Kohring, a seven-term Republican representative from Wasilla, was convicted of three counts of conspiracy, attempted extortion and bribery in a Federal political corruption case late last year.

Kohring benefited from and contributed to the cash and influence former VECO oil services company executives Bill Allen and Rick Smith meted out to at least a dozen state legislators for more than a decade. Kohring was found guilty of selling his influence and vote for multiple cash payments totaling an estimated $2,600.

During Kohring's trial, testimony and surveillance video showed Allen and Smith meeting with Kohring and other legislators in room 604 of the Baranof Hotel in Juneau. The Federal Bureau of Investigation bugged the room in 2005 and recorded thousands of hours of audio and video. Kohring and former House speaker Pete Kott were convicted of bribery and conspiracy, and the surveillance and testimony was used at both their trials.

Federal prosecutors Joseph Bottini and Edward Sullivan have asked Judge Sedwick to impose a five-year prison sentence on Kohring. Kott was sentenced to three years. The federal government is also asking for Kohring to be fined $24,244.

Bottini and Sullivan wrote in their sentencing memorandum that Sedwick should take into account Kohring's repeat offenses. He accepted multiple bribes from Allen and Smith and conspired with the executives on multiple occasions.

Kohring referred questions about the motions to his attorney. Repeated attempts to reach Browne before press time were unsuccessful.

Revisit oil taxes? No

Regime passed in November provides fair share, incentives

(01/22/08 00:35:07)

State Sen. Charlie Huggins wants to give back to oil producers some of the money Alaska claimed as its due with the enhanced ACES legislation passed last November. There is no good reason to do so. Alaska simply took a fair share for its oil, limited deductions at the big fields and still provided attractive incentives for more investment.

It's a decent deal. We don't owe the industry a better one.

Why? Here are several reasons.

• Record profits off Alaska's oil. That's right -- Alaska's oil. Some of our lawmakers, and even some former governors, seem to forget the fundamental fact that the oil does not belong to the oil companies. It belongs to Alaska, and the Alaska Constitution requires that oil, like every other resource in the state, be used for the common benefit of Alaskans.

• Years of empty talk about building a gas pipeline, which would help secure Alaska's prosperity for decades. Yes, a gas line is a tremendous undertaking. Yes, reinjecting gas to produce more oil has increased Alaska's oil production. But the North Slope producers have made it clear that they'll do a gas line only on their terms, not ours. Again, Alaska lawmakers need to remember that the gas is Alaska's, not the producers'.

• Exxon, for its intransigence over paying punitive damages from its 1989 spill and its refusal to start producing the Point Thomson field. And, of course, its arrogance during the last oil tax debate and its insistence that North Slope gas will get to market only when it suits Exxon.

For the record, and we fervently wish Alaska's leaders would take this to heart: Alaska and the oil companies are not partners. For all the talk about alignment of interests, for all the good relationships and for all the contributions the oil industry makes to Alaska, when it comes time to deal, the state and the companies sit on opposite sides of the table.

And that's the way it should be.

The oil companies' job is to look out for their interests and maximize profits for shareholders. Alaska's leaders have a different job -- to look out for the interests of all Alaskans and to realize the greatest gain from our resources.

Lawmakers did that job about as well as they could last fall. The only reason to roll back the retroactive section of ACES and to uncap deductions is because the companies would prefer it that way. That's reason enough for the industry. That's nowhere near good enough for those elected to represent Alaskans. The industry has had no qualms about asking for retroactive tax credits. It should be able to take a few months' retroactive tax in stride.

Just how does it serve Alaska to return hundreds of millions in oil company taxes when the companies are making extraordinary profits on $90 oil, and Alaska's income in future years is likely to shrink?

Sen. Huggins suggests that it's unfair to slap a retroactive tax on the industry. Unfair? What was unfair was that Alaska didn't boost its share sooner. Six months of retroactivity covers only a small share of the towering profits the industry has enjoyed harvesting Alaska's wealth.

Let ACES ride. Alaska still offers generous incentives for investment and a tax regime that won't have anyone in the industry missing any meals. Let's take care of Alaska -- and remember that Alaska is not synonymous with the oil industry.

BOTTOM LINE: State needs to hold its ACES. The industry will still play.

Don't do it

LeDoux's fundraising violates spirit of state ethics law<

State Rep. Gabrielle LeDoux (R-Kodiak) is trying to unseat longtime Alaska Rep. Don Young by presenting herself as a more ethical choice. So why does she insist on exploiting a fundraising loophole in state ethics law?

That law prohibits state lawmakers from fundraising in Juneau during the legislative session. Unfortunately, that ban applies only to fundraising for state legislative races. Since Rep. LeDoux is running for Congress, the ban does not apply to her. She's free to raise money, even from special interests who seek her favor during this legislative session. She won't agree to stop holding out her hand for contributions during the session.

A fellow Republican, House Speaker John Harris, has called on Rep. LeDoux to stop her ethically questionable fundraising. If she doesn't, Harris has suggested she could be evicted from the House Majority caucus.

That's a fine and principled stand -- but it also has a tinge of self-interest. Speaker Harris is often mentioned as a potential candidate for Congress, given Rep. Young's ethical and legal troubles. (Harris says he would not run unless Rep. Young stepped aside.) Up to this point in his long legislative career, Speaker Harris was hardly a noted champion of high ethical standards.

Potentially mixed motivations aside, Speaker Harris is right on this one. Rep. LeDoux is violating the spirit, if not the letter, of the state ethics law by raising money for her congressional bid during the legislative session. She should stop. If she doesn't, she'll have no reason to complain if the House majority caucus sanctions her.

Letters to the editor (1/21/08)

(01/21/08 00:18:02)

Kids need more time in the real world, not in crowded classrooms

Our children do not need more time in class; our teachers need fewer students in a class and less non-education-related duties ("School year should be longer, Comeau says," Jan. 14).

The last thing our children need is more time in a classroom that is overloaded. When you put 25 to 30-plus students in a class, it doesn't matter how long they are there.

Add to that all the assessments, surveys, new reading, math, report cards and underwater basket-weaving programs that are being dumped on the teachers and I am amazed that teachers have time to teach at all.

Our children also need time out of class to learn about the world and, to be honest, they need time with their parents. The last time I checked we are the primary care providers, not the school system.

The Anchorage School District administration has lost complete track of reality with this proposal to lengthen the school year. Trapping our children indoors for more hours a day or more days a year is missing the point; they are children and it is important for them to be children, not manufacturing drones.

Did it completely escape the School District administration's attention that summer is only three months a year and do they really think these kids will be attentive after a long winter?

Chaining creates dogs that are antisocial, frustrated, neurotic

It is understood that chained dogs are at risk for attacks by wolves, other dogs, moose and abuse by people. It is also true that chained dogs are dangerous to people. According to the Journal of the American Veterinary Medical Association, 17 percent of dogs involved in fatal attacks on humans were restrained on their owner's property. These dogs are not allowed the normal "flight" response when chained, often leading them to fight instead.

A chained dog often lacks socialization and human interaction, essential for any dog's mental health. Chained dogs are frustrated by isolation, lack of exercise and boredom. Additionally, they must eat, sleep, defecate and urinate in the same small area, which is unnatural and creates more problems with house training. These dogs become neurotic from their situations, further deterring human interaction.

I have a wonderful dog (now 13) who spent the first two years of his life chained to a tree. The owners gave him to me willingly, although they warned me what a terrible dog he was: fights with other dogs, not house trained, ran away. These issues were related to his circumstances; we started daily walks and he lives happily with other dogs.

I implore you to take another look at your neighbor's barking, lonely dog. Consider talking to owners of neglected dogs and working to make their lives better.

Police need to intercept red-light runners in Eagle River

I request the police department patrol the intersection of Hiland Road/Yosemite and Eagle River Loop/Briggs Bridge in the morning.

I live on Hiland Road and go through this intersection every morning between 7:15 and 7:30, which is the time Eagle River High School is getting ready to start. Recently as I waited for my green arrow to turn left off Hiland, I counted no fewer than seven cars running their red light.

It was total chaos!

Cars were cutting in front of each other, slamming on their brakes, totally disregarding the traffic order.

These were vehicles coming from the Briggs Bridge to get onto the Glenn Highway. Another morning again three cars ran the red light as I waited for my turn. There is also a lot of confusion with the drivers turning right on red from Yosemite to get onto the Glenn Highway. I assume these are parents having just dropped off their children at the high school.

Is there any way to restore order there in the morning? It looks like an "accident" waiting to happen.

In changing times, we need some better representation in Congress

In the Jan. 13 article "Young in the race of his life," Rep. Don Young is quoted as arrogantly stating, "Anybody running for this job, ask them what they can do better than Don Young. In fact, ask them, really, what hasn't he done?"

The real questions to ask and ponder are:

Could someone else given the chance do more than Don Young has?

Would a new congressman actually be present to vote in Congress with a better attendance record?

Could there be a better choice to represent all Alaska, not just Republicans and corporate donors to Young's campaign in exchange for earmarks that he is so proud of?

Come on, Alaska -- times are changing. We need to get younger, more sharp and less corrupt politicians in office. Let's retire Don Young and Ted Stevens. Lisa Murkowski is doing a fair job and I think she would work well with any new representatives we send to Washington, D.C., be they Democrats or Republicans.

Meat likely wormy, wasn't wasted

Regarding the killing of the Kodiak brown bear reported in the Jan. 6 issue ("Big time"), I too was appalled at the apparent waste of all that meat that was left behind.

I was then told that it is rare for brown bears or grizzlies to be found without worms. Thus, even our state's Fish and Game recommends not eating grizzly or brown bear meat. So, Paul Hannis ("Hunters carry 150 pounds, leave 1,500 pounds to rot," Jan. 9) may rest assured that no meat was wasted.

Commercial interests trying to take fish from dipnetters

It is that time of year for the Board of Fisheries to meet to revisit and revise the Upper Cook Inlet Management Plan for the next couple of years.

As usual, dipnetting (personal use) for your average Alaskan is under attack from the commercial fishers -- again. There is a proposal to limit dipnetters to 15 fish per head of household, rather than the current 25.

Other proposals are to limit motorized dipnetting to an anchored boat only; to do away with the windows, which are the 36-hour periods when commercial fishermen can't fish, so fish can enter the river; and to allow dipnetting only after the optimal escapement goal is met, which would be about the end of July.

More than 65,000 Alaskans benefit from dipnetting on the Kenai and Kasilof rivers. These are people just trying to put fish into the freezer. Yet we have the commercial fishermen taking about 94 percent of the total catch of sockeye salmon and they still want more. That means that the bigger percentage they want will come out of sportfishermen's and dipnetters' shares.

The Board of Fisheries meeting will be held on Feb. 1-12 at the Coast International Inn. If you want to save your access, plan on signing up before 10 a.m. Saturday, Feb. 2, to testify for three minutes. All you have to do is tell them to leave our fish alone and to leave the windows intact. It's our fish!

Don't hit soldiers up for licenses; instead, let them hunt, fish free

This is in response to the Dec. 28 article "12 soldiers fudged on residency, must pay": For an arm of the government, wildlife troopers, to target our troops is a disgrace. Members of the military are the easiest to catch, according to wildlife troopers and captain Burke Waldron.

"It's easier to prove the date of arrival for military guys," said wildlife trooper Joe Paul.

We say thank you to our troops who have been fighting a war for our safety at home. Some have been away from their families for more than a year and when they come home we splash on the newspaper that Alaska is targeting troops lying on hunting and fishing licenses. Notice in the article that only personnel from the military are mentioned for increased enforcement efforts.

If we are so proud of our military, waive the one-year residency requirement for their hunting and fishing licenses. Show them that we are proud by giving back to them and issue active-duty members free licenses. I in no way fault the troopers for their job; it's the state lawmakers who set the rules. So come on, Juneau: Issue free licenses to our troops.

SeaLife Center deal was good for ex-aide to Stevens

SEWARD CENTER: Earmark was tailored to McCabe property sale.

By RICHARD MAUER and TOM KIZZIA
Anchorage Daily News

(02/10/08 00:16:41)

New documents have emerged in Seward showing that a $1.6 million earmark in 2005 by Sen. Ted Stevens was engineered so it would lead to the purchase of property owned by his former aide, Trevor McCabe, an Anchorage fisheries lobbyist.

The public records show that another Washington lobbyist who once worked for Stevens, Brad Gilman, acted as the go-between in the deal, connecting an unnamed "Senate aide" with Gilman's two clients in Seward: the city and the Alaska SeaLife Center, a federally supported marine research center and tourist attraction.

Gilman reported that the Senate aide was shopping for an entity that would guarantee the purchase of McCabe's property if it got the earmark, the documents said. Federal agencies had rejected previous attempts by McCabe and two partners to develop or sell the property, site of a derelict building, for a government visitor center and office complex.

The result was the sudden shift of the earmark by Stevens' office from the City of Seward, which wouldn't promise to buy the property, to the Alaska SeaLife Center, which had more discretion, according to a phone log written by a Seward official and minutes of the SeaLife Center board.

The backdoor arrangement described in the documents appeared to assure that a money-losing real estate venture by the partners would be bailed out by U.S. taxpayers without any need for the earmark itself to be explicit about its intent. As passed into law, the public language of the legislation only spoke vaguely about "various acquisitions."

The Seward land sale is under investigation by the FBI and inspectors general from two federal departments, Interior and Commerce.

Roy Keim, a spokesman for the Interior Department inspector general, said in a telephone interview from Washington last week that there was no sign the investigation would wrap up soon.

"These things take a long time," he said.

FBI - Stevens-1941

REAL ESTATE MISTAKE

Flush with the unexpected grant, the SeaLife Center bought the property for $558,000 in 2006. The only partner to agree to an interview, Seward businessman Dale Lindsey, said before his death from cancer in November that it was no windfall. He lost about $23,000 and lots of sleep on the venture, he said.

"It was probably the worst real estate deal I ever got myself involved in, when I stop and reflect back on it, even absent all the publicity," said Lindsey, concerned about how people would remember him in the town he played a strong role in building. "It just was a bum deal from the

Gilman didn't return numerous calls placed to his office in Alexandria, Va., where he works for Robertson, Monagle and Eastaugh, the Juneau-based law and lobbying firm. McCabe's attorney, Michael White of Seattle, said, "Trevor has been instructed by his lawyer to continue to cooperate with investigators and make no public comments." The third partner, Anchorage office building owner Steve Zelener, didn't return several calls seeking comment.

A spokesman for Stevens said the senator wouldn't comment, following an office policy in effect since Stevens came under scrutiny in the corruption investigation in Alaska. In a Daily News interview on the Seward land deal in early 2006, before the Gilman conversation was known outside of a few city officials, a Stevens spokeswoman said the earmark "was not at Trevor McCabe's request or on behalf of Trevor McCabe." The grant came with no strings attached, the spokeswoman said.

SeaLife Center executive director Tylan Schrock, who announced two weeks ago he would leave his post later this year, said in interviews earlier this year and last year that the SeaLife Center had no obligation to buy McCabe's property with the grant, and asserted that the decision to buy it was the center's alone. He has not returned calls since the City of Seward released the records of its calls with Gilman.

The Alaska SeaLife Center has long been a favorite of Stevens, who has steered more than $50 million in federal funds to the nonprofit facility since it opened in 1998, including more than $3.5 million in the most recent appropriations bills. Schrock has been executive director for more than seven of those years.

McCabe, who worked eight years for Stevens in Washington, D.C., also has close ties to the marine facility. He is a past board member and helped provide financial backing when he was head of the At-Sea Processors' Association, a factory trawler group.

The documents were obtained by the Daily News under a public records request to the Seward city administration. The SeaLife Center had earlier refused to provide the board and executive committee minutes, saying they were confidential, despite the organization's status as a nonprofit and its overwhelming reliance on public funds. The city, which has a representative on the board, reached the opposite conclusion and released its copies.

The SeaLife Center appeared in the documents as a compliant partner to the wishes of the unnamed Senate aide, as expressed by Gilman. The city, required to engage in a public process before purchasing real estate, could offer no assurances that it would buy the Arcade property with the money, the documents said.

LEFTOVER MONEY

The $1.6 million represented money left over from an earlier Stevens earmark to the National Park Service to purchase land for a federal center in Seward. The original earmark required the remaining funds be handed over to the city for waterfront development and beautification.

Instead, as the federal budget emerged in July 2005, city officials discovered the money had been redirected to the SeaLife Center "for various acquisitions, waterfront improvements and facilities that complement the new Federal facility."

Seward's mayor and its city manager asked another city official to call Gilman to see whether he could explain what happened.

FBI - Stevens-1942

The telephone log provided by the city to the Daily News doesn't name the Seward official who spoke with Gilman. City manager Phillip Oates, hired in March 2007, said it was assistant city manager Kirsten Vesel. She declined to comment.

Oates said the log was written sometime after the call from contemporaneous notes taken by Vesel.

According to the log, after some rounds of phone tag, the Seward official reached Gilman on July 27, 2005. Gilman told the city official that "a senator's aide" had called him prior to the emergence of the new earmark.

The aide, according to the log, asked Gilman whether the city could assure the purchase of the Arcade property with the funds.

"Mr. Gilman told me that he could not assure the senator's aide that the city could guarantee the purchase of any property," the log said.

The Seward official agreed with Gilman's analysis and told him so, the log said. "I concurred and said that all city property acquisitions have to go through a public process, so Administration cannot assure anything."

What about the Alaska SeaLife Center, the aide had asked Gilman, according to the log.

"Mr. Gilman told me that he was put in a difficult position because he represents the City and the ASLC," the log said. "However, he answered to the best of his ability."

Gilman's advice: "Mr. Gilman then told the Senator's aide that he thought that Tylan Schrock, executive director of ASLC, had more discretion and may be able to commit to this request. He recommended the aide call Tylan Schrock. Mr. Gilman then told me that he did not know that this conversation would lead to the transfer of the funds and was just as shocked as we were," the log said.

CONVERSATION WITH 'DC'

Minutes of the SeaLife Center's quarterly board meeting of July 22, 2005, corroborate the phone log.

"Tylan reported that he'd been contacted by DC about the ability to administer funds to purchase the Arcade property," the minutes said.

The minutes acknowledge the money had originally been destined for the city. But then the day before -- July 21, 2005, six days before the Seward official spoke with Gilman -- "Tylan received a phone call inquiring if he would be able to help move this deal forward because the City expressed some concern with doing so. The result is that approximately $1 million will go to the ASLC. The money will be used to remove the Arcade building," it said, with leftover funds for other SeaLife Center projects.

In an interview last August, Schrock said the "DC" in the minutes was a reference to Gilman, not the aide who Gilman suggested should call Schrock.

"Essentially what happened is, that the phone call that came to me was a question as to whether or not we could administer the Park Service monies in support the Waterfront Development Plan," Schrock said. "In the board meeting, what I was reporting here was that I had received a phone call but it's about the ability to administer funds that the Park Service was supposed to have used to purchase the Arcade property."

When he presented the matter to the board, before the legislation was enacted, Schrock said, "We had no idea what we could use that (money) for."

Schrock disputed the accuracy of the minutes, saying the person who took them -- his employee -- had erred in saying the money was for the Arcade property. But Schrock wouldn't identify the scribe or allow the person to be interviewed.

"Not going down the pathway -- she's not going to be talking to you, if that's where you're going to go," Schrock said.

And he couldn't explain how no one -- board member, administrator, or other attendee -- failed to catch the alleged errors before the minutes were approved at the next board meeting, on Oct. 28, 2005.

In fact, the minutes of the Oct. 28 meeting appeared to confirm the phone log and the July 22 minutes.

By the time of that meeting, SeaLife Center officials knew they would receive $1.6 million and had decided to purchase the Arcade property, the minutes said, even as they were growing concerned about "political issues that may come as fallout."

"Bottom line is that we had to move on the Arcade Building if we wanted a deal," the Oct. 28 minutes quoted Schrock as saying.

In the 46-minute interview, Schrock cited Seward's "Waterfront Development Plan" 15 times as the rational basis for the SeaLife Center's decision to buy the Arcade property. It was the plan, not a command by a Senate aide or signal from a lobbyist, that he was following, he said.

Mayor Clark Corbridge said he knew of no document with that name and referred questions to City Clerk Jean Lewis. Lewis couldn't find anything with that name either, and suggested a call to Jeff Mow, the superintendant at Kenai Fjords National Park, who helped plan the proposed federal complex, the Mary Lowell Center.

Mow said he also knew of no such document, but said that sometimes people use that term interchangeably with the Seward Waterfront Study, a 2003 report commissioned by the National Park Service and U.S. Forest Service for locating the visitor center and administrative complex.

The study, which has no force of law, was conducted by the Portico Group of Seattle, which suggested the center be built downtown. In its recommended scenario, the Arcade Building would be razed and turned into "a plaza or public square." Today, the property remains a roped-off gravel patch.

Since the August interview, Schrock has refused requests to clarify what he meant by the "plan" or to answer additional questions.

Tim Nicoulin, chief financial officer of the Portico Group, said agents from the Interior Department's inspector general showed up at his firm Aug. 28. He provided all the information they sought about how recommendations were made. The investigator from the inspector general's office told him that the FBI was also investigating, he said.

FBI - Stevens-1944

"It was a very transparent process," Nicoulin said of the study, with public hearings and a large public document.

SeaLife Center board member and Seward Councilman Willard Dunham said he thought the site would be good for expansion of the SeaLife Center, not a plaza.

"That is absolutely not true that anybody was ordered to buy the goddamned Arcade," Dunham said. "The SeaLife center was looking for places to buy or look at or lease because we needed expansion."

TESTIMONY LOST

Lindsey, the longtime Seward businessman and a partner in Arcade building, was terminally ill with cancer when he agreed to be interviewed at home in August. He said he was cooperating with the federal investigation. It is unknown what effect, if any, the loss of his potential testimony would have to any litigation arising from the probe.

Lindsey said it was McCabe's idea to create the partnership, the Centennial Group, and to buy the Arcade Building and Old Solly's next door in 2003. Each of the partners -- McCabe, a Seward native, along with Lindsey and Zelener -- owned a third of the business and contributed according to their specialities. Lindsey dealt with financing, Zelener with commercial property and McCabe with politics.

"(McCabe) was yo-yoing back and forth between Washington, D.C., more times than I knew," Lindsey said. "I think it's fair to assume he had some influence back there," Lindsey said, though McCabe never provided him with details of what he did.

Their first plan was a bust. They hired an architect to design a new building with first-class office space and underground parking for the Park Service, Forest Service and the National Marine Fisheries Service. But the Interior Department wanted to build its own building sprawling across two lots, one of which included Old Solly's, Lindsey said.

Centennial was able to come to terms with Interior for Old Solly's, but they reached an impasse with the Arcade Building next door. The first government appraisal valued the building and lot at $174,000, much less than the Centennial partners were willing to sell. Then federal inspectors found asbestos and lead paint, leading to a second government appraisal of $94,000.

Centennial withdrew its offer to sell to the Park Service in July 2005 -- around the time the earmark was being rewritten.

Lindsey said that among McCabe's influential friends on Stevens' staff was Lisa Sutherland, the senator's longtime aide when he was chairman of the Appropriations Committee and then the Commerce Committee.

In August 2003, Lindsey recalled, he offered his boat to Sutherland, McCabe, a Park Service official named Peter Armato and Mayor Shafer to sail into Resurrection Bay and get a view of Seward from the sea.

"They wanted to see what the waterfront looked like from a boat in terms of this waterfront development plan. They're primarily interested in the downtown area," Lindsey said.

McCabe seemed very close to Sutherland from having worked with her in Washington, Lindsey said.

"He was there because he and (Sutherland) work so closely together. They reminded me of brother and sister. There was a very cordial relationship that existed there," Lindsey said. "I think he's also close to Brad Gilman. They worked as lobbyists on fishery-related issues primarily and they were both from Alaska."

Armato said he couldn't talk about the boat trip because of the ongoing investigation.

Said Shafer: "All we did was, we were talking about the waterfront development and the need to improve the waterfront area."

Sutherland quit as Stevens' staff director on the Commerce Committee last March and began working as a lobbyist. She declined a request for an interview but said she would answer e-mailed questions. She never responded.

APOC passes on ethics issue

MCGUIRE: Commission sends lobbying matter to Legislature.

By SEAN COCKERHAM
scockerham@adn.com

(02/08/08 00:40:58)

The Alaska Public Offices Commission is referring questions about Anchorage State Sen. Lesil McGuire's 2003 consulting contract to the Legislature's ethics committee for consideration.

The commissioners voted 3 to 1 Thursday to do so with no recommendation. That leaves it up to the ethics committee to decide whether McGuire did anything wrong. There's no telling whether the ethics committee will even consider the matter. Its work is confidential.

McGuire received $10,500 from Providence Health System in 2003. Her consulting job involved working with Providence's lobbyist on a strategy for how the hospital could get money from the state as part of a land deal involving the old Alaska Psychiatric Institute. McGuire was in the state House at the time.

Assistant attorney general Jan DeYoung told the commission she doesn't think McGuire violated any laws or rules. She recommended against referring the contract issue to the ethics committee. But Commissioner Elizabeth Hickerson said McGuire's work for Providence while a lawmaker "raises the appearance of impropriety at the least."

Congressional candidate Ray Metcalfe, who lost to McGuire in a 2000 race for the state House, has filed multiple complaints with APOC over the consulting contract.

The APOC has dismissed all of them.

McGuire denies any wrongdoing. Her attorney, Charles Dunnagan, said APOC has found no violation and is ignoring its own lawyer, DeYoung, in sending the contract issue to the ethics committee. He said Metcalfe has been manipulating the Public Offices Commission.

"This is absolutely irresponsible," he told the commissioners.

Public office investigator has high profile these days

By STEVE QUINN
The Associated Press
(02/11/08 00:47:46)

Jeff Berliner has a job he idealistically wishes never existed: that of an investigator who must scrutinize lawmakers' financial disclosure filings.

Thanks to the Legislature's recent sweeping ethics reform to include funding for an investigator, Berliner sits in a sparse office holding a job eliminated several years ago by former Gov. Frank Murkowski for financial reasons.

And with the backdrop of an ongoing federal corruption probe that has already produced convictions of three former state lawmakers, Berliner's job with the Alaska Public Office Commission has a higher profile than he'd like.

"This job shouldn't exist, but not in the way Murkowski didn't want it to exist," said Berliner, now in his sixth month with APOC. "In an ideal world, you would have people following the elections laws and campaign disclosures.

"But we all know we don't live in that kind of world. That's been demonstrated painfully clearly to us in the last year or so. I just want to make sure normal routine filings are what they are supposed to be: true, accurate and complying with the law."

DIVERSE BACKGROUND

The 58-year-old Berliner is a former investigative journalist who says he is not registered with either major political party. He has also worked as a Russian trade specialist under Murkowski's predecessor, Democratic Gov. Tony Knowles.

The Legislature is already looking at expanding one of the investigator's tools.

Current law stipulates Berliner can go back only one year to investigate potential wrongdoing. Rep. Bob Lynn, R-Anchorage, has proposed making that five years and requiring candidates and lawmakers to keep financial records for six years after an election.

The issue gained attention last fall during the federal trial of former House Speaker Pete Kott. A former Veco Corp. vice president and government witness, Rick Smith, testified that his company paid for hundreds of polls for Alaska lawmakers, including Kott during his failed 2006 re-election campaign.

Sharing poll information with Kott would constitute an illegal campaign contribution, but APOC can't impose any fines because of the one-year limit.

Even so, APOC wants to know who else may have received this kind of help from Veco.

FBI - Stevens-1948

194A-AN-13620-m: 766

"It's worth it; there is another goal in mind here," Berliner said. "If you find that something has been occurring contrary to the disclosure laws that APOC oversees, you also want to find out how to prevent it in the future.

"You want to find out if there is a loophole that created the problem. That's far more important than nabbing somebody. ... The issue is getting compliance within the law."

There are other obstacles, too. The U.S. Justice Department asked Alaska Attorney General Talis Colberg to not investigate Veco while it conducts its own probes. But with APOC being a semi-independent agency, it still is pushing for answers while pledging not to interfere with the feds.

"It's a tough, difficult task when you consider the FBI has had a small army of agents up here working for two years going after this stuff," Berliner said.

"We've had one person for six months working on this some of the time and working on other things the rest of the time," he said.

Berliner insists the job isn't so much about him; rather it's the title of investigator that represents a change in holding the Legislature accountable.

THE FUNDING ISSUE

He's also working for a state agency that has historically operated in fear of legislators, who control its budget.

"Whether funding is an issue or not, what this really boils down to is integrity in government," Berliner said. "This is not about politics. It's about public disclosure. Politics rears its head constantly if someone doesn't like what you're doing, and they will grasp for a reason to rationalize it away."

Separate from Lynn's bill, APOC also wants more funding from lawmakers for a second investigator and a paralegal.

The agency, which Berliner says is still recovering from being "emasculated" by the previous administration, has never had two investigators. And he knows some lawmakers still want to keep the agency's power in check, so a second investigator may be a tall order.

Berliner expects pressure on both sides -- from the dissatisfied public calling for more action and from lawmakers not wanting too much oversight.

"A strong agency can withstand the attacks and do its job, then realize it's the public we are doing it for," Berliner said. "It's about compliance and public disclosure.

"It's not about bowing too much or too little. A weakened agency can't fulfill its mission; the strong agency that is fully staffed with enforcement powers will do what the public expects it to."

Kohring in limbo on plea for trial

IMPARTIALITY: Judge declines to rule on request for new hearing.

(02/07/08 02:41:40)

A federal judge on Wednesday said he couldn't consider former House Rep. Vic Kohring's request to have the judge overseeing his case step down.

Kohring was convicted on federal bribery and extortion charges in November and is seeking to have the case thrown out or get a new trial. He was found guilty of demanding and accepting at least $2,600 from Veco Corp. executives for his support on legislation. He had been scheduled to be sentenced Monday, but the hearing was postponed.

Kohring's attorney, John Henry Browne of Seattle, argued that U.S. District Judge John Sedwick should step down because he has a conflict of interest. Browne claimed that Kohring introduced legislation that cost Sedwick's wife, Deborah, her state job, and that Sedwick should never have presided over Kohring's trial.

In reality, she remained a state commissioner, in charge of a revamped department.

Sedwick on Monday asked U.S. District Judge Russel Holland to decide the matter.

In an order filed Wednesday, Holland said in cases such as this, a judge has to disqualify himself where his impartiality might be reasonably questioned. He sent the question back to Sedwick

The Earmark Culture Thrives in Washington
By George Will
Sunday, February 10, 2008

LEE COUNTY, Fla. -- Coconut Road near Fort Myers looks like any other concrete ribbon near housing developments, golf courses and shopping malls in this state's booming southwest. But like another fragrant slab of recent pork, the $223 million "Bridge to Nowhere" in Alaska, Coconut Road leads to somewhere darkly fascinating. It runs straight into Washington's earmark culture of waste, corruption and anticonstitutional deviousness.

Today the road ends at a chain-link fence, beyond which flows the river of traffic on Interstate 75. The earmark that would have built an interchange to connect Coconut Road to I-75 was, like the bridge, smudged with the fingerprints of Alaska's Republican Rep. Don Young, who in 2005 was chairman of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee. But this story involves more than one political vulgarian's wretched excesses. It also illustrates how Republicans earned their most recent and coming drubbings.

On July 29, 2005, the House and Senate passed legislation granting Lee County's request for $10 million for "widening and improvements for I-75" to facilitate evacuations during hurricanes. But on Feb. 19, 2005, Young had been in Bonita Springs near Fort Myers, collecting $40,000 in campaign funds. The contributors included developer Daniel Aronoff, a prolific supporter of Republicans and owner of about 4,000 acres along Coconut Road. The value of that land would be enhanced if Coconut Road were connected to I-75 by an interchange that would be adjacent to 1,200 of Aronoff's acres.

When the legislation reached the president on Aug. 10, 2005, the language about widening I-75 had been mysteriously deleted and replaced by "Coconut Rd. interchange I-75/ Lee County." So $10 million was to be spent for a project neither the House nor the Senate voted for, that Lee County did not want, and that someone unknown wrote into the legislation. But the Constitution says: "Every bill ... shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate" before it becomes law.

Young at first said the local congressman, Connie Mack, asked for the change. Mack denied that. In January 2006, Young, who subsequently changed his tune, warned Lee County that it could not spend the $10 million for the widening project it requested. Young says local residents requested the interchange project instead. But many residents, not including the developers who are Young's benefactors, oppose it for environmental and traffic reasons.

There are two mysteries: Who surreptitiously perverted the will of Congress? And why is Congress not angry and eager to identify the culprit? It seems reasonable to suspect that the answer to the first question is: Young or an agent of his. The answer, or answers, to the second question probably is, or are: Because Young is powerful -- and perhaps also because such violations of legislative due process have been committed on behalf of other members.

Fortunately, Senate rules enable an obdurate individual to force the institution to sit up and take notice. One such mechanism is a "hold," by which a senator can halt a bill. Freshman Sen. Tom Coburn is an Oklahoma Republican who happily has not learned the Senate ethic of playing nicely with others. He has put a hold on the bill that corrects technical problems in the 2005 highway bill. On Dec. 18, he announced that he will block that bill -- and its slew of earmarks; that will get members' attention -- if the bill "does not require a full and open investigation of the events leading up to the unauthorized revision of congressionally passed legislation." Coburn demands "a select committee, comprised of members of both the House and Senate," because "secret, improper and unauthorized changes to congressionally passed legislation call into question the integrity of our entire constitutional and legislative process."

Seven weeks have passed and nothing has happened. Young, 74, one of whose former aides pleaded guilty to bribery charges involving the jailed lobbyist Jack Abramoff, is the subject of an FBI investigation concerning another matter, and faces strong opposition to a 19th term. Recently, two more House Republicans -- the total is now 28 -- announced their retirements, evidence that Republicans do not expect soon to end their minority status that began 17 months after the Coconut Road earmark alteration.

In his State of the Union address, the president vowed to veto any appropriation bill "that does not cut the number and cost of earmarks in half." Coburn tartly notes that although Congress hardly needs 5,500 earmarks -- half of last year's total -- the president's goal would be met if Republicans themselves quit earmarking. That fact goes far to explain the Republicans' current and future minority status.

Rep. Young's legal fees mount, new report shows

FINANCE STATEMENT: Report says Alaska congressman paid $854,035 for lawyers in 2007; why is unknown.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

WASHINGTON -- Over the course of 2007, U.S. Rep. Don Young's re-election campaign spent $854,035 on legal fees, according to a new report filed on Thursday. And Alaska's lone congressman still isn't saying what the lawyers are doing for the money.

Meanwhile, three of Young's challengers in this year's elections -- Democrats Diane Benson and Ethan Berkowitz, and Republican Gabrielle LeDoux -- appear to have raised more money in campaign contributions than Young in the last three months of the year, although he still has more far more money in the bank.

Young, a Republican who has been in office since 1973, spent $407,190 on attorneys in the last three months of 2007 alone, according to his year-end campaign finance statement filed Thursday with the Federal Election Commission. Among the payments reported: $20,000 to Seattle criminal defense lawyer John Wolfe, who has represented former Alaska Senate President Ben Stevens in an ongoing probe into corruption in state politics.

Like Stevens, son of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, Young has not been charged with any wrongdoing. The far-reaching probe made its way to the top political leaders in Alaska, including the elder Stevens. FBI and IRS agents raided the U.S. senator's home in Girdwood last summer as part of an investigation into renovations overseen in 2000 by former Veco CEO Bill Allen. Allen, a major political fundraiser, pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers and was a witness in the ongoing corruption investigation. Veco executives have been, by far, the largest single corporate source of campaign contributions to Young since he's been in office.

Young's campaign spokesman, Mike Anderson, said he couldn't comment on what sort of legal work Young was buying with the money from his campaign account. Previously, the campaign said that Young had retained a Washington, D.C., firm for advice in connection with campaign contributions from a trucking executive under federal indictment in Wisconsin. Thursday, Anderson wouldn't elaborate.

"Mr. Young cannot comment on an ongoing investigation," Anderson said. "He's not at liberty to."

The bulk of the Young campaign legal fees reported in the last quarter, as in previous 2007 reports, went to the Washington, D.C., firm Akin Gump Strauss Hauer. The campaign paid the firm a total of $330,619.46 in four payments between October and December, the report shows. For the year, the campaign spent more than $750,000 with the firm, the reports show.

FUND SET UP

FBI - Stevens-1953

Faced with continuing legal costs, Young earlier this month set up a legal expense fund so that his campaign cash wouldn't have to go toward lawyers. Some potential donors had said that they would like to donate to his campaign, Anderson said, but not his legal expenses. Others said they would contribute to his legal bills and not his campaign, Anderson said, so they decided to establish the fund.

The legal fund allows donors who have already contributed the maximum $4,600 allowed by law to contribute as much as $5,000 to the legal expense account. Lobbyists are barred from donating to it and Young can't actively solicit contributions, but individuals and corporations are allowed to give him money. Corporations are forbidden from donating directly to re-election campaigns, however.

Federal Election Commission rules allow public officials to spend their campaign money on attorneys, as long as the legal work is connected to the lawmaker's capacity as an officeholder.

According to filings with the FEC, Young's campaign account hovers just under $1 million, but he has an additional $238,000 in his Midnight Sun political action committee account.

Young took in just $43,850 in the final quarter of 2007, a poor showing for a once-legendary fundraiser who traveled the country picking up checks from donors when he served as chairman of the House Transportation Committee.

Anderson said the campaign is pleased with its totals.

"Those represent a lot of Alaskans who gave something because they believe in Congressman Young, and are willing to give him the benefit of the doubt," Anderson said.

But nearly all of Young's opponents fared better last quarter. The sole Republican in the race, state Rep. Gabrielle LeDoux of Kodiak, hadn't yet filed her FEC report late Thursday, but in an interview, she said that she brought in about $110,000 in three months. There was no way of independently confirming the amount.

"This is the first time in a generation that there's ever really been a congressional race in Alaska," LeDoux said. "I think the amount of money I was able to raise in just one quarter shows that there are, No. 1, a lot of people who are unhappy with Congressman Young and, No. 2, a lot of people out there who think I have a decent chance of winning the race."

LeDoux irritated other state Republicans by holding fundraisers in Juneau during the legislative session, and they threatened to vote her out of the caucus. She announced last week that, although it was legal to raise money during the legislative session, she would hold off until it ends.

Young's leading Democratic challenger, former state House minority leader Ethan Berkowitz, has raised $124,201, but has spent little of it so far.

"We're spending some, but we're preparing for a long, expensive battle," Berkowitz said. "Don Young has a lot of money in the bank and a lot of accounts to draw on. He has a lot of resources he can deploy."

Young's 2006 general election opponent, Diane Benson, raised $52,230 in the last quarter of 2007, said her campaign manager, Jeff Leanna. He said he estimates that she has about $32,000 cash on hand. Her FEC paperwork was also not available late Thursday.

Former state Democratic Party chief Jake Metcalfe raised $31,242 and has $11,393 left in his campaign account, FEC filings show.

In the U.S. Senate race, a preliminary FEC report filed by Stevens shows that he raised $207,606 over the past three months. Stevens has $1.7 million in his campaign war chest.

Young's money

Legal defense fund allows friends to double down

(02/06/08 00:30:35)

When you work in a job where you get to write your own ethical rules, you can make some sweet financial arrangements.

Like when you're a member of Congress. You can take thousands of dollars from people who want you to do things for them, and you get to pretend that these financial transactions in no way influence the work you do. They're just campaign contributions, you see. They're not bribes because you can't actually put the money in your pocket to use as you please. But you do get to spend the money on things that are essential to preserving your famous and powerful position.

Like when you do something on the job that gets you in trouble with the law, as Alaska Rep. Don Young has. You need legal help, and good lawyers are expensive, as Don Young well knows. He has burned up $854,000 of his campaign contributions on lawyers.

He has burned up so much money on lawyers, he decided to create his own legal defense fund. And what do you know? That fund allows him to go back to his campaign benefactors and hit them up for even more money.

How convenient.

When an elected official spends that much on lawyers, most people would figure he's already in big-time legal trouble. But the authorities have not charged Congressman Young with any crime.

So why the huge legal bills, Congressman Young?

He won't say. He doesn't want to talk about it. Ongoing investigation, you know.

Uh-huh.

Well, we do know he has drawn fire for handing out transportation funding earmarks that benefit Outside donors to his campaign.

We do know his campaign accepted $180,000 over the years from Veco executives. Alaska's corruption trials have revealed that Veco executives got repaid for at least some donations with corporate funds, which is illegal.

We do know Rep. Young also got potentially illegal help from Veco personnel in staging campaign fundraisers. He belatedly amended his campaign finance reports to show payments to Veco's Bill Allen for fundraising activity.

But Don Young doesn't want to talk about any of it. He said he can't even tell Alaskans he's done nothing wrong. Can't comment. Ongoing investigation.

FBI - Stevens-1956

194A-AN-13620-M;770

If Rep. Young wants to continue being Alaska's congressman, he's going to have to explain these ethically dubious arrangements.

And if he doesn't explain them, Alaska voters shouldn't let him use silence to slither his way to re-election.

BOTTOM LINE: Here's one more dubious development involving Don Young.

Habitat division is going home

Gov. Sarah Palin has decided to return the state's habitat division to the state Department of Fish and Game. In other words, she's returning the habitat division to its natural habitat.

In 2003, then-Gov. Frank Murkowski, with tales of blocked development and lost jobs and income, essentially gutted the Division of Habitat and Restoration, pulled it from Fish and Game, renamed it the Office of Habitat Management and Permitting and sharply curtailed Fish and Game's traditional role in habitat protection. The purpose was to give more authority to the Department of Natural Resources. The goal was to speed development.

Many of the state's professional habitat biologists disputed the governor's claims. Their morale plunged with their authority.

For the first time in state history, Fish and Game was not the lead state agency in habitat protection. A later memorandum of understanding between the two departments seemed to seal Fish and Game's junior status.

That will change.

"It's gonna be restored to its original state," said Sharon Leighow, deputy press aide to Gov. Palin.

Most Alaskans probably don't care if habitat protection is run out of Fish and Game, DNR, or weights and measures, provided Alaska's wildlife, water, fresh air and natural beauty are protected.

But the signal from the Murkowski administration was clear, and it reversed the old Jay Hammond principle with a policy that said, "When in doubt, err on the side of development."

The current chiefs of DNR and Fish and Game, Tom Irwin and Denby Lloyd, said this week the habitat office has done well in DNR, but agreed its work will be more effective in Fish and Game.

The move restores balance to state management, where the challenge always is developing resources while protecting habitat. If these two departments pull together as they promise, Alaskans will be better off.

BOTTOM LINE: The governor undoes the wrong-headed move of her predecessor on the habitat division.

Allen teen sex inquiry reopened

BAMBI: Police look into claim ex-Veco boss had sex with underage girl.

By RICHARD MAUER

Anchorage police have reopened an investigation into allegations that Bill Allen, the government's key witness in the ongoing corruption inquiry and once a leading political force in Alaska, had sex with an underage girl in the mid-1990s.

The investigation originally began in 2004 as an offshoot of the scandalous Josef Boehm sex and drug ring, according to Detective Kevin Vandegriff, who worked with federal investigators on the Boehm case.

But when federal prosecutors asked Anchorage police to suspend the investigation shortly after it began, the department complied, he said.

The Allen investigation was dormant until December, when it was reopened, said Capt. Gardner Cobb, the city's chief of detectives. The evidence of wrongdoing on the part of Allen, now 70, was contradictory and never strong, both Cobb and Vandegriff said.

But Vandegriff decided to go back into the case, interviewing witnesses and reviewing the record, "to make sure there's nothing else out there that we're missing," Cobb said in an interview in December. Vandegriff is still following leads and the investigation remains open, APD spokesman Paul Honeman said Friday.

The specific allegation was sexual abuse of a minor, Cobb said, a crime for which there is no statute of limitations.

A MIGHTY FALL

Allen pleaded guilty in May to bribing Alaska lawmakers. Once the chairman and an owner of the oil field services company Veco, he was forced to sell the company and now faces a lengthy prison term. That's a stunning fall for a power broker who handed oil-policy decrees to a stable of bribed legislators and who regularly socialized with senators and other national political figures who came to Alaska as guests of Sen. Ted Stevens.

At the time the Boehm investigation was developing, from 2003 to 2004, Allen was still a major player in Alaska politics, as he had been for decades, and was a reliable source of campaign money for state candidates, members of Alaska's congressional delegation and other national politicians. In 2000 he was Alaska co-chairman of President Bush's election campaign.

In an interview in October, Vandegriff wouldn't name Allen's alleged victim or victims. He said Allen was not a direct subject of the Boehm investigation. But he said there was one person involved in both the Boehm case and the investigation of Allen: Bambi Tyree, one of Boehm's co-defendants.

Vince Blomfield, Tyree's boyfriend starting around 1999 when he was 36 and she was 18, said in an interview with a private investigator working for Boehm that Tyree claimed to have had a sexual relationship with Allen when she was 14 or 15. Allen would have been in his late 50s at the time. The interview with Blomfield was cited in a court filing by Boehm's attorneys, who were trying to portray Tyree as having a history of preying on older men with money.

FBI - Stevens-1958

Allen's attorney, Robert Bundy, said Allen denied having an improper relationship with Tyree, now 27.

CASE RE-EVALUATED

Cobb wouldn't say what prompted the department to reopen the case. But the action follows inquiries by the Daily News, a surge in activity in civil lawsuits by Boehm's underage victims, and a reference to the Allen-Tyree allegation in a closed hearing in at least one of the recent federal corruption trials, where Allen was the government's chief witness. The existence of the investigation was first reported last week by the weekly Anchorage Press.

Tyree's father, Mark, who died in 2005, also figures in the ongoing federal corruption investigation in Alaska. He installed the furnace and plumbing in the Veco-supervised renovations to Sen. Ted Stevens' home in 2000, according to Robert Williams, the former Veco employee who hired Tyree.

Mark Tyree's name is mentioned in at least one federal grand jury subpoena concerning Veco and Ted Stevens.

COCAINE AND GIRLS

Boehm, now 64, was the wealthy owner of Alaska Industrial Hardware and other businesses, but his deep addiction to crack cocaine and his unrelenting attraction to girls and young women got him an 11-year federal prison sentence in 2005. He is currently at the minimum security Seagoville Federal Correctional Institution near Dallas.

Tyree was also a crack addict. As one of Boehm's original co-defendants, she pleaded guilty to finding the teenage girls for the ring in return for a seemingly limitless supply of cocaine sold to Boehm by her friends and others. Recognizing her cooperation with authorities and her abuse as a young teen by Boehm and other men, Judge John Sedwick sentenced her to three years.

She was released Sept. 6, 2006, and is living and working in Anchorage. Through her attorney, federal public defender Sue Ellen Tatter, Tyree declined to comment.

In the October interview, Vandegriff said he heard no suggestions that Allen was a visitor to Boehm's Oceanview home or the many "parties" Boehm held at hotels around town.

OLDER MEN

Though Tyree's extensive juvenile record remains sealed, her background has surfaced in several court cases, including a separate federal drug prosecution in 1996. The record shows a long pattern of involvement with older men. Bambi had just turned 15 when she, her older sister Tia, then 18, and 42-year-old Billy Ray Lang were arrested at the airport after a flight from California. The Tyree sisters had a combined 11 pounds of cocaine strapped into girdles they had bought before the trip in a Spenard extra-large shop.

Bambi was ordered to McLaughlin Youth Center. But Tia was held in jail and the girls' parents, Mark and Cris Tyree, testified about the family in an effort to get her released on bail. Bambi, a frequent runaway since age 11 and a Wasilla middle-school dropout, had moved in with Lang in the fall of 1995 when she was 14, Cris Tyree said. Cris Tyree described Lang as Tia's pimp and said that he ran an Anchorage call-girl service named "Cover Girls."

"I was told he was using my daughters," Cris Tyree testified.

