.

The guest list usually had 200 to 400 names of people who were expected to contribute to Young's re-election campaigns, he said.

Smith said he hired one of Anchorage's upscale restaurants, Marx Brothers, to cater the annual summer affairs. The bill from the restaurant for each event likely was $10,000 to $15,000, he said.

Wendt pressed Smith on his motivation for providing "substantial assistance" to the government in his cooperation agreement.

"I'm still looking at nine to 11 years," Smith said of his potential sentence.

Wasn't Smith hoping to see that reduced?

"That's my hope," Smith said.

The defense case is expected to begin Tuesday.

FBI - Stevens-1604

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) C-1 & C-6
FRONTIERSMAN

Date: 09/18/2007
Edition:

Title: KOTT ATTORNEY TRIES TO MAKE INROADS VS. RECORDINGS, WITNESSES

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ; 6662
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

FBI - Stevens-1605

194A-AN-13620-M; 6662

FBI - Stevens-1606

Kott attorney tries to make inroads vs. recordings, witnesses

BY DAN JOLING
Associated Press Writer

ANCHORAGE, (AP) — If former state Rep. Pete Kott hopes to be acquitted of federal corruption charges, he will have to overcome three days of testimony by men he once considered close friends.

Former VECO Corp. executives Bill Allen and Rick Smith acknowledged at Kott's trial their own guilt in bribing elected officials and testified that the seven-term lawmaker had accepted their money, a $2,750 political poll and the promise of a job once he left office.

Allen, VECO's founder and former chief, told jurors he once let the man who called him "Uncle Bill" live at his home for three months during a particularly busy time for Kott's hardwood flooring business. The temporary digs saved Kott the ride home to Eagle River every night, Allen said.

Smith, the former VECO vice president for government affairs, said VECO relied on Anchorage Republicans Ben Stevens and John Cowdery in the state Senate to advance their pro-oil industry agenda. In the House, it was Kott. Neither Stevens nor Cowdery has been charged.

"We used Pete in a lot of those ways. He was very significant for us. He had always carried our water," Smith said, and over the years, they became friends.

Kott is charged with conspiracy to solicit financial benefits for his service as a legislator, extortion "under color of official right," bribery and wire fraud.

VECO is one of Alaska's largest oil field services companies, providing engineering, construction, operation and maintenance services to petroleum producers. When its sale was completed Sept. 7 for $400 million, Allen said, he owned 5 percent of the company and 80 percent was owned by an Allen family trust, with his three children each holding one-third of the trust.

As part of their investigation, federal authorities wiretapped the cell phones of Allen and Smith from late 2005 through August 2006. They also planted a hidden video camera in a hotel room rented by VECO during the 2006 legislative session.

Prosecutors opened the trial Monday with three days of recorded conversations, then reinforced the selected dialogue with testimony from Allen and Smith. Nicholas A. Marsh, a trial attorney in the Public Integrity Section of the U.S. Department of Justice, said the evidence would prove Kott sold out.

Defense attorney James Wendt could present his case as early as Tuesday. He contends there was nothing illegal about Kott planning strategy with the VECO officials on legislation important to most Alaskans. But his first obstacle in defending Kott may be the recorded conversations, salted with profanity, sometimes fueled by booze and interspersed by the occasional crude reference to women.

See KOTT, Page C6

"The Pledge," Penn never shies away from the bleaker aspects of the story — not just in the external surroundings, but within the character's soul. Hirsch lost 41 pounds from his already lean frame to play the man at his most mortally emaciated, but in Penn's assured hands, the actor's transformation from the inside is just as startling to behold.

"Into the Wild," a Paramount Vantage release, is rated R for language and some nudity. Running time: 150 minutes. Three and a half stars out of four.

FBI - Stevens-1607

tens to bill yners for clean up clearing his land for him. His is one of four properties the city will clean or demolish homes on next week.

City law bans property owners from neglecting their properties to the point of constituting a "public nuisance" or fire or health hazard.

The city recovers the money for labor, landfill fees and other costs from the homeowners through bills or property liens, city chief of staff Pat Cole said.

City public works supervisor Roy Moore said the notifications that precede the cleanups often prompt people to clean their land before the city moves in with loaders, workers and trucks.

"That's the best-case scenario," he said.

ersman

EW on the WORLD WIDE WEB!

Check out our NEW FEATURES

Readers' Poll
Associated Press
State, National & International News
Larger Photo Gallery
ractive Community Calendar
...and more!

rsman.com

Before petroleum companies would take on the financial risk of a project that conservatively could cost $20 billion, Allen testified, petroleum producers wanted certainty in oil taxes. With industry critics calling for changes in Alaska's tax system, that meant a new oil production tax of no more than 20 percent.

Smith said Friday his company was willing to do almost anything to pass a tax bill backed by producers — even if it meant bending the law.

In one meeting secretly videotaped by the FBI, and recounted by Smith, he said the company might have to "get dirty" to line up lawmakers.

"It could be jobs," Smith said of the illegal incentives. "It could be actual dollars."

VECO's tactics eventually did cross the line, Smith said.

Kott told Smith late in the 2006 session that he knew Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, R-Juneau, had been offered work by VECO. The news alarmed Smith.

"My concern was that Bill and I didn't want anyone to know that Bruce Weyhrauch had approached us to do work with VECO," Smith said. "We were concerned it was illegal."

Weyhrauch was to have been tried with Kott, but was able to separate his case and faces trial later.

Smith testified he helped hatch a plan to funnel cash to Kott for his re-election. Meeting Kott at the Rendezvous bar in Juneau, away from the usual hangouts for the legislative crowd, he and Kott agreed that Kott should give him a phony $7,993 invoice for refinishing hardwood floors at Smith's Anchorage home.

Smith told his boss, Allen, that he would handle the payment arrangements.

"I didn't want him to be tainted," Smith said. "If anyone should get hit with this situation, it would be me."

Kott periodically referred to a project VECO had in Barbados, a prison, and joked he wanted to be warden.

"It was just a reminder that we were going to provide a job for Pete at some point," Smith said.

But in questioning Allen, defense attorney Wendt said a job offer for Kott likely was an empty promise.

Allen confirmed that VECO almost was sold in 2005 and Kott knew it. If Kott had won re-election in 2006, he would have been in office through the end of 2008 and state law would have prohibited him from taking a lobbying job for a year after that. By that time, he implied, Kott had to know that the company might have been sold and someone other than Allen could be running the company.

Wendt got Allen to confirm that Kott had received other job offers, including one from a harbormaster.

Wendt also tried to make the point that Kott had voted against the official VECO position on a workers compensation bill, benefits for public employees and tort reform.

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) A-1
FRONTIERSMAN

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

Date: 9/30/2007
Edition:

Title: VIC KOHRING'S ON DECK

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ; 663
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

FBI - Stevens-1609

194A-AN-13620-M; 663

KOHRING

Continued from Page A1

Material from Kohring's office was confiscated in 2006 by the Federal Bureau of Investigation as part of its probe into corruption surrounding oil and gas deals under then-Gov. Frank Murkowski.

The grand jury indictment enumerated dates and times of detailed conversations between Kohring and Bill Allen and Veco Vice President Rick Smith. The indictment says Kohring, Allen and Smith "did knowingly and willfully combine, conspire, confederate and agree together and with each other to obstruct, delay and affect in any way and degree commerce and the movement of any article and commodity in commerce by extortion."

The indictment also says the seven-term lawmaker allegedly conspired to performed official acts as a member of the state Legislature "for the purpose of enriching himself and his family members."

In one secretly videoed conversation between Allen and Smith, Allen talked about having just given Kohring $1,000 and, as a result, Kohring would "kiss our [behind]."

Allen testified against Kott and is expected to testify about some of the same evidence at Kohring's trial.

According to the indictment, Kohring allegedly agreed to lobby for oil industry-friendly terms in the debate last year over a new oil taxation formula known as the Petroleum Profits Tax. In return, he received cash totaling close to $2,500 and a $3,000 job for a relative. Kohring also allegedly requested help from Veco in paying off a $17,000 credit card debt that was in collection.

The petroleum profits system, adopted by the Legislature of which Kohring was a part, has been criticized with creating a shortfall in estimated tax income from the oil industry. Saying the PPT is tainted by corruption, Gov. Sarah Palin has called for a special session of the Legislature to take another look at the profits tax.

Kohring's attorney, John Henry Browne of Seattle, has tried to get Kohring's case dismissed.

Browne has argued that state Sen. Fred Dyson was "in bed" with the government when he appealed to Kohring to work with the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

"It was an effort by Dyson to try to get us to roll over and play dead," Browne said.

Dyson admits he urged Kohring to speak to the FBI about the former representative's upcoming trial. Dyson had made the same recommendation to Allen, he said.

"[Allen's] attorney worked out the best possible deal," Dyson said.

Dyson said that whether Kohring took money or not, he believes that Kohring never intended to do any harm.

"I do not believe he had any evil intention to hurt the public interest of Alaskans," Dyson said. "From what I know of [Kohring's] heart and his convictions, that was my impression."

Dyson said that in his interaction with the FBI the investigators did not see Kohring as "an intrinsically evil person" motivated by greed.

Dyson said the FBI did not prompt him to talk to Kohring. In fact, Dyson said, when the FBI found out that he had the agency was upset.

"They chewed me pretty good," Dyson said.

Kohring's trial, along with the trials and investigations of other Alaska legislators, will have an effect on the opinions of Alaskans, said David Maas, professor emeritus of political science at the University of Alaska Anchorage.

The convictions and accusations "sort of reinforces people's perception of politics, unfortunately, which is pretty negative," Maas said.

While it is difficult to tie in how legislators vote with the money they may have taken, those in the Legislature are responsive to people who have money and people who have access, Maas said.

In the case of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens who has taken the side of the oil industry on issues such as drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge while allegedly taking favors from Veco in the form of home improvements it is hard to determine if Stevens acted in response to popular public opinion or for his own personal gain, Maas said.

"The oil industry is very important in Alaska, the interests Veco represents are very important to Alaska, so legislators are going to listen to these interests," he said. "Whatever legislators do to support the oil industry would be popular in Alaska."

Kohring announced that he would resign as District 14 representative during a Greater Wasilla Chamber of Commerce meeting in June. Kohring said he intended to step down, win his court case and return to public service.

Palin chose Wes Keller to replace Kohring.

Kohring, 48, was first elected to office in 1994. He has been an Alaska resident for the last 43 years.

75 CENTS

FBI - Stevens-1612

Vic Kohring's on deck

On the heels of Kott conviction, former legislator's trial set to begin Oct. 22

BY RUSSELL STIGALL
For the Frontiersman

MAT-SU – The investigation into the bribery and extortion of former members of Alaska's Legislature turns its attention next to former Wasilla Rep. Vic Kohring.

With the trial of former Eagle River Rep. Pete Kott over Kohring is next to face the judgment of his peers. Kott, scheduled to be sentenced Dec. 7, was convicted recently on three counts of bribery, extortion and conspiracy. Kohring faces the same charges, and his trial is scheduled to begin Oct. 22.

Vic Kohring

Kohring could face the same damning evidence that helped convict Kott — the testimony of former Veco Corp. CEO Bill Allen and secretly recorded conversations between Veco executives from Room 604 of Juneau's Westmark Baranof Hotel.

Kohring nor his attorney was unavailable for comment about whether the Kott trial and convictions would have any bearing on Kohring's defense.

During a previous interview, Kohring said he believes he will be found innocent, but that he knows the gravity of his situation.

"I have been charged with some very serious crimes," Kohring said.

The former lawmaker faces up to 50 years in prison.

Kohring turned himself in to federal officials in Juneau on the afternoon of May 4 following the arrest earlier in the day of former legislators Kott and Bruce Weyhrauch, R-Juneau.

See KOHRING, Page A10

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) A13
FRONTIERSMAN

Date: 10/5/2007
Edition: FRIDAY

Title: POLITICIANS SHED MONEY FROM ALASKA CONTRACTOR

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ; 6664
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

FBI - Stevens-1613

194A-AN-13620-M; 6664

Politicians shed money from Alaska contractor

BY MATT APUZZO
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON — For years, while VECO Corp. was flush with oil profits and in a giving mood, Capitol Hill politicians happily accepted hundreds of thousands of dollars in campaign donations from employees of the Alaska oil contractor.

But now that two Alaska lawmakers are under FBI scrutiny as part of a growing corruption scandal involving VECO, the friendly feelings have faded and some in Washington are shedding the campaign donations connected with the company.

VECO founder Bill Allen and former company vice president Rick Smith have pleaded guilty to bribing public officials. They also admitted running a company "special bonus program" that steered money to favored candidates, violated federal tax laws and sent untold amounts of corporate money into political coffers.

Testifying recently at a corruption trial in Anchorage, Alaska, Allen said his generosity was aimed at oil-friendly lawmakers and candidates. "If they're working with the oil industry, I'd like to help with their campaigns," he said.

From 1993 until the FBI approached them last year, Allen and Smith donated more than $200,000 to federal political causes. Their employees [illegible] that amount.

VECO's records, has so far revealed few details about when the program began or who benefited from it.

That leaves several candidates, from Alaska to the White House, unclear about sizable donations.

"We don't know anything more about this so-called special bonus program than we've read in the newspaper," said Timothy McKeever, the campaign treasurer for Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska.

Stevens, who is under federal investigation because VECO employees helped renovate his house, donated to a veterans charity $18,000 his campaign received from Allen and Smith, McKeever said. The senator plans to keep more than $50,000 from VECO employees.

VECO was the most generous source of support for Alaska's congressional delegation. Employees donated more than $360,000 to candidates and their political action committees since 1993. Like Stevens, Republican Sen. Lisa Murkowski donated to charity $8,000 her campaign received from Allen and Smith but not the $33,000 or so it got from other employees.

Alaska Rep. Don Young, who has also come under scrutiny in the case, has made no move to return more than $180,000 in donations from VECO employees, including more than $34,000 from Allen and Smith.

VECO was generous far beyond Alaska: President Bush's campaign received more than $22,000, including $5,500 from Allen and Smith. Sen. Daniel K. Inouye, D-Hawaii, received thousands of dollars for his campaign. So did several Republicans senators including Richard Burr of North Carolina, Norm Coleman of Minnesota, Jim DeMint of South Carolina, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, John Sununu of New Hampshire, John Thune of South Dakota, Kit Bond of Missouri, David Vitter of Louisiana, George Voinovich of Ohio and John Ensign of Nevada.

Even Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., an outspoken critic of the Alaska delegation's ability to steer money to the state without going through the normal appropriations process, received VECO-linked donations.

Lawmakers are divided on how to handle the money.

Bond's office said the senator recently donated about $9,000 to charity. That included not just the contributions received from Allen and Smith, but also donations from their wives and VECO employees.

DeMint spokesman Wesley Denton said the senator was "appalled to learn about these admitted crooks" and would donate all VECO contributions to the Citizens Against Government Waste, a nonprofit group he said was "dedicated to shining a light on this type of government corruption."

The National Republican Senatorial Committee said it donated to charity about $25,000 it got directly from Allen. Spokeswoman Rebecca Fisher said Thursday the committee plans to return or donate an additional $50,000 from VECO employees. She said the committee is waiting until the case is resolved, however, because any donations deemed improper would have to be sent to the Treasury Department.

Thune's spokesman said Wednesday the senator would donate to charity $2,000 the campaign received from Allen and Smith because they pleaded guilty, but will keep $4,000 from other VECO employees. Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev., said he donated to charity $500 his campaign received from Allen.

Bush's campaign books are closed but Danny Diaz, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee, said the campaign "would take appropriate action" if it learned improper donations were received.

Inouye, a close friend of Stevens, also plans to keep $13,000 in VECO-related contributions. Coleman's office said his campaign books were closed and the money was already spent.

Coburn, too, plans to keep his donations. Spokesman John Hart said the senator "has more than demonstrated his independence on spending, particularly related to projects in Alaska."

Others did not return messages asking about the contributions.

In theory, VECO's bonus program allowed employees to donate their company bonuses, amounting to several thousands of dollars, to politicians or charity.

In reality, Smith has admitted selecting candidates and setting the bonus amounts. Allen testified that employees didn't have much of a choice.

Asked by a prosecutor whether bonuses would be continued for workers who kept the money instead of sharing it with politicians, Allen said: "No. Why would I do that?"

Lawrence M. Noble, the government's former top elections lawyer, said Allen's admission appears to make the program illegal, since corporations are prohibited from reimbursing and directing contributions to federal election candidates.

Without more information, however, it's impossible to know which donations employees made on their own and which were made as part of the program.

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) B-1 & B-2
ANCHORAGE DAILY NEWS

Date: 9/27/2007
Edition: THURSDAY

Title: NEW LOOK AT YOUNG EARMARK

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ; 6665
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

New look at Young earmark

FLORIDA: Highway money may be unconstitutional, critics say.

By GREG GORDON
McClatchy Newspapers

WASHINGTON — A watchdog group asked the House ethics committee on Wednesday to investigate how a $10 million earmark for a Florida highway interchange, which was backed by Alaska Rep. Don Young, was inserted into a bill that already had won final congressional approval.

Young

In a letter to the committee's leaders, Ryan Alexander, president of Taxpayers for Common Sense, called "the actions taken by Young's staff ... an apparent violation" of the Constitution that undermined the integrity of the House of Representatives.

"In the absence of an accounting and explanation, the public is left to assume the worst, further degrading the already low public regard for Congress," Alexander wrote the committee chairwoman, Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones, D-Ohio, and the ranking Republican, Rep. Doc Hastings of Washington. The committee is scheduled to meet Friday.

McClatchy Newspapers reported recently that the FBI is investigating the 2005 earmark for a $10 million study of a proposed Co-

See Page B-2, YOUNG EARMARK

FBI - Stevens-1615

194A-AN-13620-M;6665

YOUNG EARMARK: Bill altered after approval

Continued from B-1

conut Road interchange near Bonita Springs, Fla., as part of an inquiry into whether Young, R-Alaska, traded his influence as chairman of the House Transportation Committee for campaign contributions or other favors.

On Feb. 19, 2005, three weeks before the House passed a massive, six-year transportation bill, Young visited the site of the proposed interchange along Interstate 75, which was sought by real estate developer Daniel Aronoff. Young also attended a political fundraiser, netting more than $40,000 in donations from builders and developers, including Aronoff, whose land would soar in value if linked to I-75.

The bill that won final passage later that summer earmarked $10 million for "widening and improvements for I-75" in Collier and Lee counties. But on Aug. 10, the language was altered to read: "Coconut Rd. Interchange I-75/Lee County."

Alexander noted in his letter that the earmark was the only one of 6,371 allocations for congressional pet projects to be substantially changed during the "bill enrollment process," in which the House clerk makes technical corrections.

Young has maintained that he earmarked the money for the Coconut Road interchange because residents told him they wanted it in 2005 when he attended one of their community transportation meetings.

Alexander said that in 1854, an alleged tiny, but substantive, alteration of a House land grant bill for the Territory of Minnesota after final congressional passage led to an inquiry that concluded that the perpetrator should face "severe censure."

Alexander called on the ethics committee to investigate who substituted the earmark language, who knew of the change and on whose authority it was made.

Civic-minded residents scrub, paint over racial slurs, obsc

By PETER PORCO
pporco@adn.com

Free advice to the graffiti vandals tagging Independence Park: Find a new line of work.

Resident Kathy Harte doesn't yet have your number, but she's on your tail, erasing the swastikas, racial slurs and obscene drawings after you scrawl them on the fences, signs and electrical boxes in her subdivision.

If she can't erase, she removes — like the bicycle sign smeared in red with an ugly racist epithet that Harte wondered. The sign stood over the children's playground.

A 59-year-old fiber artist and businesswoman, Harte is one of a new breed of vigilante — a freelance graffiti buster.

She's lived in Anchorage for 30 years, 14 of them in Independence Park south of Abbott Road. Only this summer, as the florid, outsized initials and slogans blossomed like deadly nightshade in her neighborhood, did she find her new calling.

"I take the dog out for a walk every day," she said. "I start-more, and they started to get all the fences as you come into Independence Drive."

She took asphalt paint and began covering offensive scrawls on the community bike paths. She and her husband removed the metal sign in the playground and covered up the crude drawings of body parts.

Harte learned from the community's property manager that at least two other people — a person using black paint and another using grey paint — were also busting

Harte has invest of her own cash for t paint scrapers, wire thinner and special er, a potent package to use effectively.

"I learned about
al spirits through tri Harte said. "I took o
kas and the initials

Harte said the m
lone graffiti czar, D lieves the paint van work of gangs. He's the Independence

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) 10A
USA TODAY

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

Date: 9/28/2007
Edition: FRIDAY

Title: FIRM EMPLOYEE'S CLAIMS SPAWN MORE SCRUTINY FOR ALASKA SENATOR
Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ;6666
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

Firm employee's claims spawn more scrutiny for Alaska senator

Campaign: No records show contractor worked fundraiser

The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Sen. Ted Stevens' campaign has no evidence a contracting firm paid workers to help run the Alaska senator's fundraisers, the campaign treasurer said, disputing one employee's claim that he parked cars and performed odd jobs while on the contractor's payroll.

The FBI is investigating whether Stevens, the Senate's longest-serving Republican, accepted inappropriate gifts from Bill Allen, the founder of oil-services company VECO Corp. Allen has pleaded guilty to bribing lawmakers and said he paid employees to renovate the senator's home.

One of those employees told the Associated Press last week that Allen also hired him to help run fundraisers for Stevens and other candidates, an apparent violation of campaign-finance laws. Robert Williams said he worked three or four fundraisers for the senator, delivering ice, arranging table rentals and parking cars.

"If he was asked to perform services, we were never told he performed those services," said Timothy McKeever, the campaign treasurer. "We pay for all fundraising expenses."

McKeever said Wednesday night that in his 20 years working for the campaign, he never recalls seeing people parking cars for guests at fundraisers and was unaware of any VECO employees sent to work at the events. Allen did host a fundraiser at his home for the senator last year, but McKeever said the campaign insisted on paying for expenses.

By Chris Miller, AP

Under investigation: Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, at the NOAA facility in Juneau in August. The FBI is investigating whether Stevens accepted inappropriate gifts.

"I was very clear with them to send us bills for everything. We wanted to pay all costs associated with that event," McKeever said. "We got bills, which we were told for all services."

Campaign-finance reports show no payments to Allen, but they do indicate more than $12,000 in fundraising expenses were paid in mid-July 2006. That's around the time that Allen and other VECO executives — who usually donated at fundraisers rather than through the mail — donated $1,000 apiece to the campaign.

McKeever did not recall the date of Allen's fundraiser but said "we don't have any outstanding bills unpaid" for it.

Stevens has made a similar statement regarding his home renovation project, saying he paid every bill he received.

FBI - Stevens-1618

194A-AN-13620-M;6666

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) A1 & A12
FRONTIERSMAN

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

Date: 9/18/2007
Edition: TUESDAY

Title: SENATOR JUST TRYING TO HELP

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ; 1667
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

WWW.FRONTIERSMAN.COM

KOHRING

Continued from Page A1

As Kohring's attorney, Browne hopes to prove there was improper contact with Kohring by Dyson, R-Eagle River, as a way to possibly get charges against Kohring involving alleged taking of bribes from the oil services firm Veco dismissed. The Wasilla Republican's trial is set to begin Oct. 22.

Dyson had been working with the FBI since February 2006, even inviting key corruption prosecution witness and Veco chairman Bill Allen to breakfast but instead delivering him to a place where FBI investigators were waiting to question him. But Dyson has already stated via e-mail to Kohring's defense team that he was not acting as an agent of the U.S. government when he contacted Kohring recently and urged him to work out a plea.

Reached Monday after he'd spent all day at former state Rep. Pete Kott's corruption trial in Anchorage, Dyson said he was only trying to be a good friend to Kohring when he made the call and offered the advice to reach a plea.

"What I did, I've always felt a lot of affection and respect for Vic," Dyson said. Dyson said he suggested that Kohring should sit down and work out a deal. Dyson said he wasn't making an "end run" around Kohring's lawyer and assumed if Kohring did try to make a deal he'd bring the attorney along.

"The FBI didn't put me up to that, and was pretty upset that I did that," Dyson said.

Kohring's attorney, Dyson said, mis-read the situation and "got his knickers in a knot."

Browne was in Anchorage Monday morning for a pre-trial hearing in Kohring's case, where he made the allegation of improper contact between Dyson and Kohring. Browne could not be reached for comment on when he planned to file such a motion.

"Mr. Dyson said he did it on his own," Browne told the Associated Press on Monday. "I don't know that."

Kohring also could not be reached for comment.

Kohring was the last of three legislators accused of corruption this year to leave office voluntarily. The other two legislators, Kott and Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, were also indicted and Kott is now on trial.

Kott and Weyhrauch resigned shortly after their indictments. Kohring lost a key committee chairmanship prior to his resignation but stayed in office until June amid mounting public pressure to resign. He has vowed to win the case and return to public office. He resigned in June maintaining his innocence to the charges that he took money from Veco in return for votes favoring oil industry goals.

U.S. Justice Department attorneys are still reviewing pre-trial motions and other pertinent documents, said department spokesman Bryan Sierra of the agency's Washington, D.C. office. Sierra was aware of Browne's allegations regarding the FBI and Dyson.

"If we have a response to that, we'll do it in court," Sierra said.

Browne has represented a string of high-profile criminal defendants, including murderer Benjamin Ng, who was spared the death penalty for his participation in the 1983 mass murder known as the Wah Mee Massacre. In that crime, three men, including Ng, robbed the Wah Mee gambling club in Seattle's Chinatown, tying up 14 victims before at least two of the robbers opened fire killing all but one witness. Ng was one of the gunmen.

Contact John R. Moses at john.moses@frontiersman.com or call him at 352-2270.

194A-AN-13620-M ; 1667

Mat-Su Valley
Frontiersman
TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 2007 | YOUR HOMETOWN NEWSPAPER SINCE 1947
50 CENTS

Senator just trying to help

Kohring attorney wants inquest into Dyson's ties to FBI

Vic Kohring

BY JOHN R. MOSES
Frontiersman

ANCHORAGE — A state senator accused by a criminal defense attorney of being an FBI pawn working covertly against indicted former state Rep. Vic Kohring said Monday the whole matter is "really silly" and is being blown out of proportion.

Kohring's attorney — who has also accused the FBI of pressuring Kohring to plead guilty to corruption and extortion charges — wants a federal court to review the relationship between FBI investigators and state Sen. Fred Dyson, who recently sent Kohring a message through a former Kohring aide urging the embattled Wasilla lawmaker to make a plea deal with prosecutors.

Kohring has pleaded not guilty to federal corruption and extortion charges.

A U.S. Justice Department spokesman said Monday it was too early to comment on claims raised by defense attorney John Henry Browne of Seattle.

See KOHRING, Page A12

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) A3
FRONTIERSMAN

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

Date: 10/28/2007
Edition: SUNDAY

Title: ALLEN TESTIFIES HE GAVE MONEY TO KOHRING 'TO MAKE SURE HE WAS LOYAL'

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ; 1668
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

Allen and Smith have testified that they badly wanted the Alaska Legislature in 2006 to approve new oil tax legislation, known as the Petroleum Production Tax, or PPT. The measure, promoted as a way to provide a stable tax climate in Alaska, was sought by major petroleum producers before they would consider building a multibillion dollar natural gas pipeline tapping vast reserves on the state's North Slope. VECO would have been in line to bid on lucrative construction and maintenance contracts if that project had been built.

Allen testified Friday that he worried about how Kohring would vote on the PPT because he was famously against any increase in taxes. Kohring, the chairman of the House Special Committee on Oil and Gas, also was miffed because the bill was not referred to his committee.

Within a few days after the bill was introduced in February 2006, Allen, Smith and Kohring dined at the Island Pub on Douglas Island to talk about legislative business, Allen said. Smith made an excuse to leave the table, Allen said, and Allen gave Kohring $1,000.

"I wanted to make sure he was OK and kind of soften him up a little bit, where he wouldn't be so mad," Allen said.

In a meeting recorded by the secret FBI camera, Kohring on March 30, 2006 approached Allen and Smith for help in paying off a $17,000 credit card debt through a loan or a job. Near the end of the meeting, Kohring mentioned that he was about to fly to Oregon to see his wife and daughter. Allen said he gave Kohring a $100 bill that he could hide in a plastic Easter egg for the girl. When Kohring expressed gratitude for the gift and said he had just sent her money for a Girl Scout uniform, Allen handed him another wad of cash — $600 to $700 in 20-

FBI - Stevens-1621

194A-AN-13620-M; 1668

Allen testifies he gave money to Kohring 'to make sure he was loyal'

BY DAN JOLING
Associated Press Writer

ANCHORAGE (AP) — The former head of a major Alaska pipeline services company testified Friday that he handed state Rep. Vic Kohring $600 to $700 or more on at least five occasions.

Bill Allen, former CEO of VECO Corp., also contradicted key parts of the defense case put forth by Kohring, who claims that money he received from the political power broker was a gift between men who bonded in part because of their relationships with women from Russia. Allen said he has never met Kohring's wife. He said a woman from Russia with whom he once had a relationship did not have a daughter, as Kohring's Russian-born wife does.

Kohring, elected seven times to the state House from Wasilla, is accused of demanding and accepting at least $2,600 from VECO officials in exchange for his support on legislation.

Prosecutors also contend Kohring solicited a job from VECO for his nephew and that Kohring sought $17,000 to pay off a credit card debt. Kohring is charged with four federal felony counts. Kohring resigned from the Alaska Legislature in June.

The federal government investigation of corruption in Alaska politics included wiretaps placed on the phones of Allen and VECO vice president Rick Smith in late 2005 and throughout the regular and special legislative sessions in 2006. The FBI also bugged a Juneau hotel suite used as a meeting dollar bills.

"I figured I'd give him some more money," Allen said.

He rejected the idea of a $17,000 loan, he said, after talking to VECO's chief financial officer.

Allen said he had handed $600 to $700 to Kohring at least two times between 2002 and 2006. The first was soon after Kohring married and Allen learned Kohring could not afford housing in Juneau.

"He was sleeping in his office and I'd say, 'Vic, you're 6-8. How in the hell can you sleep on that couch?' He'd say, 'I do it.'"

Kohring also had trouble affording food, Allen said.

"Mostly it would be junk food. I felt sorry for him," Allen said.

He had another motive for payments to Kohring, Allen said — "to make sure he was loyal."

He made a similar cash payment to Kohring when the lawmaker was about to make a trip to Portland, Ore., and a third when Kohring told Allen he needed money for his daughter, Allen said.

In return, Allen said, Kohring said yes when Allen made requests. Kohring released a Senate bill from his committee affecting oil taxes for Cook Inlet producers, Allen said. Jim Clark, then-Gov. Frank Murkowski's chief of staff, had asked Allen to speak to Kohring, Allen said.

Kohring also agreed to not run for a state Senate seat held by Sen. Lyda Green, R-Wasilla. During the 2006 session, Kohring pledged to keep VECO informed on legislative matters and to lobby colleagues for the oil tax at the rate the company favored, Allen said.

Allen made one final payment to Kohring on June 8, 2006, the last day of the first special session when the legislature was debating a revised oil tax. Allen said he handed Kohring $600 to $700 on a Juneau street as they walked back to VECO's rented hotel room.

Allen faced cross examination late Friday afternoon from Kohring's attorney, John Henry Browne. In sometimes testy answers, Allen acknowledged that no one else has witnessed him giving money to Kohring other than Smith during the meeting in which Allen offered cash for the Easter egg and the Girl Scout uniform.

Allen is scheduled to continue testifying Monday.

FBI - Stevens-1622

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) A1 - A14
FRONTIERSMAN

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

Date: 10/12/2007
Edition: FRIDAY

Title: KOHRING FACES TRIAL WITH CONFIDENCE

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ; 669
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

CONFIDENCE

Continued from Page A1

an inner calmness; however, I fully expect to win this case, and there's no way I am going to roll over and give up. I've always been a fighter by nature and intend to battle this thing hard, defend myself with every ounce of my strength and being and, God willing, convince the jury of my innocence and walk away a free man when it's all over."

In the months leading up to his impending trial, some lawmakers, including Eagle River Sen. Fred Dyson, have urged Kohring to reach a plea agreement with prosecutors. If convicted, he faces up to 50 years in prison.

Kohring says agreeing to any deal with prosecutors would be an admission of guilt.

"I prefer taking the risk of proceeding with a trial, which is obviously a big gamble," Kohring said.

Kohring likened his trial against federal prosecutors backed by the resources of the U.S. government to the biblical confrontation between David and Goliath.

"I just hope my aim is accurate and I find a smooth stone," Kohring said.

Because of intense media scrutiny of Kohring and the scandal, the seven-time representative wanted his trial moved out of Alaska. He says jurors may be biased by the media coverage of his case.

"[Those in the media] try and convict me with their incredibly biased, one-sided and manipulating reporting," Kohring says. "Unfortunately, even if innocent, it may prove very difficult to get a fair trial because of the way these over-zealous people in the media irresponsibly manipulate the unsuspecting public in such a slanderous way."

Kohring is expected to face some of the same evidence and testimony that helped convict two of his former colleagues. In Kott's trial, the testimony of former VECO CEO Bill Allen was damaging as he described conversations and arrangements he had with lawmakers, including cash payments and other bribes.

"The most difficult task I face is the lynch-mob mentality throughout the state where much of the public is convinced that the accused — like me — are automatically guilty even before we have a chance to speak one word in court."

Vic Kohring

Kohring has maintained his innocence from the day in May he was led in handcuffs into a federal courtroom in Juneau to the day he announced his resignation in June to a crowd of more than 200 at a Greater Wasilla Chamber of Commerce meeting.

"The most difficult task I face is the lynch-mob mentality throughout the state where much of the public is convinced that the accused — like me — are automatically guilty even before we have a chance to speak one word in court," he says. "It's not the public's fault though. I hold the media responsible for this travesty."

Kohring said he is at peace, even with the thought that a jury could convict him.

"I fully recognize how serious this is and how determined the feds are to convict me, whether it's right or wrong; simply get another notch on their belt and advance their careers," Kohring says. "Truth and justice don't always seem to be a priority with the feds."

A full transcript of the Frontiersman's questions and Kohring's answers can be found online at www.frontiersman.com.

FBI - Stevens-1623

194A-AN-13620-M;669

Kohring faces trial with confidence

Former lawmaker talks about public fight over corruption, conspiracy and bribery charges

BY RUSSELL STIGALL
For the Frontiersman

MAT-SU — Vic Kohring says he will walk into his corruption trial in 10 days with a calm heart and the ammunition of the righteous.

Following the trials of reluctantly guilty Pete Kott and admittedly guilty Tom Anderson, former state representative Kohring is stalwart in his conviction he is not corrupt. Set for trial Oct. 22, Kohring responded to questions provided by the Mat-Su Valley Frontiersman in an exclusive e-mail interview.

The former Wasilla representative is one of a cadre of legislators caught up in scandal for having allegedly taken bribes for votes on the Petroleum Profits Tax. Former Reps. Kott and Anderson were convicted for their roles and Anderson also recently admitted his guilt. Kott is asking for a new trial.

Kohring entered a plea of not guilty Tuesday to an amended federal indictment that charges he took money from former VECO Corp. executives in exchange for his vote as far back as January 2002.

Kohring calls the revised indictment a "ludicrous ... Hail Mary" lobbed by prosecutors "in desperation, trying to pull off a last-second victory."

Kohring's comments were e-mailed to a reporter working for the Frontiersman and confirmed by telephone with the former lawmaker. In his responses,

'I'm fully prepared for the worst and am not afraid. In fact, I have real peace in my heart and an inner calmness ...'

Vic Kohring

MORE INSIDE
See page A3 for more on former House Rep. Vic Kohring and his upcoming trial.

Kohring makes it clear he will come out fighting.

"I'm fully prepared for the worst and am not afraid," Kohring says. "In fact, I have real peace in my heart and

See CONFIDENCE, Page A14

FBI - Stevens-1624

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) A1 - A8
FRONTIERSMAN

Date: 10/21/2007
Edition:

Title: KOHRING BRIBERY TRIAL SET TO BEGIN

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ; 670
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

KOHRING

Continued from Page A1

foolishly placed himself in a position where he and his actions could be subjected to scrutiny and misinterpretation," Ross says. "However, ... Vic never sold his vote for a gift."

Ross describes the scene in one video: Room 604 of the Baranof Hotel in Juneau and Kohring stops by his friend's room to chat. With debt collectors on his back, Kohring asks Allen and VECO VP Rick Smith about a loan to pay back his debt. Neither Smith nor Allen seemed excited by the prospect of loaning Kohring $17,000, so Kohring dropped the issue, Ross says.

Repeated phone calls to federal prosecutors for response to the claims made in Ross' letter were not returned.

But the video shows Allen giving Kohring some money to use for "Easter presents for Vic's stepdaughter [Anjuta]," Ross says. Allen also gives Kohring some how-to advice for his stepdaughter's Easter egg hunt. Ross argues that Allen's gift to Kohring's stepdaughter was "unsolicited and unexpected." This is not the only occasion Allen gave Kohring's stepdaughter a gift. After a phone conversation at a restaurant in Douglas, Allen "gave Vic some money to buy things for Vic's stepdaughter, as he has on several occasions," Ross says.

Ross argues Kohring's helpful demeanor has caused him undue grief. When Kohring was recorded asking Allen, "What can I do to help?" and "let me know what I [can] do to help," Kohring's attorney says what was heard was "typical Vic Kohring" — something Kohring would say to anyone, not just people who buy gifts for his family.

Chief District Court Judge John Sedwick denied Kohring's recent request to dismiss the case against him and a motion to move the trial out of state. Kohring claims the government denied his Sixth Amendment right to counsel when state Sen. Fred Dyson advised Kohring to work with the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Sedwick also denied Kohring's request to suppress evidence found during an FBI search of his Wasilla office in August 2006. Kohring said he hadn't been read his Miranda rights nor had he been allowed to remain silent. The government contests that federal investigators had a search warrant but did not use it because Kohring allowed the search.

'Vic understands now how he foolishly placed himself in a position where he and his actions could be subjected to scrutiny and misinterpretation. However, ... Vic never sold his vote for a gift.'

Attorney Wayne Ross, who represents Vic Kohring

FBI - Stevens-1625

194A-AN-13620-M;670

75 CENTS

FBI - Stevens-1626

Kohring bribery trial set to begin

BY RUSSELL STIGALL
For the Frontiersman

ANCHORAGE — Months of preparation, rumors and state political intrigue come to a head Monday when the trial of former state Rep. Vic Kohring of Wasilla gets underway.

The former Republican lawmaker has repeatedly maintained his innocence to federal charges of bribery, corruption and conspiracy. Kohring has waited and watched as fellow former lawmakers Tom Anderson and Pete Kott were tried and convicted of similar charges. At the center of the corruption is oil services company VECO and its former CEO, Bill Allen. Allen has testified he paid Kott, Kohring and others in return for favorable votes on the Petroleum Profits Tax.

Vic Kohring

Many of Allen's ex-legislator friends seem to have needed money.

Former Eagle River state Rep. Pete Kott, convicted last month on three counts of bribery, extortion and conspiracy, recently asked to have his trial thrown out. Kott admitted taking thousands from Allen, but said he was a friend of Allen's and only took the $9,000 as a friend.

The several thousand dollars prosecutors allege Kohring accepted from Allen was also only one friend to another. The money was mainly for Kohring's stepdaughter, Anjuta, the former lawmaker says in pretrial documents. In a letter from attorney Wayne Anthony Ross to Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph Bottini on behalf of Kohring, Ross says Kohring and Allen shared a penchant for Russian life partners and a commonality in the raising of their daughters.

"What Vic and Allen had in common with their respective Russian life partners created a special bond and friendship between Vic and Allen," Ross says in the letter.

The letter, sent in January, goes on to defend Kohring, 44, against implied allegations in several video and audio recordings made by federal investigators. Ross and Kohring attended a meeting where Bottini presented the recordings. In the letter Ross says the government would waste its efforts by prosecute Kohring.

"Vic understands now how he

See KOHRING, Page A8

IF YOU GO

- What: Trial of former state Rep. Vic Kohring.
- When: Begins 9 a.m. Monday.
- Where: U.S. Federal District Court House, Courtroom No. 6.
- The players: Prosecuting attorneys for USA vs. Kohring are Nicholas Marsh, Edward Sullivan, Joseph Bottini and James Goeke. Defense attorneys John Henry Browne of Seattle and Wayne Ross of Anchorage represent Kohring.

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) A3 - A8
FRONTIERSMAN

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

Date: 10/26/2007
Edition: FRIDAY

Title: KOHRING JURY SEATED; HEARS TAPED EVIDENCE

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ;671
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

FBI - Stevens-1627

194A-AN-13620-M;671

TRIAL

Continued from Page A3

his eagerness to help his "friends at VECO."

Kohring was Boy Scout-courteous and seemed eager to please in the recordings with VECO's Allen and Smith.

In the recordings, Kohring praised his staff, was almost never profane and took pride in House Bill 386, which he helped write. A 2006 piece of legislation, HB 386 extended the deadline for certain oil and gas expenses to be used as credits against the Petroleum Profits Tax (PPT), which was also passed last year. The FBI tapped Smith's cell phone and hid video cameras in suite 604 of the Westmark Baranoff Hotel in Juneau, where Allen and Smith met with legislators, including Kohring.

On the recordings, Kohring expressed a dislike for the Anchorage Daily News and Channel 2 news because they "twisted" public opinion with "spoon-fed lies" about Murkowski's PPT. Prosecutors claim Kohring was one of a group of state lawmakers who accepted VECO money in exchange for favorable votes on the PPT.

Much time on the tapes was devoted to the VECO internship Kohring procured for his nephew, Aaron, from Smith. They also discussed special tax breaks for the oil industry Kohring wrote into House Bill 386.

On the video surveillance tape Kohring could be seen taking several hundred dollars from Allen to get Easter eggs for his stepdaughter. He was also shown as eager to help his "friends at VECO," which included gathering information for and lobbying on behalf of the company. In one scene, Kohring and Allen eat from bags full of McDonald's take-out food at the hotel and Kohring seems willing to conspire with Allen to kill a bill in the state House.

Allen and Smith are shown discussing how they would reward then state Sen. Ben Stevens and Kott for their help on the PPT Bill. To these two former legislators Allen adds Korhing's name.

"Well, we got ol' Kohring we got to figure out," Allen said.

During a taped phone conversation, Kohring asked Smith to hand the phone to Allen.

"Uncle Bill, my friend," Kohring can be heard saying. He then thanks Allen for Aaron's internship.

"I wouldn't hug you, but I'd give you a good hearty handshake," Kohring said.

Allen asked Kohring to spy on his fellow legislators. "Kind of, see what they are really thinking about," Allen said. "Tell us who is really with the governor's [Frank Murkowski] 20/20 [Petroleum Profits Tax Bill]."

Later Kohring reports back to Allen about Rep. Kevin Meyer, R-District 30.

"He's in our camp definitely," Kohring said.

When Murkowski's preferred 20 percent petroleum tax bill changed to 22.8 percent, Allen and Smith got serious. "We have to get dirty and we have to produce," Allen says on the tapes. "Just like ol' Vic the other night I gave him a thousand. That's what I've got to do."

For that $1,000, Allen said Kohring "would kiss our ass."

In another audio recording, Kohring took a pot shot at the local Friends of Mat-Su, which Kohring called a liberal anti-development group. Kohring said the group would be no help to his 2006 campaign.

"They're drooling at the prospect of replacing Vic

FBI - Stevens-1628

hears taped evidence started to walk back to the Baranoff Hotel, Bottini said. On the way, Allen stuffed $500 or $600 into Kohring's hand. Back in suite 604, Kohring, Allen and Smith are seen on surveillance video eating the fast food and talking about Allen's scuttled plan.

Bottini said Allen told Kohring he did not follow through with the plan because he did not want to harm Kohring's political career.

Kohring replied, "'I would have done it for you anyway, Bill,'" Bottini said.

Day 3 — Prosecution Presents Its Case

Kohring seemed relaxed Wednesday as prosecutors played through nearly two dozen recordings of meetings and conversations he

See TRIAL, Page A8

Chappel, aac and so faith-with her ces and will be at Wiley

Church, Yakima. re being d Keith ial gifts
Union
Wiley rch in

WARREN BOLAM

Lifelong Alaska resident Warren E. Bolam, 70, passed away Oct. 16, 2007, at Elvies Assisted Living Home in Wasilla.

A service was held Wednesday at Valley Memorial Park on the Old Glenn Highway.

Bolam was born Nov. 1, 1936, in Anchorage to John and Mary Bolam.

Bolam worked as a heavy equipment operator for the City tionship with her grandchildren. She had a great sense of humor and was generous. She would make care packages out of what was in her cupboards for family or friends who needed it. She lived her life as if every day could be her last.

Schmahl is survived by her life partner, Larry Wright of Wasilla; daughters, Heather (Jamey) Watts of Wasilla, and Denise Wolk and her partner Steve Olds of Kenai; son Dennis (Lori) McKoon of Wasilla; sisters, Lorraine (Lolly) and Roberta (Bobbi) of Washington; brothers, John, Timothy and Donald Schmahl of Washington; grandchildren, J.T. and Andrew Watts, Nancy and D.J. Harris, all of Wasilla, Laura Mason of Eagle River, Thomas Mason of Kenai, Johnathan and Eric Mason of Seattle and Jacob Whitman-Maillard of Washington; great-grandchildren Shaleana Steger and Zoe Mason p.m. Saturday with visitation beginning at 1 p.m. at Sherrod Elementary School, 561 N. Gulkana in Palmer. William Sharlow will officiate. Pallbearers will be Bobby Jenks, Ron Bell, Jim Merchant, David Walker, David King and Paul Jensen. Honorary pallbearers will be Joe, Floyd, Ron and Robert Gumminger Jr., Robert Gumminger Sr., Frederick K. Owens Jr., Bob Jenks Sr. and Billy Daniels.

Davis was born Dec. 10, 1949, in Palmer, and was in the Wasilla High School Class of 1968. She was also a 1969 California Dental School Graduate and took several courses at Mat-Su College.

A lifelong Palmer resident, Davis worked for Matanuska Electric Association since 1969 and was a member of the Palmer Elks and Moose lodges. She was also involved with the Valley Alzheimer's Group, Relay for Life and the American Cancer Society (daffodils). She enjoyed traveling, shopping and had a love of her family and friends, and especially QVC purse and shoe shopping.

Davis is survived by her sister, Ethel (Robert) Gumminger and their children, Butch, Ron, Floyd, Jackie, Joe and their families, all of Spokane; and cousins, Doreen (Larry) Nelson, Judy (George) Hargreaves, Darwin and Jane Pearson, Ron and Jean Pearson.

Davis was preceded in death by her parents, Floyd and Evelyn Davis, and niece, Janine Sikes.

Valley Funeral Homes and Crematory of Wasilla and Palmer is assisting the family.

OPINION

MANAGING EDITOR: GREG JOHNSON PHONE: 352-2268 FAX: 352-2276 E-MAIL LETTERS TO: CONTA

FRONTIERSMAN EDITORIAL

Building fees part of the price

Mat-Su Valley
Frontiersman
FRIDAY, OCTOBER 26, 2007 PAGE A4

CT@FRONTIERSMAN.COM

The World According to Chuck nce cartoonist whose award-winning work has been published in the "Best Editorial Cartoons of e opinions expressed in his cartoons are not necessarily those of the Mat-Su Valley Frontiersman, any Wick Communications Co.

Letters to the editor

FBI - Stevens-1630

POLICY ON SUBMISSIONS

We welcome Letters to the Editor. Letters will be edited for length, clarity, good taste and libel. Factual accuracy and a civil tone are expected.

Letters should not exceed 400 words. All letters, including e-mail, must have a name and include a daytime phone number for verification. Letters will generally be printed in the order in which they are received. However, until they have been verified, they are not considered received. Longer Spectrum pieces are 600-800 words. We do not normally run letters sent to multiple publications.

E-mail letters and comments to the Mat-Su Valley Frontiersman to info@frontiersman.com. Fax letters to 352-2276. Mail to Editor, Mat-Su Valley Frontiersman, 5751 E. Mayflower Ct., Wasilla, AK 99654.

Opinions expressed in letters to the editor and in guest columns, such as Spectrum, are not necessarily those of the Mat-Su Valley Frontiersman, its officers, management or staff.

The Mat-Su Valley Frontiersman will not print any letters that involve conflicts between individuals or individuals and businesses.

unteers running the recycling education outreach booth at the fair, which helped to make the Alaska State Fair in Palmer the stand-out annual recycling event in the state and one of the top fair recycling programs in the nation.

A special thank you to both Valley Recycle Pick Up and Alaska Waste for their help and cooperation with this great program.

And finally, thank you to all the fairgoers who used the recycling containers. Together we are turning it around.

Pete Praetorius
VCRS board president
Wasilla

There are some things the public should know drivers.

When you or your spouse is an elected official, you represent the public. You are expected to set the example. And when you set a bad example, the public has a right to know about it. That is a fact of life. If you don't like that, I suggest you stay out of politics.

The article printed by the Frontiersman also serves to show the public that big-wigs or their spouses don't get special treatment from our law enforcement people. It also shows the lack of judgement from some judges.

Perhaps if the Frontiersman printed more articles on what happens to drunk drivers it might serve to prevent other people from making that error in judgement.

acts. They assaulted the public, they showed a total lack of concern for the safety of the public.

All the fines in the world won't replace a human life or ease the pain of a mangled child. People who threaten the safety of the public need to be identified to the public, and the courts need to pay attention to (the law).

R.K. Butts
Wasilla

A message for legislators

I recently sent all 50 legislators a public opinion message. Of course, I received no responses. Perhaps it was the content of the message that chilled them. The message went as follows:

"Since you folks are fond of mandatory sentences, especially the Republicans, why not a mandatory minimum of 20 years for those convicted of public corruption-type offenses?"

Why not set the example? I wonder if these folks in the Legislature have the intestinal fortitude to address breaches of the public trust committed by their kind, which harm us all in many, many ways with long-term effects. ... [Not like] some poor schlep who yells at his kids, which makes him a domestic violence criminal for the rest of his life. Or, for that matter, any

FBI - Stevens-1631

Kohring jury seated;

Editor's Note: Following is a chronological compilation of days two and three of the Vic Kohring corruption trial in Anchorage. Visit the Frontiersman online daily for up-to-date coverage of each day's happenings.

BY RUSSELL STIGALL
For the Frontiersman

Day 2 — The Trial Begins

ANCHORAGE — A jury of 12, along with three alternates, heard opening statements Tuesday afternoon in the bribery and corruption trial of former state Rep. Vic Kohring of Wasilla.

Kohring

Prosecutors and defense attorneys thinned the jury pool for USA vs. Kohring by noon on Tuesday. Jury selection began Monday.

Kohring, former Republican representative for District 14, faces up to 55 years in prison if convicted on federal charges of conspiracy, extortion and bribery. Potential jurors were brought in from around Alaska, including Bethel, Unalaska, Wasilla, Anchorage and Soldotna.

In an indictment of the former lawmaker, prosecutors allege as early as January 2002 Kohring was provided cash payments of about $500 to $1,000 by Bill Allen, then CEO of oil services company VECO, and the company's vice president, Rick Smith. The cash was to reward Kohring for "official acts taken and to be taken regarding [Allen] and [Smith's] business interests," according to the indictment.

At the behest of Allen, Kohring may have also fired his aide, Eric Musser, who had filed a complaint with the Alaska Public Offices Commission against former state Rep. Bev Masek, whom Allen and VECO supported. Initially defined as a loan, $17,000 Kohring solicited from Allen and Smith to help pay credit card debt in collection is alleged to be a payment in Kohring's indictment.

During jury selection Monday and early Tuesday, military members, contractors, project managers and cooks were turned away from jury service. Alaska residents who garden, fish, quilt and play hockey in their free time also didn't make the cut. But hobbies and professions were not the only deciding factors in selecting a jury to decide Kohring's fate, said defense attorney John Henry Browne. Browne said he and Alan Cohen, a communications psychologist, were looking for a particular type of juror.

"People with open minds," Browne said.

Kohring and Browne said they are happy with the final makeup of the jury. Much culling of the jury came from the possibility recent media coverage of Kohring's case and the public corruption trials of former Reps. Tom Anderson and Pete Kott may have influenced jurors. Both Kott and Anderson were convicted.

Though U.S. District Chief Judge John Sedwick denied Kohring's request to move his trial to Washington State due to pre-trial publicity, many more potential jurors than is typical, 120 in total, were called to seat a jury that was not swayed by news coverage of Kohring's case. The potential jurors were narrowed down to 70 before the first day of selection, then down to 57 by the end of the first day Monday.

Day 2 — Opening Arguments for Prosecution

A surprise allegation in opening arguments Tuesday afternoon claimed influence from oil interests did more than bribe Kohring. Prosecutors told the jury they will show that in addition to accepting bribes from VECO's Allen, Kohring twice abstained from running against Republican state Sen. Lyda Green at Allen's request.

The gloves were off as federal prosecutors and attorneys representing Kohring presented opening arguments in the third trial of a former state lawmaker this year.

While Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph Bottini told jurors Kohring accepted bribes from Allen, Kohring's defense attorney, Browne, said the two were friends and any small amounts of money that changed hands between the two were gifts, not graft.

Bottini promised the jury he would prove Kohring had expressed an interest in two elections to run for Green's state Senate seat, but Allen convinced him not to. Green, who could not be immediately reached for comment, has been a vocal opponent to Gov. Sarah Palin's proposal to increase the state's Petroleum Profits Tax.

Allen, who testified to bribing Kott and is expected to testify against Kohring, is unreliable and should not be believed, Browne argued during his opening. Allen has problems with alcohol use, was in a serious motorcycle accident while not wearing a helmet and is the type of person who uses expletives in every sentence. He cut a deal with the government to protect his family.

'Mr. Allen thought he owned the world,'

Defense attorney John Henry Browne about former VECO CEO Bill Allen

A surprise allegation in opening arguments Tuesday afternoon claimed influence from oil interests did more than bribe Kohring. Prosecutors told the jury they will show that in addition to accepting bribes from VECO's Allen, Kohring twice abstained from running against Republican state Sen. Lyda Green at Allen's request.

Browne also said he obtained a copy of the affidavit the government used to acquire a search warrant for Kohring's Wasilla legislative office. In that affidavit were the names of 12 people linked to the case, 11 of which were blacked out. In his reading of the affidavit, Browne said he came to understand that Allen believed he had U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens and U.S. Rep. Don Young under this thumb.

"Mr. Allen thought he owned the world," Browne said, reading to the jury transcripts of conversations between Allen and former VECO VP Smith in suite 604 at the Westmark Baranoff Hotel. "We know what the governor [Frank Murkowski] wants and we got Ted and we got Young," Browne read.

Browne tried to show Kohring's situation pales in comparison to VECO's controversial $250,000 consulting contract with former state Senate President Ben Stevens. He painted Kohring as an innocent soul who should not be judged by the actions of other former lawmakers like Kott, where one of his trial questions was a $10,000 overcharge for a flooring job. In comparison, Kohring "sleeps on his couch and lives in a trailer."

Bottini's opening was highlighted by a colorful anecdote that combined conspiracy, bribery and fast food. In an attempt to halt the 22.8 percent Petroleum Profits Tax from passing through the Legislature in 2006, Allen concocted a scheme to spirit Kohring out of the Capitol on the day the bill was up for vote. Kohring's absence was supposed stop the House from voting. Smith convinced Allen that would be a bad idea, but not before Allen scheduled a meeting with Kohring at a McDonald's in downtown Juneau.

Kohring and Allen met, ordered food and

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) A1 - A14
FRONTIERSMAN

Date: 10/30/2007
Edition: ~~FRIDAY~~

Title: ALLEN SAYS HE BRIBED STEVENS, YOUNG

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ; 672
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

1944-AN-13620-M; 672

50 CENTS

Allen says he bribed Stevens, Young

Prosecution rests in Kohring trial, defense may present case or rest

BY RUSSELL STIGALL
For the Frontiersman

ANCHORAGE — Former state house Rep. Vic Kohring took a back seat at his own trial Monday as former VECO CEO Bill Allen testified that in addition to state lawmakers, he also bribed U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens and U.S. Rep. Don Young.

Allen testified about a 2005 incident where he thought an Australian company decided not to buy VECO because VECO President Pete Lethard made an intoxicated slip and revealed the company's practice of bribery.

Federal prosecutors Joseph Bottini and Edward Sullivan appeared confident as they closed their case against Kohring at about 4 p.m. Monday. Allen spent the final two days of the prosecution's case on the witness stand. During his testimony, he revealed how he and former VECO vice president Rick Smith gave money to Kohring in exchange for his support in working in VECO's interest on legislation.

Kohring, a seven-time former state House representative for District 14, is charged with bribery, corruption and extortion.

His attorney, Seattle-based John Henry Browne, said he may waive his turn at presenting a case to the jury. He

See BRIBED, Page A14

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

FBI - Stevens-1633

Mat-Su Valley Frontiersman
PAGE A13 TUESDAY, OCTOBER 30, 2007

Supreme Court to hear Exxon Valdez case

BY MARK SHERMAN
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court agreed Monday to decide whether Exxon Mobil Corp. should pay $2.5 billion in punitive damages to victims of the huge Exxon Valdez oil spill that fouled more than 1,200 miles of Alaskan coastline in 1989.

The high court stepped into the long-running battle over the damages that Exxon Mobil money would be insufficient. "I ... would have been able to make twice what I make now if the fisheries had stayed healthy," Webber said Monday after learning of the court's action.

But the justices said they would consider whether the company should have to pay damages at all under the Clean Water Act and centuries-old laws governing shipping. The court has frequently sided with business interests in punitive damages and other cases of money was awarded to the widow of a smoker in Oregon.

Exxon said it already has paid $3.4 billion in cleanup costs and other penalties resulting from the oil spill.

"This case has never been about compensating people for actual damages," company spokesman Tony Cudmore said in a statement. "Rather it is about whether further punishment is warranted

Valdez ran aground with 53 million gallons of crude oil in its hold on March 23, 1989.

The plaintiffs said Exxon knew Hazelwood had sought treatment for drinking, but had begun drinking again. "Exxon placed a relapsed alcoholic, who it knew was drinking aboard its ships, in command of an enormous vessel carrying toxic cargo across treacherous and resource-rich waters," they said.

The San Francisco-based 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reduced the punitive damages because, in part, the company tried to clean up the spill and didn't spill oil from the tanker Exxon Valdez deliberately.

Kash's Carpet Bargains

BRIBED

Continued from Page A1

believes the government has not met its burden of proof and will make a decision about putting on a defense sometime before 9 a.m. this morning.

Browne has been trying to show the jury that Kohring is an affable character and naturally helpful. His actions on secret video and audio surveillance tapes saying he wanted to help Allen and VECO are examples of that, not of making promises in exchange for cash.

Browne asked U.S. District Court Judge John Sedwick Monday if he could call witnesses who would testify that Kohring has a habit of asking, "What can I do for you?" Sedwick denied the request.

Kohring's public corruption trial follows that of former state Reps. Pete Kott and Tom Anderson, both of whom were convicted. Anderson was sentenced to five years in prison. Kott is scheduled to be sentenced on Dec. 7.

Browne questioned Allen about home improvement — specifically, controversial improvements VECO is alleged to have made to Stevens' home in Girdwood. Allen said he is helping the government in its investigation of Senator Stevens. The former VECO executive also testified he has implicated Stevens' son Ben Stevens, former state Senate president and Republican Committee member.

In addition to giving Kohring money on several occasions, Allen testified he asked Kohring on two occasions to not challenge state Senate President Lyda Green for the Wasilla Senate seat. Allen did not say why he preferred Green retain her office.

Browne has attempted to portray Allen and Smith as men who bent government officials to their will with handfuls of cash and bogus contracts, and as alcoholic liars.

And as Allen sat in the witness chair Monday, his eyes blinking and his spotted hands fumbling with large hearing aids, Allen seemed subdued from the man who is heard using two related expletives 38 times in a five-minute video.

Browne said different sides of Allen were on display during his testimony.

"Do you normally talk the way you did on this tape?" Browne asked.

"No," Allen responded.

Allen and Smith testified as part of a plea arrangement with federal prosecutors.

With his plea agreement, Allen saved his three children from a similar fate.

A meeting between Judge Sedwick, Browne and prosecuting attorneys spelled out the limits Browne could test in his cross-examination of Allen and Smith. The limits were to prevent Browne and Allen from revealing facts from the FBI's ongoing investigations not related to Kohring's case, Sedwick said.

Frank Pruitt, who volunteered to help the FBI investigate legislator corruption, testified Monday about secretly recorded video of himself and Kohring eating diner. In the grainy video Pruitt said he seeded the conversation with topics given him by the FBI, like "Rick Smith" or "VECO consulting jobs."

Browne said Pruitt's testimony is tainted by his request that the FBI pay him for his informant work. Pruitt said he didn't realize when he first pleaded that helping the government conduct its investigation would be so time consuming.

Contact Russell Stigall at www.russellstigall.com.

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) C-1,C-2
FRONTIERSMAN

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

Date: 09/21/2007
Edition: FRIDAY

Title: AGENTS TAPED TED STEVENS AS PART OF CORRUPTION STING

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ; 673
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

STEVENS

Continued from Page C1

asked how Kott's son resolved his financial problems. Kott replied: "It was your check."

Kott, like Stevens, is Allen's longtime friend. Kott's corruption trial is under way in Anchorage.

Beyond the calls Allen made while cooperating, prosecutors also have thousands of conversations the FBI recorded while secretly wiretapping phones belonging to Allen and fellow VECO executive Rick Smith. Agents also secretly videotaped meetings between contractors and state politicians at a hotel suite in Juneau, Alaska's capital.

In addition to work on Stevens' house, a former employee also said VECO workers also helped run the senator's fundraisers while on company time, a practice that appears to violate campaign finance laws.

Agents taped Ted Stevens as part of corruption sting

BY MATT APUZZO
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) — The FBI, working with an Alaska oil contractor, secretly taped telephone calls with Sen. Ted Stevens as part of a public corruption sting, according to people close to the investigation.

The secret recordings suggest the Justice Department was eyeing Stevens long before June, when the Republican senator first publicly acknowledged he was under scrutiny. At that time, it appeared Stevens was a new focus in a case that had already ensnared several state lawmakers.

The recorded calls between Stevens and businessman Bill Allen were confirmed by two people close to the case who spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is still under way. They declined to say how many calls were recorded or what was said.

Allen, a wealthy businessman and Stevens' political patron, agreed to the taping last year after authorities confronted him with evidence he had bribed Alaska lawmakers. He pleaded guilty to bribery and is a key witness against Alaska legislators. He also has told prosecutors he paid his employees to renovate the senator's house.

In July, FBI agents raided that house in the Anchorage suburb of Girdwood. Stevens has denied any wrongdoing and said he paid every bill he received for the project. Spokesman Aaron Saunders declined to comment Thursday. Stevens has said he won't discuss the investigation for fear it will look like he's trying to influence it.

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko said the agency would not discuss any aspect of the ongoing investigation.

Allen testified in federal court last week that he called several people at the FBI's behest.

"It's been a lot of work," Allen said of his efforts for the FBI.

A judge had previously ruled that Allen could not discuss politicians currently under investigation.

Allen is the founder of VECO Corp., an oil services firm that made nearly $1 billion in annual revenue. The company was a powerful lobbying force and its employees donated heavily to federal and state campaigns.

One example of Allen's calls surfaced last week in the trial of former Alaska House Speaker Peter Kott. While working with the FBI, Allen called Kott and

See STEVENS, Page C2

FBI - Stevens-1635

14A-AN-13620-M ; 673

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) A1- A12
FRONTIERSMAN

Date: 10/26/2007
Edition:

Title: SMITH: KOHRING PROMISED RESULTS FOR VECO

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ; 674
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

FBI - Stevens-1636

194A-AN-13620-M; 674

Mat-Su Valley Frontiersman
PAGE A11 FRIDAY, OCTOBER 26, 2007

BP fine could cost company political leverage

BY JEANNETTE J. LEE AND STEVE QUINN
AP Business Writers

ANCHORAGE, — The sullying of two acres of delicate tundra and a frozen lake in the vast oil fields of northern Alaska will cost BP America more than the $20 million required in a federal settlement over environmental pollution.

It could also cost them political leverage as Alaska lawmakers open a debate over raising the state tax on net oil profits.

The oil tax bill is heavily backed by Gov. Sarah Palin and features a component that would prohibit oil companies from making tax deduction

The spill was the largest ever in the North Slope fields, which border the Arctic Ocean.

The agreement was one of several struck between the London-based oil and gas giant and federal investigators in the resolution of probes across the U.S.

The London-based company agreed to pay a total of $373 million in fines and restitution over the manipulation of energy markets in the Midwest and violation of the Clean Air Act in a refinery explosion that killed 15 people in Texas.

Four former BP employees were indicted by a federal grand jury in Chicago on 20 counts of mail and wire fraud charges Arctic environmental research. The fine is the largest ever levied for an environmental misdemeanor in Alaska, Cohen said.

It takes into account the money BP should have spent to properly maintain the pipeline, as well as a prior felony against the company when a contractor illegally dumped waste oil and other toxic substances at the North Slope's Endicott field in 1999, Cohen said.

Still, some lawmakers were not satisfied, saying the fine is not a large enough deterrent when dealing with multi-billion dollar global conglomerates.

"The proof is there they didn't tors traced the crude oil spill in March 2006 to poor maintenance of a transit pipeline, Cohen said.

The pipe was corroded, with a hole the size of an almond caused by bacteria living beneath a build-up of sludge, according to Cohen. The microbes produce an acid that eats away at the pipe. The sludge, which BP should have removed, protects them from being swept away by the flow of oil, Cohen said.

The line was one of several that carry oil from a production center into the trans-Alaska oil pipeline, an 800-mile trunk that runs from the North Slope to the tanker port of Valdez in south-central Alaska. The leak occurred at a caribou crossing, where a mound is built over the pipeline allowing the animals to cross, according the plea agreement.

The incident was followed in August 2006 with a 1,000-gallon oil spill, forcing BP Exploration Alaska, Inc. to temporarily halve its Prudhoe Bay production to less than 200,000 gallons a day.

Justice officials said BP will not be charged for the August incident because it has cooperated fully with the investigation.

The state is still pursuing a civil case against the company, said Attorney General Talis Colberg. He would not give further details.

Kash's Carpet Bargains

KOHRING

Continued from Page A1

makers.

Kohring's corruption trial follows that of former state Reps. Pete Kott and Tom Anderson. Kott and Anderson were convicted. Anderson was sentenced to five years in prison. Kott is scheduled for sentencing Dec. 7.

Smith testified the money given to Kohring was payoff to keep Kohring in VECO's favor. Browne has maintained Kohring never voted in favor of any bill at the bidding of VECO; however, Kohring is heard and seen on secret recordings saying he would attempt to lobby and influence his fellow legislators.

Smith said Kohring told him he would make appointments with members of the House Finance Committee to lobby for the Production Profits Tax VECO favored. The tax was arranged by former Gov. Frank Murkowski and officials from oil companies Exxon, British Petroleum and Conoco to give the industry a stable tax rate on oil and gas production in Alaska. Murkowski and the oil industry, of which VECO was a part, preferred a tax of 20 percent, lower than that 22.8 percent passed by the Legislature.

At one point in Thursday's testimony Kohring made eye contact with Smith and the two held the gaze for a moment. Kohring smiled and Smith turned away.

When asked during a break by the Frontiersman reporter what it was like to sit across from Smith in the unfamiliar venue of a courtroom, Kohring said it was surreal.

"I've known him for 14 years," he said. "We've had many dinners together. We were, at least I thought he was a friend, and to have him over there glaring at me, it was crazy."

Browne tried to show that Smith had personal motives to point an accusing finger at Kohring.

Smith's plea deal with the government allows his sentence to be substantially reduced from federal guidelines. The guidelines call for Smith to receive nine-to-11-year sentence.

"This is dealing with the rest of your life," Browne said.

"I understand that I am up against a hard one," Smith said. "I'm 62 years old."

Also part of the plea, the government agreed not to charge VECO Corp. with a crime. This allowed Allen to sell the company to CH2M Hill. Smith benefited from this sale with a $200,000 to $300,000 severance package. Smith was also given $500,000 to hire two attorneys.

Video and audio recordings of Smith and Allen played for the jury were rife with profanity. From the witness stand Smith apologized for his foul language.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation first approached Smith on Aug. 31, 2006, he said. Allen invited Smith to a meeting at Allen's house. When Smith arrived FBI agents were already there. Smith has pleaded guilty to bribery, extortion and conspiracy.

Most of the prosecution's questions asked Smith to clarify or give his thoughts about the recordings presented the day before in court.

Smith understood Kohring's phone calls to be reassurance that Kohring was on board with VECO's wishes. On one occasion Kohring called Smith to talk about House Bill 386, which called for tax breaks for exploration expenditures to oil companies.

Smith said Kohring went out of his way "to show me he's out there being proactive" to help get the best legislation for the oil industry.

Prosecuting attorney Edward Sullivan went so far as to try to get Smith to call Kohring a "loyal soldier," but an objection by Browne to the attempt was sustained.

Throughout the day at various times jurors would pour each other glasses of water, take notes or yawn and stare. One juror spent 10 minutes with his head in his hand.

Smith also testified about $17,000 Kohring asked himself and Allen for to pay off his credit card debt.

"We both said we didn't want to touch it at all," Smith said; however, in a hidden video recorded at the time, Smith brings up the $17,000, saying that after the 2006 legislative session Allen and Smith would need to make a decision about his request for cash.

During cross examination Browne asked Smith about Allen's secretly recorded statement where he said that for a $1,000 payment Allen gave to Kohring, Kohring "would kiss our ass."

"But he didn't kiss your ass, did he?" Browne said.

Former VECO CEO Allen is expected to testify when the trial resumes today.

50 CENTS

Smith: Kohring promised results for VECO

BY RUSSELL STIGALL
For the Frontiersman

ANCHORAGE — Vic Kohring took the money.

That was the consensus Thursday during the fourth day of trial for the former state House representative charged with bribery, corruption and extortion.

Former VECO vice president Rick Smith spent the day on the witness stand testifying for the prosecution. No one, not even Kohring's defense attorney, John Henry Browne, disputes former VECO CEO Bill Allen and Smith passed hundred dollar bills to the former District 14 legislator, who resigned in June.

The question is whether the money given to Kohring was bribes to buy the lawmaker's influence or simply gifts between old friends. Browne attempted half the day Thursday to wring a satisfactory answer to that question out of Smith on cross examination.

Smith, 62, who sat on the witness stand with reading glasses perched on his nose, appeared put out by the testimony he had to give. Throughout the day, Smith's eyes would dart to the federal prosecutors with whom he had cut a plea deal. Smith and Allen both agreed to testify against Kohring and other indicted state law-

See KOHRING, Page A12

DAY 4

Kohring corruption trial
For more on this week's court happenings see page A3.

FBI - Stevens-1639

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) C-1, C-2
FRONTIERSMAN

Date: 10/12/2007
Edition: FRIDAY

Title: KOHRING MAINTAINS INNOCENCE, ENTERS 'NOT GUILTY' PLEA

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ; 1675
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

FBI - Stevens-1640

194A-AN-13620-M; 1675

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

GUILTY

Continued from Page A1

ruption.

The jury appeared serious as its members filed into the courtroom, some dressed in suits and others in collared shirts. During the nearly two-week trial, the jury heard and saw secret government wiretaps that featured Kohring; former VECO CEO Bill Allen and former VECO vice president Rick Smith. Allen and Smith also both testified about giving Kohring money and the lawmaker's eagerness to be useful to them and VECO.

One lengthy video surveillance tape clearly shows Kohring asking Allen and Smith for a $17,000 loan. He needed the money to pay off credit card debt and told the VECO executives a loan from them would help protect his political reputation.

Assistant U.S. Attorneys Edward Sullivan and Joseph Bottini spent parts of six days laying out their case against Kohring, including linking him to attempts to influence Petroleum Profits Tax legislation.

Browne called two witnesses: Kohring's 19-year-old nephew and a friend.

Kohring is the third former state legislator to be convicted of similar charges in an ongoing federal public corruption investigation being run by the FBI. Former state House Rep. Tom Anderson was sentenced to five years and former Rep. Pete Kott, found guilty of three counts, will be sentenced Dec. 7. Another former House member, Bruce Weyhrauch, is next in line to face federal prosecutors.

Visit the Frontiersman online, www.frontiersman.com, for day-by-day coverage of Vic Kohring's trial.

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) A1-A10
FRONTIERSMAN

Date: 11/2/2007
Edition:

Title: KOHRING GUILTY

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ;6776
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

FBI - Stevens-1641

194A-AN-13620-M;6776

Kohring maintains innocence, enters 'not guilty' plea

BY RUSSELL STIGALL
For the Frontiersman

ANCHORAGE — In the wake of fellow former state lawmakers being convicted of and admitting to bribery and corruption, seven-time House member Vic Kohring maintains his innocence.

At his arraignment in U.S. District Courtroom 6 Tuesday afternoon, the former Wasilla representative told Judge John D. Roberts he would not change his position.

"Not guilty, your honor," Kohring said when asked to plead on federal charges he accepted money from officers of oil services company VECO Corp. in exchange for favorable votes on legislation.

His plea also comes less than a week following the release of an amended indictment that expanded upon Kohring's original indictment released in May. The superseding indictment adds allegations that extend the former lawmaker's alleged conspiracy back to January 2002.

Federal investigators allege that as early as 2002, Kohring was provided cash payments of about $500 to $1,000 by then VECO Chief Executive Officer Bill Allen and VECO Vice President Rick Smith to reward Kohring for "official acts taken and to be taken regarding [Allen] and [Smith's] business interests," the revised indictment says. It alleges that Kohring, at the behest of Allen, laid off an aide who had filed a complaint with the Alaska Public Officials Commission against a legislator Allen and VECO supported.

DENNIS ZAKI/Courtesy photo

Former state Rep. Vic Kohring, center, is approached by media walking into court Tuesday in Anchorage. He's accompanied by attorney Wayne Ross, far right.

The revised indictment also changes language in the allegation that Kohring solicited $17,000 from Allen and Smith to help pay his credit card debt that was in collection. Initially defined as a loan, the $17,000 is now deemed a payment to Kohring, who told Allen and Smith he did not have the money to pay the debt and was under pressure to do so.

Kohring told Allen and Smith the debt was a "personal financial matter" that "potentially could hurt me politically," the indictment says.

When asked Tuesday if Kohring's legal team has enough time to deal with the superseding indictment before Kohring's trial begins Oct. 22, Wayne Ross, an attorney representing Kohring at Tuesday's plea hearing, seemed confident.

"Oh yeah, there is nothing new here," he said.

Ross was filling in for Seattle attorney John Henry Browne, who was unavailable to attend the hearing.

The arraignment for USA v. Kohring took a few minutes and was sparsely attended, mostly by members of the media. Three attorneys represented the federal government.

Allen is expected to testify against Kohring. The former VECO CEO cut a deal to testify against former Rep. Pete Kott, who was convicted by a jury last month, and Kohring. During Kott's trial, Allen's testimony was damaging as he described conversations and arrangements he had with the former legislator, including cash payments and other bribes. In return, Kott voted how Allen wanted on the Petroleum Profits Tax. Prosecutors also have a videotaped conversation between Allen and Smith that shows Allen talking about giving Kohring $1,000.

Political watchdog and Mat-Su Valley resident Myrl Thompson attended Tuesday's plea hearing said Kohring acted like the amiable politician who won seven straight House elections. Kohring seemed in good spirits, shaking hands with prosecutors and making small talk with reporters before entering the courtroom.

Kohring and Ross went over papers while they waited for the arraignment to begin.

"I've been doing my homework," Kohring said. "Believe me, I wanted to be ready for this one."

Judge Roberts accepted Kohring's not guilty plea and set his trial to begin at 9 a.m. Oct. 22 at the federal courthouse in Anchorage.

50 CENTS

Kohring guilty

Jury convicts former Mat-Su Valley legislator on 3 of 4 corruption charges

BY RUSSELL STIGALL
For the Frontiersman

Anchorage — Vic Kohring showed little emotion Thursday as his verdict was read — guilty, guilty, guilty.

Following more than a week of testimony, a jury convicted the former seven-time state House member on three of four federal charges. Kohring, 49, a Wasilla Republican, is guilty of bribery, attempted extortion and conspiracy to commit extortion. He was acquitted of a fourth corruption charge.

Vic Kohring

The jury of seven men and five women deliberated for an afternoon and a morning before returning the verdict.

Following the verdict, Kohring, who remains free on bail pending his sentencing, apologized to his friends, family and former constituents for the trauma of his trial. He and his attorney, Seattle-based John Henry Browne, also blamed the Anchorage Daily News and Channel 2 News for biasing the jury pool, an argument they made before the trial began. Kohring did not testify at his trial.

Browne estimates Kohring could be looking at a prison sentence of three years, adding a decision to appeal the verdict hasn't been made. Kohring's sentencing is scheduled for February 2008.

Before his trial, Kohring, who took money from former VECO oil service company executives in return for political favors, labeled himself a modern-day David battling the Goliath of the federal government. Browne attempted to show Kohring as a small fish innocently caught up in a large pond of cor-

See GUILTY, Page A10

FBI - Stevens-1643

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) A1-A11 FRONTIERSMAN

Date: 10/16/2007
Edition:

Title: KOHRING TO ASK FOR DISMISSAL

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M
Submitting Office: Anchorage

1677

Indexing:

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

KOHRING

Continued from Page A1

A plea arrangement would require a deal between Kohring and prosecutors. This can be ne any time before a verdict, Gara said, adding it is not likely Kohring would take a deal.

Kohring, in an e-mail interview, said he would not accept a deal with prosecutors because that would be an admission of guilt.

"It might be that the prosecution has offered him nothing [less] than what he would get from the court," Gara said. "That is often the case in a trial, if there is no significant offer of leniency the defendant decides just to go to trial."

Gara said Kohring faces a national atmosphere where people see corruption at all levels of government. On a local level, the trials of former Reps. Tom Anderson and Pete Kott have shown an ugly side of the state Legislature.

"Juries are offended by the bribery conduct they are hearing about," Gara said. "Makes you wonder if they were innocent legislators if they could get off on their indictments."

Kohring attempted to have his trial moved out of Alaska because the media could have already turned the jury pool

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

194A-AN-13620-M, 1677

Judge denies Kohring's change of venue bid

BY RUSSELL STIGALL
For the Frontiersman

MAT-SU — Former state House Rep. Vic Kohring has been denied his request to face a jury outside of Alaska.

Kohring told U.S. District Judge John W. Sedwick he feels he cannot receive a fair trial in Alaska because of the intense media coverage of the state Legislature corruption scandal, of which Kohring is a part. The seven-time House member is accused of taking money in exchange for favorable votes for VECO oil services company officials. He faces federal charges of bribery, conspiracy and corruption. His trial is scheduled to begin Oct. 22.

Sedwick disagreed, writing in an Oct. 5 opinion that "none of the individual media items warrant a finding of presumed prejudice."

While there has been significant media coverage of Kohring's case, "The publicity has been spread over a period of many months," Sedwick says in his ruling. "Most of it consists of entirely factual news stories ... that are measured in tone and not inflammatory."

Drawing on case precedent, Sedwick says a change of venue would be appropriate "only in extreme cases where a community is literally saturated with inflammatory and prejudicial publicity. That is not the situation with respect to the community from which Kohring's jury will be drawn."

The judge also says there has not been a "huge wave of public passion" directed toward Kohring and attributes this partially to the relatively small percentage of Alaska residents who follow events in the news media.

Kohring requested his trial be held in Washington state. His attorney, John Henry Browne, is based in Seattle.

In making his case for the change of venue, Kohring's attorney submitted as evidence of inflammatory publicity a front page story from the May 6 Mat-Su Valley Frontiersman.

"This story is factual," Sedwick ruled. "It does contain a colorful quote from the VECO executive [about giving Kohring $1,000 and, as a result, Kohring would 'kiss our ass'], but even that appears to be a factual report and something that likely will be presented as part of the wiretap evidence at trial."

Editorial cartoons in the Frontiersman were considered inflammatory but did not rise to the level of ordering a change of venue.

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) A14
FRONTIERSMAN, MAT-SU VALLEY, AI

Date: 10/16/2007
Edition: TUESDAY

Title: JUDGE SENTENCES ANDERSON TO FIVE YEARS ON CORRUPTION CONVICTIONS

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ; 678
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

FBI - Stevens-1646

194A-AN-13620-M;678

Kohring to ask for dismissal

BY RUSSELL STIGALL
For the Frontiersman

ALASKA — Former state Rep. Vic Kohring and his legal team plan to answer the bell swinging when his trial begins Oct. 22.

In a defendant's status report filed with U.S. District court Oct. 11, the former lawmaker and his attorney, John Henry Browne, argue federal prosecutors should throw Kohring's case out. They will contest evidence prosecutors intend to use against Kohring.

Kohring said Browne intends to file a motion to dismiss the case.

A seven-time state House member, Kohring faces federal charges of bribery, corruption and conspiracy. He will be the third former Alaska lawmaker to stand trial over the past six months.

In the report, Kohring and Brown say the government interfered with Kohring's right to legal counsel and trial by using Eagle River state Sen. Fred Dyson as an undercover Federal Bureau of Investigation informant.

Dyson has repeatedly denied acting on behalf of the FBI.

Prosecuting Kohring on behalf of the United States of America are William M. Welch, chief of the U.S. Attorney's Office's Public Integrity Section, trial attorneys Nicholas Marsh and Edward Sullivan, and assistant U.S. attorneys Joseph Bottini and James Goeke. Repeated phone calls and attempts to contact prosecutors about claims made in the status report were not returned.

In an affidavit accompanying Kohring's report, Kohring's former chief of staff, John Davies, explains Dyson's alleged connection to the FBI. Davies works for Rep. Wes Keller, R-Wasilla, who was appointed to fill Kohring's seat after Kohring resigned in June. Keller was Dyson's chief of staff before Keller's own appointment to the Legislature.