Boehm pleaded guilty to cocaine and sexual exploitation charges. The government sought to portray his crimes as particularly egregious, deserving the maximum sentence. The defense tried to show him as a doddering, addled old man exploited for his money by a string of addicts and dealers, with Bambi Tyree first among them. It was a pattern Tyree had established for herself, they asserted, referring to Bill Allen. Vince Blomfield said it was the case in his relationship with her as well.

"She suffers from a heavy crack addiction, and her actions were geared toward obtaining funds to feed that habit," the defense said in a memorandum filed under seal and obtained by the Daily News. "Tyree often obtained the required funds by exploiting rich men."

'B.A.' CITED IN TRANSCRIPTS

Citing their private investigator's interviews with Blomfield and another friend of Tyree's, Marty Myre, the memorandum said that in addition to Boehm, "she developed a relationship with another rich and powerful businessman in Alaska, B.A."

"Bambi claimed that B.A. bought her a vehicle and that on one occasion he gave her $5,000," the defense document said.

While the court documents don't further identify "B.A.," in footnotes, the memorandum referenced pages in the transcripts of a Sept. 23, 2004, interview with Blomfield and a Nov. 10, 2004, interview with Myre. Copies of the transcripts obtained by the Daily News show the initials "B.A." referred to Bill Allen on those pages.

Blomfield, who now works at a Fairbanks strip club, turned down a request for an interview. Myre, a guide and contractor, also wouldn't talk.

LOVE AND MONEY

In the transcript of the Sept. 23, 2004, interview, Blomfield said he met Tyree at a convenience store phone booth around 1999 when she was 18. He pegged her for a party girl and asked her if she wanted a ride. She did, and the relationship developed quickly before coming to a halt when his money ran out, he said.

Tyree told Blomfield she was just ending a relationship with Allen, Blomfield said.

"He figured out, I think, to get as far away from -- you know, because to my knowledge, Bill Allen did not use drugs. He drank and partied with her," Blomfield told the private investigator.

Blomfield said Tyree told him she had a sexual relationship with Allen when she was 14 or 15.

That age range would've extended from the time she ran away to Bill Ray Lang's place in East Anchorage to after her release from McLaughlin on the cocaine trafficking charge.

"His name (Allen) came up constantly," Blomfield said. "She would leave me and go get money from him," Blomfield said. "Her father literally told me under his own words that he had met Bill and that Bill had told him that he was dating his daughter." Blomfield said he was present when Bambi called Allen in Washington, D.C.

FBI - Stevens-1960

"I spent Christmas with Bambi's family, and there were presents under the tree for the entire family from Bill Allen. He had bought her sister a car. He had given her father a number of contracts."

Blomfield said he thought Allen got the car for Bambi Tyree when she was 16. The family always referred to the vehicle "as the car that Bill bought," Blomfield said.

Public records confirm that Bambi Tyree got a new 1999 black Volkswagen Beetle on Nov. 30, 1998, but she wasn't 16 -- she was approaching her 18th birthday and just getting out of another stay at McLaughlin. Nothing in the record indicates who made the down payment. Her parents were listed as co-owners.

Three pickups owned by members of the Tyree family are connected to Allen or Veco.

A 1994 Ford originally owned by Veco Equipment was transferred to Mark Tyree in 2002, according to public records. The truck is now registered to Tyree's brother, James. The records don't show how the truck was financed.

State records show that a 1998 Ford pickup was similarly transferred to Bambi's brother Anthony from Veco Equipment Inc. on Sept. 13, 2006, again with no reference to a price.

Bill Allen's name appears as the note holder on the registration for a 2003 Ford truck registered by Anthony, according to state vehicle records.

Anthony Tyree couldn't be located for comment. A neighbor of the family home in Wasilla said she believed Anthony is attending school out of state.

BLOMFIELD CLAIM DISPUTED

In a handwritten note to the Daily News last year, Cris Tyree said Blomfield never came to her house at Christmas. She described him as "an unreliable source" with drug problems himself and a criminal record. She wouldn't answer questions.

Court records show Blomfield had several forgery and escape convictions, mostly misdemeanors and all related to his drug addiction. In 2001, his mother urged a judge to give him a maximum jail sentence to keep him away from narcotics. (Ironically, some of the money that financed his cocaine use during the time he was dating Tyree would have come from the FBI: His share of money paid by the agency to the real estate company owned by Blomfield's family, which built the FBI's downtown headquarters, according to information in one of his court cases.)

ALLEN BEFRIENDED FAMILY

Robert Bundy, Allen's attorney, said Allen had an above-board friendship with the entire Tyree family.

FBI - Stevens-1961

"Bill says he never had any kind of illicit relationship with her, ever," Bundy said. "(Mark) Tyree was a plumber who did good work, did a lot of work on Bill's stuff. He got to know him over the years."

Bundy said Allen doesn't remember how he met Mark Tyree, but it was "before he ever heard of Bambi."

"He and Mark became pretty good pals because they kind of had similar backgrounds, they both dropped out of high school, and got a trade," Bundy said. Allen never had a sexual relationship with Tyree at any age, Bundy said.

Mark Tyree died of cancer at his Wasilla home on April 1, 2005. Allen was with Tyree at his deathbed, Bundy said, and promised to take care of the family.

CASE WAS SHAKY

Detective Vandegriff of the Anchorage Police Department declined to say whether Blomfield was one of his original sources when he opened the case against Allen in February 2004.

"It came up as part of the Boehm investigation," he said. "It just came out as part of the interviews."

The initial case against Allen "wasn't very solid," he added. "We had some contradictory information, but I was just kind of getting started."

Then federal prosecutors told him to "cease and desist," he said.

The joint city-federal prosecution was run by two assistant U.S. attorneys, Frank Russo and James Goeke. Tyree testified that both prosecutors participated in the 15 to 20 hours of debriefings she underwent with the FBI and detectives as part of her plea deal.

Goeke, now with the prosecution team pursuing the corruption cases, didn't return several calls for comment.

Russo acknowledged "there were allegations along the lines of his (Allen's) involvement with Bambi Tyree," but said he asked Vandegriff to suspend the Allen investigation for purely practical reasons: The Boehm case was complex, with dozens of witnesses, and Boehm himself had a high-powered, three-attorney defense team that fought at every opportunity. Nearly 1,000 documents were filed, and that was in a case that never went to trial.

"We said, 'Hey, why don't we put this aside until later. We have enough to focus on,' " Russo said. That was his only concern, he said.

Federal prosecutors and the FBI have not yet provided a historical account of how the corruption investigation began and how it evolved with Veco and Allen at its center. Court filings by federal prosecutors since made public show it was well under way in the fall of 2005 with court-ordered wiretaps and later, video surveillance of Allen and a Veco vice president. That would have been 18 months after Vandegriff opened his case.

Russo added, "There were no charges ever brought against Allen for anything related to what Boehm was doing. In terms of the sexual assault of a minor, that's something that APD has on their files; they're free to do whatever they want with that."

FBI - Stevens-1962

Vandegriff said Russo's request was fine with him.

"I had plenty on my plate to do with the Boehm investigation, and when I was told to stop that one, no problem," the detective said in the October interview.

While mentions of the relationship between Tyree and Allen have appeared in court, most have been heard in closed proceedings or referenced in sealed filings. That was the case in the Boehm prosecution, and also in the recent federal bribery prosecutions.

Judge Sedwick, the federal district judge who presided over the Boehm cases, is also the judge in the corruption cases.

"You can presume ... that the judge knows all about it," Russo said, referring to the Allen allegations.

ONE CASE LED TO ANOTHER

The issue arose at a closed-door hearing during former Rep. Pete Kott's corruption trial in September just as Allen was taking the stand. Government prosecutors, required to disclose information about their witness, volunteered that Allen wasn't coerced to plead guilty by evidence concerning his relationship with Tyree, according to Kott's lawyer Jim Wendt. Had that happened, Wendt said, it might have been relevant to his case.

Still, Allen's decision to cooperate with the government, made in a single August day in 2006, seemed extraordinarily swift, Wendt said. "I did not understand why Bill Allen would have flipped so fast, and I still don't understand. I don't know if it has anything to do with this young woman or for other reasons," Wendt said.

Asked whether Allen's relationship with Tyree was one of the issues that arose during closed hearings in the next bribery case, that of Rep. Victor Kohring, defense attorney John Henry Browne said, "That's something that we were not allowed to go into," but also said he couldn't "confirm or deny that that was one of them because that would be violating the order of the judge."

In December, secrecy issues in the Boehm case flared anew, this time involving more than a half-dozen plaintiffs -- mostly formerly juvenile victims -- seeking to recover damages from Boehm and his codefendants in the criminal case.

With lawyers poised to depose Vandegriff's APD partner in the Boehm investigation, Detective Steven Boltz, the U.S. Attorney's office intervened to make sure his testimony remained under seal. Assistant U.S. attorney Daniel Cooper said at an emergency hearing in federal court Dec. 18, just before Boltz' deposition, that he was trying to ensure that the identities of juvenile witnesses were protected and grand jury proceedings remained secret. He didn't mention Allen or Tyree.

The civil cases against Boehm were tentatively settled two weeks ago. The terms are secret.

Alaska Ear

(02/03/08 01:14:49)

GRAYBAR JOURNAL ... Former Rep. Tom Anderson writes that he's settling in, has a job as a tutor and is getting used to the ugly uniforms -- a cheery note all in all considering he's writing from federal prison in Oregon. He's made lots of new friends, an earwig reports. Alas, most of them drug dealers, which make up much of the prison population.

Tom jokes that he, Vic Kohring and Pete Kott are going to form an Alaska political caucus.

PERFORMANCE ART ... Tuesday promises an ear-worthy experience at Loussac Library. This year's "Big Read" selection is the all-time favorite "To Kill a Mockingbird" by Harper Lee. From noon to 1 p.m. in the Wilda Marston, sponsors will stage a reading of the famous courtroom scene with an all-star cast: Former Mayor Rick Mystrom will play defense attorney Atticus Finch, Mayor Begich is the prosecutor, Rex Butler is Tom the defendant and John Tracy is the Judge.

The Big Read is a national community-based effort to promote reading, sponsored by the National Endowment for the Arts.

CLOSE CALL ... This story of skiing peril comes from Sen. Kim Elton's weekly newsletter: "Senate Sergeant-At-Arms Gary Stambaugh was snowed under last weekend, but not at work. Gary was caught in an avalanche while skiing outside the boundaries of Eaglecrest.

"He ended up being swept down the mountain about 900 feet. At the end of the slide he was buried in snow lying on his side with only the fingers at the end of his extended arm above the snow. Skiers who saw the avalanche were able to quickly dig him out. We're glad to have him back."

Darlings, listen to Ear. This is what happens to people who go outside when they don't have to.

WHO? ... Uncle Ted's calendar arrived in the mail last week. Nice photo, although Ben looks a little glum. The caption says "The Stevens family gathered for the wedding of Laura Beth Covich to Phil Sexton in Arizona." No, Ear has no idea who they are. Sounds like the title of a Victorian painting.

A QUESTION ... Is there any truth to the rumor that Jim Clark and Bill Corbus brokered the deal, or whatever one would call it, that brought Frank the Bank out of hiding to run point for the North Slope producers in the gas line debate?

It seems unlikely to earwigs asked for their opinion. The rumor was sparked by Clark and Corbus showing up around town with the former governor, who appears to still rent an apartment in the Bittner house downtown.

The Divine Appendage freely admits Ear doesn't get it. What does Frank think he's doing, and who does he think cares? A concerned observer asked Ear to forward a message: "Hey Frank, Papa Pilgrim wants his hat back."

ORDER IN THE COURT ... We're getting a new Supreme Court justice soon. Daniel Winfree, a Fairbanks lawyer with a good reputation but no judicial experience, will be sworn in at the Rabinowitz Courthouse on Feb. 12. A reception follows at the Fairbanks Princess Riverside Lodge.

OUT AND ABOUT ... Greg Wilhoit, a key character in John Grisham's nonfiction book "The Innocent Man," will speak at Borders Books and Music on Dimond this coming Thursday at 7 p.m. The book is a story of wrongful conviction, and the event is sponsored by the Alaska Innocence Project.

GET WELL SOON ... Friends of former Rep. Mike Szymanski say he's doing well after a heart attack on Jan. 22. Calling himself "born again," the ever irreverent Mike is urging people to take chest symptoms seriously and get to the hospital right away.

A PATHETIC PLEA ... News that Don Young, Congressman for Fewer and Fewer Alaskans Including Ear and Others, had trouble raising campaign money for the last quarter of 2007 struck terror in the heart of the Luscious Lobe. Is it too early to endorse darling Don for re-election? Even if he gets indicted? Even if he's in the cell next to Tom Anderson? Please? Ear is not above begging. This column would be in such trouble without him.

THE MAGIC TOUCH ... The image manipulators at Conoco Phillips have really nailed the Alaska psyche. The company is looking to develop oil in the National Petroleum Reserve-Alaska, which requires federal approval of a development "unit." On Thursday, the Bureau of Land Management announced approval of "The Greater Moose's Tooth Unit," just west of the Colville River.

Could they have chosen a more popular name? Maybe "The Lucky Wishbone Unit," but that's about it. Good work, guys.

ON THE MOVE ... Bingo Barnes, the short-lived publisher of the Anchorage Press, left the job Tuesday, and reportedly the state -- to spend more time with his family, of course. People who listen to bugs planted in the Worldwide Headquarter of the Press say there was no prior indication of family issues but no one seems that sorry to see him go. Want to know more? Ask an Eskimo. (If you don't get the reference, check a Aug. 31 story on the KTVA Web site or Ear on 9/2/07).

Kohring accuses his trial judge of bias

Ex-legislator says he tried to cut job of Sedwick's wife

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com

(02/05/08 00:09:39)

Late last week, just days before his scheduled sentencing on corruption charges, former state Rep. Vic Kohring accused the federal judge presiding over his case of bias and asked that a jury's guilty verdicts be thrown out.

On Monday, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick asked another judge to decide if he should step aside.

Sedwick postponed Kohring's sentencing until U.S. District Judge Russel Holland issues a ruling in the matter. Sentencing had been set for Feb. 11.

Prosecutors say Kohring's efforts to dismiss the case or get a new trial are unwarranted.

Kohring says he didn't get a fair trial because of a bitter public feud with the judge's wife, Deborah Sedwick, a former state commissioner whose agency budget he tried to cut and whose department and job he said he eliminated.

In a telephone interview Monday evening, Kohring said he didn't connect Judge Sedwick to former Commissioner Sedwick until Deborah Sedwick showed up for closing arguments at his trial.

"What is my worst political rival and enemy doing at my trial here, at the courtroom?" Kohring said he wondered. He said he didn't even know the Sedwicks were related but researched public records and news archives and found out they were married.

"Once I made this connection, I was sickened. My heart sunk into my stomach, and I was just stunned by what I learned," Kohring said.

A federal jury convicted Kohring in November of bribery, conspiracy and attempted extortion. Executives with the former Veco Corp. testified they bribed him to push an industry-backed version of an oil production tax on profits.

Kohring said a series of rulings by Sedwick "crippled my ability to win in court." He maintains he never took bribes.

According to Kohring's attorney, John Henry Browne of Seattle, a bill by Kohring did away with Deborah Sedwick's high-level state job and cost the couple at least $10,000 a year because of her reduced salary.

FBI - Stevens-1966

That's what Browne said in court papers filed Friday.

But as it turns out, Deborah Sedwick did not lose her job. She remained a commissioner with a revamped agency. And her salary went up over the years, not down, according to state officials.

In his order handing the issue to Holland, Judge Sedwick wrote that he doesn't recall ever talking with his wife or otherwise hearing about actions Kohring took as a legislator against her.

While Kohring talks about eliminating two state departments in "one of the most significant pieces of legislation in the history of this state," others say the two agencies were simply merged.

Judge Sedwick wrote that his wife became commissioner of the combined department.

That's exactly what happened, said Mike Black, deputy commissioner of what's now known as the Department of Commerce, Community and Economic Development.

"Commissioner Sedwick survived all that," Black said.

Efforts to reach Deborah Sedwick were unsuccessful. The judge declined to be interviewed.

The details about what actually happened eluded Browne for a while.

In the motion filed Friday, Browne wrote: "It is beyond comprehension that the antagonistic relationship between Ms. Sedwick and the defendant was not the subject of conversation between Judge Sedwick and his wife at the time of her conflicts with Mr. Kohring."

"It is even more unlikely that this was not discussed ... at the time Representative Kohring was charged. This is particularly true since Mr. Kohring's legislation actually eliminated Ms. Sedwick('s) job, greatly reduced the budget of her department and eliminated at least $10,000 annually from the Sedwick household income."

MANIPULATING FACTS

But that distorts the facts, according to Black and other state officials.

Browne also noted that Sedwick lives across the street from former Veco chief executive Bill Allen, one of the government's star witnesses, and that he went to high school with former Veco vice president Rick Smith.

All of that should have been aired before the trial, Browne said. It's no different from jurors having a perceived conflict of interest, he said.

Prosecutors aren't buying it.

"From what I have read thus far, I imagine that we are going to oppose this as completely unwarranted," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Joe Bottini. Prosecutors are seeking a five-year prison term for Kohring.

FBI - Stevens-1967

In the late 1990s, Kohring, an anti-tax Republican from Wasilla, and Commissioner Sedwick, a Knowles appointee, went after each other publicly.

In a "Budget Alert" in April 1998, she called his budget-cutting proposals "draconian" and "devastating," Kohring says in a sworn statement filed in court recently.

He responded with a press release that said state employees were spending like "drunken sailors."

His bill that year would have downgraded Deborah Sedwick's department to a division and cut her pay to roughly $74,000, Kohring says in his affidavit.

But his proposal didn't pass.

The next year, Kohring tried again with a different bill, which got through. But as the two departments merged into one, Sedwick came out on top. She remained commissioner until she resigned shortly after the November 2002 election that brought Republican Frank Murkowski into office.

Browne said Monday that he didn't understand those nuances until he talked again with Kohring.

Kohring said he still believes lingering bad feelings contributed to rulings against him that kept evidence of his innocence from the jury.

For example, Sedwick limited cross-examination of Allen, preventing questioning about allegations of sexual misconduct that could have damaged Allen's credibility, Kohring said.

"The whole thing is really starting to stink," Browne said.

Uh-oh

Federal law inhibits reform move

(01/31/08 00:50:15)

A useful reform measure pending in the Alaska Legislature has run afoul of a decade-old federal court ruling from the other side of the country.

Alaska lawmakers are considering whether to ban legislators from collecting campaign contributions for any office -- state, local or federal -- while the Legislature is in session. The move would close a troublesome loophole in the legislative ethics law.

A legislator cannot take contributions for a state legislative race during the legislative session but can take money for a statewide, federal or local election contest. That loophole allows special interests to buy special access to ambitious legislators while they are reviewing and voting on legislation.

Closing this loophole sounds like it would be a pretty simple matter.

Not so -- at least when it comes to legislators aiming for federal office.

Georgia's Legislature long ago passed a fundraising ban like the one being considered here in Alaska. A disgruntled Georgia legislator sued. In 1996, he won a federal appeals court ruling that struck down the fundraising restriction as it applies to federal election campaigns. Georgia's restriction on its legislators' fundraising, the court said, was pre-empted by federal election law. The U.S. Supreme Court let that ruling stand.

That leaves Alaska legislators with a tough choice. They can respect the ruling and pass a limited reform that leaves intact the federal election fundraising loophole. Or the Legislature could contradict the federal court ruling and tell its members they can't raise any campaign money during the session -- period.

We know which choice would work best for Alaskans. During the session, legislators should be working for people who elected them, instead of dialing for campaign dollars in any race -- especially an expensive federal contest that covers the entire state.

And who knows, there's a decent chance that, given a second look at the question, the federal courts might rule the other way.

The appeals court split 2-1 in the Georgia case, and the dissenting judge made an excellent point. The Georgia restriction, he said, doesn't apply to all Georgia candidates for federal office, so it is not an illegal attempt to meddle in federal elections, an area where the federal government is the sole boss. The Georgia Legislature was merely saying what its members were not allowed to do. That's a matter for the Georgia Legislature, not the federal government, to decide.

In the decade since that ruling, the U.S. Supreme Court has struck down some federal laws because they go too far in treading on state government powers. New legal standards set in those cases might help reverse the misguided decision in the Georgia case.

Given the corruption that afflicted the Alaska Legislature, Alaskans want and need legislators to uphold the strongest possible ethical standards. Include a federal election fundraising ban in the legislative ethics reform -- and should any lawmaker decide to challenge it, let's see if the federal courts will come to their senses.

BOTTOM LINE: The tighter the ban on campaign fundraising during a legislative session, the better.

He's ba-a-ck

State doesn't need this help

Ex-Gov. Frank Murkowski is back, "intending to join gas line debate."

As Dave Barry would say, we are not making this up.

This is the governor who gave away the store in his proposed gas line contract with Exxon, Conoco and BP. In return, he got little more than a promise the Big Three would keep sort-of-working on a gas line, which would get built whenever it suited them.

This is the governor who derailed his own gas line promotion efforts by indulging those same three multi-national companies' additional demand for "certainty" on oil taxes.

But hey, Murkowski's return to the gas line issue is a truly inspirational act of political hubris. Maybe it will inspire other discredited political figures to return to the scene of the disasters they helped create.

Imagine, George Bush might pop up a few months after he leaves office and volunteer to help the new president figure a way out of Iraq.

Michael Brown, President Bush's horse-fancying FEMA director, might come back and offer to help reconstruct post-hurricane New Orleans.

Heck, ex-president Bill Clinton might volunteer to teach abstinence-only classes to teenage girls.

How could ex-Gov. Murkowski be of most help in bringing Alaska a North Slope gas line?

By heeding the verdict of Alaska voters and quietly returning to his political retirement.

BOTTOM LINE: Frank Murkowski help with the state's gas line promotion efforts? No thanks.

Judge overturns APOC ruling on payment to Stevens

FINANCIAL DISCLOSURE: No laws in place then required that the income be reported.

By JEANNETTE J. LEE
The Associated Press
(01/29/08 02:39:33)

Former state Senate president Ben Stevens, who has been embroiled in political scandal over the past year, has won a small victory in a dispute with the state's legislative watchdog over financial disclosure laws.

The Alaska Public Offices Commission last year found that Stevens failed to report payments from his service on the board of directors of Semco Energy, parent company of Alaska's largest utility.

The commission recommended that Stevens pay a fine of $630 for failing to disclose more than $70,000 in deferred compensation from Semco.

Superior Court Judge Mark Rindner ruled against the commission on Friday, saying the laws that would have compelled Stevens to report the income were not in place at the time.

The ruling hinged on Rindner's determination that Stevens did not have to report any deferred payments for 2005, two years before a law requiring such disclosures went into effect.

"Stevens cannot be punished for failing to disclose information that the Legislature should have required him to disclose if, in fact, the Legislature did not mandate such disclosure," Rindner wrote. "It was error to assess a civil penalty against him."

Stevens did not run for re-election in 2006.

Semco is the parent company of Enstar Natural Gas Co., Alaska's largest utility.

APOC Director Brooke Miles said on Monday she had not finished reading the decision and could not comment. She referred calls to the Department of Law, which didn't immediately respond.

Calls to Stevens' lawyer, John Wolfe, were not immediately returned.

The complaint against Stevens, R-Anchorage, was brought by the Republican Moderate Party. The party claimed Stevens failed to report payments worth $74,000 received from Semco Energy three years ago.

A separate lawsuit over income Stevens received from a consulting firm in which he held an interest has yet to be decided, Miles said.

The company, Advance North, was established by Stevens and Trevor McCabe, a former legislative director for U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, Ben Stevens' father. McCabe now is sole owner of the company.

Stevens is one of six Alaska lawmakers who had their offices raided by the FBI in 2006 in an ongoing federal probe into corruption in the state Legislature. Two lawmakers have been convicted for ties to Veco Corp., a former oil field services company.

Two former Veco executives have testified in those trials that they bribed Stevens, but he has not been charged. Stevens, through his lawyer, has denied any wrongdoing.

Health shopping

State's proposal for a health Web site will help consumers

(01/30/08 00:28:35)

Say you were shopping around for knee surgery, and wanted to know which hospital does more knee surgeries, and charges the least.

Or maybe you just want to find the lowest-priced blood-pressure medicine in town.

Your search would be a lot easier, if the Legislature passes the main piece of health care legislation offered by Gov. Sarah Palin this session. It calls for the state to create a health information Web site that would provide cost comparisons and quality ratings for consumers.

This is a good step. Because the information isn't readily available, prices for different health care procedures are pretty much a mystery to most of us. And they shouldn't be.

Dr. Jay Butler, the state's chief medical officer, walked state senators through different states' Web sites during a committee hearing last week.

On the Michigan Department of Community Health Web site, browsers can complete a questionnaire and get a report on how they might improve their health.

On floridahealthfinder.gov, you can check the price of a prescription at pharmacies in your town or even your ZIP code.

The price for 30 40-milligram tablets of the blood pressure medicine Lisinopril ranged from $19.99 to $56.08.

Also in Florida, you can pick a medical procedure and produce a list that tells how often the procedure was performed at each hospital in your area, the average cost at each hospital, and the average length of hospital stay.

In Broward County, Fla., knee replacements ranged from $46,551 to $51,821.

New Hampshire's nhhealthcost.org is even slicker: You put in your health insurance info, and it breaks down the cost by what you personally might expect to pay, plus the insurance company bill.

These possibilities are all intriguing.

The governor's bill was put together quickly, and doesn't spell out exactly what might be included on Alaska's Web site.

Sen. Fred Dyson, R-Eagle River, has sponsored a bill that includes more detail on the information that should go on the Web site, but is less specific on who would put it together.

194A-AN-13620-M;FF6

The governor's bill creates a health commission for ongoing planning, and a health information office to gather data and produce the Web site. Dyson said after last week's hearing that the bills may be merged.

Health and Social Services Commissioner Karleen Jackson said the information site is to "empower consumers to take control of their health."

It would do that to a certain extent. It would offer the information many need to help themselves.

We shouldn't kid ourselves, though, that a state health information site will reduce the overall costs of medical care. Insurers, the government and physicians all have a bigger say in the costs than lowly consumers.

Oftentimes, people in Alaska don't have a choice of hospitals. Even in Anchorage, where there are two private ones, insurance companies usually decide which one is preferred. If you go to the one that's not, you might pay a penalty.

Even so, having price and quality information readily available will make Alaskans better consumers.

BOTTOM LINE: We should have a state Web site that lets Alaskans price medical services.

Culture change

New ethics rule could help

The Alaska Legislature's perfunctory way of handling conflicts of interest hurts public confidence in the institution. Just about any conflict -- whether long known to voters or brand new, trivial or profound -- is OK, as long as it is disclosed. To abstain from a vote, every one of the lawmaker's colleagues must grant permission. If there's a single anonymous objection, the lawmaker must vote, despite the conflict.

Anchorage Rep. Kevin Meyer is right -- it's time his colleagues revisit this tolerant approach. He wants a new rule that makes two changes. The legislator would have to explain the basic details of his or her conflict. (An explanation is optional now.) Then, permission to abstain would be decided by majority vote, not an anonymous chirp from a single colleague.

Rep. Meyer's change would help, but it won't necessarily change the Legislature's automatic tolerance for almost any conflict.

What's needed is a new default standard: A member with a conflict should expect to abstain, unless his colleagues decide that the conflict isn't that significant. The question should be decided by a supermajority -- say, a two-thirds vote.

Alaska legislators are understandably loathe to take away a colleague's power to vote. In a citizen legislature, conflicts of interest are almost inevitable. Many conflicts -- such as Rep. Meyer's off-season job with the oil company Conoco Phillips -- are well known to voters when they elect someone. But in some cases, a legislator may have a substantial and direct personal stake in the question before the Legislature. In those cases, Alaskans need to know that the lawmaker with the conflict will not just speak up -- but will also abstain from self-interested voting.

FBI - Stevens-1974

BOTTOM LINE: Alaska legislators with serious conflicts of interest should be expected to abstain from voting.

The 2007 Soapy Smith Awards

YOU MEAN HE WOULD DECEIVE THE GARBAGEMAN, TOO??

Former House speaker Pete Kott's attorney, arguing for a light sentence in the Veco corruption scandal, said "He's a thoroughly decent human being that will treat the garbageman and the governor the same."

UNFORTUNATELY FOR BILL, THE FBI REPOSSESSED IT

Convicted lobbyist Bill Allen was caught on tape boasting to former House Speaker Pete Kott, "I own your ass."

ALIENS MADE HIM DO IT

One of Kott's supporters told the court, "The real Pete is a model of decorum and respect. He normally treats people with kindness, speaks kindly and does not use profane language."

OH, SO THAT EXPLAINS IT

Another supporter of Pete Kott told the court Pete was a really nice, decent guy -- when he wasn't drinking.

OOPS. HE'LL BE STAYING ON THE OTHER SIDE OF THE BARS

Kott was caught on tape telling his Veco patrons, "I just want to be the warden in Barbados," referring to a prison Veco was building in the tropical locale.

THE LEAST OF HIS WORRIES

After Bill Allen pleaded guilty to corruption felonies, Gov. Sarah Palin kicked him off the Alaska Alberta commission.

FBI - Stevens-1976

SINGING FOR HIS SUPPER

In Bill Allen's deal for a guilty plea on corruption charges, the government agreed not to go after his company, Veco, whose funds were used to further Allen's corrupt schemes. Later in the year, the Allen family sold off most of Veco for about $365 million.

HE'S NOT A DOCTOR, BUT HE PLAYED ONE IN ROOM 604

Bill Allen provided Pete Kott with sleeping pills and pills for enhancing sexual performance.

194A-AN-13620-M,777

WE'D ALL BE BETTER OFF IF HE'D SLEPT MORE

After getting pills for sleeping and for enhancing sexual performance from Bill Allen, Kott told Allen he got the two kinds mixed up and spent a long, frustrating night awake while his "old lady" slept next to him in bed.

FUNNY, I DON'T RECALL ANY FBI RAIDS ON THE MAYBERRY POLICE DEPARTMENT...

Ethics bills to enter fast track in Legislature

PUBLIC TRUST: APOC could gain resources while conflicted legislators could lose their votes.

By SEAN COCKERHAM
scockerham@adn.com

(01/28/08 00:02:32)

JUNEAU -- Memories at the Alaska Capitol go back decades. No one seems to remember a legislator ever being excused from voting because of a conflict of interest. That's just how it's always been done.

Another tradition at the Capitol has been to bash the Alaska Public Offices Commission, the state's campaign finance watchdog agency.

But times have changed in the Legislature, courtesy of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Three former Alaska legislators are headed to federal prison and the word ethics is on everyone's lips at the Capitol.

There is a growing debate over whether, and how, to ban legislators from voting on an issue in which they have a financial stake. And a bill appears to be fast-tracked to boost the power and funding of that old whipping boy the Alaska Public Offices Commission, or APOC.

The Legislature gave APOC a single investigator last year. Now House Bill 281 aims to give APOC a second investigator and a paralegal.

The measure would also increase APOC's statute of limitations on imposing civil penalties from the current one-year limit up to five years.

Rep. Bob Lynn, sponsor of the APOC bill and chair of the House State Affairs Committee, said ethics bills will be a priority for his committee this year.

"Insofar as practical, so far as possible, I'm going to put ethics bills at the front of the line," said the Anchorage Republican. "We have to build the public trust."

CATCH-22

House Minority Leader Beth Kerttula said trust includes tackling the issue of legislators voting with a conflict of interest.

"We've got to deal with it. I think the public expects us to deal with it and I think we have a real moral obligation to deal with it," said the Democrat from Juneau.

State legislators with potential conflicts of interest regularly ask their fellow legislators to excuse them from voting. But it's just a show.

All it takes is one other legislator to say, "I object," in order to force the conflicted lawmaker to vote. And there's always at least one objection.

Alaska is one of 13 states with no requirement that a member of the House or the Senate should ever abstain from voting because of a conflict, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures.

Alaska appears to be the only state where all it takes is a single objection to forbid conflicted legislators from not voting if they want to.

Alaska law is somewhat of a Catch-22. It says legislators with a conflict must not vote "unless required by the Uniform Rules of the Alaska State Legislature." And the uniform rules say all legislators must vote unless their colleagues unanimously agree to let them abstain.

The issue got hot during the recent special session on raising oil taxes. Kodiak Republican Rep. Gabrielle LeDoux tried without success to prevent legislators with ties to the oil industry from voting.

There's far from universal agreement in the Legislature that lawmakers with conflicts should be forbidden from voting. There are essentially professional legislators, but it's supposed to be a part-time citizen Legislature.

It's not so easy as it might seem to sort out what is a conflict and what the Legislature should do about it, said Anchorage Democratic Rep. Mike Doogan.

Doogan said that disqualifying a representative leaves the 15,000 or so constituents of that representative without a voice on the issue.

"If you're an attorney and you have a conflict, you say, 'I can't represent this client'; the client can go out and get another attorney. If a reporter has got a conflict, 'I can't do this story'; the editor can get another reporter,' " he said.

"We can't just reach out and get another member of the House of Representatives from House District 25 if I say I've got a conflict," Doogan said.

House Speaker John Harris said it's not fair for the Legislature to rob those constituents of a vote.

"Is it right for me to determine if some other member really has a conflict?" the Valdez Republican said. "It's not really my job, it's not really my responsibility. It's the voters of the district."

Harris said he does think Alaska law should be changed, though, to allow a conflicted legislator to be excused from voting if he or she wants.

Lawmakers sometimes avoid voting by just not showing up on the House or Senate floor. But any lawmaker can place a "call" on fellow legislators, forcing them to come to the floor and take a vote.

FBI - Stevens-1983

SUBSTANTIAL BENEFIT

Sen. Bill Wielechowski thinks constituents would understand if their representative can't vote on an issue in which he or she has a direct financial stake.

"If there is an obvious conflict of interest, you should not vote," the Anchorage Democrat said.

Wielechowski's SB 203 would forbid legislators from voting on an issue if they, their employer or an immediate family member with whom they live would benefit directly and substantially from the matter.

Kodiak Rep. LeDoux has filed a similar bill in the state House.

How to define what exactly constitutes a "substantial" benefit will be an issue.

It could be left up to the legislative ethics committee on a case-by-case basis, or lawmakers might define it themselves. There's even some talk in the Capitol of having the majority and minority leaders be the judges.

Anchorage Republican Rep. Kevin Meyer has floated the idea of having legislators vote to decide whether their colleague has a conflict on a given issue. But even Meyer harbors doubts about that approach.

He said it could become too political. Legislators might use it as a weapon to keep a political opponent from voting and to allow an ally to vote. Meyer said the bottom line is for the voters to elect honest people.

"If they're not honest people, then get rid of them," he said. "And if the public won't get rid of them, then the FBI will, if they're totally not honest."

Lawmaker accuses mine company of bribery

The Associated Press
(Published: September 18, 2007)

FAIRBANKS - A Fairbanks legislator is asking the state's attorney general to investigate allegations of bribery by the developer of the hotly debated Pebble mine project in Western Alaska.

Rep. Jay Ramras, a Republican, sent a letter to Attorney General Talis Colberg containing what he said is information from Dillingham-area residents that Northern Dynasty Mines Inc. has paid local officials to support the project.

"In conversation after conversation, I heard disturbing stories of money and influence being inappropriately plied to influence this important policy decision," Ramras wrote.

Ramras said the company paid for villagers from the region to fly to Anchorage for a meeting on the project, paid for their hotel rooms and gave them $600 apiece in cash.

He also said local elected officials and directors of Native corporations received payments from the company.

Ramras asked the attorney general to investigate the allegations during upcoming legislative hearings in the region.

Northern Dynasty spokesman Sean Magee told the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner that the allegations are baseless and said money for the trips and meetings is all above-board.

Magee said Northern Dynasty has paid dozens of community leaders to attend educational meetings in Anchorage and generally compensates them $200 per day for their time away from home and work.

"All this is fully disclosed," he said. "This is not money that is passing under the table."

Northern Dynasty and its subcontractors have also employed elected officials for work related to the project, such as site services or transportation services, he said.

Positions in local government are not full time, and many of the officials have found additional work with Northern Dynasty.

FBI - Stevens-1985

Northern Dynasty employed more than 100 people from the Bristol Bay area last year and spent more than $4 million on contracts with local companies. The company employs four "community associates" to share information about the mine to locals, he said.

"We won't apologize for those things," he said.

The Alaska Native corporation in Iliamna has expressed frustration with Ramras.

"We are personally offended by the accusations being made by a legislator from urban Alaska," Lisa Reimers, general manager of Iliamna Development Corp., said in a statement.

Ramras said he considered himself a conduit for rural Alaskans who are reluctant to come forward publicly with complaints against the company.

He has long opposed development of the mine and said he believes it would pose a hazard to subsistence fisheries. The open-pit mine would be the largest in North America and would be positioned near the headwaters of rivers that are crucial to millions of spawning salmon each year.

Ramras is co-sponsoring a bill that would raise significant hurdles for Northern Dynasty by making it illegal to disturb certain salmon streams in the Bristol Bay region.

Ramras is friends with Bob Gillam, who owns a lodge near Pebble and has actively fought the project. Ramras said his position on Pebble is not affected by his friendship with Gillam.

"I don't dance to his tune," he said.

This term is his last, Wilken says

NO RE-ELECTION: The senator wants family and business time.

The Associated Press

(01/25/08 00:42:41)

Veteran state Sen. Gary Wilken, a Fairbanks Republican who unexpectedly found himself in the minority last year, will not seek re-election this fall.

Wilken said he will step down from the Senate to spend more time with his family and friends and to get back into small business.

"I think when I look back on my years, I'll feel good that I was able, to some extent, to make good decisions based on fact and that those decisions helped Alaska," he said.

Wilken, 62, won his first term in 1996. He was named to the Senate Finance Committee in his third year in Juneau and served as co-chairman of the committee that signs off on all state spending from 2003 to 2006.

He ended up in the minority last year when Sen. Lyda Green, R-Wasilla, put together a coalition that included Senate Democrats.

Wilken and four other Republicans were suddenly relegated to the minority.

Wilken described the bipartisan majority that currently runs the Senate as held together "by surpluses and silly putty." One reason to return to Juneau this year was to make sure important issues get taken care of, he said, including legislation needed to pave the way for a natural gas pipeline.

"It's really, really difficult for me to walk away from participating in some of the biggest decisions Alaska will ever have," he said.

However, he said he would not have the same passion for the job for another four years.

Wilken's district covers the University of Alaska Fairbanks. He focused significant time on university and public school funding.

He laughed when asked if he was planning a run for Fairbanks North Star Borough mayor.

"That would be a lot of fun, but I'm just too old," he said. "I'm not moving and I'm not going to be borough mayor."

Senate Minority Leader Gene Therriault, R-North Pole, said Wilken earned a reputation as hardworking and credible.

"Big shoes to fill, definitely," he said.

Gift of kidney to ailing lawmaker against the rules

ETHICS LAW: Legislative aide wants to donate organ to Nome legislator Richard Foster.

By SEAN COCKERHAM
scockerham@adn.com

(01/25/08 00:24:53)

JUNEAU -- Nome Rep. Richard Foster is famous at the state Capitol for his love of machine guns and the weekly "Foster Night" musical jam parties he used to host in his Capitol office.

Now Foster is hurting, badly, and his many friends at the state Capitol want to do more than send flowers. A half-dozen offered to donate their kidneys to the ailing legislator. Sue Stancliff, an aide to Fairbanks Rep. Mike Kelly, appears to be a match.

Here's the problem: It appears to be against state ethics law for Stancliffe to give Foster a kidney.

Alaska lawmakers tightened the ethics laws last year following the FBI raids on legislative offices and the criminal charges against former legislators. The changes included stricter limits on the gifts that state legislators can receive.

The Legislature did insert a "compassionate gift" exemption into the law to cover items meant as comfort in times of tragedy or a health emergency. But even those gifts can't be worth more than $250, and donating a kidney is figured to be worth more than that.

That's why North Pole Rep. John Coghill has introduced House Bill 317, which would eliminate the dollar limit on a compassionate gift to a legislator or legislative employee. The gift recipient would still have to disclose the gift within 30 days.

Coghill said the legislative ethics committee approached him and let him know it could be a problem for Stancliff to give Foster her kidney. Coghill said he wants to make sure there are no legal questions.

There would still be the question of whether Foster, who has had heart problems as well as the kidney disease, is strong enough for the procedure.

Foster, 61, suffered a mild stroke on Friday and is undergoing treatment at a Seattle hospital. The stroke left him with some speech and mobility problems, according to his staff, but he is improving.

FBI - Stevens-1989

Dillingham Rep. Bryce Edgmon, Foster's former staffer and longtime friend, said Foster is undergoing a two-week intensive therapy session and is responding well.

He has a two-week, excused absence from the Legislature, and other lawmakers have been assigned to take over his budget subcommittees until he is ready to return.

Even before his latest hospitalization, Foster had to go to a Juneau hospital for dialysis three times a week. The process would leave him dehydrated and drained of energy.

But friends said he was still able to crack cornball jokes.

Foster, a retired air taxi operator first elected to the House in 1988, is a colorful character in the old Alaskan style.

His official legislative Web site lists his interests as "Enjoying the country, Music by Spank The Dog."

Foster also likes guns, a lot. He faced federal charges in 1991 of illegal possession of unregistered automatic weapons. His stash included two AKs, a German MG 42 from World War II, two British World War II-style Sten guns and a Soviet 50 mm mortar.

The jury in Nome, where Foster was born, quickly found him not guilty on all counts.

Foster is also known for jokes that can crack up somber House floor sessions.

"He'll make you smile on a dark day in this building when smiles are hard to come by," said Stancliff, the legislative aide who wants to give Foster one of her kidneys.

Stancliff, who lives in Tok when the Legislature isn't in session, is the finance committee aide for Fairbanks Republican Rep. Kelly. Foster, a Democrat who aligns with the Republican-led majority, has a seat on the finance committee.

She said Foster would have a newspaper with a hole cut out of it in the finance committee. Then he'd pick up the newspaper and look at her through it, just to make her laugh.

Stancliff said the hope is to do the kidney transplant sometime this spring after the legislative session is over.

"The good Lord gave me two healthy kidneys and my faith is very, very strong," she said.

Health cited as senator resigns chairmanship

COWDERY: Links to Veco scandal trail ill politician.

By SEAN COCKERHAM
scockerham@adn.com
(01/16/08 02:41:17)

JUNEAU -- Anchorage Sen. John Cowdery, ailing and implicated in the Veco bribery scandal, announced Tuesday that he was stepping down from the powerful position of rules chairman of the state Senate.

The Republican is hospitalized in Anchorage but hopes to make it to Juneau for the 90-day legislative session, which began Tuesday.

"Due to my recurrent health issues I have decided it's best for me and the Alaska Senate to resign as chairman of the Senate Rules Committee," Cowdery said in a written statement. "When my health allows it I will return to Juneau as quickly as possible so I can work on the issues that are important to the people of Senate District O."

The rules chairman is among the most influential members of the state Senate. The job is basically the gatekeeper for what bills make it to the floor of the Senate for a vote.

Senators said they didn't know when they would pick Cowdery's replacement for the job, or who it might be. This early in the session, bills aren't ready to go to the floor anyway, so they have some time to sort it out.

Cowdery, 77, has said he is suffering from kidney problems.

Former Veco Corp. vice president Rick Smith testified under oath in the recent corruption trials of two former state legislators that he bribed Cowdery. Smith, who has been convicted and is cooperating with federal prosecutors, did not give details.

Cowdery hasn't been charged and said Smith lied. Cowdery denies any wrongdoing.

The Senate minority has called on Cowdery to resign from office as a result of testimony tying him to the scandal. Republican party leaders from Cowdery's district have said he should resign if he can't make it to Juneau for the session.

Governor calls for cooperation

Palin urges push toward self-reliance

By SEAN COCKERHAM
scockerham@adn.com

(01/16/08 00:05:36)

JUNEAU -- The Alaska Legislature began a 90-day session Tuesday with Gov. Sarah Palin feuding with the Senate president but also calling on legislators to work with her on the state's budget surplus and getting a natural gas pipeline.

"The Palin-Parnell administration stands ready to work not against you but with you to accomplish all this," the governor said in her annual State of the State speech.

Palin only briefly mentioned ethics but that was another big topic in the state Capitol on the first day of the 2008 session. Legislators, painfully aware that some of their former colleagues are headed to prison for bribery convictions, said they would focus on restoring public trust in the Legislature.

"The biggest thing we have to continue to do is build on what we did last year, and that is developing the public trust in the legislative process and legislators in general," said House Speaker John Harris, a Valdez Republican.

There will be lots of debate on whether legislators should be allowed to vote on bills in which they have a potential conflict of interest. Some legislators say no, others say each lawmaker has constituents who rely on their representation on issues in front of the Legislature.

"If you set up a mechanism in which (the state House) can disqualify a member for a conflict, you are essentially disenfranchising about 15,000 voters for the purposes of that question," said Anchorage Democratic Rep. Mike Doogan.

SELF-RELIANCE

Palin's speech was the big event of the first day, with many legislators hoping to hear where the governor wants to take the state in the coming year.

Palin said Alaska must become more self-sufficient and not so reliant on money steered home by the state's congressional delegation.

"We can and must continue to develop our economy, because we cannot and must not rely so heavily on federal government earmarks," Palin said in the speech to a joint session of the state House and Senate.

The Republican governor's speech was largely a look back at her first year in office and a case for the budget recommendations she's made to the Legislature. The governor's significant new initiative in the speech was the proposed elimination of a state certificate of need program that limits the creation of new medical facilities in Alaska.

194A-AN-13620-M;782

House Finance Committee co-chairman Kevin Meyer, an Anchorage Republican, said he did not learn much from the speech.

"Not much substance," he said.

Anchorage Democratic Sen. Johnny Ellis said the speech did include a long list of "programs, directions, visions," and had a positive theme. Ellis said he wished, though, that the governor had talked about improving communications with the Legislature.

A BETTER FOOT

"I'm hoping this session starts off on a new foot of better communication," Ellis said.

Some legislators felt blindsided by the budget vetoes the governor made last year. Ellis said miscommunication also was at the root of how this session has started with a fight between the governor and the Senate majority.

The dispute was over what time the governor would give her speech. It reached the point where Palin was talking about giving the speech just to the House -- without members of the Senate there.

The governor had asked in mid-December to give the speech at 6 p.m. in the hopes it could be carried live on television news. Her office said that, after hearing no objection, the governor purchased a plane ticket to leave later the same night of the speech to go see her son Track graduate Thursday from boot camp in Georgia.

The state House is in charge of picking the time for the speech and last week decided it would be at 7 p.m., too late for the governor to make the plane.

The House agreed to move it up to 6 p.m. But, up until the day before the speech, the Senate majority said it would need to stick to the 7 p.m. schedule because senators were still arriving in Juneau.

Senate President Lyda Green on Tuesday then proposed a 4 p.m. speech "to better accommodate the governor's personal travel schedule." Palin agreed but bristled at the implication that it was about her personal travel.

Palin said she only bought the plane ticket after lawmakers didn't object when she notified them more than a month ago that she preferred an earlier start time.

"This is an unfortunate indication that some would rather spend time and resources on things other than working together and moving our state forward," Palin said in a written statement. "My office has a lot of work to accomplish for Alaskans and we will not let things like this get us get bogged down."

Ellis said it was a misunderstanding and the Senate put the speech back on track after understanding why Palin needed an earlier time.

CHANGE AND TRUST

Palin said in her speech that in her first year in office "we have seen positive change and restored trust."

FBI - Stevens-1993

She mentioned ethics reform, raising taxes on the oil companies and her proposed path to a natural gas pipeline as achievements of the year.

Palin also said she would appoint a coordinator to oversee the statewide energy fund she has proposed for renewable projects like wind, hydropower and geothermal energy. She spoke about her previous proposal for early and increased funding for schools, to avoid the cycle of districts giving pink slips to teachers and then hiring them back when the money comes in.

Palin also talked about improving health care, arguing that getting rid of the certificate of need program would increase health care competition and access. It's a program where significant new medical facilities must get a state certificate showing that there's a need for them in the community.

It's supposed to guard against doctors cherry-picking profitable services, like radiology, leaving community hospitals with more costly and less profitable services like emergency care.

Palin said the system is broken and riddled with lawsuits.

"Alaskans want health care in the hands of doctors, not lobbyists and lawyers," Palin said.

Key points

Palin's key points:

- PUBLIC TRUST: In her first year in office "we have seen positive change and restored trust."

- GAS PIPELINE: The Alaska Gasline Inducement Act has "cleared the path for our gas to feed hungry local markets and to help secure the United States with a safe, stable and domestic supply of clean energy."

- SHARING STATE REVENUE: She touted her plans to share more revenue with local governments, provide more school funding, and create endowments for transportation and alternative energy.

LeDoux pledges to stop fundraising ETHICS: House majority drops talk about punishment.

By SEAN COCKERHAM
scockerham@adn.com
(01/24/08 00:13:52)

JUNEAU -- Kodiak Republican Rep. Gabrielle LeDoux pledged Wednesday to stop raising money for her congressional race while the Legislature is in session.

Her announcement came shortly before the House majority was expected to have a caucus meeting on whether to punish LeDoux if she didn't stop.

House Speaker John Harris said last week that he thought LeDoux should get kicked out of the caucus if she didn't cut it out.

Harris said on Wednesday that LeDoux's announcement settles the matter.

"If she lives up to the terms of what she said she's going to do, that's all we were asking," the Valdez Republican said.

LeDoux said last week that she'd keep fundraising despite the pressure because it's legal and broke no rules. But she said in a statement Wednesday that she searched her conscience and decided to stop.

LeDoux said lawmakers must avoid even the appearance of impropriety in the wake of Alaska's corruption scandal. If she's going to keep calling for change, she needs to stop business as usual herself, LeDoux said.

"I will hold myself to a higher standard and I will not fundraise for the remainder of the session," she said in the statement. "Even though I know that in the world of business, money and influence this will make my run for statewide office more difficult, I am willing to take on that challenge."

LeDoux is running against U.S. Rep. Don Young in the Republican primary.

She noted in her letter that Young can raise campaign cash even when Congress in session. She said she supports public financing of campaigns but that's not the current system and it's necessary to raise money.

Alaska law forbids candidates for the state Legislature from raising campaign money in Juneau during the legislative session.

FBI - Stevens-1995

The idea is to prevent the appearance of trading influence for contributions.

LeDoux is running for a federal office and therefore isn't covered by the law.

But Anchorage Republican Rep. Kevin Meyer has a bill to expand the fundraising prohibition to all federal, municipal and other state candidates. That bill is moving fast through the state House.

Harris said it just doesn't look good for any legislator to raise money during the session from people with interests before the Legislature.

Harris said Alaska lawmakers must be particularly aware of ethical implications following the bribery scandal that has led to three former legislators being convicted in recent months.

Harris said he would have been satisfied if LeDoux promised just not to raise campaign cash in Juneau during the legislative session, and not from lobbyists.

Harris had expressed an interest in running for Congress himself but said he won't do so as long as Young is in the race.

Alaska Ear

SOMETHING MISSING? ... The following is verbatim from an amicus brief in the Exxon Valdez case on behalf of the Legislature and Alaska's former governors, in support of the damaged fishermen still waiting for their money. This is the part where the legislative lawyers explain who they represent:

"Amici include all the living former Governors of the State of Alaska. The Honorable Walter Hickel served as Governor of Alaska from 1966 to 1969 and from 1990 to 1994, and from 1969 to 1970 served as Secretary of the United States Department of the Interior.

"The Honorable William Sheffield served as Governor of Alaska from 1982 to 1986. The Honorable Steve Cowper served as Governor of Alaska from 1986 to 1990. The Honorable Anthony Knowles served as Alaska Governor from 1994 to 2002."

Hmmm. Have the state lawyers forgotten someone? Ear understands why Gov. Miller isn't there -- everyone forgets him. He is still alive, right? But isn't someone else missing?

SARADISE ... It was a trash talk festival last week but all the earish stuff on the speech-scheduling flap ended up in news stories. All The Divine Appendage can do is footnote:

1) If you haven't listened to it yet, check out Sarah live on the Bob and Mark morning show Tuesday. Be warned, BM says bad words while the gov giggles in the background. It's truly astonishing and will certainly be played by Sarah's opponent in her next election race.

2) That stuff aside, Ear's favorite part was Sarah sharing a family moment.

Governor: "... Man, I realized last night I've got to be really careful in what I say here at home. Piper heard me griping about Lyda's actions on this to Todd, and Piper, she looks at me and she says, 'Can you pull her hair?' ... I'd better just zip my lip and not talk about things like that in front of a kid."

Ear found it on palintology.com. You can link to the whole thing at adn.com/ear.

ONE MORE QUESTION ... Is it too soon to award Lyda Green the Frank Murkowski Public Relations Trophy? Even when Frank was right, he managed to look bad.

BLOAX? ... Ear doesn't know what to make of an announcement that federal informant and former Alaska Commissioner of Corrections Frank Prewitt has written a book about the political corruption cases, cleverly titled "Bridges to Nowhere." An elaborate description showed up on a local blog and someone claiming to be a publicist e-mailed Ear that the book is real and being shopped to publishers.

"The story begins in 2004," the promotion says, "when the author finds himself a 'person of interest' to a federal investigation. To clear his name, the author agrees to 'cooperate' in exchange for leniency over crimes the federal government knew he didn't commit.

"While the events invite serious reflection about our system of government, the actual conspiracies unfold more like a season of Desperate Housewives Go to Washington ..."

Earwigs dismiss it as phony and even the credulous appendage thinks it's most unlikely.

Check out whatdoino-steve. blogspot.com and decide for yourself if it's just another blog hoax.

ON THE AGENDA ... For the Mat-Su Assembly meeting last week:

"Resolution Serial No. 08-009: A resolution objecting to the inflammatory and false dropout factory label assigned to Wasilla High School by Johns Hopkins University."

Yeah, that'll help the dropout problem.

CHOW HOUNDS ... Remember the long-time executive chef who lost her job at the Mansion when Sarah decided to live mostly in Wasilla instead of Juneau? Stefani Marnon was first reassigned as a "constituent relations assistant" in the governor's office and later to the state museum.

Earwigs report she's finally landed where they really appreciate a good chef: the Legislative Lounge.

Lawmakers were smacking their lips in anticipation, according to Sen. Kim Elton's newsletter.

WHENEVER ... State workers in Barrow got the following memo one day last week: "Due to severe weather conditions and at the request of Governor Palin, all State of Alaska offices in Barrow are closed until further notice. The situation will continue to be monitored.

"Employees are required to leave contact numbers with immediate supervisors. Once weather conditions have improved, employees will be notified and expected to return to work. ..."

It was signed by Commissioner of Admin Annette Kreitzer.

Seems like a good thing. It was like minus 45 with wind chill. But a far north earwig reports that no "further notice" has yet been received.

Despite the temptation, most employees came to work the next day, Ear is told.

OUT AND ABOUT ... Was that our Lisa Murkowski chowing down on catfish and collard greens -- or something ethnic-- on Thursday at Catfish Haven on Boniface? That's what earwigs report.

A GOOD DEED ... Moose Lodge 1534 is hosting a raffle and silent auction Wednesday from 5 to 8 p.m. for ADN letter-writer and one-time congressional candidate Dave Carlson, 68, who lost his Spenard home of 25 years in a fire on Thanksgiving. Spaghetti dinner is $5.

FUN WITHOUT INDICTMENTS ... A terribly clever earwig and her friends came up with some Alaska nursery rhymes over the holidays, inspired perhaps by a little grog. Here are a few:

Hulking Ted Stevens

FBI - Stevens-1998

Sat for some seasons

Giving the money away.

In the Girdwood arena

They served a subpoena

Scaring Ted Stevens away.

And:

Hey diddle dollar

The Governor's daughter

Went to the Senate to play.

Bob Penney's land

Came to her hand

But she had to give it away.

SPACED ... One of the new designers on "Trading Spaces" this season is Juneau carpenter Thad Mills. See his "me" video at tlc.discovery.com/fansites/tradingspaces/meet-the-crew/meet-the-crew.html.

Ear had a little trouble with his claim to have kung-fu'd a bear, but it's aimed at Outsiders who will believe anything, so ...

AND FINALLY ... A fun factoid: A birdnerd earwig reports that all 50 eagles involved in the fish gunk incident -- the 20 who died in Kodiak and the 30 that came to the bird treatment center -- are male. A lesser appendage might engage in sexist speculation about females being the brighter of the sexes in any number of species. But maybe the girls were just on diets after the holidays.

Wasilla city official leaves for Palmer job

TURNOVER: Garley is fourth city boss to depart in last year.

By RINDI WHITE
rwhite@adn.com

WASILLA -- Add another city official to the list of those moving on to other jobs.

Wasilla deputy administrator Sandra Garley is leaving Jan. 31 for the newly created planning director post across the Valley at the city of Palmer. Garley has been at Wasilla four years, two as city planning director and two as city deputy administrator. Before that, she worked for the Matanuska-Susitna Borough as planning director.

Her announcement last week makes her the fourth city department head in the past year to leave Wasilla. The other three are Finance Director Ted Leonard, Wasilla Police Chief John Glass and Susan Colligan, who was promoted from deputy finance director to take Leonard's job but then also left.

That amount of turnover, the equivalent of losing half the city's managerial staff, is unusual but perhaps not unexpected with the clock counting down on Mayor Dianne Keller's second, and, by city law, last term in office.

City code lists six department managers who serve at the pleasure of the mayor. All face the risk of being terminated by their new boss if they stay until Keller's term ends in October.

"I'll have to be honest and look somebody in the eye and say I can't guarantee it," Keller said.

The main drain on city staff in this case has been to the state. Aside from Garley, all the others have been lured away by state jobs.

Garley said future job stability wasn't a major factor in her decision. Rather, she said, she was attracted by the challenges she thinks the newly created Palmer position will present.

"Palmer is in the fastest-growing borough in Alaska and they are having growing pains just like every other community, incorporated and unincorporated, in the borough. We'll be dealing with growth issues and with what Palmer wants to be," she said.

As for where the other directors are now, former Police Chief Glass left the city in February 2007 to become deputy commissioner of the Alaska Department of Public Safety. Deputy chief Angella Long was promoted to police chief when Glass departed.

In March, city Finance Director Ted Leonard, a city employee since 1998, left for a job as a deputy commissioner in the Department of Commerce, Community and Economic Development.

Deputy finance director Susan Colligan was promoted to director, but left the position she vacated empty. Nine months later, she announced she was leaving to become special assistant to the commissioner in the state Department of Military and Veterans Affairs.

Keller said the turnover hasn't slowed city business. She's tapped into Wasilla's rich pipeline of former government employees to assist while she searches for permanent replacements.

Former city Finance Director Erling Nelson is filling in as director temporarily. Former Mat-Su Borough comptroller Kelli Veech is temporarily acting as deputy finance director. But neither is interested in the jobs on more than just a temporary basis, Keller said.

This week, she interviewed candidates for the city's chief financial officer post. Keller said she'd seek a temporary administrator to fill Garley's spot.

Keller said that when Colligan announced her plans to leave, the realization that she was entering the final year of her term hit. She said she takes the departures as a compliment.

"It just goes to show we have really good staff and people are always keeping an eye out to see if they can lure our staff away," Keller told City Council on Monday.

Stevens reaches out to colleagues to OK legal fund

SENATE ETHICS COMMITTEE: He's racking up fees to fight charges that he failed to report gifts and repairs.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(08/21/08 02:21:57)

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Ted Stevens has asked the U.S. Senate Ethics Committee to approve a legal expense fund to help pay the cost of his criminal defense.

Stevens, R-Alaska, joins Rep. Don Young, R-Alaska, who set up such a fund earlier this year to help defray the cost of mounting legal expenses connected to a federal probe into campaign donations and other matters.

The Senate Ethics Committee must approve the legal expense fund, but generally does so for senators if the legal expenses are connected to their role as an officeholder. Stevens was indicted last month on seven felony counts of failing to report more than $250,000 in gifts and home repairs from the now-defunct oil services company Veco Inc.

Individuals and political action committees can contribute up to $10,000 to the Senate fund. Lobbyists, corporations, foreign nationals and labor unions are barred from making contributions. The fund, which would be managed by a trustee, would file quarterly reports detailing the contributors. Stevens is not allowed to solicit contributions and said Wednesday he won't accept donations until the ethics committee has signed off on creating the fund.

The rules in the House of Representatives differ slightly from the Senate guidelines. In the House, corporations are allowed to contribute to legal expense funds, but contributions are capped at $5,000.

Until he set up the fund, Young had been paying the bulk of his legal fees from his campaign account. So far, Young's campaign has spent $1.3 million on lawyers. He raised about $54,000 for his fund so far this year, largely from old friends and fishing interests.

Until now, Stevens has not addressed how he is paying for his lawyer, Brendan Sullivan, one of the most expensive and highly regarded criminal defense attorneys in Washington, D.C. Sullivan's previous clients have included former Lt. Col. Oliver North. More recently, he has been defending billionaire Henry Nicholas on drug and securities charges connected to his role as the co-founder of Broadcom, a California company that manufactures computer and cell phone chips.

Stevens did reveal in his most recent personal financial disclosure form that he already owes Sullivan up to $50,000.

Stevens' trial will be in D.C.

CHANGE OF VENUE DENIED: His lawyers wanted senator to face 7 felony counts in Alaska.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(08/21/08 04:10:31)

WASHINGTON -- A federal judge on Wednesday turned down Sen. Ted Stevens' request to move his corruption trial to Alaska, tying the 84-year-old Alaska Republican to a Washington, D.C., courtroom at the height of his re-election campaign 3,500 miles away.

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan decided that the trial will remain in the nation's capital and it will continue on an accelerated schedule. The judge offered to take Fridays off during the trial so that Stevens could travel to Alaska to campaign on the weekend, but the senator's lawyer, Brendan Sullivan, was lukewarm to the idea, especially if it means a slower path to a verdict.

Stevens asked for, and received, a speedy trial schedule so that he could go to court before the Nov. 4 election. Jury selection is set to begin Sept. 22 and the trial is scheduled to start two days later. It is expected to last four weeks.

"We want the earliest possible trial," his attorney said. "We want the verdict as far this side of Election Day as possible."

Stevens faces seven felony counts of knowingly taking home repairs and gifts worth more than $250,000 from the oil services company Veco Corp. and failing to report them on his annual Senate disclosure forms from 2001 through 2006. If convicted, he faces up to five years in prison on each count.

Stevens was in Alaska campaigning for the Senate seat he has held since 1968 and didn't attend Wednesday's court hearing. On Tuesday, he faces six opponents in the Republican primary.

Stevens on Wednesday released a statement saying he asked his attorneys to request a venue change "because I wanted Alaskans to have a first-hand opportunity to learn the facts of this matter."

"I understand the court's decision today, and continue to have every faith in the fairness of the American judicial system and the court's commitment to conduct a speedy trial," Stevens said. "I welcome the opportunity to demonstrate that I am innocent of these changes."

His campaign spokesman, Aaron Saunders, said that a Washington trial has "little impact on this campaign moving forward." The campaign will "build upon our organization and support base" to "ensure this is a vibrant campaign," Saunders said.

FBI - Stevens-2003

'SO WHAT!'

Stevens' lawyers argued unsuccessfully that the trial should be moved because many of the witnesses are in Alaska, and that jurors should see Stevens' Girdwood home, where Veco employees, including former chief executive officer Bill Allen, oversaw renovations in 2000 that doubled its size. They also argued that it would be disruptive for Stevens to have the trial in Washington while he runs for re-election in Alaska.

His lawyer even held up a map of the U.S., hoping to illustrate the 3,500-mile distance. The charges in the case are about events that happened in Alaska, Brendan Sullivan argued, not Washington, D.C.

"Forms were filed here? So what!" he said. "It's all about Alaska."

Brendan Sullivan also complained that federal investigators have been working on this case for several years, giving prosecutors ample opportunity to bring charges on a timetable that wouldn't have interfered with the election.

"They didn't have to bring this 28 days before a primary and 98 days before the election," he said.

But Judge Sullivan signaled early during Wednesday's hearing that he was disinclined to move the trial, in part because he had worked so hard to clear his own calendar to hear the Stevens case quickly.

"This court went to great lengths, I emphasize, great lengths, to rearrange its calendar," he said as he read his decision.

Also, prosecutors assured the judge that there would be no problem getting faraway witnesses to Washington. The trial is appropriate here, prosecutors said, since this is where they allege the crimes occurred.

"This is a proper venue for the crimes charged in the indictment," said Nicholas Marsh, one of the prosecutors with the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section.

"It's true, a lot of this relates to Alaska," Marsh added, but quibbled with Brendan Sullivan's "so what!" characterization of the disclosure forms. "These forms are very important. They serve a very important public function."

'A HOUSE, GIFTS AND FORMS'

Judge Sullivan weighed several factors in his decision, such as where Stevens spends most of his time and where the witnesses are. But his biggest concern appeared to be ensuring that Stevens could continue to campaign even as his trial proceeded.

At one point, Stevens' lawyer appeared peeved by the potential effect on the election. He specifically mentioned a motion filed last week by prosecutors, who indicated they want to introduce evidence that will help bolster their case. The potential evidence doesn't include new charges, but the motion alleges some previously unknown information, including that Stevens accepted a $31,000 personal loan from an old friend as part of a lucrative Florida real estate deal, then failed to report it on his disclosure forms.

There was no need to "publicize to the world" such information "during the election," Brendan Sullivan said. He added he thought the case was about "a house, gifts and forms."

"I think it's about some forms and some statements made in the District of Columbia," the judge countered.

Federal prosecutors also had argued that holding the trial in Alaska while Stevens is campaigning for re-election had potential to taint the home-state jury pool. In addition, they were concerned about Stevens' statements about his innocence to the news media and at campaign events. They cited recent remarks in interviews and at campaign rallies, as well as a statement last year when he told reporters that he had "paid every bill that was given to us" connected with his home renovations. Those types of remarks also have the power to sway potential jurors, they argued.

Stevens' claim that it the trial would be disruptive to his campaign gave prosecutors "heartburn," Marsh said, especially since Stevens himself asked for a speedy trial during campaign season.

"He knew he was running for re-election," Marsh said.

FBI - Stevens-2004

Brendan Sullivan argued that there's nothing inappropriate about Stevens proclaiming his innocence on the campaign trail, although he also said he has cautioned his client to avoid any references to specifics of the case.

"So far, thank God, that's not a crime in America," to proclaim your innocence, Brendan Sullivan said. "If he slips into declaring himself innocent, I say great for him."

Judge Sullivan said he found the prosecution arguments more persuasive, and agreed that the potential jurors stood to be tainted by pre-trial publicity and media exposure. He also said he thought that the federal courthouse in Washington was better prepared to accommodate the intense media interest in the case.

Push for private prison was downfall

GUILTY PLEA: Ex-halfway house official was accused in conspiracy scheme.

By TOM KIZZIA
tkizzia@adn.com

(08/12/08 00:06:10)

An intense political battle over private prisons in Alaska kept the state's jail-building efforts tied in knots for a decade, ending only in 2005 after complaints of strong-arm lobbying helped turn legislative sentiment against the idea.

A driving force for privatizing prisons throughout that time was Bill Weimar, the former halfway house official who pleaded guilty Monday in U.S. District Court to conspiring to make illegal payments to a legislative candidate in 2004.

Weimar was the principal spokesman for the first two private-prison proposals to surface in the 1990s, but faded into the background after selling his halfway houses in 1998 to Cornell Corrections, a national prison company based in Houston.

Even as late as the summer of 2004, however, when the private prison idea was on its last legs, Weimar held a substantial interest in the deal, standing to make $5.5 million if a private prison was ever built, according to the federal charging documents filed Monday.

Among Weimar's private-prison partners, at least for much of the time he was pushing the idea: Veco Corp.

Resorting both to raw political muscle and to high-flown sentiments about saving money and bringing Native prisoners home, backers of the private prisons won legislative support for successive plans aimed at Anchorage, Delta Junction, Kenai and Whittier. Two prison deals were approved, and two others made it through the state House. Competing proposals to build state-run facilities were shoved aside.

But each private plan eventually died, falling victim to local opposition, resistance from prison guard unions and skepticism from Republican and Democratic governors.

Meanwhile the number of state prisoners shipped to the Lower 48 because of inadequate space here grew to more than 800. A new 1,500-bed state-run prison now being built in the Mat-Su Borough is intended to bring many of those inmates back to Alaska.

Through the years, debate centered on whether inmates could be housed reliably and cheaply in a facility designed and run by a for-profit firm. The stakes were high: a 25-year prison deal, worth $1 billion, would have been the largest state-private contract in Alaska history.

FBI - Stevens-2006

PARTNERS INCLUDED VECO

Corrections Group North, the original design-build joint venture pushing a private deal, included not only Cornell and Weimar's company, Allvest, but the well-connected oil field services and construction firm Veco. Some of Juneau's top lobbyists worked for the cause, and they had strong advocates in the Legislature.

Among the elected leaders were the House Finance chairman, Rep. Eldon Mulder, R-Anchorage, whose then-wife worked with Cornell lobbyist Joe Hayes, and former state Sen. Jerry Ward, who had ties to the Kenai Natives Association, a Cornell partner. Ward's real estate firm managed pull tab parlors for the Kenai Native group.

With each plan came complaints about backroom deals.

194-AN-13620-M - 789

"What I see, over and over, is repeated sole-source, pre-arranged, heavy-money deals that go to specific contractors. ... It's never been a clean, competitive proposal," Rep. Eric Croft, D-Anchorage, complained in a 2004 committee hearing. "We are going to see somebody indicted and probably imprisoned over this series of proposals."

The first proposed private prison would have been built on Veco-owned land in South Anchorage. A contract was approved by the House in 1997, but with a Senate vote pending the idea was withdrawn on the eve of a citywide vote.

Anchorage voters went ahead to reject the idea by a 2-1 margin -- what one Assembly member called "driving a nail in the coffin."

The idea quickly rose again, with help from Ward, who put together a plan for facilities in the Mat-Su and Seward. The plan was publicly praised by Weimar, but was soon replaced by the idea of locating a private prison at the mothballed Fort Greely near Delta Junction.

A deal with Allvest was approved in 1998, both by local voters and then the Legislature. But after Weimar brought Cornell into the consortium that year, a change of sentiment in Delta Junction upended the contract. The prison companies sued and won a settlement of $1.1 million.

LAST STAND IN WHITTIER

The prison backers bounced back, striking a deal with Kenai Natives Association and taking it to the Kenai Peninsula Borough. The borough assembly invited proposals from other firms. Corrections Group North finished second in the bidding, but was bumped to first on the strength of its proposed Native-owned location and its political expertise.

The Legislature approved the Kenai project in May 2001, but once again local opposition was rising. The borough assembly decided to seek voter approval, and when the project lost by a 3-1 ratio the plan died.

After a brief dalliance in Wrangell, the Cornell private prison made its last stand in Whittier. The isolated Prince William Sound port jumped on board within six weeks of the Kenai vote. But momentum in Juneau was beginning to slacken. For three legislative sessions the private prison issue was debated without a decision.

By the summer of 2004, Veco was out of the consortium and the Whittier plan was limping along. That's when, according to the charges he pleaded guilty to on Monday, Weimar made illegal payments to a legislative candidate in return for the candidate supporting the project. The effort failed, and in March 2005 Whittier announced it was done with the prison.

Cornell continued with its halfway houses in Alaska but said it was no longer interested in pursuing a private prison in Alaska.

Cowdery pleads not guilty

FEDERAL CHARGES: Lawmaker's attorney says indictment a 'mistake.'

By SEAN COCKERHAM
scockerham@adn.com

(08/12/08 02:12:32)

Anchorage state Sen. John Cowdery pleaded not guilty to federal corruption charges Monday after his lawyer wheeled him into court in a wheelchair.

U.S. marshals fingerprinted Cowdery and took his passport, and a magistrate allowed him to go free on $5,000 bond. U.S. District Court Judge Ralph Beistline will preside over Cowdery's trial, which is set for Oct. 6 in Anchorage.

The 78-year-old Cowdery faces a maximum of 15 years in federal prison if convicted on the two corruption charges. He is accused of scheming with executives of Veco Corp. to try to buy the vote of a fellow state senator, Nome Democrat Donny Olson, in order to keep state oil taxes down.

Olson has not been charged. He says he didn't get anything from Veco and didn't do its bidding.

Cowdery said little in court Monday. Both he and his attorney, Kevin Fitzgerald, declined to speak to reporters. Fitzgerald told the magistrate that Cowdery continues to be employed by the state of Alaska as a legislator. He is not running for re-election this fall.

Cowdery hesitated before replying when Magistrate John Roberts asked his age. Cowdery, who suffers from kidney problems, also looked over the court's list of medications he's on.

"Maybe that's all I'm taking, my wife knows more than I do," he told the magistrate.

Cowdery's wife, Juanita, observed the arraignment from the public gallery. She was expressionless.

Three former Alaska state legislators have already been convicted and sentenced as part of the broad FBI corruption probe into state politics. All of them pleaded not guilty and went to trial.

Federal prosecutor Joseph Bottini said in court he could turn over "voluminous" evidence to the defense this week. He said Cowdery's lawyer first needs to give prosecutors a 750-gigabyte portable computer hard drive and that it will take 24 hours to upload all the material.

Prosecutors are expected to use FBI audio and video recordings as evidence against Cowdery, just as in the previous corruption trials of state legislators.

FBI - Stevens-2008

Former Veco executives Bill Allen and Rick Smith have pleaded guilty to bribing legislators to push through the tax rate favored by oil companies that operate on the North Slope. They said in court papers that Cowdery was part of the conspiracy.

Cowdery's lawyer, Fitzgerald, has said the government misinterpreted comments made by Cowdery and that the indictment "will be exposed for the mistake it is."

Cowdery, until recently, was one of the most powerful figures of the bipartisan state Senate majority, which made him the rules chair, a position that gave him clout over which bills made it to the floor for a vote. Cowdery resigned that chairmanship this spring.

He stepped down as head of the Legislative Council, which oversees administrative business of the Legislature, after his indictment last month.

Sen. Ted Stevens' trial should stay in Washington, federal prosecutors insisted in papers filed Monday, arguing that hearing it in Alaska while the 84-year-old Republican campaigns for reelection could taint the home state jury pool.

They also argued that, fundamentally, the case against Stevens is based in the nation's capital. He faces seven felony counts of knowingly taking home repairs and gifts worth more than $250,000 from the oil services company Veco Corp. and failing to report them on his annual U.S. Senate disclosure forms from 2001 through 2006.

"Simply put, this is a case about a scheme to conceal, largely through the submission of false financial disclosure forms to the United States Senate," Justice Department prosecutors wrote in a motion filed Monday afternoon. The financial disclosure forms were "created, reviewed, signed and filed in the District of Columbia, and a substantial portion of Stevens' scheme to conceal occurred in or around the District of Columbia."

U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan is scheduled to hear the change-of-venue motion Aug. 20. Last week in court, Sullivan promised the trial would be "fast but ... fair," to accommodate Stevens' election schedule, and said he hasn't prejudged the senator's request to move it to Alaska. But Sullivan already has made plans to begin jury selection in Washington, D.C., on Sept. 22. The trial itself is set to begin two days later.

Stevens' lawyers have argued that most of the witnesses in the case are in Alaska. They also argued that jurors should see Stevens' Girdwood home, where Veco employees, including CEO Bill Allen, oversaw renovations in 2000 that doubled it in size.

Mostly, though, his lawyers said last week they're concerned that Stevens be able to continue campaigning before and during the trial. Stevens, who has held the office since 1968, faces six Republican challengers in the Aug. 26 primary before moving on to the Nov. 4 general election.

WILL CAMPAIGNING TAINT JURORS?

Last week, his lawyers said that if the trial remains in Washington, he would have "a minimal opportunity to personally participate in the electoral process that will decide his professional future."

But prosecutors said Monday that was a "substantial factor weighing heavily against transfer."

FBI - Stevens-2009

Since his July 31 arraignment, the senator has been traveling all over Alaska and participating in campaign rallies where he has "vocally proclaimed his innocence of the crimes charged against him," prosecutors wrote in their motion.

Those claims have been widely reported in the media, prosecutors said, and it's likely that Stevens will "continue to offer explanations and characterizations of the factual and legal issues in the case."

That has consequences, prosecutors argued, especially if Stevens continues to campaign during the trial. It has potential to taint the jury pool, but also could require that they be sequestered and barred from TV, radio and newspapers during the trial. Apart from the trial, that could limit jurors' participation in the 2008 electoral process as well, prosecutors argued.

They also downplayed the concerns Stevens' lawyers have expressed about transferring witnesses and evidence from Alaska to Washington, D.C.

42 BOXES OF MATERIAL

Witnesses can easily travel to Washington, D.C., the prosecutors argued, and nearly all of the evidence "will be rendered in an electronic format." There are 42 boxes of materials provided by Stevens to the government, the motion noted, but those are in Washington.

For the same reasons, there's no need for a jury to see the house, prosecutors said. For one, the evidence will include more than 1,000 high-resolution digital photos of both the interior and exterior, they said in their motion.

"The Girdwood residence is not the 'scene of the crimes,' but is rather merely the subject of some, but not all, of the defendant's false statements," prosecutors wrote.

Prosecutors added that the precise value of the benefits Stevens is accused of receiving will not be the predominant issue at trial. Instead, it will be "whether Stevens knew he received more than $250 in benefits from a source that he did not repay."

Prosecutors cite several other reasons for keeping the trial in Washington, D.C.:

• Stevens also is accused of failing to disclose that he traded his vintage Ford Mustang and $5,000 to Allen in 1999 for a new Land Rover Discovery worth about $44,000. The trade for Allen's Land Rover involved correspondence and financial instruments sent from Washington, prosecutors said. And ultimately, Stevens' 1964 Mustang was also shipped from Washington, they pointed out.

• Much of the correspondence concerning renovations at Stevens' Girdwood home, including the transmission of architectural drawings, e-mails and handwritten notes, was sent from Washington, prosecutors said.

• Although Stevens is not charged with bribery, the indictment against him details how Veco asked for assistance with federal matters and how Stevens helped the company. It also lays out how Stevens received things of value from Veco and failed to disclose them. In their motion, prosecutors said the requests for official acts that were made of Stevens involved written correspondence and were sent to addresses and computer servers in Washington.

• Prosecutors also pointed out that all three of the U.S. District Court judges in Alaska were nominated and confirmed by the U.S. Senate while Stevens was the senior senator from Alaska. Typically, a senior senator from a state suggests -- or even endorses -- judges and other federal appointees.

• Finally, prosecutors also argued that Stevens actually lives in Washington, D.C.:

"Although Stevens maintains a residence in Alaska, there can be no legitimate dispute that for all practical purposes, (he) lives and works in the District of Columbia. His spouse is an attorney at a law firm in the District of Columbia, and the family owns a personal residence in the District of Columbia."

Prosecutors wrote that if the trial is in Washington, D.C., Stevens will "be able to maintain close contact with his Senate office, and continue to live in his own home."

Businessman Weimar paid candidate to push prison

GUILTY PLEA: Fixation on building private prison brought him down.

By LISA DEMER and RICHARD MAUER

(08/12/08 01:34:41)

Bill Weimar, who made his fortune off private halfway houses in Alaska, pleaded guilty Monday to two federal felonies in U.S. District Court in Anchorage.

He admitted his role in a conspiracy to secretly funnel money to a political consultant for an unnamed state Senate candidate, knowing the candidate would back a private prison if he won.

Weimar had a long-standing relationship with the candidate running in the 2004 primary, a charging document filed Monday said. Weimar held a "contingent interest" in a private prison project worth $5.5 million, but only if the project was completed, the charges say.

He faces prison time in the plea deal and may have to forfeit "certain property." Prosecutors estimate a sentence of 10 to 16 months. U.S. District Judge John Sedwick isn't bound to that. He set sentencing for Oct. 29.

Weimar, who owned Allvest Inc., becomes the 11th person charged in the broad, ongoing investigation by the FBI and U.S. Department of Justice into political corruption in Alaska. Weimar, 68, now lives in Big Arm, Mont.

At the brief hearing on Monday, Weimar answered the judge's routine questions. Assistant U.S. Attorney Joe Bottini outlined the two charges: conspiracy to commit honest services mail and wire fraud, and illegally manipulating currency transactions to avoid reporting them to the Treasury Department.

Weimar has admitted paying the consultant a total of $20,000 during the primary in August 2004 to cover expenses for the candidate, without reporting the payments and without routing them through the campaign.

How do you plead? Sedwick asked.

"Guilty," Weimar answered, to each charge.

LAWMAKER NOT NAMED

For years, Weimar pushed plans for a private prison in Alaska, but the project was always controversial and no prison was ever built.

A Democratic activist in the 1970s, Weimar later became close to the Republicans who controlled the Alaska Legislature.

FBI - Stevens-2011

Neither the Senate candidate nor the consultant -- both accused of conspiring with Weimar -- is named in the charging document. Prosecutors declined to expand on it Monday.

But the candidate described in the documents, and in court Monday, appears to be former state Sen. Jerry Ward. He didn't return phone calls or e-mail messages on Monday.

Ward, a Republican elected from Anchorage in 1996 and the Kenai Peninsula in 2000, fervently pushed private prison projects as a legislator.

The charging document says the candidate running in 2004 had a long relationship with Weimar, and held elected office part of that time.

Ward and Weimar were "buddies," according to a statement that former lobbyist Bill Bobrick, who worked for Weimar, gave to the FBI in September 2006. Bobrick also has pleaded guilty in the corruption investigation. He declined to comment on Monday.

In 1997, a plan for a private prison in South Anchorage with Allvest and Veco Corp. as partners crumbled under strong public opposition. As that project evaporated, Ward emerged as the lead architect of a new plan to build private prisons in the Mat-Su and Seward.

"By God, this really solves the problem," Weimar was quoted as saying at the time.

In 2001, Ward signed on as the only Senate sponsor of a House bill pushing a private prison on the Kenai.

The charging document against Weimar doesn't say whether the candidate won in 2004 and does not call the person a legislator.

Ward lost his seat in 2002 to Tom Wagoner. He was trying to regain it in 2004, but lost in the Republican primary to Wagoner.

SEATTLE CONSULTANT

In court Monday, Bottini told the judge the consultant was from Seattle. Some of Ward's biggest campaign expenses in 2004 were more than $43,000 in fees charged by Madison Communications, an advertising and public relations firm based in suburban Kirkland, Wash.

Numerous calls left for Madison principal Brett Bader on Monday were not returned.

The charges against Weimar and other court documents quote details of a number of telephone conversations he had with the consultant and the candidate from Aug. 17 to Aug. 23, 2004.

In a telephone conversation on Aug. 17, 2004, the consultant told Weimar that the campaign was having money trouble, court documents say.

"I'm worried we're reaching the limit now. I don't know where we find 10 grand unless (Candidate A) can get more in," the consultant said

"There's no legal way to do that. At least not on that scale," Weimar responded.

Later that day, Weimar arranged to cover the next advertising mailer for the candidate, and told the candidate so, the document says.

On Aug. 20, 2004, Weimar told the candidate of an unpaid invoice of $20,000 with the consultant.

The candidate's campaign funds were depleted, the charges say. The candidate said he had only $300 to $400 left in his account.

On Aug. 23, 2004, Weimar made arrangements with the consultant to pay off the debt, the charges say. He then called the candidate and told him "he would not be receiving any further bills from Consultant A," the charging document says.

Weimar sent the consulting company a $3,000 check on Aug. 23, 2004, then sent $8,500 in cash that same day by express mail, and another $8,500 cash the day after, the charges say.

"WE'VE MOVED ON"

The charges also do not name the private prison company, but Cornell Corrections Inc. tried to build a prison in various Alaska communities, including Delta Junction, Kenai and Whittier. The charging document describes the unnamed company's Alaska interests as halfway houses, a planned juvenile treatment center, and a private prison project, and that matches Cornell's interests.

In 1998, in the midst of planning for a private prison in Delta Junction, Weimar sold five Alaska halfway houses to Cornell for $21 million. He also formed a partnership with Cornell to pursue the Delta prison and subsequent deals for a private facility.

One goal of the conspiracy was to get the private prison company to give campaign contributions to the candidate to help win election, according to the charges.

A spokesman for Cornell said the company was unaware of the charges but supports the prosecution. The executives now in charge of Cornell weren't there at the time of the events that involved Weimar, spokesman Charles Seigel said Monday. Company records don't show any evidence of wrongdoing, he added.

"We've moved on and we are very different and have it behind us," Seigel said.

Cornell also has not pursued a private prison in Alaska for years and is no longer interested in that, he said.

"We're glad this investigation is going on but whatever was going on or may have been going on in the past, that is not the Cornell that exists now, both in the policy on the private prison as we've talked about and in general about the way we do business."

By 2004, Veco was no longer involved in the prison project, Frank Prewitt, a former state corrections commissioner, Cornell consultant and FBI informant, has said.

ANDERSON INVOLVED

The failed private prison effort was also central in the government's case against former state Rep. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage, now in prison.

At Anderson's corruption trial last summer, Prewitt was a key witness who testified at length about his undercover work to collect evidence against Anderson, and also about questionable acts in his own past.

From the witness stand, Prewitt said that in 1994 -- when he was corrections commissioner and Weimar owned Allvest -- he accepted $30,000 from Weimar. Prewitt testified that he considered the money a loan, which he repaid the next year, after he left his state post, by working four months for Allvest for free.

Weimar helped start Allvest in 1985, then bought out his partners and turned it into a multimillion dollar corporation with operations in Alaska and Washington state. Its government contracts were worth an estimated $10 million a year.

Allvest also operated a lab that did contract urinalysis work, and used to run the city's Animal Control Center and the Community Service Patrol.

In 2002, Allvest was forced into bankruptcy because of unpaid judgments in civil suits against the company. The bankruptcy case eventually was settled.

Feds reveal more in Stevens case

FILINGS: Prosecutors allege senator used inside help to profit from Florida condo.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(08/15/08 03:37:45)

Federal prosecutors offered a glimpse of previously unseen evidence against U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens in new court filings Thursday, including allegations that Stevens used insider help to turn a secret $5,000 investment in a Florida condo development into more than $100,000 in quick profits.

The government also dismissed assertions by Stevens that his conduct was shielded by the constitution as a member of Congress, citing nine examples of Stevens' "errands" and requests involving Veco that had nothing to do with protected lawmaking.

Among them: an intercepted telephone call in which Stevens discusses how his son Ben, then the state Senate President, planned to push a bill favored by the oil industry as a prelude to gas development.

The new filings go substantially further than the indictment handed up against Stevens last month charging him with seven counts of failing to disclose gifts from 1999 through 2006. Most of the alleged gifts were from the former Alaska-based oil field service company Veco and its politically active chairman, Bill Allen. Allen and Veco vice president Rick Smith have pleaded guilty to bribing elected officials and are working with government prosecutors and are expected to testify at Stevens' trial, tentatively scheduled to start with jury selection Sept. 22.

Stevens demanded a speedy trial in hopes of a positive outcome before the November election, in which he is seeking a seventh full term. So far, the case is set for district court in Washington, though Stevens is asking for a change of venue to Alaska, where a more friendly jury might await him.

One of the government documents is a response to an earlier motion filed by Stevens seeking dismissal of the charges on the basis of the Constitution's Speech or Debate clause. That clause offers broad protection to members of Congress from prosecution for activity in furtherance of legislation -- but it's not a blanket immunity. Nor is the separation of powers doctrine, which Stevens' attorneys cited in another motion seeking dismissal Thursday.

The allegations concerning the Florida condo emerged in another document filed electronically by prosecutors Wednesday night, hours after the court clerk closed for the day. That document also alleges that Stevens sought jobs from Veco for a son and a grandchild and a new Jeep Cherokee for his daughter Lily in 2005.

The government says it plans to offer that evidence at trial as background, as proof of the crimes in the indictment, and as evidence of a guilty conscience. Stevens wouldn't comment, but it's likely his legal team will fight against introduction of the evidence as extraneous to the charges.

NEW ALLEGATIONS

While much of the government's case had emerged in newspaper reports long before the Washington grand jury handed up the indictment, the allegations concerning Florida condo and Jeep Cherokee have never been aired.

The Florida transaction began in 2001, a year after Allen began renovating Stevens' Girdwood residence, and a time at which Stevens was approaching the pinnacle of his power in the Senate.

On Feb. 4, 2001, Stevens and his wife, Catherine, signed a purchase contract with a development company about to build a condo project in Florida, agreeing to buy a garden unit for $360,000. The contract was a standard one and required a 10 percent down payment -- $36,000 -- but Stevens only put down $5,000, the motion says.

The development company was only described as "Company B." One of Company B's partners was "Person C," a personal friend of the Stevens, the government said.

Rather than require Stevens to put down the normal amount, Person C fronted the $31,000 in an interest-free loan that he paid to an escrow company "for the benefit of 'Theodore and Catherine Stevens,' " the government said.

There was evidence that the Stevenses never intended to live in the condo but merely saw it as a quick way to turn a buck, the document says.

On Aug. 21, 2001, Person C wrote Stevens that the deal was about to turn out "as I told you." Though the condo was still unbuilt, Company B had just accepted an offer on Stevens' garden apartment for $515,000 -- the same one Stevens were offered for $360,000 six months earlier. The buyer would assume Stevens' liabilities.

It was after that buyout that the Stevens' repaid Person C for the $31,000 loan, sending a $15,000 check on Sept. 12, 2001 and a $16,000 check on Dec. 11, 2001.

The government said Stevens was required to disclose any loan over $10,000 during 2001, but failed when it came to the condo loan.

"Although Stevens knowingly carried debt on a $31,000 interest-free loan from his personal friend for more than 10 months during 2001, Stevens did not list such a liability on his 2001 disclosure form," the government said.

JEEP CHEROKEE

The vehicle transaction in 2005 follows up an earlier one in 1999 that is referenced in Stevens' indictment. In the first deal, Stevens was looking for a car for his daughter, Lily, then 18. He was accused of not reporting the trade of a 35-year-old Mustang worth $20,000, plus $5,000 cash, for a new Land Rover Discovery bought by Allen worth $44,000 -- for a net benefit of around $20,000.

By 2005, Lily Stevens needed a new car, the government said in its filing Thursday. So Stevens returned to the original source: Allen.

"Allen offered to get Stevens' daughter a new car in exchange for the 1999 Land Rover, and Stevens agreed," the government said.

This time, the SUV would be a new Jeep Grand Cherokee. The deal was made between Stevens' daughter and a Veco employee "for the purpose of hiding Allen's involvement in the transaction." Allen wrote a personal check to the employee for $35,000, who bought the Jeep July 15, 2005, for a little more than $34,000 from a dealer.

Veco shipped the car to Seattle, paid the employee to fly to Seattle, pick up the car, and deliver it to Berkeley, Calif. Lily Stevens earned her law degree at the University of California at Berkeley, according to her wedding announcement in May.

Lily Stevens paid the Veco employee $13,000 plus her old car, valued at about $9,000, for the $34,000 Jeep, the government said.

PHOENIX JOB

In March 2006, after the government had begun tapping Allen's phones, Stevens asked a lobbyist to ask Allen for a job in Phoenix for one of his three sons. The son was unnamed, but Walter Stevens, a multimedia management specialist, lived in Phoenix, at least in the 1990s.

In a recorded conversation, the unidentified lobbyist told Allen, "I saw (Sen. Stevens) at lunch and he asked if you -- I'm not sure why he mentioned it to me -- but he asked me to, I think, find out if you had any business contacts in Phoenix with respect to his son who is down there, who finds himself without a job at this point." The lobbyist said Stevens mentioned Allen by name.

Allen ordered company officials to find a job for the son in Alaska in the summer of 2006, the government said. "Stevens' son accepted the position with Veco and also received a personal loan from Allen."

GAS LINE

In another filing Thursday, this one in response to Stevens' assertion of his immunity as a congressman, the government said Stevens' activities went well beyond his legislative role and should not be protected. One example prosecutors cited was Stevens pushing for state legislation on a proposed natural gas pipeline sought for years by Veco.

Stevens used his official position to try to get the state Legislature to approve construction of a gas line during the 2006 legislative session, the new filing says -- a session already shown to be tainted by corruption.

Between January and June 2006, the FBI secretly recorded telephone calls between Allen, Stevens, his legislative staff and his son, then-state Senate President Ben Stevens. They discussed the gas line, then-Gov. Frank Murkowski's negotiations with oil producers and legislation, the filing says. In one call, Stevens promised Allen he would "whittle down" the federal permitting and reviews, the document says.

In a call on June 25, 2006, Stevens and Allen talked about hearings coming up before a state Senate committee on which Ben Stevens served. Prosecutors say Stevens told Allen he was working with his son.

"I'm gonna try to see if I can get some bigwigs from back here to go up there and say, 'Look, uh, you just gotta make up your mind, you gotta get this done. There's no politics in it, there's necessity in it for the Federal government,' " Stevens told Allen, according to the filing.

He asked how he could help Allen, and said he was going to try to get the Secretary of Energy and head of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to Alaska regarding the need to act on the pipeline, prosecutors contend.

On July 7, 2006, Stevens traveled to Alaska and addressed the Senate committee, "urging it to cease infighting and pass the pipeline legislation before liquified natural gas monopolizes the marketplace," prosecutors say.

Three days later, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission issued a report with a similar message.

Stevens' defense team says case unconstitutional

TOO VAGUE: Lawyers ask judge to throw out charges that senator accepted money.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(08/15/08 02:04:56)

WASHINGTON -- Lawyers for Sen. Ted Stevens attacked the Justice Department case against him as unconstitutional and asked a judge on Thursday to throw out charges the Alaska Republican accepted thousands of dollars of home repairs and gifts and lied about them on his financial disclosure forms.

Stevens' lawyers argued in motions filed Thursday that the charges against the 84-year-old senator are vague, that they violate laws on the statute of limitations and that they breach constitutional barriers meant to keep executive branch investigators from meddling in congressional affairs.

His lawyers also complained that although Stevens is not charged with bribery, the first count of the indictment includes "blatantly inflammatory" language that suggests he accepted gifts and renovations from Veco Corp. in exchange for legislative favors for the former Alaska-based oil services company. Jurors should not see that language, his lawyers said in one of their motions.

"The gratuitous suggestion of a quid pro quo relationship would only serve to inflame the jury and create unfair prejudice against Senator Stevens," his lawyer, Robert Cary wrote.

Stevens' lawyers submitted seven motions on Thursday, the deadline for filings in an expedited trial schedule granted at Stevens' request, so his case can be heard before the Nov. 4 election.

U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan will hold a hearing Wednesday to decide whether to move Stevens' trial to Alaska. If the trial stays in Washington, jury selection is expected to begin Sept. 22. The trial would begin two days later.

Even as his lawyers prepare to defend Stevens in court, he continues to campaign in Alaska for the Aug 26 Republican primary. Stevens' campaign on Thursday unveiled three television commercials that will begin airing throughout Alaska.

SEPARATION OF POWERS

In their motions, Stevens' lawyers raised particular concerns about the first count of the indictment, which suggested Stevens accepted gifts in exchange for helping Veco with federal legislative business.

His lawyers argued that a grand jury could have issued such an indictment only if it were shown evidence that violates what's known as the speech or debate clause -- a portion of the U.S. Constitution that limits what sort of evidence executive branch investigators can use when they probe acts by members of Congress. If a grand jury heard evidence protected under the speech or debate clause, "the indictment in this case should be dismissed," Stevens' lawyers wrote.

FBI - Stevens-2017

Investigators may have overstepped their authority by interviewing Stevens' past and current legislative staffers, the senator's lawyers suggested.

"Even if those staffers did not themselves testify before the grand jury, it is equally problematic if FBI agents summarized testimony about protected information to the grand jury," his lawyers wrote.

In a similar vein, they argued that the indictment violated the separation of powers clause of the Constitution. The alleged false statements and omissions that Stevens made in the financial disclosure forms are a matter for the U.S. Senate to take up, not executive branch investigators, his lawyers argued.