While Keller was working for Dyson and Davies for Kohring, Davies says Keller handed him the card of an FBI agent. Keller told him that "an FBI agent ... had come by Senator Dyson's office and left her card with the senator saying, 'Have Representative Kohring call me. It will go easier for him if he cooperates with us,' or words to that effect."

Kohring and Browne maintain that this contact was the FBI, through Dyson, trying to deny him his right to legal representation and a trial.

Kohring said Browne also believes the government's recent filing of an amended indictment amounts to a "last-minute filing."

"Now they're claiming they may not be prepared for the start of the Oct. 22 trial because of this," Kohring said.

The government's superseding indictment, released Oct. 4, should not delay the start of the trial, Browne says in the status report. "It is Mr. Kohring's adamant desire to go to trial on the day presently set for trial."

Rep. Les Gara, D-Anchorage, said that despite any pre-trial posturing, Kohring could still reach a plea deal with federal prosecutors.

"You can always plead, depending on the strength of your case," Gara said.

See KOHRING, Page A11

it was the only thing he was doing. It was really stressful," he said.

Anderson had misgivings about extending his cooperation to the legislative session in Juneau.

"The people in his district had not elected him to be an undercover agent," Feldman said.

Anderson's willingness to save himself bumped up against what he felt was duplicitous to his legislative colleagues, he said, and Anderson stopped cooperating.

Anderson knew the consequences of ending his cooperation, Feldman said, and it happened.

"There was no ambiguity about what would unfold," Feldman said.

Anderson was arrested Dec. 7 and charged with conspiracy, bribery, money laundering and interfering with commerce, a charge connected to a demand for payments.

He was the first of four former Alaska lawmakers arrested on federal corruption charges. Former House Speaker Pete Kott, R-Eagle River, was convicted last month of conspiracy to solicit financial benefits, extortion and bribery.

Former Rep. Vic Kohring, R-Wasilla, is scheduled to go on trial on corruption charges next week.

The corruption trial of former state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, R-Juneau, has been delayed. Federal prosecutors are appealing a decision on the case that said they could not claim that Weyhrauch were required to disclose to fellow legislators or the public that he was seeking employment from VECO.

packs in learning

PALMER — An unlikely combination of fisheries, the legal process and agriculture gave 44 Glacier View School students in grades one through 12 a variety of experiences during a recent field trip.

Ninth- through 12th-grade students observed the Carl the Cat court case in Palmer Superior Court and had the privilege to meet at length with Judge Eric Smith, presiding over the case. The high school students, enrolled in a law-related studies course taught by history teacher Mark Owen, learned about job opportunities in the field of law and the legal process.

Meanwhile, first- through eighth-grade students began their field trip at Spring Creek, where Alaska Department of Fish and Game officials taught them about the life cycle of Alaska salmon. Students saw how salmon eggs are fertilized.

Third- through fifth-grade students will monitor some of the eggs' growth in a large fish tank at their school. Garth Morgan, the Glacier View science teacher, tested the water temperature and oxygen levels of Spring Creek with his junior high students to ensure the classroom tank environment matches that of the creek.

VanderWeele Farms, the third stop on the field trip for the elementary and junior high students, was equally relevant to Alaska Studies, said Jodi Talcott, who is teaching grades three through five. Alaska Agriculture in the

FBI - Stevens-1650

Mat-Su Valley Frontiersman
PAGE A14 TUESDAY, OCTOBER 16, 2007

Judge sentences Anderson to five years on corruption convictions

BY DAN JOLING
Associated Press Writer

ANCHORAGE (AP) — Former state Rep. Tom Anderson helped the FBI investigate a half dozen other cases of suspected public corruption in Alaska.

That got him no consideration from federal prosecutors after he abruptly stopped cooperating.

Anderson, convicted July 9 of seven counts of conspiracy and bribery, was sentenced Monday to five years in prison, a term prosecutors considered too short.

Anderson's sentencing hearing took two hours as witnesses described how the former lawmaker, after being confronted with evidence in his own corruption case, agreed to help investigators by recording conversations with a half dozen or so others under investigation.

According to witnesses Monday, that stopped after Anderson told his future wife, state Sen. Lesil McGuire, R-Anchorage, that he was cooperating with investigators. She learned he would be expected to plead guilty to one felony count, and that investigators expected him to continue assisting them with secret recordings in the 2006 legislative session.

Shortly after that meeting, Anderson fired his attorney and stopped wearing a wire.

Anderson, 40, a two-term Republican from Anchorage who chose not to run for reelection in 2006, was convicted of taking nearly $24,000 he thought was coming from a private prison firm, Cornell Industries, Inc., in exchange for his assistance on legislation.

The money was supplied by the FBI through an informant under contract to Cornell, Frank Prewitt, a former Alaska Department of Corrections commissioner. Prewitt secretly recorded his conversations with Anderson and a coconspirator, lobbyist Bill Bobrick, between July 2004 and March 2005. Cornell Industries was not aware of the investigation.

Anderson did not immediately comment after the sentence was announced. He remains free and afterward hugged friends and family members — many in tears — who lined the gallery.

Prosecutors sought a sentence of more than eight years. Assistant U.S. Attorney Joe Bottini said the evidence showed Anderson did more than succumb to temptation to take money. Anderson solicited the bribe, betrayed his public trust and actively took part in concealing the money, Bottini said.

"The public's faith in the integrity of our legislative system is eroded," Bottini said.

He urged U.S. District Court Judge John Sedwick to restore the public's faith.

"They have to know it was serious, and when they're caught they're going to be punished, and they're going to be punished to the extent they deserve," Bottini said.

Anderson's lawyer, Paul Stockler, asked for a sentence of no more than three years, which he said was "more than enough time."

The difference between five and three years would have no affect as a deterrent, Stockler said. But it would make a significant difference in Anderson's ability to support his three children from previous relationships and in the life of his young son — the difference between taking him to his first day of kindergarten or the first day of second grade, Stockler said.

Sedwick decision for a 60-month sentence fell within the pre-sentencing report guidelines of the 51 to 63 months. The judge noted the volume of support letters that had poured in for Anderson and said the matter likely was heartbreaking for Anderson's family. Anderson is the son of a former director of the Alaska State Troopers.

"I have no idea how Mr. Anderson's apple fell so far from the tree, but it did," Sedwick said.

The judge said he took into account Anderson's long record of community and legislative service and his willingness to help constituents, but ultimately, Anderson did not take a bribe to help someone else.

"He took the money because he wanted the money," Sedwick said.

Anderson's former attorneys testified about his cooperation with investigators.

Craig Howard, a 22-year public defender now in private practice, said he was called from his son's Little League game in summer 2005 to Anderson's legislative office as the FBI was about to serve a search warrant. Anderson had been confronted by investigators that afternoon.

The government made it clear from the outset, Howard said, that Anderson would have to plead guilty to one felony charge even as he cooperated. There was an understanding he might be able to say which charge, Howard said, but the arrangement called for nothing less than a felony.

"From day one, no way was it going to be a misdemeanor in this case," Howard said.

Anderson cooperated with investigators throughout the summer. Anderson's father had been informed of the investigation, Howard said.

After learning that McGuire was pregnant, Howard said, Anderson insisted that she be told of his situation. Prosecutors gave their consent and Anderson's cooperation with the government, as well as his connection to Howard, ended.

"I was dismissed," Howard said.

Howard's replacement, Jeffrey Feldman, testified that without a written agreement between Anderson and prosecutors, he negotiated for a "pass" for his client, such as a misdemeanor plea, in exchange for Anderson's cooperation. He tried to pin prosecutors down as to the exact considerations Anderson would receive for his cooperation.

"That became the goal," Feldman said. "It wasn't the goal initially."

By September 2005, the investigation was Anderson's "job," consuming all of his time, Feldman said.

PFD SALE! $50 OFF
Winter's coming. Replace your old garage door now. Free Estimates.
DOOR TECH, LLC
907-746-3900
WWW.DOORTECHALASKA.COM

FBI - Stevens-1651

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) A1 FRONTIERSMAN

Date: 11/18/2007
Edition: ~~FRIDAY~~

Title: GREEN SURPRISED BY FORMER VECC CHIEF'S TESTIMONY

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

194A-AN-13620-M, 6679

Green surprised by former VECO chief's testimony

State Senate president doesn't know why Allen would talk Kohring out of running for her seat

BY RUSSELL STIGALL
For the Frontiersman

MAT-SU — As the state Legislature prepares to end a month-long special session by successfully passing new oil tax reform, the fallout from convictions of former state lawmakers continues.

It was during last month's bribery and corruption trial of former state Rep. Vic Kohring, R-Wasilla, that former VECO CEO Bill Allen testified that on two occasions he convinced the former Wasilla lawmaker to not run against state Senate President Lyda Green. This revelation was used by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and federal prosecutors to help make their case that the Wasilla Republican was beholden to the wishes of VECO executives. Kohring was convicted of bribery, attempted extortion and conspiracy.

That she was a favored legislator of Allen or VECO was news to Green, R-Wasilla, who said after Kohring's conviction she never had any improper contact with Allen or VECO. Green said she has no idea why Allen would convince Kohring not to run against her and she had no idea at the time Kohring was considering it. She also said has been saddened to see Kohring, a friend, go through his public trial, along with other former state legislators Tom Anderson and Pete Kott, who were also convicted of corruption.

Green, an educator and business owner, was first elected to the state Senate in 1997. Since 1998, Alaska Public Offices Commission records show Green has accepted at least $15,000 from VECO Corp. for her campaigns. In that same time, VECO contributed to many local and national political campaigns. The top six beneficiaries of VECO's political generosity received about $866,000 total, records show. These were legal contributions reported to APOC.

Green, who has never been charged or officially implicated in any wrongdoing, was a vocal opponent of the Petroleum Profits Tax, which this past week was replaced during a special session of the Legislature with another oil tax plan that taxes the oil industry at a higher rate. Gov. Sarah Palin called the special session because she said the PPT, which was at the heart of the charges against Anderson, Kott and Kohring, was tainted by corruption.

Contacted by the Frontiersman following Kohring's conviction, Green said she was not beholden to Allen or VECO and has never done anything improper as a member of the state Senate. She acknowledged the convictions of former legislators may affect the public's trust in lawmakers overall. Most lawmakers are simple, honest residents working in good faith and guided by their beliefs, she said.

Allen's testimony during Kohring's trial last month also showed Rep. Bev Masek, R-Willow, was another of the former VECO executive's political favorites. Allen said he convinced Kohring to fire his aide, Eric Musser, who alleged Masek had misused campaign contributions. Allen said he liked Masek's voting record, was irked when Musser blew the whistle on her and asked Kohring to fire him.

Kohring denies he fired Musser at the behest of Allen.

Managing editor Greg Johnson contributed to this report.

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

FD-350 (Rev. 5-8-81)

(Mount Clipping in Space Below)

(Indicate page, name of newspaper, city and state.) A1-A14
FRONTIERSMAN

Date: 10/23/2007
Edition: ~~FRIDAY~~

Title: JURORS PROBED ABOUT MEDIA COVERAGE

Character:
or
Classification: AN-13620-M ; 680
Submitting Office: Anchorage

Indexing:

MEDIA

Continued from Page A1

In the indictment, released Oct. 4, federal investigators allege that as early as January 2002 Kohring was provided cash payments of about $500 to $1,000 by Allen and former VECO VP Rick Smith to reward Kohring for "official acts taken and to be taken regarding [Allen] and [Smith's] business interests."

The superseding indictment also alleges that Kohring, at the behest of Allen, laid off his aide, Eric Musser, who had filed a complaint with the Alaska Public Offices Commission against former Rep. Beverly Masek, whom Allen and VECO supported.

One by one Monday, 70 potential jurors filed into Courtroom No. 3 of the U.S. Federal Building and Courthouse in Anchorage in random order. U.S. District Court Judge John W. Sedwick questioned the group to determine if they had been influenced by media coverage of Kohring, Kott, Anderson, Allen and Smith.

Kohring seemed in good spirits as he helped his attorney, Seattle-based John Henry Browne, screen potential jurors. The court had questioned 50 jurors by 4 p.m. During a short break in the selection process, Browne said he is looking to empanel a fair jury.

"I think we're making inroads there," Browne said.

Last week, Judge Sedwick reprimanded Kohring and Browne for information they released to the press. The judge admonished the pair to try their case in court, not in the media.

Sedwick had to reel Browne in again during the jury selection on Monday.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph Bottini said Browne could be influencing the jurors in a way that could come into play later in the trial. Browne said to several potential jurors they provided more thoughtful answers than other potential jurors.

Sedwick agreed with Bottini and asked Browne to cease.

Jury selection continues today and opening arguments are expected to begin Wednesday.

FBI - Stevens-1652

194A-AN-13620-M;680

Jurors probed about media coverage

Jury selection begins in Kohring trial

BY RUSSELL STIGALL
For the Frontiersman

ANCHORAGE — Alaska's legislative corruption scandal has not been on the radar of many of former state House Rep. Vic Kohring's potential jurors.

Kohring's trial on federal charges of bribery, corruption and conspiracy opened in Anchorage Monday.

Considerable media that has covered Kohring's indictment, as well as the trials and convictions of former state Reps. Pete Kott and Tom Anderson, has apparently had little influence on those reporting for jury duty Monday.

Kohring's defense and federal prosecutors used the first day of jury selection in Kohring's trial process to gauge how much influence media coverage has had on potential jurors.

While many jurors subscribe to print media, far fewer said they read front-page articles. Many peruse sports, weather and headlines.

Kohring is accused of accepting money from former VECO CEO Bill Allen in return for his vote on the Petroleum Profits Tax legislation. Kohring has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing and has maintained he and Allen were friends.

An amended indictment against the former seven-time state legislator says Kohring may have been under the influence of VECO Corp. since 2002.

See MEDIA, Page A14

FBI - Stevens 1653

NewsBank America's Newspapers

And then there was 1 - Personal-conduct issues brought down all but Green QUARTET OF VALLEY LAWMAKERS RODE HIGH -- FOR A WHILE

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - December 31, 2007

Author: S.J. KOMARNITSKY skomarnitsky@adn.com ; Staff

Three years ago, they were the seemingly unbeatable gang of four. Vic Kohring, Scott Ogan, Bev Masek and Lyda Green were upstarts with little political experience when they rode a Republican wave to victory in 1994 that turned the Matanuska-Susitna Borough from a Democratic haven to a Republican stronghold.

Among the vanquished were the then-senior member of the Legislature, Sen. Jay Kerttula of Palmer, a 32-year veteran, and Rep. Ron Larson of Palmer, a 12-year incumbent.

"If you were a Republican in 1994, your name could have been Dillinger, first name John, and you probably would have been elected," said state Rep. Carl Gatto of Palmer, who served with the four after being elected in 2002.

But they proved their victories no fluke. For 10 years, they easily beat back challengers and weathered grilling on their political stands, residency and legislative attendance record.

In 2004, their fortunes turned. And when Vic Kohring six months ago resigned his House seat representing Wasilla to focus on his defense to charges of conspiracy, bribery and attempted extortion, only Green, the state Senate president, remained.

Like Kohring, who was convicted and faces sentencing in February, Masek and Ogan left under a cloud.

Ogan, of Palmer, resigned in August 2004 after constituents, angered by his work as a consultant for a resource-extraction company, launched a recall campaign.

That same month, Masek, of Willow, lost a primary election to political newcomer Mark Neuman, a Big Lake woodworker who went on to win Masek's District 15 House seat. She was dogged by a legislative inquiry into alleged use of her campaign funds for personal expenses. The Alaska Public Offices Commission later fined her $1,000.

Peter Burchell, a local educator for whom Burchell High School in Wasilla is named, ran as an independent in 2002 against Kohring. He says he sees in the departures of Ogan, Masek and Kohring ethical lapses brought on by arrogance.

"I think it's the same reason they got elected (in 1994)," he said. "Then it was the Democrats. Now they were getting too big for their britches."

FBI - Stevens 1654

But other Valley political observers say not to make much of the turnover, at least in terms of a change in the political leanings of borough citizens. All three legislators were replaced by Republicans with solidly conservative resumes -- Reps. Neuman and Wes Keller and Sen. Charlie Huggins, all of Wasilla.

"What people want from their legislators hasn't changed," said Tuckerman Babcock, a former chairman of the state Republican Party. "If you look at the issues that led to the defeat or resignation of the lawmakers, it's not related to their stands on issues; they are related to their personal conduct,"

Green, a Wasilla lawmaker, was reluctant to make any generalizations about her colleagues' departures

194A-AN-13620-M;681

besides saying the situation was "sad."

But she said not seeing Ogan, Masek and Kohring in the hallways in Juneau is strange. The longer one stays in office, she noted, the harder it is to keep up with constituents.

"Once you get to a certain point in this game when you're so busy with your office, it's harder to be on the street and at every borough meeting and be visible ... it's easy to lose touch," Green said.

KOHRING

Kohring arguably fell the furthest of the three.

A drywall hanger and loan manager, he literally came out of nowhere in 1994 to beat Pat Carney, a Wasilla Democrat who had served four terms in the House. Kohring wasn't even on the ballot until the general election. He was recruited to step in after the Republican primary winner -- pastor John Cummings -- withdrew.

But in the seven weeks left in which to campaign, Kohring ran hard and developed a signature style. He knocked on doors and waved signs along the Glenn Highway. He liked to show off for reporters that season's worn shoes.

"He worked his tail off," said Babcock, who helped recruit Kohring as a candidate.

Of the four, Kohring also seemed the most bulletproof. His electoral victories were the most lopsided. He won by 2-1 margins against credible, well-funded challengers, and in spite of questions about his finances and particularly his residency. His wife lived in Oregon, and Kohring sold his home in Wasilla. He claimed that he lived primarily with his parents in their mobile home, also in Wasilla.

Even word of the FBI investigation that was his eventual undoing did him little initial harm. Voters last year re-elected him easily by a 3-2 margin over Democrat Katie Hurley, a former legislator and a participant in the Alaska constitutional convention.

Burchell, whom Kohring in 2002 crushed in the polls 2-1, said Kohring had a pitch-perfect message voters in his district loved: "no tax, no tax, no tax."

The only way he could lose: "He had to take himself out," Burchell said.

OGAN

Scott Ogan was a cabinetmaker with $5,000 in campaign funds in 1994 when he challenged Larson, a 12-year incumbent with a campaign war chest of nearly $70,000. Larson was adept at bringing state projects home to the Valley and would later have an elementary school named after him.

But Ogan's "Ogan is pro-gun" slogan and his theme, time for change, caught on in a year when voters nationally ushered in a Republican sweep that handed that party control of both the U.S. House and Senate for the first time in 40 years.

John Bitney, an aide to Larson at the time and now working for Rep. John Harris of Valdez, said Larson was so certain of victory that he had already lined up the votes to become House speaker, the top leader in the House.

When results showed Ogan had won by just more than 130 votes out of some 6,400 cast, the calls started coming from other legislators, including then House Speaker Ramona Barnes.

"They were just floored," Bitney said.

Once in office, Ogan became a lightning rod on issues like gay marriage, which he opposed, and subsistence. He adamantly opposed giving a priority to rural residents for hunting and fishing access.

But his conservative beliefs played well in his Palmer-area district, where voters sent him to the Senate in 2002 even after he revoked his belief in limiting how many years someone can be in office -- a key promise by many 1994 electees.

Then came coal bed methane.

Conservatives and liberals throughout the Valley united in their opposition to Colorado-based Evergreen Resources Inc.'s plans to drill for coal bed methane in their backyards without their permission. The state owns the mineral rights to the land beneath those homes and could lease them to the company.

Ogan, hired as a consultant by Evergreen at $40,000 a year, was considered a sellout and came under fire.

Although he maintained he'd been upfront about his work and later quit the job, residents launched a recall. In August 2004, after a Superior Court judge denied a request to keep the recall off the ballot, Ogan resigned.

Ogan, now working for the state Natural Resources Department, in a recent interview said he resigned because of his health and not because of the recall. He suffered a near-fatal heart attack in 2002 and a week after he resigned underwent an angioplasty to unblock two clogged arteries in his heart.

MASEK

Masek, who arrived quietly, winning a four-way 1994 race for a vacant House seat representing Willow, also exited quietly.

She made few headlines in the Legislature, although like Ogan she stood out for her opposition to a rural preference for subsistence despite being an Athabascan from Anvik. In 2001, she compiled the second-worst attendance record in the House. Her opponents harped on that record.

Since her loss in 2004, she has dropped from public view. Attempts to contact her were unsuccessful. Calls left with Kohring's attorney were not returned.

The four used to appear in campaign ads together touting the power they brought to the Valley. Green said she still has enough pull to keep the Valley happy when it comes to state spending.

"Seniority doesn't take long to recoup," she said.

But she and Gatto said the departures of Ogan, Masek and Kohring are a reminder to lawmakers to stay in touch with constituents and steer clear of any suggestion of a conflict of interest.

"If I ever had a thought, it's even less of a thought," Gatto said.

Find S.J. Komarnitsky at adn.com/contact/skomarnitsky or call her in Wasilla at 1-907-352-6714.

FBI - Stevens-1656

BLOG: Discuss Alaska political topics, including corruption, at adn.com/alaskapolitics

Caption: Photo 2: Vic Kohring CMYK_123107.jpg Photo 3: Beverly Masek CMYK_123107.jpg Photo 4: Scott Ogan CMYK_123107.jpg Photo 5: 31 Pat Carney_123107.jpg Photo 6: RepRonLarson_123107.jpg Photo 7: SenJayKerttula_123107.jpg Photo 8: 31 LydaGreen_123107.jpg Graphic 1: Lyda Green CMYK_123107.eps SEANNA O'SULLIVAN / Associated Press archive 2007 Senate President Lyda Green, R-Wasilla, talking with Sen. Gene Therriault on Nov. 16 at the Capitol in Juneau, said not seeing Ogan, Masek and Kohring in the hallways is strange. 1994's victories Beverly Masek ran for an open seat. Lyda Green defeated Jay Kerttula. Scott Ogan defeated Ron Larson. Vic Kohring defeated Pat Carney.

Edition: Final
Section: Main
Page: A1
Dateline: WASILLA
Record Number: 1586207112/31/07
Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

FBI - Stevens-1657

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

January 12, 2008 Saturday
FINAL EDITION

Kott seeks to delay going to prison

BYLINE: The Associated Press

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A3

LENGTH: 121 words

Former Alaska House Speaker Pete Kott has asked federal officials if he can start his prison sentence later than ordered.

Kott was sentenced last month to serve six years in a federal prison for his convictions on conspiracy, bribery and extortion charges.

In court documents filed Thursday, Kott said he wants to delay reporting to the federal prison in Oregon until Feb. 1 so he can support his daughter Pamela, who is scheduled to give birth around Jan. 21.

He's scheduled to report to prison Jan. 17.

Kott also is appealing both his conviction and sentence. It could take up to 18 months for the federal appeals court to hear Kott's case.

READ more about the investigation that led to Kott's conviction at

adn.com/fbi

LOAD-DATE: January 14, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Kott

DOCUMENT-TYPE: WIRE

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

FBI - Stevens-1658

Copyright 2008 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

194A-AN-13620-M; 1682

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

January 13, 2008 Sunday
FINAL EDITION

Time to go to work;
The 25th Alaska Legislature 2008

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A3

LENGTH: 1260 words

The Alaska Legislature convenes Tuesday, and many of the biggest decisions will involve what to do with a budget surplus that's liable to be around $4 billion. Key lawmakers are saying they'll save, and not spend, at least a big portion of it.

If they do, they'll be making history. The Legislature in the early '80s saved hundreds of millions of windfall dollars each year by putting them in the Alaska Permanent Fund. But that was a long time ago and was unusual.

There is always an urge to spend whatever money comes in, and that will be no different this year. Legislators say Alaskans agree it's good to save money -- except when it comes to whatever their own priority is.

"Everybody has someplace they want to spend these billions of dollars," said Anchorage Republican Rep. Mike Hawker.

The decision this fall to retroactively raise state taxes on the oil companies has combined with high crude oil prices to leave the state swimming in cash.

Just how much the surplus will be depends on oil prices. Lawmakers expect the surplus left over from the current fiscal year, which ends in June, could combine with more than $3 billion expected in the coming year to give them a windfall in the $4 billion range.

Juneau economist Gregg Erickson has been watching Alaska Legislatures for 35 years.

Erickson said he's only seen windfalls saved six times in those years. Four of them were in the early 1980s. The other two were recent examples of putting money into an education fund, Erickson said, and that was really just a placeholder for the money to be spent later.

There is a Constitutional Budget Reserve, created after legal settlements with the oil companies. But Erickson said legislators have evaded their legal requirement to put back what they take out of it.

FLUSH WITH MONEY

FBI - Stevens-1659

Top state lawmakers say a huge windfall like this one is a rare event and they want to save at least part of it.

There is also some bipartisan criticism of Gov. Sarah Palin for not including more savings in her spending proposal to the Legislature. Palin's plan includes putting $380 million into the Constitutional Budget Reserve, creating endowments for transportation and alternative energy, swelling the fund for schools, giving more dollars to local governments and paying $450 million toward the multibillion state pension liabilities.

Sitka Republican Sen. Bert Stedman argued there needs to be more savings in the mix.

"I think there's going to be strong support within the Legislature to save these monies," said Stedman, who has a lot of say as co-chair of the Senate Finance Committee.

194A-AN-13620-M,683

Oil production is steadily declining in Alaska, a fact that's being masked by the high price of oil. Once the prices drop, the amount of money coming to the state will plummet. The state gets more than 85 percent of its revenue from oil production. That includes money from production taxes, royalties, property taxes and corporate income taxes.

Stedman wants to give schools more money and consider putting the rest into the Constitutional Budget Reserve. The CBR is the state's main savings account and lawmakers draw on it to balance the budget in years when low oil prices bring deficits.

Stedman said he thinks past legislators have taken care with the state's money. There is roughly $3 billion left in the budget reserve and $38.6 billion in the Alaska Permanent Fund -- most of which legislators are forbidden from touching.

Anchorage Democratic Rep. Mike Doogan doesn't sound ready to place any bets the Legislature is going to save the surplus.

"If the Legislature actually shows some self-restraint in spending it will be the first time in the history of the state of Alaska," he said.

He said the exceptions are those early '80s deposits into the Permanent Fund. Doogan said he has a bill drafted that would basically take the entire current surplus and put it into the Constitutional Budget Reserve.

Doogan said the state needs to make sure that it has money in the future for needs like police protection, health care, you name it.

"The oil fairy has once again tapped us with her magic wand, but when that stops what are you going to do?" Doogan said.

WHAT ARE YOU GOING TO DO?

Putting money into the Constitutional Budget Reserve is touchy because it takes a three-quarters vote to tap into it. That means the legislative majority must negotiate with the minority to get at the money.

House Majority Leader Ralph Samuels said he's got another idea. Samuels said he's interested in creating a new constitutionally protected fund that would house most of the surplus. That new fund would be invested and 4.5 percent of it would be made available to the Legislature each year for spending.

That plan would require a two-thirds vote of the Legislature to put it on the ballot for the public to decide. Samuels, a Republican from Anchorage, conceded it could be a tall order to get that many legislators to vote for the idea.

Anchorage Rep. Hawker said he thinks all the money from the recent oil tax hike should go to paying off the state's teacher pension liability. It could be paid off in just a couple years, he said, and then the Legislature could do the same for the public employee pension debt.

The state public employee and teacher retirement systems have an unfunded liability of $8.5 billion to $10 billion. That's the projected gap between the retirement systems' total assets and the amount in benefits they are required to pay out over the next 25 years.

The retirement system liability is a huge burden on school districts, municipalities and state government.

"When we have the money to fix it we should do it," said Hawker, who is on the House Finance Committee. "It helps the state because it takes off the continuing pressure to increase the amount we have to fund each year."

WHERE TO SPEND?

Hawker is the prime architect of the health and social services budget in the House. He's open to a modest spending increase in that area, saying that this is a year to "reinforce the foundation" of the system but not to create an expansion of it.

Lawmakers are liable to press for spending on state infrastructure projects, like a $10 million expansion of the Port of Anchorage. Sitka Republican Sen. Stedman said ferries need replacement and money should go for road improvements.

"Alaskans want us to put the money in savings but virtually every community has a whole list of (infrastructure) needs," Stedman said.

There seems to be fairly universal agreement that schools will get more money this year.

Anchorage Democratic Sen. Hollis French said he'd like to see half the surplus go into the Constitutional Budget Reserve, with schools his biggest priority in dividing up the rest.

This is the first year lawmakers are under the voter mandate to limit the regular legislative session to 90 days. Most legislators seem to think the surplus will be the big issue of the regular session, with a likely special session to follow on natural gas pipeline issues.

"If last year was about corruption and oil taxes, this year will be about the budget and gas line," French said.

Read more from Sean Cockerham on our Alaska Politics blog at adn.com/alaskapolitics, or call him at 257-4344.

The Alaska Legislature convenes on Tuesday for its 2008 regular session. Today, we have two stories: How to deal with the projected $4 billion budget surplus and the new shorter legislative session, along with resources on how to get information from, and to, lawmakers. Coming Tuesday: A rundown of other issues that lawmakers will be dealing with.

LOAD-DATE: January 14, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: SEANNA O'SULLIVAN / Associated Press archive 2005
As legislators gather this week at the Capitol Building in downtown Juneau, they have a pleasant problem on their hands: how to deal with a huge surplus.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2008 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1661

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

January 13, 2008 Sunday
FINAL EDITION

Young in the race of his life;
STIFF COMPETITION: He'll be campaigning in Alaska every month.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

FBI - Stevens-1662

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 946 words

Don Young is showing early signs of an aggressive campaign, conceding that winning his 19th term as Alaska's lone congressman is not going to be easy this fall.

"I'm going to be in the state every month for the rest of this year," Young told supporters in Anchorage last week. "I will be running as hard as you've ever seen me run."

Young, who is widely reported to be under federal investigation, has drawn more competition for his seat than in well over a decade.

Over the past week he held campaign events in Fairbanks, Wasilla, Kenai and Anchorage. Unlike during his 2006 race, Young's campaign Web site lists campaign events and features a map of Alaska that says, "Coming soon, you'll be able to follow Don's footsteps around the state!"

Republican Party of Alaska chairman Randy Ruedrich said he likes what he's seeing.

"He's on his way and that's important," Ruedrich said. "It's a higher level of real engagement than he's had in a number of years."

THE COMPETITION

Young's challengers have largely been focusing on fundraising this early in the campaign, although they've also been out meeting with groups. Young has a somewhat different timeline, as he will have to juggle his Alaska campaigning with the time he spends in Washington, D.C., until the summer congressional recess.

He faces a Republican primary challenger in Gabrielle LeDoux, a state representative from Kodiak, who will be busy in Juneau as the Legislature begins its 90-day session.

The Democratic contenders for Young's congressional seat are former state House minority leader Ethan Berkowitz, ex-state Democratic Party chief Jake Metcalfe and Diane Benson, who received 40 percent of the vote when she ran against Young in 2006.

"This is not going to be an easy election," Young said at his meet and greet and fundraiser at the Sourdough Mining Company, an Anchorage restaurant.

A theme in Young's campaign is that none of his challengers would be able to do the job better than he has.

"Anybody running for this job, ask them what they can do better than Don Young. In fact, ask them, really, what hasn't he done?" Young said.

His competitors say Young, who first went to Congress in 1973, has been in office long enough and it's time for change. At least two of them, Benson and Metcalfe, have focused on the federal investigation and argue it hurts Alaska's credibility.

194A-AN-13620-M; 6B4

Young, 74, has been under investigation for his ties to Veco Corp., for fundraising activities and for his role in specific congressional earmarks, according to various media reports. He has not been charged with any crime.

Young has spent hundreds of thousands of campaign dollars on lawyers. He has not said what kind of legal work the campaign money is buying.

PROUD OF EARMARKS

Maybe a dozen protesters picketed Young's campaign event on a cold night in Anchorage. Some focused on opposition to the Iraq war, others on earmarks. Members of Congress insert earmarks into national spending bills to direct money to specific projects and programs. The process has been criticized for lack of hearings or debate over the spending.

Democratic challenger Benson, as well as Oklahoma Republican Sen. Tom Coburn, have asked for an investigation into how a $10 million earmark to study a Florida interchange was inserted into a bill that had already won final congressional approval.

A real estate developer who favored the interchange contributed to Young's campaign. But Young said he favored the earmark because local residents asks for it.

There are conflicting stories about who inserted the earmark.

Young, chairman of the House transportation committee at the time, defended earmarks in general during his Alaska visit last week.

"None of those earmarks were ever put into a bill that wasn't asked for, including in Florida, and I want you to understand that," Young said in a Friday speech at a ports conference in Anchorage.

He said communities across Alaska ask him for earmarks to help with needs the state can't, or won't, provide for.

That's his job, Young said.

"I'm proud of every earmark I've ever gotten," he said. "That's really what you ask me to do."

Protesters outside Young's campaign event at the Sourdough Mining Company said they hope to be in his face wherever he goes on the campaign trail. John Fairleigh, an organizer of the protest, said he wants to make it more difficult for Young to campaign.

"I'd like this many or more protesters to greet him every time he goes out into public, so he fears to go out into public," he said.

Fairleigh carried a sign with Young's picture that read: "This little piggy sold earmarks." He said that supporting earmarks is like supporting embezzlement.

Some of the protesters who tried to go into the Young campaign event were kicked out. One woman, Dagmar Mikko, said she was pushed.

ON THE STUMP

Young's Anchorage campaign event was a drinks-and-dinner affair, with political notables like GOP party chair Ruedrich and former Democratic Gov. Bill Sheffield among the crowd.

Young took the microphone and said he and his supporters have to get out and talk to voters.

"And convince people I am still there, my heart is still there, my dedication is still there. Nobody knows this state better than I do," Young said.

A campaign event earlier in the week at Evangelo's Restaurant in Wasilla was more laid back.

Young chatted with small groups. Some people, like Jack Bohnert of Wasilla, just wanted to say hi. Bohnert said Young understands that Alaska is a young state and has needs.

FBI - Stevens-1663

"He's great," Bohnert said. "I've voted for him every time now for 20 years."

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him at 257-4344.

LOAD-DATE: January 14, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Photos by MARC LESTER / Anchorage Daily News
U.S. Rep. Don Young speaks to supporters during an event at the Sourdough Mining Company Restaurant on Thursday.
Young, left, is greeted by former Alaska Gov. Bill Sheffield on Thursday night.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2008 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1664

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

December 30, 2007 Sunday
FINAL EDITION

Letter urges Cowdery to resign;
LEGISLATURE: Senator implicated in Veco scandal is asked by minority to quit. xxxx: XXXXX

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 821 words

The state Senate minority has sent a letter to Anchorage Sen. John Cowdery asking him to resign from public office because he has been implicated in the Veco bribery scandal.

"Now that we are approaching the regular session, and with it seeming the majority does not intend to do anything, we felt it was appropriate to say something," Senate Minority Leader Gene Therriault, a Republican from North Pole, said Saturday.

Therriault said the letter was hand-delivered to Cowdery more than a week ago. He said the only other copies went to state Senate President Lyda Green and Senate Majority Leader Gary Stevens.

Green, a Wasilla Republican, said Cowdery has not been charged with any crime and she feels "it is probably very premature" for lawmakers to call for his resignation.

Green said she spoke briefly to Cowdery about the letter from the Senate minority.

"He was very hurt, as was his wife," Green said.

Green said, at this point at least, she expects Cowdery to serve in the coming legislative session and to continue in the position of Senate rules chairman. The 2008 session begins on Jan. 15.

Cowdery did not return a phone message left at his home seeking comment Saturday. He has not responded to recent requests by the Daily News for an interview.

He has previously denied any wrongdoing. His name has come up in federal corruption trials, though.

Former Veco Corp. vice president Rick Smith testified in the recent trials of two former state legislators that he bribed Cowdery. Smith, who has been convicted and is cooperating with federal prosecutors, did not give details.

Former Veco chief Bill Allen, who has also been convicted of giving bribes and is cooperating with federal prosecutors, has testified Cowdery was a part of his inner circle.

Cowdery is one of six state legislators whose offices the FBI searched in August 2006.

Cowdery stayed away from the recent special session on oil taxes, saying he did not want to be a distraction. The Republican represents a district that includes a stretch of the Lower Hillside and South Anchorage.

FBI - Stevens-1665

Therriault said the Senate majority should not ignore the sworn trial testimony about Cowdery.

194A-AN-13620-M-685

"They can't just adopt a bunker mentality and think the Alaska public is going to let it blow over. Because I don't think they are," he said.

Therriault on Saturday confirmed the existence of the letter asking Cowdery to resign but declined to release a copy of it after consulting with members of his caucus.

"It was not our intent, individually signing the letter, that it be used to generate a headline," Therriault said.

Therriault said all five members of the Senate minority caucus signed the letter. All are Republicans.

The bipartisan Senate majority caucus is composed of six Republicans and nine Democrats. Juneau Democratic Sen. Kim Elton, when contacted by a reporter on Saturday, said it was the first he'd heard of such a letter asking for Cowdery to resign.

Elton said he thinks whether Cowdery should resign is more of an issue between Cowdery and his constituents. He said it is not time for the majority to act.

But Elton said that, if nothing changes before the Legislature convenes next month, the majority would need to talk about what to do.

"I think a discussion needs to happen because of the testimony during the trials, and I think it will happen," Elton said.

Whatever Cowdery did or didn't do, Elton said, perceptions could get in the way of Senate business.

"People need to talk about those perceptions," he said.

That would include a discussion about whether Cowdery remains as rules chairman, he said. It's one of the most powerful jobs in the Senate, basically the gatekeeper of what legislation reaches the floor for a vote. Republican Gov. Sarah Palin and the Senate minority have both said the majority should review whether Cowdery stays as the rules chairman.

Senate President Green said she thinks the bigger issue at the moment is Cowdery's health. Cowdery, 77, has been repeatedly hospitalized in recent months, including with pneumonia and an infection in his leg. He has used a walker at times.

"I continue to be concerned about his health. ... I know he's had continuing visits with the doctor. I don't know what the status of those are. But, you know, he had some pretty serious illnesses just two or three months ago. Some of those you don't just snap back from in a flash. That's my concern," Green said.

Green said that Cowdery is looking better lately and has lost some weight.

If Cowdery did resign from the Senate, the governor would select a replacement to fill out the one year remaining in his term. Cowdery has not registered with the division of elections to run for re-election next fall but has until June to do so.

He has filed his intent with the Alaska Public Offices Commission to raise campaign money for a 2008 run.

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him at 257-4344.

LOAD-DATE: December 31, 2007

FBI - Stevens-1666

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Therriault
Cowdery

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

January 9, 2008 Wednesday
FINAL EDITION

Suspicion surrounds Cowdery;
INVESTIGATION: State senator faces no charges, but he's been linked to Veco corruption scandal.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1929 words

The FBI searched his office and a federal informant named him from the witness stand as someone he bribed.

Long-time state Sen. John Cowdery, who just announced that he won't run again, hasn't been charged with anything, but his name keeps popping up in the ongoing federal investigation into corruption in Alaska.

The FBI search, the courtroom accusations, his position of power in the Senate -- they all fuel public conjecture. So does his long, personal relationship with former Veco chief executive Bill Allen, already convicted of bribery.

And for years, there has been speculation about a yacht owned by Cowdery that sank in its slip in the Whittier harbor. It ended up in a Veco yard near the Port of Anchorage.

Does the vessel fit into the ongoing investigation?

The feds say nothing.

But some information is available, starting with the fact that Allen and Cowdery go way back.

Both are self-made contractors with little formal schooling. The two men were so close that Cowdery could pop over to Allen's downtown Anchorage home whenever he wanted, Allen testified in a recent corruption trial. "I'm at the front door," the senator would announce.

So when Cowdery's yacht, the Johnita II, sank nearly seven years ago, he relied on Veco and his friend Allen to help him deal with the resulting mess, according to three individuals involved with the boat's salvage.

Veco, an oil field services contractor now at the center of the corruption cases, paid to have the damaged boat towed to Anchorage because Allen was going to buy and repair it, Cowdery said in an interview recently. But Allen later backed out, the senator said.

"There's nothing there," Cowdery said.

In any event, Cowdery said, too much time has passed to bring charges. "Of course, the statute of limitations is gone on that," he said.

FBI - Stevens-1667

(Bribery has a five-year statute of limitations, and the boat sank in 2001.)

In May, Allen pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy, revealing his role as an informant in the FBI investigation of influence peddling. Already two state lawmakers have been convicted of accepting bribes in exchange for helping push a Veco-supported oil tax. As Allen told jurors, the bribes took various forms: cash payoffs, promises of a job, and money that he funneled to a former House speaker through an inflated business invoice.

194A-AN-13620-M; 686

Cowdery is one of six state legislators whose offices were searched in August 2006 by the FBI as the investigation burst into public view. Former Veco vice president Rick Smith, also convicted and cooperating, testified in recent corruption trials that he bribed Cowdery, but didn't give details. Allen said from the stand that Cowdery was part of his inner circle.

Cowdery has a folksy Midwestern manner and, at 77, a shock of white hair. He's been ailing physically, uses a walker at times. He said he won't run in 2008 because of his health and age.

He says he's done nothing wrong and doesn't expect to be indicted. He didn't respond to written questions and for months wouldn't be interviewed.

Back in 2006, when he was again named chairman of the powerful Senate Rules Committee, Cowdery puzzled over the things FBI agents had seized from his office: copies of his legislative paycheck, a video of legislative skits and a manual of conduct for legislative pages. "What does that got to do with the price of tea?" Cowdery said at the time.

They also took a single business card out of maybe 10,000 he has collected, he said. It belonged to Veco's Rick Smith.

UNDERWATER

Cowdery's time in Alaska stretches back to 1950. He and his wife, Juanita, live in a house on Lake Otis Parkway. Cowdery used to run an excavation business and was a city public works executive under Mayor Tom Fink.

A Republican whose district includes a stretch of South Anchorage and the Lower Hillside, Cowdery has been elected three times to the House and three times to the Senate.

He's had boats for years and has tempted fate more than once.

The Johnita II, like the first Johnita, was named after the combined first names of John and Juanita.

Just after the legislative session in 2000, Cowdery skippered his newly bought 50-foot Chris Craft from Southern California to Whittier. According to an account Cowdery posted on his family Web site, he and the crew of the Johnita II barely made it.

Caught in a sudden storm off Vancouver Island, they lost steering, put on survival suits, called the U.S. Coast Guard for a rescue, and were towed to a bay, Cowdery's account says.

Months later, the Whittier harbor master noticed the Johnita II was in trouble.

It was around 6:15 on the morning of Feb. 26, 2001. Dark. Snow on the ground. Icy around the dock. Then-harbor master Charlene Arneson poured herself a cup of coffee, lifted the drapes and saw Cowdery's big boat listing.

She alerted others, then took off to grab a pump from the harbor shop.

"By the time I got the pump to the top of the ramp ... it was already down," Arneson, who is now retired, said in a recent interview.

By 6:50 a.m., the Johnita II was underwater, according to the harbor's incident report.

FBI - Stevens-1668

The harbor crew and a local marine services business worked all day and into the night to raise it, said Mike Davidson, who at the time was operations manager and later served as harbor master.

There was no government investigation into why the boat sank, but Davidson said it appears a screw holding a clamp around a critical hose simply rusted through.

Chris Pallister, an Anchorage attorney who eventually restored the boat, said he found numerous defects with its design and believes water was able to leak in a number of ways, including through a deck drainage hose that came loose and allowed heavy wet snow and rain to pour in. Water seeped in slowly, over days, he believes.

At any rate, the Johnita II was a wreck. Crews tried to lift it out of the water for repairs, but it was too heavy for the equipment on hand, Davidson said. Both Davidson and Larry Gilman, owner of Custom Marine Services, said Cowdery paid for the boat to be raised.

Then Veco stepped in, according to Dave Martinsen, a Wasilla resident whose family had boats in Whittier and who now works as a long-distance truck driver.

Cowdery was by then a senator and chairman of the Transportation Committee. He called Martinsen to tow the boat by water all the way around the Kenai Peninsula to the Veco yard near Ship Creek in Anchorage, Martinsen said.

When he pulled into the Anchorage dock with the Johnita II in tow, Cowdery and his wife met him. He thought Cowdery was going to pay him.

Instead, Martinsen said, Cowdery told him to go to an address near the airport -- years later, he doesn't remember whose home it was, or exactly where. But whoever was there gave him a Veco check, he said.

"I took it (the boat) to Veco's yard and actually Veco was the one that paid me," Martinsen said.

As he remembers the job, Veco paid him between $4,000 and $5,000 to tow the Johnita II.

"I remember damn sure who paid me and I was shocked by the matter," Martinsen said.

REPAIRS FOR A SHARE

Sometime after that, Cowdery told Anchorage furniture maker Ernie Hall that Bill Allen had become a partner in the boat, according to Hall.

Cowdery had approached Hall the year before about building a custom teak table for the yacht. When the boat sank, Cowdery told Hall to forget it. Later he dropped by Hall's Midtown plant, Alaska Furniture Manufacturing, and said to go ahead.

"I said, 'Oh, did you get a new boat?' " Hall recalled. "He said, 'No, we've got that one refloated and Bill Allen's redoing it and he's a 49 percent partner in the boat with me, or he took 49 percent and he's going to restore the boat.' "

So they went to the docks to check it out.

"It was a typical thing with John. John always comes flying up in his Cadillac, jumps out, runs in and says 'Here, I need you to go with me for a minute.' Then you run and take a look at a deal," said Hall, who in 2002 was a Democratic candidate for lieutenant governor.

Allen had a mechanic inspect the boat and decided he didn't want it after all, Cowdery said in the recent interview.

For his labor and some money, Pallister said he became a partner in the boat, which he used over the summer last year. He runs a nonprofit beach cleanup group. Cowdery said Pallister made payments to him and eventually bought the boat outright.

Last year, Pallister sought state and federal grants for state park cleanup work to be done through his nonprofit, Gulf of Alaska Keeper.

Two Juneau lobbyists worked for Pallister to get the state money.

"I told them right out of the get-go, 'Listen, John Cowdery and I are partners in a boat. Keep him the hell out of this. I don't want any linkage with John Cowdery or Veco or anything else,' " Pallister said.

Yet Cowdery approached the Senate Finance Committee seeking $150,000 in state money for the project, said Fred Fisher, at the time a Senate budget aide. The full Legislature approved it, but Palin vetoed the appropriation.

FBI - Stevens-1669

'THE SAME MAKEUP'

Over the years, Cowdery socialized with Allen and was perhaps the state Legislature's biggest beneficiary of campaign money from Veco executives.

Allen told jurors that other than his drinking buddy, former House Speaker Pete Kott, Cowdery was the legislator he was closest to.

"John Cowdery was -- he didn't drink a lot, but him and I seen each other a lot. He had the same makeup, I guess, of me," Allen testified in the Kott trial.

Cowdery collected more than $35,000 in campaign contributions from Veco executives and employees between 1998 and 2004, according to candidate reports compiled by the Daily News and other sources. From the top Veco givers, he got more than any other candidate, according to a 2006 opinion column that ran in Alaska newspapers by Veco critic Lori Backes, a supporter of an all-Alaska gas pipeline project. He came in just ahead of the now-convicted Kott.

Smith testified in the recent trials that Cowdery was one of the main legislators Veco relied on to push a new oil tax as a step toward getting a natural gas pipeline, which could have been enormously lucrative to Veco.

According to court documents, Cowdery, Allen and an unnamed "elected official" in need of money met at a restaurant where Allen offered to raise $25,000 if the official would vote the same way as Cowdery and then-Senate President Ben Stevens.

But nothing came of it and when a tax rate higher than Veco wanted passed in an August 2006 special session, Cowdery missed the vote:

Allen and Smith stepped down from their jobs after pleading guilty to bribery and conspiracy in May. Veco's been sold. But Cowdery is still in the state Senate and until Jan. 2, he was a candidate for re-election this year.

BACK AT SEA

This summer, Cowdery survived another boating calamity and it was worse than the other ones.

On Aug. 1, he and three others took his smaller boat, the Johnita, out of Whittier harbor for a day of fishing. Then the cabin started to fill with smoke, said Ron Wise, a musician friend of Cowdery's on board that day. Two men on a nearby boat rescued the Cowdery foursome.

A funnel of dark smoke poured into the sky. It was all that remained as the boat sank into the depths of Prince William Sound.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390. Reporter Sean Cockerham contributed to this story.

CORRUPTION: For complete coverage of the FBI investigations into Alaska politicians, including secretly recorded audio and video surveillance, a big-picture overview and list of key figures involved, visit

adn.com/fbi

LOAD-DATE: January 9, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Cowdery
Photo courtesy of Whittier Small Boat Harbor
State Sen. John Cowdery's boat, the Johnita II, sank at the dock in Whittier on Feb. 26, 2001. It was raised and towed to a Veco yard at the Port of Anchorage by Dave Martinsen. Martinsen said he was paid between $4,000 and $5,000 for the work with a Veco check.
RICHARD MAUER / Daily News archive 2006
Cowdery, using a walker, returns to his legislative office in Anchorage after being questioned by federal agents on Aug. 31, 2006.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

FBI - Stevens-1670

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2008 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

December 21, 2007 Friday
FINAL EDITION

Committee rules Harris ran afoul of ethics law; DOING PARTY BUSINESS: Panel dismisses complaint against Kott.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 602 words

There's probable cause that House Speaker John Harris broke state ethics law with a news release calling on Ben Stevens to resign from the Republican National Committee.

That's the word from the Select Committee on Legislative Ethics. It dismissed a complaint against convicted former state House Speaker Pete Kott but upheld one against Harris. The committee basically said Harris was doing Republican Party business out of his legislative office.

"Representative Harris used state resources (staff, equipment and legislative letterhead), to prepare and issue a press release focused solely on partisan political activity," said the report, released Wednesday.

Stevens, the former president of the state Senate, is under federal investigation. Gov. Sarah Palin has also called on Stevens to resign. But someone made a confidential ethics complaint against Harris after he issued a press release on it.

Harris put in policies for his legislative office after the complaint to make sure it doesn't happen again, the report said. In light of that, the committee said no punishment is needed.

Harris, a Republican from Valdez, was in Mexico on vacation Thursday and couldn't be reached for comment.

Harris issued the news release on Sept. 19. It was headlined "Speaker Calls on Ben Stevens to Resign National Committeeman Position."

Stevens, son of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, holds the position of national committeeman for the Alaska Republican Party.

That gives him a seat on the Republican National Committee. The Republican National Committee is composed of one man and one woman from each of the 50 states. The committee decides the party position and puts together the party platform, among other things.

Two executives of the oil field services company Veco have testified that they bribed Stevens. But Stevens has not been charged and has denied engaging in any illegal activity.

Harris' news release said Stevens had lost the confidence of Alaskans and the support of the state's top elected leadership. It said Stevens had not attended to the duties of the Republican National Committee for more than two years. His term ends in March.

The ethics committee also dismissed a complaint filed in May against former House Speaker Pete Kott. He was sentenced this month to six years in prison on federal corruption charges.

FBI - Stevens-1671

The committee decided not to investigate the most serious allegation in the complaint.

The ethics report described the allegation only as "that former representative Kott used his status as a legislator to obtain personal gain for Debora J. Stovern in a court hearing."

194A-AN-13620-M1,687

Stovern is Kott's girlfriend. She said in a Wednesday interview Kott was accused of helping her in a child support case.

"The allegation was that he somehow influenced the judge to set a child support amount, which of course is ridiculous," she said.

Ethics committee administrator Joyce Anderson said the reasons the panel decided not to investigate are confidential. But, under the law, there could be a couple.

The committee members might have decided the complaint lacked enough information to warrant an investigation. Or they might have decided it was somehow outside their jurisdiction, although it generally covers misuse of legislative office.

The committee dismissed an allegation Kott failed to disclose that Stovern was his "domestic partner" when he was a legislator and she worked for the legislative affairs agency.

It also threw out a claim Kott improperly used state resources by faxing eight documents in 2003.

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him at 257-4344.

LOAD-DATE: December 21, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1672

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

December 20, 2007 Thursday
FINAL EDITION

Kott files appeal of 6-year sentence, federal convictions; CORRUPTION: He wants to remain out of prison during process.

BYLINE: By STEVE QUINN The Associated Press

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B2

LENGTH: 324 words

DATELINE: JUNEAU -

Former Alaska House Speaker Pete Kott has appealed both his conviction and his six-year sentence on federal corruption charges.

Kott also has asked the court to let him remain free until his appeal is heard by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, his attorney, James Wendt, said Wednesday.

Kott was found guilty of conspiracy, bribery and extortion in September and was sentenced earlier this month. He hasn't been assigned a federal prison or a date to turn himself in, Wendt said.

It could take up to 18 months for the federal appeals court to hear Kott's case. Until then, Wendt said, he would like for Kott to be able to stay out of prison.

"If he goes to jail and wins an appeal, he will have done all that time in jail potentially for nothing," said Wendt, who has recommended Kott hire an attorney specializing in appeals to further handle the case.

Calls to the Justice Department seeking comment were not immediately returned.

Kott is one of three former lawmakers found guilty this year of bribery.

In two of those cases, both lawmakers -- including Kott -- were bribed by executives of the oil field services company Veco Corp. who tried to influence passage of an oil tax favorable to the oil industry. The tax was passed, but lawmakers returned to Juneau last month and revised the rate.

At Kott's sentencing earlier this month, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick assigned a prison term beyond sentencing guidelines after concluding that Kott had committed perjury during his trial.

Sedwick also said the legislation Kott took bribes to influence -- a revised tax law on Alaska's principal industry, crude oil extraction -- affected every Alaskan.

Kott was fined $10,000 along with the prison sentence. He could have received 35 years on the three charges.

Kott represented Eagle River for 14 years, including two as House speaker.

FBI - Stevens-1673

He lost his bid for re-election during a 2006 primary to current House Rep. Anna Fairclough.

LOAD-DATE: December 20, 2007

194A-AN-13620-M;688

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Kott

DOCUMENT-TYPE: WIRE

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1674

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

January 1, 2008 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

Wondrous and weird: 2007 all that for Alaska; LIVELY YEAR: Maggie, Mackey and malfeasance all played a part.

BYLINE: By STEVE QUINN The Associated Press

FBI - Stevens-1675

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 857 words

From the federal courtroom to the Capitol to the North Slope, Alaska forged its way into national and even global headlines.

Sometimes the news was sobering, like recent NASA reports on how the Arctic Ocean could be nearly ice-free during summer within decades.

At times, it was bizarre, like the story of a female astronaut driving from Texas to Florida on a trip that prosecutors said was to attack a rival for the affection of Alaskan Bill Oefelein, another astronaut.

Other times it was an inspiring tale, thanks to cancer survivor Lance Mackey winning the Yukon Quest and Iditarod in the same year.

Alaskans welcomed a popular new governor to her first legislative session and had the state's profile raised in animation through "The Simpsons Movie."

Still, corruption and Gov. Sarah Palin's emergence on the national scene -- one that included a photo shoot with Vogue -- led the news for most of 2007.

At times, their paths crossed, as when Palin called a special legislative session to raise an oil tax that was at the heart of the federal probe.

Federal investigators had their day in all three major cities, starting with Fairbanks in January. That month, former Fairbanks Mayor Jim Hayes and his wife, Chris, were indicted on charges of using federal funds to pay personal bills.

For the next four months, Alaskans awaited the results of 2006 FBI raids on several lawmakers' offices. By May 4, they had a few answers.

Republican state Rep. Vic Kohring of Wasilla and former Reps. Pete Kott and Bruce Weyhrauch were arrested on charges they accepted bribes to support legislation for oil services company Veco Corp.

A few days later, two of the company's top officers, Bill Allen and Rick Smith, pleaded guilty to bribing them and other lawmakers with cash or the promise of jobs for their backing on bills supported by Veco.

Allen and Smith served as government witnesses, leading to the conviction of Kott and Kohring. Kott received a six-year prison sentence; Kohring awaits sentencing. Weyhrauch's trial has been delayed.

In a separate federal case, former Rep. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage, was found guilty of conspiracy and bribery for taking money he thought was coming from a private prison firm. The money was supplied by the FBI through an informant. Anderson began serving his five-year prison term this month.

By summertime, the investigation reached Capitol Hill, where Sen. Ted Stevens and U.S. Rep. Don Young became part of a wide-ranging probe that includes their connection with Allen and Smith.

194A-AN-136220-M;6689

In July, federal agents searched Stevens' Girdwood home, focusing on records related to his relationship with Allen. Stevens has been under a federal investigation for a 2000 renovation that more than doubled the size of his home, a project overseen by Allen. Stevens has repeatedly said he paid all bills he was given.

Other top Alaska stories for 2007 include:

CLIMATE

Arctic melt reached numerous records in 2007, including a few that touched the state. Dwindling sea ice affected wildlife as 6,000 walruses hauled out on shore instead of sea ice in northwest Alaska in October. Alaska's permafrost also warmed.

STRIPPER MURDER

A stripper-turned-soccer mom was convicted of first-degree murder. Mechele Linehan was convicted of conspiring with a man who hoped to marry her, John T. Carlin III, to kill her fiance, Kent Leppink, who was shot three times in 1996 on an isolated trail near Hope.

SUPREME COURT

The court provided the final word on one case and agreed to hear another.

In June, the Supreme Court tightened limits on student speech that advocates drug use when it ruled against former Juneau-Douglas High School student Joseph Frederick and his 14-foot-long "Bong Hits 4 Jesus" banner.

In October, the Supreme Court agreed to consider whether Exxon Mobil, having already paid more than $3.5 billion in cleanup costs and other penalties, should face punitive damages.

BRIDGE GOES NOWHERE

The state pulled the plug on a proposed bridge from Ketchikan to its airport on Gravina Island. It was a multimillion-dollar project, backed by a federal earmark, that quickly became a symbol of pork barrel spending. It also cast Alaska as a freeloading state.

BP SETTLEMENT

More than one year after a partial production shutdown to Prudhoe Bay, field operator BP America agreed to pay $20 million and plead guilty to a misdemeanor violation of the federal Clean Water Act for a crude spill on the North Slope.

MOVIES AND LITERATURE

Alaska found itself prominent in two general-release films this year -- "The Simpsons Movie" and "Into the Wild"-- and one best-selling novel, "The Yiddish Policemen's Union."

MAGGIE THE ELEPHANT

The Air Force helped move Maggie, the state's only elephant, on a one-way trip to San Andreas, Calif. The trip ended a months-long dispute between those wanting Maggie to stay at the Alaska Zoo and those advocating for a warmer climate.

FBI - Stevens-1676

Pleas to have her moved grew louder this year when Maggie twice couldn't stand up on her own.

MUSHING

Cancer survivor Lance Mackey made mushing history with victories in the grueling Yukon Quest International Sled Dog Race and then the Iditarod.

LOAD-DATE: January 2, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: WIRE

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2008 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1677

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

January 4, 2008 Friday
FINAL EDITION

Cowdery won't seek re-election;
HEALTH: Kidney infection may keep him from legislative session.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 900 words

Embattled state Sen. John Cowdery of Anchorage has dropped his bid for re-election and may not attend the legislative session that starts in Juneau this month.

But Cowdery said Thursday he won't resign from the Legislature, despite health problems and having his name linked in court testimony to the Veco bribery scandal.

"I don't plan on resigning. I don't have to go to Juneau. I can do most of my work here if I have to," said Cowdery, sitting in his legislative office in downtown Anchorage.

Cowdery said it is up to his doctor whether he goes to Juneau when the 2008 legislative session begins Jan. 15.

The 77-year-old Republican said resigning would be seen as an indication that he has done something wrong. Cowdery has not been charged and said he has done nothing wrong.

The all-Republican Senate minority sent Cowdery a letter last month asking him to resign as a result of being implicated in the scandal. Three former legislators have been convicted so far in the broad, ongoing federal corruption probe.

Cowdery is one of the most powerful members of the bipartisan Senate majority caucus. He chairs the Rules Committee, basically the gatekeeper for what legislation reaches the floor for a vote.

Former Veco Corp. vice president Rick Smith testified under oath in the recent corruption trials of two former state legislators that he bribed Cowdery. Smith, who has been convicted and is cooperating with federal prosecutors, did not give details.

Cowdery said Thursday that Smith lied.

"If, when this is all over, he said that under oath, I am going to sue the hell out of him," Cowdery said.

FBI - Stevens-1678

Smith's lawyer, John Murtagh, declined comment.

Cowdery said he would check with his doctor in the middle of next week on whether he should go down to Juneau for the session.

He said he could still represent his constituents even if he's not in Juneau. Cowdery represents a district that includes a stretch of the Lower Hillside and South Anchorage.

Cowdery pointed out that other senators have missed big portions of a legislative session, either for their own health reasons or that of a spouse. Those lawmakers at times participated in legislative committee meetings by teleconference.

The Uniform Rules of the Alaska Legislature say legislators cannot miss floor sessions, where bills are passed, unless they are either excused or "ill and unable to attend."

194A-AN-13620-M;690

Cowdery said he would not claim the per diem payment lawmakers get during the session if he does not go to Juneau.

Anchorage Republican Rep. Kevin Meyer, who represents some of the same constituents in the state House as Cowdery does in the Senate, said he hopes Cowdery could at least make it to Juneau for key portions of the coming legislative session.

Lawmakers must be present in Juneau to vote on bills on the Senate floor.

"If you can't cast a vote, I'm not sure how well you are representing the district," Meyer said.

Meyer is running for Cowdery's Senate seat in the fall election. He was planning to do so whether Cowdery ran or not.

Cowdery faxed a letter Wednesday to the Alaska Public Offices Commission, saying he wasn't going to run again.

"Due to my age and health I wish to withdraw my letter of intent to run for re-election," Cowdery said in the handwritten letter.

Cowdery said in an interview that he is having kidney problems.

"They don't function right and they are infected. We are trying to break the infection. Sometimes we think we've got it and sometimes we don't," Cowdery said.

He said his doctor thinks the stress and uproar surrounding the federal investigation is making it worse.

Cowdery said he is confident he will not be indicted.

"I haven't done anything. I don't know anything," Cowdery said.

Cowdery's name has come up in the testimony of both Smith and former Veco chief executive Bill Allen, who also has pleaded guilty to bribery and is working with federal prosecutors. Allen testified Cowdery was part of his inner circle, one of his closest friends.

Cowdery is one of six state legislators whose offices the FBI searched in August 2006. He stayed away from the recent special session on oil taxes, saying he didn't want to be a distraction.

Cowdery said he worked his entire life to build his reputation and called the controversy swirling around him "bulls---." Cowdery said he believes the FBI is after bigger targets.

He said he thinks he has enough support in the bipartisan Senate majority to continue as the Rules chairman if he comes to Juneau for the legislative session. If he's not there when the session convenes Jan. 15, though, that could change.

Cowdery has been in the state Legislature since 1997. Meyer is the only candidate so far to file with the state division of elections to run for Cowdery's Senate seat in the fall.

Democrat Lynda Zaugg, who lost to Cowdery in 2004, has filed her intent with the state Public Offices Commission to raise campaign money for a 2008 run in either the state House or Senate.

Zaugg was out of town Thursday and couldn't be reached, but state Democratic Party officials said they expect her to run for Meyer's House seat instead of Cowdery's Senate seat.

Potential candidates have until June to file with the elections division.

"I am optimistic we will have a viable Democrat run for the seat," said Kay Brown, the party's spokeswoman.

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him at 257-4344.

FBI - Stevens-1679

LOAD-DATE: January 4, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Cowdery

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2008 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1680

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

December 31, 2007 Monday
FINAL EDITION

Meyer says he'll offer legislation on ethics;
ISSUES: His bills will address conflicts, fundraising in session.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 840 words

The Alaska Legislature, reeling from corruption convictions of three of its former members, isn't done arguing ethics.

Anchorage Republican Rep. Kevin Meyer said he plans to put in a bill meant to generate discussion about whether legislators should get to vote on something in which they have a potential conflict of interest. Currently, conflicts don't stop voting.

Meyer is also crafting a bill to forbid state legislators who are running for federal office from raising campaign money when the Legislature is in session. That takes a poke at Kodiak Rep. Gabrielle LeDoux's fundraising for her congressional race during this fall's special session on oil taxes.

Gov. Sarah Palin plans to get into the ethics mix as well with some bills of her own. Palin's legislative director, Russ Kelly, said the specifics are still being worked out.

Some Alaska legislators are weary of being reminded about the corruption that was in their midst. But it doesn't look as though it's going away as an issue anytime soon.

Kodiak Republican LeDoux, who is running for Don Young's seat in the U.S. House of Representatives, has been banging the drum loudly in recent weeks. LeDoux has been writing op-ed newspaper columns complaining that legislators routinely vote on bills in which they have a conflict of interest.

Alaska has a part-time citizen Legislature. Some legislators are essentially professional politicians, but others have ties to fishing, labor unions, oil, tourism and other interests that constantly have bills before the Legislature. Alaska legislators are required to publicly disclose their financial ties.

It's tradition in the Legislature to require all lawmakers who declare a conflict of interest to vote anyway. Basically, a legislator with a potential conflict is supposed to ask his colleagues to excuse him from voting. But all it takes is one other legislator to say, "I object," and he has to vote. There's always at least one objection.

LeDoux raised the issue in Juneau last month during the special session on raising oil taxes. She argued without success that legislators with ties to the oil industry should not vote.

Anchorage Rep. Meyer is one of the legislators LeDoux was talking about. He works in purchasing for Conoco Phillips, the state's biggest oil producer, when he is not in Juneau as a legislator.

Meyer is one of the most influential members of the state House and is running for the state Senate in next fall's elections. There have already been letters to the editor charging that he is conflicted by the fact that he works for an oil company.

FBI - Stevens-1681

Meyer consistently discloses his employer when oil bills come up in committee and on the floor.

"I'm pretty sensitive to it," he said.

194A-AN-136620-M; 6911

Meyer said his bill would set up a process similar to what happened when he was on the Anchorage Assembly, although he had problems with that process too.

Basically, he said, the Assembly members would take a vote on whether one of their colleagues had a conflict and should be barred from voting on a proposal.

But Meyer said that didn't really work too well. The votes on whether an Assembly member was conflicted often came down to whoever might be a political ally on the issue at hand, he said. So the process became too political, he said.

Meyer actually thinks the Legislature's current system is better than that. He said everyone in his district knows where he works and he's uncomfortable with them not having a representative when an issue comes up that is related to the oil industry.

But he said he is open to changing the system and hopes putting in a bill will generate debate.

"The discussion will be healthy. Through the discussion maybe we can come up with a hybrid version that works even better," Meyer said.

LeDoux said she'd like to see a clear rule that forbids legislators with financial interests in a bill from voting. She conceded it could be hard to sort out just who had financial ties to any given bill, but said the matter could go to the legislative ethics committee to be sorted out.

One ethics measure already in Alaska law forbids legislators from raising campaign money for state offices when the Legislature is in session.

The idea is to avoid any appearance of quid pro quo. Meyer said he wants to expand the law to also forbid legislators from raising money for federal office during session.

"It doesn't look good, whether you are looking for state office or federal office," he said.

LeDoux said she made some phone calls during the recent special session on oil taxes and raised just a little money for her congressional campaign. She pointed out that it's legal but said she's open to the possibility of outlawing it.

"We could certainly talk about that," LeDoux said.

LeDoux said she's also pushing a bill that mirrors the Alaskans for Clean Elections initiative. It would allow state candidates who agree to forgo private fundraising to be eligible for public financing of their campaigns.

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him at 257-4344.

LOAD-DATE: December 31, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Meyer

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

FBI - Stevens-1682

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

January 15, 2008 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

District GOP leaders call for Cowdery to resign; AILING: The president of the Senate says others have been given leeway for illness.

BYLINE: By ANNE SUTTON The Associated Press

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 680 words

DATELINE: JUNEAU -

The latest calls for Republican Sen. John Cowdery to step down are coming from his own party and district, though Senate leaders say the ailing lawmaker should be back in his Juneau office this week.

Just before lawmakers were to convene in legislative session in Juneau, Republican party leaders from Cowdery's Anchorage district called on the veteran lawmaker to resign, saying he could not effectively represent his district from afar.

The 77-year-old senator, who has been dogged by a federal corruption probe, said last week he would not attend this year's session because of poor health, but he would participate by telephone.

In a resolution dated Sunday, district committee leaders said that would not do.

"His telephonic participation would effectively disenfranchise the voters of this district on most issues of importance to the district and the state," committee leaders wrote.

Lawmakers may participate in committee meetings by telephone but must be present to vote on the floor of the Senate or House.

Cowdery was not available for comment. Senate majority spokesman Jeff Turner said Cowdery remains hospitalized in Anchorage.

But Senate President Lyda Green, R-Wasilla, said she expects Cowdery will report to Juneau by the week's end. Green has steadfastly defended keeping Cowdery as rules chairman, a position that serves as gatekeeper for legislation headed for a floor vote.

Green said people need to be mindful of Cowdery's health when questioning whether he should still be in office.

"He's been a faithful member of the Legislature," said Green. "It's always hard when there are investigations. It's a bad signal to send, if because someone has a legitimate absence, they are called upon to resign."

Green said lawmakers in the past have been granted extended absences because of illness, either their own or that of a family member.

State party chairman Randy Ruedrich, who serves as spokesman for the district committees, did not return phone calls.

District 30 chairman Kenneth Kirk said at least a dozen committee leaders were involved in the drafting and approval of the resolution, which addresses only the question of Cowdery's presence in Juneau and not the federal investigation.

"If we were going to do something based on the corruption allegations, I think we would owe it to him to give him the opportunity to be heard on that issue," said Kirk.

"If he goes down there (to Juneau), then obviously that resolves the problem from our point of view."

Cowdery is one of six state legislators whose offices were searched by the FBI in August 2006. He has not been charged and has denied any wrongdoing.

Despite the federal probe, Cowdery was named Rules Committee chairman last year by the Senate majority, which is made up of six Republicans and nine Democrats.

However, during the trial of former House Speaker Pete Kott in September, a former Veco vice president, Rick Smith, testified that Cowdery was among five lawmakers he bribed to influence oil tax legislation.

That prompted Gov. Sarah Palin and other lawmakers to question whether Cowdery was qualified to continue as the Senate's Rules Committee chairman.

A few days later, Cowdery said he would not participate in the fall special session to review oil taxes.

On Monday, as other capital offices bustled with lawmakers and their aides preparing for the start of the session Tuesday, a lone aide in Cowdery's office said he did not know if other staffers would be joining him.

Cowdery has been repeatedly hospitalized in recent months, including with pneumonia and an infection in his leg.

A retired contractor, Cowdery is in his third term in the Senate. He also served three terms in the House.

INSIDE

STATE OF THE STATE: The Legislature convenes today, and there's already a fight between Gov. Sarah Palin and the Senate majority -- over when she should deliver the State of the State speech tonight. Page A-3

READ THE RESOLUTION: Read the resolution calling for Cowdery's resignation, and keep up with all the latest politics news, on our Alaska politics blog.

adn.com/politics

LOAD-DATE: January 15, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Cowdery
CHRIS MILLER / The Associated Press
Sen. John Cowdery's Capitol office in Juneau sits unoccupied Monday because of his recent hospitalization. Shortly before lawmakers were to begin the 2008 legislative session, district chairmen from Cowdery's own Anchorage Republican district said he should resign.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: WIRE

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

FBI - Stevens-1684

Copyright 2008 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

POLITICAL ANIMAL

By Kevin Drum

June 15, 2005

The New Vision
The speech I want the Democratic nominee to give.
By Theodore C. Sorensen

The Green Leap Forward
Environmentalism is China's fastest-growing citizen movement. Beijing isn't cracking down on these new activists—it's empowering them.
By Christina Larson

Over Stated
Why the "laboratories of democracy" can't achieve universal health care.
By Ezra Klein

Email address

submit

Powered by: MessageBot

NEWS & OPINION FROM OUR CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

David Segal: The Puzzling, Tragic End of a Golden Couple 08/01/2007

GOLD RUSH.... The LA Times reports on the investing prowess of Senator Ted Stevens (R-Gold Country):

> In 1997, Stevens invested $50,000 with developer Jonathan B. Rubini. Last year, at Stevens' request, Rubini and his partner bought back the senator's interests in their deals for $872,000, according to Senate financial disclosure forms made public Tuesday.

Now, I know what you're thinking: the feds spent $70 million investigating Bill and Hillary Clinton over an investment they lost money on. So the Justice Department will surely be all over this.

After all, they have plenty to work with. The Anchorage Daily News summarized a 2003 LA Times investigation thusly:

> While Rubini was multiplying Stevens' wealth, Stevens was helping Rubini secure a $450 million Defense Department contract to build and own housing on Elmendorf Air Force Base.

But the Times story provided new details about the Stevens family finances:

- Stevens' wife, Catherine Bittner Stevens, made at least $47,000 by buying bargain shares of Alaska Communications Systems stock and then selling them a year later. Stevens, as a senior member of the Commerce Committee, has influenced communications policy that has benefited ACS.

- Sen. Stevens did not report in his 1999 financial disclosure that Chamer Co. — an investment firm owned by Catherine Stevens, her siblings and their mother — obtained 42,248 shares of ACS, some of which Catherine Stevens later purchased. "Ethics rules require disclosure by a family-owned business, in detail and in the same year a transaction occurs," the Times reported.

- Other investors in JL Properties, the Anchorage real estate venture Stevens invested in, were required to contribute more capital if needed and to personally guarantee the partnership's debts. Stevens, though, did not take on that risk. The Times reported: "Stevens was not asked to guarantee notes or promise more money because he was brought in as a passive investor, Rubini said. The senator said he asked for that status because it shielded him for the kind of open-ended financial obligation that had caused his 'bad experience' in the crab boat venture" that he lost money on in the 1980s.

You can read more about Stevens here and here. The original LA Times story is here. I just know that a special prosecutor will be jumping all over this any day now.

—Kevin Drum 12:11 PM Permalink | Trackbacks | Comments (0)

FBI - Stevens-1685

194A-AN-13620-M; 693

Mickey Kaus: McCain's Hope 07/31/07

James Fallows: Harry Potter Comes to China Cold 07/31/07

Art Levine: The Bush Administrations New Target 07/31/07

Nicholas Thompson: A War Best Served Cold 07/31/07

David Segal: For I Like Turtles Boy, 17 Seconds of Fame. 07/30/07

Rachel Morris: Inside Story (audio.) 07/27/07

Timothy Noah: Donkey King. 07/29/07

Jonathan Alter: Talking To Dictators 07/27/07

James Fallows: Moving the Bancroft/Murdoch Choice to The Moral Level 07/30/07

Nicholas Lemann: Reversals 07/30/07

Walter Shapiro: How The Democrats Differ on Iraq. 07/25/07

Rachel Morris:What Happened to Al Jazeeras Sami al-Haj (video.) 07/23/07

Michael Kinsley: Private Equity Pigs. 07/19/07

Joshua Wolf Shenk: Depression is Real 07/23/07

Gregg Easterbrook: Greatest Living American Ignored 07/21/07

David Segal: In New York, An Explosion Forces Stifled Fears to the Surface. 07/19/07

James Fallows: Sane Thinking About Airborne Threats. 07/19/07

Jonathan Alter: He Only Saved A Billion People 07/19/07

Walter Shapiro: The Bill Richardson Difference 07/19/07

Rachel Morris: Prisoner 345:What Happened to Al Jazeeras Sami al-Haj. 07/17/07

Comments

SEARCH POLITICAL ANIMAL

Search

BLOG ROLL

Abu Aardvark

Go

POLITICAL ANIMAL ARCHIVES

August 2007
July 2007
June 2007
May 2007
April 2007
March 2007
February 2007
January 2007
December 2006
November 2006
October 2006
September 2006
August 2006
July 2006
June 2006
May 2006
April 2006
March 2006
February 2006
January 2006
December 2005
November 2005
October 2005
September 2005
August 2005
July 2005
June 2005
May 2005
April 2005
March 2005
February 2005
January 2005
December 2004
November 2004
October 2004
September 2004
August 2004
July 2004
June 2004
May 2004
April 2004
March 2004
February 2004
January 2004
December 2003
November 2003
October 2003
September 2003
August 2003

FBI - Stevens-1686

David Segal: Yankees Fans, Losing With a Vengeance. 07/17/07

Amy Sullivan: The Origins of the God Gap. 07/17/07

James Fallows: David Petraeus and the New Jesus Problem 07/17/07

Jonathan Alter: Clinton Obama 2008 (video). 07/17/07

James Fallows: Reassessing the State of Al-Qaida (audio) 07/17/07

Stephanie Mencimer: When Ethics Violations Are Just Another Opportunity to Raise Money 07/17/07

Nicholas Thompson: NYC Spycam Goal Spot Terrorists Before They Hit. 07/17/07

Mickey Kaus: Emasculating YouTube. 07/17/07

Michelle Cottle: Whos Your Daddy 07/17/07

Nick Thompson: Why Did Google Buy Grand Central. 07/11/07

James Fallows: Donnez Moi Un Break 07/12/07

Stephanie Mencimer: Watch Video, Sign Away Your Rights. 07/10/07

Walter Shapiro: The Chris Dodd Experience 07/10/07

Timothy Noah: Go NOPEC! 07/10/07

Mickey Kaus: The Case of The Diamond Dildo. 07/12/07

Michael Kinsley: The Pat on The Back Factor. 07/14/07

Joshua Wolf Shenk: Lincoln Navigator. 07/08/07

Walter Shapiro: Joe Biden Lets It All Hang Out 07/06/07

James Fallows: The Making of a Loyal Bose Customer 07/08/07

Mickey Kaus: More Hot Mayoral Sex. 07/08/07

Michael Kingsley: The Lying Game. 07/05/07

Timothy Noah: Health Care

July 2003
June 2003
May 2003
April 2003
March 2003
February 2003
January 2003
December 2002

FBI - Stevens-1687

Costs Screw Business, Too 07/01/07

Timothy Noah: Why Bush Was Right To Spare Libby . 07/01/07

Walter Shapiro: Florida Election Mayhem. 07/01/07

Jon Meacham: Before The Cannon Fired 07/01/07

Art Levine: Bush To Kids: Drop Dead 06/29/07

Michael Kinsley: My Lunch With Reagan. 06/29/07

Michael Kinsley: Credit For Bad Behavior. 06/28/07

Jon Meacham: What You Need To Know. 06/28/07

Jonathan Alter: The Mayors Veep Scenario 06/28/07

Eric Alterman: My Marty Peretz Problem And Ours 06/28/07

James Fallows: Made in China Sideshow. 06/28/07

Walter Shapiro: Hitting A Wall on Immigration. 06/26/07

Timothy Noah: Has Jonah Goldberg Gone Soft On Hillary?. 06/27/07

Tom Bethell: Einsteins Revolution and Counter Revloution. 06/21/07

Nicholas Lemann: Mother Jones Interview. 06/21/07

Joseph Nocera: A Lifeline of Sorts to Newspapers 06/23/07

Michelle Cottle: Gothams Megalomaniacs 06/22/07

Mickey Kaus: Time To Unleash YouTube. 06/23/07

James Fallows: China Makes, The World Takes. 06/20/07

Timothy Noah: Who Wrote The Worst Celebrity Profile. 06/20/07

Joseph Nocera: Can A Vision Save Africa? 06/16/07

David Segal: Nothing But The Truth 06/21/07

David Segal: Carl

FBI - Stevens-1688

Bernstein. Back On The Beat. 06/20/07

Mickey Kaus: Plucking the Pluckers. 06/18/07

Walter Shapiro: Hillary Clinton Always Comes Prepared. 06/18/07

Walter Shapiro: Hillarys Hard Won Experience. 06/18/07

Timothy Noah: Sopranos Endings You Can Live With 06/18/07

Michelle Cottle: Changing Tunes: How Country Music Soured On The War. 06/18/07

Michael Kinsley: The Quiet Gay Revolution. 06/14/07

Jonathan Alter: Guys Gone Wild. 06/18/07

Mickey Kaus: Lott Lashed Out At Talk Radio 06/15/07

Walter Shapiro: Mike Bloomberg Could Buy The White House. 06/12/07

Michelle Cottle: Woman on the Verge 06/12/07

Walter Shapiro: Hillary Studies. 06/08/07

Matthew Cooper: Will Scooter Libby Get Pardoned? 06/06/07

James Fallows: China Makes, the World Takes. 06/05/07

Mickey Kaus: McCain's Immigration Problems. 06/05/07

Walter Shapiro: The Democratic Debates Get Tough. 06/04/07

Jonathan Rowe: Our Conservative Allies. 06/01/07

Jonathan Alter: Iraq Doesn't Equal Vietnam. 06/01/07

Matthew Cooper: Fred Thompson, Actor, Senator, Lobbyist. 05/30/07

Jonathan Rowe: The Irrationality of "Economics". 05/30/07

Jonathan Alter: The Democrats' Iraq Infighting . 05/30/07

FBI - Stevens-1689

Walter Shapiro: Barack Obama's Quiet Rebellion. 05/30/07

T.A. Frank: Career Advice for Paul Wolfowitz. 05/29/07

Timothy Noah: Blogging Spector . 05/29/07

Zachary Roth: How Stretch Saved the White House Press Corps. 05/28/07

From Joshua Micah Marshall's Talking Points Memo: Faith Based Regrets: Steve Benen on DiIulio's Reversal
Josh Marshall 07/29/07

FBI - Stevens-1690

Common Dreams
NEWS CENTER
Progressive News & Views for the Progressive Community

Published on Wednesday, December 17, 2003 by the Los Angeles Times

Senator's Way to Wealth Was Paved With Favors

by Chuck Neubauer and Richard T. Cooper

ANCHORAGE — He wielded extraordinary power in Washington for more than three decades, eventually holding sway over nearly $800 billion a year in federal spending.

But outside the halls of the U.S. Senate, which is a world of personal wealth so rarified some call it "the Millionaires' Club," Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) had struggled financially.