- 794

194-AN-13620-m

In several other motions, Stevens' lawyers accused prosecutors of being sloppy and imprecise about the charges he faces. The indictment accused Stevens of failing to disclose the receipt of certain "things of value," his lawyers wrote.

"Yet the indictment does not describe the alleged falsity or concealment with any degree of specificity," they wrote, calling it "fatal to the indictment."

"ALLEGATIONS ARE INSUFFICIENT"

Stevens' lawyers ask for prosecutors to file more detailed charges that specify the things of value mentioned in the indictment, as well as the labor costs of Veco employees and contractors who worked on renovations in 2000 that doubled the size of Stevens' house.

They also want more specifics on the cost of materials that prosecutors allege weren't included in the invoices sent to Stevens.

The motion also suggests that the indictment doesn't adequately specify what sort of requests Veco employees made of Stevens when they asked him to use his official opinion to help the company.

"These allegations are insufficient, as a matter of law, to provide Senator Stevens with fair notice of the charges against him or to ensure that the grand jury properly returned an indictment in this matter," they wrote. "He is constitutionally owed a statement of the specific charges against him, a requirement not satisfied by a recitation of facts followed by general allegations."

The gifts Stevens is charged with accepting from 1999 to 2006 came during a renovation that doubled the size of the Girdwood home he owns with his wife, Catherine.

Veco employees and contractors performed architectural design services, put the house on stilts and installed a new three-bedroom first floor, a finished basement, a garage, a Viking gas range and a wraparound deck, according to the indictment.

Stevens paid a construction firm for its work, but the indictment accuses him of failing to fully reimburse Veco or its contractors -- even as he stayed closely involved in the progress of the work. Stevens has said he paid $130,000 of the construction costs.

Stevens' lawyers also argued Thursday in their motions that some of the charges he faces are outside of the statue of limitations.

During the investigation, Stevens agreed to a statute of limitations that dates to May 9, 2002. Yet his lawyers pointed out that the indictment alleges a scheme to conceal gifts by filing false disclosure forms that include the calendar years 1999 and 2000.

Sullivan will hear all motions in the case Sept. 10.

Evidence overwhelms Stevens lawyers

HELP: Defense team scrambling to sift through glut of legal material.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(08/14/08 01:42:34)

WASHINGTON -- Lawyers for Sen. Ted Stevens, facing a stepped-up trial schedule, asked for help Wednesday trying to make sense of more than 67,000 documents and 2,800 audio files that could end up as evidence against him.

Prosecutors and lawyers for Stevens had a brief hearing Wednesday afternoon to decide how to handle discovery materials the Justice Department is handing over to Stevens' defense team. That includes recordings of roughly 10,000 phone conversations.

Stevens, 84, faces a Sept. 24 trial on charges he knowingly took home repairs and gifts worth more than $250,000 from the oil field services company, Veco Corp., and failed to report them on his annual U.S. Senate disclosure forms. Next week, a judge will decide whether to grant Stevens' request to move the trial to Alaska.

Wednesday, one of Stevens' lawyers, Alex Romain, asked the government to provide more detail about 67,000 pages of documents they scanned electronically and handed over to the defense. Some of the documents don't show where they begin and end, the defense complained. Those documents include bank records, spreadsheets and evidence that was seized from Veco Corp. computers.

Veco CEO Bill Allen and Richard Smith, a former vice president of community affairs and government relations for the now-defunct company, pleaded guilty in May 2007 to making more than $400,000 in corrupt payments to Alaska public officials.

Allen's testimony has been key in other convictions in the ongoing public corruption investigation, which to date has led to charges against 11 lawmakers, lobbyists and businessmen. Eight have been convicted or pleaded guilty. Three lawmakers, including Stevens, are awaiting trial.

Stevens' lawyers on Wednesday also asked to have better labeling on approximately 2,800 audio files, and the government agreed to be more forthcoming about who is calling or who is receiving the call, and when it was made. The audio files include wiretaps of both cell phones and land lines, Stevens' lawyers said Wednesday.

The defense also wants "surveillance logs" used by investigators to determine when calls began and ended and who is on the line.

With all the discovery materials, prosecutors said they would work with the defense to try to provide more information.

FBI - Stevens-2019

DISPUTES IN THE OPEN

The fast-moving trial calendar, sped up so Stevens could face a jury before the general election, means that some of the tug-of-war that generally goes on behind the scenes in criminal trials is playing out in the courtroom.

They're the kind of issues that could generally be handled over the telephone, said U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan. In this case, though, Sullivan said he is anxious to be as transparent as possible because of the high-profile nature of the trial and the intense media scrutiny.

When necessary, Sullivan said, he'll hold a hearing, but the speed of the case means that lawyers need to settle some of their disputes over potential evidence among themselves.

194-AN-03620-01 -795

"I'm going to make myself available," he warned the defense and prosecution, "but this is an issue best resolved by the attorneys."

If the case remains in Washington, D.C., jury selection is scheduled to begin Sept. 22, two days before the trial. Lawyers for both the defense and the prosecution have asked to submit questionnaires to the jurors, so they can review them and base their selection on their answers.

Questionnaires are rarely used, Sullivan said, so he asked the lawyers to make plans to photocopy 30 to 40 copies of the answers submitted by the estimated 150 jurors in the initial pool. The copies will be needed for members of the legal teams.

PRETRIAL PUBLICITY

Meanwhile, Stevens' lawyers submitted a second brief Wednesday in support of their motion to move the trial to Alaska. In it they argued that holding the trial in Alaska is "the only way to permit Senator Stevens even a minor role in his reelection campaign." Stevens, a Republican who has held his Senate seat since 1968 and has been campaigning in Alaska, has attended only one of his court appearances since his indictment.

His attorneys continued to argue that most of the witnesses are in Alaska, as is one of the pieces of evidence in the case: Stevens' home in Girdwood.

Stevens' lawyers also dismissed concerns by the Justice Department prosecutors that moving the trial to Alaska -- while the senator campaigns there -- could taint the jury pool.

Stevens has "received positive and negative publicity in Alaska and in the District of Columbia," his lawyers wrote. "This publicity can be expected to continue in both venues during the trial. In either venue, the effects of pre-trial publicity can be addressed during jury selection while the effects of publicity during trial can be addressed by appropriate instructions to the jury."

Prosecutors argued in a motion filed Monday that they believe the case is fundamentally a Washington, D.C.-based one, since the case centers on disclosure forms Stevens filed with the U.S. Senate.

Potential questions for jurors in Stevens case

Posted by Alaska_Politics

From Richard Mauer in Anchorage --

What potential Washington, D.C., jurors know about Alaska, what they think about the oil industry, and whether they have reservations about sending an 84-year-old man to jail are all questions on proposed juror questionnaires submitted for review Monday in U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens' felony disclosure case.

Prosecutors and Stevens' defense attorney filed three separate lists of questions to U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan — one they agreed on, and separate additions (government here and defense here) they hoped to convince the judge to use.

Sullivan said he expects to begin seating a jury in Washington on Sep. 22 — though Stevens is still hoping to move the trial to Alaska, where undoubtedly the questions to potential jurors would be quite different.

Anyone who's served on a jury will be familiar with most of the noncontroversial, joint questions: where do you work, do you know anyone in the courtroom, have you ever been convicted of a crime, can you spare the time to sit in a courtroom (for four weeks), do you understand the presumption of innocence afforded any defendant?

But there were also questions unique to this case: have you ever had a vexing experience with home remodeling? Ever refuse to pay a contractor because the work was lousy? Both sides want to know, presumably because the renovations to Stevens' Girdwood home starting in 2000 by the oil-field service company Veco are central to the case. The government, in its seven-count indictment, alleged Stevens failed to disclose work and furnishing provided by Veco and its chairman, Bill Allen.

Several joint questions seek to find out if potential jurors are political active or read about politics, especially the insider Capitol Hill publications. Do they listen to talk radio, read political blogs or go to Internet forums? The government, in particular, wants to know if they read the conservative Drudge Report or the liberal Huffington Post online.

Stevens' lawyers want to know what kind of impression the potential jurors have of Alaska in general. Their answers, by the way, may provide a clue about the harm to Alaska of all the coverage — some involving Stevens — of our famed "Bridges to Nowhere," other earmarks and the corruption investigation.

Stevens' lawyers are seeking permission to ask a similar question about their impressions of Congress in general.

The government wants to know if the IRS has ever gone after them, in particular for the error of a spouse or tax preparer.

And then there are these proposed questions, also from the government: In your course of employment/business, have you ever given a gift to a vendor? In your course of employment/business have you ever received a gift from another business entity?

And finally, the government wants to know whether Stevens' age would prejudice the outcome: "Would you have any difficulty finding an 84-year-old guilty of a crime if you knew that a conviction might result in a prison term?"

A hearing will be held at 11 a.m. Washington time tomorrow on Stevens' request to move the trial to Alaska.

HUH? You talkin' to me?

Stevens hasn't denied receiving any of the under-the-table "freebies" from Veco. His only comment on the matter, so far, is that he "paid every bill that was sent to him".

Did Steven's have a contract with Veco or Allen? (Don't think so! ... that would leave a paper trail).

Did Steven's ever question Allen or Veco as to why they were doing all that "free" work ... or that they were doing it without being asked? (Don't think so ..... that would imply that he was aware of the "gifts" he wasn't reporting).

Why didn't Stevens just report the gifts? (Hummmmm.... on it's face, the whole thing looks like

Stevens' lawyers accuse prosecutors of 'smear'

FILINGS: Defense says feds insinuate bribery despite no such charge against senator.

By RICHARD MAUER and ERIKA BOLSTAD
Anchorage Daily News

(08/26/08 03:12:56)

Lawyers for Ted Stevens accused prosecutors Monday of attempting to unfairly try Alaska's senior U.S. senator next month by introducing "irrelevant and prejudicial evidence" that has nothing to do with the disclosure violations he's charge with.

Defense attorney Robert Cary asserted that new issues raised by the government "in its unnecessary public filing" nine days earlier have no place in the trial, scheduled to begin Sept. 22 in Washington, D.C.

"Instead, they are an obvious attempt to smear the senator's character," Cary wrote.

Among those issues was an undisclosed $31,000 loan by a developer to Stevens in 2001 that let him turn a $5,000 investment in an unbuilt Florida condo into a $100,000 profit, and a discount of more than $10,000 on a Jeep obtained by the oil field services company Veco for Stevens' adult daughter Lily in 2005.

And in another filing on Monday, Cary served notice on the government that he might attempt to question former Veco chairman Bill Allen, the government's chief witness, about an Anchorage Police Department investigation of him. Cary didn't provide details, but the Daily News and other media reported that Anchorage police investigated Allen for sexual abuse of a minor from allegations involving a girl who was under 16. That investigation came up in a closed-door hearing in the bribery trial of a state legislator in Anchorage last year in which Allen was the lead witness, but the jury never heard the allegations.

Cary said the government brought up the matter in a sealed motion in which it sought a ruling that any such cross-examination of Allen would be "inflammatory and impermissible" under court procedure. Cary said the government's motion itself was inappropriately filed under seal.

The defense filings came amid a blizzard of motions and responses filed by both sides Monday in U.S. District Court in Washington, the day before Stevens faces six challengers in today's Republican primary. The pretrial jockeying by the two sides is an effort to use the law, court procedures and the Constitution to their advantage as the structure of the trial takes shape.

U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan has agreed to hear the case on an expedited basis to improve Stevens' chances of a verdict before the general election Nov. 4.

FBI - Stevens-2023

Stevens insists he's innocent and will be exonerated by a jury.

In one of his filings, Stevens argued that the government was unfairly trying to bring in evidence of bribery when it was only charging Stevens with failing to report more than $250,000 in gifts, mostly from Allen and Veco.

"The utter illogic of the government's position reveals what is really going on," Cary wrote. "The government wishes to smuggle in suggestions of bribery and corruption that it has not charged and cannot prove. The indictment alleges no quid pro quo for any gifts Sen. Stevens allegedly received, but the government now asks permission to introduce evidence of official actions in order to invite the jury baselessly to infer just such a quid pro quo."

"PUBLIC SCRUTINY AND CRITICISM"

For their part, prosecutors lashed back at that argument. Prosecutors said the evidence is crucial to establishing motive. The information it wants to show the jury also details the close relationship between Stevens and Allen, who had ready access to Stevens over the phone, in e-mail and in person.

Their job is to show that Stevens "knowingly and intentionally" lied on his disclosure forms, prosecutors wrote. To do that, they need to prove a motive.

Prosecutors argued in their motions that if Stevens had reported the gifts they accuse him of accepting but failing to report, he would have faced questions that could have drawn media scrutiny as well as ethics complaints and a possible ouster from office.

He wanted to avoid "the negative consequences flowing from such disclosure, particularly during a time frame when the defendant had been engaged in performing official acts for Veco and Bill Allen," prosecutors wrote.

In other words, it was necessary for him to hide how close he was to Allen, prosecutors said, because he "would have subjected himself to public scrutiny and criticism regarding his ongoing relationship with Veco and Bill Allen, and the fact that he was laboring under a conflict of interest."

"Most importantly, disclosure of the things of value and the negative repercussions flowing from that disclosure would have threatened the defendant's future stream of things of value from Veco, Bill Allen and others."

Prosecutors also countered arguments that the charges against Stevens aren't specific enough. Stevens "cannot credibly claim that he cannot understand the charges or prepare his defense," government lawyers wrote, because they are "exceptionally detailed."

They cite one example: "Where the indictment charges that Stevens received things of value at the Girdwood residence, the indictment specifically notes that the 'renovation work included jacking up and resting the house on stilts, building a new first floor with two bedrooms and a bathroom, renovating the existing residence, and adding a garage with workshop and a second-story wraparound deck.'"

Also, while Stevens is entitled to know what charges he faces, prosecutors wrote that he is not owed an explanation of "each and every detail of how (the case) will be proved."

They also dispute Stevens' claim that the indictment violated provisions of the Constitution's Speech or Debate clause, which bars the government prosecutors from using speeches and legislation introduced by members of Congress as evidence. Prosecutors said that evidence protected by legislative immunity granted by the Constitution was not shown to the grand jury that ultimately indicted Stevens.

"The prosecutors who were involved in the grand jury proceedings are not aware of any evidence introduced to the grand jury that reflects an act taken by Stevens, such as bills or statements on the floor of the Senate, that would be considered protected legislative activity."

As for Stevens' claim that under the Constitution it's up to the Senate to police itself when it comes to disclosure rules, prosecutors counter that the case "does not involve enforcement of internal Senate rules."

FBI - Stevens-2024

"It involves enforcement of an unambiguous rule contained in the criminal law: do not lie when required by law to provide honest disclosure of assets." That was a law Congress itself passed.

"STEVENS DID NOTHING IMPROPER"

On the matter of the evidence involving the Florida loan, the Jeep and other issues, Stevens' lawyers argued that it would prejudice the jury. In the case of the Florida loan in particular, "Sen. Stevens did nothing improper," Cary, his attorney, wrote.

The Jeep deal "is a misguided attempt to impugn Sen. Stevens and his family before the jury," Cary argued.

In its earlier filings, the government included excerpts of two e-mails Stevens sent to his friend Bob Persons, the Double Musky restaurateur in Girdwood. The government said Stevens was acting guilty in those e-mails. The excerpts cited by the government suggested Stevens was asking Persons to be less than candid before a grand jury.

Persons kept an eye on Veco's renovations to Stevens' home in Girdwood starting in 2000, the majority of the alleged unreported Veco gifts in Stevens' indictment.

Cary submitted two entire e-mails, which he said showed them to be innocuous.

In one, dated May 17, 2007, Stevens advises Persons to get his own attorney involved. Apparently Persons was afraid of an indictment himself, and Stevens said he needed a lawyer.

In the second e-mail, sent six hours after the first, Stevens again stressed the important of legal counsel.

"If they know you have legal advice, they will be more careful," Stevens said.

Stevens also provided some advice about how Persons should proceed.

"Again, don't let them rattle you and don't answer questions you don't know the answers to," Stevens said. "They have lots of info from Bill," Stevens said, a likely reference to Bill Allen.

Stevens' lawyers want to block phone evidence

CORRUPTION CASE: Senator's team tries to get evidence tossed.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(09/03/08 01:36:16)

WASHINGTON -- Lawyers for Sen. Ted Stevens signaled Tuesday they'll try to keep jurors from hearing as many as 105 phone calls the FBI recorded as part of the investigation that led to the 84-year-old Alaska Republican's indictment on corruption charges.

The phone calls appear to be among the thousands of hours of secretly recorded phone taps and video surveillance that have helped prosecutors land seven convictions and guilty pleas in the sweeping multiyear probe of corruption in Alaska politics. In at least one of the cases, jurors said the recordings -- which showcase crude talk and salty exchanges between lobbyists and state lawmakers -- were key to their guilty verdict.

The senator goes to trial Sept. 24 on seven counts of lying on his annual financial disclosure reports about gifts and home repairs he allegedly received from an oil services company and its CEO, Bill Allen. A judge granted an expedited trial so that Stevens could face a jury before the Nov. 4 election. Stevens, who won a Republican primary last week, faces Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, a Democrat, in the general election.

His lawyers on Tuesday continued to shore up their defense of the senator, filing motions that criticized prosecutors for a vaguely written indictment and for insinuating that Stevens took bribes. The government "obviously wishes to import the stench of a bribery prosecution into a case that is nothing of the sort," wrote Stevens' lawyers.

Stevens' lawyers complained in documents that prosecutors dumped more than 400 hours of video and audio evidence on them last month, but little of it was related to Stevens. Only 105 of the 2,800 intercepted phone calls feature Stevens, his lawyers wrote in motions filed Tuesday.

They also said the Justice Department didn't specifically name the senator as a "targeted interceptee" in the affidavits they submitted to a court seeking permission for wiretaps. As a result, they may to seek to keep a jury from hearing those recordings, one of his lawyers, Robert Cary, wrote in motions filed Tuesday. They're asking for detailed logs that show the government made every effort to avoid recording noncriminal conversations and people who weren't named in orders authorizing the wiretaps.

FLORIDA DEAL TIE-IN

Last week, his lawyers accused prosecutors of unfairly introducing "irrelevant and prejudicial evidence" that has nothing to do with the disclosure violations he faces.

FBI - Stevens-2026

His attorneys are referring to how prosecutors revealed that a friend loaned Stevens $31,000 in 2001 that let him turn a $5,000 investment in an unbuilt Florida condo into a $103,000 profit. He faces no charges in connection with the allegation.

However, prosecutors argued Tuesday in their own motions that they intend to introduce the information at trial because it is directly related to charges he faces in connection with repairs to his home in Girdwood. Stevens took out a line of credit on his Girdwood home to pay for Veco repairs, prosecutors said.

They said they'll be showing that even as Allen and Veco helped Stevens by "doing free work on the Girdwood residence," another friend helped defray the home repair expenses the senator paid to non-Veco workers by "providing him with a virtually-no-risk real estate investment that covered Stevens' line of credit."

The information about the "no-risk" Florida real estate deal is "relevant to establishing Stevens' knowledge and interest concerning his personal investments and financial status," prosecutors wrote.

SPEECH-OR-DEBATE CONFLICTS

Stevens' lawyers on Tuesday also continued to press their case for throwing out the indictment based on the speech-or-debate clause of the U.S. Constitution, which bars the government prosecutors from using speeches and legislation introduced by members of Congress as evidence. Prosecutors said that evidence protected by legislative immunity granted by the Constitution was not shown to the grand jury that ultimately indicted Stevens.

But Stevens' lawyers said they believe the grand jurors did see protected material, and they've asked for permission to review transcripts of what prosecutors presented in the secret sessions.

That would mirror what government lawyers have done in the Rep. William Jefferson case, Stevens' lawyers said in their motions. Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat, faces bribery charges. In Jefferson's case, his lawyers were given permission to review grand jury testimony of the congressman's legislative aides to determine whether there are speech or debate conflicts. A judge reviewed the remaining transcripts for conflicts.

Prosecutors continued to maintain in their filings that that the evidence of "official or political actions" by Stevens will "be limited to such routinely admissible categories as constituent services or communication with government agencies."

U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan will hear all of the pretrial motions next week. Sullivan has already ruled that the trial will stay in Washington D.C. instead of moving to Alaska.

FBI taped more than 100 Stevens calls

By MATT APUZZO
The Associated Press
(09/02/08 13:37:29)

WASHINGTON - FBI agents taped more than 100 phone conversations involving Sen. Ted Stevens as part of their public corruption investigation, Stevens' attorneys said today.

The FBI's trove of secretly recorded conversations has already been the highlight of trials in Alaska, but the size of its collection against Stevens has until now been unclear. The sometimes-graphic conversations between hard-drinking oil contractors and corrupt Alaska politicians helped the Justice Department send three state politicians to prison.

The calls involving Stevens could be played in court this month when the Senate's longest-serving Republican stands trial on charges of lying about hundreds of thousands of dollars in home renovations and other gifts he received from an oil contractor.

The FBI did not tap Stevens' phone but did tap several phones belonging to contractors in the case. Out of 2,800 intercepted phone conversations, Stevens was recorded 105 times, his attorneys wrote in court documents.

Though Stevens is not charged with bribery, prosecutors want jurors to hear about a close relationship with Stevens and Veco founder Bill Allen. They want to portray Allen as an influence-buyer with a direct line into Stevens' office. Phone conversations between the two men could help that case.

His attorneys began laying the groundwork for a future argument that those calls should not be admitted into evidence. FBI agents can only tape conversations related to people or topics named in a warrant. The Justice Department did not name Stevens as a wiretapping target, his attorneys wrote, "yet it appears to have targeted his phone calls."

Stevens' attorneys object to the government's plan to present evidence that Stevens not only accepted gifts and services from Veco but also used his Senate seat to help the company's interests.

"The government obviously wishes to import the stench of a bribery prosecution into a case that is nothing of the sort," attorney Robert M. Cary wrote.

US Senate has final say if Stevens is convicted

CONSTITUTION: Only a two-thirds majority vote can expel a sitting member.

By STEVE QUINN
The Associated Press
(09/01/08 01:49:51)

If Ted Stevens is convicted in his federal trial next month, his name will still appear as the Republican candidate for Senate on Alaska's November election ballot.

And if the 84-year-old Stevens then wins his seventh full term and refuses to resign, it could fall to his colleagues to decide whether he should be expelled.

"Once the jury has rendered a verdict, the Senate has a constitutional right to consider the qualifications of the member," said Don Ritchie, an associate Senate historian.

It would take a two-thirds vote of the Senate to expel Stevens.

No sitting senator has been removed in 146 years. The last was Indiana Sen. Jesse Bright in 1862.

Others facing expulsion, like Oregon Sen. Bob Packwood in 1995, resigned before the Senate took a vote.

Stevens, whose trial starts Sept. 22 in Washington, D.C., said it won't come anywhere near that.

He will not discuss stepping down, withdrawing from the race or quitting the Senate. His plans are simply to first win in court, and then at the polls.

"Put this down: That will never happen -- ever, OK?" Stevens said. "I am not stepping down. I'm going to run through and I'm going to win this election.

"The court case is going to go on. Whether it's finished or not, I'm still going to run for re-election, OK?"

Federal prosecutors allege Stevens failed to disclose more than $250,000 in home renovations and gifts from executives at oil services contractor Veco Corp.

Stevens, the Senate's longest-serving Republican, has pleaded not guilty.

Ritchie said fellow senators usually do not intervene while elections or court cases are pending.

"They've always waited until the legal process is complete and voters had their say," he said. "Once they're elected, the only judge of qualifications to serve is the U.S. Senate."

Stevens satisfied voters from his party Tuesday, capturing 63 percent of the vote and defeating six opponents.

After winning his primary, Stevens quickly proclaimed the Nov. 4 election a "piece of cake."

Stevens faces a staunch opponent in November, Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, who is popular and has the backing of the national Democratic party.

Begich will seemingly have the state to himself to campaign while Stevens is on trial in late September and early October.

Begich in the campaign so far has avoided calling attention to the corruption charges, saying he believes

e

Alaskans will vote for him, not necessarily against Stevens.

"What people want to talk about are issues of energy, of health care and of taxes. That's where I'm going to go," Begich said.

Stevens has attempted to paint Begich as a liberal aligning with interest outside the state, including "extreme environmentalists."

If Stevens is re-elected after a conviction but then resigns from the Senate or is expelled, Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin would be required to call a special election.

That's a relatively new provision in state law, driven when former U.S. Sen. Frank Murkowski won the gubernatorial race in 2002 and then appointed his daughter, Lisa Murkowski, to his seat.

Alaska residents were upset with what they saw as nepotism. A voter initiative ended gubernatorial appointments to vacancies in 2004, the same year Murkowski successfully won her first full term in the Senate by defeating former Gov. Tony Knowles.

Stevens lawyer seeks access to evidence

By RICHARD MAUER
(09/09/08 15:55:06)

An attorney defending Sen. Ted Stevens against felony disclosure charges argued in a filing today that the government's failure to provide an advance look at evidence risks jeopardizing the fast-approaching trial.

In a motion to compel the government to turn over the material, Robert Cary accused prosecutors of "dilatory tactics" that could jeopardize Stevens' right to a fair trial.

The case is being heard in Washington, D.C., where Stevens files his annual financial disclosures. He's charged with seven counts of intentionally submitting false ones over the years by omitting gifts and benefits worth more than $250,000 from friends and favor-seekers, chief among them Bill Allen, the former chairman of the oil-field services company Veco.

U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan has scheduled a hearing tomorrow on at least a half-dozen significant issues that have arisen over the last month, including the motion filed today.

Though the motion was filed Tuesday, it was dated Sept. 2, a week earlier. Cary didn't respond to an e-mail message seeking clarification.

Cary argued that Supreme Court decisions protecting defendant rights require the government to turn over evidence in its possession that could show Stevens wasn't guilty of the crimes charged. The defense also demanded information that could be used to impeach government witnesses.

For instance, Cary demanded the government provide any information involving a state investigation of Bill Allen for sexual abuse of a minor.

The Daily News reported in February that in 2004, Anchorage police investigated whether Bill Allen had sex in the 1990s with a girl who was under 16, a felony without a statute of limitations. The case was closed at the request of federal prosecutors when the girl, by then an adult, had become the chief witness in federal case involving a sex-and-cocaine ring. A federal prosecutor told the Daily News last year that he feared the police would become distracted by pursuing Allen, jeopardizing the drug and sex case already at hand.

Anchorage police reopened their investigation in December, then suspended it when witnesses couldn't be located.

In his filing, Cary demanded the government provide details about "the pendency of any investigation (into sexual abuse by Allen), whether it was quashed, why it was quashed, and when it was quashed," because all that is relevant to Allen's credibility.

FBI - Stevens-2031

"His cooperation with the government, and the nature of his testimony, may well be driven by a belief, whether justified or not, that his assistance to the government would guarantee him immunity or leniency in the state investigation," Cary wrote.

Cary also alleged the government knows about a "purportedly false affidavit" signed by David Anderson, Bill Allen's nephew and an expected witness. The affidavit, submitted in an unrelated case, contains a claim by Anderson that "the government has provided him and his friends and family with a broad grant of immunity in exchange for his testimony in this case."

Anderson has told reporters that he was one the key workers sent by Allen to renovate and furnish Ted Stevens' home in Girdwood starting in 2000. Anderson later had a major falling-out with Allen over a girlfriend and other issues, and Allen was questioned during a trial last year whether he wanted to kill Anderson. Allen denied it.

Cary also demanded any plea agreements the government may have entered into with Anderson and another Veco worker on the Stevens home project, Rocky Williams. In an earlier filing, the Stevens defense team acknowledged being told by the government there were no such deals. But they questioned whether there were informal understandings.

Cary also challenged audio tapes made of intercepted phone calls of Sen. Stevens. He said that if Stevens wasn't the designated target in wiretap authorizations signed by a judge, the evidence contained in them should be suppressed. But the government has so far failed to provide the necessary information about the recorded conversations to make that determination, he said

Judge rejects move to dismiss Stevens charges

By ERIKE BOLSTAD
(09/10/08 13:59:45)

WASHINGTON -- All the bluster about "dilatory" tactics aside, it looks as though Sen. Ted Stevens will go to trial in two weeks, as scheduled and in the midst of his re-election bid.

Lawyers for the Alaska Republican tried but failed Wednesday to have the corruption case thrown out on grounds it is unconstitutional and that some counts in the indictment were outside the statute of limitations.

Stevens, 84, faces seven felony counts of knowingly taking home repairs and gifts worth more than $250,000 from the oil field services company Veco Corp. and failing to report them on his annual U.S. Senate disclosure forms.

Jury selection is scheduled to begin Sept. 22.

U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan ruled against most of the motions filed by Stevens' lawyers, including one that would have stricken language in the indictment that suggests he accepted gifts and renovations from Veco in exchange for legislative favors for the company.

Sullivan is expected to issue additional rulings on two key issues leading up to the trial. He will determine whether evidence in the case violates constitutional separations that keep lawmakers from being prosecuted for their legislative actions in the halls of Congress. He'll also rule on whether prosecutors can introduce a wide array of other evidence to boost their case, including showing that Stevens hid a $31,000 loan from a friend and then parlayed it into $129,250 in real estate gains.

Stevens' alleged gift list grows

EVIDENCE: $1,000 sled dog among items not disclosed by senator, prosecution says.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(09/08/08 23:53:41)

Federal prosecutors revealed more evidence Monday in their case against U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, detailing a new round of gifts that he allegedly failed to disclose between 2001 and 2003.

In a filing in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., the government listed the items as a $1,000 sled dog, a $3,200 stained-glass window and a $2,695 massage chair. They are in addition to the $250,000-plus in labor and materials allegedly provided by the oil-field service company Veco Corp. when it renovated and furnished Stevens' Girdwood home starting in 2000.

Monday's filings from each side asked U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan to adopt its version of the case to be read to prospective jurors when they gather in two weeks for Stevens' trial in Washington, D.C. The statement of the case is supposed to be a neutral rendition of the issues at trial, but each side clearly jockeyed for advantage.

Sullivan may choose one or the other, or draft his own version, steering somewhere between the advocates, who also submitted competing jury instructions Monday in advance of the trial.

In a separate motion, Stevens' attorneys asked Sullivan to order the release of the medical records of Bill Allen, the 71-year-old former chairman of Veco, who suffered a head injury in a motorcycle accident in 2001. Allen, who pleaded guilty to bribing state legislators and who is expected to be the chief witness against Stevens, said in testimony in state court last year that he had trouble speaking because of the accident, though he could think clearly.

Stevens' attorneys disclosed they had sought a voluntary authorization from Allen to allow them to inspect his medical records at Providence Alaska Medical Center in Anchorage and at UCLA Health Systems in Los Angeles, where he was treated by a neurologist and neurosurgeon. Allen's lawyer, Bob Bundy, turned them down.

Stevens has contended he is innocent and will be vindicated by a jury. He has asked for a speedy trial, hoping a verdict in his favor would be rendered before the November election. Stevens, the longest serving Republican senator, is seeking his seventh full term; he faces Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, a Democrat, on Nov. 4.

The government took a half-page in their document to describe the Girdwood renovations, telling how a floor was added to Stevens' home along with a wrap-around deck, new rooms, and major electrical and plumbing work.

DEFENSE DISMISSES NEW LIST

FBI - Stevens-2034

In their version of the statement of the case, Stevens' lawyers devoted only a seven-word phrase in a single sentence to the renovations. They used more words for the newly reported items, but spoke dismissively of them.

"The government further alleges that Sen. Stevens knowingly and willfully failed to report an alleged gift of stained glass, knowingly and willfully failed to report an alleged gift of a dog, and knowingly and willfully failed to report an alleged gift of a chair," Stevens' attorneys wrote.

The chair wasn't just a chair, the government said, but a $2,695 massage chair given to Stevens by a friend identified only as "Person A." The chair was placed in Stevens' home in Washington, it said.

The stained glass wasn't just stained glass either. It was a "hand-designed, hand-constructed stained glass window built to specifications provided by the defendant and his spouse, but paid for by 'Person B' and given to Stevens in 2001."

And the dog wasn't just a mutt from the pound. It was an expensive sled dog Stevens got from "Person B" in 2003. The government alleged Stevens misrepresented the dog as a $250 gift from the nonprofit Kenai River Sportfishing Association, a group closely associated with his friend, Bob Penney. In his 2003 disclosure, Stevens said the dog was "an honorary award in recognition of public service" and that he had purchased its twin for $250.

In asking for authority to subpoena Allen's medical records, Stevens' attorneys said that "understanding the scope and severity of Allen's brain injury is highly significant to the preparation of the defense."

Citing his testimony in the trials of two legislators that resulted in convictions, the attorneys added, "History has shown that, when Allen is called as a government witness, the government typically begins by eliciting his testimony that he was involved in a motorcycle accident in 2001 that impacted his speech, but otherwise left his brain function unaffected. The defense is certainly entitled to test the accuracy of Allen's account and determine whether Allen's memory or ability to perceive were impacted when 'about a quarter' of Allen's brain 'died' in the accident," they said, using Allen's own descriptions of his injuries.

Stevens lawyers protest delays

EVIDENCE: Defense says tactics could jeopardize fairness.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(09/10/08 01:34:35)

An attorney defending U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens against federal charges argued Tuesday that the government's failure to provide an advance look at evidence risks jeopardizing the fast-approaching trial.

In a motion to compel the government to turn over the material, Robert Cary accused prosecutors of "dilatory tactics" that could jeopardize Stevens' right to a fair trial.

But the government, which is prosecuting Stevens in Washington, D.C., on seven counts of filing false annual financial disclosures, dismissed the defense claims as being "without merit."

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan has scheduled a hearing today on at least a half-dozen significant issues that have arisen over the last month, including the motion filed Tuesday. Stevens' trial is set to start with jury selection on Sept. 22 and is expected to last about a month.

Under that schedule, the trial would end just a week or so before election day, Nov. 4, when Stevens, the Senate's longest serving Republican, is standing for his seventh full term against Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, a Democrat.

Stevens is accused of intentionally failing to disclose gifts and benefits worth more than $250,000 from friends and favor-seekers, chief among them Bill Allen, the former chairman of the oil-field services company Veco Corp. Allen has pleaded guilty to bribing Alaska legislators and will be one of the government's chief witnesses against Stevens.

ALLEN INVESTIGATION

In his filing, Cary argued that the government's obligation to turn over evidence that would be favorable to Stevens -- or damaging to the witnesses against him -- should include information about an Anchorage investigation of Allen for sexual abuse of a minor.

The Daily News reported in February that in 2004, Anchorage police investigated whether Allen had sex in the 1990s with a girl who was under 16. The case was closed at the request of federal prosecutors, when the girl, by then an adult, had become the chief witness in a federal case involving a sex-and-cocaine ring. One of the federal prosecutors told the Daily News last year that he had feared the police working on the federal investigation would become distracted by pursuing Allen, jeopardizing the drug and sex case already at hand.

FBI - Stevens-2036

Anchorage police reopened their investigation in December, then suspended it when witnesses couldn't be located.

Cary demanded the government provide details about "the pendency of any investigation (into sexual abuse by Allen), whether it was quashed, why it was quashed, and when it was quashed," because all that is relevant to Allen's credibility.

"His cooperation with the government, and the nature of his testimony, may well be driven by a belief, whether justified or not, that his assistance to the government would guarantee him immunity or leniency in the state investigation," Cary wrote.

- 804

But in its reply to Cary, filed shortly after 6:30 p.m. in Washington by Brenda Morris, principal deputy chief of the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, the government argued that the sexual abuse case shouldn't be used to impeach Allen at the trial.

"As the Court knows, the government has sought to limit cross-examination of Bill Allen concerning matters that are highly inflammatory and prejudicial to the government," she said. Nevertheless, the government has already provided some limited information about Allen to the defense, and the defense could have read about the matter in the newspaper, Morris said.

'FALSE AFFIDAVIT'

Cary also alleged the government knows about a "purportedly false affidavit" signed by David Anderson, Bill Allen's nephew and an expected witness against Stevens. The affidavit, submitted in an unrelated case, contains a claim by Anderson that "the government has provided him and his friends and family with a broad grant of immunity in exchange for his testimony in this case."

Anderson has told reporters that he was one of the key workers sent by Allen to renovate and furnish Stevens' home in Girdwood starting in 2000. Anderson later had a major falling-out with Allen over a girlfriend and other issues, and Allen was questioned during a trial last year whether he wanted to kill Anderson. Allen denied it.

Cary also demanded any plea agreements the government may have entered into with Anderson and another Veco worker on the Stevens home project, Rocky Williams. In an earlier filing, the Stevens defense team acknowledged being told by the government there were no such deals. But the defense questioned whether there were informal understandings.

Morris said there were none, and the defense knew it.

"Defendant's decision to petition the Court to compel production of nonexistent materials is an abuse of process and should be denied," she wrote.

Cary also challenged audio tapes made of intercepted phone calls of Stevens. He said that if Stevens wasn't the designated target in wiretap authorizations signed by a judge, the evidence contained in them should be suppressed. But the government has so far failed to provide the necessary information about the recorded conversations to make that determination, he said.

Morris said the government provided everything that was required by law. And she ridiculed a demand by the defense that the government turn over data that would identify each photograph taken in Stevens' house during a government raid last summer.

"In support of this argument, defendant appears to claim that he can only understand, and thus make use of, these photographs if he has a log identifying what those photographs are," she wrote. "But these photographs are not murky, covert snapshots of an unknown crime scene; rather, they are photographs of the defendant's house. Again, defendant is clutching at straws."

With its 22-page response, the government also filed 68 pages of letters and e-mails between prosecutors and defense attorneys concerning the exchange of evidence. In one, there's a reference to videos taken from cameras hidden in a kitchen and a living room, though there was no explanation.

That reference appeared to indicate the existence of previously undisclosed FBI surveillance cameras. Video from inside Veco's suite at the Baranof hotel in Juneau played a significant role in convicting two state legislators last year of taking bribes from Allen.

Judge orders Stevens prosecutors to simplify evidence

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
(09/12/08 15:45:31)

WASHINGTON - Sen. Ted Stevens' legal team complained that government lawyers had given them unwieldy electronic versions of more than 15,000 potential pieces of evidence in the Alaska Republican's corruption trial.

Now they'll be flooded with paper.

A federal judge today ordered that government lawyers turn over nearly everything on paper so Stevens' lawyers can have it in a more workable format this weekend in time to prepare for the senator's Sept. 24 trial.

"You'd have the same complaints if they gave you that information (in the same way), the same complaints," U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan told Justice Department prosecutors Friday, during an emergency hearing called just a few hours before it began.

Stevens, 84, faces seven felony counts of knowingly taking home repairs and gifts worth more than $250,000 from the now-defunct oil-services company Veco Corp. and failing to report them on his annual Senate disclosure forms. Jury selection is set to begin Sept. 22 and the trial is scheduled to begin two days later.

In their motion, filed this morning, Stevens' lawyers Alex Romain and Robert Cary complained that the government's "gamesmanship and 'hide-the-ball tactics' undermine the fairness of the upcoming trial."

Their specific complaint was that the government produced 15,038 pages without "load files," the electronic equivalent of staples, paper clips and folders. There's no way to differentiate where one document begins and ends, Stevens' lawyers said.

They also were concerned that some electronic files were "locked," which means they cannot search them electronically. To find a specific document in a 1,608-page electronic file taken from Veco computers, they must read the whole thing because they cannot search it electronically by key word.

Prosecutors were clearly frustrated with Stevens' lawyers, although they stopped short of using the "gamesmanship" language employed by the defense team. His lawyers' concerns could all have been addressed without the emergency hearing, argued Brenda Morris, the lead federal prosecutor.

"Just because he has 'U.S. Senator' before his name doesn't mean we have to drink out of a fire hose every time they call us," she said.

Not so fast, scolded Sullivan, who just prior to the Stevens' hearing heard a petition from a Guantanamo detainee who had been on a hunger strike for three years and whose lawyers were trying to wrest their client's medical records from the government. Stevens is getting the same deference all defendants get in his courtroom, Sullivan said, although the senator's request for speedy trial before the election has moved things at a brisker pace than most criminal trials.

"This defendant's not being treated any differently than anyone else," Sullivan said. "No other cases have been moved. I wouldn't do that for anyone. I wouldn't do that for anyone because of their status."

But Sullivan seemed to be slightly annoyed, too. On Wednesday, he told the lawyers to work out their disputes among themselves and not bother him with trivial quarrels over evidence, and told them he wished they'd tried harder to avoid such hearings.

He was less sympathetic to a request by Stevens' lawyers to receive detailed evidence about when investigators questioned certain witnesses. There's no precedent for them receiving what are known as "form 302's," documents that detail the information gleaned by FBI agents when they interview witnesses, including the time and place. They've already given Stevens' lawyers a list that has much of that information, Morris said.

"Yet another example of drinking out of that fire hose," she said.

Stevens' lawyers indicated that when Sullivan holds a hearing next week to discuss what evidence will be allowed at trial, they will work to exclude some photographic evidence. They've asked for the "metadata" on thousands of photos taken the day FBI and IRS agents raided Stevens' home in Girdwood.

They plan to have an expert who has written a textbook on crime scene photography explain how certain camera angles and lenses could make the home appear larger than it actually is, Cary said, describing it as a "small log cabin."

Isn't it a "chalet?" asked Sullivan.

"It's a chalet, but it's modest," Cary said.

"We didn't call it a chalet; they called it a chalet," Morris said, adding that investigators "didn't take pictures to make it look better."

Stevens loses attempt to have trial thrown out

The Associated Press
(09/16/08 13:52:37)

WASHINGTON, D.C. -- Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens has lost a final attempt to get his upcoming corruption trial thrown out.

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan ruled that the trial will start next week, with jury selection beginning Monday.

Stevens is charged with lying on Senate records about gifts and home renovations from Veco Corp., an oil pipeline services company. Stevens, who is running for re-election, has pleaded not guilty and wants the trial finished by Election Day.

Stevens' lawyers had argued that the whole case is based on information related to his work as an Alaska senator. They also said the government wants to introduce evidence that would require Stevens to talk about his official work to defend himself.

Stevens court case still on, judge decides

RULING: Selection of jury begins Monday after final hearing.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(09/17/08 01:54:51)

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Ted Stevens won't be able to argue that evidence in the federal corruption case against him violates constitutional separations that keep lawmakers from being prosecuted for their legislative actions in the halls of Congress.

A federal judge on Tuesday turned down his lawyers' request to throw out the seven-count indictment against the senator, and he said in a hearing that if evidence arises at trial that looks as though it violates what is known as the speech-or-debate clause of the Constitution, he will consider barring it.

But it was Stevens' lawyers' job to show he's entitled to immunity under the speech or debate clause and they failed to do so, said U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan. Previously, the senator's lawyers had suggested that investigators could have overstepped their authority by interviewing Stevens' past and current legislative staffers

Sullivan reviewed grand jury transcripts to determine whether witnesses were asked questions that would have violated the speech or debate clause, which limits what sort of evidence executive branch investigators can use when they probe acts by members of Congress. He said he saw a handful, but it was "in no way pervasive."

Stevens, in the midst of a re-election bid, didn't attend the court hearing Tuesday. However, he was in Washington D.C., in the Capitol. The 84-year-old Alaska Republican faces Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, a Democrat, in the Nov. 4 election.

Stevens faces seven felony counts alleging he knowingly took home repairs and gifts worth more than $250,000 from the now-defunct oil services company Veco Corp. and Bill Allen, its former CEO. Prosecutors said that Allen, who pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers in Alaska, is expected to be one of the first witnesses in the case against Stevens.

Sullivan also said Tuesday he would allow evidence from prosecutors that details what Stevens did in his role as an officeholder to help Veco. They include evidence he helped the company land federal contracts and grants, evidence he tried to influence the state in its efforts to build a natural gas pipeline, and communication between his office and the company.

Sullivan did tell prosecutors that they have until today to turn over redacted versions of what are known as "form 302s," the documents that detail the information gleaned by FBI agents when they interview witnesses, including the time and place and what they unearthed from their questions.

FBI - Stevens-2041

There are hundreds of the forms, warned one of the prosecutors, Edward Sullivan. Allen alone "has been spoken to many, many times," Sullivan said.

Tuesday's hearing was an effort to resolve disputed evidence before the trial; Sullivan cautioned that he wanted as many of the questions settled before the trial as possible so they don't bog down its progress.

"This process has to be a meaningful one," Sullivan said. "I don't want to start this thing and still be doing it New Year's Day."

- 807

Sullivan will take up the remaining issues Thursday in the final pretrial hearing before the trial. Jury selection begins Monday; the trial is set to begin two days later.

Lawyers argue over wiretaps in Stevens case

By RICHARD MAUER & ERIKA BOLSTAD
Anchorage Daily News
(09/18/08 15:10:27)

WASHINGTON - Defense and prosecutors in Sen. Ted Stevens' criminal disclosure case wrangled today over the admissibility of a wiretapped conversation in which two of Stevens' friends spoke of his aversion to opening his own wallet.

"Ted gets hysterical when he has to spend his own money," Alaska restaurateur Robert Persons told the former chairman of oil-field services company Veco Corp., Bill Allen, in a conversation overheard by the FBI and quoted in court by a prosecutor.

Persons, founder of the Double Musky Inn restaurant in Girdwood, told Allen there was a reason for Stevens' reluctance: the senator "can't really afford to pay a bunch of money," he said.

The prosecutor, assistant U.S. Attorney James Goeke of Anchorage, didn't cite a date for that conversation, nor was it directly connected to Veco's big remodeling project at Stevens' home in Girdwood.

Rather, the conversation was about an investment by the three men and others in a partnership that owned a thoroughbred. But the government says it illustrated a consistent pattern of behavior reflected in Stevens' seven-count indictment. Stevens' defense says the conversation, and others the government is seeking to play to a jury, is irrelevant and prejudicial.

The government has accused Stevens of taking more than $250,000 in labor, materials and furnishings from Veco and Allen starting in 2000, then failing to report the gifts on his annual Senate disclosures. His trial will begin Monday in Washington with at least two days of jury selection.

Allen has pleaded guilty to bribing state legislators and is expected to be a key witness against Stevens. Persons has testified before a federal grand jury under subpoena but has expressed reluctance to speak ill of Stevens, whom he still considers a friend. Persons lives above his Girdwood restaurant and routinely kept an eye on Stevens' home when Stevens and his wife, Catherine, were in Washington.

The open-courtroom conference Thursday before U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan was called to allow defense and prosecution to bring up unresolved issues of evidence, law and procedure. Sullivan decided some questions but left others for the trial itself.

Sullivan ruled that the defense was entitled to review the medical records of Allen's 2001 motorcycle accident, when he suffered a serious head injury. Allen, testifying last year in Anchorage at the trials of two state legislators, said the accident impaired his speech but not his memory or intellectual ability. Sullivan ordered both sides to respect Allen's privacy and not disclose anything publicly until he rules whether the medical information is relevant.

Also for reasons of privacy, Sullivan said, the government shouldn't enter as evidence all 2,200 pages of Stevens' personal financial information, including credit card receipts. The government said the records would show that Stevens never paid Veco for the items it purchased for him, but Sullivan said the government should find another way to prove that.

The Persons-Allen phone call was among eight recorded conversations of third-party conversations that the defense sought to keep from the jury. Defense attorney Robert Cary characterized the call as "triple hearsay" as it related to Stevens.

Stevens, Persons, Allen, Allen's son Mark and six other friends created a company called Alaska's Great Eagle LLC in 2004 to own race horses. Persons, who managed the partnership, was concerned about having to ask the others for more investment money.

In another call, Washington lobbyist Richard Ladd told Allen that Stevens had asked him to call to see if he could get a job for one of Stevens' sons.

The FBI began tapping Allen's phones in 2005 during the covert stage of its investigation of public corruption in Alaska. The investigation became public in a series of raids in August 2006. Among the targets was the legislative office of Ted Stevens' son Ben, then the president of the Alaska State Senate.