Then, in 1997, he got serious about making money. And in almost no time, he too was a millionaire — thanks to investments with businessmen who received government contracts or other benefits with his help.

Added together, Stevens' new partnerships and investments provide a step-by-step guide to building a personal fortune — if you happen to be one of the country's most influential senators.

They also illustrate how lax ethics rules allow members of Congress and their families to profit from personal business dealings with special interests.

Among the ways that Stevens became wealthy:

• Armed with the power his committee posts give him over the Pentagon, Stevens helped save a $450-million military housing contract for an Anchorage businessman. The same businessman made Stevens a partner in a series of real estate investments that turned the senator's $50,000 stake into at least $750,000 in six years.

• An Alaska Native company that Stevens helped create got millions of dollars in defense contracts through preferences he wrote into law. Now the company pays $6 million a year to lease an office building owned by the senator and his business partners. Stevens continues to push legislation that benefits the company.

• An Alaskan communications company benefited from the senator's activities on the Commerce Committee. His wife, Catherine, earned tens of thousands of dollars from an inside deal involving the company's stock.

Stevens, in a written response to questions submitted by The Times, said that in all these cases his official actions were motivated by a desire to help Alaska, and that he played no role in the day-to-day management of the ventures into which he put money.

"I am a passive investor," Stevens said of his real estate dealings. "I am not now nor have I been involved in buying or selling properties, negotiating leases or making other management decisions."

FBI - Stevens-1691

All in the Family

In these deals and others, Stevens' brother-in-law, William H. Bittner, played a pivotal role. An Anchorage lawyer and lobbyist, Bittner represents major business interests for whom the senator has repeatedly gone to bat. In one instance, Stevens engineered a $9.6-million federal appropriation that chiefly benefited a Bittner client, part of South Korea's Hyundai conglomerate.

Stevens tucked a single line into a must-pass appropriations bill that used federal tax dollars to buy the company out of a coal-loading facility in Seward.

194A-AN-13620-M;694

Stevens said he did it to lower the company's costs and keep it from canceling an agreement to buy Alaskan coal. Bittner did not respond to questions from The Times.

Stevens' relationship with Bittner fits an increasingly widespread pattern in Washington: Senior senators do favors for special interests that pay hundreds of thousand of dollars in lobbying and consulting fees to the senators' children, spouses and other relatives.

As The Times documented in a series of articles in the summer, Sens. John B. Breaux (D-La.), Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) did favors for companies and groups that paid their sons as lobbyists and consultants. Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has pushed through federal land trades and other provisions benefiting Nevada interests that employ his sons and son-in-law.

The Times also reported that Stevens had continually supported interests that paid his youngest son, Ben, hundreds of thousands of dollars as a consultant.

The senators all said their decisions on policy issues and legislation had not been influenced by their relatives.

But Stevens' dealings have carried him a step further. His official actions have helped individuals and companies from which he himself draws financial benefits, a six-month Times examination found.

His required financial statements have fallen short of complete disclosure — especially on the activities of a small investment corporation owned by his wife and her family, a company that is covered by the reporting rules.

The Senate has few ethics rules governing such arrangements. Although accepting expensive gifts and speaking fees is banned, the conflict-of-interest rules are much less explicit. For example, nothing clearly bars a senator from sponsoring legislation that benefits the clients of family members who lobby. Nor are lawmakers prohibited from going into business with people receiving legislative favors.

Mainly, the Senate relies on an ill-defined injunction not to bring shame upon the body.

Senate Ethics Committee Chairman George Voinovich (R-Ohio) declined to discuss the issues raised by The Times articles.

House Ethics Committee Chairman Joel Hefley (R-Colo.) said he hoped to convene an advisory panel of current and former House Ethics Committee members next year to examine a range of ethics questions, including how to address the issue of lobbying by relatives.

"I do think we ought to revisit this," he said. He declined to comment on the issue of lawmakers' financial partners.

Lawmakers should be careful about their business relationships, John D. Saxon, a former Senate Ethics Committee counsel, said, speaking generally and not about Stevens in particular.

"It's a very slippery slope for a member of Congress to be entangled with someone in a business dealing and then use their official position to help them, even if it's on something completely different," he said.

'Stevens Money'

Today, Stevens is the longest-serving Republican in the Senate, and as president pro tempore stands just behind the vice president and the speaker of the House in the constitutional line of succession to the Oval Office.

For more than 20 years, he has been chairman or ranking member of the Senate's Defense Appropriations Subcommittee. Since 1997, he has been chairman or ranking member of the full Appropriations Committee, which must approve every dollar of federal discretionary spending each year.

FBI - Stevens-1692

Stevens' position as a senior member of the Commerce Committee adds to his clout — especially in telecommunications policy, which is under the committee's jurisdiction.

In Alaska, Stevens exerts unparalleled influence. No state is so dependent on federal dollars and decisions. The federal government still owns 60% of all its land, generates one-third of all jobs, and holds the keys to economic growth through regulation of its major industries — oil and gas, fishing, timber and tourism.

Federal spending in Alaska, known locally as "Stevens money," runs as much as 70% above the national average on a per capita basis.

Since his first day in the Senate in 1968, Stevens has delivered for Alaska.

He has won tax breaks for Native businesses, bailouts for fishermen, a pipeline for an oil consortium and restoration of an abandoned Army post as a tourist attraction for a Yukon village.

He got $28 million for a rail terminal open only during the summer and $40 million for a commercial space satellite facility.

Almost every institution, region and segment of the population in the state has benefited from Stevens' efforts, from its schools and social programs to its transportation system, its urban areas and the far-flung villages of Alaska's Native peoples.

But during the period Stevens has grown wealthy, some longtime supporters say, the senator has become less willing to hear their views.

"I've been here a long time, and always had a great deal of respect for Sen. Stevens' enormous power and the good he's done for Alaska," Terry Haines, a veteran commercial fisherman from Kodiak Island, said recently. "But lately he's become extremely rigid and doesn't seem to be listening to his constituents much."

Hard Times

Theodore Fulton Stevens was born Nov. 18, 1923, in Indianapolis. At the outset of the Great Depression, when Stevens was 6 years old, his parents divorced, according to his campaign biography.

Stevens went to live with his grandparents after the divorce, helping out by selling newspapers and working evenings and weekends in a drugstore. He later moved in with an aunt and uncle in Manhattan Beach, Calif., where he graduated from high school. Both his father and grandfather died of cancer, Stevens has said.

Stevens joined the Army Air Corps during World War II, flying cargo planes "over the Hump" in the Himalayas — some of the most dangerous missions of the war. He won two Distinguished Flying Crosses and two Air Medals, his biography says.

The biography describes how he graduated from UCLA and Harvard Law School. After working in the 1952 Eisenhower campaign, he was hired by a Washington lawyer, but soon took a new job as a lawyer in Alaska, which was still a territory.

He played a leading role in the successful campaign for statehood, but Alaska's voters rejected Stevens the first two times he ran for the Senate.

Winning a seat in the state Legislature, he became House majority leader and go-to man for Gov. Walter J. Hickel. In 1968, when Sen. E.L. "Bob" Bartlett died unexpectedly, Hickel picked his ally to fill the vacancy.

In the Senate at last, Stevens worked hard to master legislative details and committee politics.

But increasing political success was accompanied by personal tragedy. FBI - Stevens-1693

In 1978, his first wife, Ann, died along with four others when the executive jet carrying them home crashed at the Anchorage airport. Stevens was one of two survivors.

At that point, the Stevens' five children were adults. Two years later, he remarried, and soon had a daughter, Lily, who recently graduated from college.

In the 1980s, Stevens and his new wife, the former Catherine Bittner, suffered a serious financial reversal.

Along with her younger brother, William Bittner, and other partners, Stevens invested in the construction of a $2-million crab boat, records show. Before it was finished, costs soared and the crab market crashed, plunging Stevens into debt.

The unexpected inheritance of a 54-foot yacht helped Stevens to regain his financial footing. Records show the boat was a bequest from the late Charles Willis "Bill" Snedden, publisher of the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner, a longtime friend of Stevens'. Stevens sold the boat for about $400,000, according to a source involved in the transaction who did not want to be named.

Stevens' financial problems underscored the disparity between his personal situation and that of his wealthy Senate colleagues.

In a news interview in the late 1980s, he lashed out at Alaska voters for failing to appreciate the personal and financial sacrifices he had made for them.

A $50,000 Investment

In 1997, Stevens began making up for lost time.

"Money was never what Ted Stevens was about," one close associate said of Stevens' sudden focus on accumulating wealth. The associate attributed it to Stevens' age — he turned 80 last month — and to concern about his family.

Whatever the reasons for the change, sometime in 1997 — acting at the senator's request — brother-in-law Bittner contacted a friend, Anchorage real estate developer Jonathan B. Rubini, about investment opportunities for the senator, Rubini said.

At the time, Stevens was making about $130,000 a year as a senator, and his wife reported annual earnings of about $100,000.

Rubini said he would be honored to help, the developer recalled recently during extensive interviews in his Anchorage office.

A lawyer and a Democrat known for representing liberal clients, Rubini had a gift for engineering complex deals.

Rubini and his partner, Leonard B. Hyde, made it a practice to form a separate syndicate of investors for each project. Bittner had often been among those participants. Rubini arranged for Stevens to put up $50,000, giving him a 7.7% interest in a new syndicate called JLS Properties.

Rubini, Hyde and another partner who came in on the deal were required to personally guarantee, if necessary, debts the partnership took on. They also agreed to contribute more capital if needed.

Stevens was not asked to guarantee notes or promise more money because he was brought in as a passive investor, Rubini said. The senator said he asked for that status because it shielded him from the kind of open-ended financial obligation that had caused his "bad experience" in the crab boat venture.

The deal began in characteristic Rubini fashion, with the purchase of an $11-million collection of what he called "ragtag" properties, whose out-of-state owners wanted to unload. Rubini quickly resold several of the properties to pay down debt.

Among the properties retained were a small office park near the Anchorage airport and a modest two-story office building downtown. Within three years, Rubini said, Stevens' equity climbed to about $250,000.

Stevens also invested $50,000 in a separate Rubini syndicate to acquire an apartment complex in Fairbanks in 1999, records show. Stevens' equity in that property has grown too, Rubini said.

A Federal Contract

Stevens was soon in a position to do a favor for Rubini.

When Elmendorf Air Force Base, immediately north of Anchorage, was selected to participate in a new Pentagon program to privatize base housing, Rubini and another set of partners bid on the $450-million contract in 2000.

The chosen developer would take title to the existing housing, upgrade and expand it, then rent the houses back to service families. At 828 units, the Elmendorf contract was far larger than anything Rubini had built before — "a big reach for us," as he put it.

Yet with low-interest government construction loans and the Air Force pledging to pay tenants' housing allowances directly to the contractor for the next 50 years, it looked like a moneymaker.

Bittner became an investor in the Elmendorf group that Rubini put together, records show. Stevens did not, and he said Monday that he had been unaware of Bittner's involvement.

The senator said he "strongly supported" privatization because it improved housing for military families and "it would greatly enhance the likelihood that Elmendorf would not be closed in the next round of base closures."

When Rubini sought more time to prepare his bid, Air Force officials noted in their records, he sent the senator a copy of the request.

"I purposely CC'd Sen. Stevens to send a signal to the Air Force that we would raise the issue with the Alaska delegation if the Air Force acted unreasonably," Rubini said.

Although it was less than he wanted, Rubini was given a two-week extension.

With only the final paperwork to wrap up, Rubini was told he'd won.

Then, in September 2000, days before the deal was to become final, the Air Force reneged. One government memo said the Air Force thought Rubini's group "lacked capacity and adequate financing" — claims Rubini strenuously rejects.

Rubini, whose group had already spent $1 million on preparation work, fought back. He filed a formal protest and also wrote to Stevens, explaining the problem and requesting help. Then he flew to Washington. First, he tried to talk to Air Force officials, who refused to see him. Next, he visited Stevens on Capitol Hill.

The meeting went so well that Stevens invited Rubini home, where they watched one of the presidential candidate debates between Al Gore and George W. Bush, Rubini said.

Military Offensive

Stevens said he decided to get involved with the Elmendorf project.

FBI - Stevens-1695

"My involvement with the Elmendorf project was motivated to ensure that the Air Force moved forward," he said in his written response.

In addition, he said, he was "looking out for an Alaskan company that was getting short shrift from the Department of Defense."

Stevens did not answer questions about the specific actions he took. He was quoted in an August Anchorage Daily News article as saying he called Air Force generals. The article reported on his relationship with Rubini.

Whatever he did, the Air Force began to feel some heat.

As chairman of Appropriations, Stevens is an ex officio member of its Military Construction Subcommittee. The chairman of that subcommittee, Conrad R. Burns (R-Mont.), is one of Stevens' fishing buddies.

In October 2000, Burns wrote to the secretary of the Air Force, F. Whitten Peters, threatening to take away the Elmendorf privatization money because of the glitch in awarding the contract.

Burns arranged for a similar letter to go to the Air Force from the chairman of the corresponding House committee, and House aides said they knew Stevens was interested in the matter.

Burns did not respond to calls or written questions about his actions.

Meanwhile, Rubini tried one more move: joining forces with the only other Elmendorf bidder — Hunt Building Corp. of El Paso. Hunt was an established builder of military housing, though the government had forced the company to pay $8 million in compensation for construction problems on an earlier project.

In early December 2000, the Air Force put aside its reservations and decided Rubini and his new partner were acceptable.

Rubini said he did not know specifically what Stevens did on the Elmendorf project. Whatever it was, "Sen. Stevens would have stepped up to assist any Alaska business," he said.

Air Force officials say they are happy with the work Rubini's firm has done at Elmendorf, and recently announced the Rubini group would get to do a second round of housing upgrades without further competition — this phase 50% larger than the first.

Inside Track

Stevens' efforts to help Rubini with Elmendorf came just as Rubini was making a decision that transformed Stevens from a modestly successful investor into a millionaire.

In October 2000, while Rubini was enlisting the senator's help with the Air Force, the developer acquired 30 acres in midtown Anchorage that he planned to cover with gleaming office towers.

Like Elmendorf, this deal was a big step up for Rubini — larger both in size and potential profits than his earlier ventures.

And Rubini chose to make Stevens and JLS Properties part of it. He said JLS had accrued equity in the properties it already owned and thus could help with the new financing.

Rubini could have financed the new development in many ways. He could have used the financial resources of almost any of his numerous successful holdings. Or, as he frequently did in such cases, he could have attracted an entirely new set of investors.

Why did he choose to use JLS to help with financing instead of one of the other options? It was just a decision he made, Rubini said.

FBI - Stevens-1696

Once again, the senator did not have to agree to guarantee the new venture's debts, as the other JLS partners were required to do.

The first new building to be constructed, called Centerpoint I, is a striking $35-million edifice with commanding views of snow-capped mountains. The remainder of the 30-acre parcel is being developed as Centerpoint II. Stevens is part of that project too.

Stevens has reported that his investments in JLS, Centerpoint I and Centerpoint II, all stemming from his initial $50,000 investment, are now worth between $750,000 and $1.5 million.

Rubini said there was no connection between Stevens' intervention on Elmendorf and Rubini's decision to move the senator into the Centerpoint deals.

"Clearly, a phone call from Sen. Stevens does not hurt," Rubini said, referring to the senator's contacts with the Air Force on his behalf.

"But there was no quid pro quo, plain and simple," he said.

Lifetime Annuity

Today, Centerpoint I is fully occupied as the new headquarters of the Arctic Slope Regional Corp., which is paying $6 million a year on a 20-year lease.

Arctic Slope is no ordinary tenant. A $1-billion-a-year business, it is the largest Alaskan-owned company in the state. More important, the company — along with 12 other regional Native corporations — was created through legislation the senator took the lead in drafting. And it has prospered through his continuing efforts in the Senate.

Arctic Slope and the other Native regional corporations were born in 1971 as part of a landmark bill called the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act, hailed as a humanitarian alternative to the failures of traditional reservations.

Under the act, about 40 million acres and almost $1 billion in working capital went to Native corporations and to some 200 much smaller village bodies to settle their claims to land. They were to help their shareholders, the Native people living in their regions, by making investments, starting businesses and in other ways generating economic activity.

Many of the Native corporations have found it hard to fulfill their mission, but Arctic Slope, which represents Inupiat Eskimos on the oil-rich North Slope, gradually built a strong base providing support services to the giant oil companies at Prudhoe Bay.

And Stevens is now fighting to authorize oil extraction from the nearby Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, where Arctic Slope owns petroleum rights to 92,000 acres.

Thanks to Stevens, Arctic Slope and the other Native corporations also enjoy preferences when seeking federal contracts that go well beyond anything available to blacks or Latinos, even though Arctic Slope ranks among the nation's 500 largest privately owned companies.

One set of preferences that Stevens inserted into his annual defense appropriations bills recently enabled Arctic Slope and another Native corporation to land a $2-billion Pentagon deal without competitive bidding.

Now money is flowing the other way — to Stevens.

A company executive, Conrad Bagne, said Arctic Slope did not find out about Stevens' ownership in Centerpoint until the company had finalized the deal. He said Stevens' involvement had no effect on the company's decision to sign the lease and that there was no impropriety.

FBI - Stevens-1697

"No one is more committed to public service than Sen. Stevens," Bagne said.

Stevens now has a personal stake in his tenant's future. At the same time, he continues to aid the company's bottom line through his position as chairman of the Appropriations Committee. This year, for example, he pushed through legislation renewing the federal defense contract preferences.

In addition, Stevens has inserted a provision in this year's pending appropriations bill that directs federal agencies to consult with Arctic Slope and the other Native corporations on equal footing with tribal governments. This gives Arctic Slope, for one, new legal standing when pushing to open the Arctic wildlife refuge to oil and gas drilling — a position opposed by at least some tribal leaders.

"I have and will continue to work with all Alaska Native corporations — both individually and collectively — in my official capacity," said Stevens, noting that he does not deal directly with Arctic Slope on its lease.

An Arctic Slope subsidiary has paid Bittner $120,000 since 2002 to lobby on appropriations and government contracts.

Hidden Interest

Business interests that look to her husband for support have also enriched Catherine Stevens in a series of transactions that went through Chamer Co., the private family investment firm run by Bittner.

Sen. Stevens did not report some of these deals on his financial disclosure reports; others were reported only sketchily — without the details required by law.

One of the transactions was a quick stock deal involving the Alaska Communications Systems Group that earned Catherine Stevens at least $47,000, records show.

The company has benefited from the senator's influence over communications policy as a senior member of the Commerce Committee.

For example, Stevens pushed through legislation in 1996 that created a subsidy for remote telephone service, and he has fought efforts to dilute Alaska's sizable share of the subsidy. Alaska Communications considers the subsidy, called the universal service fund, an important revenue source.

Alaska Communications Chairman Charles Robinson said, "The universal service fund is important to every telephone company in Alaska." He said Stevens had "done a great job in preserving it."

The senator said his actions had "benefited all Alaskans and all Alaska communications companies."

Stevens stands to be an even more valuable ally in 2005, when he's scheduled to take over as Commerce Committee chairman.

Robinson combined the Fairbanks and Anchorage phone companies to create Alaska Communications in 1999, and took it public in the fall of that year.

As is common before companies go public, a select group of insiders was allowed to buy stock at a bargain price, in this instance $6.15 a share, the documents show. In this group were several financiers and others involved in creating the company, including Bittner, who was and is the company's Washington lobbyist.

Though she was not on record as an officer or financier for the company, Catherine Stevens ended up with some of the bargain shares. Robinson said he knew she had shares but did not remember how she obtained them.

Alaska Communications issued 42,248 shares to Chamer Co., which Catherine Stevens owns with Bittner, their sister and their mother. She purchased 16,250 of those shares and sold them a year later, according to the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Ted Stevens did not report the shares on his ethics report for 1999, the year Chamer acquired them.

Ethics rules require disclosure of activity by a family-owned business, in detail and in the same year a transaction occurs.

The deal was not reported until 2000, after Catherine Stevens had sold her shares, most of them at $9.25, for a profit of at least $47,000.

Rubini, the developer of Centerpoint I, said Chamer also had an interest in that project. He said Chamer put up $250,000 for a 3% short-term stake in Centerpoint I that earned a 15% return on investment.

Records show Chamer also invested $125,000 in an earlier Rubini syndicate.

Stevens did not disclose either of these investments on his Senate financial forms.

Although Senate ethics rules encompass his wife's financial activities as well as his own, Stevens sought to distance himself from Chamer.

"I have no interest in that company, do not participate in its meetings, nor do I participate in any decisions related to its business activities," he said Monday. His wife did not respond to telephone messages on Tuesday.

Back in Washington

Stevens continues to push for money and other benefits for Alaskan interests — including nearly $400 million in pending legislation to help tourism, education, the environment, scientific research, roads, fisheries and the war against fetal alcohol syndrome.

There's also $2.5 million to survey the seabed for a fiber-optic cable connecting Kodiak Island, Anchorage and the Kenai Peninsula; Alaska Communications Systems serves both Anchorage and Kodiak.

Researcher Mark Madden in Washington assisted in this report. Staff writer Judy Pasternak in Washington also contributed.

Copyright 2003 Los Angeles Times

###

FBI - Stevens-1699

washingtonpost.com

FBI Probes Stevens's Earmark

$1.6 Million Appropriation Went to Alaska Marine Life Center

By Paul Kane and Dan Eggen washingtonpost.com Staff Writer and Washington Post Staff Writer
Wednesday, August 1, 2007; A04

Advertisement
Mortgage Rates Fall Again in Alaska!
$510,000 Mortgage for Under $1,498/Month!

1. Select Your State
Alabama
2. Select Your Rate
3.00% - 3.99%
3. Select Your Credit
Good
Calculate New Payment
LowerMyBills.com

The FBI is investigating whether Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) used a $1.6 million congressional appropriation to help an Alaska marine center purchase property from a business partner of the senator's son, said sources familiar with the probe.

That investigation comes amid a widening federal grand-jury probe into Stevens's connections to an energy services company. The FBI and the Interior Department's inspector general are also jointly examining a series of budgetary earmarks endorsed by Stevens in recent years for the Alaska SeaLife Center in Seward, said sources familiar with the probe who spoke about it on the condition of anonymity.

Investigators are particularly interested in how those earmarks may have helped the marine center buy land from Trevor McCabe, a former Stevens aide who was also a business partner of Stevens's son, Ben, according to sources and news reports. Ted Stevens has wielded enormous clout as a senior member of the Appropriations Committee, which he chaired for six years, regularly steering hundreds of millions of dollars a year in earmarks for his home state.

The center got a $1.6 million earmark to buy adjacent property owned by McCabe, sources said. The land was eventually sold by McCabe's firm to SeaLife for $550,000, according to sources and news accounts.

Officials with the Office of Inspector General at the Interior Department have interviewed a "handful" of employees at the National Park Service in recent weeks, said Marcia Blaszak, the service's regional director in Alaska. Investigators are interested in Park Service employees because the service was another prospective buyer of the McCabe parcel before it was sold to the SeaLife Center. The SeaLife investigation by the FBI and the Interior Department was first reported yesterday by Roll Call. McCabe could not be reached for comment yesterday. FBI officials declined to comment.

Stevens has declined to comment on most of the specific allegations against him, including the SeaLife purchase. But after his home outside Anchorage was searched for nine hours Monday by federal agents, Stevens spoke briefly yesterday behind closed doors to a group of Senate Republicans and Vice President Cheney, pleading for them to not to prejudge him based on news reports. "He's asked us to await all information during this investigation, and I will, while I'm standing by our longest-serving colleague," Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said.

Sen. Daniel K. Inouye (D-Hawaii), Stevens's closest friend in the Senate who has served with the Alaskan for decades, spoke with Stevens early yesterday and came away reassured of his innocence.

"He's convinced, I think, that he didn't do anything wrong," Inouye said. "He's my friend, and he'll continue to be my friend."

But the raid on Stevens's home Monday by FBI and Internal Revenue Service agents heightened pressure on the longest-serving Republican in Senate history, who has been under scrutiny since last year by federal grand juries examining a home-remodeling project that was allegedly overseen by executives from Veco Corp., an energy services company. Veco's former chief executive, Bill J. Allen, and another executive have pleaded guilty to paying more than $400,000 in bribes to members of the state legislature, several of whom have been indicted, and other unnamed elected officials.

Both executives are cooperating with investigators. Contractors have told reporters that they gave documents and testimony to federal grand juries in Anchorage and Washington about the remodeling project, which more than doubled the house's square footage by adding a new ground floor. Some contractors have said Allen and Veco executives oversaw the remodeling project, but Stevens told local reporters two weeks ago that he paid every bill he received.

An energy company attorney declined to comment on whether Allen controlled the invoices for the home project, citing the investigation. "[The home] is certainly a part of the overarching investigation," said Amy Menard, outside counsel for Veco.

Post a Comment

Ad Join the discussion. Sponsored by Cisco. welcome to the human network. cisco.

View all comments that have been posted about this article.

Your washingtonpost.com User ID, colton_s, will be displayed with your comment.

You must be logged in to leave a comment. Log in | Register

Submit

Comments that include profanity or personal attacks or other inappropriate comments or material will be removed from the site. Additionally, entries that are unsigned or contain "signatures" by someone other than the actual author will be removed. Finally, we will take steps to block users who violate any of our posting standards, terms of use or privacy policies or any other policies governing this site. Please review the full rules governing commentaries and discussions. You are fully responsible for the content that you post.

FBI - Stevens-1701

© 2007 The Washington Post Company

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Alaska Newsreader

Today's news for the Last Frontier

By Terry Carr

(Published: August 2, 2007)

News for Thursday, Aug. 2

Keeping up with the delegation

Alaska's three members of Congress – Sens. Ted Stevens and Lisa Murkowski and Rep. Don Young – are still drawing a jumbo share of media attention as a tumultuous week nears an end. All have faced trouble in recent days, the most recent jolt being federal authorities' raid on Stevens' Girdwood home on Monday. Here's some of what's in the news today and what's developing:

▪ Young – who gained nationwide media attention last week for threatening to bite, like a mink, New Jersey Rep. Scott Garrett for threatening education money for Alaska – has apologized, according to a story in The Hill. "Young listed traumatic events within his state, his hospitalization last week and the hospitalization of his wife as reasons that caused him to act inappropriately on the House floor," the story says.

▪ Citing Senate records and financial disclosure forms, a story in Roll Call today says Stevens used a Senate employee as his personal bookkeeper but does not appear to have paid her for those services out of his own funds, even as the aide collected more than a quarter-million dollars in federal pay. An Associated Press story at adn.com previously reported that the employee, Barbara Flanders, was subpoenaed to testify to a grand jury about Stevens' dealings with Bill Allen.

▪ A Stevens colleague, Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, told The Crypt, a Capitol Hill blog, that the FBI was "a bit Gestapo-like" in how it handled the search of Stevens' home. "When the FBI was offered a key and invited into the home, they chose publicize it to make sure the media was there first, and they broke in. That is gamesmanship. That makes senators very, very angry when they attempt to cooperate when for reason they are caught in these webs and yet they are denied that for the sake of the judiciary's publicity. That is wrong," Craig is quoted as saying.

▪ A Fairbanks Daily News-Miner editorial today says, "It's disturbing to see some people clamor for Sen. Stevens' head when it's not even clear yet that he is the target of the federal government's probe." The editorial concludes: "We'll all learn the details of this federal inquiry soon enough. Until we do, however, calls for the senator to step aside from committee positions are premature."

▪ The FBI investigation into corruption touching Alaska lawmakers could go on for years, a KTUU story says. The story suggests the state's "political culture" could come out the other end with a new look.

▪ Murkowski has posted a brief statement on her Web site that says, in part, "With the current investigation underway, it is not appropriate to jump to conclusions until the process is complete. Senator Stevens has the right to have the facts established in this matter."

194A-AN-1362D-M; 696

▪ Trevor McCabe, a former Stevens aide who has become part of the current investigation involving the senator (see ADN story here), filed papers in 2004 to create a restaurant company called Uncle Ted's Alaska LLC but then backed out of the plan last year, a story today at TPMmuckraker.com says. McCabe gave no indication in his paperwork as to the reason for changing his mind.

▪ A story at bloomberg.com looks at the notion that the federal investigation of Stevens not only threatens the career of the longest-serving Republican in Senate history, it also puts at risk the billions of dollars that the senator has steered to Alaska.

▪ The New York Times and others are reporting that attention on the Stevens situation is complicating a possible vote today on legislation overhauling lobbying and ethics standards. Senate Republicans had been resisting the Democrats' bill but some are less certain in their position in light of the raid on Stevens' home.

***

Are PFD days numbered? A Peninsula Clarion piece looks at the prospects that the annual cash payout to Alaskans could go away, always an explosive subject. The author reasons thus: As the fund keeps growing – it recently topped $40 billion – pressure will increase at the state level to spend some of it; and if federal appropriations tumble along with the fortunes of the state's congressional delegation, that too could increase the pressure to spend from the fund.

The story goes on: "Sen. Majority Leader Gary Stevens (no relation to Ted Stevens) said in Homer last week that he did not see any move to spend the fund over the next year or two, but further out, sentiments could change. 'We've just celebrated it reaching $40 billion. In a few more years, it will hit $50 billion,' Stevens noted. 'In another 10 years or so, it could reach $100 billion.'"

***

The long reach of an earthquake. A story that appeared in The Chronicle Journal of Thunder Bay, Ontario, and other publications says that researchers have found the shaking of a major Alaska earthquake in 2002 triggered tremors to roll under the landscape of Vancouver Island and rippled for thousands of kilometers through seismic zones across the United States. The researchers found the effects of the quake sloshed lakes from Seattle to Louisiana, muddied wells as far east as Pennsylvania and triggered small earthquakes in seismic zones across the western United States.

Researchers on the project say their findings could help advance toward predicting earthquakes. "So it's giving us a more complete picture of the faults, and with a more complete picture, we hope to predict earthquakes," said seismologist John Vidale.

***

Joyriding crewman. A Kodiak Daily Mirror story reports on the DUI arrest of a man with a record already of at least five drunken driving offenses. This time, though, he was taken into custody after he drove aground a 20-ton, 83-foot tender vessel just outside of St. Herman Harbor.

He was charged with violating probation, felony driving under the influence and refusing to provide a breath sample to troopers.

***

A new school, at long last. Coffman Cove, a small Southeast Alaska community on Prince of Wales Island, is in line to get a new school, after waiting for 18 years, an APRN story reports. The project won legislative funding this year to replace the aging educational facility currently in use and where walls have holes and floors sag, according to the story.

The community has a population of about 150, more in the summer, and the school will cost about $7 million. "Some in Coffman Cove hope the school will be one of the community's anchors," the story reports.

***

The Ketchikan Daily News reports this act of generosity:

"The Hovik family donated its Kohler and Chase upright piano to The Salvation Army Thrift Store Tuesday after bringing it across Tongass Narrows aboard Pat Jirschele's small landing craft." The story includes a detailed description of the heroic grunt work – including rolling, skidding and heaving the piano past obstacles – needed to get the thing to its destination.

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1704

From AlaskaEBG@aol.com
Sent Friday, August 3, 2007 11:03 pm
To MaryBeth.kepner@ic.fbi.gov , cjoy@leo.gov , colton_s@hotmail.com , jnewton3@leo.gov
Subject Sounds like Rosebaum to me...

Tuesday, July 31, 2007

Bookkeeper questioned in Sen. Stevens case
Warrant served at Ted Stevens' Girdwood home
Ted Stevens -- and Senate GOP -- In Trouble

July 31, 2007

The FBI and IRS's execution yesterday afternoon of a search warrant on the Alaska home of GOP Senator Ted Steven has been widely reported by now.

What's striking is this tidbit in today's WaPo:

Stevens said in a statement that his attorneys were advised of the impending search yesterday morning.
I spent nearly 9 years as a federal prosecutor. I'm not aware of a single instance when any prosecutor or agent told anyone outside the Justice Department that a search warrant was going to be executed later in the day. Telling outsiders -- especially lawyers for the person whose property will be searched -- defeats one of the principal purposes of a search warrant: SURPRISE to ensure the integrity of the evidence field.
If you're going to tell the target of the search in advance, then why not just serve a subpoena and trust in compliance?

Now Stevens' reported comment may have been a spin on a phone call from someone at DOJ when the agents were at the front door or the agents themselves calling Stevens' attorneys to ask for the key. But those seem more than a stretch considering that Stevens says the tip came in the a.m., and the search was executed in the p.m.

Maybe it's spin. Or maybe someone at DOJ broke a cardinal principle. Certainly, only a few people would have known about the impending search: the prosecutors conducting the investigation, the team of agents preparing to execute the search . . . and high-level DOJ officials who, considering that Stevens is a U.S. Senator, would have had to approve the search.

Regardless, one thing is clear about Stevens' status from the use of a search warrant. He is now squarely in the cross-hairs of a federal criminal investigation.

According to the Justice Department's Criminal Resource Manual Sec. 659:

A search warrant should not be used to obtain documentary materials believed to be in the private possession of a disinterested third party unless it appears that the use of a subpoena, summons, request, or other less intrusive alternative means of obtaining the materials would substantially jeopardize the availability or usefulness of the materials sought, and the application for the warrant has been authorized as provided in paragraph (a)(2) of this section.
Ted Stevens, clearly, is no "disinterested third party." More likely, given the hoopla a search warrant's execution creates, Stevens is a target -- defined by the U.S. Attorney's Manual Sec. 9-11.151 this way:

"A 'target' is a person as to whom the prosecutor or the grand jury has substantial evidence linking him or her to the commission of a crime and who, in the judgment of the prosecutor, is a putative defendant."
In any case, while on the one hand, it's just this sort of event -- a federal search warrant executed against a powerful politician of the same party as the administration -- that suggests the professionals in the Justice Department are doing their job, the remark WaPo attributed to Stevens -- that his attorneys were given a heads-up -- reminds that this Justice Department works very differently at the top than on the line.
If it's true that Stevens' lawyers had a heads-up about the search, I think it's more than fair to ask questions -- and to get answers -- about exactly who told Stevens' lawyers about the afternoon's planned search, who approved the disclosure, and what was the purpose of the tip-off.

194A-AN-13620-M; 697

Get a sneak peek of the all-new AOL.com.

FBI - Stevens-1706

Girdwood's "Secret Santa" mystery ends: federal investigation of Sen. Stevens prompts revelation

By Ken Smith
Turnagain Times

For the past 25 years one man has donated vast amounts of money and gifts for children whose families couldn't afford Christmas presents in Girdwood Valley. He has done so in silence, acting as "Secret Santa." But now the man behind Santa wants to come forward, due in large part, to the recent Federal investigation of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens and the remodeling done to his Girdwood home in 2000. And the man behind "Secret Santa" is Bob Persons, owner of the Double Musky Inn Restaurant in Girdwood. Persons is a close friend of Sen. Stevens since they met at the Double Musky over two decades ago, and Stevens is a frequent patron of the popular Cajun restaurant on Crow Creek Road.

Persons, who had the power of attorney in matters related to the construction of Stevens' first floor addition back in 2000, has been caught up in the federal probe by FBI and IRS investigators scrutinizing the role of oil services firm Veco in the remodeling project. Persons name has frequently been mentioned in local and national news coverage of the investigation and appeared before a grand jury in Washington D.C. in May to answer questions about the work on Stevens' home.

Persons is a private man, and the attention he's garnered from the investigation has thrust him into the national spotlight, which he feels has painted a negative image of him and his family. Persons felt compelled to come forward about his role in the community and his work as "Secret Santa" to present another side to the story.

"This is kind of embarrassing for me," Persons said. "I've kept quiet for 25 years (as "Secret Santa") and once I got caught up in the investigation, I wanted to stand up. I don't want my reputation that I've built up over 25 years being sullied by an investigation. Things that are unproven, things that nobody knows."

Persons explained that he and his wife, Deanna, have given tens of thousands of dollars for bicycles, tricycles and toys for the children of the less fortunate in Girdwood and dozens of bicycles to the children of "Alaska Women in Crisis". In addition, the Persons have given money to many people in Girdwood in their moment of crisis and, he said, have always done it without publication or desire for thanks or attention.

"I'm not a bad guy no matter what they say about me," he said, "and people that know me won't believe it anyway. But you get painted with an ugly brush and some of the paint sticks."

Girdwood resident, Judy Basler, is among several people in the community who has worked with Persons to help people less fortunate during Christmas time. She started the "Angel Tree" over 25 years ago, where each angel represents a needy child in the Four Valleys.

194A-AN-13620-1D;698

"Bob has always been a secret person," she said. "He's given bicycles and extra money to go shopping, to make sure every child has gifts under their trees at Christmas time."
Basler became emotional while describing Persons work, and the work of others in the community who have helped people in Girdwood during the holidays, fighting back tears as she talked about Persons donations and personal commitment to children less fortunate in the valley.
"I started the "Angel Tree" to make sure the children had Christmas gifts because every child needs a gift at Christmas," she said. "And Bob was the person that made sure they each got a gift. We need to see that goodness in people."
The Persons attention to the less fortunate in Girdwood goes back to the first years they owned the Double Musky in 1978 when there were no more than 350 people in Girdwood and many of them were struggling to make ends meet. The Persons were struggling themselves and served free sandwiches every Monday night to everyone in Girdwood and did not require the purchase of even a soft drink. In addition, Persons said he has paid for the removal of abandoned automobiles in Girdwood for years and has never discussed it with anyone but the local company that removed them.
"The investigation has been stressful," said Persons. "All of it has been stressful. But I do not feel any business has been hurt by this. The investigation has nothing to do with the business. I'm a very private man, and I don't like being a public figure."
Persons and his wife have first hand knowledge of hard times since his wife's father died when she was 14, leaving her mother with Deanna and three younger sisters. Persons' father died when he was 16 leaving him nothing to make a start in life, he said.
"We both know that hard work and sacrifice can get people through a bad patch," Persons explained, "and we have a natural sympathy for people who are struggling."
Persons said they are determined that children in Girdwood will always have a visit from Santa. He said that until this moment in his life, he never wanted attention for their acts of kindness and added that he does not even take charitable deductions from their taxes.
"I don't want to be the victim of false rumors," he said. "Those false rumors could be anything, rumors can be vicious."
Aside from the mental strain he has endured during the federal investigation of Sen. Stevens, he said the financial costs have also been burdensome, with legal costs accumulating at more than $35,000.
"It's like being hit by chip," he said. "They chip away at the big guys, and then they chip away at the little guy like me."

FBI - Stevens-1708

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Young offers no apologies but warns his election challengers

SPEAKING UP: Investigations aside, he cautions critics "in a glass house."

By DAN JOLING
The Associated Press

(Published: August 8, 2007)

Rep. Don Young speaks in Anchorage. (AL GRILLO / The Associated Press)

Investigations dogging U.S. Rep. Don Young have not damaged his effectiveness in Congress, the Alaska Republican said Tuesday, and he warned challengers of consequences if they sling rocks during the campaign next year when he runs for a 19th term.

"Those that cast stones better damn well not live in a glass house," he said.

Young, 74, has made more headlines this year for his campaign practices, his ties to convicted felons and his famous temper than for his lawmaking.

Young is being investigated for connections to Veco Corp., the Anchorage-based company whose former top two executives have pleaded guilty to bribing Alaska state lawmakers.

A former aide to Young, Mark Zachares, pleaded guilty in April to conspiracy for accepting $30,000 of tickets from congressional influence peddler Jack Abramoff. Zachares left Young's staff in 2005.

Questions Tuesday on investigations were off limits, Young said.

"As far as commenting on anything concerning any of these investigations, I am not free at this time to comment," he said, adding, "Most of what you've read in the paper is, I think, journalism that's been really moving this constant curiosity along."

Former Veco chief Bill Allen held annual fundraisers for Young and public records show the congressman received $157,000 from Veco's employees and its political action committee between 1996 and 2006.

"Figure it out," Young said. "Ten years, $150,000, it's what, $20,000 or less a year? That's not very much money." He has no intention of returning Veco money as some other Alaska politicians have done.

FBI - Stevens-1709

CONGRESS VS. CAMPAIGN

Young draws a line between his actions as a congressman and the campaign.

"My campaign is separated from my office," he said. "Totally separated, totally divorced. I am the candidate, they are the campaign office."

194A-AN-13620-M; 699

He would not say why his campaign is spending nearly a quarter-million dollars to retain a Washington, D.C., law firm, Akin, Gump, Strauss Hauer & Feld, or even who his attorney within the firm is.

Apart from investigations, Young remains unapologetic for his actions.

Young inserted a $10 million earmark into a federal highway spending bill to study extension of a Florida highway that could benefit a builder who hosted a fundraiser for Young. The money was desired by local officials and he has compiled the press clips to show it, he said.

Just last week, he apologized to fellow Republicans for a harsh exchange with Rep. Scott Garrett, R-N.J., who -- unannounced to Young -- opposed a $33 million education appropriation for Alaska Natives. Young on the floor of Congress drew a wildlife analogy: "There is always another day when those who bite will be killed, too, and I am very good at that. Those that bite me will be bitten back."

His cause was correct, he said Tuesday.

"My job is to defend what happens in the state of Alaska for the people of the state of Alaska, and I did so. The results were good. ... I've always been one to be very forceful in the heat of battle. I have not changed, even in my maturity, because I don't have the prerogative of being weak in the halls of Congress."

And despite ridicule, he continues support for two new Alaska bridges -- one connecting Ketchikan to its airport, another providing a shortcut from Anchorage across Knik Arm to land in the Matanuska-Susitna Borough.

"The state's bridges will be built. It's a matter of when," Young said. "I think we can build this one --the Knik crossing -- relatively soon. It is needed. The land necessary for growth in this state is needed across the inlet. It's a very short bridge. It's not a big project. But it's a project that created a lot of publicity because of (Hurricane) Katrina and, frankly, (Arizona Republican Sen.) John McCain, and they started this 'bridges to nowhere.' "

The investigations, the questioned spending and the dustups with colleagues have not changed his effectiveness, he said. Anyone who doesn't believe him doesn't know Congress, he said.

"You will find no one that does not respect me in the Congress," he said. "You may find some that don't like me. That doesn't bother me. You'll find some of them who are extremely loyal, on both sides of the aisle. I don't apologize for anything I've done as far as representing the state."

Even with Alaska Democrats smelling blood from the nicks inflicted by the media, Young said, he does not see himself as vulnerable in the 2008 election. Diane Benson, who ran against Young last year, and former Alaska Democratic Party chairman Jake Metcalfe have said they will run.

FBI - Stevens-1710

Young has won elections by 2,000 votes or less in the past.

He expects opponents to raise "all these cloudy questions," he said, but does not intend to stand idly and let them beat him up, he said.

"Have at it," he said. "They have never been in a race till they've been in a race with me."

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1711

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Young offers no apologies but warns his election challengers

SPEAKING UP: Investigations aside, he cautions critics "in a glass house."

By DAN JOLING
The Associated Press

(Published: August 8, 2007)

Rep. Don Young speaks in Anchorage. (AL GRILLO / The Associated Press)

Investigations dogging U.S. Rep. Don Young have not damaged his effectiveness in Congress, the Alaska Republican said Tuesday, and he warned challengers of consequences if they sling rocks during the campaign next year when he runs for a 19th term.

"Those that cast stones better damn well not live in a glass house," he said.

Young, 74, has made more headlines this year for his campaign practices, his ties to convicted felons and his famous temper than for his lawmaking.

Young is being investigated for connections to Veco Corp., the Anchorage-based company whose former top two executives have pleaded guilty to bribing Alaska state lawmakers.

A former aide to Young, Mark Zachares, pleaded guilty in April to conspiracy for accepting $30,000 of tickets from congressional influence peddler Jack Abramoff. Zachares left Young's staff in 2005.

Questions Tuesday on investigations were off limits, Young said.

"As far as commenting on anything concerning any of these investigations, I am not free at this time to comment," he said, adding, "Most of what you've read in the paper is, I think, journalism that's been really moving this constant curiosity along."

Former Veco chief Bill Allen held annual fundraisers for Young and public records show the congressman received $157,000 from Veco's employees and its political action committee between 1996 and 2006.

"Figure it out," Young said. "Ten years, $150,000, it's what, $20,000 or less a year? That's not very much money." He has no intention of returning Veco money as some other Alaska politicians have done.

CONGRESS VS. CAMPAIGN

FBI - Stevens-1712

Young draws a line between his actions as a congressman and the campaign.

"My campaign is separated from my office," he said. "Totally separated, totally divorced. I am the candidate, they are the campaign office."

He would not say why his campaign is spending nearly a quarter-million dollars to retain a Washington, D.C., law firm, Akin, Gump, Strauss Hauer & Feld, or even who his attorney within the firm is.

Apart from investigations, Young remains unapologetic for his actions.

Young inserted a $10 million earmark into a federal highway spending bill to study extension of a Florida highway that could benefit a builder who hosted a fundraiser for Young. The money was desired by local officials and he has compiled the press clips to show it, he said.

Just last week, he apologized to fellow Republicans for a harsh exchange with Rep. Scott Garrett, R-N.J., who -- unannounced to Young -- opposed a $33 million education appropriation for Alaska Natives. Young on the floor of Congress drew a wildlife analogy: "There is always another day when those who bite will be killed, too, and I am very good at that. Those that bite me will be bitten back."

His cause was correct, he said Tuesday.

"My job is to defend what happens in the state of Alaska for the people of the state of Alaska, and I did so. The results were good. ... I've always been one to be very forceful in the heat of battle. I have not changed, even in my maturity, because I don't have the prerogative of being weak in the halls of Congress."

And despite ridicule, he continues support for two new Alaska bridges -- one connecting Ketchikan to its airport, another providing a shortcut from Anchorage across Knik Arm to land in the Matanuska-Susitna Borough.

"The state's bridges will be built. It's a matter of when," Young said. "I think we can build this one --the Knik crossing -- relatively soon. It is needed. The land necessary for growth in this state is needed across the inlet. It's a very short bridge. It's not a big project. But it's a project that created a lot of publicity because of (Hurricane) Katrina and, frankly, (Arizona Republican Sen.) John McCain, and they started this 'bridges to nowhere.' "

The investigations, the questioned spending and the dustups with colleagues have not changed his effectiveness, he said. Anyone who doesn't believe him doesn't know Congress, he said.

"You will find no one that does not respect me in the Congress," he said. "You may find some that don't like me. That doesn't bother me. You'll find some of them who are extremely loyal, on both sides of the aisle. I don't apologize for anything I've done as far as representing the state."

Even with Alaska Democrats smelling blood from the nicks inflicted by the media, Young said, he does not see himself as vulnerable in the 2008 election. Diane Benson, who ran against Young last year, and former Alaska Democratic Party chairman Jake Metcalfe have said they will run.

Young has won elections by 2,000 votes or less in the past.

He expects opponents to raise "all these cloudy questions," he said, but does not intend to stand idly and let them beat him up, he said.

"Have at it," he said. "They have never been in a race till they've been in a race with me."

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1714

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Excerpts from Associated Press interview with Don Young

(Published: August 8, 2007)

Q. You've been in the news a lot lately for things other than making laws. Specifically, we'd like to ask you if you can talk about some of these things that we've not heard addressed before, like your relationship with Jack Abramoff.

A. As far as commenting on anything concerning any of these investigations, I am not free at this time to comment. Most of what you've read in the paper is, I think, journalism that's been really moving this constant curiosity along.

Q. Bill Allen's been in the news, and you've had some association with him. What can you tell us about that association? His employees have donated $150,000 over 10 years.

A. Figure it out. Ten years, $150,000. It's what, $20,000 or less a year. That's not very much money.

Q. Some state representatives have returned money to these people. Do you have any plans to do that?

A. No.

Q. There was a report that you paid back $38,000 to him for fundraising costs.

A. The campaign paid it back to him. I didn't pay it back.

Q. I guess I associate you with your campaign.

A. My campaign is separated from my office. Totally separated, totally divorced. I am the candidate; they are the campaign office.

Q. OK, can you explain why that was done?

A. I have no idea, I'm not a part of the campaign office. Let's not get too far away, because I can't really comment on the ongoing investigation by the federal people, agencies, so let's not go too far that way.

Q. OK. The Washington Post reports that your campaign has spent a little more than a quarter-million dollars in legal fees. Can you tell us what that is about?

A. No

FBI - Stevens-1715

Q. Is that because you don't know what it's being spent on?

A. I definitely said I wasn't going to comment on the expenditures. I'm not commenting, you know, I'm not going to comment. Now, don't keep fishing because I'm not going anywhere you're fishing.

Q. I'm trying to distinguish what areas you are willing to comment on.

A. I don't want to comment on that. It's public knowledge. What is it every three months. I know what the campaign has done as far as the legal fees go, but I'm not going to comment on what they're being spent for. It's all there, it's public knowledge.

Q.. I'd like to ask you about the incident with the representative from New Jersey on the House floor. I don't think you commented to Alaskans about it. Did you apologize to the gentleman?

A. I apologized to the group. It was a Republican study group, because I included them in my chastising. And you have to understand, I will say what I did was right for the state, was right for the Alaska Native population. That's a program that I helped instigate under the Bill Clinton administration. And it was a $33 million amount of dollars that they were trying to cut out, which to me was an affront, especially since they hadn't notified me that they were going to do so. And I will be the first to tell you that I was a little bit under stress. My wife has not been well. I was going into the hospital the next day, or two days later, for a prostate operation, and I may have gone overboard a little bit, but again, my job is to defend what happens in the state of Alaska for the people of the state of Alaska, and I did so. The results were good. ... You know, in the heat of battle, and I've always been one in the heat of battle to be very, very forceful. I have not changed, even in my maturity, because I don't have the prerogative of being weak in the halls of Congress.

Q. Let me ask you your assessment of two things: the investigations and your short temper that is well-known there — is that ultimately hurting the state?

A. No, no. People don't understand this, you know? I have found no weakness in the Congress at all. You will find no one who does not respect me in the Congress. You may find some that don't like me. That doesn't bother me.

Q. Your enthusiasm for the bridge project remains as high as ever?

A. The shortsightedness of this state, quite frankly, and the Congress, if they don't address the infrastructure issue, is to me, not thinking of the future at all. My bridges, if you want to call them my bridges — the state's bridges — will be built. It's just a matter of when. I think we can build this Knik crossing relatively soon. It is needed, the land necessary for the growth of this state is needed across the inlet. It's a very short bridge, it's not a big project. But it's a project that gained a lot of publicity because of Katrina and frankly, John McCain, and they started this "bridges to nowhere." ... There's never been a bridge built anywhere that didn't go somewhere.

Q. Do you think people Outside just don't get it about the bridges?

A. Most of them don't understand that it was not new money. It was money from the trust fund within the state's formula. They don't quite understand that. They think it's coming from the general treasury. And it's not coming out of the general treasury, it's coming out of a trust fund. We do get a larger share of it, but that's my role. If people have any ideas in this state that they don't need that, that they don't want it, then that's the prerogative of the state and they should speak up. This concept of earmarks, people don't understand this concept of earmarks either. They have this idea that earmarks are evil. Earmarks allow the elected representatives of a state or of a district to decide how money shall be spent instead of the bureaucracy.

FBI - Stevens-1716

Q. To the election, Democrats are smelling blood in the water. ...

A. According to the paper.

Q. Do you think you're vulnerable?

A. No. I think it's going to be a different race.

Q. How? A. It's different in the sense that it may be, we're no different from any other group of animals. You know, they look at me and they see me, I'm 74 years old, and they figure he's a little old, he's been wounded, he's been nicked by the media, and this is going to be interesting when this thing is all over, because then I want to see what people say, you know? They say oh, he's nicked, you know, we can get him. Well, have at it. They have never been in a race until they've been in a race with me. ... If the people decide somebody else can better do the job, then they'll elect somebody else. And it'll hurt for about 35 minutes. ... I don't understand people who want to be vindictive. 'I'm going to get you.' What are they going to get? I'm 35 years of service, and it's been an absolutely great joy, and I want to serve 36 and 37. And if that doesn't happen, that's the way it goes.

Q. Any idea what we're going to see differently?

A. Well, I think the standard thing will be raising all these cloudy questions. That's fine just remember; those that cast stones better damn well better not live in a glass house.

Q. You know stuff?

A. Let's put it this way, I'm not just going to sit and let everybody beat me up. It'll make for an exciting campaign.

Q. How's your health?

A. Good. I've had a prostate operation, and it's a little bit dicey, but I feel good, I work out, you know.

Q. Do you think you'll ever reach a point where, you've got your years in, you just want to kick back and take it easy?

A. There's two things. I can't say no to that. Probably not. I'll probably ...

Q. Die with your boots on?

A. Die with my boots on. Hopefully doing something for the people of Alaska. I have to say this: The thing that keeps me going is what I think I can do and my ability to learn something every day. You guys don't understand this but I get to meet great people — great Alaskans, non-Alaskans. I get to hear new ideas and new thoughts, and one thing I don't want to do, most people who retire die, quickly. I believe I can contribute.

Q. Without commenting on any investigation, are the feds going to eventually have to come around and say, this congressman did nothing wrong?

FBI - Stevens-1717

A. I have no idea. I don't know how they work. I really don't.

Q. From a commonsense point of view?

A. I would like to say that would happen but I have no knowledge. I don't know how they work, I have no understanding how things are done. I would like to think that someday it will all be cleared up.

Q. You can tell Alaska voters you did nothing wrong?

A. I'm not supposed to comment.

Q. You can't even say that?

A. I am not supposed to comment.

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1718

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Friendly crowd welcomes Stevens

BACK HOME: Senator defends earmarks, is mum on investigation.

By LISA DEMER and KYLE HOPKINS
Anchorage Daily News

(Published: August 8, 2007)

Supporters greet Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens on his way to a Rotary luncheon in anchorage where he spoke Aug. 7, 2007. (MARC LESTER / Anchorage Daily News)

Sen. Ted Stevens, center, walks away from reporters after speaking at the Anchorage Hilton Aug. 7, 2007. (MARC LESTER / Anchorage Daily News)

U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, on his first trip back to Alaska since FBI agents searched his Girdwood home last week, vigorously defended controversial budget earmarks on Tuesday before a large and welcoming hometown crowd.

But he refused to address questions from reporters before or after his speech about the renovation of his home, the ongoing federal investigation or earmarks that benefited his son, Ben, a former aide and their clients.

"I know you're interested in the items that have been in the media recently. I wish I could discuss those in detail. But to avoid any suggestion that I as a senator am attempting to influence an investigation by the Department of Justice, I simply cannot talk about it," he said at the start of his speech before The Anchorage Rotary Club at the Anchorage Hilton. He talked for more than 30 minutes, counting time for questions.

Federal investigators are looking into a 2000 construction project that doubled the size of Stevens' Girdwood home. Bill Allen, the former longtime CEO of Veco Corp., oversaw the work, and the investigation appears focused on whether any of it was an improper gift. Allen has pleaded guilty to bribing four state legislators, including Stevens' son, Ben, who has not been charged.

Stevens never mentioned the house project on Tuesday.

"I do think it's in the best interest of the state that this investigation proceeds, and I hope you'll understand what I've just said," he said.

SUPPORTERS TURN OUT

Well before the senator arrived, a few dozen people, many holding signs, gathered outside the Hilton at the invitation of state Republican Party leaders to show their support for Stevens. Some said they always make a point of thanking Stevens when he's in town.

"I've known him for 40 years," said Jane Niebergall of Anchorage, a retiree who worked in real estate, retail and publishing and as a Bush educator.

Her young grandson soon held her sign, which said: "I am happy to see you, Senator. Thank you for your hard work in Alaska." Scrawled in the margin: "A good man!"

194A-AN-13620-M;700

The investigation just makes her sad. Things are too muddy. "I do believe he's an honest man," Niebergall said.

Another longtime Alaskan, Frank Reed, a retired banker and early city leader who has lived here for 91 of his 94 years, called the investigation "a witch hunt."

Republicans have rallied for Stevens during congressional recesses as a group before, said Alaska Republican Party chairman Randy Ruedrich, who helped organize Tuesday's show.

The investigation, Ruedrich said, was "a very unfortunate attack at this time."

"There may be things wrong. I don't think the senator has done anything wrong. He's made comments to that effect and I believe him."

People shouldn't be too quick to judge Stevens, who has done so much for Alaska, said Marilyn Stewart, who held a sign that said "Well Done!"

"The FBI is doing their job but it doesn't signify that the senator has done anything wrong," Stewart said.

Carl Marrs, the former head of Cook Inlet Region Inc. and part of a group of influential Alaskans who have owned race horses with Stevens, showed up at the rally too.

Just after noon, Stevens pulled up in a white Chevy Tahoe owned by his campaign committee.

"Hello, Senator!" a fan called out. "Welcome home!"

"It is nice to be home," Stevens answered.

"So many people to hug around here," he added as he made his way through the crowd.

After that warm greeting, Stevens walked briskly, brushing off reporters as he made his way to the hotel ballroom. There another friendly crowd waited to hear him speak. The Rotarians greeted him with a standing ovation and sang "God Bless America."

At least twice on Tuesday, Stevens turned as if to respond to reporters who fired off questions. Aides jumped in and moved him along.

Jonathon Lack, an Anchorage attorney, state Republican Party officer and former Stevens aide, introduced the man whom he said everyone knows as "Uncle Ted."

When Lack worked for Stevens as a young staffer, he sometimes had the task of escorting the senator to morning meetings, he told the audience. As he waited one morning, Stevens' cat Tigger was tormenting a tiny shrew. Lack said he tried to get the cat to stop and finally resorted to nudging it with his foot. It may have looked like he was kicking the cat -- just as the senator stepped outside.

Stevens let loose. "Don't kick the goddamn cat!" Lack tried to explain about the shrew. Stevens wouldn't have it. "He's doing his job. Maybe I should kick you every time you do your job."

The audience roared.

But that's what it's like being a U.S. senator, Lack told them.

"People kick you when you do your job and after you get kicked, you go right back to it, doing the work you were elected to do."

IRAQ, EARMARKS

Audience members were too polite to ask about the federal investigation, sticking instead to topics such as Iraq and the Denali Commission.

Here's what Stevens said about Iraq:

"What we'd like to see and what we dream of is a democratic Iraq in the center of the Middle East that will help stabilize that area for us. I'm one who believes that we're facing a new crusade, a crusade of a different type, by the militant Islamic extremists."

Stevens spent much of his time itemizing the wealth of federal spending and programs that he has secured for Alaska.

Some of the earmarks benefited his son, former state Senate President Ben Stevens, and a former aide, Trevor McCabe, and their clients.

He never mentioned those.

"I don't like the word 'earmark,'" Stevens told the crowd. Earmarks are just amendments to appropriations bills, he said.

"We don't add to the budget. And if ... I don't earmark these monies for Alaska, your taxes aren't going to go down. The money will simply go to other states for their needs and ours will go unmet," he told the packed room of movers and shakers.

Earmarks have been criticized for being hastily inserted with little accountability to the public.

But the senator said that the real question about earmarks is whether elected leaders or "employees in the bowels of some office" are better suited to decide where federal money should be sent.

"So I ask you, is it wrong for a village in rural Alaska to want help with providing running water when places like New York City get millions in federal funds for their water projects?"

LISTS HIS ACHIEVEMENTS

Stevens reeled off project after project that he brought to Alaska. Lighting for the many Alaska airports that had none. Upgrading Anchorage's 911 system. Restoring urban fisheries. Money for local communities to fight wildfires as they best saw fit. Money for youth courts. And much more.

He pointed to military expansion worth millions to Alaska: the Stryker brigade, the new F-22 fighter jets coming to Elmendorf Air Force Base, multiforce training at Eielson.

"Alaska will in fact be the key to the defense in coming decades," Stevens said.

Critics called a recent appropriation for firefighting in Anchorage "a waste of money," Stevens said. "I call it good government."

"Without our seniority, and I say this categorically, Alaska's share will go down," Stevens said.

Stevens said his role is simple.

"I believe I was sent there to do the best I can to get the money to meet the needs of this state."

The crowd clapped.

Stevens ended his talk defiantly:

"I'm proud of the job I've been able to do ... working for you and with you every day, regardless of the slings and arrows I face attacking what I've tried to do for Alaska and Alaskans."

The standing ovation went on for half a minute.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390. Read Kyle Hopkins' political blog at adn.com/alaskapolitics. Reporter Richard Mauer contributed to this story.

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1722

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Letters to the editor

(Published: August 8, 2007)

The honorable Lisa is a victim

I do not think the honorable Sen. Lisa Murkowski is guilty of anything except taking advantage of a bargain offered by a friend, which any of us has the right to do.

I believe she is the victim of nit-picking and the hysteria of the moment.

---- Norman Griffin

Homer

European cities given too much ink in Daily News weather report

As a child, my parents encouraged me to read my hometown paper as a way to teach me something about geography and tell me about various parts of the world. Now, as a mother of two, I look to the Daily News as a means of introducing the world to my children. The weather report (back page of the Alaska section) is a great place to start, but I'm disappointed in the "World Cities" list.

European cities account for almost 37 percent of the "World Cities" listed, but Europe accounts for only 11 percent of the world's population. By contrast, China and India make up 20 percent and 16 percent of the world's population, respectively, yet they account for only 4 percent of your list. Worse still, Asia, which makes up about 60 percent of the world's population, is represented as only 14 percent of the "World Cities" list.

The "World Cities" list is more than a weather report; it's a concrete connection to our diverse world and a reflection of countries we think are important. Asia is of increasing economic and geopolitical significance in the world and for Alaska; the Daily News should recognize this.

-- Shawnalee Whitney

Anchorage

FBI - Stevens-1723

Police ignore homeless drunks

What is going on with our homeless population? Apparently nothing. They are allowed to walk around drunk, on drugs or any other way they should feel like. And what is being done? Nothing. You call the cops for them almost hitting you and the cops don't do anything.

What is wrong with that picture? Anyone else tries to swing at you and you call the cops, that person gets charged with assault. Why not the homeless drunk people?

194A-AN-13620-M,701

---- Rae Tomlin

Anchorage

Gun packing 'mentally healthy' are the ones who need watching

I had to chuckle at the July 17 article about Anchorage lawmaker Les Gara's proposal on gun control regarding mentally ill patients.

Have we all gone mad? It is apparently obvious that our "mentally healthy" need no help whatsoever from the mentally ill when it comes to gunning down one another in record numbers. According to the Special Committee on Gun Violence, in 2003 there were an estimated 30,000 firearm-related deaths in the United States.

The irony is that most violent crimes are committed not by the mentally ill, but by testosterone-fueled young men, who consider gun ownership a rite of passage into manhood.

Violence breeds more violence, and more guns on the streets equate to increased violence. The Special Committee on Gun Violence goes on to say that the rate of death from firearms in the United States is eight times higher than its economic counterparts in other countries. Hardly a sobering thought!

Let's get real. The simple truth is that we love to pack some heat. It's an image that most Americans are proud to portray and one in which Hollywood wantonly personifies. Unfortunately, this image is costing lives.

Since many of those reading this letter will consider me crazy for not packing some heat, maybe Gara does have a good point after all.

-- Danny Kilanowski

Wasilla

Many thanks to those who cleaned up graffiti at Susitna Elementary

On May 25 I discovered extensive graffiti spray-painted on the backside of our Susitna Elementary School. This was the worst public display of obscenity and graphic vulgarity that I had ever seen. Anchorage police agreed: These were deplorable actions.

I want to thank our school's business partner since 1994, Carrs Muldoon -- specifically manager Mike Miller -- for providing the key evidence to apprehend the vandals ("Three more teens arrested in vandalism at elementary school," July 19). I also want to thank our Neighborhood Watch program, the Anchorage School District security team, and ASD's school resource officers for collaborating with Carrs' security team. This was certainly an example of the private and public sectors working together for a positive outcome for our East Anchorage community.

Anchorage school and business partnerships make our community stronger and set good examples for our young people.

I am glad that the district will seek restitution for the expense of repairing the vandalism. District paint crews worked diligently to clean the damage. But, I also wish to recognize that most of our Anchorage youths are helpful and contributing community members. I can only hope that now, anticipating the court's severe consequences and through fulfilling rigorous community service -- these teens will turn their lives toward a better direction.

---- Paul Wieneke, principal

Susitna Elementary School

Anchorage

Just a few questions regarding the work being done by our FBI

Several Alaska legislators are being accused of numerous felonies of conspiracy, bribery, etc.

Despite what political affiliation one has, think:

Why are our legislators being targeted by the FBI?

Are other states having their legislators targeted like ours?

Why are the ones targeted connected to oil concerns?

Does some power person who doesn't want development have a friend in the FBI?

The FBI built an office building in Anchorage a while back. Before that we did not have these problems?

Is this the FBI having to justify the new building or their jobs?

If the rest of the trials turn out like the first one, Tom Anderson's, then it appears being innocent on some or all charges does not matter?

Is this about the FBI not being able to lose face? According to the news, the FBI apparently harassed witnesses for Tom Anderson, why?

What is really going on here?

If it can happen to them it can happen to you or me?

---- Linda Chandler

Wasilla

Checkers is more complicated than at first it would seem

Obviously a U.S. senator who doesn't understand the difference between Richard Nixon's cocker spaniel and the Alaska insider land deal of the century should have at least sought the advice of a proper Camp Cupcake alum before doing it. People who don't play checkers well should not be trusted to play this country's highest level of speech-making chess.

-- Robert Lee

Anchorage

FBI - Stevens-1725

Interchange project will improve Mountain View and Russian Jack

In response to the Alaska notebook that appeared July 25 on the editorial page ("Why cheer this?"): First, we are not South Mountain View, but Russian Jack, as we have been for 30 years. This is defined in the Anchorage Municipal Code (chapter 2.40). We also have our own Anchorage police substation (donated by a concerned citizen). Incidentally, the Daily News is located in Airport Heights.

Second, the interchange and ultimately the highway-to-highway connection will speed commuters through Anchorage, taking them off Bragaw Street, Debarr Road and Mountain View Drive, making these streets safer and less congested. As Mayor Mark Begich said at the ground-breaking, the highway-to-highway project will remove 60,000 vehicles a day from local surface streets.

Third, the interchange project will include a safer way for our children to go to Clark Middle School, without climbing the old pedestrian overpass and being intimidated by transients. The new path will even allow them to ride their bicycles to school, thus offering more exercise opportunity.

Finally, we do hope that the reduction in commuter traffic on local streets and easier pedestrian travel will bring the Mountain View and Russian Jack communities closer.

---- Edward Leach, president

Russian Jack Park Community Council

Anchorage

Stop protecting Mayor Begich; he's biggest power abuser of all

The ethics problems of the Republicans are headlines: What about the one right in front of you? Only power reveals ethics problems. Maybe the News will stop protecting the biggest abuser of all, Mayor Mark Begich. Look at the Glenn Square deal. Look at taxes and MUSA (Municipality Utilities Service Assessments). Look at the Muldoon Wal-Mart. Look at the convention center. Begich helps his friends on a regular basis, but we don't hear a word about it. Why doesn't the Daily News tell us a little about some of the mayor's property that he has sold fairly recently?

The FBI needs to look at all of these politicians who trade their political power for personal gains. Power creates corruption, not party affiliation. Come on, Daily News, report all the facts, not just those with your political agenda in mind.

---- Judd Walker

Anchorage

Health care in U.S. is atrocious

It is absolutely crucial that the American people residing here in the United States are taken care of before any other country in the world. The medical care the taxpaying citizens of this nation are receiving is atrocious. Help us all now.

---- Dr. Louis Garding

Moose Pass

FBI - Stevens-1726

<<Back

Public corruption probe expanding?

Sokol says he plans to submit a bid to build an Alaska natural gas pipeline under the new Gasoline Inducement Act. (KTUU-TV)

The charging document suggests then VECO CEO Bill Allen discussed the pending Petroleum Profits Tax with former Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch. (KTUU-TV)

Gov. Palin has called a special session for October 18 to reconsider the Petroleum Profits Tax. (KTUU-TV)

Scott Heyworth with Alaska Natural Gas Authority said Sokol's statements are very powerful. (KTUU-TV)

by Bill McAllister
Friday, Aug. 10, 2007

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- The CEO of a major energy company is speculating that the public corruption probe in Alaska could extend to the North Slope producers.

One of the charging documents against former legislators says that a lobbyist for one of the producers did know something about an oilfield services company executive trying to manipulate a lawmaker last year.

The Petroleum News is reporting that David Sokol, CEO of MidAmerican Energy Holdings Company, believes it's possible that there could be criminal investigations and indictments that involve the major North Slope producers.

Sokol, whose company is a subsidiary of billionaire Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway, says he plans to submit a bid to build an Alaska natural gas pipeline under the new Gasline Inducement Act.

But according to the Petroleum News, Sokol says that plan could be derailed if the FBI's ongoing probes into public corruption in Alaska would, "Circle back to implicate any of the producers. If they do, our concern is the process might negatively impact a gas line project from a timing standpoint."

Scott Heyworth with Alaska Natural Gas Authority said Sokol's statements are bold.

"Those are some powerful statements by Mr. Sokol to say something like that. Something bruised MidAmerican for them to come out swinging, and that's a punch back," Heyworth said.

Heyworth has stayed heavily involved in natural gas issues since sponsoring a citizens' initiative in 2002 to create the Alaska Natural Gas Development Authority.

Heyworth said it appears Sokol has mixed motives in speculating about possible involvement of the producers in the scandal concerning oilfield services company VECO.

"He certainly has his own self interest because MidAmerican wants to bid on it, and I think the producers pretty much would like everybody else to go away. But he's putting out what he's heard. You'd have to say he's heard some rumors also, or something to that effect. Like we all have," Heyworth said. "I mean, a number of us up here have been hearing those rumors, but they're just rumors, you know. I have no insight into the

FBI - Stevens-1727

194A-AN-13620-M-7D2

MidAmerican becomes the latest entity to raise the question of what the big three producers knew. (KTUU-TV) grand jury, and I don't think you do either or anyone in Alaska; it's a pretty secret thing, I believe."

But there is more than rumors.

The charging document against former Reps. Bruce Weyhrauch and Pete Kott, who are accused of bribery, extortion and other felonies, includes references to a conversation between a vice president of VECO and a lobbyist for one of the producers that occurred on or about May 25, 2006.

The document suggests that then VECO CEO Bill Allen discussed the pending Petroleum Profits Tax with Weyhrauch the night before.

According to the government's case, the VECO vice president told a lobbyist for one of the oil producers that Allen said the relationship with Weyhrauch was 'going well,' that VECO was keeping Weyhrauch in a good place, and that 'Bruce will be good.'

A spokesman for BP declined comment, and officials of ConocoPhillips and Exxon Mobil could not be immediately reached for comment.

Allen and former VECO Vice President Rick Smith have pleaded guilty to bribing legislators, and three former lawmakers await trial this fall.

And now MidAmerican becomes the latest entity to raise the question of what the big three producers knew, and when they knew it.

Coincidentally, tonight is the one-year anniversary of final passage of the Petroleum Profits Tax, which came at the conclusion of the Legislature's second special session of 2006.

Gov. Palin has called a special session for October 18 to reconsider that tax, in part because of what she considers the tainted process used to enact it.

Contact Bill McAllister at bmcallister@ktuu.com

WorldNow

All content © Copyright 2000 - 2007 WorldNow and KTUU. All Rights Reserved.
For more information on this site, please read our Privacy Policy and Terms of Service.

FBI - Stevens-1728

The New York Times

PRINTER FRIENDLY FORMAT SPONSORED BY

August 10, 2007

Like Father, Like Son, Even When They Are Under Suspicion

By PHILIP SHENON

WASHINGTON, Aug. 9 — Ben Stevens is often said by Alaskans to be the spitting image of his father, Senator Ted Stevens. They have the same broad forehead, wide-set eyes and compact physique. They share the same rough-hewn personality, seemingly always spoiling for a fight.

Now, father and son share a new, unwelcome distinction. Both are under investigation by the Justice Department over their ties to an Alaska businessman who has confessed to bribing public officials.

The Alaska home of Ted Stevens, the longest-serving Republican in the Senate, was raided last week by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. His son's offices in the Alaska Legislature — he was a state senator until this year — were raided last summer.

Neither Ted Stevens, who is 83, nor Ben Stevens, 48, a fisherman turned politician and lobbyist who is the youngest of the senator's three sons, has been charged with a crime.

But in court papers in May in which he admitted to bribery, the Alaska businessman, Bill J. Allen, acknowledged making $243,000 in possibly illegal payments to a state lawmaker identified only as "Senator B." Although he denies wrongdoing, Ben Stevens, who has acknowledged receiving about $243,000 in consulting fees from Mr. Allen's oil-services firm, has not disputed that he is "Senator B."

It is undeniable that Ben Stevens has earned hundreds of thousands of dollars in consulting fees from companies and industry groups that have been the recipients of huge federal grants steered to Alaska by his father in recent years.

Prosecutors are now investigating whether Senator Stevens directed money to projects that benefited his son's lobbying clients. Until Democrats took control of the Senate this year, Senator Stevens had been chairman of the Appropriations Committee, which determines how the federal budget is actually spent.

People with knowledge of the investigation, speaking on condition of anonymity because of grand jury secrecy, say the F.B.I. is reviewing Senator Stevens's involvement in millions of dollars in earmarks to fishing and seafood companies that his son represented, as well as a $1.6 million appropriation to an Alaska marine sciences center to buy land owned by one of his son's business partners.

The story of the Stevens family is central to the rough-and-tumble history of Alaska politics — the elder Stevens entered the Senate in 1968, a decade after Alaska was granted statehood — and the latest chapter has its elements of tortured family drama.

Many Alaskans have been left wondering whether it was a doting, fiercely ambitious father who brought the son under the suspicion of criminal investigators, or an intemperate, boastful son who entangled his aging father in the Justice Department's fast-growing investigation.

194A-AN-13620-M;708

"Tragedy is a pretty powerful word, but, yes, it applies," said Jack Roderick, a former law partner of Ted Stevens who was mayor of Anchorage in the 1970s.

Mr. Roderick said he suspected that Ben Stevens's tough-as-nails political style might help explain why his father had found himself under federal scrutiny. Mr. Roderick described Ted Stevens as "a father with a son who may have overstepped the bounds."

Ben Stevens's criminal defense lawyer, John Wolfe, said it might be precisely the opposite — that his client had come under unfair scrutiny by prosecutors because he is the son of a powerful senator with many adversaries. In Alaska, Mr. Wolfe said, "many people view life through a prism that is decidedly anti-Stevens."

Mr. Allen, the businessman at the center of the investigation, and Senator Stevens have been business partners in recent years; they were co-owners of a racehorse. But according to local news media reports, witnesses before a federal grand jury say that what appears to have attracted the attention of prosecutors is Mr. Allen's unusual role in renovating the Stevens family home in Girdwood, the house that was raided last week.

Contractors were instructed to forward their bills for the renovation, which more than doubled the size of the house, to Mr. Allen's oil-services business, VECO, not to the senator. Mr. Stevens has insisted that he paid every bill that was forwarded to him; he said those bills totaled about $130,000. The question before prosecutors is whether Mr. Allen paid some of the renovation costs in exchange for legislative favors.

Since the F.B.I. raid on his office last year, Ben Stevens has mostly stopped talking to reporters. But in the past, he had denied in interviews that he owed his success as a state politician and business consultant — under state law, he was allowed to do both simultaneously — to his father's influence in Washington.

"I've been living with it my whole life," he was quoted as telling The Anchorage Daily News in 2002. "There's nothing I can do to get rid of him as my dad."

Those comments came in response to financial disclosure forms filed by Mr. Stevens in the State Senate and other documents made public that year that revealed he had been paid more than $715,000 in salary and bonuses for three years' work on the 2001 Special Olympics World Winter Games in Anchorage.

The effort to bring the Special Olympics to Alaska had been a pet project of his father in Washington, and from his post on the Appropriations Committee, Senator Stevens helped steer millions of dollars in federal money to support the competition for mentally disabled athletes; the 2001 games were mostly underwritten by federal taxpayers.

After the games, Ben Stevens received two consulting and fund-raising contracts from Special Olympics, the Washington organization that oversees the games. The contracts were worth a total of $36,000. The larger contract was for $4,000 a month over a six-month period in 2001.

There is no evidence that his work for the Special Olympics has drawn any sort of scrutiny by investigators.

But the generosity of his pay package for a nonprofit event, and Mr. Stevens's subsequent consulting contracts with Special Olympics, drew strong criticism in Alaska and seemed to demonstrate how the younger Mr. Stevens had capitalized on his father's influence on Capitol Hill.

Jerry McBeath, a professor of political science at the University of Alaska in Fairbanks, said Ben Stevens was seen in the state as someone whose success was due largely to his bloodline: "What he has done in life has had less to do with native ability than with the fact that he's the son of a very powerful United States senator."

Ted Stevens, whose spokesmen in Washington did not return phone calls for comment this week, have said in the past that he had nothing to do with his son's appointment to the Special Olympics organizing committee or his pay for the 2001 games.

Leslie Aun, a Special Olympics spokeswoman, said the Anchorage games were considered "an extraordinary and wonderful event." Mr. Stevens was hired and paid by the local organizing committee, Ms. Aun said, adding, "We didn't have any role in that."

Ms. Aun said Mr. Stevens had been a valuable paid consultant to her group after the games and helped organize a major fund-raising drive.

Copyright 2007 The New York Times Company

Privacy Policy | Search | Corrections | RSS | First Look | Help | Contact Us | Work for Us | Site Map

FBI - Stevens-1731

adn.com

AP story on Young

Posted by Alaska_Politics
Posted: July 24, 2007 - 6:21 pm

The Associated Press has moved this story ...

Wall Street Journal: Rep. Young under criminal investigation

The Associated Press

U.S. Rep. Don Young is under criminal investigation, the second member of Alaska's congressional delegation to be part of a federal corruption probe, a newspaper reported.

Young is being investigated for his alleged ties to VECO Corp., the Anchorage-based company whose former top two executives -- including former CEO Bill Allen -- have pleaded guilty to bribing Alaska state lawmakers, the Wall Street Journal, citing anonymous sources, reported on its Web site late Tuesday.

Investigators are trying to determine whether Young or U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens took bribes, illegal gratuities or unreported gifts from VECO, the newspaper reported, citing only "people close to the case."

A message left by The Associated Press late Tuesday at Young's Washington, D.C., office was not immediately returned.

The Daily News could not independently verify the story.

Stevens has continually declined to comment on the corruption investigation, which involves the FBI and the U.S. Justice Department.

The Wall Street Journal said Allen held fundraisers called "the Pig Roast" for Young every August for 10 years. Public records show Young received $157,000 from VECO employees and its political action committee between 1996 and 2006.

Young, a Republican, amended campaign-finance filings earlier this year to reflect $38,000 in payments to Allen, the Journal reported. The refunds were labeled "fundraising costs" in documents filed with the Federal Election Commission.

Young has spent more than $250,000 of his campaign contributions on legal services since he put a Washington, D.C., law firm on retainer this year, according to recent regulatory filings.

As part of a widening corruption probe, the FBI is looking closely at a 2000 construction project that more than doubled the size of Stevens' home in the ski resort community of Girdwood, about 40 miles south of Anchorage.

A contractor who did work on the house has said he was directed to send bills to VECO. The contractor said someone at the company would examine them for accuracy before sending them to Stevens, the longest serving Republican in Senate history.

"Federal agencies have conducted a broad ranging investigation in Alaska for almost a year. I believe this investigation should proceed to its conclusion without any appearance that I have attempted to influence its outcome," Stevens said in a written statement issued last week. "I will continue this policy of not commenting on this investigation until it has concluded."

"I urge Alaskans not to form conclusions based upon incomplete and sometimes incorrect reports in the media," Stevens said. "The legal process should be allowed to proceed so that all the facts can be established and the truth determined."

Allen and another former VECO executive, Rick Smith, have pleaded guilty to extortion and bribery related to their dealings with state legislators. They are said to be cooperating with investigators. No sentencing date has been set.

Alaska Politics

Kyle Hopkins covered the 2006 campaign for governor and is covering the Palin administration's transition. Before joining the Daily News in 2005, he was a writer for the Anchorage Press and the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner. E-mail him at khopkins@adn.com.

Archive : The Trail 2006 campaign blog

Archive

Ethics complaint over Murkowski-Penney deal - 7/25/2007 4:24 pm
What to do with the WSJ story - 7/25/2007 3:39 pm
AP story on Young - 7/24/2007 10:21 pm
Taxes - 7/24/2007 8.55 pm
Wall Street Journal: Young under criminal investigation - 7/24/2007 7:32 pm
Tax exemption? (UPDATED) - 7/23/2007 8:40 pm
Palin headed to Kuwait - 7/23/2007 2:16 pm
'Dreaming of Alaska?' - 7/23/2007 2:15 pm
Rumbles - 7/20/2007 8:39 pm
Letter to Metcalfe - 7/20/2007 8:36 pm
City: Marlow's power plant, plus upgrading Assembly chambers - 7/20/2007 5:29 pm
(UPDATED) Dittman poll: Businesses, milk, global warming - 7/20/2007 3.21 pm
Murkowski in the spotlight - 7/20/2007 10:46 am
Round-up - 7/19/2007 10:06 am
What to do about homeless - 7/18/2007 3:16 pm
Roll Call on Young - 7/18/2007 10:59 am
Tesche - 7/18/2007 10:31 am
Special session and capital creep - 7/17/2007 0:14 pm
Poop update - 7/17/2007 7:54 pm
(UPDATED) AP on Stevens - 7/17/2007 6:27 pm
Wrong number - 7/17/2007 3:20 pm
Wes Keller to replace Kohring - 7/17/2007 12:54 pm
full archive »

Alaska's Top Jobs all 79 top jobs

Health Care Services
Physician
Kodiak Area Native Association

Accounting/Banking/Finance
Accounts Receivable Technician
Alutiiq, LLC

Management/Professional
Corporate and Foundation Relations Manager
University of Alaska Fairbanks

Construction/Skilled/Trades
Project Manager
Company Confidential

Accounting/Banking/Finance
Accounting Manager
Company Confidential

careerbuilder

Search Jobs □ | Place an employment ad

FBI - Stevens-1732

194A-AN-13620-M;704

Three former Alaska lawmakers charged with bribery will face trial later this year.

Meanwhile, the state's junior senator, Republican Lisa Murkowski, has come under scrutiny by watchdog groups for allegedly benefiting from a questionable land deal. She and her husband purchased a prime piece of property on the banks of the Kenai River at about $100,000 below market price. The land was purchased from the lot's adjacent neighbor and longtime Murkowski friend, Bob Penney, who also is a friend and a longtime business associate of Stevens.

Penney, who recently testified before a federal grand jury in the Stevens' investigation, said he was satisfied with the sale to Murkowski and her husband and received three times more than he paid for the property.

add new comment

11 July 25, 2007 - 2:06pm | Stags_Leap more Lisa Murkowski problems has anyone looked into the "financing" of the Penney-gate land deal? She reportedly got a sweetheart 39 year mortgage from a bank. Just so happens Lisa is a former board member of this bank.

A 39 year mortgage is extremely extremely rare. Banks just don't do them. So why did she get one? She is a U.S. Senator and a former board member of that bank. And this is another GIFT she should have disclosed to the FEC -which she did not.

reply »

July 25, 2007 - 4:00pm | tomtom

Stags,

It has been common practice for the past few years for financial insititutions to offer terms up to 40 years here in Alaska. In other countries, they are issuing multi-generational mortgages and in other states they are issuing mortgages up to 50 years.
Please check with Alaska USA, they talk about the 40 year mortgage on their website.

reply »

10 July 25, 2007 - 12:53pm | bobbys_place

Alaska Newspapers ducking political hot potatos

What happened to good old investigative reporting by Alaska Newspapers? What happened is that LM, DY and TS have the ability to call people who run large amounts of advertising in the Daily News and Fairbanks News Miner (and TV and radio stations) and get them to call the media and say,"hey I didn't like that story about my favorite crooked politician, how about I pull my ads from your newspaper/radio/TV" and instead of putting integrity and journalist ethics above dollars, the media gets gun shy and will only run stories that have already been reported by the lower 48 media, so they have an excuse when their customer calls complaining about the "attack" on the crooks we have elected. The Daily News is as crooked as LM, DY and TS, because they ignore what is going on in, because reporting it is not in their own $elf intere$t.

reply »

July 25, 2007 - 1:45pm | chilcoot

Garbage

The post above by "bobbys_place" is pure garbage. The Daily News has the Pulitzers to prove it. The Daily News has been all over the corruption of prominent Alaska politicians, and has been for years. Ask John Lindauer, George Jacko, Ben Stevens, Ralph Seekins, Scott Ogan, Jerry Ward, Jim Zawacki, Lin Garrison, Vic Kohring, Al Veazy, Pete Kott, Bruce Weyrauch, Ramona Barnes, and Dave Donley. That the Daily News is not presently leading in investigating Don Young's problems is hardly evidence that the Daily News is not trying. Good grief, what an uninformed post.

reply »

July 25, 2007 - 1:28pm | heyworth

correct

you nailed it.

reply »

9 July 25, 2007 - 11:50am | fishwrapper

Big Don

If Don goes to trial, I hope he takes the stand! We'd be in for a !@#$%&*$ Fest! Can't wait to see the judges face.

reply »

8 July 25, 2007 - 11:34am | Stags_Leap

Campaign funds for Legal Defense

USA Today has a good article in the 5/17/07 edition, called: 'Campaign funds going to legal fees.' That gives some good background on the issue. Someone kindly put up an html link to it...please.

reply »

7 July 25, 2007 - 9:29am | leowassilie

November 2006

If I remember right, didn't Diane Benson receive 40% of the vote last time?
You see, our state is progressive.

reply »

July 25, 2007 - 1:39pm | heyworth

Being used

The Dems used Diane last time by luring her in to run against Young to "soften" him up for "their guy" in '08.
They won't support her at all in this coming Primary.
Just watch which big name D files.
Need I even give the first 4 names?
She won't have a chance.
No support at all.
Sorry DB. It's what they do to folks like you.
Don't waste your time.
I know.

reply »

July 25, 2007 - 3:29pm | leowassilie

FBI - Stevens-1733

i gotcha
Not really trying to point out her as a potential candidate more than to point out that Alaskan's are actually progressing away from electing Don Young.
reply »

6 July 25, 2007 - 9:19am | leowassilie

Kenai's Murky River
It doesn't matter how much money Penney earned.
The COST of the property is a historical figure that means little to the prospective buyer, and is the measure from which to pay capital gains tax from the owner. The ONLY thing that matters here is the Fair Market Value, since LM was the buyer. The FACT he did receive three times more than he paid for the property is a great indicator the property is undervalued from borough assessments.
reply »

5 July 25, 2007 - 8:51am | chilcoot

This Can't Be True
No way is Don Young corrupt. He's pure as the driven snow.
Why, just last week, I saw him walk by an old woman and not shove her to the ground.
I've heard he can go weeks without tackling an environmentalist, binding him in duct tape, and setting him alight in whale oil.
Don Young reeks of integrity. Because that's what integrity does. It reeks. No way is he corrupt.
reply »

4 July 25, 2007 - 7:47am | nickolas

a joyous day or it would be, if this was of any real consequence, shamefull on one side, but well needed to be done, on the other however the buck doesn't stop there, and nothing will come of any of this, personaly to I it looks more like an illusion of pretend adjucation of justice to give the public a hope pf trust in some agency that has no office or Officers. One could always hope though this will continue, of course to do so would litigate the Alaska Court system as well, which doesn' seem to be the intent, since knowone ever wants to eliminate all players.
reply »

3 July 25, 2007 - 7:41am | Stags_Leap question on Lisa Murkowskii land deal

Duke Cunningham's original criminal problems started with defense contractor Mitchell Wade paying Cunningham $1.675 million for the congressman's Del Mar Heights home in late 2003. Wade then sold it 11 months later for $975,000 ---- resulting in a $700,000 loss.
So why is it ethical for Lisa to underpay for a prime piece of property owned by Penney, which gives her an immediate $150K-$200K in equity, which she didn't disclose to the FEC?
reply »

July 25, 2007 - 9:26am | ilovelucy

Question that hasn't been asked
Did Lisa sell her Anchorage home for the assessed value or market price? From what I could tell from the city property site, she sold it for $405,270 and it was assessed at 325,400 in 2005 and $344,400 in 2006 (when the sale was recorded - however, the 2005 assessment might have been current when she actually sold the place). Why would she know enough to ask more than the assessed value and yet seem so clueless when it comes to property purchases on the Kenai?
Even if it's a rhetorical question, the ADN should've asked it. They should actually report the news sometimes, not just respond to it after national groups do it.
reply »

July 25, 2007 - 7:57am | TheSdog

Stags
If LM turned around and sold it now for 400K or something along those lines you might have a point.
Then again, this transaction is going the other way.
You also need the smoking gun of what exactly LM did for Penny in exchange for money. That was clearly demarcarted in the Cunningham case.
reply »

2 July 24, 2007 - 11:25pm | alambernakis

Where is the ADN?
Here is yet another example of the outside media reporting stories that more appropriately should be done by the ADN. What is the matter with our local paper? Why are so many significant news stories about the questionable conduct of our Congressional delegation being originally reported by others? The Lisa Murkowski story came from talkingpointsmemo. This story came from the Wall Street Journal. The story about Don Young returning campaign contributions came from Roll Call (and by the way only was posted on this blog and has never been the subject of a story in the ADN). The ADN's failure to adequately cover our Congressional delegation is as embarrasing as Don Young's speech about Alaska's biting and fighting minks.
reply »

July 25, 2007 - 1:03am | shasta2

RETURNING CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS
The congressmen Young received campaign contributions and for some reason and for what reason did he say he was not needing them? Really, Did he just return $35,000.00 or whatever amount? Why did Bubba just turn around and give a refund? The house of cards etc. I am afraid is coming down.. Perhaps the jets won't be flying as the money was already spent by the old man but a lot of legislatures I bet will be packing up ready to drive south..
reply »

1 July 24, 2007 - 10:51pm | adnak

Who isn't under investigation?
How sweet it is, the Trifecta!
Stevens, Boss Young, Murky Jr., I'm so proud of our state.
And let's not forget Ben, half of the Juneau legislature, and lots of fishing industry leaders all waiting for jailtime too!
And after the Bridge to Mars ridicule, we can kiss the federal buck$$$ away. No more easy money for Alaska for years.
All these folks are going down, was all the power we gave them all these years worth it?
We are the laughing stock of America-those bozos in Alaska.
We and Sarah better drive some real world deals on our part of the oil and gas. If we continue to give our fair share away, and lose our accustomed chunk of the federal purse, I can see lots of families having to leave the state.
No federal largesse, a reduction in big ticket infrastructure funding, this state is going to be hurting for a long time.
I hope all these folks end up in prison for awhile, because their not welcome in Alaska anymore.
Thanks, all you selfish, scurvy, politicians.

FBI - Stevens-1734

You've done a great job ruining the future of a lot of hard working Alaskans.
reply »

© Copyright 2007, The Anchorage Daily News, a subsidiary of The McClatchy Company

Contact Us | Newsroom Contacts | Communication Forms | Subscriptions | Advertising | Terms of Use

Daily News Jobs | RSS Feeds | ADN Store | Newspapers in Education | Privacy Agreement

A member of the
Real Cities Network

FBI - Stevens-1735

washingtonpost.com

Timeline of Stevens Investigation Events

Advertisement

Tiger Woods gets it.

Kelly Ripa gets it.

By The Associated Press
The Associated Press
Tuesday, July 31, 2007; 1:44 PM

-- A timeline of Alaska Republican Sen. Ted Stevens' involvement in a federal investigation centered on VECO Corp., an Alaska-based oil field services and engineering company.

In May, one current and two former Alaska legislators pleaded not guilty to extortion and taking bribes to support legislation benefiting the company. Days later, Bill Allen, VECO founder and CEO, and a VECO vice president both pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers in exchange for votes favoring industry on oil legislation.

_ 2000: Renovations on Stevens' home in the ski resort community of Girdwood more than double the house's size. Allen oversaw the project. Contractors said they submitted bills to Allen, then received checks from Stevens.

_ Aug. 31 2006: The FBI raided the offices of Stevens' son, then Alaska Senate President Ben Stevens, along with the offices of several other state lawmakers in an investigation of VECO. The younger Stevens has not been charged.

_ May 25, 2007: Bob Persons, Stevens' friend and neighbor, was ordered to appear before a grand jury in Washington, the Anchorage Daily News reported. The government directed Persons to submit documents related to the work on Stevens' home in Girdwood, including work tied to VECO and contractors who were hired or supervised by VECO.

_ Summer 2007: Barbara Flanders, who serves as a financial clerk for Stevens on the Commerce Committee, testified before a federal grand jury joined by the IRS and the Interior Department. She provided documents regarding the senator's bills, according to an attorney in the case.

_ June 2007: Bob Penney, Alaska businessman and associate of Stevens, testified before a grand jury in Anchorage that has gathered information in the corruption cases.

_ June 7, 2007: The Washington Post reported that Stevens had hired lawyers and was instructed by the FBI to preserve records relevant to the burgeoning federal investigation.

_ July 2007: Stevens told The Associated Press that he's worried that a corruption investigation "could cause me some trouble" in running for re-election next year.

FBI - Stevens-1736

194A-AN-13620-D-705

_ July 17, 2007: Stevens filed his personal financial disclosure form after receiving a two-month extension to fix what he called a few simple technical errors. Stevens said every bill he and his wife received for renovations to their home was paid "with our own money."

_ July 30, 2007: FBI agents executed a search warrant at Stevens' Girdwood home, which included taking photos and training video cameras on the house. An attorney briefed on the raid said officials appeared particularly interested in cases of wine stored in the senator's house.

© 2007 The Associated Press

Ads by Google

10 Diet Rules That Work
Lose 9 Lbs in 11 Days with these 10 Easy Rules of Diet & Fat Loss.
www.FatLoss4Idiots.com

Lose Fat With Green Tea
Natural Way To Lose Weight Without Hunger. Get Your Free Trial Today!
justclickthislink.com

Stop Foreclosure Now
Exercise Your Homeowner Rights! Save Your Home and Credit History. www.advantagemitigation.com

adn.com

(UPDATED) FBI, IRS searching Stevens' Girdwood house

Posted by Alaska_Politics
Posted: July 30, 2007 - 10:38 am

I think this version of the Stevens story will be in tomorrow's paper ...

By RICHARD MAUER and ERIKA BOLSTAD
Anchorage Daily News

Federal law enforcement agents raided U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens' Alaska home in Girdwood on Monday, hauling off undisclosed items from inside and taking extensive pictures and video. Officials wouldn't say what they were looking for or what they found.

"All I can say is that agents from the FBI and IRS are currently conducting a search at that residence," Dave Heller, the assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Anchorage office said Monday.

Neighbors said agents showed up between 11 a.m. and noon, and that a commercial locksmith was called to open the front door. Some two dozen agents were still there at 9 p.m.

Stevens, 83, has long been the most powerful political figure in Alaska, and a major force in Congress. A swarm of federal agents serving a search warrant at his home is unprecedented in Alaska politics, and is part of what appears to be a widening corruption investigation that first burst into view last August. That's when agents raided the offices state legislators and the oil field services company Veco, among others.

Federal investigators and grand juries in Anchorage and Washington, D.C., have been seeking information about a remodeling project at Stevens' Girdwood home the occurred in 2000. The project, which more than doubled the size of the house, was overseen by Veco CEO Bill Allen. Two months ago, he pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers and agreed to cooperate with authorities.

Stevens said in a written statement that his lawyers were told Monday morning that federal agents "wished to search my home in Girdwood in connection with an ongoing investigation. I continue to believe this investigation should proceed to its conclusion without any appearance that I have attempted to influence its outcome. I will continue my policy of not commenting on this investigation until it has concluded."

subhead here

Throughout the afternoon Monday, agents could be seen coming and going from the house, on a dirt street below the Alyeska Ski Resort. Curtains were drawn much of the day, so it was impossible to know what was happening inside. But outside, agents could be seen taking extensive still and video images of the house and surrounding property. The agents were obviously cataloging the house and its fixtures, from light switches and electrical outlets to a big stainless steel barbecue grill on a second-floor deck that neighbors said was hoisted there with crane. At one point, agents climbed on the pitched metal roof to take pictures of heat tape in the gutter.

One agent could be seen carrying a full large black garbage bag out of the house, and put it in the white truck.

A half-dozen federal vehicles, including a white panel truck with a satellite dish on the roof, were parked in front of the house most of the day. At least 10 more federal vehicles were parked at the ski resort's day lodge a couple blocks away.

The commotion didn't attract much attention in laid-back Girdwood through the afternoon, though by evening quite a few people had made Stevens' street part of their evening dog-walking itinerary.

Agents at the house wouldn't answer questions. Heller, the FBI spokesman in Anchorage, directed other

Alaska Politics

Kyle Hopkins covered the 2006 campaign for governor and is covering the Palin administration's transition. Before joining the Daily News in 2005, he was a writer for the Anchorage Press and the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner. E-mail him at khopkins@adn.com.

Archive : The Trail 2006 campaign blog

Archive

Louisiana ... New Jersey ... Alaska? - 8/1/2007 3:28 pm
Capital keepers - 8/1/2007 3:13 pm
Too soon to jump? (UPDATED) - 8/1/2007 9:18 am
(UPDATED) FBI, IRS searching Stevens' Girdwood house - 7/30/2007 2:38 pm
Metcalfe versus Young - 7/30/2007 11:24 am
Welcome to Alaska. Here's $1,000 - 7/30/2007 10:38 am Updating Sunday's stories - 7/30/2007 10:27 am
Palin on the capital, special session - 7/27/2007 10:01 pm
Do send a fondue - 7/27/2007 12:41 pm
Murkowski to sell back Kenai property - 7/26/2007 10:39 am (UPDATED) Young: New Web site, Roll Call story - 7/26/2007 9:22 am Ramras bill - 7/26/2007 9:18 am
Pig roasts - 7/26/2007 8:30 am
Murkowski ethics complaint (UPDATED) - 7/25/2007 4:24 pm
What to do with the WSJ story - 7/25/2007 3:39 pm
AP story on Young - 7/24/2007 10:21 pm
Taxes - 7/24/2007 8:55 pm
Wall Street Journal: Young under criminal investigation - 7/24/2007 7:32 pm
Tax exemption? (UPDATED) - 7/23/2007 8:40 pm
Palin headed to Kuwait - 7/23/2007 2:16 pm
'Dreaming of Alaska?' - 7/23/2007 2:15 pm
Rumbles - 7/20/2007 8:39 pm
full archive »

Alaska's Top Jobs all 85 top jobs

Accounting/Banking/Finance
Accounting Tech II
Petro Products

Accounting/Banking/Finance
Bank Operations Manager
Northrim Bank

Construction/Skilled/Trades
Telecommunications Construction Supervisor
United Companies, Inc.

Engineering/Technical
Engineering Technical
Alutiiq International Solutions

Executive
President/CEO SouthEast Alaska Regional Health Consortium

careerbuilder

Search Jobs | Place an employment ad

Homes by Coldwell Banker more

23042 Myrtle Dr., Eagle River
Virtual Tour Available

15 of 15

Homescape

find

Search ADN Real Estate | Place a homes ad
Realtor Market Place | Valley Real Estate Guide

Top Rentals more

Continental Apartments
Midtown: Our property features lush landscaping in a quiet, peaceful environment.

11 of 12

apartments.com

FBI - Stevens-1738

194A-AN-13620-m;706

questions to the U.S. Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, which has been working with the FBI and two Anchorage-based assistant U.S. attorneys on the inquiry. A spokesman there had no comment, and neither did a spokesman for the IRS.

subhead here

Three contractors who worked on the remodeling project told the Daily News in May that their records had been subpoenaed by a federal grand jury, and others connected with the work and with Stevens said they had been interviewed or called to appear before a grand jury.

One of the contractors who worked on the job said he was hired by Veco CEO Bill Allen. The contractor said that his invoices were paid by Stevens and his wife, Catherine, but that the bills were reviewed first by Veco.

A federal law enforcement official, who spoke on the condition of not being identified by name, said the FBI is trying to determine whether Stevens has received a hidden benefit stemming from his position in Congress.

If Stevens received renovation work for which he did not play, it could be deemed unreported income by the IRS. Receipt of unreported renovation work also could amount to an illegal gratuity. Or if it were performed in return for political favors, it could be considered a bribe.

Two weeks ago, Stevens told reporters that money for the remodeling came out of his own pocket. "As a practical matter, I will tell you. We paid every bill that was given to us," Stevens told reporters. "Every bill that was sent to us has been paid, personally, with our own money, and that's all there is to it. It's our own money."The remodeling involved lifting the house on stilts and adding a first floor. City records show the 10-room dwelling has 2,471 square feet and is assessed at $440,900.

subhead here

Earlier this year, Stevens announced he planned to run for re-election in 2008 for another six-year term. Stevens' Washington, D.C., lawyer, Brendan Sullivan, said Monday that he had a "long standing practice not to comment on such matters" and would not answer any questions about the raid. Sullivan, one of the best-known criminal defense lawyers in Washington, represented former Lt. Col. Oliver North, the central figure in the Iran-Contra scandal in the late 1980s.

Earlier this summer, Stevens told the Washington Post that federal investigators had asked him to preserve certain documents as part of the Veco probe, and that he expected to eventually turn those documents over to the FBI. He told the Post that "my son is also under investigation." Stevens said then he had not been interviewed by federal investigators.

Four former state lawmakers have been charged with bribery and other crimes. One, former Anchorage Rep. Tom Anderson, was convicted earlier this summer of taking money from the lobbyist for a private prison company. The others, all accused of taking bribes from Veco executives, are awaiting trial. Allen and Smith are awaiting sentencing.

Last August, federal agents served more than 20 search warrants across the state, including at the offices of six state legislators, including Ted Stevens' son, Ben Stevens, who at the time was president of the state Senate. Ben Stevens has not been charged, but Allen's guilty plea in May described Veco paying him some $243,000 in phony "consulting" fees while he was in office.

The Wall Street Journal and Associated Press reported last week that Alaska's sole congressman, Rep. Don Young, is also being investigated as part of the Veco criminal inquiry. Young recently reported spending more than $260,000 from his campaign treasury on unspecified legal fees during the first six months of this year.

Richard Mauer reported from Girdwood and can be reached at rmauer@adn.com or 257-4345. Erika Bolstad reported from Washington and can be reached at ebolstad@adn.com. Greg Gordon of McClatchy Newspapers also contributed.

add new comment

21 August 1, 2007 - 9:25am | Stags_Leap

from CNN

Among the questions is how about $700,000 of nearly $4 million directed to the National Park Service wound up being paid to companies associated with Trevor McCabe, a former legislative director for Stevens, according to officials and others familiar with the deals.

The SeaLife Center got about a quarter of the $4 million and paid more than $500,000 for land next to it that belonged to a company owned by McCabe. The price was more than twice the land's appraised value. The center paid at least $200,000 more to a construction company in which McCabe was a managing partner to demolish a building on the land, which is now an open space in Seward's downtown.

Since the $50 million facility opened in 1998, it has proven to be one of Stevens' pet projects. Most of the public funding, or about $37 million, that went into building the SeaLife Center came from funds awarded to Alaska because of the 1989 Exxon Valdez oil spill.

FBI - Stevens-1739

Stevens also has steered at least $30 million toward the center's operations through the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, part of the Commerce Department. That money has gone to the Seward Association for the Advancement of Marine Science, which manages the center and began in 1988 as a lobbying group.

McCabe also was a business partner with Ben Stevens in a consulting firm that federal investigators are interested in. Calls for comment to Stevens' congressional office, McCabe and the SeaLife Center went unreturned. Marcia Blaszak, a spokeswoman for the National Park Service in Anchorage, Alaska, could not immediately be reached for comment.

The Exxon Valdez money -- partly administered by the Interior Department -- was intended to assist the SeaLife Center in restoring the damaged natural resources in the areas affected by the spill. But for the past five years, the center has done little new research in oil spill restoration.

"The Interior Department is seriously concerned that they are a party to misappropriation of a portion of the Exxon Valdez settlement," said John S. French, an environmental consultant in Seward and former member of a public advisory group on the settlement money. "My impression is that some people, not me, really started flagging the situation after the land sale by Trevor McCabe."

reply »

August 1, 2007 - 11:42am | jtgranger

Didn't Exxon invent the Stevens special "Secret Backroom Deals"

Or was United States District Court Judge Russel Holland incorrect discussing that "astonishing ruse" with Exxon and the "Seattle Seven" Seafood Processors?

And of course Seward would be the correct placename for a Stevens update on real Republican Senators like New York senator, and later Secretary of State, William Seward for a real republican administration, back when republicans were republicans, not dixie democrats with Trevor McCabe, and Ben Stevens "Advance North LLC"

Of course Sheets Byrd taught Ted everthing he needed to know to be Chair of the Senate checkbook.

Of course thiose drunken sailor cases from our favorite Texans, the longest running DUI cases in world history still have not yet been brought to Justice.

I guess Alaska needs to remove 7 Stars on their Flag also, and then they can be a Lone Star State just like their friends from Dixie, Teds promise land.

What do you do with a drunken sailor?

Elect him as your reprensative of choice, over and over again.

And another interesting comment from our friend Ted to Dana Bash a reporter from CNN questioning Ted at the Senate Chamber "Do you understand English"

Seems Ted might need a refresher course in english also, or are all those Federal Statues written in another language?

Like; "Conspiracy to Defraud the United States"???

Or many other statues of Title 18 and the others included in our United States Criminal Code's?

Where do Alaskan's find their U.S. Reps? They seem confused with all those laws, of course as if they don't apply to lawmakers?

But Ted always has had trouble with English
Like that Dept. of Justice letter from the boys at the Anti-Trust division, who enforce Senator Sherman's Act of 1890.
Of course only Ted wouldent know the Senator Sherman was a good friend of Senator Seward.
Where did this moron namede Stevens go to school at?
Evidently as we all know the correctly used term of per-se violation of this Act, went unheeded by Ted and his cronies, regarding the Crab Ratz Program.

English has always been a difficult subject matter for the Stevens Klan, but is that the reason for President Bush sending the troops to Alaska???

reply »

20 August 1, 2007 - 6:49am | turdball

Innocent until proven guilty.

It is one of the fundamental rights we have living in this great country. Let Senator Stevens have his day in court before we deem him guilty. This investigation is hardly over and will touch many Alaskans for a very long time.

The first corruption trial is over except for the sentencing and it is fitting Tom Anderson is the first. While he did some good things for Alaskans, he took money, probably more times than we will ever know. And he was a bully, and arrogant about it.

He will be a sad chapter of Alaskan history which is just beginning to be written.

But remember it is not time to elect Democrats just because they are democrats, nor Republicans because they are Republicans. It is time to keep good people. No one is perfect, but there are good legislators out there serving people.

FBI - Stevens-1740

But it is past time to move the capitol to the population mass near Anchorage and put it on the road system. Let the people see who their legislators are talking to, and give people access to their government.

Juneau is starting to gear up to stop the "Capitol Creep" today. Soon everyone will get a mailer explaining the cost of moving the capitol. Well we can no longer afford to have the capitol in Juneau, the price of oil is high we have the money and we can afford to move at least the Legislature.

Let Juneau fly to Anchorage to visit their legislators. Transparency is good for government if government is within reach of the most populated area of the State.

reply »

August 1, 2007 - 2:50pm | nick

Presumed* Innocent until Proven Guilty
Presumed Innocent until Proven Guilty
1. This applies to judicial courts, not the court of public opinion.
2. This does not apply to the prosecution or those performing an investigation of alleged corruption.
3. Let's make one thing clear: the concept here, in judicial courts, is that someone is presumed to be innocent. Being presumed innocent and actually being innocent are two different things. In fact, if one has committed a crime, he / she is guilty, whether or not that person is ever found guilty by a court or not.
4. R D I or G, conservative or progressive, and friend or foe, if an elected representative is found to have egregiously violated the public trust through conspiracy, corruption, bribery or other such malfeasance then that person, regardless of all the good they may or may not have done in the past, deserves to be held accountable. When you are a public servant you make a contract of integrity with the people you represent. Breaking that contract carries consequences.

As an aside you might want to change your login name from "turdball" to a more befitting name / term as many of your comments are well stated.

reply »

August 1, 2007 - 12:56pm | undeclared

The voters decided to keep the capitol in Juneau. So stop whining.

reply »

19 August 1, 2007 - 6:43am | geefour907

US vs. Alaska
Make no mistake about it - this is not so much about Ted Stevens or Ben or Lisa or Don or anyone else as it is about the U.S. vs. Alaska. The FBI and the press are taking their cues from national sentiment.

reply »

18 August 1, 2007 - 5:47am | staufen

"Ted's on the run,
....Ted's on the ruuuunnnnn...

[You know McCartney's classic, so sing along]

Stuck inside Marble Walls,
Senate Insider forever,
Never see the Public ones,
Just lobbyists like you,
Payoff you, Payoff you...

If I ever get out of Jail,
Thought of giving it all away,
to a non-profit family,
All I need is a fifth a day,
If I ever get out of Jail...

...

Well, the Night was falling in the Bribery world,
So I began to step and run,
On the Hill they're searching for me everywhere,
But the bribes will never be found.

Senator on the Run, Crook on the Run,
And the Country Judge was already bought off,
Will search for a rigged jury,
For Senator on the Run, Crook on the Run,
Ted's on the Run, ...Ted's on the Run.

I am reminded of when Senator Olympia Snowe chaired a Senate Oceans subcommittee hearing in Seattle in 1999, and Ted was wiggling in his seat along with Sen. Gorton when I gave testimony on Abusive Transfer Pricing... and Olympia looked at them turned sideways and wiggling, knowing they were more than a little uncomfortable with the $ truth! It is fun to see Ted pursued by reporters who might finally grow the cajones to keep asking questions and never stop... Ted is too arrogant to last long under the lights.

Favorite Quote - from the World According to GARP: "Not all the action in Life takes place where the camera lighting is best" - but, the Capitol hall could use a few flash bulbs again...

- Groundswell Fisheries Movement

reply »

August 1, 2007 - 9:12am | volcanoman

Hmmmm.....Purely hypothetical pustulation...
Now what could Trevor McCabe, Board of Fisheries member Jeremiah Campbell and NPFMC council member Ed Rasmuson have in common.....?

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1741

August 1, 2007 - 6:30am | turdball

Has Tom Anderson or a close friend tried to have you fired??

I am hearing Tom Anderson has tried to have several people blogging, or people working for lobbyists, reporters, and legislators fired or removed from from their jobs?

This would have occurred during the last few months.

Anyone out there willing to come forward? If there is a response here, even under blog names, I will post contact name and number. There is already a group talking.

reply »

August 1, 2007 - 8:38am | Black3

Tom Anderson didn't have the power to do that even as a sitting Legislator and certainly not as an indicted and now convicted felon. Which isn't to say that he or, especially, his darling wife might not have suggested that someone do "something about" someone, especially if that someone was a Legislative staffer. Then you have to ask yourself which Legislator would be foolish enough to do something for either of them under current circumstances.

You seem to be familiar enough with State government to understand that the one mortal sin in either the Executive or Legislative Branches is to do or say something that might call negative attention to an elected or appointed official. That said, all they can really do is huff and puff and threaten to blow your house down.

Even Legislators who foolishly think their employees "serve at the pleasure" quickly cool their jets when someone points out the wrongful discharge cases decided by Alaska Courts in favor of political appointees.

Maybe somebody was foolish enough to talk about stuff like this, but I certainly wouldn't consider it a credible threat.

reply »

August 1, 2007 - 2:02pm | turdball

Check their long distance records

You are wrong. Anderson and McGuire tried it 6 times that our little group is aware of. First when they got caught drinking on the house floor (redbull and vodka) along with a soon to be tried legislator.

There were times they tracked Anchorage Daily News reporters through security tapes in the capitol to try to discover sources.

The Captitol security tapes were reviewed to see if an altercation between Anderson and a lobbyist was on tape and which staff member was in the area to have overheard it.

There was multiple times when they called from out of state demanding 5 or 6 staff members be fired because they new about certain issues involving the Andersons.

Theres been talk from his former staffers, off the record of course. Everyone knows this goes on.

Remember when Jerry Ward fired a pregnant staffer? She was unemployed about 45 minutes. That was a lawsuit waiting to happen.

And you might think you know who wrote this but you don't our little group loans computers and IP addresses. And we have no short term memory. We can't remember who wrote this today.

reply »

August 1, 2007 - 2:20pm | Black3

I'm the one that got to go tell Ward he was going to apologize, put that woman back to work, and pray real hard she'd be happy with that. Nobody whose job it really was had the guts to do it and some who got paid for knowing better told him it was OK.

I don't doubt that Anderson and McGuire huffed and puffed; I just don't think either had/has the power to do more than huff and puff.

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1742

17 July 31, 2007 - 5:13pm | Stags_Leap

Run Begich Run

Uncle Ted has deceived us all -along with his Republican brethern. We need an ethical elected official who has brains, and can identify with us regular joe's.

Begich - you have my vote in 2008. You have nothing to lose. Even a loss would expand your name recognition state-wide, to set you up to dethrone the prom queen in 2010.

Seriously Mark -take a chance. The state needs you. It's your destiny.

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 10:35pm | volcanoman

Oh Barf, Little Miss Stars in your Eyes.....
Just get ready to have your notion of a perfect world under Nephew Begich to be dispelled.
" Ethical elected official" according to standards defined by whom? You?

As a matter of fact, we are all engaged in a search for trust at this point in time, and it gets so redundant to have party- oriented hacks defining themselves as if God [or the non-existence of Dog] is on their side to the exclusion of anyone differing in political party and religious standards. This sells as well as Christianity vs Islam vs PETA vs "The Unions"vs The"Liberal Media" vs the "Right Wing Fascist Mo-Fo's.

I know people on both sides of the political spectrum that can read things as well as my uneducated carcass can between the lines enough to understand we are constantly played against ourselves for the benefit of those without conscience regarding their fellow human beings being nothing more than stepping stones to further their own comfort and continue their attempts at distancing themselves from mortality by accumulating what passes for wealth.
Whew, Jack Kerouac may or may not roll over after that dissertation.
Everyone, get a grip!
No matter how you couch it, we remain presumptuous about our ultimate fate.
In the meantime, we are hurtling through the known universe at a fantastic [think fantasy] rate of speed, so don't get yer panties in too much of a bunch, we'll be there before you know it.

Do your best to drop the vitriol, this is supposed to be for the betterment of all. If you look,you'll find the world outside of Alaska quite lacking. Let's make here better. So knock it off!!

reply »

August 1, 2007 - 6:25am | turdball

Will we be invited to a "Bill Weimer" style fundraiser?
Knowles collected money from Veco, and there are some interesting old connections between business deals between some democratic old friends.

And remember ANY TIME THE DAILY NEWS DECIDES TO DISCLOSE ANYONES IP ADDRESS SAY TO ATTORNEYS OR OTHER INTERESTED PARTIES, THEY LEGALLY MAY DO SO.

reply »

16 July 31, 2007 - 11:19am | Rockin_Mel_Slurrup

Ted, Ben, Trevor and the Sealife Center
Oy. This is not good.

http://tinyurl.com/2oazjt

"The project, the Alaska SeaLife Center in Seaward, Alaska, has received some $50 million in federal money since 1998. One of Stevens' former aides, Trevor McCabe, was paid $558,000 of that money for an adjacent piece of land. Federal investigators want to know more about the arrangement."

reply »

15 July 31, 2007 - 8:35am | registeringissilly

Stevens' legal problems bigger than just VECO -- also fisheries.
Roll Call reports that in addition to the VECO allegations, "the FBI and the Department of the Interior are investigating a series of earmarks pushed through Congress over the past several years by Stevens for an Alaska nonprofit tied to Trevor McCabe, a former Stevens aide and a business partner of his son, Ben.

I wonder how many other former staffers have gotten sweet deals through their relationship with Ted?

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 10:21am | jtgranger

Ever hear of Advance North LLC?
With Ben Stevens and Trevor McCabe setting up this supposed Limited Liability Corporation?

Seems that Teds Legislation for fisheries with Alaska Seafood Marketing Board monies paid by some of the Seattle Seven Seafood Processors as kickbacks to Ben hasent worked out so well fror Ben and Ted.

Or then there's the Adak Fisheries Scam, with Icicle Seafoods at the helm using pollock to line Bens wallet, but no-one should notice as Adak is so far off the map???

One can really only wonder why our President ignored the Stevens Murkowski suggested appointments for Alaska's U.S. Attorney???

Someone should get a clue in Alaska about a few federal and state politicians on there way to jail.

I thought "Conspiracy to defraud the United States" was a clearly written criminal statue.

Or does that only apply in 49 other states of the Union?

I guess no-one's figured out how great the fishing in Alaska has been lately for 70 Federal Agents flying from all parts of the nation can't be wrong, can they?

Isn't it perfect Ted hiring Oliver Norths criminal defense attorney??? I suppose Ted also has "no comment" on his best friend and the other party Chairman of Approperations, Sheets Bird from West Virginia?

FBI - Stevens-1743

Sheets taught Stevens well, and Bens Advance North is perfect, the DOJ cant be wrong Advancing North!

"North to Alaska...you go North the rush is on..."

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 9:56am | Stags_Leap

agreed

much bigger problems and more big names to be indicted soon.

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 6:56pm | jpowell

Rumor has it that up to 20 more might be soon indicted in connection with the fisheries deals. This time is will not stop in Alaska. Watch out Seattle.

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 9:57am | F_Firkle

Come now....

Uncle Teddy has already asserted that he had no idea that son Benny was on those/that board(s), let alone that Benny pocketed over a million dollars from the 'ear marks' in what looks, at least from a distance, a whole lot like quid pro quo kick-backs for sponsoring access to Uncle Ted's office and authority...

I mean -REALLY-, the nerve of those silly agents and prosecutors to think that every son who's indirectly gifted a million bucks of the public's tax money by their daddy, automatically results in the daddy's kowledge of the gifting.. I mean.. Like, lots of sons get a milion bucks by virtue of their daddy's governmental authority, and never say anything about it to the old man, either before or after... Ingrateful hoodlums, anyway!! Sheesh!

Of course, I've never personally seen such an event, involving such depths of pure naivete' and convenient ignorance, but I'm sure it's possible... Isn't it?? ;^>)

By the way, Ted, who has those Paxton memos, and what condition are they in?? You don't happen to know a Farrah Fawcett look-alike named Fawn Hall, do you?? "Have shredder, will travel.."

Ted?? Ted?? Are you there??

Hmmmm...

Oh well, he was a good partisan hack while he lasted. And he never had too much critical (or even real) to say about even the worst of the Repugnikan administrations. I guess that's how he kept getting all of that pork that he required in order to appease the mostly-Demopublican unions.. But in the end, money and shallow political power can only carry one so far, eh??

Now, where'd GW go.. Seems to me that there's enough of a trail of proverbial bread crumbs on the ol' floor that the public integrity Fibbies oughta' wanna' ask HIM some questions too. That's the moment that I'm saving -my- popcorn for..

reply »

14 July 31, 2007 - 8:21am | wasilla_blogzilla

I'm sure they'll be laughing when...

Ted is a great asset to our state and we should leave him alone to do what's best for all of us. We need to give him all the honor that is due for his unrelenting pursuit of helping ALL Alaskans. For years he has done a superlative job in procuring funding that has pulled us out of the Frontier Age. With his great skill and statesmanship he has held Senators that would reduce us back to cavemen at bay. These attacks would not be happening if he was a liberal democrat. I'm sure the mainstream media misinformers will be laughing when the military that Ted Stevens has guarding our great state has to pull out due to funding cuts by our liberal congress and they wake up one morning to find that the Chinese Army is patrolling our streets.

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1744

August 1, 2007 - 9:06am | nduperron

Uncle Ted

We all need to give Senator Stevens a fair shake,if he is guilty then he needs to pay for what he has done. If he is not guilty then a whole lot of people on this blog will be eating tons of crow. I personally think all 100 US Senators should be investgated. Do you really think the likes of Harry Reid and Ted Kennedy have never done anything illegal. Remember We may have a Republican President and AG but the Dems currently control the purse strings so I would not be suprised if this is be done as a pay back to Senator Stevens, he has made foes across the political alise. This stuff happens no matter what party controls the $$$$ and right now it is Harry Reid and Nancy Pelosi Liberal Democrats that control congress.

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 7:16pm | snowline

Is Wasilla BioZILLA for real?

Or did someone allow their 4th grader on here again?

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 2:14pm | ilovelucy

Wow!

Let me get this straight. Greed is good. Ted is great. Liberals are responsible for the Federal Bureau of Investigation's criminal probe, despite the fact that GW Bush is President and Gonzales is the AG . But really, the best part is that the Commies are coming to get us if we don't let Robber Baron Ted enrich his family & friends.

Of COURSE you're from Wasilla.

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 10:31am | F_Firkle

Oh, Fer' Shur...

I can clearly remember ol' Billy Bob Clinton conspiring to gift my PFD and my best smoked king strips to Uncle Ho and Chairman Mao...

It's a derned good thing that anti-constitutionalist, quasi-dictator GW and the Stevens family are here to keep me free.. Where would I be without them??? (Other than for having only two parties participating in my telephone calls, and having my otherwise private affairs remain private, that is....)

But if the Chinese -should- show up, maybe it'll bring an end to the puzzling mystery they've been enduring over there, regarding what's happened to all of those tourist trinkets displaced from their factories, and most recently discovered in our 'Alaskan' gift shops...

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 11:13am | wasilla_blogzilla

Get ready

Well go ahead and getcher cone head straw hat, wooden clogs, and bowl of rice. When people like you elect the Ice Queen (Billy Jeff don't have any use for her) and lock up all the moral decent folk like the Honorable Ted you surely won't be getting any more PFD's or Smoked King Strips. Because it won't be any different than the Chinese taking over. Why would you worry one bit if in the name of eliminating terrorism your phone conversation gets monitored. Unless, of course you've got something to hide. As our great leader said immediately after 9/11, "If you're not with us then your against us". You must be against us and supporting the Axis of Evil.

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 12:43pm | F_Firkle

So now I voted for Sarah, eh..

The sound-bytes from Dr. Strangelove types, like yourself, often has me laughing my arse off... I had a Colonel in charge of a military post I worked on who spoke your language fluently... Funny, (albeit dimented), guy..

But you're not even close, in terms of my political affiliations.

But I also recall seeing someone who sounded very much like you in a 1937 anti-cannabis film, and again in a bit of 'Domino Theory' propaganda from the Nixon Whitehouse in the later 60s. Thankfully, only the truly paranoid and blind still subscribe to that bizarre nationalistic tripe.

As for the old, "If you don't have anything to hide," b.s., how 'bout you let me see inside your wallet, sock drawers, and your wife's private lingerie stash, as well as your diary entries and your safe deposit box; afterall, I -am- the government, as in "by, for and of the People," right? And I have fewer arrests on my adult record than GW does, thus making me a more up-standing kinda' guy at the moment... And I've got fewer 'friendly fire' kills under my belt than those who you seem to worship, as well.... And I've bankrupted fewer businesses than your heros as well.. being somewhat more fiscally conservative than they are, in -real time-.

What's tough for folks like you to admit is that by tearing holes in that constitution that's "just another goddamned piece of paper" (quoted from GW himself), if there's treason going on, and I truly believe that there is, and you wanna' find it, all that you need is a mirror.

Some of us still believe in -real- freedom, beyond the rhetorical tripe mumbled between bouts of automatons engaged in flag-waving on July 4th, and absent Orwell's Big Brother gov. And some of us are even willing to stand tall in order to keep what little we've got left of it.

You can put that in your pipe and smoke it, after you're done being an apologist for the current fascists and corporatists in charge here.... The ones who are currently falling like flies, btw..

reply »

August 1, 2007 - 9:21am | shasta2

SO WHAT?

FBI - Stevens-1745

You two genious guys stop the b.s. Please, we don't know what your saying except to one another. I think nothing wrong with having friends. You would do the same as Ted or Don if you had the means. People do things for friends. Ted & Don perhaps had a few more friends than they should have but non the less they have helped the majoriety of the finance here in Seward and Anchorage. So stop the wise cracks and just be friends..And stop speaking in riddles for dogs sake..

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 7:22pm | rfn

Just a guess....

but I think that "clinking" noise you're hearing is your chain being yanked....apparently by an expert!

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 10:21pm | F_Firkle

Ive never lived in the fabled land of strip malls...

and beehive hairdoos, having stayed more to places that more closely resemble the Alaska of my youth...

Blogzilla might indeed be pulling my chain, though it was I who initially (and potentially mistakenly) responded to his Dr. Strangelove paranoia of pinko commies, neo-socialists, those who might question his beloved figure-heads, and, , peaceniks.

But in many years of activism, and in professional life as well, in various roles and locations, I've met enough persons spewing (in all sincerity) similar stuff such as his. I also know that there are indeed those persons out there who believe in our Neo-Corporatists' pablum, as though Moses had brought it down from the mountains himself..

The "If you have nothing to hide" line was standard 'in-coming' when we initially opposed the USA PATRIOT ACT. And I might add that particular brain-dead retort is not too dissimilar to what many in Ted's company touted in their support of the totalitarian power-grabbing that's rolled out of both Congress and the Whitehouse these last 6 years..

BTW, I find it nothing less than ironic that some of the financial disclosure stuff contained in the USAPA could feasibly be used to bite ol' Ted squarely in the keister now that it's his campasinos who are under the proverbial microscope.. Especially all that stuff related to accessing business records, and the expanded definitions of 'financial institutions,' etc... Potential poetic justice, perhaps... ;^>)

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 9.58pm | pp05416

You might be right rfn

but I dunno - people from Wasilla are like that.

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 11.21am | heyworth

We are ready

Wrong.

We support the Axis of Truth and Legality.

Your buddy Alberto most likely signed the Search Warrants and your great leader knows whats going on up here.

So is he also against himself?

You talk to him often? Share with us.

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 11:43am | wasilla_blogzilla

Sharing room

Heyworth, you sound like your ready for an extended stay at the Tehran Hilton with F_Firkle. That way you can see firsthand the meaning of "Truth and Legality". Be sure to get Firkle a Beehive suit and have her walk behind you though as you wander through the town square looking for some rotten mutton to eat.

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 12:34pm | IHEARTmea

Just a thought

Perhaps, _blogzilla, you should consider a decaffeinated coffee.

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 1:41pm | pp05416

Blogzilla vs. Firkle

FBI - Stevens-1746

In Congress, the dems have a Weiner and the reps have a Boehner. Blogzilla and Firkle are way off thread. Sounds like a Weiner/Boehner issue to me.

reply »

July 31 2007 - 3:18pm | F_Firkle

Not at all

PP, if you'd closely read the thread, you'd have seen blogzilla crying the blues about how we're going to land in great pools of carnage as a result of holding such honorable men (specifically Repugnikan legislators) accountable for their apparent corruption. I wrote back re. the similarities between his tripe and many similar voices in past episodes of mind-numbing propaganda.

I was specifically addressing the many excuses persons offer up as reasons to keep folks in office who shouldn't be there, which is very much on track with this thread; it lends itself to explaining why persons who are now under investigation are still in office to be doing what they're doing.

Lastly, I'm not a Dem; life-long Independent, and more recently a Republican Moderate.

Not all perspectives are either convenient or narrow. ;^>)

reply »

13 July 31, 2007 - 7:53am | pp05416

The perfect defense for TED

I can save Ted hundreds of thousands of dollars that could be better spent on running his next campaign. The argument - simple: This has been going on for years and this is the way we have to get things done up here. The Bushie Supreme Justices will recognize that this argument has years of precedence and will rule in favor of Stevens. This will spare Dubya the need for a pardon so that those pinko commies in Congress will not be able to find reason to expand the investigations to their indebted friends.

reply »

12 July 31, 2007 - 5:36am | georgiawashington

Senator Stevens

I am not surprised in the least that Senator Stevens is now under investigation by the FBI. For the past three years I have been writing to various newspapers in both Washington DC and Alaska to let the voting public know how this man is wasting tax money. He pays a salary to his Director of Scheduling, Martha DeLynn Henry, that is way out of proportion to her education and job description. For the tax year 2000 her total income from Senator Steven's payroll was just over $66,000/year; by February 2004, just over 3 years later, her salary was $120,000/year. Ms. Henry has no formal post secondary education and is basically a Secretary who maintains Senator Steven's schedule as well as coordination of travel arrangements for his wife Catherine and daughter Lilly.
I suppose a Senator can pay his staff whatever he feels is a fair and equitable salary but I'm sure the people of Alaska can think of much better usage for that money than to double his Secretary's salary in just 3 years (a whopping 100% salary increase in three years, where else in America can this be possible?). The last documented salary for Ms. Henry was in February of 2004 in a custody hearing in the court in Alexandria Virginia, where there is a letter from Senator Stevens validating that her annual salary was, at that time, $120,000. One can only wonder what it is now, 3 1/2 years later.
Makes one wonder what his other employees earn...those with degrees, his legal staff etc. It also makes one wonder where the money for these salaries comes from...taxpayers money or "undisclosed sources".

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 7:00pm | heliodolly

sour grapes

you have been bitching about employees pay for days. where you not hired for a job in Ted's office and therefore bitter about it. what is your deal?

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1747

August 1, 2007 - 10:09am | georgiawashington

Sour Grapes

Hey Dolly It's not sour grapes at all, my income is actually above that and and I would not even consider working for anyone remotely involved in American politics. The point was that I would have thought that a Senator would be earing somewhere around that range ($120,000) in 2004. But if his sectretary was haulin' in that kind of dough back then...what does he earn? What do his high level employees earn? Does anyone know what a Senator's salary is? Sounds like a royal waste of money to me, I'm no expert on Alaska but there must be social programs that could use funding with that money. Maybe when his empire comes tumbling down, those left unemployed will have a hard time readjusting their lifestyles to accomodate the drop in pay they will most likely have to take when they get jobs in the real world.

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 10:44pm | F_Firkle

I dunno'..
, but when I see someone's salary in the government sector double, and Congress hasn't recently given themselves a 100% pay increase, and the person whose salary doubled didn't win a major settlement for some mega-law firm, several questions pop into my mind, too.

Like, for example;

Who's having whose love child??

or

Who saw sumpthin' that they maybe shouldn't have, but handled it in such a way as to please the person holding the purse strings??

or

(Insert any number of scenarios that might result in the doubling of a public service salary...)

though I can't speak for georgia, no, I haven't applied for, or been rejected from, any employment application process at Uncle Teddy's office. The degree of animosity that I typically was addressed with, by some elderly sarcastic office staff woman there, tells me quite clearly that it'd likely be a 'hostile work environment'.. As in, no place, or person, I'd personally want to work for.

reply »

11 July 31, 2007 - 1:46am | gr8landclay

I'm so tired of knee-jerk, unthinking reactions by jerks!!
You know, there are a number of us who have, at one time or another, been affiliated with one or the other of our several political parties here in Alaska... or have always been "independents"; ... but most of us who have been here for a while, and watched our chosen home and our politics change with oil and growth, have a kindred feeling with each other that we share above all other things - we regard ourselves, first and foremost, as ALASKANS - and regardless of "the bacon" brought home, we all know there are values we want our elected officials to stand for. The republican party, as it stands now - both nationally and in Alaska, is not a republican party anyone can feel proud of right now... and it needs to become one...

maybe its only because they've held the reins of power too long... maybe democrats - or greens, or moderate republicans - would exhibit the same self-rightousness and arrogance and lack of regard for the good of its ordinary citizens as these people are, and have been exhibiting.. But the POINT is - it is the republicans that are CURRENTLY shaming us, and using us, and line their pockets while saying the hell with us ordinary Alaskans, and being the butt-kissing lackeys of their in-State and out-of-State corporate owners and their lobbyists... and thus it is the current of REPUBLICANS [and i hate to use that decent word to describe these "people" - the corrupt bastard club some of them used to describe themselves seems more apt] that we will wish our hands of.. i would hope some of our more reputable Alaska Republicans would get together quietly with similar reputable Alaska Democrats, Greens, independents, and others - and agree on people of quality and character they could all support and endorse, regardless of party, for th next election - even if they had to endorse more than one for each seat.. At this particular time in our history, it would be extremely valuable for Alaska's voters to get a "seal of approval" from some respected "elders" and non-partisan Alaskans whose love for, and wisdom about, our currently bruised State we could respect!

reply »

10 July 30, 2007 - 10:24pm | edgefinder

FBI still in Stevens' Home as of 37 min ago show details 12:44 am (37 minutes ago)

Reaction to the FBI/IRS raid on the home of Senator Ted Stevens
By Matthew Simon, CBS 11 News Reporter
Article Last Updated: 07/30/2007 07:17:17 PM AKDT

CBS 11 News has reaction to the raid on the home of Senator Ted Stevens from some Alaskan lawmakers. CBS 11 broke this news to a number of lawmakers Monday, all of whom expressed shock to hear Stevens's home was being searched.
Speaker of the House John Harris tells CBS 11 News he thinks, "If the FBI had legitimate reasons, then I understand that. But it's frustrating to all of us. Because we're on the outside looking in. And it is hard for some of us to concentrate on state business."

FBI - Stevens-1748

House Majority Leader Ralph Samuels added, "You sure hope for the state's sake, you hope this is a miscommunications. He's an economic force for the state and any truth to these allegations would be unfortunate."

We also heard from Democrats Monday.

"It seems plain to me our Legislature has been tainted. It's possible our federal delegation has been tainted by favoritism. Let's get it out in the open and let the chips fall where they may," said Representative Harry Crawford, (D) of Anchorage.

reply »

9 July 30, 2007 - 9:43pm | TheSdog

Do not throw caution to the wind
It can be an extremely disconcerting experience to have heroes fall from their pedastals. The things that DY, Uncle Ted, and to some extent the Murkowskis have done for this state in DC are nothing short of phenomenal. I find some of it distasteful waste but nonetheless phenomenal.

The thing we cannot afford is backlash without thinking about what we are doing in the backlash. It is truly like picking up someone on the rebound after a long relationship.

Followers of The Palin will of course hurl stones at me but Palin is what backlash got us in the governor's mansion. She is in way over her head and has continued to pander to the backlash instead of truly moving us forward. She has shown no fiscal responsibility, favored one part of the state repetitively(how ethical is that?) and given us a farce called AGIA. Sures makes people feel good to "take a stand" though while the future crumbles around us.

We need to make sure we do not make the same mistake as we move to replace Uncle Ted and DY. We are a red state and in general the R agenda is better for us. Ultimately, the Dems are in the back pockets of the trial lawyers, the environmentalists and the labor unions. The interests of these groups often go in directions which are bad for this state.

You can listen to Metcalfe, Begich and Berkowitz try to pretend they are conservatives when they speak but the truth is they are not. Anyone can eventually bring home pork(although I wish people would not) but there are bigger issues on the agenda.

The Rs including our current legislators at state and federal levels have lost their fiscal ways. Do you really think any of the Dems would be better? Have you looked at what Begich has done to spending in this town? How about the way Berkowitz complained about too much cutting as a legislator? Union boy Metcalfe who likely never saw too fat a contract?

There will be payback in DC for the stuff that has been over the years. We will need someone not only to bring back bacon but vote in other ways to help this state. In general, that will be with a conservative bent most of the time.

Do not backlash just to backlash. Otherwise, we could be paying an even worse price for a long time to come.

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 2:11pm | KatRock_AK

Backlash is sometimes a good thing

While it is all too often a knee-jerk reaction, backlash away from an horrendous situation can be helpful to figure out where the middle (and safer, more responsible) ground is.

I agree that the election of Governor Palin had a not insignificant element of backlash, but hell....it was a looooooong time a'commin Sdog. The real question is will she be able to lead us into a better situation than the previous administrations? I think so. Hell...she couldn't do much worse.

Look at the PPT...and what Commissioner Galvin had to say about it....

"Getting information about how PPT is working is one problem, Galvin said. The only information the state has received was with true-up payments in April. 'Since then all we've received are checks.'

"That is the way the tax system was designed, he said, but it is frustrating for Revenue in trying to determine what costs are being deducted and what those costs represent.

'We're working with the taxpayers to try to get them to voluntarily provide us with information to help us in that assessment.' "

Are you kidding me??? The State of Alaska has an oil production tax system that simply accepts checks, and has to verify the basis on the amount through investigation that might (and probably) involve litigation???

Seriously, if any of the legislators who supported and voted in favor of this structure can convince Alaskans that to give the oil industry the opportunity to determine their payment rate with no backup documentation, I'll say we deserve what we get.

And then ask my congressional delegation to negotiate the same deal for me with the IRS: I'll send you a check, quarterly, in an amount that I think I owe. You won't know what I made, won't know what exactly I deducted, and you're going to have to appeal MY assertions rather than have me prove them to you in my filing. Oh, and by the way, I can afford waaaaaay more lawyers than you can...sooo... bring it on!

Good Lord!

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 4:36pm | TheSdog

Kat

I notice you avoided my points about The Palin in favor of talking about the PPT. I think the PPT needs to be looked at but calling a special session is pandering especially since it initially has brought us in more money.

You do get to file your tax return with the IRS. More than a few people take liberties with it which is why there is an auditing process. Depending on how little or more money you get with a different tax, auditing may be worth it. Clearly, there should not be deductions for malfeisance but the PPT is a clear example of carefully looking at the options before we blindly go into something else out of backlash.

FBI - Stevens-1749

I, for one, would have a team of people I trusted look at it very closely for the gov and the legislature before calling any special session. I would not put only angry backlash people or "shills" on that team. I have zero confidence in The Palin to pick the right people to look at it.

We could do worse, that is most of my point. If you vote on emotion instead of with your brain you can get into trouble.

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 5:01pm | tkelley

"Backlash" in the name of reducing the cost of doing business

SDog: Yes, PPT review should have nothing to do with political backlash. It should have all to do with cost of doing business. If get the same amount of tax revenues from the producers with less overhead, less cost of doing business – then that should be the goal.

The producers should want a gross production tax too, if they were serious about simplifying business and reducing the cost of revenue accounting. But they would rather have a complex system with gray areas they can milk via the courts so they can get on the Exxon Alaska spill payment plan. If there is a backlash against complexity for simplicity in the way we do business with the oil producers ... than that is a good, non-emotional backlash no matter who initiates it or who is involved.

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 5:18pm | TheSdog

I am all for simple but there is no such thing as a "simple" tax in this country.

Even a gross tax needs some tweeking based on oil prices to be fair to all involved.

If it were up to me I'd simplify more than just the PPT. I'd simplify everything and put accountants out of jobs in droves.

However, everybody else wants as much money as possible which may not necessarily be a gross tax. That is my point.

reply »

July 31, 2007 - 2:57pm | tkelley

Watching PPT like a Hawk(er)

[sarcasm alert] KatRock: You must be mistaken. My state representative Mike Hawker assured me in a letter to his constituents last fall that the PPT could be adequately administered by the existing State of Alaska revenue accounting staff. There is NO PROBLEM with PPT ... just ask Mr. Hawker!

reply »

1 2 3 next › last »

© Copyright 2007, The Anchorage Daily News, a subsidiary of The McClatchy Company

Contact Us | Newsroom Contacts | Communication Forms | Subscriptions | Advertising | Terms of Use

Daily News Jobs | RSS Feeds | ADN Store | Newspapers in Education | Privacy Agreement

A member of the
Real Cities Network

FBI - Stevens-1750

The New York Times
nytimes.com

THE NEXT GREAT SCI FI EPIC

August 1, 2007

Stevens' Earmark Funds Airport Project That Benefits One Company

By CQ Staff, CONGRESSIONAL QUARTERLY

By Kathryn A. Wolfe, CQ Staff

Sen. Ted Stevens, who as a top appropriator has mastered the art of the congressional earmark, tucked $3.5 million into a Senate spending bill this year to help finance an airport to serve a remote Alaskan island.

The airstrip would connect the roughly 100 permanent residents of Akutan to the outside world. The biggest beneficiary, though, would be Seattle-based Trident Seafoods Corp., which operates one of the world's largest seafood processing plants on the volcanic island in the Aleutians.

Trident and Stevens are no strangers. For years, company founder and Chief Executive Charles Bundrant has been a generous contributor to the Alaska Republican's campaigns. And in December, according to the Seattle Times, a federal grand jury investigating political corruption in Alaska ordered Trident and other seafood companies to produce documents detailing financial ties to the senator's son, former Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board Chairman Ben Stevens.

The younger Stevens served until last year as chairman of the federally funded board that his father created in a 2003 appropriations bill (PL 108-199) to promote Alaska seafood. The board provided marketing grants to Trident and other seafood companies at the same time Ben Stevens served as a paid consultant to industry trade groups.

The Senate Appropriations Committee approved the measure containing the airport earmark, the fiscal 2008 Transportation-HUD spending bill (S 1789), on July 12. It is awaiting full Senate action, probably sometime in September.

Logistical Challenges

While the Akutan airport would benefit Trident, Akutan's mayor said the town, not the company, asked for the funds.

A Stevens spokesman said the earmark was intended to help a rural community overcome daunting infrastructure challenges. At least twice a year, Akutan's population balloons to more than 1,000, as seasonal workers from as far as California flood in for jobs at Trident's processing plant. The only air access during those high periods is a twice-daily flight provided by an aging, eight-seat Grumman Goose seaplane. Trident has to charter the seaplane, along with extra boats, to transport employees to the island, according to company employees.

"It holds eight people, so you can imagine trying to bring 1,000 people in for a season -- it takes them two weeks to complete that task," said Joe Bereskin, Akutan's mayor.

FBI - Stevens-1751

194A-AN-13620-M; 707

Bereskin said the town has been seeking ways to pay for a new airport for several years, largely because of the deteriorating condition of the Grumman Goose, operated by Peninsula Airways Inc. Once the Goose is retired, the island won't have regular air access without an airport, he said.

Bereskin said the earmark is the first construction money allotted for the estimated $40 million airport project. He said a mix of federal, state and local money will be needed for the project, although "the bulk of it will have to come from Congress."

In addition to the earmark, Bereskin said, the town is seeking $3 million from the state and would try to sell bonds to raise an additional $3 million. The extra $6 million, he said, should be enough "at least to get the ball rolling and the rest of it will fall into place."

Stevens' earmark for Akutan is not the only airport project in the bill. But because it appears to benefit only one company, that makes it "less of a public good and much more of a private good," said Steve Ellis, vice president for programs at the anti-earmark group Taxpayers for Common Sense.

He likened it to building a driveway for Trident's use. "If this is important to Trident, which evidently it is, then that's important for them to invest in and probably shouldn't be something that the federal taxpayers are asked to pick up the tab for," he said.

Aaron Saunders, a spokesman for Stevens, said that criticism "ignores the needs of a community that includes a recognized native Alaskan village."

He said an airport would allow for emergency services and more regular food and gasoline deliveries that will help drive down prices on consumer items, which sometimes can be four or five times what mainlanders pay.

The Seattle Times reported last year that a federal grand jury subpoenaed documents from Trident as part of an ongoing corruption investigation. For more than a year, the grand jury has been investigating ties between Alaska politicians and the engineering firm Veco Inc. The firm's founder, Bill Allen, pleaded guilty this spring to bribing several state lawmakers and is cooperating with investigators. Allen supervised a major expansion of the elder Stevens' home, which federal agents searched July 30.

Last fall, the investigation broadened to include the Alaskan fisheries industry. Ben Stevens disclosed in a letter to the Anchorage Daily News newspaper that records regarding the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board were among documents federal investigators seized during a search last year.

Trident's Bundrant has been a longtime supporter of the elder Stevens. Bundrant and his family have contributed $17,300 since 1995 to Ted Stevens' political campaigns and $10,800 to his leadership PAC. Bundrant also gave $55,000 to the National Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee.

Trident General Counsel Joseph T. Plesha declined to comment on the investigation. Neither Ted Stevens, the longest-serving Republican in the Senate, nor his son, the former Alaska Senate president, has been charged with any wrongdoing.

"I continue to believe this investigation should proceed without any appearance that I have attempted to influence its outcome," Ted Stevens said after his house was searched this week. "I will continue my policy of not commenting on this investigation until it has been concluded."

Web Images Video News Maps Gmail more ▼ Sign in

Google News

Search News | Search the Web

Search and browse 4,500 news sources updated continuously.

News archive search New! | Advanced news search | Blog search

>Top Stories
World
U.S.
Business
Sci/Tech
Sports
Entertainment
Health
Most Popular

Make Google News Your Homepage

News Alerts

Text Version

Standard Version

Image Version

RSS | Atom
About Feeds

Mobile News

Top Stories U.S. - Go

Auto-generated 10 minutes ago

FBI searches home of Alaska Sen. Stevens

AlaskaReport

Reuters - 38 minutes ago
WASHINGTON, July 30 (Reuters) - The FBI and IRS have searched the home of Republican Sen. Ted Stevens in a ski resort in Alaska as part of an investigation into his links with an oil-services company, officials said on Monday.
FBI, IRS search home of Sen. Ted Stevens
Houston Chronicle
FBI, IRS Search Home of Sen. Ted Stevens
ABC News
KTUU - The Gate - National Journal - Anchorage Daily News (subscription) - International Herald Tribune
all 168 news articles »

Britain will take troops out of Iraq regardless of US, says PM

New York Daily News

Independent - 1 hour ago
By Andrew Grice, Political Editor at Camp David Gordon Brown has paved the way for the withdrawal of British troops from Iraq by telling George Bush he would not delay their exit in order to show unity with the United States.
Henry: Did Bush make Brown his BFF? CNN
Bush, Brown meeting reveals subtle differences
Canada.com
New York Times - Wall Street Journal - ToTheCenter.com - Scotsman
all 2,347 news articles »

Get recommended stories

Sign in to get recommended stories by using search history

Personalize this page

Verizon's expansion backed by Vodafone Telegraph.co.uk -
all 371 news articles »

California e-voting machines have more holes than Swiss cheese
Register - all 93 news articles »

Across the NFL, condolences for a coaching legend
USA Today -
all 710 news articles »

Cinema mourns explorer of the human condition Times Online -
all 486 news articles »

Avandia Should Stay On Market, FDA Advisory Committee Recommends Science Now -
all 818 news articles »

In The News

Gordon Brown	Cal Ripken
Rural Cellular	Asian Cup
Verizon Wireless	Gaza Strip
Paris Hilton	Xbox 360
Ocean City	Tom Watson

FBI - Stevens-1753

World » edit

New pressure after Taliban says second South Korean

U.S. » edit

Chief Justice Roberts suffers seizure, is hospitalized in

194A-AN-13620-m: 708

washingtonpost.com Hello Strategic3rdIris Edit Preferences | Sign Out
The Washington Post Print Edition | Subscribe

Advertisement Newsweek Smart Strategies for travel.

The Fix

By Chris Cillizza

washingtonpost.com's Politics Blog

About This Blog | Meet Chris Cillizza | XML RSS Feed (What's RSS?)

What's the Matter With Alaska?

Remember Alaska?

The ruby red state President Bush carried by 25 points in 2004 and 31 points four years earlier? The state who last elected a Democrat to the Senate in 1974. And to the House in 1972? (For trivia's sake, Mike Gravel -- yes, that Mike Gravel, was the last Alaska Democrat in the Senate; the late Rep. Nick Begich was the last Democrat in the House.)

Well, the times are changing in the Last Frontier thanks to a public corruption scandal that has badly damaged the Republican brand and potentially implicated both Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) and Rep. Don Young (R-Alaska).

At the core of the scandal is Bill Allen, the former head of Veco Corp. Allen -- along with another Veco executive -- pleaded guilty in May to bribing state legislators and other elected officials in exchange for favorable legislation. In the plea agreement, the men acknowledged giving $243,500 to a state senator's consulting company in hopes of winning support for a piece of legislation. Although the state Senator is not named in the plea agreement, the amount of money is identical to that which Veco paid former state Sen. Ben Stevens' (R-Alaska) consulting company.

As first reported by washingtonpost.com's Paul Kane, Ted Stevens -- Ben's father -- had also been asked by the FBI to retain any records in connection with Veco. At issue for Ted Stevens is more than $100,000 of work done on his home, a project that was allegedly overseen by Allen and other Veco executives. The FBI's raid of Stevens' home yesterday seems to suggest the Justice Department continues to be very interested in the Senator's connections to Veco.

Young is also struggling to hold up against the weight of the Veco scandal. As reported in the Wall Street Journal last week, the 18-term lawmaker is also now a subject of the federal investigation into the pay-to-play scandal. In the last three months alone, Young spent more than $250,000 on legal fees.

Both Stevens and Young are up for re-election in 2008. Neither has given the slightest indication that they are planning to leave office as a result of the ongoing investigation but the controversy has emboldened longtime opponents of the two incumbents.

Witness the Club For Growth, a fiscally conservative third party group

Advertisement

Advertisement

FBI - Stevens-1754

194A-AN-13620-M:709

proudly tout for their state. Earlier this month, the Club released a poll, conducted by Red Sea LLC, that seemed to show that even Alaska voters were fed up with this practice.

Asked whether they approved or disapproved of the $223 million in federal spending for a bridge from Ketchikan to Gravina Island (aka the "Bridge to Nowhere") 25 percent said they approved of the money being allocated for the bridge-building while 66 percent disapproved. Seventy-one percent said they would prefer a candidate who "wants to cut overall spending even if that includes cutting some money that would come to Alaska," while just 17 percent favored a candidate "willing to increase overall spending on federal program as long as more federal spending and projects come to Alaska."

Most worrisome for Stevens' electoral prospects was that 47 percent said the following statement was true: "Ted Stevens has done some good things for Alaska but after forty years in Washington it's time for a change"; just 45 percent said that statement was false. Did we mention these are Republican primary voters?

Alaska over the last few cycles has shown a willingness to shake up the political establishment. After two decades in the Senate, Frank Murkowksi (R-Alaska) won the governorship in a landslide in 2002. He went on to appoint his daughter, Lisa, to the vacant Senate seat -- a move that brought charges of nepotism down on both father and daughter. After Lisa Murkowski narrowly beat former Gov. Tony Knowles (D) to win a full Senate term in 2004, Frank Murkowksi was faced with an open revolt from the Republican party in his 2006 re-election bid. He took just 19 percent of the vote in the primary, a stunning collapse and a sign that Alaska voters were ready for a chance. Wasilla Mayor Sarah Palin, who ran an outsider and a reformer, won the primary and general election easily and is now enjoying sky-high approval ratings in office.

Could Stevens and/or Young fall victim to that same sort of voter fatigue? Possibly -- especially if the ongoing scandal worsens or fellow Republicans revolt. A number of prominent Republicans are mulling primary challenges to Stevens or Young but it remains to be seen whether any serious candidate steps forward in either race.

Democrats have been quietly recruiting in the state on the off chance that either Stevens or Young retires or the Veco scandal badly damages their political prospects. The crown jewel recruit in the state is Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, son of the late Congressman. Begich's last name gives him considerable entree among Alaska voters and his base in Anchorage doesn't hurt either. Begich is said to be considering runs for either the House or Senate but from what we hear is leaning toward the Senate under the belief that holding a House seat every two years is a near impossibility. On the House side, it appears as though former state House Minority Leader Ethan Berkowitz and 2006 lieutenant governor nominee is the likeliest challenger to Young.

FBI - Stevens-1755

Before Democrats get to far ahead of themsleves, it's important to remember that despite the upheaval in the state Republican party, Alaska remains a strongly Republican state. It's a certainty that whoever Republicans nominate for president will carry the state and likely carry it handily. That should give Stevens and Young or whoever their replacements are a nice boost.

Still, Alaska's political environment in incredibly fluid at the moment. Things are changing rapidly. Keep watch.

By Chris Cillizza | July 31, 2007; 1:38 PM ET | Category: House

Previous: Approaching Ames | Next: Thompson's Take

Add The Fix to Your Site
Be the first to know when there's a new installment of The Fix! This widget is easy to add to your Web site, and it will update every time there's a new entry on The Fix.
Get This Widget >>

washingtonpost.com
The Fix's Latest
- Thompson's Take
- What's the Matter With Alaska?
- Approaching Ames
- Fix Picks: Romney's JFK Moment?
- Looks and Politics
+ Add to Web Site

Comments Please email us to report offensive comments.

No wonder Homer Simpson headed to Alaska to hide out. These GOP crooks and hacks must think that no one is paying attention to what goes on up there.

Posted by: Loudoun Voter | July 31, 2007 02:05 PM

What's wrong with Alaska? It's run by republicans. Corruption inevitably results.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 02:09 PM

Imagine if a Democrat was running for president, and his grandfather had been a major financial supporter of Hitler -- how the rightwing/media would have howled over it. But bush -- not a peep. Never a mention.

Now imagine if say, Bill Clinton's father had been having a business meeting with bin Ladin's brother the morning of 9/11 -- omigod -- can you imagine the conspiracy theeories, the outrage -- but bush, not a peep.

So much for the myth of the liberal media. Even Ann Coulter says, 'we own the media' -- and they do.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 02:11 PM

What's wrong with Louisiana? It's run by democrats. Corruption inevitably results.

Let's generalize things a bit more to get at the truth.

What's wrong with government? It's run by partisan politcians. Corruption inevitably results.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 02:21 PM

What's wrong with corporations? They're run by greedy CEOs. Corruption inevitably results.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 02:23 PM

FBI - Stevens-1756

"Dear VoteVets.org Supporter,

Today, veterans of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq wrote to President Bush, calling him to come clean on the death of former NFL star and Army Ranger, Pat Tillman, and we need you to join us.

Go to VoteVets.org and sign on to our letter

Last week, it was reported that medical examiners who examined Tillman's body shortly after his death determined his fatal wounds may have been caused by shots fired from ten yards away, and urged for a criminal investigation into his death. They were denied. This new finding seems to contradict the government's second official explanation of his death, which was that it was caused by friendly fire from a convoy that was a greater distance away. The initial story, that he was killed by enemy fire, was already proven to be a lie, and officers who contributed to the cover up were punished.

Yet, when the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform sent the President a bi-partisan request for a number of documents related to the Tillman investigation, the Administration refused to turn over key communications the Committee asked for, citing Executive Privilege.

Go to VoteVets.org and tell the White House this is not acceptable

There is no Executive Privilege claim that holds any water when the matter is the death of an American soldier - especially one who had been used by the Administration as a poster for the war. By refusing to release every pertinent document, the White House is fostering a climate of distrust among those in the military, hurting efforts to recruit new soldiers by creating doubt on behalf of parents who should expect their 18-year old son or daughter will be honored for their service, and insulting the memory of Pat Tillman. Unless the President has something to hide, he should release all the documents requested by Republicans and Democrats on the Committee.

Finally, as Commander in Chief, the President owes the complete and total truth to Corporal Tillman's mother, Mary Tillman. Those of us who served know that it is the duty of any officer to write to the families of those under us who were killed, and tell them the entire truth regarding their love one's death. To lie about any details or withhold any information would not just cause unjust pain to the survivors, but is to dishonor the fallen. As our nation's top commander, it is the President's duty to the Tillman family to release all materials related to his death.

For the good of our military, our troops, the Tillmans, and our nation, we need you to sign on to our letter, calling on the President to comply with all past and future requests of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform on the matter of the death of Corporal Tillman.

Sincerely,

Jon Soltz
Iraq War Veteran
Co-Founder and Chairman, VoteVets.org
"

Posted by: support the troops | July 31, 2007 02:24 PM

It's amazing that the liberals attack anyone who doesn't subscribe to the same bravo sierra they do and THEN critize anyone else who does the same thing.

I wonder if there will be a day when all this fighting among Americans will end? Will each side ever be able to give a little bit? With all the insults (which shows how large mind is), there is no way to ever solve our problems.

And please....don't EVER say that Ann Coulter represents the conservatives in this country. That's like saying that Jesse Jackson represents all blacks.

Posted by: San | July 31, 2007 02:24 PM

FBI - Stevens-1757

another bias article.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 02:25 PM

anonymous coward writes
"What's wrong with government? It's run by partisan politcians. Corruption inevitably results."

Nah. The problem is one-party rule, not government. The system works a lot better when the parties have to produce positive results & good government in order to stay in power. At the fed level, when Reagan had to work with a Dem Congress & Clinton had to work with a GOP Congress, government worked better than, say, when Bush had a GOP Congress.

Posted by: bsimon | July 31, 2007 02:27 PM

Yeah, this article has sickly bias. How about reporters stick to reporting fact. If they have a personal belief, great, keep if to yourself. It's called professionalism...the rest of the business world does it, it's about time journalism does, too.

Posted by: nlavigne | July 31, 2007 02:30 PM

Stevens & Young? Couldn't happen to better guys.

Posted by: ssomo | July 31, 2007 02:31 PM

When an individual believes the risk of being blamed (or proven guilty) for a socially or legally offensive action is low, then this individual will most likely take this risk. The problem isn't republican, democratic, or governmental - it's human nature. How does a society (on any level) evolve away from cutthroat politics/business, corrupt practices, dishonorable tactics, etc? Can we? I'm not ignorant and unintelligent to come up with this answer on my own.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 02:32 PM

I live in Alaska and there is nothing wrong with us. We are however, very tired tired of the "same ol' thing, different day" mentality of ALL politicians. Regardless of how we feel personally about our current representatives, politically, it is time for a change. Not just with this states representation but with the US government as a whole. The upcoming elections will certianly be interesting...perhaps we should all be keeping an informed eye on what ALL candidates are doing (as well as what they are sayng) rather than pointing fingers.

Posted by: hull | July 31, 2007 02:32 PM

Change to a Democrat so you can be more like us over here in Virginia. Toss the constitution and apply excessive fines and taxes.Pass more laws since obviously your to stupid to govern yourself. Corruption or socialism HMMM hard choice. Corruption is like an infection you can usually cure the condition. Socialism as a virus there is no cure. Mr. Clinton Obama for 2008 he gets my vote.

Posted by: Mike | July 31, 2007 02:33 PM

All I can say is "yes - finally!"

Every tree, bush, drop of oil, and clod of dirt has been for sale in Alaska to the highest bidder for years - no questions asked or restrictions placed. The pipeline is now a rusted leaky disaster waiting to happen. Old growth logs go for cheap to the best bribing Asian. Fish? Take all you want. Minerals? Just have at it, my friend. Hell, don't even bother to clean up after yourself - we don't care!

Need a political favor in order to make a bunch of dough off of natural resources with little or no environmental oversight? Just call Ted or Don. These crooks have had little or no respect for the law, the environment, or common decency since - well, forever.

FBI - Stevens-1758

The Alaskan state government bribes its own citzens with oil revenue $ to look the other way - and they do smugly do so, laughing at the lower 48 all the way.

Posted by: Doug C | July 31, 2007 02:36 PM

Media run by the right-wing?! Haha, good one. What was the last study... reporters and journalists who are democrats outnumber republicans 4:1. And what was it, 22? out of the 25 highest circulated newspapers weigh heavily toward liberals. Talk radio is run by conservatives, I'll give you that, no doubt, but that's because people there's no market for liberals because nobody wants to hear them talk.

Posted by: Mike | July 31, 2007 02:38 PM

Is there really anyone out there who can't differentiate between the party of corruption and the party of responsbility and honesty? Who last gave us a balanced budget? Who presents real scientific data about the environment, and just about everything else rather than mainpulated data to achieve political gain? Anyone who makes less than $250,000 a year and who votes for a Republican is a fool. And anyone who earns over $250,000 a year and votes for a Republican is a short-sighted self-indulgent fool that is endangering the country for their own immediate tax gain - which by the way is devoured by the increase in gas prices for all of us. Think the GOP is really Christian? Take a close look at their actions. I doubt Christ would be for tax cuts for the rich over the multitude of needs of the poor. I doubt Christ would be for the Iraq war and the killing of tens of thousands of civilians. I doubt Christ would be for any of the liars we have in Washington... or the likes of the two up in Alaska. Either way, if you vote for the GOP you are a fool and about as anti-Christian as they come. It is not your words that make you Christian, its your actions. And frankly, the actions of the GOP in the last 7 years is about as pathetic as it comes. Worst President in history? That's just the start of it. God only knows the damage that has been done to America by the GOP.

Posted by: AJ Smith | July 31, 2007 02:40 PM

No surprise that it's a loaded article, when it's headlined with a loaded question.

Silly, silly, silly.

By my best rational judgement, there's nothing wrong with alaska.

Posted by: What's the Matter With Alaska? | July 31, 2007 02:41 PM

Bong Hits 4 Jesus

Posted by: frank burns | July 31, 2007 02:41 PM

"Before Democrats get to far ahead..."

CC, that should be "...too far...."

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 02:42 PM

Mayor Begich the Crown Jewel? Is that the same Mayor Begich that almost lost his last bid for reelection? The Mayor Begich that many in Anchorage believe is just as corrupt at the Anchorage Assembly and many of the rest of the State's politicians??

Posted by: Gary | July 31, 2007 02:42 PM

What's wrong with DC, Massachusetts, Louisiana,...
When a party dominates, the crooks go there to seek power. Not suprising. The difference is that when a Rebublican crook is found, Republicans dump the culprit. Democrats re-elect there crooked politians.

FBI - Stevens-1759

Posted by: Dave | July 31, 2007 02:44 PM

(This is my First Post -- though there is another Mike now)

It only took 27 minutes for the rabid left-wing bloggers to corrupt this conversation. Not surprisingly, it was the first post.

bsimon -- shouldn't you be asking Loudon if he/she only comes on this website to bash republicans?

(see previous thread)

Posted by: Mike | July 31, 2007 02:45 PM

"Change to a Democrat so you can be more like us over here in Virginia...and apply excessive fines..." - Mike

You probably never looked to find out, but the sponsor of the excessive fines legislation was a Republican.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 02:48 PM

I have to say, Ted Stevens' record as #1 Senator Bringing home the Most Pork is a shameful stain on his record and the party, and it's high time the good people of AK voted in someone less, er, creative in fundraising methods.

He has not been a fiscal conservative, something the voters of AK seem to value. And what is with that Incredible Hulk necktie? - Is the Incredible Hulk from Alaska? I could see maybe Bigfoot, but c'mon....

Ultimate power ultimately corrupts. However, of the sitting Senators who have held office for >40 years, 5 out of 6 are Democrats.

Posted by: proudtobeGOP | July 31, 2007 02:49 PM

$100,000 spent on the cuff to fix up his house and it still looks like a dump.

Posted by: GiveAmericaBack | July 31, 2007 02:49 PM

Imagine if a Democrat was running for president, and his grandfather had been a major financial supporter of Hitler -- how the rightwing/media would have howled over it. But bush -- not a peep. Never a mention.

going to beat that horse again you obsessive klown. did anyone tell you Bush is not running? Stooge.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 02:50 PM

It's not the corruption, but the the obviously blatant " I dont care what the people say or want" kind of corruption that leaves me and I believe the rest of country mad at these criminal politicians. They obviously believe they are above the law and untouchable. Unfortunately the president encourages this with his own brand of corruption and pardoning power.

Posted by: chris g | July 31, 2007 02:50 PM

The dems are fed up and pubs are in denial. Who are you going to turn to now? now? No, seriously who's next in line that is the problem the system is failing and we are no longer a great nation because of it. We lack the foresight or the strenght to challenge an age old system in this young democracy, only we have the power to chang and we need to change. vote for the outsiders the problem inlays with the people who know the system.

Posted by: CLORES | July 31, 2007 02:51 PM

Mike: "Toss the constitution and apply excessive fines and taxes.Pass more laws since obviously your to stupid to govern yourself."

Hey Mikey, you neglected to mention who controls both houses of the Virginia legislature and enacted these fines to allow themselves to say they didn't raise taxes.

Why, it's the Republicans of course!

Posted by: Loudoun Voter | July 31, 2007 02:53 PM

False premise Mike.

First of all, if nobody wanted to listen to liberals, then how could they possibly make up that 4:1 ratio of journalists and reporters? If nobody wanted to hear what they have to say, would they still have jobs?