Sullivan again addressed Stevens' protections under the Constitution's Speech-or-Debate Clause, which prevents prosecutions for normal legislative activities. Sullivan had earlier rejected a bid by Stevens to dismiss his indictment under the clause, but on Thursday said it still could bar the government from introducing some evidence. He told the defense it could make objections each night based on expected evidence to be introduced the next day of trial.

Stevens wants to testify at his trial

BUSY TIME: Alaska senator discusses state projects, economy before heading back to D.C.

By KYLE HOPKINS

(09/20/08 04:02:17)

Sen. Ted Stevens said he intends to testify at his federal corruption trial, which begins with jury selection Monday, but he said the final decision will be up to his lawyers.

Stevens spoke briefly about the trial with reporters Friday in Anchorage while talking about defense spending in Alaska, the tanking economy and his plans for the next two months.

The Republican senator is running for re-election even as he's scheduled to defend himself against seven federal counts of failing to report gifts from the Veco Corp. He said he plans to return to Alaska several times in October, but he will have to be back in D.C. a day before scheduled court appearances.

The coming week will be a busy one for Congress, he said. "I intend to go from the court to the Senate and be there every afternoon, evening."

Stevens listed several Alaska projects in the defense spending bill now before Congress, including:

• $10 million to plan for a "coal-to-liquids facility" at Eielson Air Force Base. The idea is to convert coal into aviation fuel.

• $16 million for a "C-17 assault landing zone" at Fort Greely. Stevens said the landing zone would be used by the cargo aircraft in emergencies.

• $10 million to "continue the modernization and expansion" of the Port of Anchorage.

The Hill, a Washington newspaper, reported this week that Stevens topped the list of Senators with the most earmarks in the defense appropriations bill with a total of about $215 million in spending.

The Republican presidential candidate, Sen. John McCain, and running mate Gov. Sarah Palin, have criticized some earmarks on the campaign trail. But Stevens defended the military spending in Alaska -- it's been part of his campaign message -- as necessary and forward-thinking.

"Six of the seven largest armies in the world are in fact Pacific nations. We are going to see a buildup in this state to keep us prepared to deal with the contingencies of this century," he said.

Stevens spent much of the press conference on the larger political story this week -- the teetering global economy.

FBI - Stevens-2047

"I think we're on the precipice of a meltdown," he said.

As the Bush administration announced plans for a massive bailout that would see the federal government taking over worthless mortgages and bad debt, Stevens said questions of what to do with the economy has the potential to engulf Congress.

He said he'd recently participated in a teleconference with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, who described the Bush administration's plans. Stevens said he expected the plan to be controversial but that Paulson "fairly well convinced me this situation has reached the point where you either do something now, or wait for something worse."

Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, Stevens' Democratic opponent in the Nov. election, said Friday that the country's economic woes can be traced to the door of Congress and its lack of oversight.

"Now we're in a crisis mode, and I'm glad to see it seems on the surface they're going to work in a bi-partisan way to hit this issue head on," Begich said.

"But because they waited so long and because they weren't paying attention, taxpayers are going to pay a lot of money for this."

Stevens planned to return to Washington D.C. today.

"I expect to be home several times in October, and I pray to God that we're finished by November."

Powerful lawmakers on Stevens trial witness list

Associated Press
(09/22/08 08:11:17)

WASHINGTON - Several powerful senators and former Secretary of State Colin Powell are among possible witnesses at the corruption trial of the longest serving U.S. Republican senator.

Jury selection began Monday in the trial of the Sen. Ted Stevens, who has represented Alaska for more than 35 years. A federal judge listed dozens of people who might be called at the monthlong trial.

Among them are Democratic Sens. Ted Kennedy, Patrick Leahy and Daniel Inouye. Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch is also on the list, as is Powell.

Stevens, who took his seat in the courtroom before the proceedings commenced, is charged with lying in Senate financial disclosure records about hundreds of thousands of dollars in gifts and home renovations he received from Veco Corp, an oil services company. On Friday, he urged people to reserve judgment until all the evidence is in.

The senator at the time repeated that "I am innocent of the charges against me, and I think the trial will show that."

Veco employees normally build oil pipeline and processing equipment. But company workers also led the renovation of the senator's home, a project that was overseen by Bill Allen, a longtime Stevens friend and now the government's star witness.

Stevens, 84, says he paid every bill he received and has pleaded not guilty to all seven counts. The senator has pushed to get his trial completed before Alaskans vote Nov. 4 on his re-election.

The 150 potential jurors will complete a multipage questionnaire behind closed doors before being questioned by lawyers on their suitability for the monthlong trial.

Stevens, who is looking to win a seventh, six-year term, is in a tough race against Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, a Democrat. The longtime Republican lawmaker will have to stay in Washington during the trial, while Begich is free to campaign around Alaska.

Fight brewing in Stevens trial over CH2M Hill documents

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
(09/22/08 09:31:20)

WASHINGTON -- The Colorado construction and engineering company that bought the oil services firm at the heart of Sen. Ted Stevens' corruption trial is trying to keep from handing over documents sought by the Alaska Republican's defense team.

Lawyers for CH2M HILL, which purchased Alaska-based Veco Corp. last year, don't want to make public some of the evidence sought by Stevens' attorneys, including documents that show how new company is cooperating with the federal corruption investigation.

Jury selection began today and will continue tomorrow. The trial itself will begin Wednesday in earnest.

Stevens' lawyers are looking for three things: communications between the company and prosecutors concerning the Veco sale, documents that detail whether the company would be prosecuted itself for misdeeds, and information that would show whether the company's former executives benefited by cooperating with the federal corruption investigation.

Those executives include Bill Allen, Veco's former CEO, who was convicted of bribing state lawmakers but hasn't been sentenced yet. Allen is expected to a pivotal witness in the senator's trial, as are recordings between him and Stevens.

Lawyers for CH2M HILL say that they're not obligated to turn over any of the material requested by Stevens' lawyers, who have already asked the Justice Department for it. Prosecutors have not turned it over either, saying that it's irrelevant to their prosecution of Stevens.

"Unsatisfied with the government's decision not to produce this very same information...the defendant now seeks these items from a nonparty in a backdoor attempt to circumvent the government's discovery obligations," lawyers for CH2M HILL wrote.

Stevens' lawyers counter that because Allen "apparently conducted numerous illegal activities through VECO, which have led to his conviction and that of several Alaska state officials, CH2M HILL's purchase of VECO could have exposed it to potential criminal indictment. Although an indictment would bean unwelcome event in the life of any corporation, for CH2M HILL criminal charges would be particularly devastating, because it is a government contractor and faces debarment if indicted."

They want the documents because they hope to show at trial that Allen had a motivation to "testify favorably" as a prosecution witness, Stevens' lawyers wrote.

FBI - Stevens-2050

CH2M Hill, an employee-owned company, bought Veco last September, and the formal stock-purchase agreement was filed publicly with the Securities and Exchange Commission. The agreement showed that the Allen family and two former Veco executives, Roger Chan and Peter Leathard, owned shares in Veco either directly or through trusts.

The Veco owners shared in the proceeds according to their ownership percentages, with the Allen family together holding more than 80 percent, according to sales documents.

According to the CH2M Hill purchase agreement, the total value of the sale was $380 million. But after adjustments, assumptions of debt and the issuance of $15 million in CH2M Hill stock to Veco employees who joined CH2M Hill, the owners were left to divide $146 million in cash.

- 812

Another $70 million was withheld b payable by 2010 -- a guarantee aga t hidden or unexpected issues arising, including the possibility tha Veco could still be charged criminally as a corporation.

Allen has testified he tried to get immunity for the company but couldn't. In its SEC filing, CH2M Hill said such an event would be "potentially detrimental to CH2M HILL's reputation in the business community or impact our future business operations." The new owners said they would continue to cooperate with ongoing investigations and have had a "productive dialogue" with the U.S. Justice Department.

Stevens asks to leave courtroom for Senate

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER
(09/23/08 09:57:02)

WASHINGTON - A federal judge warned Sen. Ted Stevens that it might not be the best idea to leave the courtroom during the first week of his corruption trial, but that if he is needed in the U.S. Senate, he'll explain the senator's absence to jurors.

"I would be remiss if I didn't bring this to your attention," U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan told Stevens just before jury selection began this morning. "I think it's possible that some jurors may think someone is too busy."

His lawyer, Brendan Sullivan, wanted the judge to tell jurors that if Stevens is leaving, it is because he is needed in the Senate to help address the looming financial crisis. But the judge told him he would say only that if Stevens is absent, he would instruct jurors that the senator simply wouldn't be there, but that there was nothing wrong with it and they should not speculate about it.

Jurors paraded quickly through the courtroom this morning as the selection of individual jurors got under way in Stevens' corruption trial. By 12:30 p.m. (Eastern time), the judge had reviewed 14 jurors and dismissed five.

Those dismissed included a lobbyist with Republican ties who said he believed he has met Stevens before and that he worried that his political ties would make it difficult to overcome his bias in favor of the Alaska senator. The lobbyist, who represents home-based businesses such as Avon and Mary Kay cosmetics, described himself as "a political animal." He has never lobbied Stevens directly but has probably been at the same events, he told the judge.

"I think it would be hard for me to say I wouldn't have some inherent bias," the lobbyist told the judge, adding later, "You come into this with certain biases and beliefs, but first and foremost you have the task at hand."

"I appreciate your candor, thank you," the judge said.

Stevens' lead attorney, Sullivan, appeared eager to keep him.

"This man seems to be knowledgeable, maybe opinionated ..." his attorney said. "He's exactly the kind of thoughtful, honest juror that can follow the law and instructions.

But prosecutors wanted him out.

FBI - Stevens-2052

"I believe he was trying his best to be honest, but there is a struggle there. ... He is a lawyer," said Brenda Marsh, the lead prosecutor. "He has formed a bias in this case, he has indicated that in his line of work, ... and he is very active in the Republican Party."

The judge also let go another potential juror, a teacher and Christian Scientist who said she had religious objections to sitting in judgment on someone. He also dismissed a young man who has college courses that begin every evening at 4.

"We don't want you to miss any classes," the judge said, adding that he would defer his jury service until mid-June.

-813

"That sounds pretty good," the juror said.

194A-AN-13670-M

He dismissed another juror who had family ties to lawyers at Stevens' law firms, and one man who told him he thought it would be difficult to be fair because people in Stevens' position should be "held to a higher standard."

"I feel that I already have an opinion on the case. Two people from the oil company have already pled guilty to bribery," the man said. "I don't know how I would remove the things I've already read."

But most potential jurors remained in the pool, including a woman who Stevens' defense team objected to for saying she thought public officials are "supposed to serve the people ... and they're not above the law. They should always remember the people they're supposed to serve."

When asked by the judge whether "the fact that the senator has been indicted ... would you view that as wrongdoing on his part?

"Do I feel like that means he's guilty? No," the woman said, a response that kept her in the jury pool.

Another juror, when asked about his response on a questionnaire as to whether he had ever witnessed a crime, had this to say: "If you see someone smoking marijuana at a party, that's a crime." The judge kept him in the pool.

Powerful lawmakers on Stevens trial witness list

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER
Anchorage Daily News

WASHINGTON -- A witness list read to potential jurors this morning suggested that a bevy of Sen. Ted Stevens' high-profile Senate colleagues would testify in his corruption trial.

The witness include his longtime friend and fellow World War II veteran Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, and three other Senate peers: Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, and Sen. Ted Kennedy, D-Mass. Former Secretary of State Colin Powell is also on the list. It wasn't clear Monday whether the men are witnesses for the defense or the prosecution.

Also on the list: a Fairbanks strip club manager as well as the underage former mistress of one of the chief witnesses, Bill Allen, and the Anchorage Police Department detective who is investigating the relationship between the two.

Monday, Judge Emmet Sullivan issued an order allowing Stevens to duck in and out of the trial in federal district court in Washington, D.C., if he has Senate business to attend to. It's not clear whether he can leave to campaign; the 84-year-old senator is up for re-election and on Nov. 4 faces Democrat Mark Begich, the mayor of Anchorage.

Jury selection in Stevens' trial began today and will continue tomorrow. The trial itself will begin Wednesday. Stevens faces charges that he took more than $250,000 in labor, materials and furnishings from Veco and its former CEO, Allen, but failed to report the gifts on his annual Senate disclosure forms.

Meanwhile, the Colorado construction and engineering company that bought Veco is trying to keep from handing over documents sought by the Alaska Republican's defense team.

I would suggest that the files be released as I am certain that these same files will also contain a link to the further corruption carried out by VECO and Allen in regard to their handling of two projects carried out in Barbados one being an Oil Storage facility and the other being a prison in both cases the final price tag exceeded the quoted price in one case by nearly three times the cost in the other by double the cost.

There is a VERY STRONG feeling on the island that VECO executives conspired with Barbadian con artist to defraud the Barbadian taxpayers by vast sums of money with kick backs arranged by Allen for the 4 Barbadian faciliators for ALLEN AND VECO.

See comments recently made by the new Prime Minister of Barbados The Hon Mr.David Thompson during a speech that was delivered on Saturday evening by him to Barbadians living in Toronto -:

SECRET ACCOUNTS

PRIME MINISTER DAVID THOMPSON is convinced that millions of dollars "bizarrely spent" during the previous Barbados Labour Party (BLP) Administration are now stashed in foreign bank accounts.

He did not call any names but he made it clear that he hoped one day to be able to track down the bank accounts and expose the culprits.

"Week after week in Cabinet, we unearth horror stories of how millions and millions of dollars were spent in the most bizarre of circumstances," Thompson said as he addressed the Canadian branch of the Democratic Labour Party (DLP) in Toronto on Saturday night.

"This is 2008 and it is not easy to tap into a person's personal bank account and find necessary deposits, but I am saying tonight that the money that was spent so recklessly in the past 14 years has not all dissolved into outer space, although much of it is not in Barbados.

"It is somewhere hidden and I intend to find some, if not all, of it," the Prime Minister said.

"We are not talking about a few hundred dollars here. We are not confusing ourselves with petty cash or other fine change. We are talking about millions and millions of dollars that could otherwise have gone into social, infrastructural and economic development policies and projects for the benefit of Barbadians," he charged.

He spoke of irregularities at the Rural and Urban Development Commissions as well as "strange" Town and Country Planning decisions.

"You cannot begin to imagine what was going on in Barbados. You cannot begin to imagine the depths to which governance – or lack thereof – sunk in Barbados," he told the audience.

The Prime Minister added that, as a consequence, the public service of Barbados was "never as politicised".

"There are political operatives of the Barbados Labour Party at work in virtually every department; charged with frustrating and undermining every project/initiative of your Government.

"Frequently, you discover situations where people are speaking freely about transactions and undertakings for which there is no record on file. It is only then you know that something of the sort existed. The files are now nowhere to be found."

It is for this reason, he said, that his Administration, as promised in the DLP manifesto, has set up a Governance Commission to review and examine current loopholes in the system of public administration in Barbados and to propose a series of reforms.

"I am not arrogant and I don't try to be. I spent too long in Opposition not to have learnt some lessons. But I apologise to no one – least of all the Barbados Labour Party – for the length of time it is taking to get it right."

Thompson also spoke of other manifesto commitments such as the proposed Freedom of Information Bill which he said had been presented to Cabinet last Thursday and would soon be widely circulated and ultimately laid in Parliament.

Additionally, he said the Integrity In Public Life legislation covering such issues as declaration of assets, conflict of interest issues and the conduct of parliamentarians would also be available within the next few weeks.

"This Government is in office for eight months and it is making this legislative framework a reality. Others talked about it but instructively, never lifted a finger for 14 long years, to make it happen. Barbadians must ask themselves why!"

Stevens jury set to hear witnesses Thursday

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER
Anchorage Daily News
(09/24/08 14:21:56)

WASHINGTON - The newly impaneled jury that will determine whether Sen. Ted Stevens is guilty of lying on his financial disclosure forms will hear its first witnesses Thursday in his corruption trial.

First, prosecutors will outline their case against the 84-year-old Republican from Alaska. They're expected to call three witnesses. Stevens' lawyers also will have an opportunity to outline their defense, including shortcomings they hope to highlight in the government case against the senator.

Stevens was charged in late July with taking more than $250,000 in home repairs, labor and furnishings from a defunct oil-services company, Veco Corp., and Bill Allen, its former chief executive, and failing to report the gifts on his annual Senate disclosure forms.

The gifts he's accused of accepting include renovations to his home that lifted it from its foundation, added a lower story and doubled its size.

Among the first witnesses jurors will hear from Thursday is John Hess, a Veco engineer whose initials are on the renovation plans filed with the Municpality of Anchorage's building department. Stevens called the home, an A-frame in the resort community of Girdwood, his "chalet" in correspondence that will likely be entered as evidence against him in the case. Veco, according to the Stevens indictment, paid for the design work.

Today, after a day and a half of jury selection, lawyers for Sen. Ted Stevens and federal prosecutors agreed on a jury pool of 16, which includes four alternates.

The jury is made up of nine black women, three black men, two white women and two white men - a mix that reflects the population of Washington, D.C., which is more than 56 percent black.

It's a far different jury from what Stevens likely would have faced in Alaska, had he been successful in moving the trial to his home state. In Anchorage, U.S. Census figures show, the population is about 72 percent white, 6.5 percent black and about 8 percent Alaska Native.

The D.C. jury also is reflective of the city's professional class - 39 percent of the population has at least a four-year degree. In Anchorage, that number is closer to 29 percent.

There's a third-grade teacher with 21 kids in her classroom, a woman who is the receptionist for a trade association, a young man who works in the gift shop at a journalism museum, a man who oversees the operating rooms at a hospital, a woman who keeps the books for the D.C. National Guard, another woman who compiles criminal justice reports on wiretapping, and a man who works in drug counseling. FBI - Stevens-2057

Half of the jurors previously served on juries in federal or D.C. courts; one man was a grand juror.

Stevens is balancing his trial, his Senate duties and a campaign against Democratic challenger Mark Begich, Anchorage's mayor. Opening statements in the trial, which is expected to last three to four weeks. Stevens, who was indicted in late July, asked for the expedited schedule so there is a potential for the trial to wrap up before the Nov. 4 election.

Allen, 71, is expected to be the star witness in Stevens' trial, the culmination of four years of inquiry into corruption in Alaska politics. Allen, who's pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers in Alaska, has not yet been sentenced. But his courtroom testimony and secret recordings and videos of conversations were key to the Justice Department's seven successful convictions.

Allen and Veco vice president Rick Smith pleaded guilty in May 2007 to providing more than $400,000 in bribes to public officials in Alaska.

The Justice Department also won convictions of three former Alaska state representatives, all on bribery charges: Tom Anderson, Pete Kott and Vic Kohring. One other state representative, Bruce Weyrauch, is awaiting trial, as is current state Sen. John Cowdery.

In the same investigation, Jim Clark, onetime chief of staff to former Alaska Gov. Frank Murkowski, pleaded guilty in March to one count of conspiracy and agreed to cooperate with the federal investigation. Former Anchorage lobbyist Bill Bobrick also pleaded guilty in May 2007 to felony public corruption charges.

Former governor reinserts himself in gas line talks

Monday, Jan. 28, 2008

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- After his own failure with the project, former Gov. Frank Murkowski is again jumping into the gasline debate.

Murkowski is back in Alaska. He said Monday he is meeting with some of the major producers and the Palin administration's gas line choice, TransCanada, in order to get the project moving.

"I feel as an Alaskan that I'm gonna do everything I can to help bring this gas," Murkowski said.

Although he wouldn't say exactly what role he's playing, Murkowski met Monday afternoon with officials at Conoco Phillips.

"We just can't wait for this process to go into a long period of litigation -- time's a-wastin'," he said.

Murkowski also says he plans to meet with BP, Exxon Mobil and TransCanada, the only pipeline bidder that met terms of the Alaska Gasline Inducement Act legislation, according to the Palin administration.

"The bottom line is to get this moving and how can we collectively work together to have the producers, the owners of the gas and TransCanada come together with the state of Alaska to get this project underway," he said.

In the final months of his term as governor, Murkowski's gas line deal with the major producers fell apart over concerns that he "gave away too much."

Many in the Legislature felt there weren't sufficient guarantees the pipeline would ever be built within the context of his negotiations. Tax breaks given to the producers were too generous.

The former governor says he is not working for or representing any particular party involved in the debate, though, and his efforts come as the tug-of-war between Gov. Sarah Palin and Conoco Phillips continues.

FBI - Stevens-2059

Palin rejected Conoco's "non-conforming" pipeline construction application with a letter that began with a quote from Albert Einstein that defined insanity as doing the same thing over and over again and expecting different results.

The company ran a full-page newspaper ad Sunday saying it's disappointed but not discouraged.

"We do plan to continue with our public outreach. We plan to continue with our efforts to move this project ahead," said Conoco Phillips vice president Brian Wenzel.

-816

The governor says she's committed to AGIA but isn't closing the door on Conoco.

194A-AN-13670-M

"We're not going to be stubborn," Palin said. "Some people characterize it as 'don't pull a Murkowski' -- you put your head in the sand and you don't want to hear from anybody else. We're going to hear from others."

Jury seated in Stevens trial

WASHINGTON - Lawyers for Sen. Ted Stevens and federal prosecutors have picked a jury in his corruption trial. After a day and a half of jury selection, the pool was narrowed to 12, with four alternates.

Juror links to Stevens, judge hard to avoid SELECTION PROCESS: Federal judge trims field to about 30.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER
Anchorage Daily News
(09/23/08 21:58:26)

WASHINGTON -- A federal judge began on Tuesday to shape the jury that will decide whether Sen. Ted Stevens is guilty of lying about gifts on his annual Senate disclosure forms.

Jury selection is set to finish early this morning, but by the end of the day Tuesday, U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan had identified about 30 potential jurors. He asked 46 people whether they felt they could be impartial in a case about a public official and whether they knew any of the people who could testify as witnesses in the corruption case. He also asked many people if they thought they could be fair in deciding their verdict even if the defendant -- Stevens -- does not testify.

Just two potential jurors mentioned Stevens' home state. The father of Juror 1885 -- none of their names were used in open court -- was born in Alaska.

Juror 1632 had failed to respond to a written juror question asking what he thought about Alaska, so the judge asked him what came to mind.

"All I can say is, Alaska is cold," he said.

The jury pool in some ways showed what a small town Washington can be. Two jurors reported having direct contact with the judge in the past, one as a lawyer representing a telecommunications company, the other as a mother whose son was convicted of an unspecified crime. The lawyer remained on the panel, while the mother, who harbored ill feelings toward the court, did not.

And someone who might have watched jury selections in Anchorage would observe a surprising lack of diversity for cosmopolitan Washington. Anchorage jury pools often reflect the rich ethnic and racial diversity there, where more than 80 languages are the native tongues of students in the school district or their families. The Washington that showed up in Sullivan's courtroom was almost exclusively biracial -- African American and white. A single Asian -- a female lawyer -- was among the pool, along with a man who might have been Hispanic.

With government being the city's main industry, bureaucrats, clerks, technology workers, lawyers, lobbyists and one "signals analyst" for the Defense Department swelled the jury pool.

One of the lobbyists, Juror 2135, even had a connection to Stevens.

FBI - Stevens-2062

That juror is a corporate attorney with Verizon who practices before the FCC. The Senate Commerce Committee, which Stevens chaired until Republicans lost control of the Senate in 2006, has oversight of the FCC and Stevens has a lot to say about who its chairman will be. The juror said he met Stevens professionally and knew one of his long-term aides-turned-lobbyist, Lisa Sutherland.

Sutherland was listed Monday as a possible witness.

The lead prosecutor, Brenda Morris, asked the man if it would be a problem for his own career if he sat in judgment on a jury determining whether a powerful senator is guilty of a crime.

The man told the judge it would not be a problem and survived the first round of cuts.

Two of the potential jurors had experience with corruption investigations. Juror 511 said a relative, a judge in Pennsylvania, is now under investigation by the FBI for abuse of power. The juror said she had become jaded, but didn't know if that would help or hurt Stevens. She was cut.

Juror 1902 worked for Walter Fauntroy when he was the District of Columbia's nonvoting delegate to Congress. She was subpoenaed by a grand jury investigating Fauntroy and remembered being frightened before she testified. In 1996, after leaving Congress, Fauntroy pleaded guilty to filing a false disclosure statement, the same violation Stevens is facing. Juror 1902 remained on the Stevens panel.

About 56 percent of Washington is African American and just over 53 percent of residents are women. By the end of Tuesday, the potential jurors in the pool of 30 or so included 13 black women.

ABSENCE MIGHT BE A MISTAKE

The jurors paraded quickly through the courtroom, as Stevens sat quietly at the defense table with his lawyers, a frown fixed on his face most of the day. During some breaks in the proceedings, he checked his Blackberry for e-mail messages in the airy modern atrium outside the courtroom. Stevens, the longest-serving Republican in the U.S. Senate, left the proceedings about 15 minutes early to go to the Capitol, where votes were scheduled.

The 84-year-old senator faces charges that he took more than $250,000 in labor, materials and furnishings from former oil services company Veco Corp. and Bill Allen, its former chief executive officer, and didn't report the gifts on his annual Senate disclosure forms. The senator is balancing his trial, his Senate duties and a tight re-election bid against his challenger, Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, a Democrat.

Sullivan warned Stevens on Tuesday that it might not be the best idea to leave the courtroom during the first week of his corruption trial but that if he's needed in the Senate, the judge will explain his absence to jurors.

"I would be remiss if I didn't bring this to your attention," Sullivan told Stevens just before jury selection began. "I think it's possible that some jurors may think someone is too busy."

Stevens' lead attorney, Brendan Sullivan, wanted the judge to tell jurors that if Stevens is absent, it's because he's needed in the Senate to help address the looming financial crisis. The judge told him he'd say only that Stevens simply wouldn't be there, but that there was nothing wrong with his absence and the jurors shouldn't speculate about it.

LOBBYISTS IN THE POOL

Another lawyer/lobbyist failed to make the cut: a man with Republican ties who said he thought that he'd met Stevens before, and said he was worried that his political ties would make it difficult to overcome his bias in favor of the Alaska Republican senator. The lobbyist, who represents an association of home-based businesses such as Avon and Mary Kay cosmetics, described himself as "a political animal." He's never lobbied Stevens directly but probably has been at the same events, he told the judge.

"I think it would be hard for me to say I wouldn't have some inherent bias," the lobbyist told the judge.

FBI - Stevens-2063

A bias from the other side was held by Juror 86, who reported that his father was a lobbyist. He said he believed people in public office should be held to a higher standard, and had come to the conclusion that "Stevens is guilty." He also was struck from the pool.

The judge also let go another potential juror, a teacher who is a Christian Scientist and said she had religious objections to sitting in judgment on someone. He also dismissed several jurors who worked the night shift or were enrolled in college courses that conflict with the five-day-a-week trial schedule.

"We don't want you to miss any classes," the judge told one student.

Judge Sullivan dismissed another potential juror who had family ties to lawyers at the firm whose attorneys are representing Stevens.

OPENINGS ON THURSDAY

Most potential jurors remained in the pool, however, including a woman whom Stevens' defense team objected to for saying that she thought public officials are "supposed to serve the people ... and they're not above the law. They should always remember the people they're supposed to serve."

The judge asked her about "the fact that the senator has been indicted. ... Would you view that as wrongdoing on his part?"

"Do I feel like that means he's guilty? No," the woman said, a response that kept her in the pool.

Another juror, when he was asked about his response on a questionnaire to whether he'd ever witnessed a crime, had this to say: "If you see someone smoking marijuana at a party, that's a crime." The judge kept him in the pool.

Jury selection is expected to finish today. Opening statements in the trial are scheduled for Thursday morning.

Prosecutor: Stevens used Veco as his own 'handyman service'

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER
(09/25/08 09:11:13)

WASHINGTON - Sen. Ted Stevens used one of Alaska's biggest employers as his "own personal handyman service" and never paid Veco Corp. for hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of renovations to his home, a federal prosecutor charged Thursday as she outlined the government's case for finding the Alaska Republican guilty of lying on financial disclosure forms.

"You'll learn that the defendant never paid Veco a dime for the work on the chalet. Not a penny," the Justice Department's lead prosecutor, Brenda Morris, told jurors in the opening minutes of Stevens' trial.

Stevens' lawyers countered that he was not guilty and blamed Veco and its chief executive officer, Bill Allen, for allowing costs to escalate without telling him what the expenses would be or even showing him all the bills. Allen also installed fancy add-ons - like a Viking gas grill and gaudy but pricey Christmas lights - that were unnecessary and unwanted, Stevens' lawyer, Brendan Sullivan said.

"When you see the evidence ... you'll see he had no intent to violate the law, no intent to conceal anything," his lawyer said. "He didn't want these things, he didn't ask for these things. He told some of them to take them back. He never once hid anything."

Sullivan also hinted that jurors would hear uncomfortable and intrusive details about the relationship between the 84-year-old Stevens and his second wife, Catherine Stevens, whom Sullivan said opened the bank account they established to pay for home renovations expenses.

"Catherine ran the financial part of the renovation," he said. "She was the person who opened the account, reviewed the bills, she was the person who wrote the check."

But prosecutors said that the jury will also hear from many of the people who did the work on Stevens' Girdwood home, Morris said, referring to the A-frame cabin as the "chalet," as the senator did: Morris said they will describe how even though Stevens paid subcontractors with whom he didn't have a personal relationship, he never paid Veco for its work, thanks to his close connections to the company's founder.

"If the defendant needed an electrician, he contacted Veco. If the defendant needed a plumber, he contacted Veco," she said. "We reach for the Yellow Pages, he reached for Veco."

FBI - Stevens-2065

Jurors also will hear about a 2006 conversation between Stevens and Allen, who already was cooperating with federal authorities at that point. In the conversation, Stevens told Allen that the worst that could happen to the two was if anyone found what the company had done for him was that they'd have to spend a lot of money on lawyers - and perhaps serve a little jail time.

Stevens knew he was doing wrong, Morris said, and contractors who the government alleges worked for free on the senator's home will testify that they were told not to talk about the work they were doing.

"One of the guys will tell you that he was told by Bill Allen to keep it quiet, that it would be bad if the public found out," Morris said.

"This is a simple case about a public official who took hundreds and thousands of dollars' worth of free financial benefits, and then took away the public's right to know that information," Morris said.

Stevens, the longest-serving Republican U.S. senator, faces seven felony counts of making false statements on his Senate financial-disclosure forms. In office since 1968, Stevens is up for re-election this year and is locked in a tight battle with his Democratic opponent, Mark Begich, the mayor of Anchorage.

The senator is accused of accepting more than $250,000 in home repairs, labor and furnishings from the now-defunct oil-services company Veco and Allen. Among the gifts he's accused of accepting are renovations to his Girdwood home that lifted it from its foundation and added a lower story, doubling it in size.

Allen, whose testimony will be the centerpiece of the trial, has pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers in Alaska. He hasn't yet been sentenced.

The judge cautioned jurors that what the lawyers said Thursday morning is merely a road map of the case, not evidence.

"They simply are statements of what the attorneys expect the evidence to be" and are designed to help the jury understand what sort of case it'll be hearing, U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan said.

He reminded the jurors that the law doesn't require the defendant to prove his innocence or present any evidence. Also, the judge added, the jurors must rely only on the facts in the case and not judge Stevens based on his race, religion, national origin or age.

Courtroom is set for dramatic Stevens trial

OPENING STATEMENTS: Jury has been picked, and the first witnesses will take the stand this morning.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER
(09/25/08 01:07:16)

WASHINGTON -- With a jury seated Wednesday in the trial of Sen. Ted Stevens, opening statements and the first witnesses were set for this morning, lifting the curtain on what will be a historic courtroom drama.

Stevens, the first sitting senator to face a criminal trial since Sen. Harrison Williams, D-N.J., was convicted of bribery in 1981, will be tried by a jury of 11 women and five men, a panel that includes four alternates.

The jury is mainly a mix of white-collar professionals and bureaucrats, typical for this government-centric city. They'll have the job of determining whether Stevens, 84, who has represented Alaska since 1968, is guilty of seven counts of lying on his financial disclosure forms.

The government will begin its opening statement after the jurors are sworn and given preliminary instructions, expected at 9:30 a.m. Washington time, 5:30 a.m. in Alaska.

Stevens' lawyers also will have an opportunity to outline their defense, including shortcomings they hope to highlight in the government case against the senator.

Each side will have 75 minutes to introduce its case.

Stevens was charged in July with taking more than $250,000 in home repairs, labor and furnishings from the defunct oil-services company, Veco Corp., and Bill Allen, its former chief executive, and failing to report the gifts on his annual Senate disclosure forms. The gifts he's accused of accepting include renovations to his home that lifted it from its foundation, added a lower story, and doubled it in size.

Among the first witnesses jurors will hear from today is John Hess, a Veco engineer whose initials are on the renovation plans filed with the city of Anchorage's building department. Stevens called the home, an A-frame in the resort community of Girdwood, his "chalet" in correspondence that will likely be entered as evidence against him. Veco, according to the Stevens indictment, paid for the design work.

Another former Veco worker, Derek Awad, is scheduled to follow Hess.

JURY MAKEUP

FBI - Stevens-2067

The jury is made up of nine black women, three black men, two white women and two white men -- a mix that reflects the population of Washington, which is more than 56 percent African American.

It's a far different jury than Stevens likely would have faced in Alaska, had he been successful in moving the trial to his home state. In Anchorage, U.S. Census figures show the population is about 72 percent white, 6.5 percent black and about 8 percent Alaska Native.

The D.C. jury also is reflective of the city's professional class, where 39 percent of the population has at least a four-year college degree. In Anchorage, that number is closer to 29 percent.

Among the jurors chosen: a third-grade teacher, a receptionist for a trade association, a young man who works in the gift shop at a journalism museum, a man who oversees the operating rooms at a hospital, a woman who keeps the books for the National Guard, another woman who compiles criminal justice reports on wiretapping, and a man who works in drug counseling.

Half of the jurors previously served on juries, either in federal court or Washington, D.C., courts; one man said his only jury experience was as a grand juror.

The trial is expected to last four weeks, a fact not lost on the jurors.

"My principal.won't be very happy," the third grade teacher told the judge. He offered to call the principal on her behalf.

ALLEN AS STAR WITNESS?

In some cases, the jurors were asked to disclose their political leanings. One, a recent college graduate, said he came from a very conservative Republican family whose parents are ardent Sarah Palin supporters. The man said he flirted with a Republican organization in his sophomore year in college, but has since moderated his views and recently went to Baltimore to see Barack Obama at a rally.

"Politics-wise, I have no idea where I stand -- I'm still trying to figure it out," he said.

The juror said he didn't know much about Stevens but had been listening to the radio as he drove to the courthouse Monday in response to his jury summons. He heard on the news that Stevens' trial was about to begin.

"It was like, weird, I was like, that's interesting," he told the court.

Stevens is balancing his trial, his Senate duties and a campaign thousands of miles away against Democratic challenger Mark Begich, Anchorage's mayor.

Allen, 71, is expected to be the star witness in Stevens' trial, the culmination of four years of inquiry into corruption in Alaska politics. Allen, who's pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers in Alaska, has not yet been sentenced. But his courtroom testimony and secret recordings and videos of conversations were key to the Justice Department's seven successful convictions.

Senator's day in court

Prosecution tells of free work; defense says bills were paid

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER

(09/26/08 04:34:25)

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Ted Stevens used one of Alaska's biggest employers as his "own personal handyman service" and never paid Veco Corp. for hundreds of thousands of dollars in work done on his home, a federal prosecutor charged Thursday as she outlined the government's case for finding the Alaska Republican guilty of lying on financial disclosure forms.

"You'll learn that the defendant never paid Veco a dime for the work on the chalet. Not a penny," the Justice Department's lead prosecutor, Brenda Morris, told jurors.

Stevens' lawyer, Brendan Sullivan, countered that the senator is not guilty and that "every bill submitted was paid." He blamed Veco and its chief executive officer, Bill Allen, for allowing costs to escalate without telling Stevens what the expenses would be or even showing him all the bills. Allen also installed fancy add-ons -- like a Viking gas grill and gaudy but pricey Christmas lights -- that were unnecessary and unwanted, Sullivan said.

"When you see the evidence ... you'll see he had no intent to violate the law, no intent to conceal anything," Sullivan said. "He didn't want these things, he didn't ask for these things. He told some of them to take them back. He never once hid anything."

Sullivan also hinted that the jurors in coming days would hear some uncomfortable and intrusive details -- he didn't elaborate -- about the relationship between the 84-year-old Stevens and his second wife, Catherine Stevens, whom Sullivan said opened the bank account they established to pay for home renovations expenses in 2000.

Sullivan quoted Stevens as saying: " 'When it comes to things in and around the teepee, Catherine controls.' That might be a little old-fashioned, but Ted's old-fashioned. The most important thing to know is Catherine ran the financial part (of their household.)"

That extended to the renovation, Sullivan said.

"She was the person who opened the account, reviewed the bills, she was the person who wrote the check."

Sullivan said the senator and his wife paid five bills totaling about $160,000 to Augie Paone, owner of Christensen Builders, for carpentry work. They "believed the bills they received were covering the cost of the renovation," his lawyer said, adding that the project cost about $160,000.

FBI - Stevens-2069

He added that when Paone prepared the sixth bill to send to Veco for approval, it wasn't paid. Paone was told by Bill Allen and construction foreman Robert "Rocky" Williams that he was going to "eat that bill," Stevens' lawyer said.

"Augie thought about calling the senator and saying, 'by the way, they won't pay the bill,' " Sullivan said. "He didn't want to do that. He thought it would just be dangerous to go against Bill Allen."

Instead, Sullivan said, Paone was given a renovation job at Allen's home that helped him recover some of the expenses of the Stevens work. The additional costs from the Stevens renovations were padded into the work at Allen's home, Sullivan said, "unknown by the Stevenses."

"This was an act by Bill Allen to keep information from the Stevenses," Sullivan said. "Why? He thought the cost was too high. If the renovations were really $166,000, how could you send a bill for all these other costs run up on the Veco bill when Ted and Catherine were 3,000 miles away?"

Sullivan made a point to the jury that the Girdwood house, though Stevens' official Alaska residence, is not his and Catherine's primary home.

"They live here with us in the District of Columbia," he said. "That is their technical residence. They are lucky to spend 20 days a year at that residence."

THE CASE AGAINST STEVENS

The jury also will hear from many of the people who did the work on Stevens' home in Girdwood, Morris said, referring to the A-frame cabin as the "chalet," as the senator did. Morris said the workers will describe how even though Stevens paid subcontractors with whom he didn't have a personal relationship, he never paid Veco for its work, thanks to his close connections to the company's chief executive officer, Allen.

"If the defendant needed an electrician, he contacted Veco. If the defendant needed a plumber, he contacted Veco," she said. "We reach for the Yellow Pages, he reached for Veco."

Morris said jurors also will hear about a 2006 conversation between Stevens and Allen, who already was cooperating with federal authorities at that point. In the conversation, they said the worst that could happen to them if anyone found out what the company had done for him was that they'd have to spend a lot of money on lawyers -- and perhaps serve a little jail time. In the conversation, they agreed they wouldn't "be killed," meaning that it wasn't a matter of life or death.

Stevens knew he was doing wrong, Morris said, and contractors whom the government alleges worked for free on the senator's home will testify that they were told not to talk about the work they were doing.

"One of the guys will tell you that he was told by Bill Allen to keep it quiet, that it would be bad if the public found out," Morris said.

"This is a simple case about a public official who took hundreds and thousands of dollars' worth of free financial benefits, and then took away the public's right to know that information," Morris said.

SCENE IN THE COURTROOM

Stevens scowled throughout the government's 45-minute opening remarks, but he smiled during several portions of his lawyer's remarks. Stevens listened through a set of earphones that enhanced the sound in the courtroom. The system also allowed him to hear the private conferences at the bench between lawyers and the judge.

As the trial began Thursday, both the courtroom and an overflow room were packed. The well in front of the judge, where the two sides sit, was filled on the government side with FBI agents, additional prosecutors and support staff. The defense side was packed with lawyers on the Stevens team.

The first row on the defense side of the courtroom was reserved for Stevens' friends and family. His daughter Beth sat at the end of the row and appeared to pay close attention to everything that was said. Although his wife came with Stevens to his arraignment, she is a witness in his trial and cannot attend the proceedings until she is called to testify.

On the other side of the courtroom, the first row was filled with sketch artists with huge pads covering their laps. There were two rows on one side and one row on the other for the media. There was also a full crowd of suited attorneys who came to check out the performance in openings by the two sides.

Throughout the morning session, a watch alarm periodically beeped from somewhere in the courtroom. When the lunch recess finally began and Stevens was leaving the courtroom, he took off his plastic-band wristwatch and handed it to one of his lawyers.

"I only paid 30 bucks -- I don't know how to turn it off," he said.

First witness says he drew up the plans

By RICHARD MAUER and ERIKA BOLSTAD
(09/26/08 04:34:44)

WASHINGTON -- A Veco project manager testified that his boss, Bill Allen, invited him to lunch in a private Midtown Anchorage dining room in 2000 so he and Sen. Ted Stevens could plan the addition to Stevens' Girdwood residence.

The Veco employee, John C. Hess, was the first witness in Stevens' felony disclosure trial here. He was called to help prove the government's case that Alaska's six-term senator knew full well that Veco, the now-defunct oil-field service company, was paying for a major part of the renovations that doubled the size of his home.

Stevens is charged with failing to disclose more than $250,000 in gifts over six years, mainly from Allen and Veco. Stevens says the charges are unfounded.

Hess laid the foundation for much the case that will unfold over the next few weeks, testifying for more than two hours about the scope of the addition. His testimony was illustrated for the jury with more than a dozen of his own photographs, designs and blueprints of the project.

Hess, trained in drafting, engineering and architecture, was followed by another witness, Derrick Awad, also from Veco, who testified that Allen dispatched him and another Veco worker to drive to Girdwood to shovel Stevens' deck in the winter of 1998 or 1999. In the fall of 1999, Awad and two other Veco workers installed an emergency generator for Stevens.

Both Hess and Awad, along with other Veco employees expected to take the stand today, are now employed by the Denver-based engineering firm CH2M Hill, which bought most of Veco's assets from Allen, his three children and his two top executives just over a year ago.

ASSIGNMENT CAME FROM ALLEN

Hess' start on the project came when his manager summoned him to his office, he testified. The big boss, Allen, wanted to see him, the manager told him.

Within the next day or so, Hess met with Allen at Veco's executive offices in the Frontier Building on 36th Avenue in Anchorage.

"We sat down and discussed the project," he said. "I learned the project was a cabin that belonged to Sen. Stevens."

FBI - Stevens-2072

Allen said that Rocky Williams, a trusted Veco employee -- and a likely trial witness himself -- would be helping on the job. A few days later, Hess and Williams went to Girdwood to scope out the project. No one was home, but Williams had the key to Stevens' house. By that time, a plan was fully in place: They would raise the single-story home and build a new first floor beneath it. Hess went back to Anchorage and started drawing up the designs.

Not long after that, he got a call from Bill Allen or Allen's secretary, Linda Croft, directing him to come to lunch at Jens' Restaurant, an upscale place in a Midtown strip mall. When Hess got there, he was led through the restaurant to a private dining room, he testified. Stevens and Allen arrived a few minutes later, though Hess said he didn't know if they had driven together.

"Mr. Allen introduced me to Senator Stevens. He said I worked for Veco and that I would be helping with the remodeling of the cabin," Hess said.

Lunch lasted about 1 1/2 hours. He listened for the first 45 minutes as A and Stevens "caught up" with each other. "It was two friends talking," he said.

"Halfway through the lunch, the subject changed. I started conversing with the senator," Hess said.

STEVENS REVIEWED DESIGNS

Stevens told him that the main reason he and his wife, Catherine, wanted to expand the house was because their grandchildren were spending time there, and there wasn't enough room, he testified. On some issues of design, Hess said, Stevens told him that he would defer to his wife.

From August through December 2000, Hess produced more designs, detailed construction drawings and revisions. He said he phoned Stevens a couple times and faxed material to him at his Senate office in Washington.

In one drawing introduced as evidence, Hess had noted at the bottom that Bob Persons, the owner of the Double Musky Restaurant in Girdwood and a good friend of the Stevenses, would be the "ramrod" on the project.

Persons' name appeared on other documents introduced as evidence, including a file folder created by Hess for the project that listed other names as well. On Aug. 26, 2000, Hess received a handwritten letter from Stevens mailed to his Veco office. In the note, which was shown to the jury, Stevens said he and Catherine were thrilled by his effort.

"Now I want you to give us a bill for your work," Stevens wrote. "And, as Bob (Persons) and I have told you, under our Senate rules I must pay you for what you have done. We'll be back in Anchorage in early October. Hope to (illegible) you then."

Hess said he wrote back to Stevens and told him he needed to ask Veco for the bill, not him. He said he also mentioned the note to his bosses. Hess said he didn't hear from Stevens after that.

Under cross-examination by Stevens' lawyer, Hess said he couldn't recall exactly how he contacted Stevens and had no copy of any correspondence. But he insisted he had done so.

The government alleged that Stevens never paid for Hess' time. In her opening statement earlier Thursday, Brenda Morris, the lead prosecutor, said Stevens exhibited a pattern of offering to pay bills, then never following up with cash.

While professional draftsmen usually include information on the plans that would identify themselves and their company, Hess said, those identifiers did not appear on the Stevens project. Only his initials, "JCH," identified his handiwork, including designs filed with the city building department.

"I recall Bill Allen suggesting that we should just keep it simple," Hess said. "He didn't want Veco on there."

Hess was followed to the witness stand by Awad. Stevens was reported to be frightened by the possibility of a massive power failure on New Years in 2000 -- the so-called Y2K bug -- so Veco bought him a $6,000 gas-powered generator and a switch that would automatically turn it on if the power failed, Awad said.

Awad said he and two other Veco employees picked up the generator, unpacked it, drove it to Girdwood and spent about two days installing it in the back of Stevens house. They had to cut a hole through the foundation to run a power cable inside, he said.

Tradesmen detail Stevens 'chalet' renovation

By RICHARD MAUER and ERIKA BOLSTAD
Anchorage Daily News
(09/26/08 11:25:05)

WASHINGTON - Tradesmen who renovated Sen. Ted Stevens' home in Alaska in 2000 testified today about their work as prosecutors began building a case that the Alaska Republican never paid a prominent oil services company for electrical and carpentry work on the so-called "chalet."

In the second day of testimony, a series of electricians and carpenters described in detail how they jacked up the Girdwood house, installed a new first floor and redid all of the electrical wiring. In some cases, employees for Veco Corp. - whose executives were for years the leading campaign contributors to many Alaska political candidates, including Stevens - spent hundreds of hours devoted to work on the senator's home.

Stevens faces seven felony counts of lying on his Senate financial-disclosure forms. The 84-year-old senator is accused of accepting more than $250,000 in gifts from the now-defunct oil field services company, Veco, and its former chief executive officer, Bill Allen. Among the gifts he's accused of accepting are renovations to his Girdwood home that lifted it from its foundation and added a lower story, doubling it in size.

Some Veco employees spent months at the Stevens home, according to testimony. Beginning in October 2000, Roy Dettmer of Littleton, Colo., spent four months working six days a week, 10 hours a day, installing electric service in the new sections of the house and rewiring much of the old.

Every morning, he'd drive to the Veco's facility at the port of Anchorage, sign in using his badge, then drive 45 miles to Girdwood. In the evening, he would have to "badge out" again back at the port before he could go home to his hotel. Dettmer's pay at Veco at the time was between $27 and $29 an hour, plus overtime. Working a schedule of six weeks on, two off, Dettmer said he spent about 400 hours on the project.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Joe Bottini of Anchorage walked Dettmer through his tasks. The service entrance had been at the rear of the original house, but that was now 15 feet in the air. Dettmer moved it to the other side of the house in the new garage Veco built, requiring all the old circuits to be extended. That doubled the electrical capacity from 100 amps to 200 amps. That meant the generator that had only been installed by Veco the year before had to be rewired and moved as well.

Veco bought the material from an Anchorage supplier, Dettmer said. The new kitchen built by Veco on the second floor also had to be wired.