FBI - Stevens-1760

Second, while the journalists may more often than not be categorized as "liberal", they mostly work for large corporations. Who runs the large corporations? Conservatives. Who, for the most part, controls the purse strings in the form of advertising dollars for media outlets? Conservatives.

Therefore, the money controls the media, because if advertisers don't like the message, they pull their dollars. Result: conservatives control the media.

Posted by: JamesCH | July 31, 2007 02:53 PM

The problem with this type of article is it is never about the person it is always about what party they are from because heaven knows that democrats will never pull something like this....

Posted by: Lauren | July 31, 2007 02:54 PM

Mike asks
"bsimon -- shouldn't you be asking Loudon if he/she only comes on this website to bash republicans?"

I can see why you would think so, but no. Loudon Voter referenced Alaska in his comment, thus remaining on-topic. He did choose a partisan attack, but it still met reasonable criteria for topicality. Now, if you want to pick a post for criticism, lets go with the 2:11 note, which was likely offered by rufus. Totally off-topic rant solely intended to bash the opposition.

Posted by: bsimon | July 31, 2007 02:54 PM

Those of us who have dealt with elected officials on a regular basis for many years will tell you that the incidence of venality and dishonorable conduct is about what you would expect from the general public: maybe as many as 1 in 30 are, for want of a better word, crooks.
I hope Sen. Stevens is not one, because prison would be very hard on an 80+ year old man.
Always remember that absolute power tends to corrupt, absolutely, and never let any person or party think that he or it is indispensable.
Do not become beholden to a party or a candidate. They represent you; they cannot own you.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 02:55 PM

Mikeyboo: "bsimon -- shouldn't you be asking Loudon if he/she only comes on on this website to bash republicans?"

you can ask and you'd be wrong, ace. bsimon can tell you that last week we had a very interesting debate over the alleged coat-tails effect. It was 100 percent polite. Of course, you weren't there.

Posted by: Loudoun Voter | July 31, 2007 02:55 PM

hey nlavigne, does that "professionalism" apply to Fox News also?

Posted by: ssomo | July 31, 2007 02:57 PM

FBI - Stevens-1761

Texas Mike, how long do you think it will take Zouk (or whichever name he uses this time) to get over here and try to get the blog away from Stevens and Young and onto Jefferson?

Or Klinton, or Peanut Carter, or anybody but Stevens and Young?

Zouk is the one who more often gets a thread far offtrack by casting wide nets of generalizations and hauling in anybody who gets caught in the net. [An example is how he landed TruthHunter posing as "ssdd"?]

A number of us suspect that he works at the RNC and that it is part of his job.

Keep an eye out for him and watch how he operates. The intentional subversion of the thread is more often from the right side of the page, not the left. (the rufuses don't count - they are head cases unto themselves).

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 02:57 PM

Lauren: "The problem with this type of article is it is never about the person it is always about what party they are from because heaven knows that democrats will never pull something like this...."

Lauren, do you see something factually wrong with the article? CC is hardly considered to be a Democratic stooge.

Posted by: Loudoun Voter | July 31, 2007 02:58 PM

Berkowitz the best candidate for Young's seat? How about Jake Metcalfe, who had the balls to announce his campaign, while Ethan B. sits on the sidelines, calling potshots and waiting for someone with real Alaskan cache to hand down his coattails?

Alaskans are sick of partisan politics and bickering. Ethan B. was minority whip and all he did was whine. He's from Frisco - Alaskans are ready to elect a real Alaskan. jake's the best guy for the job.

Posted by: Frank G. | July 31, 2007 02:58 PM shouldn't you be asking Loudon if he/she only comes on this website to bash republicans?

That is exactly what Loud and dumb voter does here. And that is the extent of it.

funny how all the howling misfit moonbats come on this site to bash bush and they never see how utterly worthless that is. Just like the last election - no ideas leads to no new laws.

Let's rename the blog 'howling misfit moonbat losers who despise Bush incoherently'. that is apt.

why argue with an idiot about the level of thier stupidity. It is sufficient to note that they all seem to be equally stupid and have no agenda but hate and envy.

Why is it that all the women are tough and all the men wimps in Lib lalaland? something contrary to human nature there, same as Marxism.

QED

Posted by: QED | July 31, 2007 02:59 PM

All of you are full of crap!!!
Democrats quit fooling yourselves!!! I have
One word for all of you...ILLINIOS!!! Controlled by the Democrat party since its inception!!! You want corruption, we got it!!! NEPOTISM, no problemo, an unbalanced budget year after year, no problem!!! We have a $1 BILLION deficit to match!!! The Democrats cannot even pass a budget here & they are all in the same party. We got it all!!! And who fault is it, DEMOCRATS!! Time for both these parties to belly up & admit they are equally incompetant & equally corrupt!!!!!!!!!!
WHEN IS THERE GOING TO BE ANOTHER CHOICE!!! GO THIRD PARTY GO!!!
God bless!!!

FBI - Stevens-1762

Posted by: Rick B | July 31, 2007 02:59 PM

"The New Yorker:

At first glance, next year's Presidential election looks like a blowout. But it might not be. Luckily for the incumbent party, neither George W. Bush nor Dick Cheney will be running; indeed, the election of 2008 will be the first since 1952 without a sitting President or Vice-President on the ballot. At the moment, survey research reflects a generic public preference for a Democratic victory next year. Still, despite everything, there are nearly as many polls showing particular Republicans beating particular Democrats as vice versa. So this election could be another close one. If it is, the winner may turn out to have been chosen not on November 4, 2008, but five months earlier, on June 3rd.

Two weeks ago, one of the most important Republican lawyers in Sacramento quietly filed a ballot initiative that would end the practice of granting all fifty-five of California's electoral votes to the statewide winner. Instead, it would award two of them to the statewide winner and the rest, one by one, to the winner in each congressional district. Nineteen of the fifty-three districts are represented by Republicans, but Bush carried twenty-two districts in 2004. The bottom line is that the initiative, if passed, would spot the Republican ticket something in the neighborhood of twenty electoral votes-votes that it wouldn't get under the rules prevailing in every other sizable state in the Union.

If you haven't seen it already, take a look at the video "Hacking Democracy". (h/t Todd for link)"

Posted by: If you can't win, cheat | July 31, 2007 03:02 PM

Human history shows over and over again that power corrupts. The more power an individual has, the less they feel there are consequences to abusing that power, the more they will abuse it.
It is especially bad in the hands of Conservatives whose entire philosophy is based around reckless selfishness, unbased pride (arrogance), the need to squash and control others, and a constant itch for conflict and bloodshed. All of this, of course, well supported by an ancient book they all take far too seriously.

However, power can be abused by people who start off with more noble intentions as well. Especially when corporate forces who are best served by the representatives failing to serve their people work on all sides to tempt that person into obedience or submission.

There is nothing wrong with socialism, it is a far better way to run a government then sit back and let autocracy turn quickly into an oligarchical plutocracy. The fact that under Republican leadership in the last 20 years with only an 8 year break, America has deflated entirely and now runs entirely on credit lent by Communist (China) and Socialist (Japan) nations. Meanwhile countries that were bankrupt after WWII took on more socialist governments and built back up.

However, democratic socialism, the best form of government, only functions when the people care enough to participate. When it is unusual for even 50% of eligible voters to participate in an election, American incumbants are more likely to be reelected than they were in Russia at the height of the Soviet rule and nothing that the government does creates the kind of bitter demonstrations that would really make the politicians fear for their jobs when not doing their jobs well, it really doesn't matter.

Members of the American government spend more time raising funds for their next election than they do representing their people. The reason is simply because they know that no matter how good or bad of a job they actually do over the year, a bunch of commercials and smear campaigns at election time will mean more than all of that when it comes to staying in power.

Posted by: Andrew | July 31, 2007 03:02 PM

FBI - Stevens-1763

proudtobeGOP -Google "lord acton"

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 03:03 PM

As for what's wrong with Alaska, well, it's the same thing that's wrong with the the rest of the country, and it can be summed up in two words:

Power corrupts.

Happens with Democrats, happens with Republicans, and everyone in between. It's been proven time and time again.

If you can remember that far back, we're in an ethical crisis not unlike the one we saw in the late 80s-early 90s with a too long in power Democratic Congress. Too much power routinely leads to its abuse. Hence checks and balances. This is a natural, albeit unfortunate, byproduct of democracy mixed with capitalism.

The root of the problem is the for-profit nature of American politics as they are today. Find a way to shut off the money, and maybe we can return to democracy for the benefit of the people.

Just my opinion. I wish I had the ability to go beyond defining the problem, but I can't yet see the solution.

Posted by: JamesCH | July 31, 2007 03:03 PM

Doug C.'s comments aren't exactly, well, accurate or fair.
Alaska has a long history of irresponsible resource exploitation (starting with Russian fur traders) alternating with periods of resource conservation. Sometimes, the rip-rape-and-run practices are being conducted in one area while wise conserveration practices are taking place elsewhere.
I have long been a critic of many in Alaska's political establishment, including the Congressional delegation. I don't support drilling in ANWR (putting me at odds with most of the state) or the Teshekpuk Lake area (putting me probably on the same side as a majority of Alaskans); I'm skeptical about the Kensington Mine (putting me in a minority) and opposed to the Pebble Mine (putting me in the vast majority).
It is true, though, that Alaskans make their living from natural resources, renewable and non-renewable. Sometimes that use of resources is responsible, sometimes not. Doug is WAY off the mark when he criticized Alaska fisheries management, for example, which has been cited as a model for the world. Especially Alaska's salmon management.
As for other environmental preservation, Alaskans deserve some credit as well as some blame. Alaskans, overall, are pretty responsible about wildlife management and appreciative of wildlife. Anchorage is the only big city, maybe in the world, where brown (as well as black) bears roam, and in fact are valued. In other U.S. states, people are still fearful of brown bears, as well as wolves, and fighting hard to prevent reintroduction.
Alaska was also the first U.S. state to impose environmental regulations on cruise ships, which previously had been major sources of water pollution, as well as emitters of air pollution. Other states are taking Alaska's lead. Former Gov. Tony Knowles deserves a lot of the credit for Alaska's cruise-ship regulation, which now has benefitted all places where the ships go because the cruise lines have had to upgrade their wastewater-treatment systems to comply with Alaska law.
Doug is also WAY off the mark when he refers to the Alaska Permanent Fund dividend as a bribe or a payment from the state to residents. It is an annual dividend from investment earnings in a publicly owned fund that was built from public royalties earned through the extraction of a publicly owned resource, oil. Almost every drop of oil that is pumped out of Alaska comes from state-owned land and state-owned mineral rights. The people of Alaska own that oil and also are entitled to the financial benefits when their public oil is extracted. Unlike other states (such as Texas, where ranchers can become oil barons if oil is discovered on their property), there are no private individuals who own mineral rights. It's illegal. All mineral rights are owned by: the state, the federal government or the Alaska Native corportations. Don't have any more time to explain the Permanent Fund or its dividend; just Google Jay Hammond (populist pro-environment, Big Oil-fighting former governor who's considered the father of the dividend) to learn more.
And speaking of Alaska Natives, I would wager that we've done a much better job here of preserving our Native cultures, including our Native languages, than most other states.
Yes, Alaska's Congressional delegation and the Corrupt Bastards Club (primarily Ben Stevens) have what is coming to them, but don't bash all of Alaska unfairly along the way.

Posted by: In defense of Alaska | July 31, 2007 03:03 PM

Doug C.'s comments aren't exactly, well, accurate or fair.

FBI - Stevens-1764

Alaska has a long history of irresponsible resource exploitation (starting with Russian fur traders) alternating with periods of resource conservation. Sometimes, the rip-rape-and-run practices are being conducted in one area while wise conserveration practices are taking place elsewhere.
I have long been a critic of many in Alaska's political establishment, including the Congressional delegation. I don't support drilling in ANWR (putting me at odds with most of the state) or the Teshekpuk Lake area (putting me probably on the same side as a majority of Alaskans); I'm skeptical about the Kensington Mine (putting me in a minority) and opposed to the Pebble Mine (putting me in the vast majority).
It is true, though, that Alaskans make their living from natural resources, renewable and non-renewable. Sometimes that use of resources is responsible, sometimes not. Doug is WAY off the mark when he criticized Alaska fisheries management, for example, which has been cited as a model for the world. Especially Alaska's salmon management.
As for other environmental preservation, Alaskans deserve some credit as well as some blame. Alaskans, overall, are pretty responsible about wildlife management and appreciative of wildlife. Anchorage is the only big city, maybe in the world, where brown (as well as black) bears roam, and in fact are valued. In other U.S. states, people are still fearful of brown bears, as well as wolves, and fighting hard to prevent reintroduction.
Alaska was also the first U.S. state to impose environmental regulations on cruise ships, which previously had been major sources of water pollution, as well as emitters of air pollution. Other states are taking Alaska's lead. Former Gov. Tony Knowles deserves a lot of the credit for Alaska's cruise-ship regulation, which now has benefitted all places where the ships go because the cruise lines have had to upgrade their wastewater-treatment systems to comply with Alaska law.
Doug is also WAY off the mark when he refers to the Alaska Permanent Fund dividend as a bribe or a payment from the state to residents. It is an annual dividend from investment earnings in a publicly owned fund that was built from public royalties earned through the extraction of a publicly owned resource, oil. Almost every drop of oil that is pumped out of Alaska comes from state-owned land and state-owned mineral rights. The people of Alaska own that oil and also are entitled to the financial benefits when their public oil is extracted. Unlike other states (such as Texas, where ranchers can become oil barons if oil is discovered on their property), there are no private individuals who own mineral rights. It's illegal. All mineral rights are owned by: the state, the federal government or the Alaska Native corportations. Don't have any more time to explain the Permanent Fund or its dividend; just Google Jay Hammond (populist pro-environment, Big Oil-fighting former governor who's considered the father of the dividend) to learn more.
And speaking of Alaska Natives, I would wager that we've done a much better job here of preserving our Native cultures, including our Native languages, than most other states.
Yes, Alaska's Congressional delegation and the Corrupt Bastards Club (primarily Ben Stevens) have what is coming to them, but don't bash all of Alaska unfairly along the way.

Posted by: In defense of Alaska | July 31, 2007 03:03 PM

You appear to have a backup -- it's coming out your mouth.

Posted by: QED, Try Metamucil | July 31, 2007 03:04 PM

FBI - Stevens-1765

Frank G writes
"Alaskans are sick of partisan politics and bickering. Ethan B. was minority whip and all he did was whine. He's from Frisco - Alaskans are ready to elect a real Alaskan. jake's the best guy for the job."

Frank, sounds like you're a local Alaskan. What do they like, from the Republicans? My guess is the Alaskan mindset identifies with the traditional GOP sales pitch of small government, low taxes, states' rights, etc. Is it that stuff, or the social stuff - 'family values' etc?

Posted by: bsimon | July 31, 2007 03:04 PM

another hour, another new name for gutless coward/ignorant moron

Posted by: QED = Gutless Coward | July 31, 2007 03:05 PM

A number of us suspect that he works at the RNC and that it is part of his job

how many voices inside your pea brain today Kos koward?

does any sane person think the RNC would pay someone to come in here and try to get Kos Koward to vote R? Only a Lib.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 03:05 PM

If you can't win, cheat - I believe that what you described is the method which Maine already uses to award Presidential electoral votes.

It's just one of a number alternatives in the discussion of Electoral College reforms.

Didn't the Powers That Be in Maryland just come up with something similar?

It may have been done quietly in Sacramento, but it is a legitimate alternative to the current archaic process. It's far from cheating.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 03:08 PM

Therefore, the money controls the media, because if advertisers don't like the message, they pull their dollars. Result: conservatives control the media."

Well said james. And so who is really controlling the media?
$$$

Some one please explain to me just how this article is "bias" - (I think that perhaps you mean to use the word biased)

It factually reports the goings on regarding Stevens and Young. It states that the Alaska Republican party has undergone some upheavals, and implies that Alaskan voters have a somewhat independent streak.

It closes by pointing out the Alaska is a strongly Republican state that will probably continue to be so.

Oh, wait a minute. The facts reported in the story cast a bad light on Republicans. Silly me - of course it's biased.

Posted by: John D in Houston | July 31, 2007 03:10 PM

'Yeah, this article has sickly bias.'

why is it than cons are so incredibly stupid they can't write a sentence? i guess that answers itself. if they weren't they wouldn't be cons.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 03:10 PM

Stevens is a criminal hack. The rest of the country should file a class-action suit suit against Alaska to recoup the theft from the treasury. I'd happily give up the pitance my MN hacks managed to bring home to get the Alaska haul returned.

Posted by: RK | July 31, 2007 03:11 PM

Mike,

Please explain to me how Hilary Clinton is a "known felon". I believe that one has to be indicted and convicted for that to be an accurate statement.

If you are referring to Whitewater, I think you'd better check out how that one turned out. I beleive that there was no wrong doing found.

Posted by: John D in Houston | July 31, 2007 03:12 PM

Mike: "But what do you do with a known felon? Nominate her for President."

The Web is the greatest invention ever for gutless cowards like Mike. It allows them to engage in libelous behavior from the safety of mommy's basement.

Posted by: Loudoun Voter | July 31, 2007 03:13 PM

'What was the last study... reporters and journalists who are democrats outnumber republicans 4:1. And what was it, 22? out of the 25 highest circulated newspapers weigh heavily toward liberals' that phony study again -- included clerks and folks in the mail room -- and even people who were no longer employed -- by not a single editor. bogus through and through.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 03:13 PM

"Power tends to corrupt, and absolute power corrupts absolutely. Great men are are almost always bad men."

Well, "!". 50% of the last phrase may, indeed, apply to Senator Stevens.

Posted by: proudtobeGOP | July 31, 2007 03:13 PM

Sorry about the double post. I didn't realize that the internet isn't a big truck you can dump stuff on! It's a series of tubes, I have learned from an informed source, and I guess mine were blocked.

Posted by: In defense of Alaska | July 31, 2007 03:13 PM

FBI - Stevens-1767

Who was the last Democrat who lied to US into a war that destabilized an entire region of the world and cost over 3,000 lives so far?

Isn't it long past time to impeach Bush and Cheney, and throw MANY of their upper-level minions in jail??!

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 03:14 PM

BSIMON, I think you hit the nail on the head. It's not a particular party, it's the lack of checks and balances that comes from one-party rule. Don't forget, our government had one-party rule for 6 straight years; hence, more corruption.

Posted by: Bo | July 31, 2007 03:14 PM

"Isn't it long past time to impeach Bush and Cheney, and throw MANY of their their upper-level minions in jail??!"

I'm quite sure the Democrats are perfectly happy to allow this crew to remain in office right through next year's presidential campaign.

Posted by: Loudoun Voter | July 31, 2007 03:16 PM

...and to the poster preceding my correctly spelled, capitalized and punctuated post, from one considered to be a conservative by my Democrat friends: huh?

Posted by: RK | July 31, 2007 03:16 PM

Loudon can point to 1 intelligent conversation in 2 weeks. OK.

that puts him well above his fellow kooks. Try to find a single, original, creative idea from the loonies of the left here. you can't because they don't exist.

what you get is Bush bashing, cutting and pasting from lefty hate blogs, ruin America sensibilities and of course insults. there is also one particular demented individual who sees something called zouk everywhere he goes and likes to shout it to the moon when he spies it. what sort of poor tormented creature lives thier life like this?

watch and you will see.

"so incredibly stupid they can't write a sentence" followed by:

"if they weren't they wouldn't be cons"

Laughing yet. there is more.

Posted by: QED | July 31, 2007 03:18 PM

Cons prefer corruption to socialism. That really just about sums up their incredible and bottomless stupidity. They'd rather their money stolen than have a social safety net. No wonder the ads on con talk shows are all for baldness and ED remedies and snake oil salesmen. They are stoooooooopid.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 03:18 PM

FBI - Stevens-1768

If you are referring to Whitewater, I think you'd better check out how that one turned out. I beleive that there was no wrong doing found.

Ha ha - try to ignore the fact that most of all their friends went to jail. nope- no wrong doing there. If you're a Lib.

How about you face the fact that clinton 1 was the most corrupt administration in modern history? the most convictions, the most pleas, the most fleeing from the country, etc,.

Posted by: no facts please, we're Dems | July 31, 2007 03:20 PM

VECO had two large contracts in Barbados; a pipeline and a prison. People here are wondering if there were inappropiate payments here as well

Posted by: trjr7246 | July 31, 2007 03:22 PM

No wonder the ads on con talk shows are all for baldness and ED remedies and snake oil salesmen. They are stoooooooopid the end of Lib intellect is upon us. this is the last try at making sense

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 03:23 PM

Off thread but, only a lawyer could come up with this opinion:
Does S.C. Law Cover Federal Campaigns?
By Jim Davenport, AP

COLUMBIA, S.C. - South Carolina law may allow state workers to use taxpayer computers and time to promote presidential campaigns, a state Ethics Commission lawyer said.

The comments from commission general counsel Cathy Hazelwood came after an Associated Press review of e-mails that showed former state Treasurer Thomas Ravenel exchanged messages promoting Republican presidential candidate Rudy Giuliani during office hours. Ravenel resigned last week following a federal cocaine charge.

"I think an argument can be made that it is an unwise use of time; however, campaign practices specifically excludes federal candidates," Hazelwood wrote in an e-mail to the AP.

Mental corruption!

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 03:25 PM

I see kowardly Kos klown is at full speed ahead on his hate and envy kick today. might as well write off this blog today.

funny how all the candidates but biden are in the pall of the hateful left. and afraid to take them on. why are Libs always afraid of everyone?

go the way of Dean and Lamont. Buh bye.

how will hillary the robot answer a real question if and when she finally gets one?

Posted by: ssdd | July 31, 2007 11:17 AM

A prediction that always comes true around here.

Posted by: truer words have not been said | July 31, 2007 03:26 PM

BSIMON, an answer to your question: Alaskans are not too much into the family-values stuff. The general political debates are over natural resources (mostly oil) and how to manage them -- extract or preserve. We have hard-core "boomers" who want to drill, mine and pave everything (like Frank Murkowski), hard-core "greenies" who live off the grid (Alaska has had the nation's most successful Green Party) and all varieties in between.
Lately, the major, overwhelming issue has been, what is going to be our relationship with the oil industry? Sarah Palin, though a Republican, campaigned and has governed as a tough-on-oil official. This makes her a very atypical Republican.
Social issues that are considered important in the Lower 48 -- abortion, gay rights, immigration -- are not big deals here. Socially, the state is pretty libertarian (like the Yukon and Northwest Territories). One issue that does come up perennially is the question of legalizing marijuana, or to what degree it should be legalized.
Alaskans tend to be not too straight-laced and not Bible-thumpers, even the Republicans. If we were, we wouldn't be living here.
Hope that gives you a sense of the social and political scene.

Posted by: In defense of Alaska | July 31, 2007 03:27 PM

FBI - Stevens-1769

"clinton 1 was the most corrupt administration in modern history? the most convictions, the most pleas"

You're ignoring the pardons given by Republican Presidents in this statement, right Zouk!

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 03:28 PM

QED - HAHA I'm laughing. I didn't want to sound stupid by asking who the hell Zouk is -- because a lot of people seem to see him. I thought maybe my computer wasn't downloading all the posts.

Posted by: Mike | July 31, 2007 03:28 PM

With reference to the butt-ferret who chose to bring Louisiana into the discussion about ALASKA: Right now our biggest embarrasment is Senator David Vitter. Our biggest short-term problem is a federal government who is much more interested in rebuilding Iraq (which they destroyed), than Louisiana. Our biggest long-term problem is that the majority of domestic oil production runs through this state and our politics is constantly interfered with by "Big-Oil".

Are you still going to say that the troubles of my state are caused by Democrats? Check the facts and history of Louisiana before using it in a lame attempt to make yourself think you have a point.

Posted by: Louisiana Resident | July 31, 2007 03:28 PM

Oh look, it's No Facts again! Now we can continue our discussion of DDT. For those that missed it, here's a recap:

No Facts (AKA kingofzouk, QED, SSDD, etc.): Since DDT was banned, malaria has killed millions.
Blarg (AKA me): No, DDT is still used to fight malaria.
No Facts: You didn't cite a source! You're a lying lib liar who lies!
Blarg: [Citations]
No Facts: [Silence]

So, are you going to retract your ridiculous claims that DDT bans have killed millions in Africa? Or are you just going to ignore the fact that you have, once again, been proven wrong? I'm betting on the latter. I also bet you'll post the same lies again in a few days.

Posted by: Blarg | July 31, 2007 03:29 PM

How much did the Repub get for the pardon. I think the actual cash value of a pardon has slumped in the last 7 years. How much is a stay in the WH these days? Oh, I keep forgetting. all that stuff was made up by Ann coulter. And Monica and all the other bimbos lie. If you're a Lib.

Posted by: QED | July 31, 2007 03:32 PM

"What's wrong with the Empire? It's run by Darth Vader and the Emperor. Corruption inevitably results."

Posted by: Jed Dye | July 31, 2007 03:33 PM

FBI - Stevens-1770

According to Bate and Okonski, writing in a recent issue of UpDate, the monthly newsletter of the Competitive Enterprise Institute, "Spraying DDT in houses and on mosquito breeding grounds was the primary reason that rates of malaria around the world declined dramatically after the Second World War. Nearly one million Indians died from malaria in 1945," they report, "but DDT spraying reduced this to a few thousand by 1960. However. concerns about the environmental harm of DDT led to a decline in spray- ing and, likewise, a resurgence of malaria. Today there are once again millions of cases of malaria in India, and over 300 million cases worldwide -- most in subsaharan Africa."

http://www.conservativemonitor.com/news/2001017.shtml

Posted by: no facts please, we're Dems | July 31, 2007 03:36 PM

It has been 30 years since DDT was banned as a result of Rachel Carson's literary skills. Malaria and other diseases controlled by the "miracle pesticide" are on the rise again. In Sri Lanka, five years after DDT was banned under pressure from U.S. regulators and diplomats, malaria deaths were back up to 2.5 million per year.

http://www.freerepublic.com/focus/f-news/731285/posts

Posted by: we demand our own facts | July 31, 2007 03:37 PM

Sixty million people have died needlessly of malaria, since the imposition of the 1972 ban on DDT, and hundreds of millions more have suffered from this debilitating disease. The majority of those affected are children. Of the 300 to 500 million new cases of malaria each year, 200 to 300 million are children, and malaria now kills one child every 30 seconds. Ninety percent of the reported cases of malaria are in Africa, and 40 percent of the world's population, inhabitants of tropical countries, are threatened by the increasing incidence of malaria.

The DDT ban does not only affect tropical nations. In the wake of the DDT ban, the United States stopped its mosquito control programs, cutting the budgets for mosquito control and monitoring. Exactly as scientists had warned 25 years ago, we are now facing increases of mosquito-borne killer diseases--West Nile fever and dengue, to name the most prominent.

http://www.21stcenturysciencetech.com/articles/summ02/DDT.html

Posted by: what about wiki? | July 31, 2007 03:40 PM

Trying to keep this on thread - would DDT work on the Black Flies in Alaska?

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 03:40 PM

While it is true that we don't know every last risk of using DDT, we know very well what the risk of malaria is - and on balance malaria is far, far more deadly than the worst that one could imagine about DDT," said Amir Attaran, director of the Malaria Project in Washington. He and the Malaria Foundation International organised the open letter.

"We are not in love with DDT. But the reality is that if you try to get rid of DDT without guaranteeing that money will be available for alternatives, you will kill people.

http://www.malaria.org/DDT_Guardian_VIII_99.html

Posted by: dem science = opinion | July 31, 2007 03:42 PM

To only a few chemicals does man owe as great a debt as to DDT... In little more than two decades, DDT has prevented 500 million human deaths, due to malaria, that otherwise would have been inevitable."

FBI - Stevens-1771

[National Academy of Sciences, Committee on Research in the Life Sciences of the Committee on Science and Public Policy. 1970. The Life Sciences; Recent Progress and Application to Human Affairs; The World of Biological Research; Requirements for the Future.]
It is believed that [malaria] afflicts between 300 and 500 million every year, causing up to 2.7 million deaths, mainly among children under five years.

[Africa News, January 27, 1999]
Some mosquitoes became "resistant" to DDT. "There is persuasive evidence that antimalarial operations did not produce mosquito resistance to DDT. That crime, and in a very real sense it was a crime, can be laid to the intemperate and inappropriate use of DDT by farmers, espeially cotton growers. They used the insecticide at levels that would accelerate, if not actually induce, the selection of a resistant population of mosquitoes."

[Desowitz, RS. 1992. Malaria Capers. W.W. Norton & Company]
"Resistance" may be a misleading term when discussing DDT and mosquitoes. While some mosquitoes develop biochemical/physiological mechanisms of resistance to the chemical, DDT also can provoke strong avoidance behavior in some mosquitoes so they spend less time in areas where DDT has been applied -- this still reduces mosquito-human contact. "This avoidance behavior, exhibited when malaria vectors avoid insecticides by not entering or by rapidly exiting sprayed houses, should raise serious questions about the overall value of current physiological and biochemical resistance tests. The continued efficacy of DDT in Africa, India, Brazil, and Mexico, where 69% of all reported cases of malaria occur and where vectors are physiologically resistant to DDT (excluding Brazil), serves as one indicator that repellency is very important in preventing indoor transmission of malaria."

DDT was banned by an EPA administrator who ignored the decision of his own administrative law judge.

Feeding primates more than 33,000 times the average daily human exposure to DDT (as estimated in 1969 and 1972) was "inconclusive with respect to a carcinogenic effect of DDT in nonhuman primates."

[J Cancer Res Clin Oncol 1999;125(3-4):219-25]

http://www.junkscience.com/ddtfaq.html

Posted by: Dem science = junk science | July 31, 2007 03:45 PM

I've lived in Alaska for almost 40 yrs, and watched in disgust as the politicians have become more and more corrupt. however I doubt it has anything to do with political affiliation. When you are coming from a state with so many natural resources to be exploited, a politician is going to be courted by the industries attempting to exploit those resources. It is only human to take the money and run, too bad. I am glad they are finally getting some outside scrutiny. This house deal of Teddy's is nothing, compared to what he has socked away, imho.

Posted by: charlotte | July 31, 2007 03:45 PM

Dem science -
1. write a book that predicts doom and gloom
2. go to wikipedia and enter in your opinion.
3. find some journalist who flopped out of college because calculus was too hard, get them to report the news
4. find sufficient negative motivation in all your skeptics
5. no matter what, ignore numbers, facts, figures and old science.

Posted by: QED | July 31, 2007 03:48 PM

As a committed Lib , I will study the DDT facts above and not rest until I can find a single misspelled word with which to discredit the whole affair.

we are Libs, we don't do citations to scientific magazines. We only believe truth from Kos and NYT. Or any cable show with really low ratings.

FBI - Stevens-1772

Posted by: SSDD | July 31, 2007 03:50 PM

You're quoting from advocacy articles on sites like Free Republic. Those aren't valid sources; their facts are flat-out wrong. For instance, the 21stcenturysciencetech article refers to millions dying since the 1972 ban. But that ban was in the US ONLY. It was not an international ban. So unless 60 million people have died in the US because of lack of DDT, the US ban has nothing to do with anything. DDT is still used in malaria-prone countries.

Then there's the malaria.org article. It argues against a proposed DDT ban in 1999. And that ban was never enacted. Remind me how this helps your argument that millions of have died due to 1960s DDT bans.

By the way, the first limitations on DDT usage in the 60s were due to mosquitos showing resistance to DDT. Are you going to blame Rachel Carson and the environmentalist movement for that? No, that was caused by evolution, so I guess you'll have to blame Darwin.

Posted by: Blarg | July 31, 2007 03:51 PM

Can we Libs go back to the pre-internet days when facts and figures weren't so readily available. we always lose when actual numbers and facts are involved.

curse you al gore.

Can we get back to talking about Breck girls hair now. Our little Lib brains hurt.

Posted by: no facts please, we're Dems | July 31, 2007 03:53 PM

"Who was the last Democrat who lied to US into a war that destabilized an entire region of the world and cost over 3.000 lives so far?"

Johnson.
They U.S. government faked an attack on a ship in order to get the country to committ to invading Vietnam and interfering in a civil war that we had no part in and couldn't really benefit from all because of an over-the-top irrational, paranoid fear of a political philosophy.

Anyway, the cost of lives from the Iraq war is more around 300,000 instead of 3,000. Many of those 297,000 that you don't count were far more innocent and noble than the 3,000 that you bother to count. But it still isn't as high as Vietnam.

Posted by: Andrew | July 31, 2007 03:56 PM

So, are you going to retract your ridiculous claims that DDT bans have killed millions in Africa? Or are you just going to ignore the fact that you have, once again, been proven wrong? I'm betting on the latter. I also bet you'll post the same lies again in a few days.

Posted by: Blarg | July 31, 2007 03:29 PM

What say you now misguided fool? Want some ketchup with that. I don't expect a response after such a thorough drubbing. you Libs always run and hide when forcibly confronted.

Try this:

Mosquitoes are evil - like bush. that seems to be the level of your discourse on this blog.

Posted by: QED | July 31, 2007 03:56 PM

WASHINGTON - President Bush's choice to head the military Joint Chiefs of Staff said Tuesday an increase of troops in Iraq is giving commanders the forces needed to improve security there.

time to flop Hill, a new poll is in.

Posted by: no facts please, we're Dems | July 31, 2007 03:57 PM

FBI - Stevens-1773

I guess you weren't actually interested in a response of any depth to your idiotic idiotic demand. did you even look at the junk science site with solid citations on every claim - how about malaria.org.? Why demand answers and then ignore them. you are a coward and dishonest. a true Lib. hint - stay away from science - it makes you look even weaker and dumber than the average Lib, if that is even conceivable.

Posted by: QED | July 31, 2007 04:02 PM

"Before Democrats get to far ahead..."

CC, that should be "...too far...."

--repugs can't spell or use grammar...

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 04:04 PM

"Before Democrats get to far ahead..."

CC, that should be "...too far...."

--repugs can't spell or use grammar...

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 04:04 PM

Video: Feds Search Sen. Stevens' Home In Probe

Watch this video coverage of the breaking investigation now: http://onthehillblog.blogspot.com/2007/07/video-feds-search-sen-stevens-home-in.html

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 04:05 PM

'Ultimate power ultimately corrupts. However, of the sitting Senators who have have held office for >40 years, 5 out of 6 are Democrats.'

--therby implying that they have done something wrong, which they have not. you people are so deceptive, so dishonest.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 04:07 PM

But that ban was in the US ONLY.

who do you think makes the stuff for the rest of the world. I should have considered that you Libs don't do math or science. I forgot you have so little understanding of world economics as well.

If you really want an answer to all your clueless claims about DDT, simply go to the junk science site. It is all there complete with actual scientists and their publications. It will be a much better use of your time than this blog ever will be. you may learn something if you care to. I always thought that blarg was not a complete close-minded Lib, until now.

Posted by: no econ, we're Dems | July 31, 2007 04:07 PM

Mike says

"your to stupid to govern yourself."

!!

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 04:08 PM

You assert the benefits of socialism and cite Japan as a "socialist" economy.

Japan is an oligarchical economy that practiced precapitalist mercantilism until their monetary system nearly collapsed.

You correctly cite China as a Communist country - but its economy is largely capitalist, and certainly not Marxist.

There are no purely socialist economies in the industrialized world although there are various categories of "welfare states": countries in which most means of production and distribution are privately owned but the government provides a "safety blanket" for the lame and halt, the elderly, the orphan, the sick, and/or more.

From your examples you meant "welfare states" when you referred to "socialist" states.

These kinds of economies can exist in a dictatorship, like China, or in a representative government, like ours. Under a representative government, many people will opt for private control of the means of production and distribution, out of inherent distrust of one entity controlling the lifeblood of the nation. As a result, actual democratic socialism has only worked for limited times in local contexts where everyone knew and generally trusted everyone else. Even the Israeli kibbutzim have now largely disappeared.

FBI - Stevens-1774

Not one voter in ten in Alaska would choose socialism, although most enjoy the "oil dividend".

Posted by: to "Andrew" at 3:02 PM | July 31, 2007 04:11 PM

'funny how all the howling misfit moonbats'

so very characteristic, koz -- what a brainless little illiterate twit you are. and yes, some do believe you work for the RNC -- it is well documented that they have been hiring trolls since 2006 -- but you'd think they'd pick somene smarter.

one of the main reasons people think this, however, is that you could not posibly on here as much you are every single day, if you had an actual job.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 04:13 PM

"Many of those 297,000 that you don't count were far more innocent and noble than the 3,000 that you bother to count" - Andrew

And YOU know that they were far more innocent and noble because?

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 04:14 PM

The junk science site says nothing to prove your original statement that millions have died due to DDT bans. Your citations from that site usually don't even relate to your point.

The first quote describes that DDT prevented many deaths in the 40s and 50s. As a quote from 1970, it has nothing to do with post-Silent Spring DDT bans.

The second quote says that many people are killed by malaria. It mentions nothing about Rachel Carson, the environmental movement, or DDT bans.

Then you include a couple of quotes about mosquitos becoming resistant to DDT. This actually undercuts your point. If overspraying causes resistance, then not overspraying is good. Guess what? Silent Spring advocated against overspraying DDT. And since Silent Spring, overspraying has been significantly reduced. Spraying of DDT continues, however, because it was not banned.

Then you say that DDT was banned for bad reasons. That still doesn't prove that the US ban caused any deaths.

You wrap up with a study that says DDT doesn't cause cancer. That still says nothing about your original point.

And, yes, I looked at malaria.org. It has many references to the fact that DDT is still used to fight malaria in Third World countries. Which casts some doubt on your original claim that DDT bans kill millions, because it clearly shows that DDT HAS NOT BEEN BANNED IN COUNTRIES WITH MALARIA!

Face it; you've got nothing. You pulled up a bunch of citations that are only periphally related to your original statement, and none that provide any sort of proof. And every time I point out how wrong you are, you paste in a few more pages of crap, then mock me for not responding. Absolutely pathetic.

Posted by: Blarg | July 31, 2007 04:14 PM

Oh look, it's No Facts again! Now we can continue our discussion of DDT. For those that missed it, here's a recap:

No Facts (AKA kingofzouk, QED, SSDD, etc.): Since DDT was banned, malaria has killed millions.
Blarg (AKA me): No, DDT is still used to fight malaria.

FBI - Stevens-1775

No Facts: You didn't cite a source! You're a lying lib liar who lies!
Blarg: [Citations from wikipedia]
No Facts: multiple citations from scientific sources
Blarg: Waaahh, can we go back to opinions only?
Other Libs - we don't do facts, why try? Poll anyone?

Posted by: no facts please, we're Dems | July 31, 2007 04:15 PM

Simple....Anwar The Dems will never get Alaska

Posted by: Jack | July 31, 2007 04:16 PM

'demented individual who sees something called zouk everywhere he goes'

QED/zouk -- anon is several people. your speech and grammar patterns, and particlar obssessions make you recognizable no matter how many names you use -- no one is foooled.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 04:17 PM

'might as well write off this blog today.'

you always promise zouk and then you never leave. ever.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 04:19 PM

Discrimination allows superiority where truth is hidden and corruption tends to creep in.

This is the human equation.

People change day to day. Things change, steal rusts while conceited blows away, but the energy that makes us who we are moves through us as we experience our lives.

Governments, Advocates. Churches, and Media put pressure on sex offenders who are struggling daily to make a way for their families.

These groups are one in the same who have created the realm of secrecy and oppress for gain.

To be ashamed of being a flawed human who makes mistakes, is the responsibility of the person/group/s allowing laws of decimation which is abuse.

Inflicting pain on any person who has been betrayed by that societies recklessness to hide the truth because of its own shame is the ultimate in irresponsibility.

By continuing to advocate lifetime sentences, separation, eradication, concerning sexual offenses is recognition of the breakdown of group/s and any system/s which supports this human rights abuse .

There can be no justice where the responsible party is the society which refuses acceptance of its error.

FBI - Stevens-1776

Thinking that labeling anyone concerning life and death decisions with regard to sexual offenses has no validity.

The stigma/demonization/and continuance of the myth is perpetrated by the group/s and any system/s that makes people suffer for a belief that has only for centuries hidden its own truth.

Please take time to write those who can change our laws.

What ever we do we do to ourselves as money and power leads us by the ring in our nose rendering us unable to hear or see beyond sound of our own greed.

Mr. & Mrs. Keith Richard Radford Jr.
http://www.SOSunite.com
http://www.youtube.com/sosunite

Posted by: Keith Richard Radford Jr | July 31, 2007 04:19 PM

I'll tell you what's wrong with Alaska. It's cold up there, the winters are dark and long, which all make for boring people with nothing better to do than get into mischief. I think we ought to send Hillary and her groupies up there where they wont menace the rest of us.

Posted by: MikeB | July 31, 2007 04:19 PM

If you've ever bothered to notice you would see that conservative talk show hosts all call themselves "political satirist". They have to do this to keep from being sued for the lies that they say about people. A person who calls himself a journalist is bound by law (and news company policies) to be able to prove that he has reasonble evidence that what he writes is true.

Do you really think that Rush Limbaugh believes anything he says on the radio?

Do you also think that Dan Rather would have paid the price for being wrong if he had been a talk radio charlatan like Limbaugh?

Do you really think that you being a republican tool makes everyone who disagrees with you a liberal?

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 04:20 PM

'I also bet you'll post the same lies again in a few days.'

blarg, zoukie/QED/etc -- has a standard routine, a standard set of talking points he posts every single day -- so my guess is it will come up on the next thread.

oh and look how precious -- he uses the American Nazi white suremacists over at the Little Green Football site as a credible reference.

LOL....

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 04:23 PM

I simply don't have the patience to do all your work in educating yourself. I always suspected you were slow blarg, but now i am convinced. try this:

The late Dr. J. Gordon Edwards estimated that 190 people per minute are either dying or suffering directly or indirectly from the USA ban of DDT and other pesticides.

http://3billionandcounting.com/index2.php

this should speak directly to your carved out argument, for what I am no longer sure. If you keep back peddling, maybe you will arrive where you began. I am done with arguing with dimwits who couldn't admit an error if it hit them in the face. After having written that last sentence, I understand hill's position. It is no different than the rest of you liars and enablers.

Posted by: QED | July 31, 2007 04:26 PM

FBI - Stevens-1777

MikeB - maybe we could send all the engineers to Alaska too.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 04:35 PM

'Do you really think that you being a republican tool makes everyone who disagrees with you a liberal?'

they don't think -- that's the pronblem.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 04:35 PM

don't get curious and head over to junk science and look around at your new religion - global warming. there is real science there and you Libs will be very dissappointed.

Stick with what you know - insults, slander and emotionalism. Men who act like women and women who look like men. Pretty funny when the most masculine member of your party is hillary.

Posted by: QED | July 31, 2007 04:36 PM

""The Mona Lisa should hang in a museum, not a subway platform. The Statue of Liberty should stand unvarnished in New York Harbor, not draped with corporate logos.

And The Wall Street Journal should be owned by a company dedicated to maintaining its integrity, not one grasping to find content for a yet-to-be-launched cable channel."

wow.

http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/19916213/?GT1=10150

Posted by: rufus1133 | July 31, 2007 04:36 PM

U.S. toll in Iraq lowest in 8 months

Ohhh bad news for Ms Reid.

Posted by: good news for US is bad for Libs | July 31, 2007 04:38 PM

See, someone does watch MSNBC. I thought you all were extinct.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 04:39 PM

The level of nastiness on this thread is unbelievable. This is just the way the repubs like it. Hurl insults at each other--that way no serious discussions can occur and the political elites in Washington can go on scheming their corrupt, criminal enterprises. Why do you think Rove et al bring out the hot topics like gay marriage, flag burning, aboertion, etc. before all elections? The answer is to distract the rabblefrom knowing what's being done in Washington against most people's self interest. They don't have3 to bother anymore--you're all distracting yourselves now.

Posted by: Bo | July 31, 2007 04:42 PM

No, Zouk a lower death toll is always better news for all of us.

Now, let's make it progressively lower. Instead of being used as twisted logic for having to send more troops in, to get them killed.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 04:42 PM

Hit number two, after lowe's last week:

"Home Depot seems to have had a change of heart. They're now unequivocally telling their customers that they will not advertise on Bill O'Reilly's show."

Posted by: rufus | July 31, 2007 04:43 PM

Why aren't you in the Military, zouk/QED-- instead of sitting on your pimply white a*s typing all day, shilling for chemical companies?

ANSWER ZOUK/QED - WHY AREN'T YOU IN IRAQ? WHY DO YOU ALWAYS AVOID THE QUESTION?

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 04:44 PM

Can we hurry up and surrender now. what would happen to my majority if somehow we were to win this war? Now that I have staked my career on losing, I really need it to happen soon. Nancy - help!

FBI - Stevens-1778

Posted by: Reid my Libs | July 31, 2007 04:44 PM

QED: "Stick with what you know - insults, slander and emotionalism. Men who act like women and women who look like men. Pretty funny when the most masculine member of your party is hillary."

That's not too internally inconsistent, is it? What a d-bag.

Posted by: QED: What a Dick | July 31, 2007 04:45 PM

Troll Bait:
1. DDT
2. Global warming
3. Harry Reid or Nancy Pelosi
4. Math

What am I missing?

Posted by: Don't feed the trolls! | July 31, 2007 04:47 PM

Republican presidential hopeful Rudy Giuliani on Tuesday offered a consumer-oriented solution to the nation's health care woes that relies on giving individuals tax credits to purchase private insurance.

Edwards estimates that his plan would cost $90 billion to $120 billion per year

Obama estimates his plan would cost $50 billion to $65 billion per year

Posted by: Reid my Libs, lots of taxes | July 31, 2007 04:47 PM

trolls -- let's see, you're missing -- how we are winning in iraq, how 'Libs' don't understand economics, how "Dems' will raise taxes -- he's got quite a list. Every day.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 04:50 PM

Hillary, Nancy, please show me how to be a man. I seem to have lost my way. you two clearly know more about it than I do.

Posted by: Reid my Libs | July 31, 2007 04:51 PM

nd no amount of time will make much of a difference" in the war in Iraq. "[P] rudence dictates that we plan for an eventual drawdown and the transition of responsibilities to Iraqi security forces," he said. In questioning later, he conceded, "there does not appear to be much political progress" in Iraq.

Mullen also said, "A protracted deployment of U.S. troops to Iraq...risks further emboldening Iranian hegemonic ambitions and encourages their continued support to Shia insurgents in Iraq and the Taliban in Afghanistan."

In the end, however, Mullen qualified his skepticism over the current course in Iraq by endorsing a long-term occupation. "U.S. military forces will be needed in Iraq for 'years not months," he said.

UPDATE: Asked whether or not U.S. forces were "winning" in Iraq, Mullen said; "[b]ased on the...lack of political reconciliation...I would be concerned about whether we'd be winning or not," Tim Grieve notes.

FBI - Stevens-1779

Posted by: x | July 31, 2007 04:53 PM

Oh yes I forgot:
5. The elimination of tax cuts for millionaires and billionaires.

Posted by: Don't feed the trolls! | July 31, 2007 04:53 PM

"I am done with arguing with dimwits who couldn't admit an error if it hit them them in the face."

Tell me what my error is.

Am I in error when I say that DDT is still widely used around the world? No, that's true. Malaria.org describes the use of DDT to fight malaria throughout Africa and Asia. This usage is supported by the World Health Organization.

Am I in error when I say that the 1972 ban only affects the US? Nope, that's true too. Other countries banned DDT earlier, or later, or not at all. And, of course, it's not banned in countries that still suffer from malaria.

Am I in error when I say that your citations are meaningless? Looks like I'm correct there also. Just because you're incapable of remembering what you're arguing about doesn't mean that everyone else is. None of your citations have done anything to prove your point.

Am I in error to continue a conversation with someone who does nothing but spout half-truths and insults? Well, I'm afraid you've got me there.

Posted by: Blarg | July 31, 2007 04:55 PM

"trolls -- let's see, you're missing -- how we are winning in iraq, how 'Libs' don't understand economics, how "Dems' will raise taxes -- he's got quite a list. Every day."

Raise taxes. Yeah. if you make over a million. I have a novil idea. Instead of hording your wealth, why not pay your employee's more. That will bring down your taxable income :)

Posted by: rufus1133 | July 31, 2007 04:58 PM

'Am I in error to continue a conversation with someone who does nothing but spout half-truths and insults? Well, I'm afraid you've got me there.'

It IS a waste of time, blarg -- zouk gets proven wrong and he just cites the same false stats all over again. he can no more tell the truth than explain why he isn't in Iraq, or why he doesn't have a job or a life.

Posted by: | July 31, 2007 05:04 PM

Reid my Libs says:

Hillary, Nancy, please show me how to be a man. I seem to have lost my way. you two clearly know more about it than I do.

This is [unintentionally] poignant. 10 year old boys are running this country.

Posted by: 1arryb | July 31, 2007 05:05 PM

After reading most of the comments, it is cetain to me, that most of these folks probably don't know where alaska is.
I have been a resident for 44 years.
Stevens and Young need to go, along with ted's son.
It is a great state and beautiful.Come up some June.

Posted by: Alaskana | July 31, 2007 05:10 PM

After reading most of the comments, it is cetain to me, that most of these folks probably don't know where alaska is.
I have been a resident for 44 years.
Stevens and Young need to go, along with ted's son.
It is a great state and beautiful.Come up some June, if your a anti Alaska, try December or January.

Posted by: Alaskana | July 31, 2007 05:11 PM

I feel that. Don't post for zouk. Post for the independant viewers who read, but are scared to post because they don't want to be put on some terrorist watch list. That's who you should post for. The people who are not in the know.

Don't worry about these fascists that know what time it is, but continue to spout propoganda. That is his game. don't let him suck you in. That's why I'm here. To battle the trolls (and be the furthest left) to give you the oppurtunity to speak freely to the independants. Speak your mind. Ignore the trolls. I got this :)

FBI - Stevens-1780

Posted by: rufus1133 | July 31, 2007 05:11 PM

Troll Bait:
1. DDT
2. Global warming
3. Harry Reid or Nancy Pelosi
4. Math
5. The elimination of tax cuts for millionaires and billionaires

This seems to cover it. Please take note.

Posted by: Don't feed the trolls! | July 31, 2007 05:23 PM

Trollbait, you forgot one:
6. volunteering to fight the trolls.

Posted by: bsimon | July 31, 2007 05:28 PM

You do me. I'll do me. I got my agenda. It is in progress and seems to be working. I'm the one doing the hard work out here. Help me, don't hinder me.

Do you, I'll do me. Ignore me if you must. Or leave. No disrespect.

Some things need to be said. Some people need to be called on their BS. With me being on here the furthest left, if gives all of you the chance to say whatever you want AND NOT BE SCARED. Maybe someone reading will clarify or clean up my statements for me, happens on here all the time. Maybe a troll will attack me rather than you, bsimon.

If you disagree or think I'm lying, research. If you can re-phrase, please do so. But don't silence me. If only we all could speak our minds without fear. That used to be what this country was founded on. The mere fact that you have ANY fear before posting ANYTHING shows how far this country is fallen

Posted by: rufus | July 31, 2007 05:35 PM

"You do me. I'll do me"

You do you that is. Sorry :)

Posted by: rufus | July 31, 2007 05:36 PM

"Trollbait, you forgot one:
6. volunteering to fight the trolls."

Eminently sensible IF you can first recognize the signs of trollism which are the first five on that list.

Posted by: Don't feed the trolls! | July 31, 2007 05:36 PM

Blah blah blah. Keep making yourself feel big.

Posted by: rufus | July 31, 2007 05:38 PM

rufus "Raise taxes. Yeah. if you make over a million"

Actually rufus, most of the dems plans would raise taxes on those making over $200,000 not a million. Your idea of punishing the successful in America is but one example of why the dems will lose again in '08.

Tax and spend dems; always consistent in that at least.

Posted by: proudtobeGOP | July 31, 2007 05:40 PM

FBI - Stevens-1781

Alaska! I have never been there. I have told I should more there. What is your state's political leanings. Are there more liberal areas than otehrs?

What is so good about Alaska? What is bad about Alaska?

Anybody that lives there or has lived there. Is it mostly military in the woods?

Posted by: Rufus1133 | July 31, 2007 05:43 PM

GOP. what's up Old man :).

I hear your attack. But what do you think about taxing the millionares TO FORCE the business owners to pay their employee's more?

I hear your attack and spin, but what about the poin tI made? Do you think that is a fair approach? Let me dig something up for you. You people say this a a republic, reminesent of the roman republic. If that's the case why to the top not filter the money down anymore. Why the hording Listen to this:

Posted by: rufus | July 31, 2007 05:47 PM

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Romulus_and_Remus

"The rest of the people became the populace of the city, and out of the populace, Romulus hand selected 100 of the most noble men to serve as a council for the city. He called these men Patricians and their council the Roman Senate. Romulus called these noble men Patricians not only because they were the fathers of legitimate sons, but also because he intended the great and the wealthy to treat the weak and the poor as fathers treat their sons."

Why does the party that claims patriotism as a virtue, hate this country so. Why do people that claim to be christians hate liberals and the poor so much. Why to the wealthy not share with the less fortunate so as to not involk the hungrey's wrath?

These questiosn are included in my previous. You want REAL conversation. Let us see how you answer a real question. Or if you answer it at all.

Posted by: rufus | July 31, 2007 05:51 PM

Post a Comment

We encourage users to analyze, comment on and even challenge washingtonpost.com's articles, blogs, reviews and multimedia features.

User reviews and comments that include profanity or personal attacks or other inappropriate comments or material will be removed from the site. Additionally, entries that are unsigned or contain "signatures" by someone other than the actual author will be removed. Finally, we will take steps to block users who violate any of our posting standards, terms of use or privacy policies or any other policies governing this site. Please review the full rules governing commentaries and discussions.

Name:

Comments:

FBI - Stevens-1782

Preview Submit

RSS Feed Subscribe to The Post

© 2006-2007 The Washington Post Company

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

December 22, 2007 Saturday
FINAL EDITION

Cuddy proposes Stevens rematch;
OFF LIMITS: Developer says he won't run on federal investigation.

BYLINE: By SEAN COCKERHAM scockerham@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 464 words

Anchorage developer David Cuddy is making another run against Ted Stevens.

Cuddy said he would file a letter of intent after New Year's to run in the 2008 Republican primary for the U.S. Senate. He last challenged Stevens over a decade ago.

Cuddy comes from one of Alaska's most prominent banking families. He's a former state legislator and used to be president of First National Bank of Anchorage. He spent time earlier this decade living in Los Angeles, consulting for the entertainment industry.

Cuddy spent roughly $1 million, most of that from his own bank account, in an unsuccessful effort to wrest the party nomination from Stevens in 1996. Cuddy got just 27 percent of the primary vote then.

Cuddy, 55, ran that race as a conservative who said he wanted to shrink government and cut taxes. It turned into a hard-hitting campaign in which Cuddy accused Stevens in a series of advertisements of breaking the law and abusing the perks of power. The Federal Election Commission ended up dismissing a claim by Cuddy that Stevens' 1990 campaign committee improperly spent campaign contributions on him and his staff.

Cuddy said Friday that in this race he doesn't plan to make an issue of the federal investigation of Stevens.

The FBI and IRS raided Stevens' Girdwood home in late July as part of a probe into corruption in Alaska politics. Stevens has not been charged.

But Cuddy said he does intend to focus on the broad issues of government reform and clean elections. He has said it's a question of whether voters want pork or good government.

Cuddy announced his plan to run late on Friday afternoon; Tim McKeever, who is acting as spokesman for Stevens' re-election effort, couldn't be reached for comment.

FBI - Stevens-1783

Anchorage pollster Dave Dittman said Friday night he thinks Cuddy could pose a challenge for Stevens.

Cuddy "will have a ways to go in re-establishing himself," said Dittman, who is doing work for the Stevens campaign.

But Ivan Moore, another Anchorage pollster and campaign consultant, earlier this week was dismissive of Cuddy's ability to seriously threaten Stevens in a Republican primary race.

"He may be in trouble, his negatives may be up, but he's still Ted," said Moore.

Moore often works for Democratic candidates. Democrats believe Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich would give Stevens real problems. Begich said he hasn't made up his mind whether to run.

194A-AN-13620-M;710

Ray Metcalfe, a former state legislator and founder of the Republican Moderate Party, is running for the U.S. Senate seat as a Democrat.

Rocky Caldero of Dutch Harbor and Frank Vondersaar of Homer have also filed to run as Democrats. Jerry Heikes of Palmer has filed to run for the U.S. Senate seat as a Republican.

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him at 257-4344.

LOAD-DATE: December 24, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Cuddy ran for Stevens' seat in 1996 and lost.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1784

<<Back

Locals react to federal investigations

by Rebecca Palsha
Wednesday, Aug. 1, 2007

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- Alaska has been thrust into a national spotlight due to suspect leadership of some of the state's most prominent people.

But how do Alaskans feel about the recent FBI search on the home of Sen. Ted Stevens and the accusations against some former members of the state Legislature?

Many people Channel 2 News spoke with said while they hoped no one is guilty, most seem concerned that federal agents had to get involved.

Vic Fischer, a former state legislator who helped draft the Alaska Constitution more than 50 years ago, said he was disappointed by the recent turn of events.

"It's sort of sad what's going on in Alaska," he said. "It's a shame that Alaska's reputation these days is getting rather messed up compared to what it's been."

Fischer said this is not what he and others envisioned when writing the state's Constitution and moving the U.S. territory toward federal statehood.

"Generally it was an era of optimism and vision," Fischer said. "That vision did not include the issues running around before us in Alaska today."

Former East Anchorage Rep. Tom Anderson was found guilty on seven felony counts just weeks ago; today, three other former state lawmakers await trials on corruption charges.

Now the Alaska pubic has something else to await as well, as events continue to unfold surrounding a federal raid of Sen. Stevens' Girdwood home and Alaska Congressman Don Young's implication in a public integrity investigation.

In some way, all have been linked to the VECO Corp. bribery scandal. VECO Corp. founder and former CEO Bill Allen pleaded guilty two months ago to bribing state lawmakers.

People around the nation are now keeping a close eye on Alaska politics, but what do locals think?

Jeff Slear of Anchorage said if something is discovered about Stevens, it should be pursued.

"I would hope he does everything legitimately, but he may be a target. However, if it's found out that it was wrongdoing, it should be investigated," Slear said.

Chuck Jerde of Anchorage said there is likely a reason that the investigation was started.

"They must have something, or else they wouldn't be looking. It's a pretty big deal and there is a good possibility there is something we don't know about," Jerde said.

University of Alaska Anchorage History professor Stephen Haycox said elections will tell how much of an impact the investigations had.

194A-AN-13620-M;7111

<<Back

Locals react to federal investigations

by Rebecca Palsha
Wednesday, Aug. 1, 2007

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- Alaska has been thrust into a national spotlight due to suspect leadership of some of the state's most prominent people.

But how do Alaskans feel about the recent FBI search on the home of Sen. Ted Stevens and the accusations against some former members of the state Legislature?

Many people Channel 2 News spoke with said while they hoped no one is guilty, most seem concerned that federal agents had to get involved.

Vic Fischer, a former state legislator who helped draft the Alaska Constitution more than 50 years ago, said he was disappointed by the recent turn of events.

"It's sort of sad what's going on in Alaska," he said. "It's a shame that Alaska's reputation these days is getting rather messed up compared to what it's been."

Fischer said this is not what he and others envisioned when writing the state's Constitution and moving the U.S. territory toward federal statehood.

"Generally it was an era of optimism and vision," Fischer said. "That vision did not include the issues running around before us in Alaska today."

Former East Anchorage Rep. Tom Anderson was found guilty on seven felony counts just weeks ago; today, three other former state lawmakers await trials on corruption charges.

Now the Alaska pubic has something else to await as well, as events continue to unfold surrounding a federal raid of Sen. Stevens' Girdwood home and Alaska Congressman Don Young's implication in a public integrity investigation.

In some way, all have been linked to the VECO Corp. bribery scandal. VECO Corp. founder and former CEO Bill Allen pleaded guilty two months ago to bribing state lawmakers.

People around the nation are now keeping a close eye on Alaska politics, but what do locals think?

Jeff Slear of Anchorage said if something is discovered about Stevens, it should be pursued.

"I would hope he does everything legitimately, but he may be a target. However, if it's found out that it was wrongdoing, it should be investigated," Slear said.

Chuck Jerde of Anchorage said there is likely a reason that the investigation was started.

"They must have something, or else they wouldn't be looking. It's a pretty big deal and there is a good possibility there is something we don't know about," Jerde said.

University of Alaska Anchorage History professor Stephen Haycox said elections will tell how much of an impact the investigations had.

FBI - Stevens-1786

194A-AN-13620-m,711

"I don't think we'll really know until we see how people vote for their legislators," Haycox said.

Voting may be the only real way of knowing. So for now, Fischer keeps his eye on the future.

"We'll just see what happens," Fischer said.

Democrats are very eager to see if the recent scandals will be enough to get their party members elected into office.

Contact Rebecca Palsha at rpalsha@ktuu.com

All content © Copyright 2000 - 2007 WorldNow and KTUU. All Rights Reserved.
For more information on this site, please read our Privacy Policy and Terms of Service.

FBI - Stevens-1787

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

August 12, 2007 Sunday
FINAL EDITION

First family of fur: PERRY GREEN; Alaskana Interview

BYLINE: Interview by JUDY FERGUSON Daily News correspondent

SECTION: LIFE; Pg. G3

LENGTH: 1119 words

I was born in 1936 in Seattle from a European line of master furriers dating back to the 18th century. My father, David Green, was born about 1900 in an Eastern European cultural center, Galicia, then a part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. My great-uncles immigrated to New York in the late 1800s. They established one of the largest fur manufacturing outlets in New York City, Green Brothers. In 1904, my grandfather and their eight children, including my 4-year-old father, David Green, followed.

When he was 10, my father apprenticed to a master furrier in Philadelphia, which was a 24/7 job. When he wasn't working, he read Jack London's "Call of the Wild," which captured his imagination to go north. When he was 16, his guild conferred on him the title "master furrier." With this background, he confidently headed north toward Alaska.

In 1921, he saw a sign in Seattle's Baker Fur Co. window -- "Help Wanted, Master Furrier" -- and stopped in. Six months later, he'd earned the respect of local furriers and had climbed Mount Rainier as well. Establishing a Seattle base, he left for Cordova but continued, over the years, to return to Seattle.

The copper mine at Kennicott, with its Copper River and Northwest Railroad terminus, had made Cordova a critical port. Dad opened a shop and became the local furrier. In those days, a customer didn't buy a ready-made coat but brought his own furs or selected hides from those in the store. A master furrier like my father could do everything: design, match, stretch, nail, cut and sew fur. Many wore fur, and the ultimate was the durable otter coat, considered a "lifetime" coat."

While in Cordova, a friend suggested to my dad to go meet Ruth Grad, a Latvian immigrant, the daughter of the first Hebrew teacher in Vancouver, British Columbia. In 1926, they married in Vancouver; Dad decided to close his Cordova shop. He began a store in Seattle but just in time for the Great Depression. He missed Alaska and, working with his brothers' New York City factory, he opened a second store in Ketchikan. In the late 1940s, he opened a third shop in Juneau. Dad was always on the road.

In the late 1930s, Aleuts on the Chain noticed Japanese scouting and mapping their islands. Consequently, the U.S. military planted forward observers on the islands. Working 18- to 20-hour shifts then, Dad began making full-length muskrat liners and parkas, both warm and camouflaging, for the observers. At the factory, he slept a few hours at night. Between 1939 and 1941, Mother carried shopping bags of food to feed him and the factory workers.

JOINING THE BUSINESS

In 1950 my brother, Jerry, and I spent our "free day," Sunday, at the factory. My dad would say to me, "You sew another seam like that, and I will kiss your hands -- and then cut them off." Of course, he never did.

As my father saw Anchorage becoming an important center, he decided to establish his company's headquarters (with an upstairs family apartment) on Fourth Avenue in 1950.

Six years later, I married 17-year-old Gloria Dolgoff in Seattle and moved her to "faraway" Alaska. It was only natural to start my own fur-buying business, Anchorage Fur Trading. I traveled four months annually buying ivory and furs. Over time, I visited over 300 villages -- Nikolski in the Chain, Mekoryuk on Nunivak Island, Dillingham, Chevak, St. Lawrence Island, up the Yukon River, north to Point Barrow, upriver, downriver and in between. I bought from grocers at Tok Junction, Tetlin and Northway, the Indians in the Copper River Basin and across the border into Yukon Territory.

Even though times were hard, I could leave my black bag with $20,000 cash in my host's home. In those days, there were still women who wore facial tattoos and men adept at survival skills who signed their name with an "X." I'd issue a check to village trappers, who then circulated it like cash. Six months later, the check with six or seven endorsements on the back would hit the bank in Anchorage. I thought life would always be the same. Children were important, old people were revered and there was a tranquility.

Other territorial fur buyers were Louis Rotman of Kotzebue, the last USPS dogsled mail carrier; Samuel Applebaum of Bethel (aka "Sardine Sam"); Fairbanks' Muskrat Johnny; Charlie Goldstein, a founder of Juneau and a respected fur buyer, who even spoke Tlingit; his colleague, Fred Hamburg, who was a U.S. marshal as well.

I sold to fur auctions all over the world, wherever the price was best for a particular pelt.

WHISKEY FOR TOOTHPASTE

In 1964, we had two Anchorage stores: David Green Furs here on Fourth as well as Arctic Fur and Leather on Fourth Avenue between D and E streets.

At 5:36 p.m. on Friday, March 27, my son, Alan, was climbing into the barber's chair when the earth began to shake. As my two children and I exited, the earth began opening and closing three to four inches every 15 yards, increasing then to 12 to 14 inches, and then, with a loud bang, it slammed shut. The buildings on the north of Fourth Avenue suddenly collapsed.

Leaving our children with my wife, I found my father alone in the athletic club, sitting on the massage table, repeating, "Well, the damned fools did it." When I asked, he exclaimed, "The Russians dropped an atomic bomb!"

After hearing the truth, he told me to go find Mother. I found her upstairs at home, rocking and lamenting, "Oh, my Passover dishes, all broken!" I took her to the window, where we surveyed the wreckage and I explained the event. On the day of both Good Friday and of Passover, we saw our home was untouched. Since the water was suspect, my father said, "Finally I get to brush my teeth with whiskey."

Soon he found it increasingly difficult to manage both the Anchorage and Seattle stores, and he reluctantly closed the Seattle factory.

By 1970 we knew my father's heart was bad. Both Jerry and I began to take over David Green Furs. In 1971, Dad was gone. About 1970, when my cousin in New York died, I also began running the New York factory.

In 2000, our children took over. Jerry's son, David, now manages David Green Furs. His wife, Shani, is our fashion manager. My daughter, Deborah Grashin, takes care of the accounting -- the "inside." My oldest son, Alan, runs the store in Ketchikan. Jerry's daughter, Sarah Green, runs Sarah's Specialty Shop, and my son Jay Green has three gift shops, Polar Bear Gifts.

We are a history of Alaska, where it has been my great joy to know its real people.

Judy Ferguson is a publisher and the author of three children's books, "Alaska's Secret Door," Alaska's Little Chief" and the newly released "Alaska's First People." Her Web site is www.alaska-highway.org/delta/outpost.

FBI - Stevens-1789

LOAD-DATE: August 14, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Photo by JUDY FERGUSON
Perry Green in 2007 with a painting of his father.
Historical photos courtesy of Perry Green
Perry Green with his father, David, at Fur Rendezvous, 1960. Perry traveled statewide as a fur buyer.
Brothers Jerry, left, and Perry Green in the 1990s.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Freelance

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1790

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

August 21, 2007 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

Oil tax nets $800M less than state predicted;

PPT: With special session looming, report on controversial net-profits tax draws mixed responses.

BYLINE: By TOM KIZZIA tkizzia@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1083 words

State income from the controversial new net-profits tax imposed on the oil industry a year ago will bring in $800 million less than expected this year, a Palin administration report concludes.

The main problem: Industry capital and operating expenses, which can now be deducted from profits before taxes, are twice as high as proponents predicted 12 months ago.

The huge gap between the tax as advertised and its actual performance is helping frame the debate for a special legislative session on oil taxes scheduled for October, Palin administration officials say.

"It does put the exclamation point on the concern that we need to re-examine this," said state Commissioner of Revenue Pat Galvin.

Gov. Sarah Palin said earlier this month she is calling for a second look at the new Petroleum Profits Tax, or PPT, in part because a cloud of corruption surrounds its origins. Three legislators have been charged in federal court with selling their votes on the tax to the oilfield-services company Veco.

The under-performance of the tax in its first year adds reasons for review, say critics of the tax.

"It exposes the weaknesses in the net-profits system right away," said David Gottstein, a member of Backbone, a bipartisan group pushing state lawmakers to take a tough stance on oil industry taxation. Backbone and others have long predicted the state would be no match for sophisticated oil company accounting.

But industry officials say the unexpectedly high deductions reflect real increases in steel prices and other costs these days. Operating the North Slope fields is expensive, they say - and jacking up taxes again could hurt investment here.

"Increased costs aren't necessarily a bad thing. It means the level of investment is up," said Kara Moriarty, deputy director of the Alaska Oil and Gas Association. "That's the balance PPT was meant to strike."

Palin officials concede that industry costs have indeed risen. They say the high costs are probably here to stay, and are not related to one-time expenses due to last year's spills and shutdowns on the North Slope.

Former Gov. Frank Murkowski's administration officials apparently failed to anticipate this 12 months ago when pushing for the PPT, Galvin said. "What I don't know is if the most current information was used, or if there was some suppression of current information because it didn't fit with the information being used," he said. "There's not a need for casting blame."

TAX IS TAINTED BY CORRUPTION SCANDAL

FBI - Stevens-1791

194A-AN-13620-M; 7/13

The report, issued earlier this month, says it's too soon to know whether the law's incentives have spurred new investments or led to excessive deductions.

The current state forecast for oil production and oil prices is slightly less than predicted, and these factors contributed in a small way to the under-performance of the tax, revenue officials said.

Palin says she plans to announce Sept. 4 how she wants the Legislature to change the oil tax.

Corruption will certainly be a theme of the session beginning Oct. 18. In August 2006, the PPT's passage in the state House hinged on a single vote. Two Veco executives have pleaded guilty to bribing lawmakers to vote in step with industry on the tax. Critics say offers of money and jobs may have swayed enough votes to prevent the Legislature from approving a higher tax rate, or another sort of tax entirely.

With the timing that has become a Palin trademark, the governor will be announcing her oil tax decision one day before the scheduled opening of the trials of former Reps. Pete Kott, R-Eagle River, and Bruce Weyhrauch, R-Juneau, both of whom are accused of selling their PPT votes to Veco in 2006.

Administration officials are still debating whether to propose changes to the net-profits tax or a switch to a broad tax on the gross value of oil production, with deductions keyed to specific investments. Some Democrats pushed unsuccessfully for a gross tax last year, and Palin spoke favorably of that alternative during her 2006 campaign.

But some legislators say a complete overhaul of the state's brand-new oil tax is too much to ask of a 30-day special session.

House Resources co-chairman Jay Ramras, R-Fairbanks, said even if the income isn't as high as expected, the net-profits tax should be given a few years to see whether it encourages new investment in Alaska.

"The question is whether we're going to tax our way into prosperity or develop our way into prosperity," Ramras said.

Backers of the new tax note that, even with the big deductions, it is bringing the state $250 million more this year than would have come under the now-discredited "ELF" oil tax system it replaced.

Oil companies operating in Alaska are united in opposing a special session to revisit the oil tax issue this year, the oil and gas association's Moriarty said.

PPT critics, on the other hand, say the new tax would need to be changed even if it were delivering as promised.

"PPT was intended to short-change us," said Rep. Les Gara, D-Anchorage. "So if we just go back to what was intended, we cement in the system that was designed to short-change us."

Democrats cite petroleum consultants who say Alaska's total share from its oilfields is only 61 percent, compared with a world average of 67 percent or higher. The difference would be worth more than $1 billion a year to the state, they say.

LEGISLATURE WILL TAKE PALIN'S LEAD

The new law included a "progressive surcharge" meant to capture more windfall profits from high oil prices. When the PPT tax passed, advocates said the surcharge would kick in when oil hit $55 a barrel. Because of the higher deducted costs, however, the surcharge won't take effect until oil is between $60 and $63 a barrel, Palin officials said.

The net-profits tax has brought two other surprises, Palin officials said. The law allowed smaller exploration companies to build up tax credits through investments and sell them to major producers. But no market for the credits has materialized among the companies that pay taxes, Galvin said. Also, the state is having a hard time hiring qualified auditors who can sort through the oil company deductions.

House Speaker John Harris, R-Valdez, said Monday he's willing to consider a major overhaul of the state's new oil tax if that's what the governor decides to propose.

"We're going to take a lot of our lead from the administration," he said. "She sits on the high ground here."

Find Tom Kizzia online at adn.com/contact/tkizzia or call him in Homer at 1-907-235-4244.

LOAD-DATE: August 21, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1793

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

August 22, 2007 Wednesday
FINAL EDITION

'New kid' Keller is in the House;
READY TO GO: A man described as having "integrity and honor" replaces the arrested Vic Kohring.

BYLINE: By RINDI WHITE rwhite@adn.com

SECTION: MAT-SU WEEKLY SECTION; Pg. G1

LENGTH: 976 words

DATELINE: WASILLA

With a leather couch, a coffee cupboard and art on the walls in his office at 600 E. Railroad Ave., Wes Keller is ready to hear from his constituents.

On July 24, the Wasilla man became the Valley's newest state representative. Keller, 61, fills a seat vacated by Rep. Vic Kohring, who resigned July 19 to focus on his legal defense. Kohring this spring was arrested on federal bribery and corruption charges for allegedly taking money from oil field services company Veco in return for his support on oil issues.

Keller hails from northern Wisconsin. He moved to Alaska in 1969 and worked around the state in building maintenance, construction, industrial training and in the oil field. Since 1999 he worked as Eagle River Sen. Fred Dyson's chief of staff.

Keller is a pilot, a hunter, a fisherman and a family man. He and his wife, Gayle, have three grown children and five grandchildren.

We caught up with Keller last week, a few hours after he was introduced to the Wasilla Chamber of Commerce.

Q. You just got back in state -- from where?

A. I went to the National Conference of State Legislatures (in Boston). I had the honor a year and a half ago of being selected as staff co-chair of the standing education committee and as co-chair of the legislative education staff network executive committee. I had to present my resolution; I'd been working on a resolution promoting the use of education technology to individualize learning for every child. (The resolution passed unanimously.)

Q. Was this your first junket?

FBI - Stevens-1794

A. (Laughs) This is my first working trip, yes. I'd been to NCSL before though.

There were a lot of breakout sessions. I picked up a number of really great sessions, one on property tax, one on judicial appointments. They were really fascinating to me.

Q. So this is sort of your first week in office? Are you getting settled in?

A. I had a little bit of time (before the conference). I've hired staff ... Jim Pound and John Davies, and I hired Janet Ogan. She was working for Sen. Green. They're an excellent staff. They keep me straight and help me stand up.

194A-AN-13620-M; 714

Q. You're the new kid on the block at the Wasilla Legislative Information Office building. Is there any teasing or hazing going on?

A. There've been a few people who say "Hell-OO REP-re-SENT-a-tive!" Sure, there's a little good-natured teasing. But really, I've been a little bit overwhelmed at the number of cards and phone calls and e-mails, offers to help -- and, sure, some condolences. But it's been rewarding and it sets my desire to do a good job.

Q. Isn't it a cut in pay?

A. Very much so.

My parents spent their lives working in the community, trying to make things better. That's just the way I tick. I think it's an opportunity to get some really good representation for the people in my district. I would've been uncomfortable not stepping forward. I think I was uniquely positioned to do it.

Q. When you worked for Sen. Fred Dyson, did you aspire to become an elected official?

A. I guess I anticipated it when I began to realize my representative was in trouble, a little bit. I went through a process, first thinking "no way" and then working through it. Working for a senator as a staffer, I began to really appreciate that staffers make the world go 'round. But it's not that I aspired to work up the ladder. Sen. Dyson, I wasn't thinking about bumping him off or anything. (Laughs)

Q. What does your family think about your decision?

A. That's one of the most delightful parts about my job. It's here, it's with my family and my friends. Commuting to Eagle River got a little old. My family, they're very supportive. My wife, Gayle, she also worked for Sen. Dyson in the same time frame. My kids are excited. They think it's wonderful -- they don't see the spooky part. And I've got five grandkids. They think it's really cool to see Grandpa on TV.

Q. When Lt. Gov. Sean Parnell introduced you at the governor's picnic in Wasilla on July 24, he said you "lived a life of integrity and honor" in Juneau. Why did he say that?

A. You'd have to ask Sean, but I can guess. When you're down there, you live in an imported group of people and you form opinions about them. That's just how it works.

Q. But "integrity and honor," that's a pretty impressive description. Is that something you aspire to?

A. I'm a Christian, and I believe in the values as laid out in the Big 10. Sure, I want to be obedient to my creator, that's probably part of it. And I try to be really straight with people.

Q. Do you have hopes for the special session and your first regular session?

A. Starting with the special session, I think it's really good we're reviewing (the Petroleum Profits Tax). I don't know if there's anything wrong with PPT, but 85 percent of our earnings come from oil, and the resources of Alaska are to be used for the maximum benefit of the people. So I'm glad we're looking at it. I don't know yet where the proposal is going to come out -- we haven't even seen anything yet.

As for next session, even though I have eight years of experience with the process, I've never been on the floor.

I am working on legislation for campaign reform. The idea is to restrict campaign contributions so they just come from your constituency. It's a pretty radical idea.

I have some legislation ideas, several other things I'm thinking about, but at this point I'm not even sure what committees I'll be on yet.

FBI - Stevens-1795

Q. What's on your summer reading list? Do you even have time to read these days?

A. Right now I'm reading a novel, for a little RandR. It's Patrick O'Brian's "The Surgeon's Mate." And I've been working on some books by Dallas Willard. He writes about faith and values and things I think are inspiring to me. But I'm not above a Louis L'Amour, either.

Find Daily News reporter Rindi White online at www.adn.com/contact/rwhite or call 352-6709.

Q&A

LOAD-DATE: August 22, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Keller
EVAN R. STEINHAUSER / Anchorage Daily News
Wes Keller, who recently filled the District 14 House seat that was vacated by Rep. Vic Kohring, has worked as a teacher, building contractor, oil field hand and pilot in the Alaska National Guard, and served as chief of staff to Alaska state Sen. Fred Dyson.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1796

NewsBank America's Newspapers

Senator preaches patience as main strategy for Iraq - Question and answer

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - August 15, 2007

Author: Staff

Q. What do you see as the way forward (in Iraq)? A. Patience, which the press doesn't seem to have much of. (U.S. military commander in Iraq Gen. David) Petraeus has all the qualification of Eisenhower. As a matter of fact I think if he succeeds he will be an Eisenhower.

The great difficulty is people who say "Pull out" don't have an answer when you ask, "What will you do with a new Iraq that's really al-Qaida with the oil production? ... What's your answer going to be to what they want to do to the United States?

Q. Isn't al-Qaida a Sunni organization in a Shiite country? Are you suggesting the Sunnis are going to end up back in charge of Iraq?

A. I'm not exactly certain who's going to be in charge of Iraq. I don't know if we pull out. And, by the way, I don't think it's necessarily a Sunni organization. It has strength in so many countries now. It's getting a lot of its money from portions of the Saudi and other oil producers. That's really sort of a payment to them to avoid the trouble they're causing elsewhere, such as in Iraq. ...

(Someone) was quoted as saying we ought have sent 300,000 people instead of 30,000 people (in the surge). You're not going to like this, but Clinton kept cutting down the numbers of our people in the Army and the Air Force. Cutting, cutting, cutting, cutting. We ended up with fewer wings, fewer divisions. We don't count divisions any more; we count brigades because we don't have many divisions. Anyone who says (we should have sent) 300,000 people just doesn't know the statistics.

Q. There's some suggestion that we don't have enough troops -- we've used up too many troops to stay there.

A. We have a volunteer military. ... You could expand them ... The volunteers are there. ... The question is, how big a military do you want?

The joint command wants more people. They want to increase. It remains to be seen whether we'll do that.

The people who make these statements about, oh you could do it, just send more people -- where are you going to get them? We're sending people right here from this state over there for the third time. You know why? There's no one else to send. It's just because the military is so small. And it takes you six to nine months just to train them. It takes two years to train them before you can get them overseas.

Q. What did you make of (Congressman John) Murtha's proposal to have troops stay at least as long at home as they were deployed to lengthen the rotations?

A. He's a friend of mine. But what he's saying, that's a way to end the war. If you can't send them back and you don't have any more to send, what happens? If you don't replace the people that were there, you have an automatic withdrawal.

Q. Well, how much patience are you prepared to have?

FBI - Stevens-1797

A. Your question is how much patience have I got for the news media. This frantic demand to totally withdraw without regard to any consequences I think is just, it's immature, immoral as far as I'm concerned. The consequences of what we do over there are great on the future. If we walk away again -- we (already) have very few partners left in the world -- and we won't have any.

Q. Were you surprised at the amount of time it's taken to patch back Iraq, with the number of people we had to put Iraq back together? Given that we only had that number of men to go, was it a good call to go?

194A-AN-13620-M;715

A. There was no alternative but to go. ... Would you rather see Saddam Hussein still there, is that what you're telling me?

Q. Well, I don't think we've got a much better situation now. We've got people on their third rotation, we've got near anarchy there. You're saying we can't get out now. And the threat from Saddam was so imminent . ...

A. I'm saying we can't get out now because of developments since the war. You know, al-Qaida wasn't there when we started. The money for that insurgency wasn't there until we started. That's an aftermath of the militant, Islamic terrorist world.

The question is, are we going to do anything to prevent them owning a nation. ...

Q. I'm getting a better idea of what you don't think we should do in Iraq, which is not to leave precipitously, than what you think we should do.

A. I'm not a general. What the hell would you ask me that for? ... I don't make any military plans. I review them, and I give them money. ... I don't have any idea what they should do at this point. ... I think we'll succeed, I really do.

Q. I wanted to touch just briefly on your own situation and legal controversies.

A. You're not going to touch it at all or I'm going to leave. We had the understanding it was not going to come up.

Q. I understood the investigation wouldn't come up.

A. It's not going to come up at all.

Q. OK. What about your ability to be effective in Congress?

A. What about it? You're destroying it. More people are repeating what you're writing in your paper than anything else in the country. This paper has caused me more difficulty, and I've told you that before, than anything else. You've created me as the senator-for-life. You've been hanging me weekly.

You read any paper, the information -- most of it is not true -- started right here. And your guys just yesterday, they taunt me. They taunt me with statements that really no respectable reporter would ask a senator. It was already said I'm not going to answer your questions. They say, don't you have any concerns for your own integrity? Don't you have any conscience? That's what your reporters do to me. ...

I've spent hours here with you here in the past, and I've never seen any result of it at all. ... This paper has done nothing but try to assassinate me.

GO TO: ADN.com/opinion to listen to Sen. Stevens' remarks.

Q&A

EDITOR'S NOTE: Sen. Ted Stevens met with the Daily News editorial board last week on a number of topics. Here are excerpts of what he had to say about Iraq and about media coverage of his current controversies. Those present included editorial page editor Matt Zencey, publisher Mike Sexton, editor Pat Dougherty, cartoonist Peter Dunlap-Shohl and editorial writer Rosemary Shinohara. To hear excerpts on other topics, or the entire 57-minute session with Sen. Stevens, go online to ADN.com/opinion.

Caption: Photo 3: 15edit pg1.1_081507.jpg Graphic 1: Q_A_081507.eps Graphic 2: 15edit_Stevens_081507.eps
LAUREN VICTORIA BURKE / Associated Press archive 2007 Sen. Ted Stevens, who marked a milestone this year as the longest-serving GOP member in the U.S. Senate's history, says his ability to be effective in Congress has been damaged by news coverage, chiefly in the Daily News, of his activities.

Edition: Final
Section: Alaska
Page: B5

FBI - Stevens-1798

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

August 22, 2007 Wednesday
FINAL EDITION

Stevens not ready for gold watch;
BACKLASH: Investigations could rebound on the GOP, state Rep. Mike Kelly fears.

BYLINE: By STEVE QUINN The Associated Press

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 671 words

DATELINE: JUNEAU -

U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens on Tuesday brushed off the call of a conservative Republican state lawmaker that he retire instead of seeking re-election next year.

"I've had that happen two or three times in my career," Stevens said during the dedication Tuesday of a $51 million marine research center bearing his name.

"This is a free country," said the 83-year-old Stevens, the longest serving Republican in Senate history.

State Rep. Mike Kelly, R-Fairbanks, has urged both Stevens and U.S. Rep. Don Young, 74, to retire at the end of their current terms. Stevens has been in office since 1968; Young, also a Republican, has held office since 1973.

Stevens is under scrutiny for his relationship with oil field services contractor Bill Allen, who helped oversee a renovation project that more than doubled the size of the senator's Girdwood home in 2000. Allen's former company, Veco Inc., won tens of millions of dollars in federal contracts, and he has pleaded guilty to bribing Alaska state lawmakers.

Several news media outlets have reported that Young is under investigation for his relationship with Veco and his campaign finance practices. State-level politics also have been touched by the Veco inquiry; three former state lawmakers face corruption trials this fall.

Kelly first called for Stevens and Young to retire this week in a letter to the editor of the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner.

Kelly told The Associated Press he's concerned the party will suffer defeats next year as a backlash because of corruption investigations at the state and congressional level.

"We need enough time before 2008 to consider from 40,000 feet what healing actions are required so no one is hurt," Kelly said.

"I wanted to see if a taller dog would call for a slate of activities that would help restore voter trust and confidence. Nobody seemed to be heading down that trail, so I did it and carefully considered that it wouldn't be accusatory or contentious," he said.

A spokesman for Young on Tuesday had no comment.

FBI - Stevens-1799

The August recess is normally a time when congressmen make the rounds of their home states to tout projects and visit constituents.

194A-AN-13620-M-716

But both Stevens and Young have been met with protests at almost every gathering. Some shouted "oink, oink" earlier this month at Young's annual pig roast campaign fundraiser in Anchorage.

At Tuesday's dedication ceremony, held hours before the public was allowed inside the Ted Stevens Marine Research Center for tours, protesters shouted and carried signs at the center's gates.

But they were kept well out of Stevens' sight and earshot.

Stevens breezed through the new 66,000-square-foot center with a constant curiosity about the new labs and offices at Lena Point, 17 miles north of Juneau.

The building, he says, reflects decades of his commitment to the industry, including laws under the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act, a 30-year-old law that guides fishery management in waters between three miles and 200 miles offshore.

It also represents his interest in the nation's development of the fishing industry and marine life, especially that of Alaska, which supplies half the nation's seafood.

Stevens touted the importance of the fisheries industry, saying that if managed properly it will outlive the petroleum and mining industries that also drive the state's economy.

State Rep. Andrea Doll, D-Juneau, who attended the ceremony, says Stevens' work for the fisheries industry is a huge boost for the state's capital, and that cannot be overlooked.

"The jury hasn't come back yet," she said metaphorically about the investigation. "I think we need to acknowledge him for the things he's done. Give the credit where it's due."

The FBI raid on his home and the federal investigation are off limits for Stevens.

"I'm not going to answer any questions at all into the investigation; that's out," he said.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR: Read Rep. Mike Kelly's call for Young and Stevens to retire in the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner at newsminer.com/2007/08/19/8469

LOAD-DATE: August 22, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Photos by CHRIS MILLER / The Associated Press
Rich Moniak and fellow members of Juneau People for Peace and Justice protest Tuesday before the dedication of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's Ted Stevens Marine Research Institute in Juneau. The protesters were kept out of Stevens' sight and hearing.
During dedication ceremonies for the new NOAA facility that bears his name, Stevens took a moment to address calls for him to step down after his current term expires. "This is a free country," said the 83-year-old Stevens, the longest serving Republican in Senate history.

FBI - Stevens-1800

DOCUMENT-TYPE: WIRE

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

August 17, 2007 Friday
FINAL EDITION

Weyhrauch wants to be tried alone;
CORRUPTION CASE: Attorneys are mum on reasons for the motion.

BYLINE: By LISA DEMER ldemer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 825 words

Three weeks before the corruption trial of former state Reps. Bruce Weyhrauch and Pete Kott is set to begin, Weyhrauch wants a judge to split his case from that of his co-defendant.

No one will say why.

The motion and supporting documents were filed under seal, out of public view. It's the same story with much of the legal maneuvering in the case. Lawyers involved say they couldn't talk about the issues even if they wanted to.

"There's a lot going on behind the scenes and it involves evidence that we can't discuss before the trial," said Doug Pope, one of Weyhrauch's attorneys.

The trial is scheduled to begin Sept. 5, though that could change. U.S. District Court Judge John Sedwick has yet to rule on several sealed motions.

The corruption case involves accusations that officials with oil field services contractor Veco Corp. bribed the legislators to help push an oil-production tax favored by the industry through the Legislature in 2006.

Veco's former chief executive, Bill Allen, and vice president, Rick Smith, have pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy involving four legislators: Kott, Weyhrauch, indicted former Wasilla Rep. Vic Kohring and former Senate President Ben Stevens, who was described but not named in court documents. Kohring has an October trial date. Stevens hasn't been charged.

Allen and Smith are now cooperating with the government and are expected to be key witnesses at the trial. They've resigned from Veco.

It appears from the indictment that the FBI used electronic surveillance of Veco's suite in Juneau's Baranof Hotel to collect evidence.

FBI - Stevens-1801

Kott is accused of taking payoffs totaling $8,993 and the promise of a job from Veco in exchange for doing the company's bidding. Weyhrauch is accused of soliciting legal work from Veco.

Generally, one reason a defendant tries to split off his case is so he won't be tainted by his co-defendant, said Rex Butler, a prominent Anchorage criminal defense attorney not connected with the Kott-Weyhrauch case.

"First of all, one person might be really knee deep in the trouble while the other person is a surface player," Butler said. "The problem is, in a joint trial, if a juror takes one down, they almost always will take both people down."

The specifics of the accusations against Kott and Weyhrauch differ, though they were indicted together May 3 and face similar charges: conspiracy and bribery against both; extortion and wire fraud against Kott; attempted extortion and mail fraud against Weyhrauch.

194A-AN-13620-M; 717

Kott is described in the indictment as willingly doing Veco's bidding and meeting with Allen and Smith in the Baranof's Suite 604 to plot strategy.

As laid out in the indictment, Weyhrauch's role was smaller. But he is accused of following Kott and Allen's instruction to change his vote on an amendment opposed by the oil industry. He had mistakenly voted the wrong way, the indictment says.

The charging document quotes a conversation between Kott and Allen in Suite 604 after the amendment was defeated on May 7, 2006:

Kott: "I had to get 'er done. So, I had to come back and face this man right here," pointing to Allen. "I had to cheat, steal, beg, borrow and lie."

Allen: "I own your ass."

Co-defendants may want to point the finger at each other, but that can backfire in a joint trial, Butler said.

"Both parties will end up convicting each other," he said.

Defense lawyers also may end up stepping on each other's toes. And there can be problems with evidence when one defendant has made incriminating statements against the other, Butler said.

Plus, defense lawyers like looking like the little guy up against the government with all of its power and resources, Butler said. The image doesn't carry as well with a table full of defense lawyers.

Jim Wendt, who represents Kott, said he probably won't oppose the motion to sever the cases, but he won't join in, either.

As to Kott's defense, "You'll have to wait and see, but our defense is basically that our guy is not guilty," Wendt said.

Weyhrauch attorney Pope said that his client is innocent and never sold his votes.

Prosecutor Jim Goeke declined to comment on the upcoming trial or the maneuvering.

Jury selection is scheduled to begin Sept. 5 with a bigger-than-normal pool of 120 potential jurors from Southcentral Alaska and beyond. Judge Sedwick has ordered that potential jurors be pre-screened with a questionnaire. It asks whether they know the defendants, lawyers or key witnesses; what they've read, seen or heard about the case; and whether they already have opinions about Kott and Weyhrauch.

Kott is a former House Speaker from Eagle River first elected in 1992 and defeated in the 2006 Republican primary. He now lives in Juneau. Weyhrauch is a Juneau attorney who served two terms and didn't run again in 2006.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

STORIES: Visit the Web for more on the ongoing FBI investigation.

FBI - Stevens-1802

adn.com/corruption

LOAD-DATE: August 17, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Weyhrauch
Kott

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

August 17, 2007 Friday
FINAL EDITION

Inouye raises voice for Stevens;
ON TOUR: Senator from Hawaii travels to Alaska in support of an old friend.

BYLINE: By TOM KIZZIA tkizzia@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 353 words

DATELINE: HOMER -

Sen. Ted Stevens got a campaign endorsement and a pat on the back from his old friend Democratic Sen. Daniel Inouye of Hawaii during a low-key appearance at a wildlife refuge visitor center in Homer on Thursday.

"I'm here to tell the people of Alaska that I support him, that you're fortunate to have him," Inouye said.

Stevens and Inouye, the ranking members of the Senate Commerce Committee, are traveling together in Alaska through the weekend. Inouye, a frequent visitor to Alaska, was honored by the Alaska Federation of Natives in Anchorage Wednesday.

The two senators said they are headed to Kodiak today and Fairbanks on Saturday. With Alaska Sen. Lisa Murkowski, they cut a ribbon at a new Alaska Railroad whistle stop in the Chugach Mountains south of Portage Thursday before flying to the southern Kenai Peninsula.

In Homer, the reception was friendly, as it has been elsewhere on Stevens' recess trip.

Stevens and Inouye defended the practice of earmarking funds for specific projects in the federal budget, saying it had long been necessary to allow their remote home states to catch up with the rest of the country.

In Hawaii, Inouye said, a town the size of Homer, with an area population of about 10,000, would never have such a grand facility as the Islands and Oceans Visitor Center. The senators spoke in the $18 million facility for an hour with about 100 people.

Thanked by Homer Mayor Jim Hornaday for the many buildings constructed with federal funds, Stevens said, "Every one of these came from an earmark. None of them was requested by the president."

While the national criticism of earmarks could hurt Alaska, Stevens said, the corruption investigation has not limited his effectiveness. In answer to a local reporter, Stevens said only one member of Congress had objected, while many others had come up to him and offered support.

"It's not a problem," he said.

Inouye deemed national press coverage of the Stevens investigation "overkill," citing repeated mentions of the recent FBI search of his friend's Girdwood home.

"It should be reported. It's news. But good God," Inouye said.

FBI - Stevens-1803

LOAD-DATE: August 17, 2007

194A-AN-13620-M; 718

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Inouye

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1804

2 of 2 DOCUMENTS

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

August 14, 2007 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

Young has a picnic on the Park Strip;

EAT-AND-GREET: Embattled congressman faces critics with humor and a little jig.

FBI - Stevens-1805

BYLINE: By KYLE HOPKINS khopkins@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 608 words

U.S. Rep. Don Young held a picnic on the Park Strip Monday, handing out Mountain Dew and Diet Pepsi as hundreds of people waited in line for a plate of free food and to shake hands with Alaska's lone congressman.

All the while, a small but loud cluster of protesters chanted slogans at Young from a few feet away. Young, standing in front of watermelon slices and hamburger plates, ignored some of the taunts and danced along with others.

"FBI! FBI!" the protesters yelled.

Young smiled and did a little dance, shaking his hips and pumping his arms. "They'll never get the best of me," he said at one point to a supporter who was making his way through the line.

Young is running for re-election and under federal investigation for his ties to the oil field services company Veco. One of the grills at the picnic was stamped with a plate-size Veco logo. A Young aide, Steve Hansen, said the grills were rentals and will be paid for by the campaign.

Young's annual pig roast fund-raiser in Anchorage last week drew more than 200 supporters and dozens of protesters.

Monday, fewer critics showed for his hastily arranged meet-and-greet picnic on the Park Strip. They were able to crowd within feet of the congressman for nearly 90 minutes as he served food, leading to jostling between supporters and protesters, a crying girl, and somebody grabbing somebody's shirt.

Signs for the picnic began appearing around town late last week, and the event drew hundreds in the afternoon heat.

Carl Washington, who is 32, stood shirtless resting on a BMX bicycle. He wore an "I'm a Young man" button hanging from a necklace.

He said he likes it that Young has been able to bring federal funding to Alaska. As for Young's critics, Washington said people try to knock you down if you're successful.

He pointed to the long, single-file line. "If you look at the people here -- low income. And I don't mean to disrespect nobody. People carrying backpacks. They're hungry."

Toward the end of the line stood Peter Brink, 42. He said it's become too expensive to live in rural Alaska and that he left Bethel in March. He's now homeless in Anchorage, he said.

Asked what he'd like to tell Young, he said: "There's too many companies that are controlling our congressmen."

Young arrived at about 5:30 p.m., shaking hands with well-wishers as he made his way to the food tent. Protesters who had been standing along I Street quickly followed, getting as close as Young's handlers would allow as a seemingly endless river of people picked up plates of hot dogs and beans, watermelon and salmon.

194A-AN-13620-M;719

Mitchell Cannon, a 17-year-old who had been handing out Young buttons early in the day, had switched sides and written "Benson 08" on his T-shirt -- a reference to Democratic House candidate Diane Benson. Hansen, the Young aide, confronted a protester who was yelling into the tent, and Hansen said the man grabbed his shirt.

In the middle of the crowd, a 10-year-old girl cried, and Young supporters and critics argued as grill smoke blew across the strip.

Young made no speech. Reporters stood among the supporters and protesters, shouting questions:

Congressman Young, what do you think of all this?

"I love it! I love America!" Young replied.

Congressman Young, have you done anything wrong?

"The Lord is with me," he said.

Young left about 7 p.m. as the protesters complained about the Young supporters and the supporters complained about the protesters. Volunteers continued to serve watermelon and soda, and from 9th to 10th Avenue, the Park Strip smelled like smoke.

Find Kyle Hopkins' political blog online at adn.com/alaskapolitics or call him at 257-4334.

LOAD-DATE: August 14, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Find more photos online at adn.com Photos by BILL ROTH / Anchorage Daily News
Hundreds of people waited in line for free food and a chance to see Young.
Congressman Don Young reacts to protesters gathered where food was being served at his meet-and-greet at the Delaney Park Strip on Monday. Young said, "It's America; they can do what they want to do."

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1806

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

August 7, 2007 Tuesday
FINAL EDITION

Young pays old bill for fundraiser food;
'CRAB FEED': E-mail notes in-kind contributions; payback is $5,583.

BYLINE: By ERIKA BOLSTAD ebolstad@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 387 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON -

U.S. Rep. Don Young has agreed to reimburse a seafood trade association $5,583 for the cost of providing food at his annual "Crab Feed" fundraiser for the past seven years.

Young's campaign treasurer said that this spring the Pacific Seafood Processors Association sent the campaign an e-mail, saying the group had researched its records and determined it had made in-kind contributions that needed to be disclosed. The campaign wasn't aware of the contributions until receiving the e-mail, said Robert Bohnert, Young's campaign treasurer.

Originally, the campaign was going to reimburse the industry group only for the 2004-2006 contributions, but decided last week to also send back the 2001-2003 contributions, worth about $3,175 total. Typically, the Pacific Seafood Processors Association provided between $700 to $900 in seafood for the event, Bohnert said.

Bohnert said he did not know why Young or his lawyers made that decision, and referred further questions to Young's campaign manager, Steven Dougherty.

"We're not commenting at this time," Dougherty said. "We're not commenting on issues pertaining to this topic."

But until the seafood trade association told them about the in-kind contributions, they weren't aware of them, Bohnert said. They pay someone to organize the event, including ordering the food and renting out the Capitol Hill Club. The annual event is a Washington tradition for Alaska's Republican congressman

"If we don't know about it, we can't do anything about," Bohnert said. "I don't know what prompted them to send it to us."

In July, Young disclosed to the Federal Elections Commission that he spent more than $262,137 from his campaign account to pay legal bills this year. Between March 10 and June 15, Young's congressional fundraising committee, Alaskans for Don Young, paid two Washington law firms to advise him.

Young, who is under investigation by the FBI, has refused to address questions about the federal inquiry.

Young has four major fundraisers scheduled this August while he is in Alaska, Dougherty said. There's a pig roast in Anchorage on Wednesday, salmon bakes in Fairbanks and Anchorage on Aug. 13 and 15, and an Aug. 16 golf tournament in Palmer. He also plans his annual mooseburger fundraising event in September, when Congress goes back into session.

FBI - Stevens-1807

LOAD-DATE: August 7, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

194A-AN-13620-M;720

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1808

NewsBank inc. America's Newspapers

Turning up the heat - Pig roast inside 'gates of hell' has those outside roaring ANCHORAGE PROTESTERS FEAST ON DON YOUNG'S FUNDRAISER

Anchorage Daily News (AK) - August 9, 2007

Author: LISA DEMER, KYLE HOPKINS and LIZ RUSKIN Anchorage Daily News ; Staff

Outside Don Young's annual pig roast fundraiser on Wednesday night, a raucous crowd of all ages and political persuasions taunted the guests with shouts of "oink, oink," waved signs against corruption and big money in politics, and generally protested anything Young was for. It was a party inside the fence, where the more than 200 guests drank beer and bottled water and dined on pork under white tents. They were asked to donate up to $1,000 each for U.S. Rep. Young's re-election campaign.

And it was a party outside, where about 70 protesters showed up for a remarkable demonstration not only against Young at his signature fundraiser event, but also against U.S. Sens. Ted Stevens and Lisa Murkowski, who were special guests.

The event, talked about on talk radio and the Internet for days, attracted all kinds.

"Restore habeas corpus!" one man shouted.

Another, a Minneapolis chef and performance artist who goes by Mero Cocinero Karimi, was there shaking a wooden spoon at arriving donors.

"I heard they were roasting a pig in celebration of corruption," he said, dressed in a poofy chef's hat and white jacket. "A pig is paying for this with his life! They never asked the pig's permission!"

"You are now entering the gates of hell," retired salmon fisherman John Farleigh, a third-generation Alaskan and one of the protest organizers, yelled out to guests as they walked down the long driveway to the Turnagain home of former Gov. Bill Sheffield. The party inside was off limits to news reporters.

Farleigh said his discontent has been boiling up for some time.

"They get caught in something untoward and nothing happens to them and so they think they are untouchable," he said.

Around the back, protesters shouted through the fence at donors as they dined.

"The secret sauce is blood and oil, topped with shredded Constitution!" sometime political candidate Thomas Higgins bellowed.

DIFFERENT POINTS OF VIEW

At one point, conservative talk show host Eddie Burke faced off against political consultant Art Hackney, who was one of a few guests who stopped to talk to reporters.

"I find this outrageous," Hackney said. "To me, the story is these guys who are stirring this up. Go look into them, because they have a helluva worse history than the people serving Alaska in the United States Congress."

As he spoke, the crowd closed in.

FBI - Stevens-1809

"Shame, shame, shame!" they roared at Hackney.

"Two wrongs make a right?" one man asked.

194A-AN-13620-M; 721

Alaska's congressional delegation "built Alaska," Hackney said.

"Take Alaska back!" people in the crowd began shouting.

Hackney said that Burke and two others who have been pushing hard to crack down on politicians -- Ray Metcalfe and former U.S. Attorney Wev Shea -- are the ones who are unethical.

"I'm not being investigated by the FBI," Burke shot back. "Are you?"

"Are you going to grope me, Eddie?" Hackney asked. Burke was convicted of a misdemeanor in 1994 for drunkenly groping a waitress at the Peanut Farm.

"Thirteen years ago I acted like a drunk sailor in a bar," Burke said.

Burke was within inches of Hackney's face until a Young aide, Steve Hansen, guided Hackney away.

Among those spotted walking into the fundraiser were Diane Kaplan, president of the Rasmuson Foundation, and former legislator and oil industry lobbyist Mark Hanley.

High-powered Washington lobbyist Jack Ferguson, who has close ties to Young, came. His clients have included Alaska Airlines, Arctic Power, trucking companies and cruise lines. Another D.C. lobbyist at the event: Rick Alcalde, a frequent contributor to Young who lobbied him on national transportation projects.

When Alaska Republican Party chairman Randy Ruedrich arrived, someone shouted, "Talk about ethically challenged!" Ruedrich was forced to step down from his job as head of the state's oil and gas commission amid allegations he misused his office for political purposes.

A CHANGE OF VENUE

The location at Sheffield's home was a change from recent years, when the event was held at the home of former Veco Corp. chairman Bill Allen. Allen has pleaded guilty to bribing four former state lawmakers. Young and Stevens both are under federal investigation for their ties to Veco.

Steve Dougherty, Young's campaign manager, said they cooked an entire pig this year too. It just wasn't in one piece, as was the tradition when Allen hosted the event.

By roughly 7:30 p.m., Sens. Stevens and Murkowski had already driven out of Sheffield's driveway, to jeers from the remaining crowd outside. Then Young left too, smiling, riding in the back of a silver Chrysler sedan.

Minutes later, a faded blue ice cream truck arrived, playing tinny children's music. A few of the maybe two dozen remaining protesters stood eating Popsicles and fudge bars, still holding signs, in the early evening heat as the last partygoers walked to their cars.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

Caption: Photo 1: Protest1_080907.jpg Photo 2: PigRoast_080907.jpg Photo 3: PigRoast2_080907.jpg BILL ROTH / Anchorage Daily News The boisterous crowd of protesters outside former Gov. Bill Sheffield's Turnagain home on Wednesday evening during Don Young's annual pig roast included Minneapolis chef and performance artist Mero Cocinero Karimi. "A pig is paying for this with his life!" he said. Don Young's annual pig roast drew more than 200 guests who were asked to donate up to $1,000 each. MARC LESTER / Anchorage Daily News "I find this outrageous," said political consultant Art Hackney. "To me, the story is these guys who are stirring this up."

Edition: State
Section: Main
Page: A1
Correction: Correction A story about Don Young's pig roast on Page A-1 Thursday incorrectly described John Farleigh as a third-generation Alaskan. He is a fourth-generation Alaskan and a third-generation Anchorage resident.
Record Number: 1457550408/09/07
Copyright (c) 2007, Anchorage Daily News

FBI - Stevens-1810

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

August 12, 2007 Sunday
FINAL EDITION

Pork for a few, then fish for all;
DON YOUNG: Congressman hosts salmon bake on Delaney Park Strip.

BYLINE: By KYLE HOPKINS khopkins@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 469 words

U.S. Rep. Don Young is having a public barbecue in Downtown Anchorage on Monday afternoon, days after protesters taunted him and guests at his annual pig roast fundraiser.

"You're invited to Congressman Young's salmon bake and bar-b-que," read a broad, yellow sign that appeared last week on the Delaney Park Strip. By weekend, similar signs had sprouted all over town.

The signs say the shindig will last from 3 to 7 p.m. Monday. By Friday afternoon, an organizer of the original protest began circulating e-mails calling for another anti-Young rally.

Young is under federal investigation for his ties to Veco Corp., and dozens of protesters surrounded his fundraiser Wednesday at the home of former Gov. Bill Sheffield.

Young appears at the private pig roast every year. Until recently, it was held at the home of former Veco chief Bill Allen, who has since pleaded guilty to bribing state legislators.

But the Anchorage salmon bake -- where "everyone is invited," according to the advertising -- is new.

According to the city, Young's campaign indicated on July 26 it wanted to hold an event on the Park Strip. Later, his campaign reserved 20 picnic tables at $20 each, according to the city.

Young usually attends the state Republican Party's annual picnic this time of year, said party chairman Randy Ruedrich. But this year, the party pushed its meeting back to September in hopes of enticing Republican presidential candidates, he said.

Ruedrich said Young will be back in D.C. by then, so he's holding the salmon bake in Anchorage instead. "He's having his own community event because we moved ours."

Political consultant Art Hackney, who traded barbs with Young critics at last week's protest, said he cringed when he saw the sign advertising Monday's public meet and greet.

"That sounds like an invitation for a rather raucous event," he said.

John Farleigh hopes so. He was one of the organizers of the pig roast protest and was trying Friday to rally people to show up at the salmon bake too.

Farleigh said he wants to create an environment where Young doesn't even want to appear in public. "If we could bump it up over 100 (people) next time, then we're looking at some momentum."

Two Democrats -- Jake Metcalfe and Diane Benson -- have announced they're running against Young.

"I find it pretty interesting that he is campaigning or getting out and having contact with people so early in the election year ... it signifies that he's worried," said Metcalfe.

But Young said he's ready for battle in a recent interview with The Associated Press.

"They say 'Oh, he's nicked,' you know, we can get him. Well, have at it. They have never been in a race till they get in a race with me," he told the AP.

Find Kyle Hopkins' political blog online at adn.com/alaskapolitics or call him at 257-4334.

LOAD-DATE: August 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Young

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1812

2 of 2 DOCUMENTS

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

August 10, 2007 Friday
FINAL EDITION

FBI seizes Stevens note;
'OVER $130,000' PAID: Two pages to former federal prosecutor become part of probe into home remodeling.

BYLINE: By RICHARD MAUER rmauer@adn.com

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1495 words

FBI agents earlier this week retrieved a handwritten note by U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens to former U.S. Attorney Wev Shea in which Stevens said he and his wife paid "over $130,000" for the Veco-supervised renovations to their home in Girdwood.

The amount described in the note, dated June 7, is the only time Stevens is known to have put a figure on his out-of-pocket costs for the 2000 addition, which more than doubled the size of the house. Stevens told reporters last month that he paid every bill he received, leaving open the possibility that he wasn't billed for all the work. He has declined to answer any more questions.

If $130,000 is an accurate total, it would raise questions about how such a major renovation could have been accomplished within such a tight budget. The carpentry contractor alone said he was paid more than $100,000 by Stevens. Another contractor, who raised up the house to make room for the new first floor and built part of the foundation, said he too was paid by Stevens, though he didn't recall the amount. The earth-moving contractor who prepared the ground for the job also said he was paid by Stevens.

That would leave little if any left over for a range of other work that was done, everything from design to plumbing and electric to a new roof. As recently as this week, Stevens declined to answer questions about how the project was billed and financed.

Federal investigators are keenly interested in the matter as part of their three-year investigation of official corruption in Alaska. They've subpoenaed witnesses to testify about the project before grand juries in Anchorage and Washington, D.C., and the FBI and IRS conducted a 12-hour search of the home July 30, with agents documenting the addition in painstaking detail. According to the office of the Senate historian, it was the first time a sitting senator's residence was searched in the history of those agencies.

'SAD PORTION OF MY LIFE'

Stevens' note was a thank-you to good wishes from Shea on the eve of a White House dinner held in Stevens' honor on May 23. Stevens' remarks about the construction project were unsolicited.

"This is a sad portion of my life -- it will take time to explain," Stevens said in the two-page note. "Catherine and I personally paid over $130,000 for the improvements to our chalet in Girdwood. Someone -- or more than one -- keeps telling the FBI that's not so. Takes time to go back over five years to prove they are wrong."

In a briefing with Alaska reporters in Washington on July 16, Stevens appeared to leave room for a discrepancy between what he paid and the actual costs.

"We paid every bill that was given to us. Every bill that was sent to us has been paid, personally, with our own money, and that's all there is to it," Stevens said before cutting off questions about the house and the investigation.

The existence of the note was first reported Sunday in the Seattle Times. At 9:30 a.m. Monday, Shea said, two FBI agents on special duty here from Miami arrived at his downtown office and asked for the original. Shea turned it over.

In executing their search warrant on Stevens' home July 30, agents appeared to be as interested in the house itself as in removing anything inside. They used tape measures, still cameras, video cameras and even a special camera capable of producing 360-degree panoramas to document the dwelling and its fixtures.

With the curtains drawn, it was impossible for someone outside to tell what the agents were doing in the house.

But outside, agents scaled the building on ladders to take pictures of the aluminum roof and the ice-melting heat tape installed on it and in the gutters. They took detailed pictures of outdoor electrical fixtures, including those on a spruce tree in the front yard, and twice uncovered and photographed a stainless steel barbecue.

The house was expanded by jacking up the one-story building and adding a new ground floor with two bedrooms, a sauna, bathroom, a laundry room, game room, "mud room" and garage, according to plans filed with the city at the time.

Three contractors who discussed their role in the project with the Daily News in May would have absorbed most or all of the $130,000-plus cited by Stevens. Specifically:

* Augie Paone of Christensen Builders, the main contractor, said he was paid "more than $100,000" by Stevens for framing, other carpentry and some of the kitchen cabinetry and painting. Paone said he has testified about the project before a federal grand jury in Anchorage.

* Anchorage house mover Toney Hannah said he was paid by Stevens for jacking up the home, building a new foundation, then lowering the home on the new first story. He didn't recall how much he was paid and couldn't look up the invoices because they had been taken by the FBI.

* Girdwood contractor Bob Redmond was paid by Stevens for earth-moving work associated with the project, according to his stepmother, Jean Redmond. The FBI took his files as well, she said.

That leaves the project design, blueprints, Veco's project management, plumbing, heating and electrical work unaccounted for, as well as carpentry work performed before Paone was hired. In addition, a neighbor, Daryl Pederson, said a new aluminum roof was installed at the time, on a roofline with multiple peaks and angles. Whether the project included new appliances or other furnishings couldn't be determined.

Paone said he was hired by Veco's chairman at the time, Bill Allen, and said he submitted his invoices to Veco first before he was paid by Stevens. Paone said he observed mechanical contractors working on the heating system and plumbers on the pipes, but didn't recall who they were.

Paone said he has no idea if other contractors were paid by Stevens. "It's just that he was never around. He didn't know what was going on."

'DESIGNED BY JCH'

Four sheets of building plans submitted to the city for the project contained no identifying mark that would show who drew them or for whom the designer worked. However, the initials "JCH" were printed next to "Designed By" on all four sheets, along with a date of July 24, 2000.

The initials match John C. Hess, a Veco employee who works in the company's engineering group. Visited at his Anchorage home in June, he declined to talk about the Stevens project. Asked if he drafted the plans, he said, "That's possible." On Thursday, his wife, Jill, said the plans were his.

Hess was one of five current or former Veco employees listed on a subpoena summoning Girdwood resident and Stevens friend Bob Persons to a grand jury in Washington, D.C., in May. Persons, who took out the land use permit for the project, was asked to bring any information or documents connecting those five employees to the work on Stevens' home.

Allen has pleaded guilty to bribing Alaska legislators and violating tax laws and is cooperating with federal authorities in hopes of getting a reduction in his sentence and keeping other family members out of jail. The FBI had wiretaps on his phones and video surveillance of his lobbying hotel suite in Juneau for more than two years before the federal investigation broke into the open in August 2006 with raids on the offices of six legislators, including then Senate President Ben Stevens, Ted Stevens' son. Ben Stevens has not been charged.

Persons looked after the house when Stevens wasn't around, and was given power of attorney to act for the senator and his wife on the remodeling project. Shea, the U.S. Attorney for Alaska between 1990 and '93, got to know Persons 30 years ago when Shea was living in Girdwood and Persons owned a cafe. Persons since achieved acclaim with his Double Musky restaurant.

Shea found out from Persons that Persons, his wife, and other Alaskans were invited to the White House for a special dinner honoring Stevens on May 25 -- two days before Persons' date with the grand jury. It was among the tributes to Stevens this spring when he became the longest serving Republican senator in history. Shea faxed a letter to Stevens, praising his "commitment to Alaska," honoring his military service, and describing their mutual friendship with Bob and Deanna Persons.

In his June 7 reply, Stevens didn't mention the White House dinner but discussed his house.

Find Richard Mauer online at adn.com/contact/rmauer or call 257-4345.

6/7/07

Dear Wev --

My staff tells me I did not respond to your May 23 letter. I truly believed I did as I answered a series of "thank yous" from people who wish us well in these hours of strife.

This is a sad portion of my life -- it will take time to explain. Catherine and I personally paid over $130,000 for the improvements to our chalet in Girdwood.

Someone -- or more than one -- keeps telling the FBI that's not so. Takes time to go back over five years to prove they are wrong.

I do appreciate your comments.

My best

Ted

dig deeper: For stories and photos of the FBI/IRS investigation of Stevens' house, go online.

adn.com/stevens

LOAD-DATE: August 10, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: ILLUSTRATION SHOWS SCAN OF STEVENS' LETTER.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

FBI - Stevens-1815

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

Anchorage Daily News (Alaska)

August 10, 2007 Friday
FINAL EDITION

Earmark tampering suggested;
FLORIDA ROAD: Don Young or staff changed bill, report says.

BYLINE: By ERIKA BOLSTAD ebolstad@adn.com

SECTION: ALASKA; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 548 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON -

A $10 million earmark that benefited a Florida developer continues to cause a stink in the Sunshine State, where some local road planners say they didn't ask for it and still don't understand how Alaska's congressman got it for them.

In Florida, the leader of a local transportation planning organization asked a retired federal government budget expert to research how U.S. Rep. Don Young designated money for what's known as the Coconut Road interchange. Wednesday, the researcher issued a report suggesting that Young or his staff changed language in the earmark after it had already been approved for another project they sought, the widening of Interstate 75.

Both the House and Senate voted for the earmark in 2005 when it was part of a massive highway bill ushered through Young's Transportation committee, said researcher Darla Letourneau, a retired former congressional liaison to the Department of Labor in Washington. At some point, as the bill was being cleaned up to be sent to the president, the $10 million earmark was given a specific designation for the Coconut Road interchange.

It's not unusual for technical and grammatical changes to be made at the final stage of the legislative process, said Letourneau, who lives in the beachfront community of Sanibel. But in this case, Letourneau said, the changes were to the substance of the bill. It went from being an earmark for a general road-widening project to one that benefited a specific interchange - one that many local officials opposed because they feared it would open environmentally sensitive lands to more development.

"It's definitely not consistent with the rules, at least on its face," Letourneau said. Letourneau was asked by her friend, Carla Brooks Johnston, a Sanibel city commissioner, to research the earmark for a planning group that helps determine how transportation money will be spent locally.

"It raises a lot of questions in my mind," Letourneau said Wednesday. "It's just another example of abuse of power."

Young, currently under federal investigation as part of the Veco corruption inquiry, drew national scrutiny this spring for this particular earmark. It was first reported in the Naples (Fla.) Daily News, where people questioned why a congressman from Alaska would take such interest in an interchange in Florida - even though some local planners hadn't asked for it. The $10 million Florida earmark could lead to an interchange that improves freeway access to land owned by real estate developer Daniel Aronoff; it was inserted into the legislation in 2005 soon after Aronoff helped raise $40,000 in Florida for Young's re-election.

Wednesday, Young held one of his biggest fundraisers in Anchorage, his annual pig roast. Guests included several Washington lobbyists, including Rick Alcalde, a frequent Young contributor. Alcalde's clients include Aronoff's real estate business, the Landon Companies, according to federal disclosure forms.

Young's office would not comment Wednesday on the Florida earmark, and has called it a "recycled story." Previously,

Young has said that he was asked by people in the community to put the earmark in the transportation spending bill, and that he was told it would pay for transportation improvements to assist with hurricane evacuation.

LOAD-DATE: August 10, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Staff

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Anchorage Daily News
All Rights Reserved

FBI - Stevens-1817

Alaska Report
"News and Information Since 1999"

Congratulations!
You have won our hourly prize. Click the "OK" button to claim it before time runs out. OK

Ads by Google

Ketchikan Daily News
News, information and photos from beautiful Ketchikan, Alaska www.ketchikandailynews.c

Alaska Real Estate
Homes cabins land lodges farms B&B's fishing & hunting lodge www.talkeetnarealestate.n

Alaska MLS Listing $299
Why Pay 6% ? Direct Access to Alaska MLS.
www.congressrealty.com

Trophy Halibut Fishing
Experience 1-of-a-Kind Sportfishing In Ketchikan, Alaska! Learn More www.AlaskaStrikeZone.co

Jake Metcalfe - It would be irresponsible not to investigate Don Young and Ted Stevens

July 14, 2007

By Jake Metcalfe - Lew Williams Jr., former publisher of the Ketchikan Daily News, recently attacked the news media in general and the Democratic Party in particular for the scandals troubling Alaska's two senior elected Republicans in Washington, D.C.

Lew should know better.

He has been in the news business for too many years, beginning with his newspaper route when he delivered papers to my grandfather's house in Juneau at the top of Gold Street some 65 years ago. It is the job of news reporters to report. If, as Williams suggests, there is nothing to worry about, then it will blow over.

But considering Rep. Don Young's connection to Jack Abramoff and Sen. Ted Stevens' connection to VECO, for any journalist who purports to cover the political beat to ignore these stories would be unprofessional and a violation of the public's need to know.

Williams suggests news reporters at least try Googling sources. Well, Lew, try this: If you Google "Don Young" plus "corruption" plus "Jack Abramoff," you'll get 22,000 hits. Googling "Ted Stevens" plus "corruption" plus "VECO" nets 27,000. With this much smoke, it's worth looking for a fire. If so, either the FBI or some enterprising journalist will find it.

As for Williams' attacks on the Democratic Party, I'll remind this former reporter and former Democrat, that the trans-Alaska oil pipeline would never have been built but for the Democratic Party. At the time the pipeline was approved, there was a Democrat in the Governor's Mansion, Democrats controlled both Houses of the Alaska Legislature, Democrats sat in two of Alaska's three congressional seats, and Democratic majorities controlled both the U.S. Senate and U.S. House of Representatives.

Present Alaska Democrats. Alaska Democrats have a long history of supporting progress and projects such as the Alaska gas line. We are proud of our history of advocating and representing the interests of Alaska's working people - blue collar and professional. I can assure Alaskans that on my watch the Alaska Democratic Party will continue these traditions.

But Lew. He is reduced to throwing weak mud balls.

Amid our Alaska corruption scandals, I honestly pity Lew. He and his fellow travelers are reduced to defending the indefensible: corruption of the lowest sort - selling out all Alaskans (including fellow Alaskans) for the benefit of the world's most profitable corporations, and doing this for pocket change.

Alaska Birds
Ads by Google

Anchorage Listings Online
Find Homes in Anchorage, Alaska. Easily Contact an Agent! www.eagent.com/Anchorage

AK MLS - Free Search
View AK homes for sale. Newest Alaska listings. www.MLS.com

Alaska Woman
Email Singles For Free No Credit Card Required
Singlesnet.com

Alaska Singles Events
Cupid/PreDating holds monthly Speed Date singles events-3 Alaska Cities www.Pre-Dating.com

Meet Alaska Singles
View photos of singles in your area We're 100% free for everything!
DateHookup.com

FBI - Stevens-1818

194A-AN-13620-M; 725

[illegible] from the tone of Lew's column and several letters to the [illegible] would think the indicted are the victims. They are [illegible] by these writers as honest, intelligent, productive [illegible] of the community. I'm a former district attorney, and I [illegible] you how many criminals I've successfully prosecuted [illegible] the victim despite overwhelming evidence. As a [illegible] I always found that to be the surest sign the defendant [illegible] be rehabilitated.

[illegible] hard working people of Alaska don't buy your [illegible] defense of these corrupt bastards, or your attack-[illegible] game. As one of my colleagues once said, "There [illegible] three types of crime: stupidity in the first, second and [illegible] degree."

[illegible] crimes are more stupid than those committed by arrogant [illegible] who believe they are above the law.

[illegible] Metcalfe is chairman of the Alaska Democratic Party and a [illegible] District attorney for the state of Alaska.

[illegible] Stories:

[illegible] & Corruption: Move Over Duke Cunningham

[illegible] and Don Young Fail to Provide 'Honest Services'

[illegible] closing in on Ted Stevens' son Ben

[illegible] warrants issued as criminal probe intensifies after FBI [illegible] Alaska legislators

[illegible] president Ben Stevens has accepted bribes from [illegible] successors, according to Ray Metcalfe

[illegible] Report News

[illegible] Halibut Fishing
[illegible] 1-of-a-Kind Sportfishing In Ketchikan, Alaska!
[illegible] eZone.com

[illegible] Ballad Excursion
[illegible] Crab Fishermen's Tour departing from [illegible], Alaska.
[illegible] snorth.com

[illegible] Listings Online
[illegible] in Anchorage, Alaska. Easily Contact an [illegible] m/Anchorage

Ads by Google

FBI - Stevens-1819

All images, media, [illegible] Copyright © 1999 – 2007 AlaskaReport.com – Unless otherwise noted – All rights reserved Privacy Policy

Examples of Alaska earmarks

Examples of Alaska Projects Earmarked by Lawmakers

The Associated Press
AP News

Aug 14, 2007 13:56 EDT

Some examples of special project appropriations going to Alaska, as compiled by the private group Taxpayers for Common Sense:

_Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board. From its federal funds, the board gave Alaska Airlines a $500,000 grant. It was used, in part, to paint a Boeing 737 to look like a Chinook Salmon to promote the state's seafood.

_The Alyeska Roundhouse received $450,000. The building is at the Alyeska ski resort in Girdwood, where Alaska Republican Sen. Ted Stevens has his home.

_Money for six "Alternative Salmon Products." The University of Alaska received several of these earmarks, which included $450,000 for development of baby food containing salmon in 2006.

_Alaska Christian College received $435,000 in 2005. The school had several dozen students at the time.

_The National Archives and Records Administration received at least $2.25 million toward the purchase of an empty lot in Anchorage from two former Stevens business partners. The purchase cost was $3.5 million, allowing the former Stevens partners to more than double their investment.

_The Alaska Botanical Garden received $300,000 over three years for expansion and renovation.

_SpringBoard, an organization that helps Alaska businesses meet the needs of the Department of Defense, received $14 million the past two years.

_$250,000 was appropriated to plan for the Alaska Statehood celebration, set for 2009.

_$1 million in 2005 went for mobile computers for police cars in Wasilla, Alaska, population 6,700.

Source: AP News

Powered by Mochila

PRINT SHARE

FBI - Stevens-1820

194A-AN-13620-M, 726

TPM PARTNER SITE
THE HUFFINGTON POST

Robert Scheer: Hillary Pushes the Button
What in the world was Sen. Hillary Clinton thinking when she attacked Sen. Barack Obama for ruling out the...

Markos Moulitsas ZÃºniga: "MSM" vs. "Traditional Media"
It's become in vogue by progressives to adopt the right-wing acronym "MSM" to refer to the "mainstream media". It's...

David Roberts: Bush speechwriter supports action on climate change after leaving White House; misunderstands issue; offends my sensibilities grist org Via Brian Beutler (The Other WunderkindTM), I notice that longtime Bush loyalist and former Bush speechwriter Michael Gerson...

HEADLINES BY FEEDBURNER

ADVERTISEMENT

FBI - Stevens-1821

Home Privacy Policy About TPM Archive Advertise Contribute
Copyright 2007 TPM Media LLC. All Rights Reserved.

COMEDY CENTRAL'S INDECISION 2008
TOP STORIES
MORE INDECISION >

Roll Call: [Nick Cage Movie Reference Redacted]
Wed, 15 Aug 2007 - What happens in Vegas will not

Slogasm: Obamastan Follow-Up
Wed, 15 Aug 2007 - Last week we asked you to help ...

Cockblock the Vote: 1876 - The Kooks of Hazzard
Tue, 14 Aug 2007 - Whether it's the daily critiques of

FBI - Stevens-1822

Switch to DISH. Get over 100 top channels.*
Save $31/mo. over cable. Based on FCC report dated 12/27/06
*Including Disney Channel!
GET DISH dish NETWORK

TPM MUCKRAKER.COM
They've got muck. We've got rakes.

Sen. Ted Stevens (R-AK) (WDCPIX.com)

Alaska: Where Pork Lives

By Laura McGann - August 14, 2007, 3:51 PM

The AP teamed up with Taxpayers for Common Sense to take a hard look at how Alaska has benefited from earmarks:

More than 2,000 projects worth $7.5 billion have gone to Alaska since 2000, says Taxpayers for Common Sense. Alaska received a little over $1 billion in the 2005 highway bill.

A 2005-2007 study of earmarks by the group showed that Alaska _ ranked 47th in population _ has done far better than other states, when spending is calculated per person. Spending over the three-year period came to $4,311 per person in earmarked projects for Alaskans, while Hawaii was a distant second at $1,812. At the low end were the populous states of Texas, at $98 per person, and New York, $95 per person.

Part of the difference can be explained by Alaska's special needs, with its remote geography, rough terrain and extreme weather. But the clout of Stevens and Young also has played a huge role.

Here are a few of the more, ahem, interesting projects.

Permalink | TOPICS: Don Young: Lisa Murkowski: Ted Stevens

FBI - Stevens-1823

194A-AN-13620-m;727

ADVERTISEMENT:

return to the homepage | post a comment

Comments:

Alaska Christian College? My tax dollars went to pay for religious ed? What happened to the separation f church and state thing? This pisses me off even more than painting a salmon on an airplane or paying for some company to incorporate salmon into baby food.

Posted by: Toxophilite
Date: August 14, 2007 4:03 PM

Interesting comparison between Hawaii and Alaska earmark monies. As someone living in Hawaii, I can say that Alaska has no corner on the "remote geography" market. While we may not appear a likely candidate for 'extreme weather' like Alaska (note that Hurricane Flossie is making its way toward us as I write), the 44 days solid of rain that killed seven and did $$ millions in road, crop and sewage pipe infrastructure damage last year is certainly not trivial.

Not that I'm asking for a Senator like Stevens, of course, don't get me wrong. But yeah, does seem like things are a little lopsided. At least all our bridges go somewhere....

FBI - Stevens-1824

Posted by: pakaal
Date: August 14, 2007 4:44 PM

Well...
At least we have some consolation. After all, once the case is decided against Stevens, Stevens, Young, and Murkowski, and they are all found guilty of fraud and misappropriation of taxpayers' dollars and bribery... after this occurs... at least we taxpayers will be reimbursed now, won't we?

We really do not have justice (justice: n. 1. The quality of being just; fairness.

2. a. The principle of moral rightness; equity. b. Conformity to moral rightness in action or attitude; righteousness. 3. a. The upholding of what is just, especially fair treatment and due reward in accordance with honor, standards, or law. b. Law The administration and procedure of law) anymore, though, do we...

Posted by: johnnydoughey
Date: August 14, 2007 5:24 PM

From the AP:

_$1 million in 2005 went for mobile computers for police cars in Wasilla, Alaska, population 6,700.

I just checked the Wasilla 2007 capital budget and it has $4,250,000 in federal aid budgeted for wideband mobile communicatons in 2007. I linked to the budget below - see p. 22 of the actual budget, p 30 of the PDF file.

Wasilla's entire 2007 budget is $13,140,971.

I think Alaska needs to be audited.

Posted by: Nelly Bly
Date: August 14, 2007 5:42 PM

Any interest on the part of TPM's editors to conduct a similar audit of the spending in Jack Murtha's district -- how about just to the defense contractors that use his brother's lobbying firm?

Or how about Rep. Mollohan from West Virginia. Seems like the reporting on him was that just about every dollar in campaign contributions he received came from people connected to non-profits that operated exclusively on federal grant money directed to them by Mollohan earmarks.

Posted by: shipwreckedcrew
Date: August 14, 2007 10:18 PM

Any interest on the part of TPM's editors to conduct a similar audit of the spending in Jack Murtha's district -- how about just to the defense contractors that use his brother's lobbying firm?

Or how about Rep. Mollohan from West Virginia. Seems like the reporting on him was that just about every dollar in campaign contributions he received came from people connected to non-profits that operated exclusively on federal grant money directed to them by Mollohan earmarks.

FBI - Stevens-1825

Posted by: shipwreckedcrew
Date: August 14, 2007 10:19 PM

---

1. Since Alaska's total population is that of a mid-size city while covering an area 2 or 3 times larger than Texas, any project of magnitude here will cost more per person. While interesting, per person federal spending is no more statistically valid for states at the extremes of population than simply comparing Alaska's total federal spending with that of other states.

2. I trust there will be articles on earmarks in others states, e.g. as what Tom Coburn got in Oklahoma, or Ted Kennedy in Massachusetts- who recently got a $100 million earmark to produce jet engines (in Lynn, MA) that the Air Force DOESN'T WANT.

Picking on federal spending and earmarks only in Alaska may the the sport du jour, but it's not fair.

Posted by: bobalaska
Date: August 14, 2007 10:44 PM

Alaska brainwashing. TPM readers remember Ted and Don have a huge victim following in Alaska you must remember everyone is a victim in Alaska including Ted and Don according to Ted and Don

Posted by:
Date: August 14, 2007 11:54 PM

If you really wanted to dig, look into the preferential federal contracts for Alaska Native-owned corporations. How sweet it is!

Posted by: Grumpy
Date: August 15, 2007 10:20 AM

I wonder how much of the easiness with which the Alaskan Congressmen got pork had to do with the administration's want to open up the wildlife rfuge to oil companies???? Were they given carte blanche so Big Oil could make a buck?

Posted by: The Raving Badger
Date: August 15, 2007 12:52 PM

Name:

Remember personal info?
Yes No

Email Address:

URL:

Comments:

FBI - Stevens-1826

GO

last three months

THIS JUST IN:

RECORD CRACKDOWN ON CORRUPT IRAQ CONTRACTS
A federal crackdown on corruption involving U.S. contracts in Iraq produced a record number of criminal and administrative cases last month — including the largest bribery case.
(USA TODAY)

U.S. WEIGHING TERRORIST LABEL FOR IRAN GUARDS
The Bush administration is preparing to declare that Iran's Revolutionary Guard Corps is a foreign terrorist organization, senior administration officials said Tuesday.
(NY Times)

LAWYERSR SAY PADILLA WENT OVERSEAS TO STUDY
Jose Padilla traveled overseas to peacefully study Arabic and Islam and not to train as an Al Qaeda terrorist, his lawyer said in closing arguments yesterday in a case rooted in 2002 allegations that he plotted to detonate a "dirty bomb" in the United States.
(Boston Globe)

EXAMPLES OF ALASKA EARMARKS
Here are some examples of special project appropriations going to Alaska, as compiled by the private group Taxpayers for Common Sense.
(Associated Press)

ARMY CHIEF UNSURE WHEN DUTY TOURS WILL BE CUT
Gen. George Casey, the Army's chief of staff, said yesterday he didn't know when officials would be able to cut the length of soldiers' tours back to 12 months.
(Associated Press)

LINKS

TPM Media Sites
Talking Points Memo
TPM Election Central
TPMCafe

Approved Sites
TNR
ThinkProgress

MUCK RESOURCES

U.S.A. Scandal Timeline
TPM Document Collection
Bios of Key Players
Grand Old Docket

HOT TOPICS

Indefinite Detentions
Surveillance
Alberto Gonzales
Ted Stevens
Don Young
U.S. Attorneys
Iraq
Must Read

ADVERTISERS:

Advertise here
Advertise here
POWER THRILLS... TOO MUCH KILLS

Pre-order the pulse-pounding new thriller from NYT Bestseller Joseph Finder and get a free copy of Killer Instinct, named 2007 Thriller of the Year by the International Thriller Writers!

Jet-propelled
Janet Maslin, NYT
Explosive
Entertainment Weekly
A master of the modern thriller
Boston Globe
Advertise here

FBI - Stevens-1827

War&Piece
The Carpetbagger Report
Mother Jones

Harper's
DailyKos
POGO blog
PC Action Fu GO

MASTHEAD

WSJ: DHS to Get Access to Spy Satellite Intel

Home | Terms of Use | Privacy Policy
Copyright © 2007 TPM Media LLC. All Rights Reserved

Leahy Asks for a Chat with Bush

DOJ to Feinstein: Nanny Nanny Boo Boo

THIS JUST IN:

FEDERAL CRACKDOWN ON CORRUPT IRAQ CONTRACTS
A federal crackdown on corruption involving U.S. contracts in Iraq produced a record number of criminal and civil cases last year, including the largest military case.
(USA TODAY)

U.S. WEIGHING TERRORIST LABEL FOR IRAN GUARDS
The Bush administration is preparing to declare that Iran's Revolutionary Guard Corps is a foreign terrorist organization, senior administration officials said Tuesday.
(NY Times)

LAWYERSR SAY PADILLA WENT OVERSEAS TO STUDY
Jose Padilla traveled overseas to peacefully study Arabic and Islam and not to train as an Al Qaeda terrorist, his lawyer said in closing arguments yesterday in a case rooted in 2002 allegations that he plotted to detonate a "dirty bomb" in the United States.
(Boston Globe)

EXAMPLES OF ALASKA EARMARKS
Here are some examples of special project appropriations going to Alaska, as compiled by the private group Taxpayers for Common Sense.
(Associated Press)

ARMY CHIEF UNSURE WHEN DUTY TOURS WILL BE CUT
Gen. George Casey, the Army's chief of staff, said yesterday he didn't know when officials would be able to cut the length of soldiers' tours back to 12 months.
(Associated Press)

LINKS

TPM Media Sites
Talking Points Memo
TPM Election Central TPMCafe

Approved Sites
TNR
ThinkProgress

Editor
Reporter-Bloggers
Spencer Ackerman
Paul Kiel
Laura McCann
Brian Ross
Matthew Murray

MUCK RESOURCES
U.S.A. Scandal Timeline
TPM Document Collection
Bios of Key Players
Grand Old Docket

HOT TOPICS
Indefinite Detentions
Surveillance
Alberto Gonzales
Ted Stevens
Don Young
U.S. Attorneys
Iraq
Must Read

ADVERTISERS:

Advertise here
Advertise here
POWER THRILLS... TOO MUCH KILLS

Pre-order the pulse-pounding new thriller from NYT Bestseller Joseph Finder and get a free copy of Killer Instinct, named 2007 Thriller of the Year by the International Thriller Writers!

Jet-propelled
Janet Maslin, NYT
Explosive
Entertainment Weekly
A master of the modern thriller
Boston Globe
Advertise here

FBI - Stevens-1828

War&Piece
The Carpetbagger Report
Mother Jones
Sunlight Foundation
Harper's
DailyKos
POGO blog
PC Action Fund

MASTHEAD

Editor
Josh Marshall

Reporter-Bloggers
Spencer Ackerman
Paul Kiel
Laura McGann

Researchers
Will Thomas
Tanvir Vahora

FBI - Stevens-1829

Texas Instruments | Learn

TPM MUCKRAKER.COM
They've got muck. We've got rakes.

Sen. Ted Stevens (R-AK) (WDCPIX.com)

Stevens: Local Paper Out to "Assassinate Me"

By Laura McGann - August 15, 2007, 12:54 PM

Sen. Ted Stevens (R-AK) finally stood up for himself. He called out the Anchorage Daily News for trying to destroy his credibility during an interview with its editorial board last week. Presumably Stevens is upset about coverage of events like the FBI raid of his Girdwood home, which marked the first time in history federal investigators searched a sitting U.S. senator's residence.

Stevens initially threatened to leave the interview when a reporter brought up the ongoing federal investigation, but Stevens did respond to a question about his "ability to be effective in Congress":

A. What about it? You're destroying it. More people are repeating what you're writing in your paper than anything else in the country. This paper has caused me more difficulty, and I've told you that before, than anything else. You've created me as the senator-for-life. You've been hanging me weekly.

You read any paper, the information -- most of it is not true -- started right here. And your guys just yesterday, they taunt me. They taunt me with statements that really no respectable reporter would ask a senator. It was already said I'm not going to answer your questions. They say, don't you have any concerns for your own integrity? Don't you have any conscience? That's what your reporters do to me. ...

I've spent hours here with you here in the past, and I've never seen any result of it at all. ... This paper has done nothing but

FBI - Stevens-1830

194A-AN-13620-M;728

try to assassinate me.

Yeah Daily News, ease up.

Permalink | TOPICS: Ted Stevens

ADVERTISEMENT:

return to the homepage | post a comment

Comments:

I was just scimming through Bill Allens plea facts and I stumbled upon something pretty damning for Teddy Boy;

"From in or about 1995 until in or about 2001 ALLEN corruptly authorized VECO to engage and pay on a monthly basis the consulting services of a private company owned by [Ben Stevens], who was, at that time, not an elected public official. During that time, ALLEN discussed with [Ben Stevens] the possibility that [Ben Stevens] would eventually become an executive at VECO."

So, if Allen was making "corrupt" payments to Ben Stevens before he was even elected, those payments clearly cannot have been intended to by his vote. These payments also do not appear in the round-up of fees used to influence Stevens jr's support. Furthermore, it is not likely that Allen would start paying for his support back in 1995 when Ben probably did not even think of going to the Legislature (they even discussed ANOTHER job for him, at VECO).

FBI - Stevens-1831

The only logical conclusion can be that these payments were made to buy Ted Stevens' support. This is gonna be bad.

Posted by: Oscar
Date: August 15, 2007 1:11 PM

let the victimization begin! Ted Stevens is officially running for office with these comments

P.S. Ted, Capitol Hill are reading TPM not ADN

tubular

Posted by:
Date: August 15, 2007 1:37 PM

Best part of the interview:

Q. Isn't al-Qaida a Sunni organization in a Shiite country? Are you suggesting the Sunnis are going to end up back in charge of Iraq?

A. I'm not exactly certain who's going to be in charge of Iraq. I don't know if we pull out. And, by the way, I don't think it's necessarily a Sunni organization.

Yup, he's a US Senator.

Posted by: JesseLman
Date: August 15, 2007 1:39 PM

"statements that really no respectable reporter would ask a senator"

I believe this statement is an important insight to the attitudes our elected officials have embraced.

When this country became a democracy, it was attempting to do away with the complete separation of the heirarchy with the masses. Our Constitution is full of protections quarding us from the Kings and rulers. Even George the 1st (sad that this clown in office was given the same name as our 1st president, who refused to be known as anything more than "one who presides").

We have come full circle. We now have senators, congressmen, and presidents who actually believe they should be treated differently than us common folk.

The problem we are up against has nothing to do with the Iraq War, terrorism, poverty, or anthing else. These are only the situations which have resulted from the REAL problem. We have allowed our representatives to become arrogant, self serving, nonaccountable rulers, and this past 6 1/2 years has shown us just how much and how often rulers listen to their subjects...

FBI - Stevens-1832

Unless we have another revo@&* (any of you still secure enough to believe they are NOT using their "find" command to look for certain words) in which we somehow pull their throwns out from under them, their rule will become more and more set in concrete and we will become less and less annoying. Look around... it is becoming more and more evident as the months go by...

Posted by: johnnydoughey
Date: August 15, 2007 1:54 PM

Laura,

I suggest you call Willie Hensley and ask him if he's willing to be candid about the threatening phone calls Don Young has been making to him and his employer over the past few weeks. I hope you beat the ADN to the story, because it is even better - by far - than St. Ted's rant to the ADN editors.

Posted by: Ed*ard Teller
Date: August 15, 2007 1:59 PM

RE: 1:54 PM

Sorry. "thrown" should be "throne". Freud must have been whispering to me...

Posted by: johnnydoughey
Date: August 15, 2007 2:00 PM

"statements that really no respectable reporter would ask a senator."

No respectable reporter would have ignored the Alaska gravy train story(s), it is really muckin'up the river water...

And so what is TPMmuckraker, Ted, chopped liver?

Methinks the Anchorage paper took some cues from Laura, but that would be more proof that the 4th Estate has moved on up to the east side, and is now living on The Blogs..

Needless to say, "The Senator for Life" may not appreciate that "sentence, when it comes from the other side of the wiitness chair...
...a 20 year sentence for his overt corruption would be tantamount to a life sentence. And who needs to even look for "proof", when you've been a Republican from Alaska for so long, all your crimes are right there on the Congressional Record!!!

Posted by: JEP
Date: August 15, 2007 2:04 PM

Stevens said he is friends with Murtha. No suprise there, is there?

FBI - Stevens-1833

Posted by: Pork Barrel
Date: August 15, 2007 2:11 PM

Darn! The Alaska Daily News didn't ask Stevens about what Barbara Flanders, 54, does to earn $150k as a financial clerk for the Senate Commerce Committee.

Flanders is the one who did personal bookkeeping for Ted and was called to testify about the Girdwood bills.

Are Stevens and Flanders romantically linked? Did Senator Inouye, committee chairman, give Flanders a $38k raise this year on behalf of his best friend, Ted?

Inquiring minds want to know!

Posted by: Just Asking
Date: August 15, 2007 2:16 PM

LOL - Our failure in Iraq is Bill Clinton's fault!

Posted by: Didn't you just know it!
Date: August 15, 2007 2:36 PM

TED STEVENS REALLY SHOWS HIS "INTERNET-TUBES" MENTALITY IN THAT INTERVIEW... AND ALSO COMES ACROSS AS A SILVER-SPOON SPOILED BRAT.

HE'S SUPER-SPECIAL: HE SHOULD ONLY HAVE POSITIVE STORIES WRITTEN ABOUT HIS ILLEGAL, CORRUPT, PORK-GLUTTONED WORK AS A SENATOR.

OLD FART!

Posted by: Herb
Date: August 15, 2007 2:42 PM

Could Senator Stevens elaborate here?

"If we walk away again -- we (already) have very few partners left in the world -- and we won't have any."

Walk away again? Is he talking about Vietnam or what?

Very few partners left in the world? Why is that?

Which of our partners will abandon us if we walk away from Iraq?

FBI - Stevens-1834

Posted by: Cyrptographer
Date: August 15, 2007 2:42 PM

"Gen. David) Petraeus has all the qualification of Eisenhower. As a matter of fact I think if he succeeds he will be an Eisenhower."

And if Petraeus doesn't succeed, he can be Westmoreland.

Posted by: I like Ike!
Date: August 15, 2007 2:53 PM

"I've spent hours here with you here in the past, and I've never seen any result of it at all."

Talk about perfect insight into the corrupt mind of Sen. Stevens: "I did you a favor, therefore I deserve preferential treatment." Clearly there's a sense of betrayal that the local paper is undermining the Alaskan graft industry.

Posted by: gbheron
Date: August 15, 2007 3:09 PM

Of course the ADN reporting on his legal troubles is causing him grief - it is widely read throughout the state. From the ADN pages to the voters. This is also probably why his handlers suggested he agree to an interview. It's unfortunate for him that he couldn't keep a lid on his temper, and threw a hissy fit at the paper for doing it's job.

His sense of entitlement, that he is above suspicion because he is a senator, is breathtaking.

Posted by: TEL
Date: August 15, 2007 3:19 PM

One can listen to the entire interview by going to the Daily News site (www.adn.com) and downloading it. The way the transcript was edited was very kind to the Senator.

It is clearly time for him to resign; or, at the very least, to step aside when his term ends next year. He is not a well man.

Posted by: AlaskaVet
Date: August 15, 2007 3:38 PM

Alaska Vet,

I doubt either Senator Stevens or Representative Young will be standing for re-election come next spring. Young has already pulled his 2008 campaign website - http://www.donyoung08.com/

FBI - Stevens-1835

Posted by: Ed*ard Teller
Date: August 15, 2007 3:47 PM

Universal rule of the road:

When a public official openly blames the media for their troubles, they are finished...

Adios, Sen. Stevens

GO

last three months

THIS JUST IN:

RECORD CRACKDOWN ON CORRUPT IRAQ CONTRACTS
A federal crackdown on corruption involving U.S. contracts in Iraq produced a record number of criminal and administrative cases last month — including the largest bribery case.
(USA TODAY)

U.S. WEIGHING TERRORIST LABEL FOR IRAN GUARDS
The Bush administration is preparing to declare that Iran's Revolutionary Guard Corps is a foreign terrorist organization, senior administration officials said Tuesday.
(NY Times)

LAWYERSR SAY PADILLA WENT OVERSEAS TO STUDY
Jose Padilla traveled overseas to peacefully study Arabic and Islam and not to train as an Al Qaeda terrorist, his lawyer said in closing arguments yesterday in a case rooted in 2002 allegations that he plotted to detonate a "dirty bomb" in the United States.
(Boston Globe)

EXAMPLES OF ALASKA EARMARKS
Here are some examples of special project appropriations going to Alaska, as compiled by the private group Taxpayers for Common Sense.
(Associated Press)

ARMY CHIEF UNSURE WHEN DUTY TOURS WILL BE CUT
Gen. George Casey, the Army's chief of staff, said yesterday he didn't know when officials would be able to cut the length of soldiers' tours back to 12 months.
(Associated Press)

LINKS

TPM Media Sites
Talking Points Memo
TPM Election Central TPMCafe

Approved Sites
TNR
ThinkProgress

MUCK RESOURCES

U.S.A. Scandal Timeline
TPM Document Collection
Bios of Key Players
Grand Old Docket

HOT TOPICS

Indefinite Detentions
Surveillance
Alberto Gonzales
Ted Stevens
Don Young
U.S. Attorneys
Iraq
Must Read

ADVERTISERS:

Advertise here
Advertise here
POWER THRILLS... TOO MUCH KILLS

Pre-order the pulse-pounding new thriller from NYT Bestseller Joseph Finder and get a free copy of Killer Instinct, named 2007 Thriller of the Year by the International Thriller Writers!

Jet-propelled
Janet Maslin, NYT
Explosive
Entertainment Weekly
A master of the modern thriller
Boston Globe

Advertise here

FBI - Stevens-1836

War&Piece
The Carpetbagger Report
Mother Jones

Harper's
DailyKos
POGO blog
PC Action Fu GO

MASTHEAD

Editor
Reporter-Bloggers
Spencer Ackerman
Paul Kiel
Laura McGann

THIS JUST IN:

FEDERAL CRACKDOWN ON CORRUPT IRAQ CONTRACTS
A federal crackdown on corruption involving U.S. contracts in Iraq produced a record number of criminal and administrative cases last month, including the largest bribery case.
(USA TODAY)

U.S. WEIGHING TERRORIST LABEL FOR IRAN GUARDS
The Bush administration is preparing to declare that Iran's Revolutionary Guard Corps is a foreign terrorist organization, senior administration officials said Tuesday.
(NY Times)

LAWYERSR SAY PADILLA WENT OVERSEAS TO STUDY
Jose Padilla traveled overseas to peacefully study Arabic and Islam and not to train as an Al Qaeda terrorist, his lawyer said in closing arguments yesterday in a case rooted in 2002 allegations that he plotted to detonate a "dirty bomb" in the United States.
(Boston Globe)

EXAMPLES OF ALASKA EARMARKS
Here are some examples of special project appropriations going to Alaska, as compiled by the private group Taxpayers for Common Sense.
(Associated Press)

ARMY CHIEF UNSURE WHEN DUTY TOURS WILL BE CUT
Gen. George Casey, the Army's chief of staff, said yesterday he didn't know when officials would be able to cut the length of soldiers' tours back to 12 months.
(Associated Press)

LINKS

TPM Media Sites
Talking Points Memo
TPM Election Central TPMCafe

Approved Sites
TNR
ThinkProgress

WSJ: DHS to Get Access to Spy Sat

Home | Terms of Use | Privacy Policy
Copyright © 2007 TPM Media LLC. All Rights Reserved

Leahy Asks for a Chat with Bush

DOJ to Feinstein: Nanny Nanny Boo B

MUCK RESOURCES
U.S.A. Scandal Timeline
TPM Document Collection
Bios of Key Players
Grand Old Docket

HOT TOPICS
Indefinite Detentions
Surveillance
Alberto Gonzales
Ted Stevens
Don Young
U.S. Attorneys
Iraq
Must Read

ADVERTISERS:

Advertise here
Advertise here
POWER THRILLS... TOO MUCH KILLS

Pre-order the pulse-pounding new thriller from NYT Bestseller Joseph Finder and get a free copy of Killer Instinct, named 2007 Thriller of the Year by the International Thriller Writers!

Jet-propelled
Janet Maslin, NYT
Explosive
Entertainment Weekly
A master of the modern thriller
Boston Globe

Advertise here

FBI - Stevens-1837

War&Piece
The Carpetbagger Report
Mother Jones
Sunlight Foundation
Harper's
DailyKos
POGO blog
PC Action Fund

MASTHEAD

Editor
Josh Marshall

Reporter-Bloggers
Spencer Ackerman
Paul Kiel
Laura McGann

Researchers
Will Thomas
Tanvir Vahora

FBI - Stevens-1838

<<Back

inAlaska com

More suspicions surface in Stevens FBI investigation

More details surfaced today regarding an FBI investigation into the finances of Sen. Ted Stevens and his son, Ben. (KTUU-TV)

McClatchy Newspapers says the FBI is investigating an award of $170 million in federal contracts to VECO Corp. (KTUU-TV)

The McClatchy article contained no allegation that Stevens steered the money to VECO. (KTUU-TV)

Bering Marine Corporation hired Ben Stevens to work on a boat in the Arctic Ocean under a subcontract with Shell Oil. (KTUU-TV)

by Bill McAllister
Thursday, Aug. 16, 2007

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- More details came to light today regarding an FBI investigation into the finances of Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens and his son, Ben, former president of the State Senate.

Reports out of Washington make connections between funding provided by the elder Stevens and contracts and employment received by his son from companies that got the federal money.

As usual, the FBI isn't confirming anything, but one article describes an aspect of the federal investigation that has not been reported on by the media thus far, while another suggests a link between congressional appropriations and Ben Stevens' current job.

McClatchy Newspapers says the FBI is investigating an award of $170 million in federal contracts to VECO, the oilfield services company that monitored remodeling of Ted Stevens' Girdwood home in 2000.

Two top former VECO executives pleaded guilty in May to bribing state legislators, including Ben Stevens, who has not been charged.

VECO won a contract in 1999 to provide logistical support for arctic research, according to the McClatchy report, even though the firm had limited experience in that field.

The article contained no allegation that Stevens steered the money to VECO, but says it was well-known in certain circles at the time that Ben Stevens was a VECO consultant.

Meanwhile, Roll Call, a Capitol Hill publication, reports the company that recently hired Ben Stevens received $300 million in federal contracts over the past six years, much of which came from appropriations under oversight by the elder Stevens.

FBI - Stevens-1839

Bering Marine Corporation, a subsidiary of Lynden, hired Ben Stevens to work on a boat in the Arctic Ocean under a subcontract with Shell Oil.

Lynden CEO Jim Jansen reportedly paid Ben Stevens $10,000 to work as a federal lobbyist in 1997.

University of Nebraska's Marijane Hancock had a proposal to continue the school's polar research grant and lost out to VECO in the award of the grant by the National Science Foundation.

194A-AN-13620-m; 729

Two top former VECO executives pleaded guilty in May to bribing state legislators. (KTUU-TV)

"It was well known. It was coffee shop talk. It was lunchroom talk about Stevens' influence and his, I'm going to say manipulation because that's how we talked about it over the lunch hour, of funds and pressure on NSF," Hancock said.

Senator Stevens continues to decline to comment on any aspect of the FBI investigation.

Washington is where the appropriations were originally made, and someone involved in the federal probe may be leaking information to reporters there.

It certainly isn't happening on that scale within Alaska.

Although the FBI won't confirm it, Dana Cruikshank of the National Science Foundation said in a brief interview this afternoon that the FBI is looking into the agency's award of the polar research contract to VECO in 1999.

Contact Bill McAllister at bmcallister@ktuu.com

WorldNow

All content © Copyright 2000 - 2007 WorldNow and KTUU. All Rights Reserved.
For more information on this site, please read our Privacy Policy and Terms of Service.

FBI - Stevens-1840

<<Back

Fairbanks Republican lobs bomb at GOP leadership

by Channel 2 News staff
Monday, Aug. 20, 2007

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- Rep. Mike Kelly, R-Fairbanks, has written a letter to the editor of the Fairbanks News Miner asking U.S. Rep Don Young and Sen. Ted Stevens to step down and not seek re-election next year.

Kelly also called on state Sen. John Cowdery, chairman of the Senate Rules Committee, and Alaska Republican Party Chairman Randy Ruedrich to resign.

In the letter, Kelly acknowledges that his words would ignite controversy no matter "how well written," but that Republicans want a change and insinuated that senior members had done the party more harm than good in light of recent corruption probes.

Cowdery's office was raided by federal investigators last year. Ruedrich has been cited and fined for ethical lapses by the state Legislature. Both Young and Stevens are currently under federal investigation into charges of corruption.

Watch the Channel 2 News evening broadcasts for the complete report.

WorldNow

All content © Copyright 2000 - 2007 WorldNow and KTUU. All Rights Reserved.
For more information on this site, please read our Privacy Policy and Terms of Service.

FBI - Stevens-1841

194A-AN-13620-M;730

FAIRBANKS
Daily News - Miner

Letters to the Editor

Published August 19, 2007

Time for sacrifice and honor

August 17, 2007

To the editor:

The Alaska Republican Party, legitimate home of the conservative agenda built upon individual responsibility, limited government, development of human and natural resource potential, solid ethics and traditional family values is in need of change, inspiration and visionary leadership. In the year just ahead Alaskans will surely select: a) effective reform, or b) further revolution. "Status quo" will not be their choice. I've held this piece for a month since it will tread large sore toes no matter how carefully written. But no rancor or accusation or offense is intended.

Rebuilding public trust and confidence is the worthy task. A new Governor and changes to ethics legislation gave us a start. Next steps would involve selfless sacrifice for the benefit of the Republican Party and the conservative agenda by powerful individuals whose action could permit a new team of conservative candidates to rise without risk of offending current longtime office holders. Failing this, I fear we risk further slide toward the wretched agenda of the far left – some would say deservedly. Here's how I would like to see this play out:

Senator Ted Stevens would announce his intent to retire at the end of his current term and support the strongest conservative candidate that comes forth to replace him in the next election.

Congressman Don Young would take the same action to contribute to the re-birth of his party.

Senate Rules Chair John Cowdery would, in the same spirit, resign his Alaska Senate seat to permit Governor Palin to appoint a replacement in time for the special session beginning October 18.

Alaska Republican Party Chairman Randy Ruedrich would join the effort by announcing his intent to resign and assist his replacement in the transition.

Seeing these positive steps the popular and conservative Governor Palin may feel more comfortable working with a team of Republican leaders to restore the confidence of Alaskans in their government and lead Alaska to a bright future.

Rep. Mike Kelly

R-Fairbanks

FBI - Stevens-1842

Buyer beware!

194A-AN-13620-M; 731

Aug. 1, 2007

To the editor:

While next in line to check out at local grocery store, I noticed a display of gift cards. One of them was a Visa gift card for $50. I thought that would be the perfect gift for my son-in-law's birthday. He comes home in November after serving his second tour of duty in Iraq. I asked the cashier if this was a prepaid Visa card, and she said that it was. I bought the card, which was in a cardboard sleeve. Before exiting the store I looked over my sales slip and noticed that they had charged me a $4.95 fee. Since the card display is at the check-out, I didn't have time to read the fine print as there were customers waiting behind me. I started to read the fine print on the cardboard sleeve and noticed that the $50 icon was in big letters, but surrounding it was fine print that said "Card good through October 2007," and at the bottom of the card, in very fine print, was the message "A $4.95 purchase fee applies."

The fine print was way too small for seniors to read without using a magnifying glass or putting on reading glasses. Since the card was only good through October, I couldn't use it because the gift recipient will not return to America until November. I went to customer service and asked for my money back. A manager appeared and told me that they couldn't refund my money on a gift card. I explained the situation and told her that since I didn't bring my lawyer with me I felt like they were cheating me. She still refused. I asked to speak to her supervisor. When he arrived I told him my sad story and he told me that I was just out of luck. I went to a store next door determined to spend the $50 and get rid of the card taking the loss of $4.95. I presented the card for payment, but it didn't work. The clerk called the toll-free number on the card and was told that there was a 30 minute waiting period between the purchase and ability to use the card. I mailed the card to my daughter and told her to buy something for her husband's birthday.

I guess that when you shop, it's "Let the buyer beware" instead of "The customer is always right" or "Satisfaction guaranteed or your money refunded."

Roby McHone

Fairbanks

UAF athletics

Aug. 6, 2007

To the editor:

Several of the recent letters to the editor concerning the UAF athletics director Forrest Karr are missing the point.

I've been in Fairbanks for 27 years and, as a booster and former employee of the university, I've dealt with all of the athletics directors over the years. Some were good, some were great and a few were not so hot. Forrest is one of the best. I retired in 2006 and am currently a volunteer in the Athletics Department. I can tell you that the morale within the department is the best I've ever seen. There is a positive attitude, and the department seems to be moving in the same direction instead of each sport doing its own thing.

Regardless of what you may think about his decision concerning the two players who want to renege on their letters of intent, the athletics director has an obligation to do what he thinks is in the best interest of the university.

FBI - Stevens-1843

Although the public and media can state anything they want about the situation, the athletics director and others within the university are severely restricted by federal law in what they can disclose about any student or employee. So, what you have read in the paper is only half the story, and you are not going to hear the other half, because the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act won't allow the university to discuss specific details about these students and their situation.

College isn't just about playing sports and going to classes. It's the whole experience. And, part of that experience is learning that when you commit to something you have to follow through or suffer the consequences. The letter of intent process is just one commitment. When these and other college students sign up for classes, move into the dorm, accept financial aid, park on campus, etc., they become responsible for following through on commitments. If they do not there are consequences.

These young men were aware that a change in coaching staff was not grounds for not following through with their commitment. The National Letter of Intent is not a complicated, lengthy legal document. It is a one page contract that outlines in plain language the benefits and responsibilities of committing to attend and play for a college or university.

Let these individuals start learning what it means to sign a legal document. It's the first of many things they will learn in college, whichever one it is that they choose to attend.

Tim Bauer

Fairbanks

Give it back

Aug. 16, 2007

To the editor:

I would like to ask the person who stole my wallet to please return it. It was taken from my shopping cart at Sam's Club Wednesday evening. I had several pictures, small tokens from my husband, and bible verses from friends and family that mean a great deal to me. They cannot be replaced.

The wallet was black with pink lips (one of a kind), and only had $20 in it. All the cards have been cancelled, so it's of no use to you!

I am still in shock that this happened. My husband and I only had our backs turned for a second. I never thought this could happen to me, and certainly not in Fairbanks. What is happening to our town?

Please, if you can find it in your heart to return my precious belongings, I will be forever grateful.

Karla Mangum

Fairbanks

FBI - Stevens-1844

Roundabout 101 class

Aug. 17, 2007

To the editor:

Regarding Mary Fenno's letter regarding Roundabout 101, I would gladly teach a class! Topics to be covered would include "Why Signaling A Left Turn Is Just Plain Dumb," "The Evils of Stopping," "Is Right-Of-Way The Same As Wrong-Of-Way?" and "Can You Chew Gum And Use A Roundabout At The Same Time? The class final will be multiple choice, er, actually, it will consist of only two multiple-choice questions: 1) Will you use the roundabout correctly so that others will not become abusive to you? 2) If I poke you repeatedly with my cattle prod, will you stop being an idiot about using the roundabout?

The only right answers should be obvious even to the most roudabout-challenged individuals.

Bob Hammond

Fairbanks

This article may be accessed online at http://newsminer.com/2007/08/19/8469.
This article is copyrighted property of the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner. Unauthorized reproduction of this article other than for personal use is strictly prohibited. To obtain permission for republication in any form, please contact the News-Miner. Visit http://newsminer.com/contact/ for more information.

FBI - Stevens-1845

Alaska Report
"News and Information Since 1999"

WaMu Earn up to 5.50% APY With the W Giving you an i LEARN MORE

Alaska Photo Gallery
Pictures of the aurora, bears, birds, and more.

Alaska fishermen scream at Ted Stevens in Kodiak

August 19, 2007

Kodiak, Alaska - Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens and Hawaii Sen. Daniel Inouye were greeted by an angry group of around 30 commercial fishermen protesting crab rationalization and Stevens' involvement in federal fisheries issues at a luncheon sponsored by the Kodiak Chamber of Commerce.

Stevens, under multiple criminal investigations for corruption, kept his head low and walked briskly into the Kodiak Inn Hotel after arriving about 10 minutes late.