Dettmer said he never met Stevens, but Catherine Stevens, the senator's wife, came around once. The Veco supervisor, Rocky Williams, introduced him.

FBI - Stevens-2074

"We said 'Hi,' and that was it," Dettmer said.

Doug Alke, a Veco electrician, described installing a back-up generator at the residence in the fall of 1999, the year before the renovations that doubled the Stevens home in size.

Alke estimated that he spent an estimated 20 to 24 hours on the job, including coming back a few days after he and another Veco worker installed it to check on whether it was cutting on automatically each week to recharge the batteries.

The journeyman electrician, who was paid about $19.50 an hour at the time, said he filled out an "overhead number" on his timesheet, a code that described which client the work should be billed to. The number for the Stevens job wasn't for a specific client like other jobs were, Alke said. Instead, it was an internal code used for what he assumed were accounting purposes, he said.

Stevens' wife, Catherine, stopped by once to bring workers muffins, said another contractor, Mike Luther, a carpenter with Christensen Builders of Anchorage. He also saw Stevens once, saying he was friendly and "talked to everyone," Luther said.

On his way out of the courtroom Friday, Luther waved to Stevens as he walked past the senator at the defense table.

Friday, both prosecutors and Stevens' attorneys also made sure to familiarize the jury with terms that are second-nature to Alaskans, especially those who work on the North Slope oil fields. One of Stevens' lawyers, Robert Cary, asked Alke what was a "hitch" on the North Slope.

"A "hitch" is just a rotation," Alke said. "It's slang. Six weeks on, two weeks off."

Alaska might be a very distant place for many of the jurors, but Gov. Sarah Palin's vice presidential candidacy has made it more familiar than it once was. When Alke told the jury he was from her hometown of Wasilla, a murmur of recognition shot through the courtroom.

Stevens, who has held office since 1968 and is the longest-serving Republican in the U.S. Senate, is in a tight re-election contest with his Democratic opponent, Mark Begich, the mayor of Anchorage.

Stevens defense accuses prosecutors of subterfuge

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER
McClatchy Newspapers
(09/29/08 14:14:11)

WASHINGTON -- Prosecutors stumbled Monday in their corruption case against Sen. Ted Stevens, drawing the ire of a federal judge for sending home to Alaska a potential witness who has figured prominently in other people's testimony but so far has not testified himself.

Stevens lawyers asked for a mistrial and accused prosecutors of failing to tell them everything they knew about a Veco worker named Robert "Rocky" Williams, who oversaw renovations at the Stevens Girdwood home in 2001.

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan said there was no basis for a mistrial, but he said he was "flabbergasted" with how prosecutors had sent Williams home without alerting him or defense attorneys that he was no longer scheduled to be a witness. Sullivan scolded prosecutors from the bench but out of earshot or view of the jury.

"I find it very, very disturbing that this has happened, and concerned about the appearance of propriety, or impropriety," Sullivan said, stopping short of accusing government prosecutors of misconduct or a lapse in ethics but threatening sanctions.

"After all, this is the search for the truth, and people ought not to forget about that," said Sullivan, who asked lawyers to give him briefs outlining what had happened. "This is a serious one; we're all officers of the court."

The jury heard none of the dispute, meaning that it may not have a bearing on the outcome of the trial.

Stevens, 84, faces seven felony counts of failing to report on his U.S. Senate disclosure forms more than $250,000 worth of gifts and home renovations, chiefly from Veco Corp. and its chief executive officer, Allen. The Alaska Republican, who is up for re-election Nov. 4, asked for a speedy trial so he'd have the opportunity to clear his name before then.

Williams, who worked for Allen, was originally set to be a government witness, but prosecutors decided in the opening days of the trial not to use him. It remains unclear why they no longer want him to testify, although he spent extensive time in Washington, D.C., with Justice Department lawyers in preparation for the trial.

Lawyers from both sides discussed the issue with the judge privately but did not elaborate in open court. Prosecutors did allude to Williams being "two weeks overdue" for something in Alaska, and in court filings, Stevens' attorneys refer to health issues that include "coughing episodes." FBI - Stevens-2076

Williams got in touch with Stevens' attorneys - at the direction of prosecutors - after they released him as a witness and sent him home to Alaska. The conversation they had over the weekend with Williams "casts the government's decision to send him home - on the eve of Bill Allen's testimony - in a very different light," Stevens' lawyers wrote in their filings.

Stevens' lawyers say there's evidence Williams worked far less on the Girdwood home remodel than other company employees have suggested in their testimony, including one of the company's bookkeepers who took the stand Friday.

Such evidence could help Stevens knock holes in the government's theory that the Veco work done on his home was so extensive that he must have known he was getting benefits above and beyond the $160,000 his lawyers said he paid a separate contractor for the work done to double his home in size.

"We got lucky," said one of Stevens' lawyers, Robert Cary. "We got his lucky that he changed his prior position of not wanting to talk to us."

In court filings, Cary said that "Mr. Williams informed defense counsel that he spent nowhere near eight hours per day, six to seven days per week, on the Girdwood home renovation project - in direct contrast to the timesheets that the government has placed in evidence to support its central theory that the unpaid cost of the project to Veco was $188,000."

No one answered the door or the phone this morning at Williams' trailer in South Anchorage. A pair of pickup trucks sat in the driveway, and what sounded like a TV could be heard playing from behind the door.

Prosecutors said they didn't intend to give the impression they were hiding information and apologized - but they were caught off balance by the judge's ire.

"We're distressed that we're being accused of this," said the prosecutor who bore the brunt of the judge's scolding, Nicholas Marsh.

"This was not a decision that came easily," said Brenda Morris, the lead prosecutor in the case.

"It would have been very easy to get me on the phone," Judge Sullivan said.

The judge offered Stevens' lawyers a chance to re-question Cheryl Boomershine, the Veco bookkeeper who testified Friday about how much money the company spent renovating the home in Girdwood. Boomershine was still in Washington this morning and available to come to court.

Jurors weren't told why there was a delay, although Sullivan had half-jokingly suggested to lawyers on both sides before the jury came in that he would tell them "the government hid the ball."

Instead, Sullivan joked about the Redskins win on Sunday and told them simply that additional information was available that wasn't available last week. Because Boomershine was still in D.C., they were able to bring her back to the stand to allow attorneys to ask her more questions.

When Boomershine took the stand, Cary walked her through the time cards Williams filed in connection with the project, trying to establish that all the time and money he spent on the Girdwood project may not have been 100 percent devoted to overseeing renovations at the Stevens home.

"You don't know whether Mr. Williams spent time working on other projects for Mr. Allen that had nothing to do with Girdwood?"

"No," Boomershine said.

Prosecutors continued to build their case by bringing to the stand a series of tradesmen who worked on Stevens' home.

A carpenter who was paid by Veco to build a deck testified he was told to be discreet about the project when the chief executive of an oil services company, Bill Allen, hired him in 2002.

FBI - Stevens-2077

"He said a certain amount of discretion would need to be used because it was the senator's house," and the company was actually an oil services firm, not a general contractor, testified Brian Byrne, who oversaw the deck construction.

Prosecutor Joe Bottini asked Byrne why he thought Allen would have said that.

"I'm not really sure, other than the appearance of impropriety I believe is what he was concerned about," Byrne said.

Stevens showed a rare smile during the proceedings when Cecil Dale, an electrician, testified about how the senator had given him a cigar the one time he met him.

"How was the cigar?" asked Beth Stewart, one of Stevens' lawyers.

"I never smoked it," Dale said.

Veco bookkeeper: 'No paper trail'

By RICHARD MAUER and ERIKA BOLSTAD
Anchorage Daily News
(09/26/08 14:26:30)

WASHINGTON - Even as Veco Corp. was paying the bills for renovations on Sen. Ted Stevens' home in Alaska, the oil services company covered up the nature of the work in its books, the corporate bookkeeper testified today.

Veco bookkeeper Cheryl Boomershine testified that when she asked for an explanation for a $2,000 handwritten expense claim from the construction foreman, an attached note came back with the instructions that there should be no written records.

The orders "no paper trail," came from Bill Allen, the company's chief executive officer, Boomershine said, and they were written on the back of the expense form submitted in connection with the 2000 renovation of Stevens' home.

Boomershine also said that they assigned some costs to an account called "Girdwood Consultants." One of the consultants, she testified, was a plumber.

There's also no record that Stevens or his wife ever reimbursed the company for any construction costs for the projects that began in 1999, Boomershine said. Veco kept copies of deposits to its bank account, Boomershine testified, and the only checks that ever came in were reimbursements for two charter flights originally paid for by Veco.

Other tradesmen who renovated Stevens' home in Alaska in 2000 testified Friday about their work, as prosecutors began building a case that the Alaska Republican never paid a prominent oil services company for electrical and carpentry work on what Stevens called the "chalet."

Allen, who has already pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers in Alaska, is expected to testify Monday. Allen's testimony and secret recordings of conversations between him and Stevens are expected to be the strongest evidence in the government case against Stevens. The trial, which had been expected to take four weeks, is moving so fast that prosecutors might finish their case in eight days. They sped through so many witnesses that they had to scramble to schedule people to testify next week.

Friday, a series of electricians and carpenters described in detail how they jacked up the home in Girdwood, Alaska, and installed a lower story, and redid the electrical wiring. In some cases, employees for Veco Corp. -- whose executives were for years the leading campaign contributors to many Alaska political candidates, including Stevens -- spent hundreds of hours devoted to work on the senator's home.

FBI - Stevens-2079

Stevens faces seven felony counts of lying on his Senate financial-disclosure forms. The 84-year-old senator is accused of accepting more than $250,000 in gifts from the now-defunct oilfield services company and Allen. Among the gifts Stevens is accused of accepting are renovations to his Girdwood home that lifted it from its foundation and added a lower story, doubling it in size.

Some Veco employees spent months at the Stevens home, according to testimony. Beginning in October 2000, Roy Dettmer of Littleton, Colo., spent four months working six days a week, 10 hours a day, installing electric service in the new sections of the house and rewiring much of the old.

Dettmer said he never met Stevens, but Catherine Stevens, the senator's wife, came around once. The Veco supervisor, Rocky Williams, introduced him.

"We said 'Hi,' and that was it," Dettmer said.

Doug Alke, a Veco electrician, described installing a backup generator at the residence in the fall of 1999, the year before the renovations that doubled the Stevens home in size.

Alke estimated that he spent an estimated 20 to 24 hours on the job, including coming back a few days after he and another Veco worker installed the generator to check on whether it was cutting on automatically each week to recharge the batteries.

The number for the Stevens job wasn't for a specific client like other jobs were, Alke said. Instead, it was an internal code used for what he assumed were accounting purposes, he said.

Catherine Stevens stopped by once to bring workers muffins, said another contractor, Mike Luther, a carpenter with Christensen Builders of Anchorage. He also saw Sen. Stevens once, saying he was friendly and "talked to everyone."

On his way out of the courtroom Friday, Luther waved to Stevens as he walked past the senator at the defense table.

Stevens indicted

False reports, not illegal gifts, are the issue in the case

(07/29/08 23:20:49)

Tuesday's indictment of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens was a grim day in Alaska's history. Before his legal troubles, Sen. Stevens had a distinguished career of public service dating back before statehood. Now the man once hailed as "Alaskan of the Century" faces federal felony charges for allegedly filing false information on official forms about $250,000 worth of gifts, supplied by the man who was at the time the state's most powerful political operative, Veco's Bill Allen.

It's a shame the career of such an influential Alaska figure has sunk to this point. Regardless of whether he is convicted, Sen. Stevens showed bad judgment in getting so financially entangled with a lobbyist and political power broker who had already had run-ins with the law.

The federal indictment does not charge Sen. Stevens with bribery. It does allege that Bill Allen and Veco were seeking official actions from Sen. Stevens, and sometimes got them. But there was no quid pro quo for all the gifts he took, according to federal authorities.

Instead, what the indictment describes is a relationship of mutual back-scratching between a powerful insider and a powerful politician. Alaskans have seen too much of that already in the Veco scandal and elsewhere -- and that may help explain why Sen. Stevens was behind in his re-election race even before the indictment was issued.

It may turn out that what Bill Allen did for Sen. Stevens did not break federal corruption laws or Senate ethics rules. Nonetheless, Sen. Stevens will have trouble explaining to Alaska voters why they should tolerate such cozy arrangements between their elected officials and insiders who want to influence them.

BOTTOM LINE: Legal or not, Ted Stevens' dealings with convicted lobbyist Bill Allen are a black mark against his distinguished career.

Statement from Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, on his indictment:

"I have proudly served this nation and Alaska for over 50 years. My public service began when I served in World War II. It saddens me to learn that these charges have been brought against me. I have never knowingly submitted a false disclosure form required by law as a U.S. senator.

"In accordance with Senate Republican Conference rules, I have temporarily relinquished my vice chairmanship and ranking positions until I am absolved of these charges.

"The impact of these charges on my family disturbs me greatly.

"I am innocent of these charges and intend to prove that."

Details of the seven-count indictment charging Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, with failing to disclose more than $250,000 worth of renovations on his Girdwood, Alaska, home and other gifts he received from VECO Corp., an Alaska oil services company, and its founder, Bill Allen:

-From 1999-2006: Stevens knew he was required to list any gifts of nominal value on his yearly financial disclosure reports and "knowingly and intentionally sought to conceal and cover up his receipt of things of value by filing Financial Disclosure Forms that contained false statements and omissions concerning Stevens' receipt of these things of value."

-Summer 2000 to end of 2001: "VECO incurred over $200,000 in materials, labor and other costs in connection with the work that VECO employees and contractors performed at (Stevens) Girdwood Residence. These costs included, but were not limited to, approximately $81,775.18 in materials, labor, architectural design and services, and other costs from approximately June 2000 to December 31, 2000, and approximately $110,153.64 in the first three and a half months of 2001 alone."

-2002: "The work performed by VECO employees and contractors at the Girdwood Residence included, among other projects, the installation of a first-floor wraparound deck, a plastic roof between the first- and second-floor decks, a heat tape system on the roof of the Girdwood Residence, and the installation and partial removal of rope lighting on multiple portions of the property. These projects cost VECO approximately $55,000."

-2004-2005: "Stevens contacted Allen and VECO employees multiple times to request that VECO employees or contractors perform additional tasks at the Girdwood Residence. These tasks included, without limitation, the installation of multiple kitchen appliances and maintenance on the heat tape system on the roof of the Girdwood Residence. ... Stevens contacted Allen and VECO employees multiple times to request that VECO employees or contractors perform additional tasks at the Girdwood Residence. These tasks included, without limitation, roof and gutter repairs, electrical wiring, and the replacement of sensors."

-2006: Allen assigned workers to repair the boiler and heating system at the Girdwood residence.

-In each case, the indictment says, Stevens knew that the work on the house he often referred to as "the chalet" was done by VECO employees and contractors. Stevens, however, "never paid or reimbursed VECO at any time for the cost of materials provided and labor performed by VECO and its employees at the Girdwood Residence," the indictment said.

Unreported gifts tripped up Stevens

NO BRIBERY: Government says senator wasn't in a payback game with Veco.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(07/30/08 01:07:46)

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Ted Stevens got something from Veco and the oil services company got something from Alaska's senior Republican senator, according to Tuesday's federal indictment of the veteran senator.

But what Stevens got was not a bribe; it was his failure to report what he got that's the problem, according to the indictment and one of the top Justice Department officials overseeing the case, who spoke to the press Tuesday during a news conference.

"Bribery is not charged in this case," said Matt Friedrich, the acting assistant attorney general in charge of the criminal division of the Department of Justice. "Bribery requires proof of a specific agreement of a quid pro quo, of this for that. This indictment does not allege such an agreement."

The indictment lays out numerous examples of things that former Veco chief executive Bill Allen wanted and got from Stevens, such as help landing multimillion dollar, multiyear federal contracts with the National Science Foundation and assistance with international Veco projects in Pakistan and Russia.

The indictment also very carefully lists the things that federal investigators say Stevens received from Veco and Allen -- and then didn't disclose as gifts on the annual forms he's required to file with the Senate detailing his personal finances.

Yet "the indictment does not allege a quid pro quo," Friedrich said.

In other words, what the indictment does not do is say that Allen and Veco gave Stevens those things specifically in exchange for what the company wanted Stevens to obtain for them.

"Bribery and gratuity cases are tough," said Donald Smaltz, a California lawyer who was appointed as an independent counsel to investigate then-Agriculture Secretary Mike Espy for allegations he took gifts from growers who had business with his department. "This makes an easier case for the government."

The federal bribery statutes require prosecutors to show that a public official got something of value in exchange for a specific act that benefits the person who is bribing them, Smaltz said. Federal bribery charges also carry a penalty of up to 15 years in prison -- far stiffer than five years for making false statements. Stevens was charged with seven counts of making false statements on his financial disclosure forms.

Often, secret recordings are the only way to prove outright bribery, said Smaltz, whose prosecution of Espy ended in an acquittal. He points to the infamous Abscam case of the late 1970s, where investigators had videotaped surveillance of elected officials accepting bribes. That was the key to their convictions, Smaltz said.

Another more recent example came in Alaska: the conviction of former Alaska state Rep. Vic Kohring, who was seen on FBI surveillance tapes accepting cash from Bill Allen.

"The only reason the government was able to make those cases, was because they were using undercover tactics and jurors ... were able to see precisely what was said by whom," Smaltz said. "It's very difficult for the defendants to weasel their way out of those cases.

Excerpts from the indictment

"Beginning in or about May 1999, and continuing to in or about August, 2007, in the District of Columbia and elsewhere ... STEVENS, while a sitting United States Senator, knowingly and willfully engaged in a scheme to conceal a material fact, that is, his continuing receipt of hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of things of value from a private corporation and its chief executive officer."

"... STEVENS took multiple steps to conceal his continued receipt of things of value from ALLEN and VECO. During the nearly seven-year period in which STEVENS received multiple things of value from ALLEN and VECO, STEVENS filed and caused to be filed false annual Financial Disclosure Forms for the years 1999 to 2006 that did not report STEVENS' receipt of any thing of value from ALLEN and VECO, either as gifts or as liabilities, as required."

"... STEVENS, while during that same time period that he was concealing his continuing receipt of things of value from ALLEN and VECO from 1999 to 2006, received and accepted solicitations for multiple official actions from ALLEN and other VECO employees."

Alaska Sen. Stevens indicted; 'I am innocent'

By LISA DEMER, RICHARD MAUER and ERIKA BOLSTAD
Anchorage Daily News
(07/30/08 00:51:35)

A federal grand jury in Washington, D.C., indicted long-term U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens Tuesday on seven counts of filing false financial disclosures, each a felony charge that carries a penalty of five years in prison and an unspecified fine.

With the indictment, Stevens, an icon in Alaska politics, becomes by far the most powerful politician charged in the broad, four-year federal investigation into public corruption in the state. To date, three state legislators, a high-level official in Gov. Frank Murkowski's administration, two businessmen and a lobbyist have been convicted, while two legislators are awaiting trial.

Stevens said he will fight to save himself and his long career.

"I am innocent of these charges and intend to prove that," he said in a prepared statement. "I have proudly served this nation and Alaska for over 50 years."

At a news conference in Washington to announce the indictment, Matthew Friedrich, acting assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's criminal division, said Stevens would be allowed to turn himself in. Stevens' attorney, Brendan Sullivan of Washington, was notified of the indictment Tuesday morning shortly before it became public, Friedrich said.

'THINGS OF VALUE'

The seven-count indictment charges Stevens with making false statements by failing to disclose "things of value" he received from Veco Corp., the now-defunct Alaska-based oil services and construction company, and from its chairman, Bill Allen, in a scheme that stretched over eight years.

At the same time, according to the indictment, Allen and other Veco employees asked Stevens to intervene on their behalf with the government, and Stevens sometimes obliged.

Stevens received substantial benefits from his relationship with Veco that he never disclosed, the indictment charged: improvements to his home in Girdwood; an automobile exchange in which he received a new Land Rover worth far more than his 35-year-old Mustang; and household appliances.

The federal Ethics in Government Act requires all senators to file financial disclosure statements detailing their transactions during the previous calendar year, including the disclosure of gifts above a specified value and all liabilities greater than $10,000.

At the news conference, Friedrich said the case involved false disclosures, not bribery, and no specific actions by Stevens in return for gifts were charged, even though the indictment mentioned some Veco requests and the favorable responses by Stevens and his staff.

Some of the solicitations were made directly to Stevens and included requests for help by Veco on its international projects in Pakistan and Russia; requests for federal grants and contracts, including National Science Foundation contracts worth nearly $200 million; and assistance with efforts to construct a natural gas pipeline from Alaska's North Slope.

The indictment comes just as Stevens is in the political fight of his life to win a seventh term. The fallout was immediate: Under Republican rules governing indicted senators, he had to step aside from two key committee positions he earned through longevity -- his co-chairmanship of the Commerce Committee, which oversees fishing and telecommunications, and his ranking position on the defense appropriations subcommittee, from which he has sent millions in earmarks to Alaska.

Even with his famed clout in Washington at least temporarily diminished, Stevens vowed to continue his campaign. His presumptive Democratic opponent, Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, wouldn't answer questions about Stevens' indictment.

YEAR AFTER GIRDWOOD RAID

Friedrich said the Justice Department followed its own rules in seeking an indictment when the evidence was complete and sufficient to bring charges. The political calendar wasn't considered, he said.

Allen, Veco's former chief executive, and Rick Smith, the company's former vice president of community affairs and government relations, pleaded guilty May 7, 2007, to providing more than $400,000 in corrupt payments to public officials from Alaska. Allen and Smith are cooperating and have been key witnesses in two trials so far.

Back then, there were no direct references in the Allen and Smith charges to gifts they provided to Stevens, though they admitted making corrupt payments of $243,250 over five years to Stevens' son Ben, once president of the Alaska Senate. Ben Stevens has not been charged and has denied wrongdoing.

The charges against Ted Stevens come almost exactly a year after an FBI and IRS raid on Stevens' home in Girdwood, the first time those agencies had ever raided the home of a sitting U.S. senator. At the time the agents documented the renovations made in 2000 that were overseen by Allen and managed by his employees and contractors. The renovations doubled the size of the home.

Stevens has refused to discuss the investigation, except to say he paid every bill he received connected to the renovation. He has refused to elaborate about whether that answer implied he knew of work on the house for which he wasn't billed.

The indictment said Stevens made "multiple false representations" to reporters, his friends and his staff about what he received from Veco and Allen. While it's no crime for an official to lie to the media, prosecutors charged that those statements were part of his long-term effort to conceal Veco's gifts and benefits.

MORE THAN $200,000 ON RENOVATIONS

From the summer of 2000 to about December 2001, Veco spent more than $200,000 on the Girdwood renovations, including materials, labor and architectural design, the indictment says. Much of that effort has already been the subject of extensive media coverage based on interviews with contractors, ex-Veco employees and Girdwood residents who witnessed the work.

For instance, Veco and Stevens hired a construction firm, identified only as "Construction Firm A" in the indictment, for the renovation project. The company matches the description of Christensen Builders of Anchorage, whose president, Augie Paone, told the Daily News in May 2007 that he was hired by Veco but sent invoices to Stevens and that Stevens paid by personal check from a new account.

The charges say Stevens never paid Veco anything for the materials or labor provided by Veco, its employees and contractors but clearly knew that Veco did a lot of the work.

Paone said he fully cooperated with the government. The indictment echoes his assertions in the interview, adding that Construction Firm A focused on carpentry and finish work, and Veco employees did much more.

PRAISE FOR VECO WORKERS

In an e-mail to Allen Sept. 24, 2000, Stevens was full of praise for Veco and its employees, according to the indictment. "We've never worked with a man so easy to get along with as (unnamed Veco employee). Plus, everyone who's seen the place wants to know who has done the things he's done. ... You and (Person A) have been the spark plugs, and we are really pleased with all you have done. hope to see you and the chalet soon. best teds." The indictment goes much further than what was previously known and reveals that maintenance on the house extended into 2006. When something went awry, the charges say, Stevens asked Veco for help much as someone else might call a plumber.

By 2006, the concealed "things of value" topped $250,000.

The indictment has no reference to whether the government intercepted calls made to Stevens from any of Allen's or Smith's phones that were wiretapped under court order starting in 2005. Once Allen agreed to plead guilty, on Aug. 30, 2006, he placed several calls to public officials, including Stevens, in a sting effort. The content of those calls has not been disclosed.

The 1999 vehicle exchange cited in the indictment concerned a new car for Stevens' "dependent child," not naming the person. At the time, his only dependent child was daughter Lily.

Allen transferred a new 1999 Land Rover Discovery, which he had bought for $44,000, to Stevens. In exchange, Stevens gave Allen, a car collector with a love of Fords, a 1964 Mustang and $5,000. But the Mustang was worth less than $20,000, according to the indictment.

Lily Stevens, now 27, is the sole child of Stevens' marriage to his second wife, Catherine. Lily, a law clerk in Washington, is engaged to be married in late August. A call to her Washington office was not returned.

Stevens' first wife, Ann, was killed in the crash of a private jet in Anchorage in 1978 that injured Stevens. Ted and Ann Stevens had five children together, including Ben.

ALASKAN OF THE CENTURY

Stevens, 84, is the longest-serving Republican in the U.S. Senate. From 2003 to 2007, he was Senate president pro tem and third in line to the presidency. With political power that increased with his longevity, Stevens came to represent Alaska's clout in Congress. In January 2000, Stevens was named "Alaskan of the Century," and the Anchorage airport was renamed in his honor that July.

That was also the year of the bulk of the Girdwood home renovations.

Alaska's other senator, Lisa Murkowski, expressed shock at the indictment in a prepared statement today.

"I know Ted Stevens to be an honorable, hard-working Alaskan who has served our state well for as long as we have been a state," she said. "As to the charges, we are at the beginning of the criminal process and there is a judicial procedure in place that will be followed."

Murkowski, a Republican, probably owes her election in 2004 to Stevens. She was trailing former Gov. Tony Knowles in the polls until the final weeks, when Stevens began blitzing the state with commercials saying he needed her beside him in Washington.

Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, Stevens' best friend in the Senate, said in a brief statement: "In our legal system, a man is presumed innocent until proven guilty in a court of law. ... As far as I am concerned, Ted Stevens remains my friend. I believe in him."

Stevens and Inouye are both World War II veterans and call each other "brother." When Stevens became chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee in 2005, he named Inouye vice chairman rather than the usual term "ranking member" afforded the senior member of the opposite party.

Inouye returned the favor last year when Democrats took over the Senate and he became chairman.

Richard Mauer and Lisa Demer reported from Anchorage and Erika Bolstad reported from Washington, D.C.

Stevens' statement

JULY 29, 2008 - 12:40 PM

I have proudly served this nation and Alaska for over 50 years. My public service began when I served in World War II. It saddens me to learn that these charges have been brought against me. I have never knowingly submitted a false disclosure form required by law as a U.S. Senator.

In accordance with Senate Republican Conference rules, I have temporarily relinquished my vice-chairmanship and ranking positions until I am absolved of these charges.

The impact of these charges on my family disturbs me greatly.

I am innocent of these charges and intend to prove that.

Stevens Indicted On Charges Of Failure To Report VECO Gifts. ABC World News (7/29, story 4, 2:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Well, there was something of a political earthquake in the US Senate, today. A seven-count federal indictment was filed against Senator Ted Stevens of Alaska, the longest serving Republican in the Senate, on charges he concealed more than $250,000 of gifts and services from an oil company, which helped renovate his home in Alaska." ABC (Tapper) added that "Stevens resigned from his leadership posts in two key committees...after becoming the 11th sitting US senator in American history to be indicted." ... Matthew Friedrich, Justice Department Criminal Division: "These items were not disclosed on Senator Stevens' financial disclosure forms, which he filed under penalties of perjury, either as gifts or as liabilities." ... Tapper: "His Republican colleagues, today, stood by him." Sen. Arlen Specter: "I've known Ted Stevens for 28 years, and I've always found him to be impeccably honest."

The CBS Evening News (7/29, story 3, 1:30, Couric, 7.66M) noted that "for several years as President Pro Tem, he was third in line to the presidency. But now...Stevens is facing criminal charges." ... Friedrich: "These renovations are alleged to have included the addition of a new first floor with multiple bedrooms and a bathroom as well as a finished full basement." CBS (Axelrod) added: "The feds say they've got Stevens for not including the work on federal disclosure forms, but prosecutors stopped short of charging Stevens with actually taking a bribe. Another case where it's not the crime, it's the cover-up." Andrew Cohen, CBS News legal analyst: "We've seen this pattern over and over again with high-profile figures from Martha Stewart to Lewis Libby, and now to Ted Stevens."

NBC Nightly News (7/29, story 4, 2:00, P. Williams, 9.87M) reported, "In a written statement, Senator Stevens said today's indictment 'saddens' him, and that he has 'never knowingly submitted a false disclosure form.' But analysts say this could be a fatal blow to his political future." Chuck Todd, NBC News political director: "Senator Stevens was considered one of the most vulnerable Republicans running for reelection in 2008. Now, with an actual indictment hanging over his head, it's probably impossible for him to survive." Williams: "Prosecutors say they brought the charges when the case was ready, and the Alaska election was not a factor."

Fox Special Report (7/29, lead story, 2:55, Hume) reported, "The Justice Department says Stevens falsified disclosure statements and lied to investigators to cover it up. Steven says he is innocent." ... Fox News (Bream) noted that in an interview Monday with Alaska Public Radio, Stevens said, "I really believe that I have not done anything that is wrong in the process of my official activities." Bream: "Even though this is a Republican administration, the Justice Department wanted to be very clear that this election year indictment is arriving now only because the case was ready for prosecution." Friedrich: "Partisan politics should play no part either in what charges we bring or in things like, you know, the timing of indictment or that type of thing. That policy has been followed to the letter in this case."

The AP (7/30, Jordan) reports that Stevens "is the first sitting U.S. senator to face federal indictment since 1993. He declared, 'I am innocent of these charges and intend to prove that.'" The AP notes that the "indictment...caps a lengthy FBI investigation that has upended Alaska politics and brought unfavorable attention to both Stevens and his congressional colleague, GOP Rep. Don Young. Both are running for re-election this year." VECO founder Bill Allen "agreed to cooperate with the FBI as part of a plea deal for a lesser penalty. That cooperation included letting the FBI tape his phone calls with Stevens, though those calls do not appear as part of the indictment."

The Washington Post (7/30, A1, Johnson, Kane, 696K) reports, "Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse...said federal prosecutors would be very careful about bringing such a highly sensitive indictment, especially in the months before an election. 'You go over it and go over it and go over it, to make sure you got it right,' he said. 'It's more of making sure you've got it all right, and then, in the DOJ's case, make sure you've got all the appropriate sign-offs from above.'" At yesterday's press conference, "Friedrich said prosecutors closely followed internal protocols for bringing criminal charges against elected officials. 'We bring cases based on our evaluation of the facts and the law,' he said. 'We bring cases when they are ready to be charge, and that's what happened here.' Stevens will be allowed to surrender to authorities on his own terms, Justice Department officials said."

The Alaska Daily News (7/30, Demer, Mauer, Bolstad) reports, "With the indictment, Stevens, an icon in Alaska politics, becomes by far the most powerful politician charged in the broad, four-year federal investigation into public corruption in the state. ... Stevens said he will fight to save himself and his long career." The Daily News notes, "At the news conference, Friedrich said the case involved false disclosures, not bribery, and no specific actions by Stevens in return for gifts were charged, even though the indictment mentioned some Veco requests and the favorable responses by Stevens and his staff. Some of the solicitations were made directly to Stevens and included requests for help by Veco on its international projects in Pakistan and Russia; requests for federal grants and contracts, including National Science Foundation contracts worth nearly $200 million; and assistance with efforts to construct a natural gas pipeline from Alaska's North Slope."

The Wall Street Journal (7/30, A3, Pérez, Wilke, Carlton, 2.07M) reports, "The indictment unsealed Tuesday was narrow, given the breadth of the year-long investigation by the Justice Department, FBI, Internal Revenue Service, and other agencies. Beyond Mr. Stevens's alleged ties to VECO, the FBI is continuing to look into the involvement of Mr. Stevens and his business partners in a variety of real-estate deals in Alaska and elsewhere, people close to the federal investigation said. In addition, these people said, the FBI has been investigating whether business partners, friends or relatives may have benefited from earmarks or other federal spending backed by the senator." The Journal notes, "In the indictment... prosecutors didn't allege any quid pro quo in Sen. Stevens's relationship with VECO. However, prosecutors alleged that during the time that Sen. Stevens concealed the gifts, he 'could and did use his position and his office on behalf of VECO.'"

The New York Times (7/30, Johnston, Herszenhorn, 1.12M) reports that the indictment "comes nearly a year to the day after F.B.I. agents raided the senator's home as part of a long-running and expansive public corruption investigation in Alaska. Mr. Stevens was informed of the indictment through a telephone call to his lawyer on Tuesday morning and was allowed to surrender instead of being arrested. ... Mr. Stevens declared his innocence and his intention to fight the charges against him in a statement posted on his Web site. 'I am innocent of these charges and intend to prove that,' he said.

The Washington Times (7/30, Lengell, 83K) notes, "Other members of Congress currently under indictment include Rep. Rick Renzi, Arizona Republican, who is facing federal wire fraud and money laundering charges and is retiring at the end of this term, and Rep. William J. Jefferson, Louisiana Democrat, who was indicted on racketeering and bribery charges. Nearly a dozen other members also have reportedly come under investigation for corruption." Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell declined to comment o" the accusations against Mr. Stevens." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "also said little about Mr. Stevens' legal trouble, and would not indicate whether the Republican conference should ask the lawmaker from Alaska to step down from the chamber."

Roll Call (7/30, Yachnin) reports, "Stevens has previously asserted that he personally paid outside contractors for the home renovations — FBI agents raided the property in 2007 as part of the ongoing investigation — although he has said VECO personnel did review bills from those contractors. But Allen, who along with another high-ranking VECO official pleaded guilty in May 2007 to providing more than $400,000 in payments to Alaska state officials, has testified in court that he used company funds to pay for some of the construction costs as well as provided company employees to perform the remodeling work." However, Roll Call also notes that Friedrich said, "This indictment does not allege a quid pro quo."

CQ (7/30, Hunter, Staff) reports, "Stevens' closest friend in the Senate and a fellow World War II veteran, Hawaii Democrat Daniel K. Inouye, said Stevens should be considered 'innocent until proven guilty,' adding that the indictment should not impact Stevens' ability to do his job. Another fellow World War II and Senate veteran, John W. Warner, R-Va., said Stevens has 'been a hero and a fighter, and he's been a fighter for his country's interests and a fighter for his state ever since.'"

On PBS' NewsHour (7/29, Lehrer) the Washington Post's Carol Leonnig said, "What's alleged is a failure to disclose and concealing these gifts, which is very serious, but bribery is much more serious and much more difficult to prove. That is, indeed, what prosecutors and investigators began investigating, concerns that the senator may have been receiving something of value in a quid pro quo...but that is not what is charged. And that has, of course, caused a lot of discussion in Washington today about whether or not the prosecutors essentially just didn't have enough evidence to prove it or didn't believe that it occurred."

The Los Angeles Times (7/30, Hook, Murphy, 833K) notes, "The high political profile that Stevens, 84, has established could help him ride out, at least initially, the uproar triggered by his indictment Tuesday on charges that he failed to report gifts worth a quarter-million dollars. The first threat to his hold on power will come next month, when he faces a challenge in his state's Aug. 26 Republican primary. If he survives that, Stevens will face a tough Democratic rival in November."

The Hill (7/30, Raju, Bogardus), Seattle Times (7/30, Bernton, 217K), Financial Times (7/30, Luce), AFP (7/30), and NPR's All Things Considered (7/29, Kaste, Norris) also report on Stevens' indictment, as did CNN, Fox News, MSNBC, CNBC and Bloomberg TV throughout Tuesday afternoon and evening. Additionally, the AP (7/30, Davis), McClatchy (7/30, Lightman) and the Washington Post (7/30, A8, Cillizza, Kane, 696K) analyze the expected political fallout for the GOP.

Stevens Delayed Lifting Of Pakistan Sanctions Until VECO Dispute Resolved. The Los Angeles Times (7/30, Neubauer, 833K) reports that in 1999, the government of Pakistan was "desperate for the removal of powerful military and economic sanctions imposed after the country conducted nuclear tests in 1998. Many hundreds of millions of dollars in trade was at stake. Stevens was the chairman of the conference committee that was considering allowing that change. But first, according to Capitol Hill sources, he made it clear that he wanted Pakistan to resolve a multimillion-dollar dispute" with VECO. The company "is at the heart of the Stevens indictment handed down Tuesday, and prosecutors outlined hundreds of thousands of dollars in financial favors VECO allegedly did for Stevens. What was less clear was what Stevens did for VECO, though the indictment mentions -- without elaboration -- that VECO asked for his help with projects in Pakistan and Russia, among other favors."

Other Indictments Seen As Possible. The AP (7/30, Quinn) reports that Stevens "could be the biggest prize caught in a widespread federal investigation into corruption of Alaska politics, but his indictment might not be the last. The offices of six state lawmakers were raided two years ago, and all but two have either been charged or found guilty. The only exceptions are Stevens' son, Ben, and Sen. Donny Olson." Rep. Don Young "is also under federal investigation and his campaign is hemorrhaging money on legal fees with a primary against a formidable opponent, Lt. Gov. Sean Parnell, less than one month away." The AP notes, "The FBI is investigating Young's fundraising practices. He has not been charged. Federal authorities are also investigating an unrelated earmark for a Florida highway interchange sought by a developer who was also a campaign contributor."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (7/30, A14, 696K) editorializes, "It is notable that prosecutors sought only false-statement charges against Mr. Stevens for failing to report the alleged gifts; despite the language in the indictment about Mr. Stevens's alleged help for Veco, he was not charged with the more serious offense of taking a bribe or illegal gratuity. Nonetheless, the facts as portrayed in the indictment appear devastating for Mr. Stevens, who was already facing a difficult reelection race this year." The Post adds, "Mr. Stevens said, in a statement posted on his Web site yesterday, that he was 'innocent of these charges' and had 'never knowingly submitted a false disclosure form.' We look forward, as we imagine his constituents do, to hearing the senator's explanation of how, exactly, he thought all these renovations were being financed."

The Wall Street Journal (7/30, A14, 2.07M) editorializes that the Stevens indictment "is another blow to the Republican Congressional reputation for honest government -- as well as the party's chances of avoiding big losses in November. Minority parties don't typically defeat a majority when more of their own Members are being indicted for corruption. ... If Mr. Stevens insists on running again, Alaska Republicans will have a chance to render their own verdict in an August 26 Senate primary. Some political hygiene would seem to be in order."

Meanwhile, New Republic senior editor Michael Crowley writes in a Washington Post (7/30, 696K) op-ed, "Stevens says he is innocent, but if he's convicted, few tears will be shed in Washington. Stevens cultivated a tyrannical image and personalized politics to an extreme degree, dividing the world into friends and enemies and showing no mercy. This outlook carried him to great heights. But, nourished by the culture of a Republican-dominated Congress, it eventually became toxic."

FBI Helping Philadelphia Police Fight Crime In Violent Neighborhood. Fox Special Report (7/29, story 16, 3:00, Hume) reported, "The job of career FBI agents in the post-9/11 world is about more than counterterrorism. Most of their casework deals with public corruption, white collar crime, violent crime, and drugs. In part two of our series marking the FBI's 100th anniversary, Fox gained exclusive access to Squad Two, one of Philadelphia's premiere drug and violent crime task forces." ... John Magee, FBI intelligence analyst: "The 12th district is a particularly violent area in the city of Philadelphia southwest division, with a lot of gunshot wound victims and a lot of narcotics trafficking." Fox (Herridge) added: "And for career agent Judy Tyler, this takedown is her baby. ... Tyler and FBI intelligence analyst John McGee are using Stevens' trial scheduled before election

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(07/31/08 18:55:49)

WASHINGTON - Sen. Ted Stevens will have the opportunity to clear his name in a federal court before the Nov. 4 election, but a judge seemed unlikely to move the case to his home state where jurors might be more sympathetic to the 84-year-old political titan.

The Alaska Republican made his initial appearanceThursday afternoon in federal District Court in Washington. He pleaded not guilty to seven counts of failing to disclose gifts investigators say he received from Bill Allen, the former chief of the oil services company Veco.

The 84-year-old lawmaker, a former U.S. Attorney, prosecuted wrongdoers in Alaska in the 1950s and has filed briefs with the Supreme Court. But Thursday's court appearance was his first as a defendant in a criminal case.

Stevens isn't trying to "ask for any special favors because he's a senator and served 40 years in the Senate," said his lawyer, Brendan Sullivan. But, "he'd like to clear his name before the election. This is not a complex case. It should be one that moves quickly."

U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan set a tentative trial date of Sept. 24

"The reason for your request is not an insignificant one," the judge said. "I can appreciate why the senator would like to have this matter commence and concluded before the election."

Stevens' attorney told the judge it was the first time in his career that he recalled asking for a criminal trial to be moved at such a fast clip. On his way into the courthouse Thursday afternoon, Stevens waved to the television cameras lining Pennsylvania Avenue, within walking distance of the Capitol. He waited quietly for the proceedings to begin and was greeted politely by the judge, who welcomed him to the courtroom by saying "Good afternoon, senator."

Stevens said little during the hearing, but followed it closely. When it came time to enter his plea, his lawyer did it for him. After the first segment of the hearing, Stevens left the hearing room with his arms around his wife, Catherine, and one of his daughters, Beth. When it concluded, Stevens and his family and lawyers took the elevator down to a side exit, where he was whisked away in a black Cadillac.

Stevens' office issued a statement at the end of the day with the senator reiterating his innocence.

"I am humbled by all the outpouring of support, expressions of friendship, and offers of prayers," the statement said. "This process has lasted for more than a year, causing great distress to my family and confusing the Alaskans who have put their trust in me for more than 40 years.

"When all the facts come out at the trial, Alaskans will know that I continue to be a dedicated public servant and that I am working hard for them every day."

NEEDED: 500GB HARD DRIVE

Stevens is charged with making false statements about more than $250,000 worth of goods and services that he allegedly received from Veco Corp., the now-defunct Anchorage-based oil services and construction company, and from its chairman, Allen. The senator is the highest-profile politician to be caught in the four-year-old federal corruption probe, which has led to the conviction of three state lawmakers, a high-level official in Gov. Frank Murkowski's administration, two Veco officials and a lobbyist. Two other state legislators are awaiting trial.

Prosecutors said they could be prepared to bring Stevens' case to trial at the end of September. Brenda Morris, the lead Justice Department prosecutor on the case, also told the judge they could begin handing over discovery materials in the case as soon as Stevens' attorney gave them a 500-gigabyte computer hard drive.

Morris said the evidence they will share includes video and audio recordings and "consensual monitoring," which is when one of the parties to a conversation has agreed to its recording but the other person is unaware.

The need for such a large computer hard drive suggests that voluminous amounts of recorded evidence will play a part in this trial, much as it has in other corruption cases brought in Alaska.

It's not clear whether prosecutors will use recorded conversations between Stevens and Allen in court, but Allen's cooperation and that of the No. 2 at Veco, Richard Smith, in the case has been instrumental in other convictions. So have the surveillance videos and conversations recorded by the FBI.

The two pleaded guilty in May 2007 to making more than $400,000 in corrupt payments to public officials from Alaska. Allen agreed to cooperate with investigators in return for leniency in his own sentencing.

"It's generally understood up here that both Allen and Smith were engaged in a sting operation for approximately six months after they agreed to cooperate," with federal investigators, said Doug Pope, who represented one of the lobbyists who pleaded guilty, Bill Bobrick. He also represents former state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, who is awaiting trial.

"A whole lot of telephone calls were recorded when they were talking to public officials," Pope said. "I've listened to every tape they've produced, and some of which involve people who are involved in the Stevens case. My take on it is that Allen and Smith were trying to set people up."

"ONLY THING THAT CONVICTED VIC"

John Henry Brown, a lawyer for Vic Kohring, a former state representative, said that jurors approached him after his client's trial and said that video evidence was what convinced the jury to find him guilty.

"One of the jurors contacted us, and told us the only thing that convicted Vic was the last tape... (when) Vic said, offhandedly to Bill (Allen), 'I won't vote on that if you don't want me to.' That was really the only thing that convicted Vic," Brown said.

Brown also said that it could help Stevens to move the trial venue from Washington D.C. to Anchorage, even though Judge Sullivan seemed disinclined to do so.

"I'm sure the (prosecutors) want to keep it in D.C. because everyone in Alaska loves Uncle Ted," Brown said.

FBI - Stevens-2095

The judge set a hearing on Stevens' change-of-venue motion for Aug. 19, but questioned Stevens' lawyer about why Stevens would push for such a motion when all parties had worked hard to find a trial date in Washington, D.C., that allowed the case to be heard before the election.

Brendan Sullivan said that they thought about 90 percent of the witnesses in the case would be from Alaska and that it would make it easier. If possible, they would like the judge to come to Alaska, Stevens' lawyer said.

They're prepared to work around the geographic challenges, Morris said.

Stevens wasn't required to post bond, but he does have to surrender his passport and get permission from the court if his duties as senator require him to leave the country. If convicted, Stevens could face an unspecified fine and as much as five years in prison on each of the seven counts.

Most of the alleged gifts to Stevens from 1999 to 2006 came during a renovation that doubled the size of a house he owns with his wife, Catherine, in Girdwood. The company's employees and contractors performed architectural design services, put the house on stilts and installed a new three-bedroom first floor, a finished basement, a garage, a Viking gas range and a wraparound deck, according to the indictment.

While Stevens paid a construction firm for its work, he never reimbursed Veco or its contractors, even while staying involved in the progress of the work, the indictment said. Stevens also is accused of trading his vintage Ford Mustang and $5,000 to Allen in the spring of 1999 for a new Land Rover Discovery worth about $44,000, a car he told Allen he wanted for one of his daughters. Stevens' Mustang was worth about $20,000 at the time, according to the indictment.

Meanwhile, as Stevens then served as the powerful chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, Allen and VECO sought his help with international projects, grants from the National Science Foundation and funding for a natural gas pipeline on Alaska's North Slope, the grand jury charged in its indictment.

Stevens money a bit too tainted for some

GOP: Those facing re-election try to insulate themselves by donating funds obtained from Stevens to charity.

By GREG GORDON

(07/31/08 01:25:56)

WASHINGTON -- Republican senators facing re-election challenges sought to insulate themselves from indicted Sen. Ted Stevens on Wednesday by promising to donate to charity tens of thousands of dollars they received from the veteran Alaska lawmaker's political action committee.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky and Texas Sen. John Cornyn, the chairman of the Republican Conference, led the way, with each disclosing that he'd relinquish $10,000 in campaign donations from Stevens' Northern Lights PAC.

Minnesota freshman Sen. Norm Coleman, who's fighting to win re-election against comedian-turned-politician Al Franken, decided to give away $20,000 that his campaign and his own leadership PAC got from Stevens' PAC.

The GOP senators acted a day after Stevens was indicted on charges of lying to conceal more than $250,000 in gifts from Veco Corp., a former Alaska oil services company at the center of a public corruption scandal that already has netted seven criminal convictions.

North Carolina Sen. Elizabeth Dole acted quickly on Tuesday, announcing that she'd give $10,000 from Stevens' PAC to a campaign to fight hunger.

Freshman Sen. John Sununu of New Hampshire made a similar decision on Wednesday as his Democratic rival, former governor Jeanne Shaheen, issued a press release charging that his re-election campaign was funded by $45,000 in "tainted" cash from Stevens and another $65,000 that the Alaska senator raised on his behalf.

Meantime, the Republican Party of Alaska on Wednesday disclosed that it's donated $34,500 it received from Veco executives to a half dozen Alaska-based charities. The party received more than $56,000 in donations from the company between 1997 and 2004, but spokesman McHugh Pierre said that more than $20,000 of those funds had been spent when the corruption scandal became public in 2006.