The protesters shouted "Racketeer go home!" "Give it back" and "FBI" among others.

Casey Kelly at Kodiak's local radio station KMXT interviewed some of the protesters. (Listen Here).

The mayor of Kodiak Carolyn Floyd, Al Burch, Julie Bonney, were among 45 people that attended the lunchtime gathering.

© By Dennis Zaki - AlaskaReport News

FBI - Stevens-1846

194A-AN-13620-m; 733

Ads by Google

Summer Jobs in Alaska!
Alaska Fishing Jobs Clearinghouse "Where Crews and Skippers Click!"
www.FishingJobs.com

Aleutian Ballad Excursion
Bering Sea Crab Fishermen's Tour departing from Ketchikan, Alaska. www.56degreesnorth.com

Alaska Jobs
Search Jobs & Find Your Next Career Here. Register Free & Start Today! www.Job.com

Alaska Fishing Jobs
Great adventure. Great pay. Male or Female. No exp. necessary.
www.AlaskaJobFinder.cor

FBI - Stevens-1847

Alaska fishermen shout at Ted Stevens in Kodiak, Alaska

FBI - Stevens-1848

We should be able to grasp ethics without straining so much

Story tools
E-mail a friend
Print
Digg this
Seed Newsvine
Send link via AIM
Font size : A | A | A

Wow, it's hard for me to swallow the lack of understanding with regard to the current ethics investigations, especially after reading the Aug. 11 letters. Let me try to explain.

"We've robbed Sen. Murkowski of a home on the Kenai."

Umm ... no, she paid for prime real estate approximately what I might pay for a site-condo in Anchorage. There is no way that I, as an average citizen, would get a deal like that. She is a senator and should understand that everything she does while in office should be for the people she represents, not her own gain.

"I have been following the witch hunt. ..."

"Most people I know would take a good deal. ..."

Guess what? These people are not "most people." They represent the state of Alaska and all of its people. I'm sure they can afford plenty without being offered "a good deal" on land, renovations, and seafood feeds.

Sadly, these points seem to escape some of us.

---- Craig Hewitt

Anchorage

FBI - Stevens-1849

194A-AN-13620-M;732

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Alaska Newsreader

Today's news for the Last Frontier

By Terry Carr

(Published: August 20, 2007)

News for Monday, Aug. 20

Sen. Stevens and Sen. Daniel Inouye, Hawaii. (AP photo) ( )

Stevens plays to mixed reviews. Sen. Ted Stevens, who has been getting rough press and rough receptions while he's in Alaska during the current congressional recess, was targeted by a noisy crowd of critics during a Kodiak visit, according to reports from KMXT radio and the Alaska Report. But while the reception from the protesters on the street was hostile, those inside the Kodiak Inn Hotel were in a much more receptive mood and paid $10 a head to hear a lunchtime speech from the senator, according to the reports.

Stevens was accompanied in Kodiak by friend and fellow senator Daniel Inouye, who has defended Stevens in the face of a federal investigation. Both major Honolulu newspapers addressed their relationship over the weekend

The Honolulu Advertiser, under a headline "Senate buddies Inouye, Stevens staying tight through corruption probe," in a lengthy story on Sunday quoted Inouye as saying that Stevens told him he has done nothing wrong. "That's what he assures me. ...So far, the senators on both sides have been publicly very cordial and friendly. I don't see any change. They don't shy away like he was a leper."

The Star Bulletin, meanwhile, in a shorter opinion piece, noted in its headline that "Inouye-Stevens amity transcends FBI probe." The commentary also points out that former Veco executive Bill Allen gave Inouye's campaign $2,000 and other Veco employees chipped in $9,000.

And in yet another of the commentaries on Stevens that Outside newspapers have given space to, a Seattle Times story from Washington, D.C., on Sunday noted that "the potential demise" of Stevens has provoked mixed emotions in the nation's capital and "nearly complete silence" from Democrats. "Though he has vehemently fought Democrats on a wide range of energy and environmental issues, the Alaska Republican has long-standing personal and professional relationships with many in the opposing party," the story says.

FBI - Stevens-1850

***

Mat Maid not milked out yet. A story in the Mat-Su Valley Frontiersman details some of the changes that have been made at the struggling Matanuska Maid Dairy under a new board and suggests things are looking up.

The story quotes Kristin Cole, a member of the state Board of Agriculture and Conservation, saying, "There is no reason for imminent shutdown, and all of us are encouraged by what we're seeing (financially). ... Our primary focus is to keep Mat Maid in Alaska."

194A-AN-13620-m;734

***

Celebrity crabbers. The Cape Gazette in Delaware reports that fans mobbed the captains and crewmen who have starred in Discovery Channel's "Deadliest Catch" during a casino appearance. The men were from the Time Bandit, the Sea Star and the Cornelia Marie, boats that chase crab in the Bering Sea.

The fans, for the most part, were seeking autographs. "People just love these guys," a spokesperson said. "And it crosses all ages and genders. They are treated like rock stars."

***

Su Valley back in the educating business. Su Valley Junior/Senior High School, destroyed by fire in June, will be back in business today when the students return for the new school year, stories from Mat-Su Valley Frontiersman and KTUU say. School facilities have been moved across the Glenn Highway, and portable classrooms will host classes. The Upper Susitna Senior and Community Center hall will serve as the cafeteria.

"If we have a good attitude about it, the kids will have a good attitude about it," veteran social studies teacher Dave Stull told the newspaper.

***

Critics rip plans for hazardous waste facility. KTVA has a story saying that public reaction is running against a hazardous waste facility near downtown Anchorage. The Hawaii company that would build the facility says its proposed site at First Avenue and Ingra Street is in an industrial zone, but critics say it's too close to the Brother Francis Shelter and to Fairview, which are among the places at risk.

"If they tried to put this in the middle of a middle-class neighborhood with the same number of residents, people would be up in arms," said Rep. Les Gara, D-Anchorage.

***

"Mayor Begich has a vindictive streak." So says an angry opinion piece authored by Frank Dahl that ran over the weekend at the Voice of the Times web site (scroll down a bit to get to it). Dahl claims the Assembly and the mayor are showing anti-business sentiments and suggests the mayor is driven by the city's hospitality businesses' refusal to back him in the last election.

***

All aboard. KIMO has a story about plans for Alaska Railroad whistle-stop service in the Chugach National Forest. The train will ultimately make five stops in the forest in areas otherwise difficult to reach.

FBI - Stevens-1851

Alaska Railroad Chairman John Binkley told the television station: "We'll have a schedule laid out of how we're going to advance, when the next whistle stop will come on line, what the trail systems will be, and if there's the funding available to do that. Then we'll proceed right down that line and up, up this national forest for Alaskans."

***

More flood tales. The stories from those who were there for the 1967 Fairbanks flood, which has been described as a turning point in the city's history, keep on coming. Dermot Cole's column in the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner has a new list of tales. The newspaper put out a call for stories and the responses have flowed in.

***

Memorial to divers. A short item in the Seattle Post-Intelligencer takes note of a memorial that has been created to two Coast Guard divers who died while diving last year north of Barrow. The memorial is at a Coast Guard facility in Seattle. A report highly critical of events leading up to the deaths was ultimately issued.

***

Alaska-Russia links in WWII. A new book by the son of a Russian army officer looks back at the Alaska-Siberia Lend-Lease Program of World War II, according to a story in the Juneau Empire. The writer, Boris Dolitsky, has lived in Alaska since 1985 and has been researching the subject that, he says, doesn't get much attention in history books these days.

"If you take the U.S. textbooks today, and I took 11 of those, there are only two or three paragraphs in each book dedicated to the lend-lease," Dolitsky told the paper. "And nothing about the Alaska-Siberia airway. But we have to keep in mind that lend-lease was the largest project of the 20th century: $50 billion that in today's money is about $800 billion."

***

Grub in a bag. Soldiers at Fort Greeley were given the mission in 2005 of testing eight new versions of the Army's Meals Ready to Eat, which were under development at the time. Now the new meals are about to be deployed, and The Smoking Gun web site has the blunt reviews from the Greeley troops. Some examples:

> The chicken and dumplings triggered "a flatulence symphony in my tent all night."
> Of the stuffed cabbage, "The meal sucked! Do you even try this crap before you give it to us?"
> On the same meal: "Don't ever give the stuffed cabbage to a soldier again; even POWs deserve better."
> "Good idea with flavored bread now if it were softer."
> "Maybe change the name 'chicken loaf' scares me."
> And at least one favorable notice: "The vanilla pudding is so good that I ripped it open. Licked the inside and rolled around on top of it like a dog."

FBI - Stevens-1852

Print Page Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Alaska Newsreader

Today's news for the Last Frontier

By Terry Carr

(Published: August 17, 2007)

()

News for Friday, Aug. 17

Here's your money back. A South Florida planning board voted today to send back to Congress a $10 million earmark for an Interstate 75 interchange that would benefit a Florida developer who is also a major contributor to Alaska Rep. Don Young. The board meeting is going on now and is being blogged here by the Naples Daily News.

The Lee County Regional Planning Council is urging that the money be used for a different project. Allegations have arisen that the measure appropriating the money was changed after it was approved by Congress to steer the money to the interchange.

Church investigation. The Kodiak Daily Mirror says in a story today that the primate of the Orthodox Church in America has undertaken an investigation into allegations of misconduct within the church's Alaska Diocese. The investigation is centering on the Kodiak clergy, the seminary there and the bishop who oversees it, according to the story.

A confidential letter written by the primate and quoted at length in the story notes that at least part of the allegations apparently involve sexual misconduct.

Bishop Nikolai, who heads the Alaska Diocese, has been asked to step aside during the investigation, the story says.

***

Down for the season. The state ferry Columbia, flagship of the of the Alaska Marine Highway fleet, will be out of service for the rest of the season, according to a story in today's Juneau Empire. The vessel threw a piston rod in one of its engines and has been sent to Ketchikan for repairs.

Rep. Beth Kerttula, D-Juneau, is quoted in the story as saying that the loss of the Columbia emphasizes the need for investing in newer ships. "We need more funding to keep ships up and running," she said. "The Marine Highway System is our highway, and all highways need to be subsidized."

FBI - Stevens-1853

***

Go with the flow. With the Columbia sidelined, a Ketchikan Daily News editorial notes that travel plans for some in the community have probably been disrupted. The writer's solution to any irritation that might arise:

194A-AN-13620-M,735

"Let's keep smiling and empathizing and doing whatever we can to make our unwillingly overstaying guests as comfortable as possible, realizing that it's difficult to be tired and ready to go home with no immediate way to get there."

***

On Stevens' trail. A New York Times story reports on some of Ted Stevens' activities in Alaska during the present congressional recess. The story says "fears of the unknown have been stirring in the outsize soul of the Last Frontier" as news of federal authorities' interest in the senator and his son, Ben Stevens, has surfaced.

The story notes that Ted Stevens has apparently not been seen at his home in Girdwood, which was searched by federal agents in July. The story ends this way:

"Mr. Stevens has told friends that he was given notice that investigators were going to conduct a search and that he offered them a key. They declined and found their own way inside. On a recent afternoon, a white van from Action Locksmith was parked outside the house in a light rain. The man driving the van said he had come to change the locks on the house."

***

And another view. The Los Angeles Times also weighs in today with a hefty piece – 1,500 words headlined "In Alaska, scandal flows like crude" – that starts with Bill Allen and Veco and goes from there to the "scandals – some overlapping, some stand-alone – (that) have shaken the state's small political world to its core."

***

A passion for hammers. A Haines man has turned his interest in tools and history into a museum that may boast the world's premier collection of hammers, according to a story in the Juneau Empire. Dave Pahl has about 1,700 hammers but likes to think of himself as "collecting history."

"Visitors to Haines can find his building easily enough: Just look for the gigantic hammer in the yard," the story says.

***

Pricey business climate. A cost-of-doing-business index, developed by the Milken Institute and posted on its web site, lists Alaska as one of the three most expensive states for doing business. Hawaii and New York are the other two. The three were at the top in the last survey too, according to the institute.

FBI - Stevens-1854

***

Aiming to float a maritime museum. A story in the Peninsula Clarion takes note of the efforts of a Homer man to create a museum that would tell the story of Alaska's rich maritime history. Michael Neece envisions a place that would look back some 800 years.

"I haven't accumulated anything yet, but so many people have been offering things, including things like ship logs from the 1780s, plenty of vessels and other artifacts. But I can't accept anything until I have a physical location to store them and a curator," Neece said.

***

Beluga issue boils. Comments keep pouring in on the proposal to list Cook Inlet belugas as endangered under the Endangered Species Act, even though the deadline has passed for comments, a Homer Tribune story says. Gov. Sarah Palin has made known her administration's opposition to the listing.

But federal officials insist their numbers show belugas are not increasing, according to the story, and critics take issue with the governor's stand. "The governor and her staff are ignoring the facts and the science of this issue," the story quotes Cook Inletkeeper executive director Bob Shavelson saying. "They're politically motivated to support extractive industries."

***

One view of ANWR issue. Treasure America web site has produced and put up a video, "Drawing the Line," with some nice footage of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. The point of the video, however, is political, not aesthetic. The video and accompanying information argue that maintaining the refuge in its "pristine state is a better economic move than opening it to the minor, short-term gains of oil exploration."

***

Return of a fallen soldier. Daniel Reyes, a 24-year-old Fort Richardson soldier who died in Iraq, was taken home to San Jose, Calif. And a story at InsideBayArea.com tells the story of him being next to his younger brother, Roberto Esparza, who aspired to also join the Army but died when his bike was hit by a car.

Reyes was one of two Fort Rich paratroopers killed during an attack early this month. He was in Iraq when his brother was killed but returned home for that funeral, according to the story.

***

And on the other side of the country ... A Washington Post story tells of the reaction of family members and friends to the death of Chief Warrant Officer Jackie McFarlane, one of five Fort Wainwright soldiers who died in a helicopter crash in Iraq this week.

McFarlane, who grew up in Norfolk, Va., was a member of the Victory Christian Faith Center church in Fairbanks, the story says. "Jackie's priorities were God, his wife, his children and the Army," a friend and church member is quoted as saying.

***

Spell it right, please. A letter to the editor of the Juneau Empire, "Put the apostrophe in the right place," urges that those involved with a waterfront attraction in the city consult a dictionary:

"I was just down on South Franklin Street admiring the Peoples' Wharf (their punctuation, not mine). The city of Juneau will obviously be providing Diamonds International, The Fur Factory and Venetian Jewelers with tremendous economic opportunities every tourist season. Therefore, I do not mind burdening these businesses with one simple request: Please move that apostrophe to the correct place (People's)."

FBI - Stevens-1855

Print Page Close Window

Copyright © 2007 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1856

The Next Hurrah

« Shorter Karen Hewitt: Foggo and Wilkes Are BFFs | Main | Dear George: Fire Wolfie, or Else »

May 07, 2007

Ben Stevens ~~Not~~ Is Named in VECO Charging Document

by emptywheel

Correction: Edward Teller is right. Stevens is named--he's has to be Senator B, since he was appointed mid-term. And for a whole bunch of other reasons.

Though I disagree with Teller as to why Stevens wasn't indicted. As I said, if you're giving two old men plea agreements, you're going after someone else. Stevens is likely that someone else.

Someone check my math, preferably Steve, who gave such a superb primer on Alaska politics last week. The CEO, Bill Allen, and VP, Rick Smith, of VECO pled guilty today to charges of bribery and conspiracy. This is the case that has already won three state representatives indictments last week. There remains the outstanding question of whether Ted Stevens' son, Ben, would be indicted too. The charging document for Allen describes two unknown Alaska state Senators (it also lists the House Representatives who were indicted last week) involved in this conspiracy this way:

> "State Senator A" is an elected member of the Alaska State Senate. State Senator A was first elected to the Alaska State Senate in 2000.
>
> "State Senator B" was, from 2001 to 2006, a member of the Alaska State Senate.

~~Ben Stevens is serving as President of the Senate. But he wasn't elected until 2002. So he's neither A (elected too late) nor B (still serving). So he is not yet in the immediate scope of this investigation.~~

As to the question of the intent to prosecute this seriously, the plea deals VECO executives Allen and Rick Smith got strongly suggest this thing is not done. Why make plea deals with two elderly men unless you intend to use their cooperation to make a further case?

FBI - Stevens-1857

194A-AN-13620-M; 736

May 07, 2007 at 18:19 in Bush/Republican Scandals, Contributor--emptywheel | Permalink

TrackBack

TrackBack URL for this entry:
http://www.typepad.com/t/trackback/305209/18302044

Listed below are links to weblogs that reference Ben Stevens ~~Not~~ Is Named in VECO Charging Document:

Comments

Now if VECO is worth billions as Allen says to the judge - should not some of that be due as "reparations" as probably some of that value was created through the use of bribery and conspiracy to break the law.

Posted by: ab initio | May 07, 2007 at 18:36

Ben Stevens is Senator B. He's not in the Alaska senate any longer. Please see http://www.adn.com/static/includes/alaskapolitics/indictment page seven. Only one Alaska senator completely fits the description. He hasn't been indicted yet because Alice Fisher chooses to hold Ben's dad and Lisa Murkowski hostages to her scheme to take over Gonzo's job.

Posted by: Ed*ard Teller | May 07, 2007 at 18:50

Oh, I almost forgot. Ben was elected in 2002, but had been appointed to the Alaska Senate in 2001.

Posted by: Ed*ard Teller | May 07, 2007 at 18:56

Right you are, Edward, thanks. Though as I said, I think it'll be hard to have gotten plea deals from these guys, based on their cooperation, and not actually get their cooperation to get someone else. And that someone else is almost certainly Stevens.

Posted by: emptywheel | May 07, 2007 at 18:59

Thanks. BTW, EW, I figured out who Steve is - he rocks!

Posted by: Ed*ard Teller | May 07, 2007 at 19:15

Another Alaskan chiming in... we are all sure Stevens is Senator B. We suspect Cowdry is Senator A... what we want to know is who the "unnamed elected official" is for whom Senator A was soliciting funds and who with Senator A met with Allen on June 25, 2006 in an Anchorage restaurant to discuss these misappropriations...

FBI - Stevens-1858

Some are even hinting at the former Gov... I know he was in Iraq the week prior and was expected back in his office Monday, June 26th. But if he connected through Anchorage, he could have been there on Sunday the 25th. Rumors, rumors... It would make sense then that he didn't follow up on the election money (as stated in the indictment) since he lost the primary (unexpected, on his part). More grist for the rumor mill!

Posted by: Patrick McGonegal | May 07, 2007 at 19:58

So I will keep asking this, you Alaskans, until you invite me up for salmon (and I'm hoping it'll be soon, if you know what I mean--today was the first day of $35/pound salmon at my fishmonger, which I can't afford).

Is it your sense this is real? Stevens, and possibly others? With the VECO pleas, is this going to happen for real? Or are you voting with Edward Teller (and against my salmon dinner) that this is currently an open threat?

BC I have reason to suspect they misjudged Cohen, or Buchanan isn't as corrupt as she's been made out to be, and that he will chase public corruption as diligently as anyone.

And if we're talking the former governor AND Stevens' son, I guess we'd have an easy explanation for why a sane WH would ignore both the Senators' suggestions.

Posted by: emptywheel | May 07, 2007 at 20:58

Marcy,

I'll make you a similar deal to the one I made Howie Klein and egregious: You get yourself as far as Anchorage, and I'll spring for the salmon fishing trip. In the old days, before the long-legged 747s, it was routine to put down in Anchorage to refuel on the way from Chicago to the Orient. Not so much anymore, but next time you have to do business in Asia, see about alternative routes. I'll even try to arrange for you to meet Diane Benson and some of the southcentral Alaskan progressives who love your work so much.

Posted by: Ed*ard Teller | May 07, 2007 at 21:27

FBI - Stevens-1859

Hmmm. I've got a whole bunch of miles to dump. Is mr. emptywheel invited too? He's never been.

I was in Anchorage in 1994 doing business with big oil (gulp, yup, even talked to Alyeska). And in Denali in 1991 on a "business trip" with Sierra Club. But I missed salmon season both times.

And yes, I've never gotten the stop in Alaska. Straight to Tokyo from Detroit, unless there's a typhoon in Tokyo.

Posted by: emptywheel | May 07, 2007 at 21:37

looks like outsourcing, to me... but since i love Ed*ard almost as much as Marcy, I guess I'll share of course this is only because I trust you both to SHARE with TNH.

no, not the salmon, eat hearty... but all the cynicism and speculation that requires no refrigeration

Posted by: njr | May 07, 2007 at 22:29

so all of this really is about fishing ???

you're one hell of a fisherwoman EW be careful though. In Alaska, humans are in the middle of the food chain at times

Posted by: freepatriot | May 07, 2007 at 22:35

I can't offer any fishing trips or connections to Alaskan progressives of note but I will pick you and Mr. EW up at the airport and drive you wherever you need to go.

How about a nice hike on the coastal trail and some salmon on the grill? There are some decent Alaskan beers to try too.

Bill Allen may be older but he has a nefarious and uncooperative history. The feds must have a big stick to get his cooperation. Allen is saving his company.

FBI - Stevens-1860

Posted by: Outahere | May 07, 2007 at 22:38

outahere

Just so long as I don't have to hike on tundra again. That's not very much fun, even if the views are terrific.

Posted by: emptywheel | May 07, 2007 at 23:19

Marcy,

Mr. EW too! Ms. ET, ETette, ET, Jr. and Strider will all welcome your family. niklake at mtaonline dot net.

Posted by: Ed*ard Teller | May 08, 2007 at 01:20

Of course the allure of free fishing trips in Alaska has brought many a politician and DC bureaucrat on fact finding missions in the summer. And they always seem to find some time in their normally busy schedules to do a little fishing. I guess bloggers aren't immune to such temptations either. Alaskans tend to have a lot more respect for those folks who do their work up here in January and February. And, yes, you can still fly from NY through Anchorage to Taipei on China Airlines. Korean Airlines does NY-Anchorage-Seoul in the summers. It's a long trip, so a couple of days in Anchorage is a good break.

Anyway, yes, Ben seems to be Senator B. And I've also heard, like Patrick, that John Cowdery is likely Senator A.

If anyone's interested in more background, the ADN did a good article on Ben Stevens and the fish deal almost two years ago. Here's the opening couple of paragraphs and the url is at the end.

Ben Stevens' secret fish deal
State senator helped steer Adak pollock to a company he had financial stake in
By RICHARD MAUER
Anchorage Daily News
Published: September 18, 2005
Last Modified: September 18, 2005 at 07:37 AM
State Sen. Ben Stevens held a secret option to buy into an Alaska seafood company at the same time his powerful father, U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, was creating a special Aleutian Islands fishery that would supply the company with pollock worth millions of dollars a year.

The pollock allocation alone was projected to provide the company with $1.5 million in profits this year and $3.7 million in 2006, the company's founder said in an affidavit in March, before problems involving the company and the availability of fish cast doubt on those numbers. Under his deal, Ben Stevens would have been entitled to one-fourth of the profits of the company, Adak Fisheries.

FBI - Stevens-1861

During the time he held the option, the company grew in value from about $2 million to at least $8.5 million, according to an owner and court documents.
The rest is at: www.adn.com/front/story/6984518p-6885437c.html

But while we're focused on the villians here, I'd like to point out some good guys who have stood up to these guys. Rich Mauer, who wrote this original Ben and Fish article and has had his finger in most of the recent articles, is a great reporter for the ADN.

Also, former Republican state legislator, and founder of the Moderate Republican Party, Ray Metcalf, has been a relentless thorn in Ben Stevens side. He's the one who brought the complaint against Stevens before the Alaska Public Offices Commission, claiming that Stevens had gotten all this money from Veco for consulting, but didn't say what he did for that money. Precisely the issues on the front page today. He was a lone voice in the wilderness for a long time. One of his complaint letters to the APOC is at: http://www.repmod.info/OpenLtr2Marquez-Metcalfe-3-25-06.pdf

Another legislator who spoke truth to the corrupt was Minority Leader Ethan Berkowitz. On this audio clip you first hear Weyhrauch, one of this week's indictees.
http://www.jamglue.com/tracks/102458
Before this audio clip (originally from Gavel to Gavel, the state live coverage of the legislature, this clip was posted on the ADN site Saturday, May 5, 2007), Weyhrauch had introduced an amendment that passed. The Veco lobbyists were ticked off. There was a short recess. The tape begins with Weyhrauch apologizing, he'd made a mistake and would like to rescind the amendment. Then Berkowitz, working hard to keep his voice calm, reminds W. that the oil belongs to the people of the state of Alaska, not the companies. That legislators are not supposed to be jumping from the House floor to do the lobbyists' bidding, etc. Weyhrauch takes great offense. Berkowitz goes on. Just in case the clip doesn't work above, you can go to this url:

There are lots of other heroes in this story. Those who didn't give up just because the Republicans and the oil companies seemed insurmountable, who just kept on doing their jobs well. Perhaps the other Alaskans on here can point them out, and the rest of you can identify the good guy Feds.

FBI - Stevens-1862

[I tried to post this a couple of times with some links, but it got blocked as suspected span. I've taken the html out and am trying it again.]

Posted by: Steve | May 08, 2007 at 05:08

Marcy,

Make sure that is wild salmon that you are paying $35/pound for!

Farm-raised salmon should cost no more than chicken due to the way it is raised. (Look at the wholesale price.) This is one of the biggest rip-offs in the restaurant biz because diners assume that someone went hand-to-hand with a grizzly to get that salmon and they'll pay a premium.

OTOH, nothing is better than fish you've caught yourself, even if it is a fairly tame and ordinary trout. :)=

Posted by: hauksdottir | May 08, 2007 at 05:14

Apparently Bill Allen is no longer the owner of Veco. He was titled 'owner' as of Monday morning but by last night a special BOD was at the helm. (As a friend said, "He'll be getting paid under the table rather than doing the paying at that table!")

No tundra walks - check. Actually the coastal trail is the local, paved 'Tony Knowles Coastal Trail' easily enjoyed. You never know who you might see on a sunny day - - it is a small town.

Posted by: Outahere | May 08, 2007 at 09:57

Man, I'm going to screw up Alaska news more often--it does wonders for my vacations schedule!

Posted by: emptywheel | May 08, 2007 at 11:13

Regarding the response to my last comment which asked if Alaskans believe this is "real" as in, will these people really be prosecuted. Short answer, definitive "YES". The question remains is who will be charged? Two have pled (I detest the word "pleaded"--we don't use "leaded" so why "pleaded"?) guilty, three more have been indicted and at least five more are implicated (two senators, one "elected official" and two more VECO folks). I think they have been

FBI - Stevens-1863

Stevens dead to rights and are probably working on him to roll (my bet is they want him to roll on the "elected official"). I am hoping that both Senator A and Senator B-en Stevens are plea bargaining to roll on this third party, because that would mean that the as yet unnamed "elected official" is someone of even greater import... that would be one of only four people in this State (a US Senator--we have two--our Representative, or, as many suspect, our former Governor). It is a lot of speculation at this point, but it seems with the information already released that the two senators are pan-fried. Face it, it appears that the DOJ has recordings of these conversations (why else would there be such phrases as "unintelligible" included in the transcripts? So the only explanation is that there is some negotiation going on in the background to nail an as yet unnamed participant.

I think it is going to be exciting here. Even if it only reaches as high as the two senators, we have a real scandal. If it goes higher, I think we will have some serious national headlines...

Posted by: Patrick McGonegal | May 08, 2007 at 13:15

Oh, and just to round out the Alaskan offers... I live in Southeast Alaska (Juneau) with my wife and two young boys and we would not only meet you at the plane, but would even offer you a room (for two, bring Mr. Emptywheel along!). We have great salmon fishing (as does most of Alaska) but we also have world-renowned whale watching (not to mention a "walk up" glacier).

I can't promise you'll meet with the afore-mentioned "progressives" (questionable), but you'll meet plenty of locals and we all have political opinions to share. :)

Hiking, salmon-fishing, whale watching, mountain tram, glacier viewing (and touching!)... what could be better? And free lodging to boot! :)

Serious. If you're up this way, my family would be happy to welcome you to our home. Wanna see what we enjoy on a daily basis, just check out the photo database on my website (http://www.didjuneau.com/images.php) and check out the various categories in the left column. :)

So, add another invitation to the list!

Posted by: Patrick McGonegal | May 08, 2007 at 14:28

FBI - Stevens-1864

Post a comment

If you have a TypeKey or TypePad account, please Sign In

Name:

Email Address: (Not displayed with comment.)

URL:

☐ Remember personal info?

Comments:

Preview Post

RECENT POSTS

TALON, Guardian, Insert Your Name of the Week

Stephen Hayes Tells the Truthiness: CIA Trip Report

They Can't Legislate $hit

The deadline that wasn't a deadline

Wilkes Will Get an Enemy Combatant Lawyer for His Extraordinary Rendition-Related Trial

What Stephen Hayes Doesn't Want You to Know about Cheney's Involvment in Outing Valerie Wilson

Details on Cheney's FISA Documents

Bush To America's Children: Drop Dead

Schloz Shortened

Documents from Dick, not Bush?!?!?

CONTRIBUTORS

DHinMI

DemFromCT

Emptypockets

Emptywheel

JamesB3

Kagro X

Meteor Blades

Mimikatz

Plutonium Page

RonK, Seattle

Trapper John

CATEGORIES

FBI - Stevens-1865

Contributor--Mimikatz
Contributor--Plutonium Page
Contributor--RonK, Seattle
Contributor--Trapper John Culture
Democrats
Domestic Policy
Economics
Elections--2005
Elections--2006
Elections--Historical Energy Policy
Environment
Foreign Policy
Free For All
Health Policy
Ideas and Ideology
Labor
Law
Misc
Nuclear Option
Open Threads
Polls
Press and Media
Public Policy Process
Republicans
Science Society
State and Local Government Terrorism
War
ARCHIVES

FBI - Stevens-1866

December 2006
November 2006
Email Me
Subscribe to this blog's feed
Add me to your TypePad People list
WHERE WE MET
Daily Kos
LINKS

FBI - Stevens-1867

War and Piece (Laura Rozen)
Working Life (Jonathan Tasini)
Powered by TypePad

FBI - Stevens-1868

NEWS BY EMAIL
• Breaking News • Outdoors
• Fishing • PM Briefing
• Obituaries • & More
SIGN UP HERE

Anchorage Daily News: Alaska's Newspaper

Search Archives »

home alaska life money entertainment outdoors sports classified alaska.com archives help

news entertainment
life money
obituaries
opinion outdoors
sports weather shopping jobs cars homes rentals
deals ads from print alaska.com
rss feeds
adn store
adnmail
crossword puzzle archives
help

Here's what happened

Posted: July 6, 2007 - 6:05 pm

You've had questions about the Bobrick/Begich/Knowles post that appeared, then was removed, earlier this week.

Chief state & local news editor David Hulen explains:

There's been some discussion here about a story we posted Tuesday afternoon on adn.com and on the Alaska Politics blog about the Tom Anderson trial. We removed the story, without explanation, from both places later that afternoon, and it didn't appear in the next day's print newspaper (a different story about Tuesday's events in court did run).

Here's what happened (and at the end, links to audio clips of the testimony that resulted in the story):

Our reporter covering the trial, Lisa Demer, has been writing long stories each day that we've publishing in the paper and the Web site. Most days, she also has written short updates for adn.com during lunch breaks. Lisa's a veteran reporter and one of the most careful and consistently accurate journalists I know.

On Tuesday, she called in a brief story based on testimony from that morning. It had come during fairly aggressive cross-examination of a key government witness, former lobbyist Bill Bobrick, by Anderson's attorney, Paul Stockler.

Jurors were shown a partial transcript of a July 24, 2004, conversation between Bobrick and another government witness, Frank Prewitt. In it, Bobrick boasted about trying to raise $45,000 to $50,000 in campaign contributions for former Gov. Tony Knowles during his race that year for the U.S. Senate.

"We're going to move heaven and earth to try to get Tony Knowles elected," Bobrick told Prewitt. Bobrick mentioned Mayor Mark Begich as being part of an effort to raise money for Knowles, although it was not explicit what Begich's role would have been.

Bobrick testified he never pursued the idea.

Stockler pressed Bobrick on the fund-raising, and seemed to be trying to make the point that Bobrick had been caught by investigators in an illegal scheme, and that part of his motivation in cooperating with the authorities was the hope of leniency.

The lawyers in the case weren't available to explain further during the lunch break. They have generally been reluctant to talk to the press because the judge has instructed them to be careful about what they say to reporters. We did not have access to the transcript

Alaska Politics

State, local and beyond

Alaska has a new governor, a new legislature and a powerful congressional delegation. Come here for the latest news and tidbits from the transition, from Juneau and elsewhere by Daily News political reporters. We want to hear from you, too. So sound off and interact with other readers and the reporters in the "comments" section.

Kyle Hopkins covered the 2006 campaign for governor and is covering the Palin administration's transition. Before joining the Daily News in 2005, he was a writer for the Anchorage Press and the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner. E-mail him at khopkins@adn.com.

The Trail 2006 campaign blog

Sabra Ayres covers Alaska state politics and the legislature from our capitol bureau in Juneau. Before joining the Daily News in December 2006, Sabra covered the former Soviet Union as a Moscow correspondent for the Cox Newspapers. Email her at sayres@adn.com.

ARCHIVE

Jury finds Anderson guilty - 7/9/2007 1:42 pm

Here's what happened - 7/6/2007 6:05 pm

Thanks! - 7/6/2007 5:26 pm

Going, going...not yet gone - 7/6/2007 4:28 pm

Now accepting applications -

Ads by Google

Alaska MLS Listing $299
Why Pay 6% ? Direct Access to Alaska MLS.
www.congressrealty.com

Anchorage Alaska Houses
Anchorage Relocation Package Anchorage Homes For Sale!
www.Homes-For-Sale-Re

Alaska Divorces
Follow State law & get a divorce. 3 easy steps! Fast, Easy & Cheap.
LegalZoom.com

Alaska Personal Injury
The Law Offices Of Steve Sims Over 25 Years of Experience
www.alaskaaccidentlaw.c

FBI - Stevens-1869

194A-AN-13620-M; 737

being referred to (at this point, none of the exhibits in the case have been made public - a situation we're trying to change).

Lisa wrote a story based on the testimony, an editor reviewed it, and we published it online. It began, "Bill Bobrick, a former lobbyist in Anchorage and a government witness in the corruption trial of former state Rep. Tom Anderson, today testified about a 2004 conversation in which he discussed an idea to funnel large amounts of apparently illegal campaign money to benefit former Gov. Tony Knowles, then running for U.S. Senate." The story went on to say that Bobrick told Prewitt that the effort would have involved Begich.

Later that afternoon, a law enforcement agent told Demer that Stockler was cross-examining Bobrick about two separate fund-raising ideas: an illegal scheme never executed and a plan to help Knowles legitimately with the help of Begich and others.

Late in the afternoon, Lisa and Bill White, one of the local news editors who had been working with her on the story, decided to pull the story off adn.com, and later the blog, because they had questions about its accuracy. What was actually said in court was confusing. Bobrick's scheme was not clearly laid out, and there was no quick way to follow up, expand on or investigate what was said. By that point of the day, other editors here were raising questions about whether the story was fair or whether there was enough context for the story to make sense. Demer, meanwhile, was focused on the story for the next day's newspaper (a factor in why we chose to remove the afternoon Web story completely rather than take the time to rework it). So we pulled the story and moved on to the next day's story.

7/3/2007 11:42 am

'Inconsistencies' - 7/2/2007 4:14 pm

Should everyone have to get insurance? - 7/2/2007 3:19 pm

Backbone II: Electric Boogaloo - 7/2/2007 1:41 pm

Universal health care - 7/2/2007 12:24 pm

Whose job was it ... - 7/2/2007 10:13 am

Third soldier - 7/2/2007 6:26 am

Green's response - 6/29/2007 5:33 pm

Begich on budget cuts - 6/29/2007 2:27 pm

Cap budget - 6/29/2007 2:24 pm

Veterans, Democrats & Young - 6/28/2007 7:22 pm

Late night - 6/28/2007 5:18 pm

Let them eat sandwiches - 6/28/2007 4:54 pm

Alberto Gonzales on Stevens - 6/28/2007 1:11 pm

Full plate - 6/28/2007 10:51 am

Bald eagle back - 6/28/2007 8:18 am

full archive »

This is one of the downsides of online journalism: stories are reported, written and published in minutes, instead of the hours spent on a typical newspaper story. In hindsight, we should have explained why we removed the story.

Meanwhile, on Thursday, Bobrick returned a phone call from Lisa. He said he could not talk in any detail about the case but he could clarify, in general, what had happened with the fund-raising. Begich was hosting a legitimate fundraiser for Knowles, he said. Neither Begich nor Knowles had any idea that he was thinking of trying to bring in more money than campaign limits would allow, and in the end, he dropped the idea, he said.

"I acknowledged it was wrong to do and it was a stupid idea," Bobrick said.

Want to listen yourself? Here's that portion of the cross-examination (it's eight minutes long, so we've broken it into three parts).

Part 1

Part 2

Part 3

add new comment

"God sent me here tonight, to bring this prison to you."

I couldn't make this Prison Shell Game Hustle stuff up if I tried.

Really.

new twentythreeskidoo | July 9, 2007 - 12:20pm

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1870

---

puff piece for democrats.....

boy what a long winded non excuse. It sure didn't stop the daily news from printing lesil's name over and over in the paper, even though it had nothing to do with anything improper.

What's the difference between the two??

It was part of the trial. period. tony and mark can make their denials, just like lesil did. But to completely eliminate the story as if nothing happened? Nothing but bias.

I am a non partisan so I am not pushing for favoritism to republicans either. What I think we all want is a return to fair minded, investigative journalism that used to represent the daily news.

I noticed the third recycled story again today on the front page: Stevens and young in trouble!! democrats ready to move into their offices!!!

Please just print the news and leave the editorializing and wishing and hoping to the editorial page.

new truthseeker | July 9, 2007 - 11:24am

reply »

Seeker

It is more than ADN. KTUU usually plays ball as well.

nOse has not been around lately or he'd get after me for claiming there was a KTUU-ADN-Dem alliance.

There is a reason why I have in the past referred to the ADN and KTUU as Pravda and Al-Jazeera.

The umpteenth story on Stevens and Young without any real new developments is a bit much.

Pravda and Al-Jazeera can never get enough of the jet either. They almost talk about as much as KUDO.

new TheSdog | July 9, 2007 - 11:54am

reply »

KTUU

Channel 2 TV is head and shoulders above the ADN on objectively reporting the news.

Especially if it has to do with Democratic torch bearers or Oil Companies.

They report.

The ADN hides, edits, misleads, removes, squashes, editorializes, and covers up or leaves unprinted numerous important to Alaskans stories over and over again.

Especially re the gas line and all that has really gone on in the last 6 years.

Or is currrently going on.

Alaskans have been left void of true reporting by the ADN on all aspects of the gas line.

Just look at all those full color full page and 3/4 page adds by the Oil Companies. Day after day. Never hurt the Golden Goose.

This alone is a huge and shocking story.

new heyworth | July 9, 2007 - 12:05pm

reply »

SH

Advertisors do not have much say over content.

If they did...I see a BP or C-P commercial just about every time I watch the news on KTUU or KTVA. Along with obligatory Pebble Mine commercials.

That argument carries no water. If you want to advertise in the media your options are limited up here.

Al Jazeera, ah, I mean KTUU is just as biased as the ADN. They love Begich and Knowles. Ever notice how glowing and non-ending their coverage is of Begich is?

Could it be Jason Ulmer...I mean Jason Moore. I, like most people, almost never watch KTVA so I cannot comment on them.

FBI - Stevens-1871

The media unfortunately is part of the revolving door in the political world with the same people going back and forth.

new TheSdog | July 9, 2007 - 1:25pm

reply »

just a hunch

All those entities do advertise on TV 2 and the ADN.

You miss the point that TV 2 does not hold back truth.

The reporting of the Knowles and Begich comments by Bobrick under oath ran as their (TV 2) first story at both 5 and 6 pm July 3.

They never retracted them. It was just "court testimomy".

The ADN first put the same comments/testimony out on this Blog, then cut the comments entirely from the front page Lisa Demer story (July 4) and then pulled it off their Blog, and then had some editor write the mish-mash justifying explanation at the top of this header section.

Probably just coincidence huh?

Not many have watched this as closely as I have regarding non reporting of important stories re the gas line by the ADN.

You would be amazed what has NOT been reported in the ADN but covered well in the Juneau Empire, Fairbanks News-Miner, Petroleum News, and Journal of Commerce. I know.

new heyworth | July 9, 2007 - 2:14pm

reply »

SH

You would be amazed what has NOT been reported in the ADN but covered well in the Juneau Empire, Fairbanks News-Miner, Petroleum News, and Journal of Commerce. I know.

I am not surprised at all.

KTUU did go with the testimony story but you don't see either digging on it. KTUU also already knew it was here on the blog. Somebody missed the memo or it was too late.

I am telling you KTUU is just as bad as the ADN on most things. I notice you left them out of your last paragraph.

new TheSdog | July 9, 2007 - 2:53pm

reply »

Another good source

Steve Heimel is doing an excellent job of covering it too.

new twentythreeskidoo | July 9, 2007 - 2:43pm

reply »

great didn't know that 23sdoo.

thanks.

new heyworth | July 9, 2007 - 2:50pm

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1872

Kyle

any updates on the Anderson trial? I'm predicting a verdict by end of today - guilty on all counts. TA should consider himself a lucky man if he beats any of the charges.
This trial is really just scratching the surface of what's to come -in my opinion. I'm wondering if the verdict comes back guilty on all charges, and TA is faced with jail time, could the feds offer leniency in exchange for additional cooperation/information?

new Stags_Leap | July 9, 2007 - 9:44am

reply »

Yes..... and the real question will be how far the investigation goes into VECO fronting for the oil companies in the PPT. Anderson wasn't part of that and it is much more serious for the state.

VECO isn't taxed by PPT. It is obvious all their corruption was on behalf of the oil companies.

new truthseeker | July 9, 2007 - 11:12am

reply »

The deal making is usually over when you go to trial. Once you've walked thru the Courthouse door, you've almost always made your choices.

new Black3 | July 9, 2007 - 9:48am

reply »

Voice of the Times 07/07/07

Editorial 7/07/07
Media selective about apoplexy

A FEW DAYS AGO, we pointed out the painfully obvious: that Alaska's news media seem to pick and choose their next victims for the pillory based on, well, bias, and that they do not lift their voices against friends.

The embarrassing tidbits surfacing in the federal trial of former Rep. Tom Anderson do nothing but underscore that assertion.

First, there was testimony in Anderson's trial that Mayor Mark Begich suggested to a company that wanted to build a juvenile center in Anchorage that it should hire a lobbyist to deal with city issues.

It turns out that Bill Bobrick, who has pleaded guilty in the corruption probe that netted Anderson, was the only lobbyist of note who lobbied the city, and he was a close friend of the mayor's.

No howls of indignation from the Anchorage Daily News or its fellow travelers. No endlessly repetitive stories hammering home the relationship. No outraged editorials.

Then, testimony from Bobrick, a government informant, detailed a 2004 conversation "in which he discussed a (sic) idea to funnel large amounts of apparently illegal campaign money to benefit former Gov. Tony Knowles, then running for the U.S. Senate," the News reported Tuesday.

"Bobrick told (Frank) Prewitt (another informant and a former corrections commissioner) during this meeting that he envisioned a joint effort to funnel $45,000 to $50,000 in campaign contributions to Knowles that would have involved Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich and other Democratic activists," the paper said.

The newspaper went on to say: "There is no evidence that Begich or Knowles knew about Bobrick's idea." (You have to ask yourself how the newspaper would know that? Why would it issue a blanket exoneration, based on . . .?)

There, of course, has been no call for a more thorough investigation, or editorial lectures on the appearance of impropriety, or any of the other tired nonsense the newspaper trots out when it has no real proof of wrongdoing.

FBI - Stevens-1873

Bobrick said he did not go through with the scheme and that apparently is good enough. Knowles said it would have been ridiculous. As for Begich, his spokeswoman, Julie Hasquet, did his talking. He did nothing wrong, she said.

And that raises other questions. Why is a city employee, a woman the taxpayers pay to speak for the mayor of Anchorage, running interference for Begich in a matter unrelated to his job as chief executive? It would seem to us that if Begich needs a spokesperson for private matters he should hire a public relations firm on his own dime, not use city resources.

Anybody in the media notice all that?

No? What a surprise.

new twentythreeskidoo | July 7, 2007 - 10:58pm

reply »

no story there you are making wild speculations that are NOT supported by facts. I wouldn't print any of it. A newspaper has to verify its facts/sources. Otherwise, there can be no objectivity or truth to the story.

It is common practice for municipal government to hire lobbyists.
In sum, the only lame thing here is your juvenile attempt to smear the Mayor with misleading and false statements.

new Stags_Leap | July 8, 2007 - 7:35am

reply »

Stags, for such a loudmouth, you are astoundingly naive or simply blind to any allegation that doesn't involve a Republican.

You are dealing with a group of people who have been business and political associates since the early seventies. They've all raised lots of money, you don't do that for nothing, and have held all sorts of elected and appointed positions; they know how to reward their friends and punish their enemies, and they're far better at it than Republicans who tend to be rather hamfisted and get caught.

There is a literal revolving door between State and ANC government and various for profit and nonprofit businesses that do business with the State and city governments; follow the money and who has what jobs and when. It ain't rocket science. Go figure out how someone with Wiemar's past got Allvest going and how Allvest got its big start with the drug testing contract with DOC when Frank Prewitt was DC and Bill Parker was a Special Assistant. Then figure out how all the emphasis on a badly needed State prison got deflected to private prison iniatives - initiatives that would never survive the union opposition - while Allvest and others moved into halfway houses and the like to pick up an ever-growing prisoner load. What's funny is that while VECO, CCA, and others were being shook down for "contributions" over a private prison scheme that hadn't a snowball's chance in Hell, the big money was going to the ever so politically friendly halfway houses.

The very worst thing that could happen to these people was when the Murkowski administration started making moves toward a real State owned and operated prison which would cut off a lot of the gravy train to them. Even during Knowles, people with very close ties did everything they could to make building and opening the ANC jail complex as difficult and expensive as possible. Even that structure was set up so that it wouldn't accommodate sentenced offenders and thus cut into the gravy train. The bidding is still open on who gets what, if anything, out of the new Mat-Su prison project, but if it doesn't get built or doesn't have adequate capacity, it won't be because the neighbors don't like it. Pass the popcorn.

new Black3 | July 9, 2007 - 7:49am

reply »

The real problem

There is a literal revolving door between State and ANC government and various for profit and nonprofit businesses that do business with the State and city governments; follow the money and who has what jobs and when.

I'd say that sums it up.

new TheSdog | July 9, 2007 - 8:24am

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1874

Stags

You're missing the point.

The ADN runs stories all the time on speculation and not supported by facts.

We still don't even have close to al the facts on Steven's house in Girdwood but that did not stop the ADN.

This is a little more than just "hiring a lobbyist." The VOT is streching it a little by suggesting it is likely Begich pr Knowles knew but this is still a story.

new TheSdog | July 8, 2007 - 9:19am

reply »

Nobody is Smearing Anybody

Don't you want to know what your enemies are saying, Stags ?

In fact, Here's a rather flattering article written very recently about Mark's Uncle, a former longtime state lawmaker back in Minnesota. The Newsreader folks can once again thank me for this little nugget.

If you really dig it's interesting what you can find in the Carson City NV and Big Arm MT white pages.

Personally, I really do believe that this was the first time ever, that Bobrick cooked up a "Bill Weimar-style" fundraiser for a friend, er, uh, i mean a client.

The story is what were the other "6-8 investigations" that Prewitt was working on and when was he working on them ?

What's the deal with the $30,000 loan from Weimar ?

Did Weimar's legal and financial troubles around this time period (2000-2002) have anything to do with all of this ?

When did the feds start sniffing around up here ?

We know that Prewitt started wearing the wire in the spring of 2003. What was Frankie doing prior to that to warrant their attention ?

> "The Republican Party is going to rue the day in this state for allowing Randy Ruedrich (chairman of the Republican Party of Alaska) to remain as a chair. He's bringing this party down and it's bad." KTUU also interviewed Rep. Eric Croft. He says he saw this coming two years ago, during a legislative committee meeting concerning VECO's pitch for a sole-source contract award for a private prison. "I said at the time, in 2004, on the Whittier proposal, someone's going to jail over this 'cause I could see how corrupt the process was," said Croft, D-Anchorage.

There are some names involved with some very big projects that are going to start coming up in the near future.

It's so obvious, go back through the APOC records, it's all there, well, most of it.

Remember the LA Times piece back in 2003 that caused Senator Ted to blow a gasket ?

This pot has been simmering for quite a while, and it's going to stain a lot of people by the time it all boils over.

And yes, to a lesser degree, Knowles wasn't as willing to roll over on private prisons than Murkowski was, that much I'll agree on.

But he took their money, as did a lot of people.

Follow the money, follow the money.

Someone needs to write a book about all of this.

new twentythreeskidoo | July 8, 2007 - 8:11am

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1875

There was NO

pressure from Governor Murkowski to make any move towards private prisons and one Helluva lot of opposition to it in both Admin and DOC.

The privatization pressure in that administration came from the smart boys from Anchorage, mostly refugees from the Weurch administration such as Neil Gunn, who wound up in OMB and their friend Scott Hawkins. They had a scheme worked out that would allow them to step on any purchase the State made and a lot of friends in the Legislature willing to help them do it, see, e.g., the Privatization Pilot Program legislation. I won't go so far as to say that Admin sabotaged it, but certainly nothing was done to make it easier for them. Law finally stepped in and pretty much stopped it. I crossed swords over it with OMB repeatedly. The unions were smart enough to never offer any concessions on contracting out language and we had better things to do than try to get any so a bunch of ANC smartasses could get rich.

I was and remain adamantly opposed to privatization of core governmental functions and so long as I was there, there wasn't anybody with enough horsepower to really get around me on the issue.

new Black3 | July 9, 2007 - 7:19am

reply »

digging

since you are so good at it, have you ever looked into the no-bid contract for Pac-West?

new Stags_Leap | July 9, 2007 - 4:45am

reply »

I'm not going to defend the Pac-West contract, since I don't know or care exactly how it was done, but there is nothing per se improper or illegal about a sole source contract so long as the award rules are followed.

new Black3 | July 9, 2007 - 7:25am

reply »

This Is Precious

All laid out in a nice timely fasion by a seasoned reporter with perhaps the deepest institutional memory of recent Alaska politics.

> "While Marsh looks like he hasn't been outside in years, Stockler looks like he just got back from a beach vacation. Marsh has those clean cut Tobey Mcquire looks, Stockler's head is shaved and he looks like someone who breaks your knees if you don't pay your debts."
>
> "Within minutes the jurors had asked for a copy of the stipulations. And then another note came out asking when they could have a smoke break."
>
> "Frank Prewitt began wearing a wire with Bobrick and then Anderson in Spring 2003. Prewitt claimed that 'mistakes' he'd made were either past the statute of limitations or very minor and that he was cooperating with the FBI voluntarily, not to get any reduction in sentence or charges dropped. He said he was involved with 6-8 other investigations.
> Bill Bobrick began cooperating with the FBI in late September or early October 2006. He quickly pled guilty and agreed to cooperate with the FBI. It's not clear whether he is cooperating in other investigations. The only promise made to him was that if things went well, they might write a letter to the judge asking for leniency in sentencing.
> Tom Anderson was called into the FBI in November 2006 [June 14, 2005]. Anderson, obviously, has not pleaded guilty, but apparently has cooperated with the FBI and wom a wire.
>
> So this case is most likely the tip of the iceberg. We know of three more legislators who have been indicted and two more who have been investigated, but not indicted."

new twentythreeskidoo | July 7, 2007 - 11:17am

reply »

Precious

makes me think of that ugly creature in the The Hobbit -Return of the King movie. PRECIOUS. I can't get it out of my mind now. It's like a bad song stuck in my mind -like something from the Village People.

new Stags_Leap | July 9, 2007 - 9:45am

reply »

FBI - Stevens-1876

Statute of Limitations..

The Supreme Court thas still not ruled/provided as to a clear guidance of Racketeering Statute of Limitations.

From my understanding is has to be after the statute was enacted ,of course, and fresh predicate acts could possibly bring out the whole course of events since the date of enactment of the Rico legislation, depending on relatedness.

Two predicate acts (fraud) in a certain number of years may be all that is needed.

new edgefinder | July 7, 2007 - 9:23pm

reply »

Reason against S of L

The very basis of fraud laws provides the reasoning to argue why there should never be a statute of limitations (similar to murder: you're dead when you are killed). When our Treasury is robbed, that money never went to work for benefits elsewhere. Resources can't often be replaced. (There are estimates the oil companies took $100 billion from you, Alaskans, in past 30 years! Think about that when revisiting the PPT based on net profits or dropped-down-bottom-lines via falsified Transfer Pricing accounting.)

FRAUD VITIATES ALL THAT FOLLOWS - it lives within all subsequent transactions and events derived from the fraudulent beginning.

The real problem with RICO is that in the 1989 Senate re-write, not enough was done about strengthening White Collar crime laws. Drug wars = bankers, accountants, lawyers, judges and other white collars who handle the big money. Follow the money, not the small time dealers etc.

Same with theft of Alaska's resources: follow the money -- go after the Certified Public Accomplices (profit launderers across national borders in global affiliate structures), financiers (often members of same Japanese keiretsu of operating and banking firms), and the (often foreign paid) lobbyists working behind scenes with Congressional staffers and Alaska's delegates to earmark, slip in special language etc.

And for getting back the golden goose sakes (before it is killed off), extend the IRS 3 year S of L on criminal cases against corporations. And stop the "gift shop" method of audit division giveaways (letting culprits go for 10 cents on the $ lost).

After all, we are talking here, today, about the legislators and other servants of this Corporatism and Kleptocracy. They are supposed to work for you! (hope you have seen the YouTube about idea of buying back Alaska for $10million for its citizens to own the Legislature.)

Groundswell Fisheries Movement

- FRAUD - and corruption - VITIATES ALL THAT FOLLOWS!!!

new staufen | July 8, 2007 - 7:21am

reply »

Disturbing And Almost Beautiful In A Corrupt Sort Of Way

The CBC needs a slogan, something the marketers can hit home with. I wonder if Croft would let them use his quote ?

Keep in mind party peoples, Prewitt was wearing his wire when this was happening...

What did Croft know back then ?

XXXXXX

From the May 9th 2004 Alaska State Legislature House Finance Committee Minutes
Representative Croft MOVED to ADOPT Amendment #3. (Copy on File). Co-Chair Williams OBJECTED.

FBI - Stevens-1877

Representative Croft explained the amendment. He emphasized that the privatization of the prison system bill has been around for many years. He recounted the numerous communities who have attempted to get that proposal and how devastating it was to each of them. Representative Croft objected to the litany of "sole source projects". There has never been a clean proposal presented to the Committee. The proposals are always sole source, with heavy money deals directed to one contractor. It is always prearranged and never clean. He believed that the legislation would result in sole sourcing being prearranged with political pressure through construction and continued operations.

Representative Croft warned that the State would see someone indicted and likely sent to prison over the proposed series. He stressed that he "hates" this type of proposal because of what it does to the integrity of the Legislature. He disliked the "high money and motives money and the legislators". These proposals historically have left a trail of damaged communities. Representative Croft warned tat Whittier would regret it at some point.

Senator Green interjected that the amendment language would return the legislation to the original bill. She pointed out that the Whittier language had been added with great deliberation. All the language is "futuristic" and will reesult in a lease-purchase owned by the State. She acknowledged it would be a policy call.

Representative Stoltze commented that Amendment #3 is important and requested an analysis. He inquired if there had been an overview of the contract between the City of Whittier and that contracting group.

VERN JONES, CHIEF PROCUREMENT OFFICER, DEPARTMENT OF ADMINISTRATION, indicated that the Department had not read the contract, but had read the City of Whittier's RFP. The procurement process for the City of Whittier did not comply with the State's contract process. Whittier would be subjected to their own ordinances. Without Amendment #3, the bill requires the City of Whittier procurement process to comply with the State's. He offered to provide technicalities regarding negotiation costs.

Representative Hawker acknowledged that the bill could resolve concerns raised by Representative Croft. He said he opposed Amendment #3.

A roll call vote was taken on the motion.

IN FAVOR: Croft, Stoltze
OPPOSED: Fate, Foster, Hawker, Joule, Meyer, Moses, Chenalut, Williams, Harris

The MOTION FAILED (2-9).

new twentythreeskidoo | July 8, 2007 - 8:04am

reply »

This is for another investigation not Andersons

If any of this is correct, it is meant for another investigation. It serves no purpose to explain it here.

What is important today is thanking everyone who worked so diligently in the Anderson case to find the facts.

There are many of us who want to thank prosecutors and investigators personally but are not able to for fear of retribution from the Andersons. We have seen it before, but that too is unimportant here.

Thanks to the prosecutors, support staff and every person who devoted extra time to bring Tom Anderson to justice. Regardless of the outcome you have put every politician on notice, and you have cleaned up Alaska politics. Elected officials are a bit less arrogant today, and embarrassed about their behavior. Thank you. R's or D's are better behaved as a result of the Anderson prosecution. Thank you.

FBI - Stevens-1878

The one fact we will disagree on is whether Mrs. Anderson knew Tom was taking money. She knew, you could not prove it but she had to know. She makes it her business to know. Hopefully she will be of use during the VECO investigation.

Regardless, thank you again. A hundred people who can't tell you want to thank you but don't dare.

new nooneknows | July 7, 2007 - 7:50am

reply »

Speaking of retribution...

Having the a Troopers (ie. TA's father) as a potential retribution weapon, I wonder what other ..

Some funny business went on about ten years ago- one of those failures to do fair 'internal' as it were, investigations,or of another Agency actually.

A good 'ol boy-thing with witnesses loosing contact so no investigation...

Might have even been seen by a Federal Judge showmewhere....Hmmm

Do anyone know what years his Father served as DPS?

new edgefinder | July 7, 2007 - 9:31pm

reply »

You have to remember

It was a job with the State Troopers that brought J. Frank Prewitt, Jr. J.D., M.S. to Alaska a long, long time ago.

It's probably a safe bet that he and TA's father had some sort of professional relationship.

new twentythreeskidoo | July 9, 2007 - 12:29pm

reply »

Bobrick versus Prewitt

on the ADN coverage during 2004 is pretty telling Kyle.

Bobrick was not even on the radar in articles other than the crazy ads he ran on radio.

http://www.adn.com/senate/story/5719930p-5653268c.html

"...Knowles spokesman Matt McKenna said the campaign did not know about the ads before a reporter contacted him. Knowles listened to the commercial that angered Stevens for the first time Wednesday, and after he heard it, he called Bobrick and asked him to pull it, McKenna said. He then called Stevens to let the senator know he was outraged over the content and also sent a handwritten letter to Stevens.

Knowles "believes they are disrespectful and a lame attempt at humor about a subject that is not funny," McKenna said. "There are overzealous supporters on both sides. But (Bobrick) is doing this on his own."

Interesting take by Knowles back then on not knowing about the ad. Think John Q public would buy that today?

Bobrick was on the muni lobbyist listing for Cornell and all the focus was on Prewitt.

I wonder why.

Well who was really the real real "bad guy" the FBI used.

What can be expected during the 2008 election. I am sure the DNC and their Congressional election commitee is having a cow right now.

How many times do you think the ADN editors can say Abramhoff?

new tlamb775 | July 6, 2007 - 10:36pm

reply »

Disturbing and Beautiful in a Corrupt Sort of Way

From the KTUU website

FBI - Stevens-1879

> No evidence has been presented that Mayor Begich had knowledge of what Bobrick was proposing, and in court Bobrick testified the campaign contribution scheme never came to be.
>
> In the same recorded conversation, which was transcribed and shown to jurors on an overhead screen, Bobrick alludes that he and Weimar had worked on something similar in the past.
>
> He went on to say Weimar had once come up with a stack of checks for a prior campaign, totaling as much as $65,000. Again, no evidence, other than transcribed excerpts of the conversation in which Bobrick makes these remarks, was presented in court regarding these claims.
>
> Bobrick is charged only in connection with the current case. Stockler argued that the reason Bobrick was willing to plead guilty and testify against Anderson was in hopes he wouldn't face prosecution for other crimes and for leniency at sentencing.

In the conversation, Bobrick says he is working on an idea to raise money for Knowles, in what he called a "Bill Weimar-style fundraiser." Weimar is a man with long-standing connections to the corrections industry, and the former owner of a company called Allvest, which was sold to Cornell (for 21 million dollars). Weimar is also a former client of Bobrick's.

XXX

In the case of Anchorage, Corrections Group North -- the new corporation formed by Allvest, Veco and Wackenhut -- proposed using 40 acres in the city owned by Veco to build a 624-bed facility at a cost of $60 million to $80 million. Allvest President Bill Weimar, who was on the board of the Downtown Community Council, and lobbyist William Bobrick contributed more than $11,000 to candidates running in 1996 for the Anchorage Assembly, which had to approve zoning changes for the project before it could move ahead.

XXX

Between 1990 and 1998, Allvest (now Cornell) contributed nearly $120,000 to state political campaigns, including $5,100 in 1996 and 1998 given to Eldon Mulder, House Finance co-Chair and author of the legislation authorizing a prison in Delta Junction. (The Prison Payoff , November 2000)

In addition to political contributions, Cornell lobbyist Joe Hayes paid Eldon Mulder's wife $85,000 to work as his office manager. (Peninsula Clarion , September 23, 2001)

Cornell is so well connected that one of their executives was appointed to chair a subcommittee charged with "advising" the state on prison privatization. When that created too much of a conflict, he was replaced by... a former Cornell executive. (Anchorage Daily News, February 28, 2000)

XXX

Weimar sold the assets of Allvest for $20 million in 1998 and began a series of asset transfers to separate corporations and trusts. After the J.W. creditors and Brown had obtained their state court judgments against Allvest, they each filed supplemental complaints in aid of execution in their respective state court actions. The supplemental complaints were against Weimar and other non-debtor entities, and sought to recover the Allvest assets on fraudulent transfer, alter ego and other grounds.
In May of 2002, the J.W. creditors seized $490,854.00 from Allvest. Brown filed an involuntary chapter 11 bankruptcy petition against Allvest in October of 2002.

XXX

Search the APOC records for "CONCERNED CITIZENS FOR RESPONSIBLE ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT" and see who contributed heavily (Cornell, Neeser, VECO, Kenai Native Association) to their campaign to bring a private prison to the Kenai in 2001. You can also search the records and see that the Bobrick/Weimar team has been giving money to Tony Knowles at least back to 1990.

XXX

As to Prewitt's own questionable behaviors, he told jurors that he did accept $30,000 from a friend, Bill Weimar, in 1994. At the time, Prewitt was state corrections commissioner and Weimar owned a halfway house business called Allvest. Prewitt said he was facing a difficult family situation and considered the money a loan, which he repaid the next year, after he left his state post, by working four months for Allvest for free. He said he shouldn't have accepted the money.

FBI - Stevens-1880

XXX

What caused the governor to change his strongly stated opposition to privatized prisons? He hasn't explained his shift yet. But in May 2003, a prominent Anchorage architect named Mark Pfeffer met with his aides to promote the Veco-Cornell prison project. Pfeffer had recently joined the prison consortium, and he had also signed on as treasurer for Lisa Murkowski's reelection campaign. Around that time, her father began to back away from his pledge to oppose private prisons, issuing a vague announcement that his administration would take a "fresh look" at the Veco-Cornell prison plan.

Meanwhile, money from Veco and its lobbyists has flowed into Lisa Murkowski's campaign. The first $2,000 check from Veco chairman Bill Allen showed up on May 13, 2003, only days after the Anchorage Daily News reported the governor's shift on his project. Allen, who registered as a lobbyist in Anchorage to push the project, has given regularly and generously -- as have other Veco executives, whose total of $43,750 is Murkowski's largest single donation. Lobbyists from Patton Boggs, which represents Veco in promoting the prison deal, have given her an additional $12,000.

XXX

Jim Kelly, former director of communications for the Alaska Permanent Fund Corp., has joined the management team of Allvest Information Services. The firm manages Assessments.com, one of the nation's leading providers of validated risk assessment/cased management software, staff training and implementation consulting. Among its major clients are juvenile justice departments for the states of Washington, Florida, Montana and Wyoming, and Los Angeles and San Diego counties in California.

From the Assessments.com website:

> Assessments is one of the nation's leading providers of software and other services to help state and county probation agencies more effectively and efficiently manage their day-to-day activities.

XXX

From ACLU of New Mexico Blog posted July 5, 2007:

Pressures are mounting for Bernalillo County and the federal office of Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) to aggressively audit the way Cornell Corrections, Inc. is managing the immigrant detention facility that now occupies the former Bernalillo County Detention Center in downtown Albuquerque. In recent days, both the Tribune and the Journal have reported on the appalling conditions in the facility, including inadequate medical care, overcrowding, poor food, unprofessionalism of jail guards, and increasingly unsanitary conditions. A federal judge has taken an interest in the situation and attorneys who sued the county for jail overcrowding several years ago are demanding access to the facility. The ACLU is investigating whether the conditions amount to "cruel and unusual punishment."

XXX

From the Alaska State Legislature Legislative Minutes

Co-Chair Mulder noted that testimony had been taken from Delta Junction. He observed that there had not been any consensus for a facility to be built there. He noted that the lawsuit is the greatest concern. Co-Chair Mulder noted that financial relief could not be provided within the confines of the legislation. Co-Chair Mulder advised that he would speak with Senator Stevens about the debt concern for the City of Delta Junction. Mr. Gilbertson interjected that Cornell is a participant in the lawsuit against the City of Delta Junction because of Allvest, Inc., and noted that they would appreciate any help they could get.

XXX

From the Cornell Rap Sheet

But the Knowles administration -- and several key legislators -- preferred an alternative this year that would expand regional prisons and jails. The administration's resistance toughened in the closing days of the session, when Corrections Commissioner Margaret Pugh issued a letter recommending a veto of the Whittier bill. Cornell will still follow the local debate and continue to run six Alaska halfway houses, said company spokesman Doucette. Delta Junction is glad to have the $1 million loan, given that the legal settlement was due July 1, said city administrator Pete Hallgren. He said the city has already undertaken a study of forming a local borough, in part as a response to a flood of federal money now reaching the area as part of the national missile defense project being built at nearby Fort Greely. The former Army post was to have been the site of the private prison. Delta Junction backed out of the deal with Allvest, the principal company in the Delta Correction Group, amid local controversy over a lack of competitive bidding. Allvest sued and won a settlement from the city.

FBI - Stevens-1881

--

Cornell and Veco are lobbying heavily for a private prison in Whittier. To that end, they've retained Kent Dawson, Mark Higgins and Joe Hayes, heavy hitters in the capitol. The Whittier bill was co-sponsored by Rep. Eldon Mulder, the house finance chair.

--

"The majority of (Whittier) people won't 'fess up to it, but 60 to 70 percent of them are against the prison, too," he said. "The simple reason is that the ordinance was written to exclude a public vote. ... There's no public vote. Not even an advisory vote." Arneson also voiced concern over lack of a feasibility study. However, Butler said, "We don't have any problems with thinking the prison isn't feasible. The contractor will do a site evaluation and that will be a feasibility study." In 1998, the Legislature authorized the creation of a private prison by the city of Delta Junction at abandoned U.S. Army facilities at Fort Greely. Corrections Group North, formed by Cornell and Weimar Investments, worked with Delta Junction on that project. Pete Hallgren, the executive director of Delta Junction's department of economic development and the city administrator, said a $75,000 feasibility study "indicated that there wasn't anywhere near enough money appropriated under the enabling legislation to make it financially feasible." Constructing the private prison was not pursued, lawsuits were filed, and Hallgren said, "We came out of the project defending against a lawsuit by the proposed prison operator. We ended up settling the case for $1.1 million." Delta Junction has paid $100,000. The remaining $1 million is due July 1. "It's more money than we've got," Hallgren said.

--

Croft, who's against the Whittier project, says he finds that "disturbing" and "almost beautiful in a corrupt sort of way."

new twentythreeskidoo | July 7, 2007 - 12:48am

reply »

No sale

That original story was clear Begich and Knowles likely did not know of this proposed plan.

It was innuendo but that never stops the ADN when an R follows somebody's name. You run with it and if absolutely necessary you run a correction or retraction 2 weeks later on page Z-976.

I can hear now about how you knew and your ethics would not allow you to run it. What a load of rationallizing nonsense.

I do not think TK or MB did anything here. I said as much when that blog was up.

I actually do think it is relevant their names came up. It is something the public has a right to know. we all should know the lobbyists work both sides. All the inbreeding is nauseating.

Here is a great example of how it works...

Eric Croft sent me a letter asking for money when he ran for governor.

I called him up and left a message that I wanted him to explain why he voted against the med malpractice bill.

So, I get a call from the Alaska Physician and Surgeons lobbyist(a group I am not a member of I might add). He tells me Croft voted against it but gave him valuable information on how other people would vote. Therefore, Croft was really my friend even though he voted in a way I did not like.

It was surreal.

They're all in it together no matter how holy the Ds think they are right now.

new TheSdog | July 6, 2007 - 8:46pm

reply »

---

one of the problems - with on-line, "instant" news is that "stuff happens", and stories continue to develop. You did the right thing by pulling this story off the blog. While I appreciate that breaking news gets put up here, I also understand that as more facts are developed, the news changes.

FBI - Stevens-1882

new akgambit | July 6, 2007 - 8:02pm

reply »

Doh

one less smoke screen for the prom queen and her cult of followers.

Good on the ADN for pulling the story, and good on them for explaining the reasons.

Now we can focus on AGIA and the coming few months. The prom queen will be held accountable. Don't let them/her fool you with their pending excuses and blame game.

new Stags_Leap | July 6, 2007 - 7:40pm

reply »

Stags u r crazy

Just for fun how long will it take the Anderson jury to come to a verdict? And what will the verdict be, for all you fans of the legal system?

new Barbies_R_US | July 8, 2007 - 4:57pm

reply »

Wrong thread..

We're talking about gravy funnels here Stags. Did you listen to the link or not?

Stacks of checks and sources and paper trails, corrupting relationships people engage in.....

I didn't hear the name Palin, did you?

Prosecutor sounds like Joe Friday. Just the facts Bill, just the facts...

ABSCAM is taken...How about ANDERSCAM.

new edgefinder | July 6, 2007 - 8:54pm

reply »

Okay edge

Since you brought her up...

Explain the pattern of cuts. Especially with regards to Stoltze and the valley.

Also explain how a "fiscal conservative" allows Mat Maid which has no viablility to go on.

Explain how the panderer pushed for continuing senior welfare.

There is more. If you think Palin is completely above the political ganes you are dead wrong.

new TheSdog | July 8, 2007 - 6:28pm

reply »

I'm not too familar with

I'm not too familar with Stoltze but the perceived favoritism may have a way of taking care of itself. Being on Finance Committee he must have some connection to the PPT that was favored by federal criminals

Palin probably wants the Federalis' to take their showing elsewhere, but the job may only be half done. This perceived favoritism may have a way of taking care of itself.

Mat Maid deserved another shot with people who have the best interests, and will now be under the magnifying glass. It is a keeper with the right people.

As for seniors I would hope the ones in the wrong "bracket" save the state and not take it. As for the ones needy, pandering or not, at least she is not alienating them like Frank.

FBI - Stevens-1883

new edgefinder | July 9, 2007 - 12:54am

reply »

If you do not see the ethical dilemna in Palin's decisions favoring valley and valley interests.

I mean all new Ag members valley people save one former valley resident?

Take the blinders off.

new TheSdog | July 9, 2007 - 7:54am

reply »

Great ideas!

Now, let's get serious about that bridge I offered for sale earlier. There's only one and it could easily turn into a bidding war if you don't act soon!

new rfn | July 6, 2007 - 7:55pm

reply »

thanks kyle,

for providing the reasons.

new akgen | July 6, 2007 - 6:30pm

reply »

© Copyright 2007, The Anchorage Daily News, a subsidiary of The McClatchy Company
Contact Us | Newsroom Contacts | Communication Forms | Subscriptions | Advertising | Terms of Use
Daily News Jobs | RSS Feeds | ADN Store | Newspapers in Education | Privacy Agreement

A member of the
Real Cities Network

FBI - Stevens-1884

MSNBC.com

Courts rules FBI raid on lawmaker illegal

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner in Washington
Financial Times
Updated: 5:43 p.m. AKT Aug 3, 2007

The FBI illegally seized documents from the Capitol Hill office of a Louisiana lawmaker last year, a US court ruled on Friday, in a decision that could affect the ability of federal prosecutors to investigate political corruption.

The court of appeals for the District of Columbia said the Department of Justice must return to William Jefferson some privileged documents that were taken during the raid.

It ruled that the search of Mr Jefferson's computer hard drives was not illegal, however, because it did not reveal "legislative material" to the executive branch of government.

Mr Jefferson, a Democratic congressman who is alleged to have kept $90,000 in cash in his home freezer, was indicted on corruption charges in June, months after the search of his Washington office caused a bipartisan furore over whether the raid was constitutional.

The Department of Justice said on Friday it was pleased that the court did not find the search of the office unconstitutional but was "disappointed" that the ruling required members of Congress to be given "advance notice and the right to review materials before the execution of a search warrant".

The department said its prosecution of Mr Jefferson would not be hurt by the decision because of "procedures" it put in place before its search warrant was executed.

Mr Jefferson's attorney, Robert Trout, hailed the ruling as a victory.

"This is a reminder that just because the Department of Justice says it's so, doesn't make it so. We are confident that as this case moves forward, and when all of the facts are known, we will prevail again and clear Congressman Jefferson's name," Mr Trout said in a statement.

But Melanie Sloan, a former prosecutor and ethics watchdog, said the decision was "devastating" to the investigation and prosecution of congressional corruption because it could have a "profound effect" on other cases, including the fed-eral investigation into Ted Stevens, the longest-serving Republican in the Senate.

Mr Stevens' Alaska home was searched by the FBI and tax officials on Monday as part of a wide-ranging corruption probe.

"Sen Ted Stevens now has every incentive to store in his congressional office any document concerning the renovations of his house, secure in the knowledge that it will be beyond the reach of federal investigators," she said.

Copyright The Financial Times Ltd. All rights reserved.

FBI - Stevens-1885

URL: http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/20114520/

MSN Privacy . Legal
© 2007 MSNBC.com

194A-AN-13620-M, 738

[redacted] (AN) (FBI)

b6
b7C

From: [redacted] (LA) (FBI)
Sent: Friday, August 10, 2007 2:38 PM
To: [redacted] (AN) (FBI)
Subject: FBI Brief - You Probably Knew This Already

UNCLASSIFIED
NON-RECORD

Stevens Hosting Lobbyists For Fundraiser At Alaska Fishing Lodge. Roll Call (8/9, Newmyer, 11:56 a.m.) reported on its Web site, "Undeterred in the face of a federal corruption probe, Sen. Ted Stevens...is hosting a small klatch of top lobbyists and others this weekend for a fishing and fundraising trip to his home state. The getaway, billed as the 'Ted Stevens El Capitan Fishing Event,' combines 'three days of some of the best salt water fishing you will ever have,' according to the invite, with a fundraising reception expected to net at least $2,300 per person for the Senator's re-election campaign." Roll Call notes, "While Stevens has held fundraising events at the lodge in previous years, they have benefited a nonprofit entity," and "this is the first year the trip has been staged as a political fundraiser."

Meanwhile, under the headline "Like Father, Like Son, Even When They Are Under Suspicion," the New York Times (8/10, Shenon, 1.18M) reports, "Ben Stevens is often said by Alaskans to be the spitting image of his father, Senator Ted Stevens. ... Now, father and son share a new, unwelcome distinction. Both are under investigation by the Justice Department over their ties to an Alaska businessman who has confessed to bribing public officials. The Alaska home of Ted Stevens, the longest-serving Republican in the Senate, was raided last week by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. His son's offices in the Alaska Legislature - he was a state senator until this year - were raided last summer." The Times notes, "Many Alaskans have been left wondering whether it was a doting, fiercely ambitious father who brought the son under the suspicion of criminal investigators, or an intemperate, boastful son who entangled his aging father in the Justice Department's fast-growing investigation."

UNCLASSIFIED

FBI - Stevens-1886

194A-AN-13620-m 739

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Records expose Young-Abramoff ties

MARIANA ISLANDS: Congressman has denied being influenced.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com
(04/20/08 01:49:47)

Rep. Don Young has said he never allowed convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff to be an influential force over him in Congress.

But now a trove of old billing records from two of Abramoff's firms show that his team of lobbyists had more than 120 contacts with Young's personal and committee staffs over 25 months, including at least 10 with Young himself.

The available records cover a single Abramoff client, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, a U.S. territory in the Pacific that Young oversaw when he chaired the House Resources Committee from 1995 to 2001.

The records show that one of the looming concerns of Abramoff and his fellow lobbyists at the time was a bill introduced by Young's fellow Alaskan, Sen. Frank Murkowski, to reform labor and immigration practices feeding the island's notorious Chinese-owned sweatshops. In 2000, Murkowski's bill passed the Senate unanimously, but Young stopped it cold in his committee, refusing to hold even a hearing.

Young has denied taking that action or any other as a favor to Abramoff, now in a federal prison.

"Abramoff is, and has been, inconsequential to my work in Congress," Young wrote in 2006 in response to a Daily News editorial linking him to the lobbyist. "I have never had any personal or professional relationship with Abramoff."

But as more information surfaces in the Abramoff lobbying scandal, the connections to Young only deepen. Among that new information was a private memo written by Abramoff himself to the governor of the Mariana Islands, expressing concern that Young was being forced by term limits to give up his Resources chairmanship in 2001.

"The loss of Chairman Young's authority cannot easily be measured -- or replaced," Abramoff wrote on Jan. 4, 2001, in crediting Young with blocking reform legislation. "We have lost major institutional memory and friendship."

FBI - Stevens-1887

LINKS TO ABRAMOFF

Young has been defending himself over matters related to Abramoff since the lobbying scandal began to unravel in 2005. Young's campaign spokesman and chief of staff, Mike Anderson, declined to say in an interview last week whether some portion of the $1.1 million the campaign has spent on legal fees over the last year relate to the ongoing FBI investigation of the Abramoff affair, which has led to 13 convictions so far of lobbyists, aides, a former congressman and two former administration officials. Young himself refused to discuss the matter the last time he met with reporters in Anchorage in February, and Anderson would not comment on matters involving

194A-AN-13620-M;740

Abramoff.

Young first came under criticism related to Abramoff over his efforts as Resources chairman to preserve the freewheeling Mariana economy. Investigations by the government, media and human rights groups uncovered widespread abuses in the garment industry and among sex workers there starting in the mid-1990s, but Young asserted those investigations were bogus.

Then, in 2006, a four-year-old letter surfaced from Young asking the head of the General Services Administration to grant preferences in the development of the Old Post Office Pavilion in Washington, D.C., to disadvantaged businesses. Abramoff was seeking just such a privilege for two Indian tribe clients. A Young spokesman would later say that fact was a coincidence.

Last year, Mark Zachares, whom Young hired as a top aide on the House Transportation Committee, pleaded guilty to accepting bribes from Abramoff and agreed to help investigators. Before going to work for Young, Zachares, originally from Alaska, had been a labor and immigration official for the Mariana government. Prosecutors said Abramoff placed Zachares on Young's committee, and Zachares used his insider spot to help Abramoff's clients. Since Zachares' plea 12 months ago, Young has refused to explain what he knows about how Zachares got his job.

Now the 900-plus pages of Abramoff billing records and memos associated with the Mariana Islands are telling more of the story, though they represent only a fraction of Abramoff's total business activities from the 1990s until his first guilty plea on Jan. 3, 2006.

CONNECTIONS WIDEN

The documents emerged in 2005, when the Los Angeles Times, The Associated Press and other media obtained them under a public information request from the Mariana capital of Saipan. Dennis Greenia, a blogger and publications director for the nonprofit Co-op America, provided copies of the records to the Daily News. Some of those records are also coming into play in Colorado, where the Denver Post has been writing about another congressman with Abramoff and Mariana Islands ties, former Rep. Bob Schaffer, a Republican now running for U.S. Senate.

As a member of Young's Resources Committee, Schaffer took a free trip to the Mariana Islands arranged by Abramoff's law firm, then played a central role in a 1989 committee hearing investigating Interior department officials in the Clinton administration who were trying to rein in the Saipan government.

The documents span an intermittent period of 25 months from January 1996 to December 2001. At times during that period, the Mariana government let its arrangement with Abramoff lapse. Other months of billing records are missing.

But the records that are available show Abramoff billing the island commonwealth for some 120 contacts by his team with Young's staff and Young himself -- meetings, phone calls and letters.

Abramoff billed the government for just one meeting he had with Young, on March 6, 1997. At the time, the governor of the territory was visiting Washington. One of Abramoff's lobbyists, Lisa Helpert Tucker, reported five meetings with Young from March 27, 1996, to Oct. 2, 1997. Lobbyists Dennis Stephens, Shawn Vassell, William Myhre and Darrell Connor all said they met with Young in 1996 and 1997.

Lloyd Jones, a former Alaska state senator from Ketchikan who went to work for Young, had 10 meetings and phone conferences with Abramoff's team when he was staff director of the Resources Committee, according to the records. Jones, who retired in January, didn't return a call left on the answering machine at his home in Virginia, where he lives with his wife, Jan Faiks, another former Alaska state senator.

Other Young aides, including Kurt Christensen, Dan Kish, Manase Mansur and Bill Simmons, had nearly as many contacts as Jones. Lu Young, the congressman's wife, attended a meeting with an Abramoff lobbyist on Sept. 14, 2000, the records show.

But by far the largest number of contacts -- 35 -- were with Duane Gibson, a lawyer on Young's Resources Committee who followed Young when he became Transportation Committee chairman in 2001. Gibson is a former aide to Sen. Ted Stevens and, with his brother Brett, also a lawyer, owns the Anchorage company that makes Yummy Chummies dog treats.

Gibson, as a congressional official, took a trip to the Mariana Islands in December 1997 that was arranged and paid for by Abramoff's lobbying firm. Abramoff submitted a $48,042 bill to the Mariana government to cover the cost of the trip, which included 10 people, among them:

• Lobbyist David Safavian, who a few years later would land a job as the Bush administration's top procurement official in the General Services Administration. Safavian was sentenced to 18 months in prison in 2006 for covering up his connections to Abramoff.

• Roger France, former chief of staff to Rep. Charles Taylor, R-N.C. France is now living in Anchorage, where he has a contract to develop the public relations campaign to open the Pebble Mine in the Bristol Bay region, according to Pebble spokesman Sean Magee.

TROUBLE FOR LOBBYISTS

Shortly after Young took over the Transportation Committee in 2001 for a six-year term -- assuming continued Republican control of the House -- Abramoff lobbyist Dennis Stephens sent an e-mail to Abramoff, with the subject line "duane gibson." It was an idea of how to exploit a new situation with old friends.

"Maybe you and I need to meet with Duane and have him walk us through (a blacked-out name) priorities at his new committee," Stephens said. "Young should be there for six years -- that is plenty of time to develop appropriate clients, sign them up and deliver."

In its charging documents against Mark Zachares, the Alaskan who went to work for Young and pleaded guilty to accepting Abramoff bribes, the government said Abramoff tried to find a job for him in the Interior Department office that oversaw U.S. territories. But the Bush administration wouldn't hire Zachares.

Instead, he got a job as counsel to a subcommittee of Young's Transportation Committee in June 2002, one month after Gibson left to work for Abramoff's firm, Greenberg Traurig.

Zachares' guilty plea made reference to a person who intervened on his behalf to get him the job, but did not name or otherwise identify the person. Young and his spokesmen have refused to provide more information. Lloyd Jones would have been in overall charge of the staff. The chairman of the subcommittee where Zachares worked, Rep. Frank LoBiondio, R-N.J., said Young had overall supervision of the entire staff, including Zachares.

Gibson has consistently declined to talk about anything connected with Abramoff. Reached on his cell phone last week, he said he had nothing to say. FBI - Stevens-1889

While working at Greenberg Traurig, one of his fellow lobbyists e-mailed Gibson and others that a terrible situation was developing in the White House. An ethics official had advised agencies dealing with Indian tribes that lobbyists should never be allowed to attend their meetings, and that it was a waste of tribes' money to hire lobbyists at all.

Those were "fighting words," the lobbyist, Kevin Ring, wrote Gibson. Tribes with casinos were some of Greenberg Trauig's most lucrative clients.

Gibson responded quickly, telling Ring to find out all he could about the ethics adviser -- and get her fired. He also suggested a dirty trick: start a "phone bank" to place a thousand calls a day to the ethics adviser "from every tribe with a problem."

There was nothing in the records to indicate whether Ring followed through with Gibson's advice.

Greenberg Trauig fired Abramoff in March 2004 as he was falling under increasing scrutiny. Gibson left a few months later. He now lobbies on his own or subcontracts from other lobbying firms, according to his lobbying registrations. By far his biggest contract is with the Pebble Mine partnership, generating nearly $1 million in fees since 2005.

Pebble spokesman Magee said the mine developers got to know Gibson when he was lobbying for the Alaska Miners Association. He said he asked Gibson about Abramoff last week following an inquiry by the Daily News. Gibson said he wasn't under investigation, Magee said. However, the Los Angeles Times reported in 2006 that the Justice Department sought information on Gibson in a grand jury subpoena served on an Indian tribe in Louisiana represented by Abramoff and Gibson.

THE MARIANAS

The situation in the Mariana Islands set up an unusual public confrontation between Young and Alaska's then-junior senator, Frank Murkowski. Both are Republicans.

The Marianas are a string of 14 islands north of Guam, the scene of bloody battles with Japan during World War II. The atomic bomb dropped on Hiroshima was assembled on one of the islands. After the war, the people of the islands decided to affiliate with the United States. Their covenant, signed in 1976, allowed them to have their own immigration and labor policies, though Congress retained the right to impose all U.S. laws.

In the 1980s, tariffs on garments made in some Asian countries gave a decided advantage to clothing factories in the Marianas. Though the industry in Saipan was dominated by the Tan family from Hong Kong and the clothing was made by "guest workers" from China, the Philippines, Bangladesh and elsewhere, the labels said, "Made in U.S.A." The island economy boomed, but not without cost in human misery.

A growing number of reports spoke of near slave-labor conditions, with workers kept in sealed compounds, required to work seven days a week without overtime, and sometimes getting no paycheck at all. There were widespread reports of women coerced into getting abortions to keep their jobs. Some women hired abroad found themselves working not in garment factories at all, but sex clubs.

Murkowski was then chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, which, like Young's committee, had jurisdiction over the Mariana commonwealth. In February 1996, he and Sen. Daniel Akaka, D-Hawaii, traveled to Saipan to see conditions themselves. They returned outraged.

Visiting one garment factory, Murkowski said, he "talked with some Bangladesh workers who had not been paid and who were living in appalling conditions." He also described a young woman taken to Saipan as a minor and forced to work as a prostitute.

FBI - Stevens-1890

"This was occurring under the U.S. flag and supposedly with the protection all U.S. citizens enjoy under our Constitution," Murkowski said in a Senate speech in 1999.

MURKOWSKI'S BILL

By the time Murkowski introduced his first bill to take over labor and immigration on the Marianas, in 1997, Abramoff was working for the garment industry and the government. Murkowski failed to get a vote on his bill, but he introduced a slightly scaled-back measure in the next Congress in 1999. This time, the Senate passed it by unanimous consent on Feb. 7, 2000. It went to the House, where it was assigned to Young's committee.

In memos to the Marianas government that March, April and May, Abramoff said his staff was closely monitoring the legislation. In April, he wrote, his lobbyists "continued meetings with House Resources Committee Members and staff to advocate rejection" of the Murkowski measure. Actual billing records for those months are not available, so there's no way to know who the lobbyists were talking to.

Young stopped Murkowski's bill cold, refusing to let it out of his committee. He said the stories of worker abuse were largely fabricated by trade unions and special interest groups promoted by the news media.

"There's no need to move anything," he told a Daily News reporter in July 2000. "Why should you move anything that's really been fueled, very frankly, by hysteria reporting by the media?"

The following January, in his private memo to Mariana officials, Abramoff took credit for the result. "We erected a roadblock in the House to stop the bill from moving," he wrote.

Was that bluster by Abramoff in an effort to convince a client to shell out more money, or did he actually manipulate Young?

Since leaving office, Murkowski has declined to talk about the Marianas issue.

YOUNG DEFENDS ROLE

In the 2006 op-ed column in the Daily News, Young said he was listening to the administration on the islands, not Abramoff, when he spiked Murkowski's bill.

Young also said he got first-hand information when he led a congressional trip to the Marianas and nearby Guam and the Marshall Islands in February 1999. He brought along three delegates from other U.S. territories, eight staff members including Lloyd Jones, and four other congressmen, including Rep. John Doolittle, R-Sacramento, whose wife's home office was raided by FBI agents last year in the Abramoff investigation. Doolittle has not been charged.

Young visited factories and residences. Critics charged that all he saw was what the Tan family wanted him to see.

The visit was covered wall-to-wall by the local paper, the Marinas Variety News & View. A day after Young's group left, on Feb. 22, 1999, it published a small story about an alien worker group that said the delegation provided "no help" with abuse claims. Leaders of the organization, representing Filipinos, Bangladeshis, Pakistanis, Chinese, Sri Lankans and Indians, managed to get a one-hour hearing with the delegation -- minus Young, the paper said. Young didn't meet with the group, the newspaper reported, because he "was tired."

WAGE BILL BECOMES LAW

With the Democrats back in control of Congress, Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., long a foe of Young's on the Mariana Islands, introduced a bill in 2006 that would bring the islands in line with the U.S. minimum wage. President Bush signed it into law last year. Then, two weeks ago, the Senate approved a House measure extending U.S. immigration law to the islands. That, too, is expected to be enacted.

Find Richard Mauer online at adn.com/contact/rmauer or call 257-4345.

What is the Abramoff investigation?

In his heyday in the 1990s and early 2000s, he was routinely referred to in print as "super-lobbyist" Jack Abramoff. That's been replaced with "disgraced lobbyist." Abramoff and his team of lobbyists, many of them former Republican congressional aides, made tens of millions of dollars advocating for Indian tribes with casinos, U.S. territories and dozens of other clients. But Abramoff's access to Congress was greased with bribes and his dealings with clients were marred by fraud, according to his guilty pleas on Jan. 3, 2006, in Washington and the following day in Florida. He agreed to cooperate in an ongoing FBI investigation of influence peddling.

So far, 11 others have been convicted in the Abramoff case, including three former Bush administration officials, former Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, and two of his former aides, two former aides to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas, and an aide to Rep. Don Young, R-Alaska.

-- Richard Mauer

Who's who

From 1995 to 2001, Don Young was chairman of the House Resources Committee, which had oversight of U.S. territories, including the Mariana Islands. From 2001-2007, Young chaired the House Transportation Committee.

Some 25 months of billing records from Abramoff's firms to the Mariana government list the hours worked on its behalf and who lobbyists had contacted. Key lobbyists who worked with Young and his personal and House Resources Committee staff:

FBI - Stevens-1892

Dennis Stephens (more than 50 contacts), still a lobbyist

Lisa Helpert Tucker (nearly 20 contacts), still a lobbyist.

Darrell Conner (more than 15 contacts), still a lobbyist.

Patrick Pizzella, now an assistant secretary of labor

The records show Abramoff himself, Tucker, Stephens and Conner met or spoke directly with Young. There's no way to confirm the accuracy of those records.

Key staff members contacted were:

Duane Gibson, a top official in Young's Resources and Transportation committees, who topped the list with about 35 contacts. Gibson received some notoriety during the aftermath of the 2000 election when he was photographed in the "Brooks Brothers Riot" -- a demonstration by Republican congressional staffers outside a meeting of election canvassers in Miami organized to stop a hand recount of thousands of ballots in the presidential election. After leaving Young's staff in 2002, Gibson went to work at Abramoff's firm and now has his own small firm.

Lloyd Jones, Young's chief of staff at the Interior and Transportation committees. Jones retired in January after working for Young for about a decade. He's a former Alaska state senator from Ketchikan.

Dan Kish, Young's former chief of staff.

Bill Simmons, now a lobbyist, was Young's staff director for the House Resources Subcommittee on Forests until 1999.

Kurt Christensen is now the Republican chief of staff for House Resource's Subcommittee on National Parks, Forests and Public Lands. Young is back on House Resources as its senior Republican.

-- Richard Mauer

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © Mon May 5 16:07:05 UTC-0800 20081900 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1893

NETFLIX Click here

Q&A: Don Young and the Coconut Road controversy

EARMARK: $10 million put in 2005 highway spending bill is coming back to haunt him.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

Published: April 21st, 2008 12:01 AM
Last Modified: April 21st, 2008 07:59 PM enlarge

BILL ROTH / Daily News archive 2008
Congressman Don Young held a press conference where he got testy with reporters in his Anchorage office Feb. 20, 2008.

WASHINGTON -- Last week, the U.S. Senate voted to ask the Justice Department to look into what happened in 2005 when Alaska's sole congressman earmarked $10 million in unasked-for money to study a highway interchange in southwest Florida.

Story tools
Comments
E-mail a friend
Print
Digg this
Seed Newsvine
Send link via AIM
MY YAHOO!
Font size : A | A | A

The 64 to 28 vote was an unprecedented request on the part of the Senate for a federal inquiry into the actions of a member of the House of Representatives.

At the center of it all: Alaska Rep. Don Young, who acknowledged responsibility last week for the 2005 earmark, which shifted $10 million pledged to help widen Interstate 75 to the interchange study. If built, the interchange promised to benefit one of Young's campaign donors, a family friend whose real estate company owned property nearby. The earmark was one of thousands overseen by Young when he was responsible for pushing a multiyear highway spending bill through Congress.

Young has maintained that there was nothing wrong with what he did, and that the earmark was requested by the community.

But Young is already the subject of a federal investigation, and many questions remain about how the earmark showed up in the spending bill -- after the House and Senate had already voted on an alternative proposal.

Related Stories

Records expose Young-Abramoff ties
Justice asked to probe Young earmark
Young aide's link to Abramoff sheds new light on Marianas bill

Related Links

Blog: Alaska politics
Video: Don Young talks about his legal fund (2/20/08)
More on the Don Young investigation

More Alaska News stories »

Another sentencing setback for Kohring
Groups sue to stop Chukchi exploration
Burn permits suspended in windy Mat-Su
Currency bypasses businesses in the Bush
Exotic meat market

What follows is an explanation of where the controversy came from, what's known, and what isn't:

FBI - Stevens-1894

ADVERTISEMENT

Q. How did the Coconut Road earmark come to national attention?

A. The obscure Coconut Road earmark first came to the attention of transportation planners in Lee County, Fla., in 2006, when they tried to figure out why they had received $10 million in federal money for a study of an intersection that wasn't on their list of transportation priorities.

The transportation board thought it was getting a $10 million earmark to go toward widening of Interstate 75. Instead, the money was earmarked to the study of an interchange that improves freeway access to land owned by real estate developer Daniel Aronoff.

194A-AN-13620-m;741

The community was divided over the earmark for the Coconut Road interchange. Although it wasn't on the list of priorities, some organizations, such as Florida Gulf Coast University, had been pushing for the interchange.

Local newspapers, including the Naples Daily News, picked up on the controversy, and posed the question to Young, at the time the chairman of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee. In 2005, the Alaska Republican oversaw the multiyear transportation bill, a $286.4 billion spending plan for some of the biggest infrastructure projects across the U.S. (The bill also included $452 million for the Gravina Island and Knik Arm spans that came to be known as the bridges-to-nowhere.)

Young refused to address the issue. The story failed to draw national attention until The New York Times wrote about it last spring. The article elaborated on the connections between the developers seeking the earmark and a 2005 campaign fundraiser Young attended in Bonita Springs, Fla., at the invitation of a local congressman, Rep. Connie Mack, R-Fla. (The article also reported that when a Times reporter approached Young to speak to him about it, the congressman "responded with an obscene gesture.")

Those donating money -- about $40,000 total -- to Young included Aronoff, whose family has long been friendly with Young. The earmark for the interchange study showed up not long after the fundraiser.

Q. How was the earmark put in the transportation bill?

A. It wasn't until August 2007 that anyone realized that there may have been an additional impropriety beyond Young's questionable approval of earmarks that benefited his campaign donors.

In Florida, the head of the transportation planning board asked her friend, Darla Letourneau, to research how the county landed the earmark -- and to determine whether there was a way to use the money how they wanted. Both Mack and Young had suggested it might be poor form to turn down the money, and transportation planners wanted to see if there was a way to keep the money but spend it on road widening.

Letourneau, a retired former congressional liaison to the Department of Labor in Washington, found that as the bill was being cleaned up to be sent to the president, the $10 million earmark was given a specific designation for the Coconut Road interchange. Her research showed that the bill was changed after both the House and the Senate voted on it.

The Web site Talking Points Memo took it one step beyond; researchers looked at 6,373 earmarks in the bill and found that the Coconut Road earmark was the only one that underwent any substantive changes.

Q. What was Young's role?

A. Last spring, Young called the matter "a recycled story" and wouldn't answer questions about it. But as ethics watchdogs, journalists and community activists have uncovered more information, his office has been gradually more forthcoming with the sequence of events.

Initially, they would say nothing other than that the community asked for the change in the earmark and that they made it. In December, they told the Daily News that they always intended for the earmark to go to the interchange study. Florida Gulf Coast University asked for it for hurricane evacuation in 2005 when he attended one of their community transportation meetings.

FBI - Stevens-1895

The actual changes to the earmark came during the enrollment process, when transportation committee staffers from both parties (as well as both the House and Senate) sat down with clerks to fix technical problems with the bill. One of Young's aides on the transportation committee made the change at that time.

Last week, Young's spokeswoman Meredith Kenny told the Washington Post that the bill was altered after both the House and Senate voted on it.

"There was an error in the bill and so it was corrected," Kenny told the Post.

But the change was a substantive one that Congress never voted on, and it angered watchdog groups because it was a clear deviation from regular legislative procedure. They have been calling on the House ethics panel to investigate since Letourneau discovered the post-vote change to the earmark.

Their efforts bore fruit last week when Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., a longtime critic of earmarks and wasteful spending, called for an internal investigation by a bipartisan panel of House and Senate members. The panel would help restore integrity to the legislative process by finding out exactly what happened, Coburn said. His proposal failed and the Senate voted on an alternative: a request for the Justice Department to look into criminal activity connected to the earmark change.

Alaska's two senators, Republicans Lisa Murkowski and Ted Stevens, voted for the failed Coburn proposal but not the Justice Department investigation.

Q. What role will the Justice Department have?

A. The Justice Department already has been investigating. A community activist in Florida told the Daily News last year that he had been interviewed by the FBI in 2006. Investigators wanted to know about the political connections of the people who sought the earmark.

Young has been interviewed by the Justice Department and has provided it with documents, his lawyer, John Dowd, told the Daily News. Dowd said he's advised Young not to talk about "matters under investigation." The Justice Department also requested Young not talk about them, Dowd said. The FBI and Justice have several ongoing investigations, including the wide-ranging probe into political corruption in Alaska. They haven't been forthcoming about their ongoing corruption investigations, because of the sensitive nature of investigating political figures.

But Justice also has refused to even address some of the fundamental questions raised by the Senate's call last week for an inquiry into the Coconut Road earmark. It's not clear whether the Justice Department will investigate, or whether it has the authority to look into an internal, procedural matter.

Q. What role did Florida lawmakers play?

A. Young's office has long tried to cast blame on Connie Mack, pointing to a letter he wrote in support of the Coconut Road study. But while Mack was involved in organizing the 2005 fundraiser in Florida, he was a junior congressman on Young's large House committee. Mack didn't have the authority -- or the position -- to actually change the earmark, unlike Young and the staffers he employed on the committee. While he may have asked for the change, ultimately it was Young's staffers who made it. Mack has denied any involvement but also refuses to discuss the matter.

He, as well as other Florida lawmakers (including the ranking Republican on the House Transportation committee, Rep. John Mica) asked for the earmark to go back to its original format: money for the widening of I-75. They were joined in the Senate by both Florida senators, Republican Mel Martinez and Democrat Bill Nelson. Both the senators voted for the Justice Department investigation.

The Senate's request last week for an investigation was actually attached to legislation that does away with the Coconut Road bill and allows Florida transportation planners to use the money as originally intended: for road widening.

Find Erika Bolstad online at adn.com/contact/ebolstad or call in Washington, D.C., at 1-202-383-6104.

Troubles mount for Rep. Don Young

- On Thursday, the U.S. Senate voted 64 to 28 to ask the Justice Department to investigate Young's $10 million Coconut Road earmark.
- Convicted D.C. lobbyist Jack Abramoff's staff had more than 120 contacts with Young's staff over a 25-month period, according to billing records.
- Young refuses to discuss $1.1 million in campaign funds he has spent on legal fees over the past year.

FBI - Stevens-1896

Comments

Welcome utah12. If this is not you, please log out and log in again.

Subject

Comment

Save comment

29 Sunday, April 27, 2008 - 11:59am | badmick

Dung Young Done

The tyrant dies bleeding in the sand!!Parnell, 45, shocked political observers when he announced he was seeking the Republican nomination for Youngâ€™s seat at the partyâ€™s state convention last month. Young has expressed his displeasure that he was not informed of Parnellâ€™s decision beforehand.â€œGiven the personality involved, I donâ€™t think a call would be productive,â€ he said. ...

28 Saturday, April 26, 2008 - 6:35am | Birch

Glory_To_God,

many Alaskans gave money to the Young Campaign to be used on the campaign. Now they find that he has spent the extraordinary amount of $1,100,000 on his personal legal matters. This may or may not be legal in itself, but I think that Alaskans have every right to be angry with the diversion of their money from politicking to trial lawyers. Wasn't there a parable about a man who gave his servant mon ...

read more

27 Friday, April 25, 2008 - 3:22am | travelingtweety

Prison?

Prison sounds about the right place for young to spend the rest of his life. Lets send him there with a soap on a rope so it can be used for the same things that he's done to us for years.He's a foul mouthed old fool who's time is up, and after spending over a Million Dollars of money people gave him to run for office speaks loud and clear. Sure would like to see him give me Thee Finger ...

read more

26 Tuesday, April 22, 2008 - 9:23am | wolfvorkian

The more I read about the Young affair, the more I realize why Don has spent over a million dollars on legal fees. He may end up in prison.

25 Friday, April 25, 2008 - 9:29pm | joshgold

Alaskans can do better

Alaskans deserve better than Don Young. It is unfortunate that Ted Stevens is on the same ballot as this contemptuous crook.

24 Tuesday, April 22, 2008 - 5:16am | juliaclayton

Hey Don

If I were you it would be hard for me to sleep at night. Lets see you walk around with that smug attitude of yours now. You make me feel ill everytime I see or read something about you. See ya around

23 Monday, April 21, 2008 - 9:33pm | sheenar416

Are you really suprised?.....

Public servant my ass!.....what a scum bag.

See all 29 comments

FBI - Stevens-1897

Top stories »

- Elton John concert sells out
- Another sentencing setback for Kohring
- Groups sue to stop Chukchi exploration
- Burn permits suspended in windy Mat-Su
- Currency bypasses businesses in the Bush
- Rowdy crowd forces Girdwood Forest Fair cancellation

Most read

- Rowdy crowd forces Girdwood Forest Fair cancellation
- Currency bypasses businesses in the Bush
- UAA grad overcomes huge odds to earn her diploma
- Exotic meat market
- Elton John concert sells out

Most e-mailed

- City cleanup week produces glut of garbage
- Web site flap KOs Metcalfe adviser
- Juneau road
- East High student hit by car after school
- Polar bear wasn't only strange beast seen in Fort Yukon

Most-viewed galleries

- Elton John concert sells out
- 2008 Prom
- Tattoos
- Cat shots
- Exotic meat market

Kohring retrial denied

By Andrew Wellner
Frontiersman

MAT-SU â€" A federal district court judge in Anchorage has denied Vic Kohringâ€™s motion asking the judge to recuse himself and for Kohring to receive a new trial. The former longtime Mat-Su Valley state legislator was convicted in late 2007 on charges of bribery, corruption and attempted extortion.

Kohring will be sentenced 9:30 a.m. Thursday, May 8 in Anchorage.

Kohring was a sitting state representative from Wasilla when he was indicted on federal charges relating to money he received from former officials from oil field services company VECO at the time the state was considering revising petroleum taxes.

In early February, his lawyer, Seattle-based John Henry Browne, argued Kohring should receive a new trial and claimed Judge John Sedwick was biased against him. In a 29-page decision, Sedwick, in essence, ruled Monday that Kohringâ€™s motions were filed late and, even if they werenâ€™t, are baseless.

Kohring had argued that though he realized seven to 10 days after his trial that the judge may have been biased, he needed time to research voting records and talk to lawyers and judges before taking such a drastic step as challenging Sedwickâ€™s impartiality. As such, Browne wrote on Kohringâ€™s behalf, the motion came more than two months after the former lawmakerâ€™s conviction.

Sedwick didnâ€™t buy it.

â€œKohring has failed to establish that he filed the motion within a reasonable time after discovering the facts that he now asserts give rise to the appearance of a lack of impartiality,â€ the judge says in his ruling.

One of the contentions Kohring raised was that Sedwick lives catty-corner to Bill Allen, the former CEO of VECO who admitted to bribing Kohring and testified at his trial. He also argued Sedwick went to high school with Rick Smith, another VECO executive who also testified against Kohring.

Sedwickâ€™s ruling says Kohringâ€™s claims donâ€™t stand up and that case law seems to indicate mere acquaintance with a witness is not enough to force a judge to recuse himself.

The other part of Kohringâ€™s argument involves Sedwickâ€™s wife, Deborah Sedwick. In 1997 and 1998, during Kohringâ€™s time as a legislator, he pushed changes to the state Department of Commerce that, Kohring argued, merged her department with another and eliminated her position.

Sedwick rules on each piece of evidence Kohring argues shows he butted heads with Deborah Sedwick. In each instance, Sedwick rules the relationship between his wife and Kohring, far from being uncivil, demonstrated an ability on the part of both parties to disagree on political issues without taking it personally.

â€œEven if one could somehow assume that Ms. Sedwick harbored some personal antagonism or hostility during the 1997-99 period, there is no basis upon which an informed and thoughtful person could possibly conclude that the ill-will was so pervasive and deep-seated that it has lived on for nearly a decade,â€ Sedwick says in his ruling.

Young's legal fees surpass $1 million

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
The Anchorage Daily News

April 16, 2008

WASHINGTON – [Alaska] U.S. Rep. Don Young has spent more than $1.1 million on lawyers who have helped fend off Justice Department investigations, according to a campaign spending report filed Tuesday with the Federal Election Commission.

Young crossed the million-dollar threshold earlier this year, when his campaign wrote checks for $93,725 and $119,004 in legal fees to Washington, D.C., law firm Akin Gump Strauss Hauer and Feld.

Young paid the legal bills from his campaign account even after he established a separate legal expense fund this winter to help pay for lawyers. He has until April 30 to disclose the activity in that account.

Young, a Republican who has held office since 1973, still won't say why he spends so much on lawyers or exactly what they are doing for him. Young, who held a combative news conference in February, said he wished he could speak his mind. He can't, he said in a statement released Tuesday, because "both the Department of Justice and my lawyers have asked that I not comment further on the investigation. I MUST honor this request," using capital letters for emphasis.

"Many people have been concerned about my legal fees and I do not take their concerns lightly," he added. "I have learned that the legal process is an expensive process, but I have nothing to hide. When it comes to my family and my character, the truth is priceless. That is exactly why I hired good legal counsel, and I have worked fully with the Department of Justice by answering their questions and providing them with anything they have requested."

Young has not been charged with any wrongdoing, but he is connected to several ongoing investigations. They include an FBI probe into his ties to a Florida developer who held a fundraiser for Young in 2005 and then landed an earmark in the highway bill the congressman was shepherding through Congress when he chaired the House Transportation committee. The $10 million earmark, originally slated for the widening of Interstate 75, was shifted toward a study of an interchange instead.

The FBI interviewed community activists who said they felt an interchange at Coconut Road and I-75 would allow the development of environmentally sensitive land owned by Daniel Aronoff, a developer who organized the March 2005 fundraiser in Bonita Springs, Fla.

Like other Alaska politicians, Young also has ties to the wide-ranging federal corruption probe into fundraising practices by the former oil-services company Veco and its chief executive, Bill Allen.

Allen, a major political fundraiser, pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers and has been a witness in the ongoing corruption investigation. Until this year, Allen and Veco executives were Young's largest source of campaign contributions.

Young also has had several connections to lobbyist Jack Abramoff, now serving a federal sentence and assisting the FBI and a team of federal prosecutors in an ongoing investigation of influence peddling in Washington.

Young has not been identified as a subject of the investigation, but one of his top Transportation committee aides, former Alaskan Mark Zachares, pleaded guilty last year to conspiring with Abramoff by taking cash and expensive gifts and helping his clients get projects. Zachares, who's also cooperating with prosecutors, was placed in his job by Abramoff, according to his plea. Young has refused to publicly explain how that happened.

DETERMINING PRIVILEGE

Young's lead attorney, Washington defense counsel John Dowd, did not return calls Tuesday. Young's campaign spokesman, Mike Anderson, said that the bulk of the legal expenses has been for lawyers who are reviewing Young's congressional papers to determine whether they are privileged under the separation of powers doctrine, or whether they must be turned over to federal investigators. The Constitution protects some activities of Congress from executive branch officials like FBI agents or U.S. attorneys, though the privilege is not absolute.

Legal expenses have continued to eat away at Young's campaign coffers, even as challengers have filed to run against him. He faces two Republicans in the August 26 primary: state Rep. Gabrielle LeDoux and Lt. Gov. Sean Parnell. Neither candidate has raised as much money as Young, but his once-healthy campaign account has dwindled down to $604,268, with more money going out than coming in.

If Young prevails in the primary, he'll face one of three Democrats in the race. The leading fundraiser, former state House Minority Leader Ethan Berkowitz, raised twice as much money as Young. With $287,306 in the bank, Berkowitz continues to gain on Young.

Young's most recent campaign finance report shows that of the $252,293 he spent on legal bills, $212,752 went to Akin Gump. Young paid another $24,520 to another Washington firm, Tobin O'Connor & Ewing. He also paid $15,020 to John Wolfe of Seattle, a criminal defense attorney who has represented Ben Stevens, the son of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, in the federal corruption probe in Alaska.

Lawmakers are allowed to spend campaign donations on legal expenses as long as they're connected to their role as officeholders.

Young's separate legal expense fund allows supporters to give up to $5,000 in addition to the $4,600 that individuals also can donate to his campaign. Unlike an election campaign, though, lobbyists are barred from contributing to the legal expense fund. He can accept money from corporations, which cannot donate money directly to campaigns.

REIMBURSING BILL ALLEN

The latest report has an unusual reference to an effort by Young to reimburse old fundraising expenses paid by Veco on his behalf.

According to Anderson, who is also Young's chief of staff, the campaign decided to take a close look at past fundraising expenses after the 2006 election. One reason for the self-examination was the defeat in California of one of Young's closest Republican colleagues in the House, Richard Pombo. Anderson said Pombo was weakened by third-party attacks and Young's campaign officials wanted to guard against Young being similarly vulnerable in 2008.

In reviewing the campaign's expenses for 2006, they discovered they weren't properly billed by Veco for its annual pig roast on Young's behalf, Anderson said. With that discovery, campaign officials looked back several more years -- he didn't know how many -- and determined that Veco or Allen needed to be reimbursed $37,626. A check was sent to Bill Allen in January 2007, the campaign reported.

Anderson said the audit and the reimbursement occurred months before it was known that Allen was cooperating with federal investigators. Allen and Veco vice president Rick Smith pleaded guilty in May 2007, more than eight months after they secretly began working for the FBI.

Young's most recent report said that Allen never cashed the reimbursement check. This January, the campaign gave the money instead to the U.S. Treasury.

Young's legal fees

2007

1st quarter $25,000

2nd quarter $177,886

3rd quarter $245,457

4th quarter $423,672

2008

1st quarter $252,293

Total $1,124,308

FBI - Stevens-1900

Source: Young's reports to Federal Elections Commission

Reporter Richard Mauer contributed to this report. Find Erika Bolstad online at adn.com/contact/ebolstad or call in Washington, D.C., at 202-383-6104.

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page | Close Window

Air it out

Young welcomes investigation; so do his constituents

(04/20/08 22:48:32)

Last week the U.S. Senate voted to ask the Justice Department to investigate the $10 million Florida interchange earmark inserted into the 2005 highway bill by Rep. Don Young's staff.

That earmark changed the nature of the appropriation. Florida transportation officials had sought money to widen a stretch of Interstate 75, not build an interchange at I-75 and Coconut Road. The interchange appeared to benefit Young campaign contributors.

Investigate? The sooner the better.

There's question about whether the Senate should be voting to ask the Justice Department to do what it may be doing already. Rep. Young has spent more than $1 million in legal fees but has not been charged with anything or even named as the subject of any federal investigation. Federal investigators have interviewed people in Florida who raised questions about the political connections of those involved in the change of the road money appropriation.

Sen. Tom Coburn has proposed a bipartisan congressional investigation of the Young earmark. He said the Senate vote might be unconstitutional. Congress, he said, should police its own members on ethics and procedural rules.

Sen. Harry Reid said the Young earmark is an example of corruption in Congress.

The Senate vote was not just a party-line split. The 64 in favor in favor of a Justice Department investigation included 20 Republicans.

As near as we can tell, there are separate issues here.

• Young's staff apparently changed the earmark to reflect what Young called the wishes of the community in Lee County, Fla. But the change was made after the House and Senate had voted on the bill. Young's staff called it a technical fix. Many of Young's colleagues don't buy it. Did Young violate congressional rules with the after-the-vote fix? That's a matter for Congress to settle.

• Florida road planners said they didn't ask for the change. Florida Gulf Coast University, Young donors and a lobbyist for both the university and Florida developer Daniel Aronoff did seek the change; the lobbyist, Aronoff and others contributed more than $40,000 to Young's campaign, both before and after the change was made.

The questions Alaskans want answered are simple: Did campaign contributions buy a fix for special interests in the transportation bill? Was the claim of "technical change" cover for such a fix? Did Young violate any ethics rules or federal laws?

Whether it's the Justice Department or a bipartisan congressional committee, this earmark and Young's role in it need a thorough investigation, with the power of subpoena.

FBI - Stevens-1901

194A-AN-13620-m;745

More than $1 million in legal bills and what looks like an unprecedented Senate call for the investigation of a House member do not bode well for Rep. Young.

Young's office says he welcomes an investigation of the earmark. He should, because the Coconut Road earmark issue isn't going away until it's resolved.

BOTTOM LINE: Alaskans deserve a thorough inquiry into their congressman's Florida work.

He's late

President warms just a little to action on climate change

If global warming is happening as slowly as the president's response to it, we've got nothing to worry about.

Last week, President Bush made what was billed as a bold Rose Garden speech on his long-range vision for cutting carbon emissions and slowing climate change. He wants to stop the growth in U.S. carbon emissions by 2025, consolidate incentives for cleaner energy production and use, ensure global cooperation, especially with China and India, and encourage technological breakthroughs.

Given the Bush track record of the last seven years, it's hard to take such proposals seriously.

The administration argues that radical short-term fixes are both ineffective in slowing climate change and harmful to the U.S. economy. This view has climate change as a long-term problem requiring long-term solutions.

Some of what the president and his advisers said makes sense. Yes, we should consider the economic impacts and weigh them against actions to alleviate global warming. Wisdom may argue against doctrinaire refusals to consider alternatives like nuclear energy. And China and India need to be part of the solution.

But there's little sense of urgency in the White House approach, no real specifics. This is a view of global warming that says we've got time. Let's talk awhile.

Is this the current generation's World War II? It's a popular notion among some of the most passionate prophets of apocalyptic change, and recently made the cover of Time magazine. Still, the analogy seems forced.

So did the president's Rose Garden speech. The president's proposals boil down to faith in market forces and Yankee ingenuity. Both will play a role in dealing with climate change. The Bush administration has not, and won't.

Print Page | Close Window

FBI - Stevens-1902

Copyright © Mon May 5 15:56:28 UTC-0800 20081900 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

Automated Serial Permanent Charge-Out
FD-5a (1-5-94)

Date: 05/15/08 Time: 20:58

Case ID: 194A-AN-13620-M Serial: 744

Description of Document:

Type : NEWSPAPE
Date : 04/20/08
To : ANCHORAGE
From : ANCHORAGE DAILY NEWS
Topic: LETTERS TO THE EDITOR (4/21/08)

Reason for Permanent Charge-Out:

not appropriate for the file

Employee: [redacted]

b6
b7C

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Justice asked to probe Young earmark

COCONUT ROAD: Circumstances of $10 million change questioned.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(04/18/08 00:38:37)

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. Senate on Thursday took the unusual step of asking the Justice Department to investigate Rep. Don Young's Coconut Road earmark.

The Senate's 64-28 vote calls on the Justice Department to look into the circumstances surrounding the 2005 earmark, which shifted $10 million from a road widening project in southwest Florida to a study of an interchange that promised to benefit one of Young's campaign donors.

Young has frequently made national news in his 35 years in office, but it is uncommon for any rank-and-file member of the House of Representatives to be the center of attention and discussion in the Senate. The Senate historian's office could recall no example Thursday of the Senate ever asking the Justice Department to look into possible criminal conduct by a House member.

But the 2005 earmark by an Alaska congressman for a southwest Florida road has, as Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said, spotlighted "the corruption that permeated the Congress in recent years."

"If violations of federal criminal law occurred, it is the province of the Justice Department and the FBI to investigate and prosecute them," Reid said on the Senate floor.

Justice Department officials would not comment on Thursday's Senate vote. They also have repeatedly refused to comment on any ongoing investigation in Florida, where FBI agents have interviewed community activists who raised questions about the political connections of the people who benefited from the earmark.

EARMARK CAME AS A SURPRISE

The Coconut Road earmark was in the $286.4 billion highway bill that Young oversaw in 2005 as the influential Republican chairman of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee. An aide made the change to the legislation after the House and Senate had already voted on the bill, a secret move that has angered other members of Congress and that, ultimately, led to Thursday's call for an investigation.

Young has said since last summer that the community asked for the change and that when one of his staffers made it during the bill enrollment process, they considered it a technical fix that mirrored what people in Florida wanted. His office wouldn't comment Thursday on the Senate vote, but has said for the past week that Young welcomes scrutiny of how the earmark was changed.

"It's a matter of the process, not the member," Young's spokeswoman, Meredith Kenny, said earlier this week. "None of this could have happened just at the hand of Congressman Young."

FBI - Stevens-1904

194A-AN-13620-M;746

Thursday's vote for a Justice Department investigation was actually an amendment to a bill that corrects a number of technical problems in the original 2005 bill -- including reversing Young's Coconut Road earmark.

ROAD PLANNERS RAISE QUESTIONS

The $10 million earmark, originally for the widening of Interstate 75 in Lee County, Fla., was shifted toward a study of an interchange instead.

The FBI has interviewed community activists who said they felt an interchange at Coconut Road and I-75 would allow the development of environmentally sensitive land owned by Florida developer Daniel Aronoff.

But federal investigators didn't start looking into the matter until local road planners started questioning why they had received an unasked-for earmark to study something that wasn't one of their transportation priorities. They'd originally asked for the $10 million to widen the interstate.

Other community interests were pushing for the interchange, including nearby Florida Gulf Coast University. The school asked for the Coconut Road study when Young attended one of their community transportation meetings with a local congressman, Rep. Connie Mack, R-Fla.

Young's chief of staff, Mike Anderson, has said previously that school officials wanted it to serve as a demonstration project for a sophisticated transportation hub that could be monitored with cameras during hurricane evacuations. "It's captured in three words: Hurricane evacuation route," Anderson told McClatchy Newspapers in August.

Yet in the weeks before and after the earmark was inserted in the spending bill, Young's campaign and his political action committee collected contributions from Aronoff, his lobbyist and a number of business interests. Those donations totaled more than $40,000.

Contributors included Rick Alcalde, a Young campaign donor who worked on behalf of Aronoff's real estate firm, the Landon Companies. Alcalde also worked as a lobbyist for Florida Gulf Coast University.

Lobbying disclosure forms show that in 2005, the Landon Companies paid Alcalde $80,000 specifically to lobby on Young's highway bill. In 2006, the university paid him $40,000 to lobby on a transportation appropriations bill.

FBI - Stevens-1905

ALASKA SENATORS VOTE AGAINST

The fundraiser was one of many Young attended nationwide as chairman of the transportation committee, where he was the final say on what highway projects got approved across America.

Eventually, the original earmark was changed, but after the House and Senate had both voted on it. An enrollment clerk, working with staffers on Young's committee, erased "I-75" and added the words "Coconut Road" as the massive spending bill was being cleaned up to be sent to President Bush for signing.

Thursday, support for the Justice Department investigation, sponsored by Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., drew an unlikely coalition of Democrats and Republicans, many of whom said they were concerned about the integrity of their legislative process. Twenty of the votes of support came from Republicans, including Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., the Senate minority leader.

House leaders had a muted response to the Senate vote, but indicated they were concerned about what had happened. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said Thursday that the matter should be taken up by the House ethics committee. The Republican House leader, Rep. John Boehner, said he also had no objections to an investigation.

"Mr. Young's office has welcomed any inquiry or examination of the earmark, and I would support that as well," Boehner said. "I think it's in everyone's interest that we know what happened and did not happen here."

Both of Alaska's senators voted against the Justice Department investigation, with Republican Sen. Ted Stevens calling it a "dangerous precedent." But both he and Sen. Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, did vote for an alternative proposal posed by Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla.

Coburn, who opposes earmarks and has been critical of the Alaska delegation, had asked for a bipartisan House and Senate committee to investigate the earmark. It would then refer its findings to the proper authorities. His proposal had 49 supporters, but needed 60 votes for approval.

Later, Coburn said he feared that the Senate's vote Thursday was unconstitutional. Congress can't order a criminal investigation any more than the Justice Department can investigate violations of congressional rules, Coburn said. It violates the Speech and Debate clause of the Constitution, which keeps investigators from using legislative materials as evidence of wrongdoing in criminal investigations.

"Violating congressional rules is not a crime, yet Congress has just given away its right to police itself with this misguided amendment," Coburn said.

His concerns were echoed by congressional budget and ethics watchdog groups, who say they worry that a criminal investigation won't get at the heart of what is essentially a procedural problem.

Find Erika Bolstad online at adn.com/contact/ebolstad.

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © Mon May 5 15:54:43 UTC-0800 20081900 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1906

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Judge dismisses Kohring's bias claim, sets sentencing date

SENTENCING SET: Judge says no evidence backs allegation he was prejudiced against ex-lawmaker.

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com

(04/15/08 00:02:21)

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick on Monday rejected former state Rep. Vic Kohring's accusations of bias and set sentencing for May 8 for the former lawmaker's convictions on bribery, conspiracy and attempted extortion.

Kohring's lawyer, John Henry Browne of Seattle, said they will take the matter to the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals.

In February, three months after a jury convicted him, Kohring asked that the case be thrown out or, at the least, for a new trial with a different judge.

Kohring asked Sedwick to step aside because of what he called an "extremely antagonistic relationship" Kohring had with the judge's wife, Deborah Sedwick. It started back in the late 1990s when she was commissioner of the state Department of Commerce and Economic Development and Kohring targeted her department for cuts and downsizing.

Kohring said he sponsored legislation that eliminated her department and her job as commissioner.

In truth, the judge noted, the legislation led to the merger of two state departments, and Deborah Sedwick ended up as commissioner of a revamped and enlarged agency. Her pay went up, not down, over the years, according to state officials.

In his 29-page order, Sedwick wrote that "certain allegations made by Kohring are either inaccurate, misleading, or conclusions without any evidentiary support."

While Kohring's legislation could have led to the demotion of Deborah Sedwick from commissioner to division director, "there is no evidence, direct or indirect, from which it may logically be inferred that it was directed at Ms. Sedwick personally or that she considered that as being its purpose," the judge wrote.

Kohring sought a hearing to air his complaints of bias under what Sedwick called "the novel theory that he has a constitutional right to confront and cross-examine the judge." There's no requirement for a hearing and no need for one, Sedwick said.

Beyond that, Kohring's motion was brought too late, Sedwick wrote. Kohring sought a new trial Feb. 1, three months after his conviction.

Kohring argued that he made the connection between Judge Sedwick and former Commissioner Sedwick only after she showed up for closing arguments in his trial. In court papers, Browne added that the defense needed to "confer with colleagues, friends, legal scholars and even federal judges," all of whom said Sedwick should step down.

"It is literally amazing to contemplate the assertion that one or more federal judges actually did offer Mr. Browne the gratuitous opinion that another federal judge should have recused himself in a pending case in which Mr. Browne was appearing," Sedwick wrote.

Kohring raised three questions: the "combative" relationship between Kohring and Deborah Sedwick between 1997 and 1999; the fact the Sedwicks are neighbors of government witness Bill Allen; and the fact that Sedwick went to high school -- more than 40 years ago -- with another government witness, Rick Smith. Kohring was convicted of conspiring with Allen and Smith to push through an oil tax rate sought by North Slope producers.

Sedwick said that no reasonable person would think a judge was biased just because he lived in the same neighborhood as a witness or went to high school with one. In fact, he authorized wiretaps of Allen and Smith's phones, and the resulting evidence ultimately led to their guilty pleas, the judge wrote.

In a brief telephone interview Monday, Browne said he wasn't convinced the judge could be impartial about a neighbor. "It's just kind of classic Alaska good ol' boy stuff going on."

Browne said he remains concerned about the appearance of a conflict involving the judge and that he will appeal on that and other grounds.

"It's a very unusual situation because the judge is ruling on his own credibility," Browne said.

As to the relationship between Kohring and the judge's wife, Sedwick said there are two questions. First, was there real animosity? And second, would a reasonable person think the judge would remain aware of it to the point he could not be impartial all these years later.

"The court concludes that given all the circumstances, no fully informed, thoughtful person would see the situation for anything other than this: Ten years ago, Kohring and Ms. Sedwick held different views of what was in the public interest with respect to the budgeting for and operation of certain state departments," the judge wrote. "Objectively viewed, there was no personal animosity, but rather a difference of political opinion."

Even if his wife had some hostility back then, no reasonable person would think the ill will so deep-seated that it could live on for a decade, Sedwick wrote.

Prosecutors have asked Sedwick to send Kohring to prison for five years. Browne has not yet filed his recommendation.

Kohring, a Republican from Wasilla, was elected seven times but resigned before his trial.

FBI - Stevens-1908

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

Print Page Close Window

Copyright © Mon May 5 15:53:50 UTC-0800 20081900 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Investigation of road earmark sought

FLORIDA HIGHWAY: Staff member says Young won't object.

By GREG GORDON
McClatchy Newspapers

(04/11/08 00:39:42)

WASHINGTON -- An Oklahoma senator plans to propose legislation next week that would force a special congressional investigation to find out who set aside $10 million in a 2005 transportation bill after it won final House and Senate passage. The money was to study a possible highway interchange in southwest Florida.

Such an investigation almost certainly would focus on veteran Alaska Republican Rep. Don Young, who was chairman of the House Transportation Committee when the unusually late substantive revision was made in the summer of 1995.

Months earlier, Young collected more than $40,000 at a fundraiser in Bonita Springs, Fla., much of it from Florida real estate developer Daniel Aronoff and others seeking the interchange at a nearby site along Interstate 75.

McClatchy Newspapers reported last year that the FBI was looking at Young's role in redirecting the $10 million as part of investigations into his earmarking practices and his relationship with an Alaska oil services company.

Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., vowed in December to block unanimous passage of a routine bill updating the transportation legislation unless the Senate agreed to an investigation. His plan to introduce a formal amendment signals a more determined push.

Coburn's spokesman, John Hart, said that both Florida senators -- Democrat Bill Nelson and Republican Mel Martinez -- are co-sponsoring the amendment, a copy of which was obtained by McClatchy. It calls for creation of an eight-member select committee appointed by House and Senate leaders of both parties, to "determine when, how, why and by whom such improper revisions (to the bill) were made."

The panel would have subpoena power to compel the appearance of key witnesses and obtain documents. The committee would be required to issue an interim report by Aug. 1 and a final report by Oct. 1.

FBI - Stevens-1909

Meredith Kenny, a spokeswoman for Young, said the congressman "has always supported and welcomed an open earmark process."

"If Congress decides to take up the matter of this particular project," she said, "there will be no objection from Mr. Young. "

The Coconut Road episode has upset many members of Congress because the change was made after final passage, when only nonsubstantive, technical corrections were permitted. Until the change, the $10 million had been allotted for widening a portion of I-75.

194A-AN-13620-M; 748

Hart said Coburn plans to introduce the amendment by Monday and is confident the full Senate will get to vote "on the substance of the provision."

Hart called it "a brazen attack against the integrity of every member of Congress" and "an unprecedented abuse of power" to change the measure between its final passage and the president's desk.

Steve Ellis, vice president of Taxpayers for Common Sense, a watchdog group that helped uncover the earmark, praised the amendment.

"This gimmick, this power play to shift the language, had real consequences," he said. "The community down there has been waiting two years to get their $10 million to actually widen I-75 because of this whole long, drawn-out fight over the interchange at Coconut Road."

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © Mon May 5 15:50:17 UTC-0800 20081900 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1910

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page | Close Window

Kid care

Legislature can still boost children's health insurance

(04/09/08 23:39:38)

The Senate Finance Committee breathed some life this week into a bill that would expand the state's health care insurance program for low-income children and pregnant women.

The committee finally moved the bill along to the next step.

That's good news, though it will be a stretch to get the bill passed by both houses of the Legislature before adjournment, scheduled Sunday.

Some legislators are reluctant to support the bill because they fear the state won't be able to afford children's health insurance at the increased level at some time in the future.

That would be understandable if Alaska provided children's health insurance at a reasonable level.

It doesn't. Our health insurance program is one of the most stringent in the country. A state as flush as ours should take better care of its children.

Congress created this joint federal-state program to insure children in families with too much income to qualify for Medicaid and too little income to be able to purchase their own private insurance.

In Alaska, the program covers children in families with earnings at 175 percent of the federal poverty level.

Forty-one states include families with earnings at twice the federal poverty level, an aide to Sen. Bettye Davis told the Senate Finance Committee. Davis's bill, which the committee moved out Tuesday, would raise Alaska to the 200 percent level, too.

Angela Liston of Anchorage was one of less than a dozen people testifying at the committee hearing.

"Frankly, as an Alaska resident, it's sort of an embarrassment that Alaska, one of the wealthiest states, has one of the lowest levels of children's health care," she said.

The economic argument against expanding the program is even weaker when you consider that the federal government pays 70 percent of the costs.

It's true that some time in the future, Alaska will likely have to cut back on spending. At that point, the level of children's health insurance will have to be weighed against every other state program.

But that's no reason to deny children who need health care today. We've got the money. We've got no excuses.

FBI - Stevens-1911

194A-AN-13620-M;749

BOTTOM LINE: This bill will extend health insurance to more low-income children. It's a no-brainer.

Initiatives

Let's make it easier to follow the money, consider the source

Whether writing new law is the work of citizens or legislators, we do a better job of it in the light of disclosure.

That's why most of House Bill 355, the Open and Transparent Initiative Act, is a good idea.

The bill, sponsored by Rep. Kyle Johansen of Ketchikan, would require initiative committees to disclose, right from the start, names of contributors and publish that information online. Anyone donating more than $500 would have to file a separate report on their donation as well. Current law requires disclosure only after the initiative backers have finished gathering signatures. This bill would let voters know before they signed a petition who was backing it.

That kind of information is as important to a fair and open initiative process as it is in any election. The more information we have about who is behind an initiative and why, the better we can judge an initiative's purpose, intent and what, if any, special interests it may serve. And the sooner we know, the better.

The initiative process is a valuable right, guaranteed in the Alaska Constitution. Through it, citizens can work their will when their elected representatives will not.

The bar for success is high, as it should be. Only after a proposed initiative passes legal review and certification by the state can backers then set out to gain signatures. They need to collect registered voters' signatures equal to 10 percent of the vote in the last general election -- currently 23,831. In addition, those signatures must include seven percent of the vote in the last general election from at least 30 of the state's 40 House districts. No exclusive cherry-picking for signatures in the population centers like Anchorage.

That high bar can be expensive to reach. The law allows sponsors to pay signature-gatherers up to $1 a name. Alaskans should be able to know who's paying those bills, or any other expenses involved in an initiative campaign, whether for or against, from the first signature to the morning of the election.

We'd strike one section of the bill, which sets well-meaning but vague guidelines for what a committee can name itself. An initiative committee's name should reflect what an initiative would do. Backers shouldn't be allowed to blow smoke with a bogus name that might win the support of voters who don't read the fine print.

But we'd rather let the political marketplace sort that out than give state employees control over the process. Critics will swiftly point out deceptions. The bill should stick to its prime purpose of disclosure. Then voters can follow the money and draw their own conclusions about whether an initiative committee's name fits.

There's an old line that likens making law to making sausage, and says don't look too closely. Don't buy it. Alaskans need to know how the sausage is made and who's making it.

BOTTOM LINE: Open up the initiative process to more disclosure of financial backers.

FBI - Stevens-1912

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © Mon May 5 15:48:12 UTC-0800 20081900 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1913

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Legislators try to dampen gambling initiative

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT: Judiciary chairman wants issue to go to voters in November.

By SEAN COCKERHAM
scockerham@adn.com

(04/10/08 00:02:36)

State legislators are moving toward changing the state constitution to demand a public vote before any gambling for profit can be legalized in Alaska.

The idea is to blunt an initiative that's set to appear on the August statewide ballot. The initiative would create a commission with the power to authorize gambling -- from lotteries to casino games -- without the Legislature's approval.

The state House voted 33-6 in favor of the constitutional amendment this week. It goes to the Senate, where Judiciary Committee Chairman Hollis French thinks it has a real shot at passing even with just four days left in the legislative session.

If the Senate does pass the constitutional amendment in time and the governor signs it, the idea would go to voters for approval in the November election. That's presumably before the gaming commission could get set up and act.

"I want this to go into the constitution, that people will always have a say," said Anchorage Democratic Rep. Harry Crawford, a longtime foe of expanding gambling who sponsored the measure with Eagle River Republican Rep. Nancy Dahlstrom.

Currently, it is up to the Legislature to decide whether to allow gambling beyond the limited number of pull-tabs, bingo, ice classics, pools, raffles and the like that are now legal to benefit nonprofits. Recent years have seen fights in the Legislature over whether to expand what's allowed to include video poker, a casino, lotteries or card rooms. In the end, the Legislature refused to do so.

That's when people associated with the bar and restaurant industry trade group CHARR produced the initiative for an Alaska Gaming Commission. CHARR members had lobbied for the legalization of video gambling machines in bars and clubs.

The proposed commission would regulate existing gaming in Alaska, which is now overseen by the state Department of Revenue. It would also have the power to expand gambling.

FBI - Stevens-1914

WILL OF THE PEOPLE

Darwin Biwer, owner of the Anchorage bar Darwin's Theory, said initiative backers collected more than 50,000 signatures while getting the measure on the August ballot. He said Anchorage Rep. Crawford's constitutional amendment is an attempt to thwart the will of the voters to decide by initiative.

"It's kind of embarrassing to even do such a thing," Biwer said.

194A-AN-13620-M; 750

He said the Legislature is out of touch with the public on gambling issues and listens to a vocal minority. He said polls show, for example, that Alaskans want a lottery.

"Everybody wants a lottery; it's stupid not have one," he said.

Biwer said the commission would strengthen monitoring and enforcement of gaming.

CAN IT PASS?

Crawford said initiative backers misleadingly sold the initiative as a move for greater regulation rather than a tool for expanded gambling. Biwer said the initiative language is clear about what the commission would have the power to do.

The initiative says the commission is meant to generate revenue for the state and regulate gaming activities. The five voting commissioners are to be appointed by the governor and confirmed by the Legislature to five-year terms.

Crawford said the commission would have too much power. His proposed constitutional amendment would forbid for-profit gambling without both a statewide vote and a vote in whatever community where the gambling would happen.

Crawford is confident his proposal would get the necessary two-thirds vote to pass the Legislature if it reaches the Senate floor. But he said the question is if it will be held up in committee in the frantic final days of the legislative session.

The measure is likely to go first to the Senate Judiciary Committee. French, the chairman, supports HJR 2 and thinks it "probably does" have legs in the Senate.

French noted it was the Senate in recent years that killed proposals passed by the House to legalize card rooms and potentially allow a casino to be built in Anchorage.

Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him at 257-4344.

Print Page Close Window

Copyright © Mon May 5 15:47:03 UTC-0800 20081900 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1915

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

E-mails may violate ethics code

STEVENS AND SHEFFIELD: Exchange included an offer for a Senate race fundraiser.

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com

(04/08/08 00:04:13)

An intriguing e-mail exchange between U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens and Port of Anchorage director Bill Sheffield caused an instant flap Monday, with Mayor Mark Begich directing that it be investigated as a possible violation of the city's new ethics code.

In the e-mail chain, 16 months old but just being publicized, Alaska's senior senator and former governor chat about Christmas, sharing drinks and a campaign fundraiser for Stevens to be hosted by Sheffield.

Sheffield was using his city e-mail account when he offered to "hold a FR at my house." He said Monday that could have stood for "a footrace or a fun rally or whatever" but acknowledged they were talking about a fundraiser.

"It was probably a mistake," Sheffield said by cell phone from Juneau, where he is trying to secure state funding for a proposed $700 million port expansion. He said he has hosted fundraisers for Stevens for years, starting long before he became port director.

Stevens said in a statement that he is careful not to use public resources in campaigning. He was using a BlackBerry with e-mail paid for by his campaign, as he has for years, according to campaign spokesman Tim McKeever. The address at issue -- no longer active -- was teds8042@bbi.senate.gov.

"There was no misuse of federal resources in this situation," Stevens said in a statement.

The six e-mails in the string were among nearly 1,000 pages of docu- ments obtained in November 2007 by the Alaska Public Interest Research Group through a public records request to the port.

The documents included hundreds of other e-mails, but those in the string from November 2006 were the only ones about political campaigning, said AkPIRG executive director Steve Cleary. He publicized the chain Monday as he sent in a new request for any e-mails between Sheffield and the congressional delegation, staff members, legislators or candidates that relate in any way to election campaign activity, including fundraising.

FBI - Stevens-1916

E-MAILS WERE A SURPRISE

The public interest group sought the port expansion records because of concerns about the size and cost of the project.

It was surprising that the e-mails on fundraising and Christmas were included given that Stevens and Sheffield didn't even discuss the port, Cleary said. The original request sought, among other things, communications with members of Congress or their staffs on the port.

"AkPIRG believes that public officials whether elected or appointed shouldn't be using public time or public resources to engage in election campaign activity," Cleary said. "You are supposed to be doing your job, not engaging in ... political activity of any kind."

The e-mails at issue were sent just a few months after the federal investigation into Alaska political corruption burst into public view. Offices of six legislators, including Stevens' son, then-Senate President Ben Stevens, were searched by the FBI in August 2006. But Ted Stevens would not be caught in the glare until July 2007, when the FBI searched his Girdwood home.

Neither Stevens has been charged with a crime, and the investigation is ongoing. So far, three former legislators, a lobbyist, a top aide to former Gov. Frank Murkowski, and two former executives of the defunct oil field services company Veco have been convicted of various corruption charges. A fourth former lawmaker is awaiting trial.

On Nov. 16, 2006, Ted Stevens wrote to Sheffield about the upcoming campaign.

"It's going to be a long, hard trail, probably the toughest one I've faced, but there are still issues here that I do believe I can deal with better than the next person," Stevens e-mailed. "We'll be home for Christmas-hope you and I can talk about some of these problems over a glass."

The next evening, Sheffield e-mailed back and invited Stevens over for dinner or a drink on Christmas Day.

"Other wise see you in Girdwood at your convenience. You may want a FR this year. Let me know."

A delighted Stevens wrote back right away.

"Bill: you're on! Will do it and I will welcome an FR at your place. It feels good to start to gear up for the race! Thanks.T."

CITY E-MAIL ACCOUNT

The conversation next picks up on Nov. 28. Sheffield says people will start coming at 3 p.m. on Christmas with dinner at 4.

Also: "Received your letter regarding request for early money. Will gather up a few checks and hold a FR at my house as well," Sheffield wrote.

In his reply, Stevens said they'd come early because of a planned dinner "with all the gang" including "Ellie," whom he called the grand dame of "our total family." He was referring to Elladean Bittner, mother of his wife, Catherine, said McKeever.

"This will be a tough election if the war isn't over abd (typo) that doesn't look too good now!" Stevens wrote.

On Monday, Cleary sent the exchange to Begich, the city attorney and news reporters. He referenced the city code prohibiting municipal employees from campaigning while on duty.

Begich then referred the matter to deputy municipal attorney Rhonda Westover -- the city's senior ethics officer -- for investigation. She'll decide whether it needs to go to the Ethics Board, which makes recommendations.

Begich, like Sheffield, is a Democrat. He is seriously considering running against Stevens.

So far, the port expansion project has received $109 million in federal earmarks.

Sheffield said his support for Stevens had nothing to do with money for the port. McKeever said the same thing, on behalf of Stevens.

As to the fundraiser, McKeever said it didn't happen until August 2007.

Find Lisa Demer online at adn.com/contact/ldemer or call 257-4390.

Print Page | Close Window

Copyright © Mon May 5 15:45:30 UTC-0800 20081900 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1918

<<Back

Fundraising e-mails between senator, port director questioned

by Jill Burke
Monday, April 7, 2008

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- A local government watchdog group claims to have unearthed questionable e-mails between a city official and U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

The Alaska Public Interest Research Group says it came across what appears to be an e-mail thread about campaign fundraising between the senator and Port of Anchorage Director Bill Sheffield.

The documents were discovered during an AKPIRG review of materials concerning the rising cost of the port expansion.

The e-mails stand out because they appear to originate from both men's official government addresses.

AKPIRG believes that city ethics laws may have been violated in the exchange.

It is illegal for city officials to use their official e-mail addresses or government computers to conduct fundraising, according to the statute.

Watch the Channel 2 News evening broadcasts for the complete report.

WorldNow

All content © Copyright 2000 - 2008 WorldNow and KTUU. All Rights Reserved.
For more information on this site, please read our Privacy Policy and Terms of Service.

FBI - Stevens-1919

194A-AN-13620-M; 752

Subscribe
Need a Job?
ALASKA Journal
alaskajobnet

Legislative Journal

ALASKA Journal of Commerce

Alaska's Legislative Digest

April 14, 2008

Legislature approved business license fee reduction

The state House gave unanimous consent April 13 to HB 111, sending Gov. Sarah Palin's bill to reduce business license fees to her for her signature.

More

Bill increasing state funding for tour promotion sent to governor

A bill expanding the state's share of funding for tourism marketing from 50 percent to 70 percent for three years was approved.

More

Personal information protection act goes to governor

While it was slightly weakened by seven amendments adopted in the Senate Finance Committee, the final version of House Bill 65 passed the Legislature.

More

Legislature approves bill requiring reports on lease-purchases

House legislation prompted by former Gov. Frank Murkowski's jet lease/purchase passed

Web posted Tuesday, April 1, 2008

Ethics bills heard and held

By Steve Quinn
Associated Press Writer

JUNEAU (AP) - A bill looking to give state watchdogs more time to investigate complaints against elected officials has come down to one burning issue: how much time.

The debate started Monday in the House Finance Committee and was likely to continue Tuesday with just 13 days remaining in this legislative session.

Two Anchorage Republican representatives boiled the argument down to the difference of a single year.

Bob Lynn, the bill sponsor is pushing for five years, but his aide Mike Sica told the committee he would be willing to settle for four. Lynn was sick and not present.

Lynn's argument is that five years would encompass the longest possible full term plus the campaign season leading up to it.

Kevin Meyer, the committee co-chairman, introduced an amendment for four years, a proposal that will get further discussion.

"It's the length of your Senate term or your two House terms; that's why four years," Meyer said. "It's not making it more onerous than even the IRS does on our taxes."

Democratic Rep. Les Gara, also of Anchorage, however, is pushing for five years, saying that reflects the criminal statutes.

Gara and fellow Anchorage Democrat Harry Crawford first raised the issue last fall when testimony in a federal trial revealed former oil field service executives paid for some candidate's political polls.

"I just feel the statute of limitations should be longer so people aren't shielded from their conduct," Gara told the committee.

Gara and Crawford had insisted that the Alaska Public Offices Commission should pursue charges. But APOC said it was bound by a one-year statute of limitations. However, the commission has ordered an investigation

Advertisement

To advertise here, contact Deborah D. Fachko

FBI - Stevens-1920

194A-AN-13620-M,753

the Senate with a unanimous vote, April 11.

More

April 11, 2008
Capital budget out of House Finance at $3 billion!

Renewable energy bill passes from Senate Finance with $50 million in funds

House endorses reestablishment of film promotion office, tax credits

ATIA tourism marketing bill ready for Senate vote

April 10, 2008
Senate supports will, probate modernization

Tire tax is repealed by House, but Senate vote uncertain

Expansion of Tanana Valley Forest

April 9, 2008
Renewable energy debate sparks as session nears end

NPDES primacy bill goes to governor

ATIA marketing match shift held in Senate Finance into other cases.

The commission has said it's worth it to learn who else may have received this kind of help from Veco Corp., even while bound by the current laws. Additionally, there could be value in preventing any infractions from happening again, one investigator said. The results haven't been announced.

Lawmakers are trying to make the term consistent with another provision calling for elected officials and those who lost races to keep campaign receipts for six years. Meyer is calling for four as well.

"It makes no difference to me whether this is one, two, four, five 10, 20, 25 years or the rest of your life," said Anchorage Republican Mike Hawker. "Just make it consistent throughout."

If APOC had more than one year, it could have pursued an investigation into Jim Clark, the chief of staff to former Gov. Frank Murkowski. Federal prosecutors did get to Clark, however.

Clark pleaded guilty to hiding from state election regulators more than $68,000 in polls and consultants' fees he secured from the oil field services company Veco Corp. for Murkowski's failed gubernatorial re-election bid two years ago.

APOC had four years to investigate complaints, but the time limit got reduced to one year in 2003.

"Prior to amending it down, I don't think the system was broken; in hindsight now that it's back before us, we see it's broken," said Rep. Reggie Joule, D-Kotzebue. "We probably shouldn't have fixed it when it wasn't, but now we need to fix it since it is.

"Under the unbroken system, it was four years. I would say just go back to that."

A second bill proposed by Lynn includes prohibiting a lawmaker from accepting or soliciting campaign donations in the municipality where a session is held 90 days before an election.

During Monday's meeting, concern arose over the fairness to lawmakers who live in the city where session is held. A special session is to be held in Juneau, the city where three lawmakers call home.

Still, committee members said it could have broader effect if a special session is held outside of Juneau, as it was in Anchorage last June.

Additionally, the second bill allows legislative staff members to receive gifts from immediate family, even if they are lobbyists.

Lawmakers' spouses or domestic partners are not permitted to be a registered lobbyist thanks to a sweeping ethics reform bill past last year.

e-mail your letters and comments to editor@alaskajournal.com

PREVIOUS ARTICLES

Health care legislation appears dead but Coghill tries for resurrection

FBI - Stevens-1921

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

Young's campaign donations up; legal spending continues

The Associated Press
(04/07/08 00:18:57)

WASHINGTON, D.C. -- U.S. Rep. Don Young raised more funds for his re-election campaign during the first quarter of this year than in the last quarter of 2007.

The Alaska Republican, however, continued to pay substantial legal fees to defend himself against a federal probe into corruption allegations.

According to a Young spokesman, the congressman's re-election campaign raised more than $164,000 in contributions between January and March. In the last quarter of 2007, just under $44,000 was raised.

Young's report to be filed soon with the Federal Elections Commission will show that he spent about $213,000 in legal fees in the first quarter of this year, the spokesman said.

Almost $94,000 was billed in January for legal work performed in December. Fees charged between January and March added up to about $119,000.

Additional legal fees will show up on the next quarterly report. A bill for about $23,000 in legal work done in March was sent to the campaign in April.

Those charges, combined with previous fees, total more than $1.1 million for legal counsel since the beginning of the 2007-2008 campaign cycle.

Print Page Close Window

Copyright © Mon May 5 15:42:26 UTC-0800 20081900 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1922

194A-AN-13620-m 1755

Automated Serial Permanent Charge-Out
FD-5a (1-5-94)

Date: 06/03/08 Time: 13:32

Case ID: 194A-AN-13620-M Serial: 754

Description of Document:

Type : NEWSPAPE
Date : 03/31/08
To : ANCHORAGE
From : ANCHORAGE DAILY NEWS
Topic: LETTERS TO THE EDITOR (4/1/08)

Reason for Permanent Charge-Out:

should have not been uploaded

Employee: [redacted]

b6
b7C

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

CONTACT: Wayne A. Stevens at (907) 586-2010
wstevens@alaskachamber.com

The Alaska State Chamber of Commerce Announces Jim Jansen as Outstanding Alaskan of the Year

(Anchorage, AK, September 13, 2007) – The Alaska State Chamber of Commerce named Jim Jansen the 2007 William A. Egan Outstanding Alaskan at the Chamber's 48th Annual Convention and Business Trade Show in Anchorage. The Celebrated and prestigious William A. Egan award is given to individuals who have made substantial and continual contributions of statewide significance while working in the private sector. Each year, nominations are kept strictly confidential and the selection is made by the casting of a secret ballot by all past chairs of the Alaska State Chamber of Commerce. The recipients of the Outstanding Alaskan of the Year form an impressive list of Alaskan "Who's Who" and dates back to its first honoree in 1964.

Jim Jansen is a recognized transportation visionary. As a second generation Alaskan businessman, his leadership, vision and dedication has taken the Lynden family of companies from being a solid trucking operation to an all-encompassing multimodal transportation provider using aircraft, boats, barges, hovercraft, specialty trucking, and global forwarding.

Lynden began with a clear mission. Put the customer first, deliver quality, and be the best at what you do. Today, Lynden's service area has grown to include Alaska, Washington, Western Canada, with additional service extending throughout the United States and internationally, via land, sea and air. The Lynden family of some sixteen companies includes Bering Marine, Lynden Logistics, Alaska Marine Lines, Lynden Transport, Alaska West Express and Lynden Air Cargo among others.

Since 1982, Jim has served as Lynden's Chief Executive Officer. He began his career with Lynden in 1970 and held progressively responsible positions within the organization prior to becoming CEO. Lynden has a culture that clearly began with Jim's father, Hank Jansen, and continues today through Jim's leadership.
His motto is 'Work Hard, Give Back to your Community, and Have Fun". Jim is always looking for new opportunities and continues to build the company.

In Alaska, the Lynden companies are widely recognized and respected for applying the ingenuity that is mandatory for successfully operating equipment in our environment. This ingenuity applies throughout the Lynden organization.

ALASKA STATE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Headquarters
217 2nd Street
Suite 201
Juneau
Alaska 99801
(907) 586-2323
FAX 463-5515

Regional Office
601 W. 5th Ave.
Suite 700
Anchorage
Alaska 99501
(907) 278-2722
FAX 278-6643

www.alaskachamber.com

194A-AN-13620-N) 757

Automated Serial Permanent Charge-Out
FD-5a (1-5-94)

Date: 06/03/08 Time: 13:37

Case ID: 194A-AN-13620-M Serial: 756

Description of Document:

Type : NEWSPAPE
Date : 03/30/08
To : ANCHORAGE
From : ANCHORAGE DAILY NEWS
Topic: ALASKA EAR

Reason for Permanent Charge-Out:

.should not have been uploaded

Employee: [redacted]

b6
b7C

Human Events.com

Report From Alaska: Old School vs. New School in GOP -- Sort Of

by John Gizzi (more by this author)
Posted 03/18/2008 ET Updated 03/19/2008 ET

As readers of my political columns in HUMAN EVENTS know, Alaska is rarely high on the list for reporting. It's not that it's so far away, but it's just that politics in the state are rarely exciting. Until Frank Murkowski relinquished his Senate seat to become governor in '02 and appointed his daughter Lisa to succeed him in Washington, the Land of the Midnight Sun had had the same two Republican senators for decades -- Frank Murkowski since 1980 and Ted Stevens since 1968. Fellow Republican Don Young had held the state's lone U.S. House seat since 1973 (winning a special election to replace Democratic Rep. Nick Begich, who was declared legally dead a few months after disappearing in a small airplane but nonetheless defeating Young in November). About the last time I focused on a race for governor was in 1990, when former Republican Gov. (1966-68) Walter Hickel won his old job back as the nominee of the Alaskan Independence Party (which wants the state to secede from the union and become a sovereign nation).

But all that is changing in a big way. So when Massachusetts political consultant Holly Robichaud called me after returning from the state GOP convention this weekend, I jumped to take her call. Holly was in Alaska to train more than 50 participants in a workshop sponsored by the Republican Federation of Republican Women. This comes at a time when conservative Republican Gov. Sarah Palin -- seven months pregnant with her fifth child barely a year after succeeded Murkowski as governor -- is being boomed for as a running mate with John McCain. Moreover, the state's two most durable pols -- 74-year-old Young and 84-year-old Stevens -- are headed for the fights of their political lives. Both Republicans have been touched by scandal, albeit never formally accused on any crime.

"It's really a case of new school versus old school," Robichaud told me, after spending a weekend at the state convention that attracted more than 500 FBI - Stevens-1926

Republican activists to the Captain John Cook Hotel in Anchorage, "There was a feeling at the convention that 'We need to clean house and if the Republicans don't clean house, the Democrats will.'"

She was referring to the stunning announcement at the convention by Lieutenant Governor Sean Parnell that he would be a candidate against Rep. Young for nomination to the at-large House seat. Parnell's declaration was followed by an even more stunning announcement by Palin that she was supporting him against the 35-year incumbent.

"And then Don Young blew his cork," Robichaud said. She recalled how the congressman took to the podium, denounced Parnell, and wondered aloud angrily why he ran for lieutenant governor in '06 if his ambition was Congress.

The differences between Parnell and Young are less on issues than image. As the Almanac of American Politics notes in its latest edition, "Young's 2008 re-election prospects became clouded by a far-reaching FBI corruption probe in Alaska. In May 2007, Rick Smith, an associate of Young's and the former CEO of the politically-connected oil -- production services firm VECO Corp, whose PAC was the single largest contributor to Young since 1989, and several others plead guilty to bribery and conspiracy charges. The Wall Street Journal reported in July 2007 that the investigation had expanded to include Young." In the '06 general election, Young's little-known and underfinanced Democratic foe got a surprising 40% of the vote.

A third candidate in the primary race with Young and Parnell is State Rep. Gabrielle LeDoux. For the first time in memory, Democrats will field a heavyweight contender for the House seat -- most likely former State House Democratic Leader Ethan Berkowitz.

The guilty plea of Smith and fellow VECO executive Bill Allen has also touched the venerable Sen. Stevens, whose home in Girdwood, Alaska was raided by the FBI in July of 2007 (although Stevens has yet to be charged with any crime). One year before, there were FBI raids on the offices of six Alaska legislators (including the senator's son, State Sen. Ben Stevens, who has since left the legislature) and VECO' Allen had overseen and allegedly paid for remodeling work on the senator's home.

FBI - Stevens-1927

But, in contrast to Young, Stevens faces no primary opposition. As Robichaud explained, "Ted Stevens is looked at as having a halo on his head for all the federal money he has brought to Alaska to keep the economy going. There is forgiveness for him in the Republican Party." Perhaps, but this may not be the case in the state as a whole; a recent Research 2000 poll showed Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, son of the late Rep. Nick Begich, defeating Stevens by a margin of 47% to 41% statewide.

At this point, one thing is certain: in contrast to past years, Alaska politics will not be "business as usual."

John Gizzi is Political Editor of HUMAN EVENTS.

Advertise | Privacy Policy | Terms and Conditions
Copyright © 2008 HUMAN EVENTS. All Rights Reserved.

FBI - Stevens-1928

<<Back

Mat Maid site hot property

Palmer Mayor John Combs (Kris Riley/KTUU-TV)

The plant sits in the heart of downtown Palmer and was once the epicenter of the Valley's dairy industry. But now it's cluttered with junk, used equipment and truck trailers. (Kris Riley/KTUU-TV)

Palmer City Manager Bill Allen (Kris Riley/KTUU-TV)

Ray Nix, asset manager with the state Division of Agriculture (Kris Riley/KTUU-TV)

by Lori Tipton
Monday, Jan. 7, 2008

PALMER, Alaska -- Matanuska Maid Dairy is no more and the state is in the process of shutting down its Anchorage plant and liquidating other assets, including the old dairy plant in Palmer.

State officials say they are already getting calls and letters from potential buyers for that piece of property.

The plant sits in the heart of downtown Palmer and was once the epicenter of the Valley's dairy industry. But now it's cluttered with junk, used equipment and truck trailers.

Mayor John Combs says Mat Maid moved to Anchorage more than 20 years ago but held on to this piece of property, which consists of one large building sitting on three acres.

"It's in a lot of disarray over there and, you know, needs a lot of attention," Combs said. "It's been neglected for a long, long time."

City Manager Bill Allen says it needs to be cleaned up. He sent a letter to the state asking if the city could buy the property.

"That's a big eyesore right in the heart of our community," he said. "We're getting ready to launch a major beautification project for the city of Palmer."

Allen says the city also wants to buy the property surrounding the old Mat Maid plant should it become available.

For now, the focus is on the three acres, assessed at just under $400,000.

Ray Nix, asset manager with the state Division of Agriculture, says the city is just one of many interested in the three acres.

"Offers to purchase, persons interested in leasing all or part of the facility, so yes, there has been several interests in the properties," Nix said.

But Allen says he hopes the state gives the city preferential treatment because of their plan to help beautify downtown.

"The city is willing to pay market value. We're not asking for a sweetheart deal," Allen said. "We simply want control of the property that plays such an important role in our future."

FBI - Stevens-1929

194A-AN-13620-M: 759

Mat Maid once helped build a community here and city officials hope its property can serve as a cornerstone for Palmer's future.

Allen says he will address the city council at Tuesday's meeting, asking for approval to enter into negotiations for the property.

The Creamery Board will have the final say in who gets to purchase the property.

Contact Lori Tipton at ltipton@ktuu.com

WorldNow

All content © Copyright 2000 - 2008 WorldNow and KTUU. All Rights Reserved.
For more information on this site, please read our Privacy Policy and Terms of Service.

FBI - Stevens-1930

adn.com
Anchorage Daily News

Print Page Close Window

MEA plays dirty to sidestep democratic process

COMPASS: Points of view

By DARIN MARKWARDT

(02/01/08 02:05:32)

I sometimes wonder if MEA does it intentionally -- if it lays awake at night thinking of ways to act petty and boorish, ways to say, "Hey, watch us thumb our noses at you, the member-owners -- and get away with it."

Over the past week, we have seen fresh examples of Matanuska Electric Association's disdain for its member-owners, and the democratic process.

The first incident involved Tom Staudenmaier. He has run for the MEA board ... a lot.

Every year he gathers his 50 required signatures, and every year he's on the ballot. This year, though ... oops. Only 49.

One short. MEA had to give an "Aw shucks, Tom, one short, terribly sorry ..." Tom was about to unleash a massive lawsuit, when -- ta da -- the magic 50th appeared.

Why did MEA want to keep Tom off the ballot? After all, he's never been close to winning.

Well, could it have to do with the fact that Lee Jordan -- who is running for reelection -- is from Eagle River? So is Tom. What a coincidence.

Could it be that MEA was trying to keep Tom off the ballot because he could siphon off 1,500 votes from Jordan?

It's the same old MEA tactics.

The second of MEA's latest transgressions involves the proposed bylaw change.

The new bylaw would seat newly elected board members on the MEA board within 15 days of the election, instead of making them wait 4½ months before being seated.

Three hundred signatures were needed to place the bylaw change on the MEA ballot. FBI - Stevens-1931

Six hundred and 20 member-owners signed the petition.

Six hundred and 20 signatures. (For you math majors, that's more than twice the amount needed).

MEA, of course, has chosen to play dirty. They have declared that the MEA ballot book will only show reasons for voting "no" on the bylaw change.

Well, long live the empire.

194A-AN-13620-M,760

Imagine the borough or state trying to get away with this. Imagine, in the voting booth, reading: "Reasons to vote no on this initiative," followed by a "yes" or "no."

No way, you'd cry. This is the United States. We don't play one-sided baseball. We either give both sides a fair say or say nothing at all.

But MEA doesn't want to play by those rules (pesky democracy ...). In fact, MEA assistant general manager Tuckerman Babcock has said that the "utility cooperatives aren't bound by the same rule of neutrality as state and borough governments when it comes to elections."

In essence, MEA management is saying that you -- the member-owner -- are too stupid to figure out what's right for your utility.

And to save you the trouble of thinking, MEA's benevolent management is just going to tell you how to vote on the bylaw initiative.

How charming.

Now here's the truth about MEA's election process: MEA forces its elected board members to wait for 4½ months before being seated.

That's longer than we make the president, governor or Congress member wait for office.

That's 4½ months for MEA's not-so-lame-duck board members to do whatever they want.

Four and a half months for MEA to try to find some reason to kick out the new board member, 4½ months for MEA to ignore the vote -- and the voice -- of their member-owners.

MEA claims that the new bylaw would conflict with current bylaws. New officers, they say, aren't elected until July.

What if an officer is defeated? We'd be left without an officer!

Wrong. The truth is that MEA bylaws allow the board to temporarily fill vacant officer positions.

That means if an officer -- say, the president -- is defeated, then the new MEA board will choose a fellow board member to temporarily fill the position. In July, the board will decide whether or not to keep that person as president.

It's rather simple. (That whole truth thing helps.)

Ask the other Railbelt utilities. Their newly elected board members are placed on the board within 15 days of the election or at the next meeting.

Look at the bylaws themselves. They say that election results must be certified within seven days.

It's not rocket science, MEA. Just because you don't like democracy doesn't mean you can make up the rules.

Darin Markwardt is a board member of MEA Ratepayers Alliance

FBI - Stevens-1932

Print Page Close Window

Copyright © Mon Apr 21 10:31:29 UTC-0800 20081900 The Anchorage Daily News (www.adn.com)

FBI - Stevens-1933

Kohring sentencing delayed

By Russell Stigall
For the Frontiersman

MAT-SU — Former state Rep. Vic Kohring has beat back his day of sentencing with an appeal for a new trial and to disqualify the judge who found him guilty.

Facing sentencing on his late 2007 convictions on corruption, bribery and attempted extortion charges, Kohring is asking U.S. District Court Chief Judge John Sedwick to overrule the convictions or order a new trial. The motion also asks Sedwick be recused from handling Kohring's case. Kohring was to be sentenced Wednesday, but that was pushed back to consider his motions.

Before Kohring's October 2007 trial, Sedwick denied appeals by the ex-legislator and his attorney, Seattle-based John Henry Browne, to move the trial to Seattle and disregard certain evidence. Kohring's motion accuses Sedwick of being biased as a result of a previous political disagreement between Kohring and Sedwick's wife.

Judge Sedwick referred Kohring's appeal to Judge H. Russell Holland. Holland interpreted Kohring's appeal and placed the decision back with Sedwick. Sedwick has until Feb. 25 to decide whether or not to recuse himself and Kohring has until March 10 react to Sedwick's decision.