Democratic Sen. Daniel Inouye of Hawaii, one of Stevens' closest friends, however, said he wouldn't give away any of the $13,000 he received from Veco executives. He said he didn't solicit the contributions, and "to my knowledge they were not made illegally."

Veco executives gave at least $35,000 to Stevens' PAC in recent years, Federal Election Commission records show. Most of it came from former Veco CEO Bill Allen, who pled guilty last year to making illicit payments to Alaska politicians and allegedly arranged for free renovation work on Stevens' house in Girdwood. In all, Veco employees made more than $600,000 in political contributions between 1993 and 2007, virtually all of it to Republicans.

In their effort to distance themselves from Stevens and Veco, the Republican senators are giving away more money than the company's employees gave to Stevens' Northern Lights PAC.

Republican senators, however, rejected calls to surrender money they received in previous election cycles from Stevens' PAC, which the GOP elder statesman routinely used to support his colleagues' campaigns.

Numerous Republican legislators last year donated to charities campaign money they received from Allen and other Veco executives. But legislators Wednesday continued to try to draw an array of ethical lines while trying to avoid any taint from the charges against Stevens.

Sen. Lisa Murkowski, Stevens' Alaska Republican colleague, received $41,250 from Veco executives for her victorious 2003-2004 campaign. Last year, she donated to charity $8,000 in donations from Allen and former Veco vice president Richard Smith, who pleaded guilty to corruption charges last year, but kept donations from other Veco executives.

Her spokesman, Mike Brumas, said Wednesday that to give away donations from other Veco employees would "impugn the integrity of a lot of good Alaskans."

Sen. Ted Stevens to face judge in corruption case

By MATT APUZZO
(07/31/08 06:40:32)

Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens is due in federal court Thursday to answer charges that he lied about hundreds of thousands of dollars in gifts from an oil services contractor.

Stevens is the Senate's longest-serving Republican and has been a dominant figure in congressional politics for a generation. After being indicted on seven counts of lying on Senate disclosure forms, Stevens was ordered to surrender in federal court and appear before a judge Thursday afternoon. A throng of reporters and television crews awaited his appearance.

Stevens had been scheduled to appear at a pretrial services office earlier Thursday, to be interviewed by court officials but, under an unusual arrangement, he arrived for that meeting Wednesday afternoon, avoiding the media attention. U.S. Marshal George Walsh, whose office is in charge of booking defendants, said he was unaware of the arrangement until Thursday and was disappointed that it would appear Stevens received special treatment.

Court spokeswoman Jenna Gatski said Stevens made an early appointment with a pretrial services officer. Though a judge's order called for Stevens to appear for that meeting Thursday, Gatski said the pretrial office sets its own schedule. Stevens appeared late Wednesday afternoon but within business hours.

Stevens, a former federal prosecutor, has said little about the corruption investigation that has dogged him for more than a year. Thursday's court hearing was likely to be no different. He was expected to plead not guilty, but initial court appearances are usually brief.

The indictment is a blow to the senator's re-election bid. Once a seemingly invincible political figure, he now faces both Democratic and Republican challengers who hope his legal woes make him vulnerable.

Some GOP colleagues have distanced themselves from Stevens. A spokeswoman for John McCain's presidential campaign said Wednesday that the indictment was a "sad reminder" that the next president will have to work to rebuild the public's trust.

Nicolle Wallace said McCain and Stevens famously clashed over the appropriation process. McCain regularly says on the presidential campaign trail that appropriations are subject to corruption that causes voters to lose faith in government.

Stevens has steadfastly maintained his innocence, and his campaign has pledged that Stevens will press on with his re-election race.

He would have to ask U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan for permission to travel. Stevens was expected to remain free while he campaigns and attends to Senate business, but Sullivan was to decide what rules the senator must abide by while he awaits trial.

FBI - Stevens-2099

Stevens, 84, is accused of concealing more than $250,000 in gifts and home remodeling services he received from VECO Corp., a once powerful contracting firm. Two top VECO executives have pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers. The executives cooperated with the FBI and provided information about Stevens.

If convicted, he faces up to five years in prison on each of seven counts.

The indictment stops short, however, of charging Stevens with bribery or other traditional corruption charges. Despite winning cooperation from the VECO executives and searching the senator's home, the Justice Department said it could not prove a this-for-that corruption case.

His indictment is the culmination of an FBI investigation that for years has sent tremors through Alaska's political system. Several state lawmakers have been charged and others, including Stevens' son, Ben, remain under scrutiny.

Stevens due in court this morning

Supervisor says he erred about Veco labor costs

Anchoorage Daily News
(08/04/08 01:25:06)

A former Veco employee backed away from an assertion in an interview published in Sunday's Daily News that some labor costs for the 2000 renovation of Sen. Ted Stevens' home in Girdwood were borne by an oil company.

David Anderson, who supervised the project for Veco, an oil field service company implicated in the government's corruption investigation in Alaska, said he submitted the time slips for the shop electricians who worked on the Stevens house.

But on Sunday, he said he couldn't be sure how Veco accounted for the labor costs on its books.

Last week, Anderson said some of the labor charges were passed on to an oil company that was paying Veco to build a North Slope module in its shop at the time, probably BP, though not necessarily with the knowledge of the oil company. He affirmed that Saturday.

But on Sunday, Anderson said he was mistaken and only knew for sure that Veco covered the costs, not that they were passed through to a Veco client.

That accounting took place in a Veco office outside the scope of his job, he said Sunday.

Stevens was charged last week in a seven-count indictment with failing to disclose more than $250,000 worth of gifts from Veco, mostly related to renovations of his residence in Girdwood starting in 2000.

The indictment said Stevens failed to reimburse Veco for labor, materials and furnishings it provided Stevens from 2000 to 2006.

Veco men sparked Stevens remodel

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(08/03/08 02:04:59)

Editor's note: Earlier versions of this story, online and in print, contained three paragraphs reporting that ex-Veco employee David Anderson said some of Veco's costs on the Stevens house were passed along to an oil company for which Veco was doing work. Anderson on Sunday said he was mistaken about this, and the three paragraphs were removed from the story. Read a fuller explanation HERE.

The idea to double the size of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens' home in Girdwood by jacking it up and adding a new first floor was hatched by Veco employees over drinks at the Alyeska Prince Hotel, according to two of the participants.

"This is what I'm thinking -- I want to expand Ted's house," then-Veco chairman Bill Allen told two of his trusted employees, his nephew David Anderson and Robert "Rocky" Williams. "How can we do this?"

The conversation was recalled in interviews last week by Anderson and Williams, federal grand jury witnesses who may testify at Stevens' corruption trial scheduled next month. They said it took place in a suite at the Girdwood hotel rented for the night by Allen, probably in the spring of 1999 or 2000, Anderson said.

Anderson said he eventually supervised the start of the 2000 renovation project for Veco and continued to respond to maintenance requests by Stevens and his wife over the next few years. He said Veco paid for most of the work and Stevens should have known it.

Williams said he too had a supervisory role on the project and that he made no effort to conceal his employment with Veco when Stevens came around. Anderson described his recollections in a telephone interview last week from his home in the Matanuska-Susitna Borough. Williams was interviewed at his home in South Anchorage last week and in 2007.

Stevens, who has represented Alaska in the Senate since 1968, was indicted Tuesday on seven federal felony counts of failing to disclose on his annual financial statements more than $250,000 in gifts he allegedly received from Allen and Veco starting in 2000. The Veco-organized house renovation, subsequent repairs and Veco-supplied furnishings were central to most of the alleged violations.

Stevens says he is innocent and has vowed to fight for acquittal. On Thursday, he asked for a speedy trial and got it. A judge set a date of Sept. 24 in Washington, D.C.

Stevens has declined to answer questions about the house except to once say that he paid every bill he received. His wife, Catherine, did not respond to e-mails to her husband's Senate and campaign offices for comment on this story, and has previously declined to discuss the Girdwood remodeling.

Bill Allen pleaded guilty in May 2007 to federal conspiracy, bribery and tax charges and agreed to cooperate in a massive corruption investigation of Alaska politics. For the third time Friday, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick granted a Justice Department request to continue Allen's sentencing, this time until at least February 2009. The government's status report on Allen was filed under seal, prosecutors wrote, because "it discusses active criminal grand jury investigations and similar matters."

'BILL'S HOTSHOTTING'

The interviews with Anderson and Williams provide new details about the allegations in the Stevens indictment from the perspective of two people involved in the construction project. Their stories closely track the allegations in the government's case, though in several instances they spoke about work and furnishings provided to the

194A-AN-13680-m 937 e

Stevenses that were not directly mentioned in the indictment.

Anderson, a certified welder by trade, grew up with Bill Allen's son Mark in Kenai. Bill Allen got his start there in the 1970s, with Veco getting contracts on the oil platforms in Cook Inlet. When Allen sold Veco last year, the company had annual sales of nearly $1 billion and 4,000 employees worldwide.

Anderson spent years working on the North Slope, then moved to Anchorage in the 1990s when Veco opened a metal fabrication shop in South Anchorage.

Anderson said Bill Allen began bringing him into his inner circle, first trusting him with making campaign contributions that Allen would later -- and illegally -- reimburse with cash. Anderson said he built the giant wheeled barbecue grill later used to roast pigs at fundraisers for Rep. Don Young. The cooker was originally built for a party Allen planned to host for a Louisiana senator that was canceled, he said.

"Pretty soon I'm out of the shop -- I'm doing all of Bill's hotshotting," Anderson said.

One of those jobs took him to a chalet on Northland Road in Girdwood -- the official Alaska residence of Ted Stevens. Anderson wasn't sure of the year, but based on other documented events, it probably was 1999.

"I took a crew out there and we cleaned up," Anderson said. "Like a spring cleaning thing." Anderson had two or three other Veco employees with him, and they spent four or five days removing downed limbs, taking out brush and other tasks.

Ted Stevens wasn't there, Anderson recalled, but Stevens' wife, Catherine, was at the home.

"Catherine kind of told us what she wanted done," Anderson said. "She was telling me, 'Let's get that out of there, and that out of there."

Allen had ordered the cleanup and Catherine knew the crew was from Veco, Anderson said. "I know she didn't get a bill -- I know because I was running the paperwork," Anderson said.

Before they were done, he said, Allen showed up.

'GIVE HIM SOME MORE ROOM'

"He was checking on it, and he brought Rocky (Williams) out, and (Allen) goes, 'We need to talk,' " Anderson said. They drove over to the nearby Alyeska Prince Hotel -- now the Hotel Alyeska. Allen got a suite for himself and rooms for Anderson and Williams, the two employees said.

"We all met up there in Bill's stateroom," Anderson said. "Bill busts out the wine."

Allen had a question. "He goes, 'How can we expand Ted's house? I want to give him some more room.' "

Anderson, in the middle of the yard work project, had been having a rough time convincing the neighbors to spruce up their own places, he recalled. He said he told Allen that expanding the Stevens house horizontally toward the property lines of the quarter-acre lot would only put it closer to the neighbors -- not necessarily a good idea.

"Me and Rocky started talking about it -- why don't we just jack the house up? Which is what we did."

In two interviews last year, Williams recalled that at the time, there was talk of Stevens stepping down from the Senate -- especially if he could win approval of oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, a goal that has proved elusive.

"Ted had actually wanted to retire a few years ago and Catherine never liked the original place," said Williams, who said he had conversations with both about the house.

THE PLANS

Before any work could begin, Anderson said, a huge tree overhanging the Stevens home had to be removed.

"I had to go in to Girdwood and I found these rustic-hippy tree cutters to come out there and cut that tree down. That was a big deal, cutting that tree down so that it didn't fall on the cabin," Anderson said.

The stump was about four feet in diameter, he said. Anderson didn't recall how much it cost to fell the tree and buck up the logs.

"It was fairly spendy -- that was a big tree -- but Veco, not Stevens, paid for it," Anderson said. "Ted had firewood -- they knew what was going on."

Anderson's next step was to get Veco engineers to design the addition. A Veco employee, John Hess, led the team, Anderson said.

"John Hess comes out, meets with me, meets with Rocky, and we started walking around looking at stuff, kicking it around -- how in the hell are we gonna do this?"

The initials "JCH" are on the plans filed with the city's building department -- though the documents themselves have no reference to Veco, which, according to Anderson and the Stevens indictment, paid for the design work.

When the Daily News interviewed Hess in June 2007, he declined to talk about the Stevens project. Asked then whether he drafted the plans, he said, "That's possible."

The city permits for the remodel were filed in July 2000 by Robert Persons, the Double Musky restaurateur and a longtime friend of the Stevenses. Persons monitored the progress of the project when neither Ted nor Catherine was around, Anderson and others said, and he is referenced in the Stevens indictment, though only as "Person A."

Persons didn't return several messages left on his phone and in person at the Double Musky over the last two weeks. In a brief interview in March, Persons said he doesn't doubt that Stevens believes he paid everything he owed on the house. That's the way Stevens conducted business in a racehorse partnership managed by Persons, he said: Whenever the partners were required to invest more cash, Persons said, Stevens insisted on being the first to put in.

"This shouldn't be happening," Persons said. "He's very strict about that sort of thing."

'A SAD PORTION OF MY LIFE'

Going through the Yellow Pages, Anderson found a house mover in Anchorage, Toney Hannah, to lift the house.

In an interview last year, Hannah said he first met with Ted and Catherine Stevens about the project in 1999, but the work actually took place in the fall of 2000.

Once Hannah jacked up the house, Anderson said, "it was me, Rocky and Bob Persons, and we were putting in floor joists." Allen dealt with Stevens, he said. "I'm just the supervisor."

FBI - Stevens-2106

Hannah said in the interview last year that he sent a bill to Stevens. Catherine paid by check, he said. He couldn't recall how much and couldn't look up the figure, he said, because the FBI had his files.

Veco hired Christensen Builders for the carpentry work, owner Augie Paone told the Daily News last year. Paone said he sent his invoices first to Veco, then faxed them to Stevens, who paid by check. He thought Stevens paid him at least $100,000 over the course of the project.

Paone's wife, Ruth, an officer of the company, said two weeks ago that neither she nor her husband would comment about the case now.

Stevens told reporters last year that he paid every invoice he received on the remodel.

"As a practical matter, I will tell you. We paid every bill that was given to us," Stevens told reporters last July.

"Every bill that was sent to us has been paid, personally, with our own money, and that's all there is to it. It's our own money."

In a handwritten note sent last summer to Wev Shea, the former U.S. Attorney for Alaska, Stevens said he paid $130,000.

"This is a sad portion of my life -- it will take time to explain," Stevens said in the two-page note, which was seized by the FBI after Shea told a Seattle Times reporter about it. "Catherine and I personally paid over $130,000 for the improvements to our chalet in Girdwood. Someone -- or more than one -- keeps telling the FBI that's not so. Takes time to go back over five years to prove they are wrong."

In the indictment, prosecutors accused Stevens of misleading friends and staff about the Girdwood project, but it doesn't say whether his note to Shea will be used as evidence of that allegation.

But the indictment appears to back up Paone's statements. It says invoices from "Company A," an apparent reference to Christensen Builders, were sent to Stevens and paid by the senator by personal check.

Those invoices, however, "did not include the labor costs of Veco employees and contractors and did not include the costs of materials provided by Veco," the indictment says. Veco employees "installed electrical, plumbing, framing, heating and flooring materials in the Girdwood Residence," as well as buying and installing fixtures and appliances, the indictment says. Between the summer of 2000 and Dec. 31, 2001, those costs totaled more than $200,000, the indictment says.

The electricians on the job were Veco employees, and the plumber, Mark Tyree, was a private contractor hired by Veco, Anderson said.

Veco absorbed the costs of material and Tyree's services, Anderson said.

A VECO JACKET

Among the electricians' tasks was to wire up a switch for a generator that would automatically turn on whenever the power went out, Anderson said. Allen told him to buy an oversized power plant to install in the back yard. It was so heavy that Anderson had to order in a Veco crane from the shop to lift it over the garage from the driveway and set it in place in the back.

It was another gift that Stevens got for free, Anderson said. "I know, because I ran the paperwork -- I did all the purchase orders."

The generator is not mentioned in the indictment.

Anderson said he himself did some of the Veco-paid steelwork -- manufacturing a metal staircase for inside the home in the Veco shop, and making the external pillars that held up the second deck. Williams corroborated that account.

"He's a welder, he knows how to design. He knew everybody at the fab shop," Williams said of Anderson.

Before the project was completed, Anderson had to leave for Oregon to attend to family matters after the death of an aunt -- Bill Allen's sister. Williams stayed on the project.

Stevens himself inspected the work about three times that fall, Williams said. There was no secret about Veco's involvement.

"I wore a Veco jacket the whole time," Williams said. "This was no big covert deal."

According to the indictment, Stevens thanked Allen multiple times for work on the Girdwood house, starting with the initial remodel. In 2000, the indictment says, Stevens sent Allen an e-mail praising a Veco employee whose name was redacted from the indictment

"(W)e've never worked with a man so easy to get along with as [name of a VECO employee], Plus, everyone who's seen the place wants to know who has done the things he's done. ... You and [PERSON A] have been the spark plugs and we are really pleased with all you have done. hope to see you and the chalet soon."

Williams said Catherine Stevens wanted to put her touch on the place, which she and Stevens had bought as a 12-year-old house in 1983.

"So she picked out the carpet, she picked out the tile," Williams said. "She made it her place and that was what Ted wanted because I don't think he planned to be in politics at this point in time."

FALLING OUT WITH ALLEN

Anderson returned to Anchorage and resumed work on the home the following spring, he said, building the ground-floor deck. The Viking grill, cited in the indictment as another gift from Allen to Stevens, was lifted onto the upper deck and permanently plumbed to a gas line with solid pipe, Anderson said. Like the generator, it was so heavy it took a crane to install.

"I knew them," Anderson said of Ted and Catherine Stevens. "Usually Catherine would come by. Ted didn't come by that much," Anderson said. One day, there was a plumbing problem under the kitchen sink -- Anderson called it a "blowout," using a term from the oil patch.

"Catherine called me and said, 'My god, we've got to get this stopped.' I had to drive out to Girdwood and fix it." Anderson didn't remember the date, but said it was shortly after the renovation project was completed.

Anderson and Allen had a serious falling-out sometime after that. Anderson said that when he began dating one of Allen's girlfriends, Allen became enraged and Anderson lost his Veco job. In one of the corruption trials last year, the lawyer for former House Speaker Pete Kott attempted to discredit Allen by asking him if he had ever threatened to kill Anderson. Allen said he hadn't. Allen said Anderson was blackmailing him, but didn't elaborate.

Anderson denied blackmailing Allen.

When Anderson moved to a remote part of the Mat-Su Borough and adopted a low-key Alaska lifestyle, he thought he was done with Allen, he said.

Then one day a sedan appeared at his place. Inside were U.S. Treasury Department agents, he said. He got a phone call from someone else -- an FBI agent who couldn't find the place. The agent was directed to the house.

That was Aug. 31, 2006 -- the day teams of federal agents swarmed legislative offices in Anchorage, Juneau and Wasilla, executing search warrants and giving the first public sign that a massive investigation was under way. Agents had questioned Allen for the first time the day before.

Anderson said the agents wanted to talk to him as a key witness. He said he told them he had nothing to hide and has been cooperating ever since.

Ex-Veco worker says he was mistaken about BP billing

Anchorage Daily News
(08/03/08 19:04:21)

A former Veco employee backed away from an assertion in an interview published in Sunday's Daily News that some labor costs for the 2000 renovation of Sen. Ted Stevens' home in Girdwood were borne by an oil company.

David Anderson, who supervised the project for Veco, an oil field service company implicated in the government's corruption investigation in Alaska, said he submitted the time slips for the shop electricians who worked on the Stevens house. But on Sunday, he said he couldn't be sure how Veco accounted for the labor costs on its books.

Last week, Anderson said some of the labor charges were passed on to an oil company that was paying Veco to build a North Slope module at the time in its shop, probably BP, though not necessarily with the knowledge of the oil company. He affirmed that Saturday.

But on Sunday, Anderson said he was mistaken and only knew for sure that Veco covered the costs, not that they were passed through to a Veco client. That accounting took place in a Veco office outside the scope of his job, he said Sunday.

Stevens was charged last week in a seven count indictment with failing to disclose more than $250,000 worth of gifts from Veco, most it related to renovations of his residence in Girdwood starting in 2000. The indictment said Stevens failed to reimburse Veco for labor, materials and furnishings it provided Stevens from 2000 to 2006.

Veco hid construction expenses

STEVENS TRIAL: Bookkeeper says Allen wanted no paper trail.

By RICHARD MAUER and ERIKA BOLSTAD

(09/27/08 05:12:28)

WASHINGTON -- Even as Veco Corp. was paying the bills for renovations on Sen. Ted Stevens' home in Girdwood, the oil services company was concealing its activities in its own internal records, the corporate bookkeeper testified Friday.

Veco accounts manager Cheryl Boomershine testified that when she asked a co-worker to obtain the "who, when, where and why" for a $2,000 expense claim for materials from construction foreman Rocky Williams, she got back a note with orders that there should be no written records.

"No who, per Bill," said the note, referring to Veco chairman Bill Allen. The "when" was August 2000 and the "where" was Girdwood, but there would be no "why," wrote the co-worker.

"No paper trail per Bill Allen per Rocky," she said.

Anyone examining the Veco books might have thought that the company was spending tens of thousands of dollars on business consultants, not Stevens. Testifying on the second day of Stevens' trial for failing to disclose more than $250,000 in gifts from Veco, Boomershine said she created an account for the project called "Girdwood Consultants."

One of the "consultants," she testified, was a plumber named Mark Tyree.

And Boomershine said there's no record that Stevens or his wife ever reimbursed the company for any construction costs for projects that began in 1999 with a back-up generator that cost $6,300 plus labor.

Boomershine now works for CH2M Hill, which bought Veco last year and has been cooperating with the government. Boomershine said that at the FBI's request, she searched through all the backup copies of Veco deposits to its bank accounts; she testified she found only two checks from Stevens.

Both payments were for reimbursements for flights originally paid for by Veco. One check was dated Aug. 8, 2003, for $420.28, for a round trip between Anchorage and Kenai.

The other was dated Aug. 31, 2005, for $1,710.41 for a flight from Phoenix to Roswell and Hobbs, N.M. Allen's son Mark raises racehorses in Roswell, and there's a track at Hobbs.

WORKERS TESTIFY

Other tradesmen who renovated Stevens' home in Alaska in 2000 testified Friday about their work, as prosecutors began building a case that the Alaska Republican never paid Veco for electrical and carpentry work on the so-called "chalet."

Allen, who has already pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers in Alaska, was announced as the government's sole witness Monday.

Allen's testimony and secret recordings of conversations between him and Stevens are expected to be the strongest evidence in the government case against Stevens. The trial, which had been expected to take four weeks, is moving so fast that prosecutors might finish their case in eight days. They sped through so many witnesses that they had to scramble to schedule people to testify next week.

DEPLETED WITNESS LIST

Seven witnesses, mostly from Alaska, have testified so far. The case was moving at such an unexpectedly brisk clip that prosecutors ran out of witnesses Friday, drawing the ire of U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan. Many times a day since before the trial even started, Sullivan has pressed his point that jurors deserve utmost respect, and one way to honor them, he has frequently said, is to ensure they have as little waiting time as possible.

Sullivan was incredulous when the lead prosecutor, Brenda Morris, told him that more witnesses were flying in from Alaska on Sunday. The normally soft-spoken judge thundered back: Why were they not here already?

"I'm not going to tolerate it," he said, and threatened to decree that the government's case had concluded since there were no more witnesses available.

After a 10-minute recess for the government to come up with a revised list of witnesses for Monday, Sullivan had calmed when he re-entered the courtroom. The government presented Allen's name and nine alternates.

Prosecutors also said they could wrap up their case a week from Monday -- the eighth day of trial. They initially had predicted their case would take three weeks.

HOW THE WORK WENT

Earlier Friday, a series of electricians and carpenters described in detail how they jacked up Stevens' Girdwood home and installed a first story, and redid electrical wiring.

Some Veco employees spent months at the Stevens home, according to testimony.

One was Roy Dettmer, of Littleton, Colo. Beginning in October 2000, Dettmer spent four months working six days a week, 10 hours a day, installing electric service in the new sections of the house and rewiring much of the old.

Every morning, he testified, he'd drive to the Port of Anchorage, where he was assigned to work, sign in using his badge, then drive 45 miles to Girdwood. In the evening, he would have to "badge out" again back at the port before he could return to the hotel where he lived when he was in Alaska. Dettmer's pay at Veco at the time was between $27 and $29 an hour, plus overtime, he said. Working a schedule of six weeks on, two off, Dettmer figured he spent about 400 hours on the project.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Joe Bottini of Anchorage walked Dettmer through his tasks. The service entrance had been at the rear of the original house, but that was now 15 feet in the air. Dettmer moved it to the other side of the house in the new garage Veco built, requiring all the old circuits to be extended. That doubled the electrical capacity from 100 amps to 200 amps. That meant the generator that had been installed by Veco only the year before had to be rewired and moved as well.

Veco bought the material from an Anchorage supplier, Dettmer said. The new kitchen built by Veco on the second floor also had to be wired.

Dettmer said he never met Stevens, but Catherine Stevens, the senator's wife, came around once. Williams, the Veco supervisor, introduced him.

"We said 'Hi,' and that was it," Dettmer said.

Catherine Stevens stopped by once to bring workers muffins, said another contractor, Mike Luther, a carpenter with Christensen Builders of Anchorage. He also saw Sen. Stevens once.

"He was a friendly kind of guy -- he was talking to everyone," Luther said

On his way out of the courtroom Friday, Luther waved to Stevens as he walked past the senator at the defense table.

Both sides have tried to educate the jury about Alaska through the witnesses, asking them to describe the North Slope, the Kenai River, Girdwood and the like.

But recent events outside the courtroom have also contributed familiarization, as was obvious when the first witness took the stand Friday. When Veco electrician Douglas Alke gave his hometown as "Wasilla," a murmur of recognition rustled from the jury box to the spectator section.

Stevens: Government is hiding evidence

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@mcclatchydc.com

(09/29/08 08:12:57)

WASHINGTON - Sen. Ted Stevens is accusing prosecutors of hiding evidence from a potential witness that would help the Alaska Republican clear his name before the election, and asked a judge to declare a mistrial in his corruption case.

There's no basis for a mistrial, said District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan. But he was not happy with prosecutors and how they had handled the matter. Sullivan scolded one of the prosecutors, Nick Marsh, from the bench this morning, telling him "someone's treading some very shallow water here."

"I'm flabbergasted," Sullivan said.

The senator's lawyers, who asked for a speedy trial so that jurors could reach a verdict before Alaska voters go to the polls Nov. 4, made their accusations in a motion filed at 11:58 p.m. Sunday. Stevens faces seven felony counts of failing to report on his U.S. Senate disclosure forms more than $250,000 worth of gifts and home renovations, chiefly from Veco Corp. and its chief executive officer, Bill Allen.

Stevens' lawyers say that prosecutors declined to tell them everything they knew about a Veco worker named Rocky Williams, who oversaw renovations at the Stevens home in 2001. Evidence will show that Williams worked far less on the home than other company employees have suggested in their testimony, Stevens' lawyers said, including one of the company's bookkeepers who took the stand Friday.

Williams was originally set to be a government witness, but prosecutors decided in the opening days of the trial not to use him. They discussed the reasons why with the judge privately, in a bench conference, but did not say why in open court. They did allude to Williams being "two weeks overdue" for something in Alaska. And in court filings, Stevens' attorneys refer to health issues that include "coughing episodes."

That will help them knock holes in the government's theory that the Veco work done on Stevens' home was so extensive that he must have known he was getting freebies above and beyond the $160,000 his lawyers said he paid a separate contractor for the work.

Stevens' attorneys did speak to Williams over the weekend, after they learned that he wouldn't be a government witness.

"We got lucky," said one of Stevens' lawyers, Robert Cary. "We got his lucky that he changed his prior position of not wanting to talk to us."

FBI - Stevens-2113

In court filings, Cary said that "Mr. Williams informed defense counsel that he spent nowhere near 8 hours per day, 6-7 days per week, on the Girdwood home renovation project – in direct contrast to the timesheets that the government has placed in evidence to support its central theory that the unpaid cost of the project to Veco was $188,000."

The judge offered Stevens' lawyers a chance to re-question Cheryl Boomershine, the Veco bookkeeper who testified Friday about how much money the company spent renovating the home in Girdwood. Boomershine was still in Washington D.C. Monday morning and is expected to return to the courtroom today. Now, the defense team will be able to ask her questions that might help bolster their case.

Allen won't testify in disclosure trial today

WITNESS LIST REVISED: Former Veco boss might be pushed back until Tuesday.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(09/29/08 00:52:16)

WASHINGTON, D.C. -- Bill Allen won't be testifying today after all in Sen. Ted Stevens' disclosure trial.

On Friday, the government ran out of witnesses because the trial had been running faster than expected.

After being scolded by the judge for keeping the jury waiting, prosecutors announced that Allen, its chief witness and the former chief executive of Veco Corp., would open the day Monday. Allen was in town, and his lawyer, Bob Bundy of Anchorage, had been a regular presence in the back of the courtroom -- even for pretrial matters before the case opened on Thursday.

But Allen's scheduled testimony was also marked with controversy and possible delay -- the scope of cross examination remains undecided. Prosecutors are seeking to limit the kinds of questions that Stevens' attorneys can ask Allen in an effort to impeach him. In particular, they want to prevent questions about Bambi Tyree, who, as a 14- or 15-year-old, told friends she had sex with Allen. She is now 27 and is listed as a potential defense witness.

The defense says Stevens' right to confront the witnesses against him includes exploring whether Allen believed he wouldn't be prosecuted over Tyree if he agreed to plead guilty to federal public corruption charges and testify against Stevens and others.

On Saturday, the government revised its witness list for today, putting Allen back at least until Tuesday and probably later. He's replaced with a list of 14 other witnesses, including Courtney Boone, Stevens' former spokeswoman, and several former Veco employees.

Tyree's father's name has come up several times in the trial already, but in a different context. Mark Tyree, who died in 2005, was the Wasilla plumber hired by Veco to install the pipes, fixtures and heating in the renovations it provided for Stevens on his Girdwood home. Earlier this year, the Daily News reported that over the years, Allen provided gifts, including cars, for Bambi Tyree and her family.

Anchorage police have an open investigation of Allen for sexual abuse of a minor involving Tyree and at least one other woman.

In a motion filed Friday, the government sought to limit the questions of Allen and two other government witnesses, Allen's nephew, David Anderson, and his go-to problem solver, Rocky Williams, who worked as the foreman at Stevens' house. Both Anderson and Williams "are rumored to engage in excessive alcohol consumption," the government acknowledged.

FBI - Stevens-2114

Prosecutors asked the judge to "limit questioning of these witnesses when the cross examination strategy behind the questioning will serve no purpose other than to impair the search for the truth; harass, annoy, or humiliate the witness; improperly inflame the jury; and unfairly prejudice the government's case against defendant."

Stevens' attorneys said that the Allen investigations have already been publicly reported.

"The defense has no desire to smear any government witness," it wrote. "The Sixth Amendment, however, ensures that a criminal defendant will be entitled to explore his accusers' credibility and any motivation to lie."

Prosecutors defend sending witness home to Alaska

By RICHARD MAUER and ERIKA BOLSTAD
Anchorage Daily News
(09/30/08 11:50:20)

WASHINGTON - Prosecutors shed more light Tuesday morning on why they chose to send home Robert "Rocky" Williams and not use him as a witness in Sen. Ted Stevens' corruption trial.

The head of the Justice Department's Public Integrity section said in a court filing that it was his decision to send Williams home to Alaska because he and others in their office had serious concerns about his health. Williams, who oversaw renovations at Stevens' home in Girdwood for Veco Corp., was scheduled to testify in Stevens' trial but prosecutors sent him home the day the trial opened.

Monday, prosecutors drew the ire of U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan, who threatened sanctions and asked for a full explanation of what had happened. Sullivan said he was "flabbergasted" that the government team sent Williams home without telling him or the defense.

Stevens' team seized on the situation, calling for a mistrial and accusing prosecutors of withholding potential testimony from Williams that could help Stevens. They were especially interested in potential evidence that Williams worked far less on the home than other company employees have suggested in their testimony, including one of the company's bookkeepers who took the stand last week.

Such evidence could help Stevens knock holes in the government's theory that the Veco work done on his home was so extensive that he must have known he was getting benefits above and beyond the $160,000 his lawyers said he paid a separate contractor for the work done to double his home in size.

Prosecutors said that when Williams met with government lawyers to prepare for his testimony, it was apparent he had "serious, health-related issues that warranted medical attention." Between his Nov. 7, 2006, grand jury testimony and the present, Williams had become "almost unrecognizable," prosecutors wrote in their filings.

"Mr. Williams had lost a substantial amount of weight, his abdomen was distended (and had been previously drained of excess fluid), he appeared jaundiced, his face was gaunt, he had substantially aged, he had chronic coughing spells, and he was frequently short of breath."

He was so sick that William Welch, the head of the Justice Department's public integrity section, said he could hear Williams "wheezing and coughing" in the corridor in the Justice Department long before he walked past his office.

FBI - Stevens-2115

There was no nefarious intent in sending him home to Alaska, Welch said, and accused the Stevens defense team of "win-at-all-cost" tactics.

"At no time did the government intend to engage in any type of deception," he wrote.

The dispute over Williams dominated the proceedings Monday, although jurors never saw any of the discussions.

The Republican senator faces seven felony counts of failing to report on his Senate disclosure forms more than $250,000 worth of gifts and home renovations, chiefly from Veco and its chief executive officer, Bill Allen. Stevens, who is up for re-election Nov. 4, asked for a speedy trial so he'd have the opportunity to clear his name before Election Day.

Allen, the star witness, just took the stand this afternoon.

Four other witnesses took the stand Tuesday morning, including Stevens' former press secretary, Courtney Boone, who testified about inquiries she had received from a reporter about work done on the Stevens home. The reporter, Heather Resz, had called to ask about a tip she'd received alleging that Veco had built a deck on Stevens' home without paying for it.

Boone said that when she asked the senator about it, his response was "the same as mine. 'What?' Shock," she said. "He said I'd have to talk to Mrs. Stevens about it because she handled the work that was done at the house.

Boone testified she was told by Stevens' wife, Catherine Stevens, that the work was done by Christensen Builders. That contradicts evidence from a carpenter who told the jury yesterday that he was paid more than $4,000 by Veco to build the lower deck.

Resz, who worked for a now-shuttered weekly paper owned by Alaska Newspapers Inc., read jurors the statement she received from Boone. In it, Boone told Resz that Stevens' wife had taken out a line of credit to pay for the addition, and that the "modernization of their chalet included work on their deck."

Resz said she thought she had run into a dead end and didn't pursue the story.

Allen testifies in Stevens trial

By Richard Mauer and Erika Bolstad
Anchorage Daily News
(09/30/08 14:48:21)

WASHINGTON -- The self-made Alaska construction executive whose testimony could bring to an end the 40-year U.S. Senate career of Ted Stevens took the stand today in the corruption case against his former fishing buddy and friend.

Bill Allen, the founder of Veco Inc. and the star witness in Stevens' trial, spoke fondly and with admiration of the 84-year-old Republican senator from Alaska.

"We kind of really liked each other," Allen said this afternoon as prosecutors introduced a photo of the two men catching a king salmon. "Had the same thoughts. Ted really worked hard. Ted loved Alaska and I loved Alaska."

But Allen also began highlighting a pattern of gift-giving that is at the heart of the government case against the senator. Stevens, the longest-serving Republican in the Senate, is accused of failing to report on his annual financial disclosure forms more than $250,000 worth of gifts and home renovations, chiefly from Veco and Allen.

Prosecutor Joe Bottini, an assistant U.S. attorney from Anchorage, asked Allen whether Stevens ever paid him back for the estimated $5,000 to $6,000 cost of the backup generator the senator asked Allen to install in 1999, in advance of the Y2K scare.

"No," Allen said.

"To your knowledge, did he ever pay Veco back for the generator?"

"I don't know," Allen said. "I don't think so."

Allen, 71, is a key figure in the case against Stevens. He and former Veco vice president Rick Smith pleaded guilty in May 2007 to bribing state lawmakers as part of an effort to push through the Legislature an oil production tax favorable to North Slope oil producers. Both are cooperating with the government; neither has been sentenced.

In the three-and-a-half days of testimony leading up to Allen's turn at the stand, jurors have heard from former Veco employees and others who described under oath work they did on Stevens' home. Prosecutors say Stevens never paid for $188,000 worth of renovations paid for by Veco, including a deck, an exterior staircase and extensive electrical work.

FBI - Stevens-2117

Allen, who will continue his testimony tomorrow, began by telling jurors the story of his hardscrabble origins and how he worked his way from teenage welder in New Mexico to wealthy owner of one of Alaska's biggest private employers. Veco was sold last year to the Colorado construction firm CH2M Hill for $380 million.

He also explained to jurors that his halting speech is the result of a brain injury from a 2001 motorcycle accident. He testified he has no memory problems but sometimes has difficulty speaking the words he is thinking.

Allen described meeting Stevens for the first time in the early 1980s at fundraisers and events for Republican Frank Murkowski, who was running for the U.S. Senate and went on to a term as Alaska governor. Allen spoke wistfully of their former "close, personal friendship" and how they used to go to "boot camp" in the desert Southwest - where they would walk around, eating little and drinking only wine, "trying to get some pounds off."

While Allen testified, Stevens looked down at the table, writing. It didn't appear the two former friends ever made eye contact.

Allen also described a complicated 1999 transaction involving a new Land Rover he gave to Stevens in exchange for $5,000 and a 1964-and-a-half Ford Mustang. Stevens wanted to sell the Mustang and buy his daughter Lily a car, Allen said. He offered to give Stevens a $44,000 Land Rover Discovery that he had bought for one of his grandsons but decided not to give him because he was unhappy with him.

Stevens estimated the Mustang was worth $25,000. Allen thought it was worth less, $15,000 to $20,000. When asked whether he thought he had gotten a good trade, he said, "Not at that time, no."

Bottini then asked why he entered the agreement.

"Because I liked Ted," Allen said.

Allen's courtroom testimony and secret recordings he made of conversations with lawmakers and lobbyists were key to the Justice Department's seven previous successful convictions in a wide-ranging federal probe into corruption in Alaska politics.

The Justice Department convictions include those of three former Alaska state representatives, all on bribery charges: Tom Anderson, Pete Kott and Vic Kohring. One other state representative, Bruce Weyhrauch, is awaiting trial, as is current state Sen. John Cowdery.

In the same investigation, Jim Clark, onetime chief of staff to former Alaska Gov. Frank Murkowski, pleaded guilty in March to one count of conspiracy and agreed to cooperate with the federal investigation. Former Anchorage lobbyist Bill Bobrick, who also cooperated with prosecutors, pleaded guilty in May 2007 to a single conspiracy count.

If asked during testimony, Allen will not be allowed to specifically name one of the state lawmakers he pleaded guilty to bribing: former Senate President Ben Stevens, Ted Stevens' son.

In public charging documents connected to Allen's own case, Ben Stevens is referred to as "State Senator B." Allen himself named Stevens specifically in testimony in the trials last year of two Alaska legislators but has been instructed by government lawyers not to call "State Senator B" by name during the proceedings. Ben Stevens has not been charged with any wrongdoing.

Ted Stevens, who is up for re-election Nov. 4 and faces a spirited Democratic opponent, Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, asked for a speedy trial so he'd have the opportunity to clear his name before Election Day.

Six others testify for prosecution

STATEMENT: Serious health concern cited as reason witness was sent home.

By RICHARD MAUER and ERIKA BOLSTAD
Anchorage Daily News

(10/01/08 01:07:02)

WASHINGTON -- Prosecutors flatly rejected the claims of Sen. Ted Stevens' attorneys that government witness Rocky Williams was sent home to Anchorage to prevent him from helping the defense.

In a sworn statement demanded by the judge in Stevens' trial, the head of the Justice Department's Public Integrity section said it was his decision to send Williams home because he and others in their office had serious concerns about his health.

Williams, who oversaw renovations at Stevens' home in Girdwood for Veco Corp. from 2000-2001, was scheduled to testify for the government in Stevens' trial but prosecutors sent him home the day the trial opened.

Monday, prosecutors drew the ire of U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan, who threatened sanctions and asked for a full explanation of what had happened. Sullivan said he was "flabbergasted" that the government team sent Williams home without telling him or the defense.

Stevens' team seized on the situation, calling for a mistrial and accusing prosecutors of withholding potential testimony from Williams that could help Stevens. They were especially interested in potential evidence that Williams worked far less on the home than the hours recorded in a report by the company's bookkeeper, who testified earlier.

But Welch said that Williams actually made himself available to the defense when he arrived in Washington, about Sept. 15. Williams said he called the firm and left his hotel and cell phone numbers, Welch said. They never called back, he said.

The government said it had planned to call Williams among the first of its witnesses. But when Williams met with government lawyers to prepare for his testimony, it was apparent he had "serious, health-related issues that warranted medical attention." Between his Nov. 7, 2006, grand jury testimony and the present, Williams had become "almost unrecognizable," prosecutors wrote in their filings.

"Mr. Williams had lost a substantial amount of weight, his abdomen was distended (and had been previously drained of excess fluid), he appeared jaundiced, his face was gaunt, he had substantially aged, he had chronic coughing spells, and he was frequently short of breath."

The dispute over Williams dominated the proceedings Monday, although jurors never heard any of the discussions. By Tuesday, though, the Williams matter seemed all but forgotten, aside from the filing of motions and affidavits.

FBI - Stevens-2119

The government breezed through six witnesses on its way to its main witness, former Veco chairman Bill Allen. Each of the six in some way was connected to unreported gifts to Stevens or his alleged efforts to cover them up.

The Republican senator faces seven felony counts of failing to report on his Senate disclosure forms more than $250,000 worth of gifts and home renovations, chiefly from Veco and Allen.

Among the witnesses was a reporter from Wasilla who had a tip that Veco had provided free construction services for Allen and the Stevens press aide who successfully fended off the questions.

Heather Resz, then editor of the Anchorage Chronicle, a weekly owned by Alaska Newspapers Inc., testified she got a strong tip about Veco and Stevens in 2003, but was unable to confirm it through public records or other sources.

She worked on the story, on and off, until 2004. About to give up, she called Courtney Boone, then press secretary for Stevens in Washington, she testified.

"Her initial reaction was that she assured me that the senator was an ethical man," Resz said. But there was one unusual aspect to that call. While Boone normally answered questions off the top of her head, in this case, she said she'd get back. It took two days.

Boone testified that when she got the call, she was "shocked" by the allegation. "I think I said, 'What, are you kidding? Seriously, are you kidding?' "

Boone demanded to know Resz's source and said she might not come back with any information at all unless Resz gave up the name. Resz refused.

Still, Boone knew the problem could be serious, she said. First she told Stevens' chief of staff, then went to Stevens directly. He too expressed shock, she said.

But then he told Boone to get in touch with his wife, whom he said had managed the household finances on the remodel. She also testified that Stevens' friend Bob Persons, the owner of the Double Musky in Girdwood who looked after the project for the Stevenses, called her about the project.

According to an e-mail account of that conversation Boone sent to Stevens, Persons told her the only thing Veco provided was some used pipe for the deck. The rest of the work was handled by Christensen Builders, Boone wrote.

Boone also told Stevens that another aide in his office had spoken with Allen about the call from Resz. Allen said he knew who her source was: "he is a disgruntled foreman who was fired a couple of years ago," Boone wrote.

Four days of testimony in the Stevens case so far shows that Persons knew Veco provided far more than used steel. He has yet to testify, though. The Stevenses paid Christensen about $130,000 for his work, but that was less than half the cost of the entire project, according to the testimony. The rest was picked by Veco.

Even though she knew that Veco provided something, the approved statement Boone prepared for Resz made no mention of the company, which managed the project and provided the architect, electricians, the plumber and carpenters, along with tens of thousands of dollars in material.

"It would've stirred up more questions," Boone testified. "This was a story I would've wanted to put a stop to."

The statement, as Resz read it to the jury, asserted that a general contractor -- presumably Christensen -- "handled all the subcontracting and supply work for the project."

Boone had succeeded. Resz never published a story.

"I closed the file and threw up my hands," Resz testified. "It's another dead end."

Allen: Veco did work, didn't bill Stevens

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER
Anchorage Daily News
(10/01/08 08:30:51)

WASHINGTON _ Taking the stand for the second day, the former chief executive of the Alaska oil services company that renovated Sen. Ted Stevens' home continued to testify about gifts and help with renovations he had given his longtime friend over the years.

Former Veco Corp. CEO Bill Allen, the star witness in the case against Stevens, was asked time and time again: Did Stevens paid for any of the work done by Veco? Did Stevens pay for the electrical work, the plumbing? Did he pay to move the generator? Did he pay for the lower level deck? How about the electrical tape system that melted ice off the roof?

"Who did that work?" asked prosecutor Joe Bottini.

"Veco electricians," Allen said.

"Who paid for the materials?" Bottini asked.

"Veco," Allen said.

Bottini asked whether Stevens ever sought a bill for the work that had been done in 2002. Allen hesitated for a few moments.

"I don't think so," he said slowly.

Stevens, 84, faces seven felony counts of making false statements on his financial disclosure forms. The Alaska Republican is accused of hiding more than $250,000 of gifts from Allen and others, chiefly home improvements that helped double his home in size.

Bottini asked Allen to read portions of a note Stevens sent him in October 2002, thanking Allen for his work on "the chalet." In the note, Stevens told him not to be "P.O.'d," but said that he needed to have a conversation with one of Stevens' neighbors in Girdwood, Bob Persons, a close friend of both who helped oversee the renovation of the senator's home.

"You owe me a bill," the letter from Stevens said. "Remember Torricelli, my friend. Friendship is one thing, compliance with the ethics rules entirely different."

FBI - Stevens-2121

Allen said he was unaware at the time what Stevens meant by "Torricelli." But Stevens was apparently referring to former Sen. Robert Torricelli, D-N.J., who in 2002 was investigated by the Justice Department for accepting improper gifts from a donor. The investigation closed, but the Senate Ethics Committee reviewed the investigative files and issued a public letter of admonishment to Torricelli, who then abandoned a re-election bid and left the Senate.

Allen said he didn't send Stevens a bill or invoice after the note, but as promised in the letter, he did have a conversation with Persons. Allen testified that Persons told him, "Don't worry about getting a bill, Ted's just covering his ass."

Then, realizing the language, might not be appropriate for the courtroom, said "Maybe I shouldn't say that."

Stevens' offer to pay was ignored

FRIEND'S TESTIMONY: Allen says he took senator's request for a bill for Veco's work as just a gesture.

WASHINGTON -- After spending nearly $200,000 of his company's money improving the Girdwood home of Sen. Ted Stevens, Veco chief executive Bill Allen received a note from the senator asking for a bill.

"I asked Bob P to talk to you about this so don't get P.O.'d at him -- it just has to be done right," said the Oct. 6, 2002, handwritten note, entered as a prosecution exhibit Wednesday in Stevens' felony disclosure trial.

Sure enough, said Allen, on the witness stand for the second day, Bob Persons did talk to him. But Persons, a good friend of both men and the owner of the Double Musky restaurant in Girdwood, explained that the note wasn't to be taken seriously -- it's a wink and a nod, not a demand to do the right thing.

"Don't worry about getting a bill -- Ted's just covering his ass," Allen quoted Persons as saying. Then, briefly injecting a moment of levity into an otherwise tense morning, Allen turned to the jury and said, "Maybe I shouldn't have said 'ass.' " The jurors cracked up laughing.

Stevens' supposed request for a bill came on a day of damning testimony by Allen. But the session was cut short at the lunch break by an unexplained issue involving a juror. U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan called a closed-door meeting with attorneys for both sides before recessing for the day. Whether that session was about the juror or other matters couldn't be learned.

But Sullivan said the trial would resume this morning with Allen back on the stand. The government is expected to play three recorded conversations between Allen and Stevens that were made in 2006 after Allen agreed to cooperate in the FBI's sweeping public corruption investigation in Alaska.

Stevens is charged with seven felony counts of failing to report more than $250,000 in gifts, mainly from Allen and Veco, between 1999 and 2006. Allen, the government's star witness, has pleaded guilty to bribing Alaska legislators and is awaiting sentencing.

On Wednesday, Allen's second day of testimony, he recited a litany of work he did for Stevens on the house without ever getting paid.

Allen was asked time and time again by assistant U.S. Attorney Joe Bottini: Did Stevens pay for any of the work done by Veco? Did Stevens pay for the electrical work, the plumbing? Did he pay to move the generator? Did he pay for the lower level deck? How about the electrical tape system that melted ice off the roof?

"Who did that work?" Bottini asked.

"Veco electricians," Allen said.

"Who paid for the materials?" Bottini asked.

"Veco," Allen said.

What about the steel deck and stairs at the back of the house? Veco.

What about the steel log holder.

"I think I had it fabricated at the shop," Allen said.

What about the new steel deck on the third story loft?

"That platform was fabricated at the Veco shop," Allen said.

Who paid for the folding metal escape ladder that went from the loft to the ground?

"Veco did."

Through Allen's testimony and notes and e-mails from Stevens, it became clear that Stevens knew what he was getting -- and appreciated it.

"Many thanks for all you've done to make our living easier and our home more enjoyable," Stevens wrote in a note to Allen dated Nov. 8, 2002.

"When I think of the many ways in which you make my life easier and more enjoyable, I lose count!" he said in the Oct. 2, 2002; note. "Thanks for all the work on the chalet."

"Bill: Bob (Persons) has been filling us in on all the help you've given him on our (remodeling) project," Stevens said in an e-mail on Sept. 24, 2000. "You and Bob have been the spark plugs and we are really pleased with all you have done."

Stevens singled out Rocky Williams, the Veco foreman who oversaw the biggest part of the project in 2000 and 2001 -- jacking up the house and adding a new first floor, a second-story kitchen and a garage.

"And we've never worked with a man so easy to get along with as Rocky," Stevens wrote. "Plus, everyone who's seen the place want know who has done the things he's don

In the November 2002 note, Stevens repeated his request for a bill.

"Don't forget we need a bill for what's been done out at the chalet," Stevens wrote.

Allen said he ignored him again. "I don't know why," he said.

Did you want to send Sen. Stevens a bill? asked Bottini.

"I really didn't want to," Allen said.

"Why not?" asked Bottini.

"Because I wanted to help Ted," he said.

"Why?" Bottini asked.

" 'Cause I like him," Allen said.

Allen began his day of testimony recounting how he first heard that Stevens was dissatisfied with his Girdwood home.

"I think we were on the plane and he said he needed more room," Allen said. Stevens talked about jacking up the cabin and adding a large single room beneath it -- a place for bunk beds primarily for his grandchildren when they came to go skiing at nearby Alyeska Resort.

"I told him we had some jacks," Allen said.

Stevens eventually hired a house mover, not Veco, to lift the house. But as Stevens' wife, Catherine, warmed to the idea of the addition after initially wanting to sell the place, it became clear the project needed an architect, Allen said.

"He told me that Catherine, that she wanted to be in the middle of it," Allen said. "Now she wants to have a house. Before, she never did. (Now) she wants to put her fingerprints on it. He thought that was good. She wanted to have a bigger house."

Allen assigned an engineer with architectural experience to the project, he said.

Catherine Stevens rejected some ideas born from the oil fields where Veco normally worked. Allen thought a grated steel deck on the second story was a great idea because snow would fall through instead of having to be shoveled. She thought it would make the home look like an oil platform, Allen said. So Allen assigned workers to build a wood deck on the second floor, and later another deck on the new first floor to make the house look balanced.

And he fixed problems. With the project completed, he and Stevens would hang out on the ground-floor deck and smoke cigars, he said. When it rained, "the water would be coming down your neck" through the upper deck. The solution? Veco workers put a roof of plastic sheeting between the two decks.

Meanwhile, Veco was getting favors from Stevens, Allen said.

Stevens intervened to get the World Bank to pressure the Pakistani government to pay Veco its share of profits it claimed it was owed on a pipeline there. Stevens intervened with the State Department to pay for training Russians in building oil production modules, a project approved but never put place, Allen said. And Stevens acted on behalf of the company for an Arctic logistics contract with the National Science Foundation, though Allen said he thought he would have been successful without Stevens' help.

Stevens' defense has said that he was doing nothing more than helping constituents -- a normal activity for senators.

Unrelated to Stevens, Allen testified about a previously undisclosed state legislator whom he had bribed, though he didn't provide the lawmaker's name. He also explained for the first time what his son, Mark Allen, might have done to put in him legal jeopardy had Allen not gotten him immunity.

The matter came up as Bottini asked Allen about his deal with the government. Aside from a possible reduction in his 9-to-11 year sentence if he cooperated -- Allen said he didn't trust the government to deliver -- he said his deal bought immunity for Mark and the rest of his family.

When Allen was being debriefed by the government, he said, he didn't mention a suspicion he had about his son: that Mark "got money to this legislator." After that debriefing session, Allen said, he called his son to confirm it.

"Yes, Dad, I did," Allen quoted his son as saying.

"The next thing in the morning, I got ahold of that agent and said I had, and that Mark had."

Allen was directed by the judge not to name any legislator he admitted bribing, in part because one of them was former Senate President Ben Stevens, Ted Stevens' son. The judge ruled such an assertion would be prejudicial to Ted Stevens. However, Allen described the legislator whom he and Mark had paid as "her."

So far, no current or former female legislators have been publicly identified as targets of the FBI's investigation.

Stevens trial will continue, judge rules

WASHINGTON - Prosecutors have seriously bungled evidence and witnesses, but Sen. Ted Stevens' corruption trial will proceed as planned, a federal judge ruled this afternoon.

The case against the Alaska Republican had threatened to collapse earlier in the day when his attorney demanded a mistrial or dismissal of charges over the government's failure to turn over evidence favorable to the senator.

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan was angered at prosecutors for their handling of evidence that might help Stevens' case but was "not persuaded" the violations were serious enough to declare a mistrial. The trial will resume Monday.

Judge Sullivan asked whether the defense attorneys wanted a few extra days before continuing with the trial and suggested they could make a new opening statement to jurors.

"Thank you for asking, but we believe there should be a dismissal," said Stevens' chief lawyer, Brendan Sullivan. "If not a dismissal, then a mistrial."

The chief prosecutor in the case apologized and called her team's oversight a mistake, though she asserted that Stevens' rights weren't violated. The defense team was looking for weaknesses and found one, said Brenda Morris, the lead prosecutor on the Justice Department team.

"They're just trying to make a hole and seep into a crack," she said.

"Dont you think thay have good reason to do that?" asked the judge.

The dispute began Wednesday night when prosecutors handed over notes by an FBI agent of an interview with the main prosecution witness, Bill Allen, the former chief executive of Veco Corp. Stevens is accused of not reporting more than $250,000 in free labor, materials and gifts he received, most of it from Veco, from 1999 to 2006.

Testimony ends in Stevens trial

The agent's notes, on a document known as a Form 302, quoted Allen as saying he thought that Stevens would have paid a bill had he sent him one.

Allen is in the middle of his testimony, and he said Wednesday that he didn't send Stevens a bill for tens of thousands of dollars in repairs and remodeling even though the senator had asked for one at least twice in 2002. Allen testified that one of his good friends told him that Stevens was just "covering his ass" in asking for the bills.

"I can't do my duty to defend my client if the government does not abide by the instructions," Brendan Sullivan said today. He asserted that he would have delivered a different opening statement last week had he known what Allen had told the FBI agent.

"This can't be undone," he thundered, speaking directly up to the judge from a podium less than 10 feet away. Clutching his chest, he said, "My heart's beating twice as fast as it should be for a 66-year-old man. This can't happen in court."

As he accused the prosecution of misconduct, Morris leapt to her feet and got within inches of him, her voiced raised as well.

"He called me out," she told the judge as he tried to calm the situation.

Walking back to the defense table, Brendan Sullivan said, "I called her up, not out."

Morris admitted that she violated the judge's orders in not turning over the document, but not Stevens' rights. She said the defense was told that Allen had said that very thing in a letter on Sept. 9.

A copy of that letter, filed by the defense Thursday afternoon, said:

"Allen stated that he believed that defendant (Stevens) would not have paid the actual costs incurred by VECO, even if Allen had sent the defendant an invoice, because defendant would not have wanted to pay that high of a bill. Allen stated that defendant probably would have paid a reduced invoice if he had received one from Allen or VECO. Allen did not want to give defendant a bill partly because he felt that VECO's costs were higher than they needed to be, and partly because he simply did not want defendant to have to pay."

FBI - Stevens-2127

Morris said the letter was adequate information to the defense.

"He's getting a fair trial, believe me. You're getting a great fair trial," Morris said.

Judge Sullivan said he found the government's claims "unbelievable."

"It strikes me this is probably intentional," he said. "This is the government's chief witness!"

Before the trial, he'd ordered prosecutors to turn over redacted versions of 302 forms.

Morris said the prosecution found that particular 302 as it was preparing for the next round of witnesses. The agent who wrote it is scheduled to testify after Allen, and the prosecution would be required to make the report available to the defense at that time.

In its requirements to present material to the defense, the government operates under several kinds of rules. In one, known as a "Brady" after the Supreme Court decision that created it, the government is required to turn over evidence before the trial that would be favorable to the defendant. A different rule, known as "Jenks," requires the prosecution to provide more detailed notes from agents at the time they testify.

In addition, Judge Sullivan issued an order early in the case requiring the government to provide more material to the defense than Brady usually requires.

Morris said that when members of the prosecution team were preparing Jenks material for the FBI agent, Michelle Pluta, they realized that they should have given the document to the defense sooner under the judge's order.

"We do realize this is a gross error," Morris said. "It wasn't done intentionally by any stretch of the imagination. It was a human error."

The defense filed a heavily redacted version of the 302 Form, dated Feb. 28, 2007, around 1:30 p.m. Thursday, with only a few sentences of Allen's interview readable in the four-page document.

"The source (Allen) did not invoice STEVENS for the work that HESS (the project architect) performed; however, the source believes that STEVENS would have paid an invoice if he had received one."

In another part of the 302, Allen reported that he'd discussed a request by Stevens that he get a bill for plumbing work that Veco did on his house in Girdwood, Alaska.

"STEVENS said 'ethics' (an apparent reference to the Senate Ethics Committee) was on his ass and the source (Allen) needed to get him an invoice. STEVENS said he didn't want the source to go through what JON RUBINI went through with their investment. The source did not provide STEVENS with the requested invoice."

The reference to Rubini concerned a real estate investment in Anchorage that Rubini and his partner in JL Properties, Leonard Hyde, invited Stevens to make. Stevens' $50,000 investment grew to about $1 million in six years and was the subject of extensive news coverage after Stevens pushed the Air Force into approving a separate housing project of Rubini and Hyde's.

New name in federal corruption case

JUSTIN STIEFEL: Agent interviewed him involving Veco payment scheme.

WASHINGTON -- The name of yet another person emerged Thursday in the ever-broadening federal corruption investigation: Justin Stiefel, the former chief of staff and campaign manger for U.S. Sen. Lisa Murkowski.

Justin Stiefel

Stiefel was interviewed by a federal agent over a payment scheme involving Veco when he did work for former Gov. Frank Murkowski's re-election campaign, and, prosecutors say in a footnote, "engaged in criminal conduct."

Stiefel's connection to the corruption case was disclosed in a defense filing in the current case against Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens. Defense lawyers, arguing for a mistrial in Stevens' case, attached to their motion letters from prosecutors to the defense.

In their Aug. 25 and Sept. 9 letters, the federal prosecutors handling the corruption cases list evidence that the defense might use to discredit government witnesses. Prosecutors have to provide that sort of information under federal court rulings.

The filing indicated Stiefel might still be subject to prosecution. Government lawyers said he has not been promised immunity.

FBI - Stevens-2129

Stiefel has run his own Washington, D.C.-area lobbying firm the last few years. Before he worked for Lisa Murkowski, he was a top aide to Stevens.

Reached by phone Thursday, Stiefel said he would have no comment about the court revelations.

Prosecutors say Stiefel was interviewed June 3. He said he performed consulting and polling work for Frank Murkowski's re-election campaign. Murkowski was trying for a second term in 2006 but Sarah Palin beat him in the Republican primary.

As Stiefel explained it, Veco was supposed to pay Murkowski's polling company for Stiefel's work, in essence laundering the source of the money, prosecutors say in the Sept. 9 letter.

"Stiefel stated he agreed with (Veco executive) Rick Smith to have Veco pay a polling company for services performed by Stiefel and charged to the polling company. Stiefel stated this was done so that payments would not go directly from Veco to Stiefel. Stiefel further stated he never received any payment from Veco or the polling company."

Defense lawyers blacked out much of the information in the Aug. 25 letter before filing it in court. But they left a footnote about Stiefel.

"During the course of the investigation, the government independently learned that Stiefel had engaged in criminal conduct. (Stiefel) also initially made a false statement to a government agent during an interview. Stiefel later corrected the false statement during the same interview. Stiefel has not been promised immunity from prosecution for this conduct."

The letter didn't say what polling company Stiefel was connected with.

Dave Dittman, who handled Murkowski's polling until the last few weeks of the campaign, said Stiefel never worked for him. Likewise, said Bill McConkey, who wrote radio and television ads for Frank Murkowski. McConkey once was a big player in Alaska politics, working for Republicans. He now lives in Wisconsin, where he's a university instructor and operates a consulting business.

Veco Corp. is the former oil field services and construction company that has been at the center of most of the Alaska corruption cases. Smith, a Veco vice president, and Bill Allen, the company chairman, both have pleaded guilty to bribing Alaska legislators. Allen is the government's star witness in the case against Stevens, accused of hiding about $250,000 in home improvements and gifts, most from Allen and Veco.

The case against the Alaska Republican had threatened to collapse earlier in the day when his attorney demanded a mistrial or dismissal of charges over the government's failure to turn over evidence favorable to the senator.

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan, who Thursday morning was furious with prosecutors, said later in the day at a hearing that he was still angry but "not persuaded" that the violations were serious enough to declare a mistrial.

The trial, which paused Thursday while the dispute over evidence was resolved, will resume Monday.

Judge Sullivan asked whether the defense wanted a few extra days before continuing with the case, and he suggested that Stevens' lawyers could make a new opening statement to jurors. He even offered to tell the jury that the new opening was made necessarily by a government error.

FBI FORM 302

It was the second time in a week that Judge Sullivan has reprimanded the prosecution team. He earlier became upset when the government sent a key witness home to Alaska without testifying and without informing the court or defense until the man left town. Prosecutors said the man, Rocky Williams, a foreman on the project to expand Stevens' home in Girdwood, was seriously ill.

The new dispute began Wednesday night when prosecutors handed over notes an FBI agent took of an interview with the main prosecution witness, Bill Allen, the former chief executive officer of Veco Corp. Stevens is accused of not reporting more than $250,000 in free labor, materials and gifts he received, most of it from Veco, from 1999 to 2006.

The agent's notes, on a document known as a Form 302, quoted Allen as saying he thought that Stevens would have paid a bill had he sent him one.

Allen is in the middle of his testimony, and he said Wednesday that he didn't send Stevens a bill for tens of thousands of dollars in repairs and remodeling even though the senator had asked for one at least twice in 2002. Allen testified that one of his good friends told him that Stevens was just "covering his ass" in asking for the bills.

"I can't do my duty to defend my client if the government does not abide by the instructions," Brendan Sullivan said Thursday. He said he would have delivered a different opening statement last week had he known what Allen had told the FBI agent.

"This can't be undone!" he thundered, speaking directly up to the judge from a podium less than 10 feet away. Clutching his chest, he said, "My heart's beating twice as fast as it should be for a 66-year-old man. This can't happen in court."

As he accused the prosecution of misconduct, Morris leapt to her feet and got within inches of him, her voiced raised as well.

"He called me out," she told the judge as he tried to calm the situation.

Walking back to the defense table, Brendan Sullivan said, "I called her up, not out."

Morris admitted that she violated the judge's orders in not turning over the document, but not Stevens' rights. She said the defense was told that Allen had said that very thing in a letter on Sept. 9.

A copy of that letter, filed by the defense Thursday afternoon, said:

"Allen stated that he believed that defendant (Stevens) would not have paid the actual costs incurred by VECO, even if Allen had sent the defendant an invoice, because defendant would not have wanted to pay that high of a bill. Allen stated that defendant probably would have paid a reduced invoice if he had received one from Allen or VECO. Allen did not want to give defendant a bill partly because he felt that VECO's costs were higher than they needed to be, and partly because he simply did not want defendant to have to pay."

Morris said the letter was adequate information to the defense.

"He's getting a fair trial, believe me. You're getting a great fair trial," Morris said.

On Thursday morning, Judge Sullivan said he found the government's claims "unbelievable."

"It strikes me this is probably intentional," he said. "This is the government's chief witness!"

Before the trial, he'd ordered prosecutors to turn over redacted versions of 302 forms. Morris said the prosecution found that particular 302 as it was preparing for the next round of witnesses. The agent who wrote it is scheduled to testify after Allen, and the prosecution would be required to make the report available to the defense at that time.

'A GROSS ERROR'

In its requirements to present material to the defense, the government operates under several kinds of rules. In one, known as a "Brady" after the Supreme Court decision that created it, the government is required to turn over evidence before the trial that would be favorable to the defendant. A different rule, known as "Jencks" from the statute that created it, requires the prosecution to provide more detailed notes from agents at the time they testify.

In addition, Judge Sullivan issued an order early in the case requiring the government to provide more material to the defense than Brady usually requires.

Morris said late Thursday that prosecutors had reported their own Brady violation to the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility, which investigates allegations of misconduct by its attorneys.

She said that when members of the prosecution team were preparing Jencks material for the FBI agent, Michelle Pluta, they realized that they should have given the document to the defense sooner under the judge's order.

"We do realize this is a gross error," Morris said. "It wasn't done intentionally by any stretch of the imagination. It was a human error."

The defense team on Thursday afternoon received all 100 of the 302 Forms connected to the Stevens portion of the sweeping Alaska corruption investigation. Most are just one page, Morris said, but some are as long as 10 pages. It also received transcripts of all relevant grand jury testimony.

Defense renews its bid to dismiss Stevens trial

MOTION: Judge orders government to file its response by 8 a.m. today.

By TOM HAYS
The Associated Press
Published: October 6th, 2008 01:44 AM
Last Modified: October 6th, 2008 01:48 AM

WASHINGTON -- Attorneys for Sen. Ted Stevens on Sunday renewed their effort to get a federal corruption case against the veteran Alaska lawmaker thrown out, saying prosecutors manipulated the story of their star witness to undermine the defense.

"Until today, defense counsel have refrained from alleging intentional misconduct by the government," the lawyers wrote in court papers. "We can no longer do so in good conscience."

U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan rejected a similar bid for a mistrial or dismissal on Friday after prosecutors said they would share with the defense documents they claimed were mistakenly withheld.

Stevens, 84, is charged with lying on senate financial disclosure forms about more than $250,000 in home renovations and other gifts from oil pipeline magnate Bill Allen. The senator's trial is expected to continue today with Allen returning to the witness stand.

FBI - Stevens-2134

The latest motion to end the trial says the newly disclosed documents show Allen originally told investigators he believed Stevens would have paid for work on a mountain cabin if billed -- proof, the defense says, that the senator never intended to hide anything.

Rather than turn over the first statement to the defense as required by rules of evidence, the government "intentionally procured from Allen a contradictory statement" and then "concealed its actions" from the court, the defense papers say.

There was no immediate response to messages left with the Justice Department, which is prosecuting the case.

Judge Sullivan late Sunday ordered the government to file its response by 8 a.m. today. He scheduled a hearing on the defense motion for 9 a.m.

Testifying as part of a deal in which he pleaded guilty to bribing state legislators, Allen has told jurors he did not have the heart to bill his buddy for the work done by his company, Veco Corp. Stevens sometimes asked for bills, Allen said. But Allen said he was informed by a mutual friend that the senator made the requests simply to cover his tracks.

Lawyers for Stevens say the lawmaker relied on his wife to pay tens of thousands of dollars in bills on the remodeling project, and believed the job was above board. They claim Allen, who was overseeing the work while the senator was away, kept Stevens in the dark about the cost of extras such as wraparound decks, a Viking gas grill and fancy outdoor lighting.

Much of Allen's testimony focused on construction at the ski chalet and what Stevens knew about it. But the self-made multimillionaire also spun a folksy back story of a deep kinship ultimately destroyed by a sudden betrayal.

Allen, 71, spoke in a halting drawl that, he told jurors, was caused by lingering brain damage from a motorcycle accident. He described his steady rise from an apprentice welder in New Mexico to owner of an Alaska-based company with 5,000 employees. He said he first met the patriarch of Alaska politics in the early 1980s while attending political fundraisers.

As the years went by, the pair grew close. They smoked cigars together at Stevens' cabin. They fished for salmon. They flew to the Lower 48 for "boot camp" outings where they gave up hard liquor and heavy food for wine and light meals, and did lots of walking to get in shape.

"We kind of really liked each other," Allen testified as Stevens sat at the defense table with a frown etched on his face. "Had the same thoughts. ... Ted loved Alaska and I loved Alaska."

Handwritten notes from Stevens entered as evidence suggest the admiration was mutual. One note thanked Allen for the "many ways you make my life easier and more enjoyable."

Allen testified Stevens used his Senate seat to help VECO try to win lucrative government contracts and oil deals in the late 1990s. Defense lawyers insist their client merely was doing his duty to assist a constituent.

By 2006, the FBI had Allen under investigation for lining the pockets of state legislators voting on a pipeline project. After agents arrived unannounced at his doorstep that year, Allen agreed to cooperate -- even letting them record phone calls with Stevens -- so long as they did not pursue any charges against his family.

The investigators asked him "to help them to try to get the guys I bribed, and they told me if I did that they wouldn't mess with my kids," he said. "That was it, I guess."

WASHINGTON - In secretly recorded telephone conversations played in court today, Sen. Ted Stevens denied wrongdoing and cursed at the federal agents who were raiding homes and offices in Alaska as part of a sweeping corruption probe.

"I don't know what the (expletive) these guys are doing. We'll have to figure that out later," Stevens said to Bill Allen, chief executive of the oil services firm Veco Corp.

But Stevens also offered up advice on maintaining a good attitude in the face of the investigation to Allen, the man who - unknown to Stevens -- had agreed to testify against the senator in exchange for leniency in his own sentencing and the promise prosecutors wouldn't target his children.

They needed to maintain the attitude that "these guys can't really hurt us," Stevens said to Allen.

"They're not going to shoot us; it's not Iraq, so what the hell," Stevens said. "The worst that can happen to us is we wind up with a bunch of legal fees and might lose, and we might have to pay a little fine, might have to serve a little time in jail. I hope to Christ it never gets to that, and I don't think it will."

"I'm developing the attitude that I don't think I did anything wrong, so I'm going to go right through my life and keep doing what I think is right," the senator said.

Two years after that conversation, Stevens, now 84 and up for re-election, is on trial for taking more than $250,000 in gifts -

Testimony ends in Stevens trial

The first of the three recordings played today in court as part of Allen's testimony was made Aug. 31, 2006. That was one day after the FBI searched Allen's home and office and he agreed to cooperate with investigators in the Alaska corruption investigation. In 2007, Allen pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers.

In conversations played in court, Stevens told Allen the investigation was weighing on his mind so heavily that he wasn't sleeping well.

"Well, I'm not getting much sleep when I think about all this (expletive) that's going down, about four hours a night," Stevens said in the 2006 phone call. "But I'm going to survive. I just can't figure out why these (expletive) are doing this thing to our friends."

The Alaska Republican also was equally insistent he had done no wrong, telling Allen that his own lawyers had warned him about Martha Stewart, who Stevens described as going to prison not for what she had done but because "she lied about a conversation she had with somebody."

"I don't think we've done anything wrong, Bill, I can tell you right now," Stevens said. "I told my lawyers I can't think of a thing of we've done that's wrong."

On cross examination later in the day, Stevens' main lawyer, Brendan Sullivan, zeroed in quickly on the heart of their defense strategy: The senator is an honorable man who pays his debts and would have written a check for the home renovations had he known he owed Veco or Allen any money.

"You never tried to bribe Sen. Ted Stevens, did you, sir?"

"No," Allen said.

"You knew you couldn't bribe Sen. Ted Stevens, could you, sir?"

"No."

Allen's testimony, which is at the center of the trial against Stevens, began last week. The trial nearly derailed Thursday after Stevens' lawyers accused prosecutors of hiding evidence that Allen might have said things that would have helped Stevens win his case. They included notes from an FBI interview in which Allen told the investigator he thought Stevens would have paid a bill had he ever sent him one.

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan, furious with the government team, ruled that prosecutors had bungled the evidence but that there was not enough misconduct to declare a mistrial or throw out the charges.

The trial, on hold for two days last week, restarted this morning with Allen's testimony. Before they played the audio recordings, prosecutor Joe Bottini walked Allen through a series of questions about gifts he'd given Stevens, including furniture, a bed and free labor on repairs to his boiler in 2006.

Allen testified about fixing the boiler in 2006 and how when he got the bill from Chugach Sewer and Drain, he didn't think it was right for Stevens to have to pay the labor costs since the plumber had screwed up the installation. The invoice read, "Labor paid by Bill."

That caused problems, Allen testified.

"I didn't want that saying that I was going to take care of the labor," he said, saying that he talked to mutual friend of Stevens' and his, Bob Persons, about the invoice. "It's going to be a mess, I didn't want this invoice going around for everybody, like a secretary, and Chugach Sewer and Drain."

Stevens did inquire about the bill, Allen said, but he never gave it to him.

"Did he ever ask you how much the labor charges were?" Bottini asked.

"Not that I can remember, no," Allen said.

But Stevens' attorney elicited a slightly different response from Allen when he asked about the exact same invoice.

"When Ted Stevens saw that notation, on the bill that he got in Washington, he called your secretary, Linda Croft, and told her to tell you he wanted the full bill, didn't he?" Brendan Sullivan asked.

"Yes," Allen said.

"And your secretary called you and told you exactly what Ted Stevens said, am I correct?"

"Yes," Allen said.

Brendan Sullivan also asked him whether Stevens insisted on paying his share when they dined together, and whether the senator reimbursed Allen when he flew on a Veco charter. He also brought up the racehorse stake the two had with other partners.

"Isn't it true that with respect to those little ventures you had, Ted Stevens always insisted on paying all of them money that was properly his share?"

"Yes," Allen said.

Stevens' lawyer also asked Allen whether he had told FBI agents that Stevens would he have paid a bill if he sent him an invoice. "I had no idea how much, but if it had been an invoice that was fair, I think Ted would have paid it," he said.

The awkward question-and-answer session was slowed by Allen's claims he was having difficulty hearing through the voice-amplification system he was using. He also sparred with Brendan Sullivan.

"You're not going to get me mad, are you?" Allen said.

"No," Sullivan said, adding that Allen would know if he were trying to provoke him.

"You're not going to get me mad," Allen said, smiling.

But Judge Sullivan was suspicious about Allen's demeanor and, once the jury had gone home for the day, called out to Allen's lawyer, Robert Bundy of Anchorage, in the audience. Bundy was signaling to Allen, the judge said, and threatened to hold him in contempt. He also suggested that Allen wasn't being entirely truthful about his hearing problems.

"It's entirely inappropriate; I can't imagine an attorney doing that," the judge said, adding later, "It's clear to me what I saw. It's really disturbing."

Bottini, who is an assistant U.S. attorney in Anchorage, vouched for Bundy and said he had known him for years. He "would be quite surprised if that was an intentional gesture on his part," Bottini said. It didn't appear Allen was looking at Bundy at the time.

Outside the courtroom, Stevens' lawyers continued to hammer at Allen's credibility as a witness, filing a second motion late Sunday asking the judge to declare a mistrial. This time, they accuse the prosecutors of deliberate misconduct and said they've manipulated Allen to elicit the testimony most damaging to Stevens.

Judge Sullivan will hold a hearing Tuesday or Wednesday on the new request for a mistrial. The judge has already twice reprimanded the prosecution team. He earlier became upset when the government sent a key witness home to Alaska without testifying and without informing the court or defense until the man left town. Prosecutors said the man, Rocky Williams, a foreman on the project to expand Stevens' home in Girdwood, was seriously ill.

TED STEVENS: I'm not going to let these guys get us in a position where they can charge us with something just because we didn't do what they think we should do. They've got to go out make the case that we did something that is against the law. I don't think we have violated the law."

BILL ALLEN: I don't think we have either, Ted. But ... that lawyer has grilled me and grilled me on what they think they can do. He talks to them, I don't."

STEVENS: That's, that's the way it should be. But as a practical matter, the question is, what can they convince the jury, uh grand jury, to charge us with? That's the problem. But when I was a district attorney, I handled grand juries, lots of them. They're funny people, but they also are people from within the community. And your reputation and everything else comes into play, as far as grand juries are concerned ... We ought to just cool it. I told Ben the same thing: just cool it, you know, go about our business and smile and have a happy face ... Do the things you used to do and just keep going. If it's a violation of the elections law, that's a corporate violation. This thing, it shouldn't, it shouldn't get to your mind, old buddy."

us. And we're gonna win it because we didn't do anything wrong. You've got a right to spend all the money you got to support the party you believe in.

ALLEN: Yeah, I know.

STEVENS: You remember that. No one can tell you you spent too much money.

ALLEN: Right.

STEVENS: The question is whether you did something illegal and I don't think you did. I have a little problem about Rick Smith from some of the things I'm hearing. I don't know if you're hearing that, but the things he's done down in Juneau may have been a little bit on the edge. But we'll stick with him. I'm not tossing him to the wolves, don't misunderstand me.

STEVENS: When I was talking to my lawyers, they told me that we, we ought to avoid trying to look like we're meeting in a situation where we wouldn't be overheard or having no one with us. They point out that, what's her name, that woman that uh, who went to jail, Martha Stewart?

ALLEN: Yeah.

STEVENS: She didn't go to, to jail because she did something wrong. She went to jail because she lied about a conversation she had with somebody.

ALLEN: Uh huh.

STEVENS: They say we should have no problem ... we can meet, you know have dinner, or what not. But we should not try to look like we're going to try to try to keep things from the world. And he, they said we ought to really lay low right now, because this grand jury is meeting. And if they got wind that it looked like we were going try to, you know, do what they call obstruct justice, they could call us before the grand jury on a different, different thing all together.

STEVENS: For what?

ALLEN: Uh, with, with Ben and trying to figure out, y'know, what ... what kind of ... you know, what he done for us.

STEVENS: I see. Ok.

ALLEN: And ...

STEVENS: Well, I ...

ALLEN: And uh, they asked me what I done on your house....

STEVENS: Yeah?

ALLEN: And I said, well, he's paid for everything and uh, you know, you don't ... you don't need this problem again, Ted, but that's what they're, uh, talking me ... and I just told 'em I wouldn't talk to 'em.

Stevens evidence on tape played for jury

Senator maintains innocence in profanity-laced conversations with friend working for the FBI

But the recordings also provided insight into how Stevens has maintained his presence in Washington and Alaska without shrinking in shame or embarrassment despite the long, public investigation and then his seven-count felony indictment in July.

"You've got to get a mental attitude that these guys can't really hurt us," Stevens told Allen on Oct. 18, 2006, not knowing that Allen had been secretly working for the FBI for nearly two months.

Stevens' defense rests

Testimony ends in Stevens trial

The three audio recordings, totaling about 30 minutes, were the first played in Stevens' felony disclosure trial, now entering its second full week of testimony. Later this week, prosecutors say they plan to introduce recordings made on wiretaps on Allen's phones before he knew he was a suspect.

The recordings are nothing like the videos in the trials last year, where Allen and another Veco official could be seen reaching for hundred-dollar bills to stuff in the outstretched hands of state legislators, who were later convicted.

Stevens, now 84 and up for re-election, is on trial for taking more than $250,000 in gifts -- chiefly from Veco -- and lying about them on his U.S. Senate financial disclosure forms.

Prosecutors finished their direct examination of Allen at the end of the lunch break Monday, and he was handed over to chief defense counsel Brendan Sullivan. Over three hours of cross-examination, Sullivan tried to chip away at the government's case.

The main theme was Allen acknowledging that Stevens would have paid at least a fair price for much of the work done on his home by Veco -- had Stevens been billed. Allen also told of how some of the things he got for Stevens, like strands of outside house and tree lights for the winter, or big pieces of new and used furniture, were not solicited by Stevens and may not have been wanted.

"You never tried to bribe Sen. Ted Stevens, did you, sir?" asked Sullivan

"No," Allen said.

"You knew you couldn't bribe Sen. Ted Stevens, could you, sir?"

"No."

But the charges faced by Stevens were not that he was bribed or that he asked to get something for nothing. Rather, he's charged with failing to report gifts under ethics laws enacted by Congress.

The main effort by the prosecution so far has been to offer evidence that Stevens obtained tens of thousands of dollars of valuable services, materials and useful items from Veco and Allen, and knew about it. The defense so far has been that the government's accounting of those services was overstated, that the gifts weren't wanted, that the work was faulty and that Stevens wasn't given the opportunity to pay.

The first recording played Monday with Allen on the stand was made Aug. 31, 2006. That was the day that the FBI conducted a coordinated series of raids on legislative offices, including the office of Stevens' son, then-state Senate President Ben Stevens. It was also one day after Allen began cooperating with federal authorities.

Allen's call appeared to be the first that Ted Stevens heard of the raids. Allen reached Stevens on his cell phone while he was walking down a hill in San Francisco with his wife, Catherine.

Allen told him the FBI was asking about his "consulting" payments to Ben and Veco's renovations to Stevens' house in Girdwood.

"And I just told them I wouldn't talk to them," Allen lied.

"Yeah, OK. Good," said Stevens. He told Allen he had an "inkling" something was up, but by his descriptions in that conversation and others, seemed to think it was about Veco's campaign contributions, not gifts or, in the case of legislators, bribes.

In the Oct. 18, 2006, call, Stevens told Allen his son, in the last two months of his term, wasn't able to get the investigation out of his mind and it was threatening to affect his family.

"He's got to stop being just so depressed because it'll spring over to the kids. He's going to do all right. When his term finishes, we'll get some funds to help him pay his law firm, his legal fees. But he's got a tough row to hoe," Stevens said.

In the Sept. 10, 2006, call, Stevens said he was also emotionally affected by the investigation.

"Well, I'm not getting much sleep when I think about all this (expletive) that's going down, about four hours a night," Stevens said. "But I'm going to survive. I just can't figure out why these (expletive) are doing this thing to our friends."

Stevens also was equally insistent he broke no laws.

"I don't think we've done anything wrong, Bill, I can tell you right now," Stevens said. "I told my lawyers I can't think of a thing we've done that's wrong."

Allen's testimony, at the center of the trial against Stevens, began last week. The trial nearly derailed Thursday after Stevens' lawyers accused prosecutors of hiding evidence that Allen might have said things that would have helped Stevens win his case. They included notes from an FBI interview in which Allen told the investigator he thought Stevens would have paid a bill had he ever sent him one.

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan ruled that prosecutors had bungled the disclosure of evidence to the defense, but that there was not enough misconduct to declare a mistrial or throw out the charges.

The trial, on hold over the evidence question, resumed Monday with Allen still on the stand, and he'll be there again this morning for more cross-examination. Before prosecutors played the audio recordings, assistant U.S. Attorney Joe Bottini of Anchorage walked Allen through a series of questions about gifts he'd given Stevens, including furniture, a bed and free labor on repairs to his boiler in 2006.

Allen testified about fixing the boiler in 2006, and how when he got the bill from Chugach Sewer and Drain, he didn't think it was right for Stevens to have to pay the labor costs, since the plumber had initially installed a circulation pump backward. On the invoice, it read "labor paid by Bill."

That caused problems, Allen testified.

"I didn't want that saying that I was going to take care of the labor," he said, saying that he talked to mutual friend of Stevens' and his, Bob Persons, about the invoice. "It's going to be a mess, I didn't want this invoice going around for everybody, like a secretary, and Chugach Sewer and Drain."

Stevens did inquire about the bill, Allen said, but he never gave him it.

But Brendan Sullivan, Stevens' attorney, elicited a slightly different response from Allen when he asked about the same invoice in cross-examination.

"When Ted Stevens saw that notation, on the (parts) bill that he got in Washington, he called your secretary, Linda Croft, and told her to tell you he wanted the full bill, didn't he?" Brendan Sullivan asked.

"Yes," Allen said.

"And your secretary called you and told you exactly what Ted Stevens said, am I correct?"

"Yes," Allen said.

When Allen built his own home and moved out of an apartment, he filled several rooms of Stevens' home with his old furniture. Allen, a tall, big man, had large, comfortable living room furniture that overwhelmed the Girdwood home, Allen acknowledged under questioning as monitors around the courtroom displayed a particularly wide chair.

"You're not an interior decorator?" Sullivan asked.

"No," said Allen.

"Did they tell you he (Stevens) couldn't sit in the chair because his feet didn't touch the ground?"

"No, they were too polite," Allen said.

Sullivan also asked him about whether Stevens insisted on paying his share when they dined together, and whether the senator reimbursed Allen when he flew on a Veco charter. He also brought up the racehorse stake the two had with other partners.

"Isn't it true that with respect to those little ventures you had, Ted Stevens always insisted on paying all of them money that was properly his share?"

"Yes," Allen said.

Stevens' lawyer also asked Allen whether he had told FBI agents that Stevens would have paid a bill if he sent him an invoice. "I had no idea how much, but if it had been an invoice that was fair, I think Ted would have paid it," he said.

The awkward question-and-answer session was slowed as Allen complained of having difficulty hearing through the voice-amplification system he was using. He also sparred with Brendan Sullivan.

"You're not going to get me mad, are you?" Allen said.

"No," Sullivan said, adding that Allen would know if he were trying to provoke him.

"You're not going to get me mad," Allen said, smiling.

But Judge Sullivan was suspicious about Allen's demeanor. With the jury still in, he pointed to a lawyer in the front row of the spectator's section, Robert Bundy of Anchorage, and said he saw him signaling to Allen and demanded at once that he stop. A marshal moved to the aisle one row behind Bundy and stood there till the next recess.

With the jury gone but the room still filled with lawyers, reporters and other spectators, Sullivan demanded Bundy, Allen's attorney, identify himself. Sullivan threatened Bundy with a contempt citation and an ouster from the courtroom.

"It's entirely inappropriate, I can't imagine an attorney doing that," the judge said, adding later, "It's clear to me what I saw. It's really disturbing."

Bottini, who is an assistant U.S. attorney in Anchorage, vouched for Bundy and said he had known him for years. He "would be quite surprised if that was an intentional gesture on his part," Bottini said. It didn't appear Allen was looking at Bundy at the time.

Outside of the courtroom, Stevens' lawyers continued to hammer at Allen's credibility as a witness, filing a second motion late Sunday asking the judge to declare a mistrial. This time, they accused the prosecutors of deliberate misconduct and said they've manipulated Allen to elicit the testimony most damaging to Stevens.

Judge Sullivan will hold a hearing today or Wednesday on the new request for a mistrial.

WASHINGTON - The attorney representing Bill Allen, the star witness in Sen. Ted Stevens' corruption trial, was scolded further Tuesday morning by the judge overseeing the case.Anchorage attorney Robert Bundy, who has been sitting in the spectator section of the courtroom in Washington while his client has been testifying, was accused Monday by the judge of trying to signal to Allen on the stand and help him answer questions from a defense attorney.

"I couldn't believe what I was seeing," U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan said Tuesday morning, in something of a sideshow before the trial began for the day. "That's borderline obstruction of justice."

Bundy's colleague, Creighton Magid, said Tuesday morning that the Anchorage lawyer and former U.S. attorney is "absolutely torn up by this" and "vehemently" denied signaling to his client.

Monday, at the close of proceedings but with the jury still in the courtroom, Judge Sullivan pointed to Bundy, said he saw him signaling to Allen, and demanded he stop. A marshal moved to the aisle one row behind Bundy and waited there until the next recess.

Judge Sullivan raised the matter again Tuesday morning, asking for Bundy to appear in the courtroom, but he was not there. Magid spoke on Bundy's behalf and also said he would represent Allen's interest in court today.

Stevens' chief lawyer, Brendan Sullivan, said he wasn't planning to say anything about what his own team had seen the day before, but since the judge had brought it up, he would. Stevens' personal lawyer, Bob Phillips, told one of the lawyers on the defense team Monday that he also had observed some sort of communication between Bundy in the courtroom and Allen on the stand, Sullivan said in court Tuesday.

"He was so distressed at what he saw, that he got up and signaled one of our young lawyers to mention what had happened," Brendan Sullivan said.

Stevens' lawyer also said that he received a call Monday night from Magid, asking him whether he objected to Bundy being in the courtroom during Allen's testimony. Brendan Sullivan told the judge that he told Magid on Monday night that he didn't want Bundy in the courtroom.

But prosecutors vouched for Bundy, calling him a "stellar" attorney. The accusations by the defense were just another "scurrilous" attempt to stir up trouble in the case and smear Bundy's name, said the chief prosecutor, Brenda Morris. It will be in Alaska newspapers now, Morris said, and will open up Bundy to the kind of hate mail she's received from people in the state.

Magid, too, said he was concerned that it had already been mentioned in the Anchorage Daily News. His colleague is an honorable former federal prosecutor who sits on the ethics committee of the Alaska Bar Association, Magid said.

"To have shots taken at Mr. Bundy and him not in the position to defend himself, I think is fundamentally unfair," Magid said.

That's true, Judge Sullivan acknowledged. The judge also conceded it was also possible that "maybe he was shaking his head in disbelief at something else."

Later this morning, when cross-examination of Allen resumed in the courtroom, Brendan Sullivan asked Allen whether he had seen Bundy in the courtroom Monday, and asked whether Allen saw him nodding his head when he gave certain answers.

"No," Allen said, "no, he did not do that."

Judge Sullivan said he didn't want the issue to be a distraction from the trial, but also said he wasn't content to let the issue rest and may ask for some sort of statement from the other attorney who witnessed the signals. He refused on Tuesday to rule out any sanctions.

Stevens friends plotted to cover bills

WASHINGTON - Sen. Ted Stevens' friends went out of their way to help pay his bills, according to court testimony today, even conspiring to cover up how much they paid for something as minor as plumbing repairs at his home in Girdwood.

Sen. Ted Stevens leaves U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., Oct. 6, 2008.

"I'll just tell Ted to give me a check," his friend Bill Allen said in a conversation secretly recorded in 2006 by FBI agents investigating corruption in Alaska politics.

"You don't have to deposit it, you just have to make a copy of it," said Stevens' friend Robert Persons, who kept an eye on Stevens' home when he was out of town. "Then if it ever did come up, you can say, 'I didn't deposit that? Hell, I know I did.' "

The telephone conversations, played in court today near the end of the prosecution case against the senator, came as close to a smoking gun as Stevens' corruption trial has had. Stevens, 84, is on trial for lying on his Senate financial disclosure forms about more than $250,000 in gifts and renovations to his home in Girdwood in recent years. The gifts were largely from Veco Corp. and its chief executive, Allen, who now is the star witness in a corruption trial that's been under way since Sept. 22.

Prosecutors have been working to establish a case that time after time, Stevens took gifts even though he knew he should have paid his own way.

But they've stumbled in their presentations, and Stevens' defense team has accused them of withholding evidence that would have been helpful to the senator's defense. Stevens' lawyers have tried twice now to have the charges thrown out and will argue again today in front of the judge for a mistrial.

Today, Brendan Sullivan, Stevens' lead defense attorney, continued to tear into the government's case when he cross-examined Allen, who has already pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers in Alaska. Sullivan worked to leave jurors with the impression that Allen deliberately held back information from Stevens about bills, and that the senator would have paid them had he ever been sent an invoice.

Brendan Sullivan also sought to dismiss the idea that Veco got special benefits when Stevens came to the company's defense over a pipeline in Pakistan, a labor training program for Russians, a logistics contract with the National Science Foundation and support for a proposed natural gas pipeline.

Sullivan today questioned Allen about his plea deal with the government and the risks that his lack of cooperation would disrupt the sale of Veco last year to CH2M Hill, the international engineering and construction firm based in Colorado. The company withheld $70 million from the cash they paid the owners of Veco -- Allen, his three children and two top executives -- to protect against contingencies, including the possibility Veco itself would be indicted.

But prosecutors came back swinging with the recordings this afternoon. Jurors paid close attention to the conversations between Allen and Persons and openly guffawed at the salty exchanges.

Prosecutors also played conversations highlighting Stevens' legendary tight-fistedness. Persons, Allen and Stevens were part of a horse racing venture and it was difficult to pry money out of the senator for it, his friends joked in their recorded conversations. Even Stevens' wife, Catherine, acknowledged it, the two joked.

"As Catherine says, Ted gets hysterical when he has to spend his own money," Persons said, chuckling. "He gets hysterical because he can't really afford to pay a bunch of money, I think."

"I know," Allen said.

One of the conversations shows the two were especially irritated in early 2006 after Allen sent a plumber he knew to make emergency repairs to Stevens' boiler. The plumber sent an invoice for his work with the notation "Labor paid by Bill" that Persons forwarded on to Stevens.

Stevens saw the notation and got annoyed, according to testimony. He sent Allen's secretary an e-mail saying he wanted to pay the whole bill, including labor costs. Allen had had it split in two so that he paid the $1,080 in labor and Stevens got the $1,187 bill for parts.

On Feb. 16, Allen called Persons to ask him why the bill went to Stevens marked with "labor paid by Bill."

"Oh (expletive), I didn't even see this, oh, labor paid by Bill. Ouch. I didn't see that, I'm sorry," Persons said.

"Oh (expletive)," Allen said.

"Well, it went straight to his house," Persons said.

"Yeah, but I got an email from ... that he's got to talk to me," Allen said, "and I've already taken care of that (expletive) bill."

"I just looked at that and I didn't...son of a bitch. I know you didn't want him to know that, did you?" Persons said.

"Well, that, and I didn't want everybody to know," Allen said.

Allen testified earlier in the day that although Stevens initially offered to pay him, Allen never sent him an invoice, and Stevens never again offered to pay.

But he also testified that he thought Stevens wanted to pay. Allen said he remembered having a conversation about the amount of work Veco had done on his house, as the two men were getting into Allen's car outside the Double Musky Inn, the restaurant in Girdwood owned by Persons. "He said, 'I know you're putting more work in there than what you're saying,' " Allen said.

Investigators had been recording Allen's conversations secretly for some time as part of their investigation, but he was not aware of it until Aug. 30, 2006, when the FBI searched his home and office and accused him of bribing state lawmakers. Allen agreed to cooperate with prosecutors and record some conversations with Stevens. Some of those were played during Monday's testimony.

The prosecution is expected to wrap up its case Wednesday, when the judge overseeing the case will also hear a motion by Stevens' legal team for a mistrial.

STEVENS TRIAL: Senator's friends tried to cover up plumbing work.

WASHINGTON -- Two of Sen. Ted Stevens' best friends went into a panic in 2006 when they learned a plumber had mailed a bill showing that one of them -- Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen -- had paid more than $1,000 of his own money to fix Stevens' boiler.

The Feb. 16, 2006, telephone conversation between Allen and Double Musky owner Bob Persons, intercepted in an FBI wiretap and played in court Tuesday, unveiled the two men plotting a cover-up of the plumber's honest transgression -- a scheme to first destroy the evidence, then create a cover story that would have required Stevens' participation.

"We need to get the guy at Chugach Sewer & Drain to make that disappear from his records," Persons told Allen. Then, Persons said, working out the plot as he spoke, Allen should get Stevens to write a check to him for the exact amount.

"You don't have to cash it -- just have it," Persons said. "You don't have to deposit it, just have to make a copy of it. ... And then if it ever did come up, you can say, 'I didn't deposit that? Hell, I know I did. I don't know where it went.' " Both men broke out in laughter at the thought of fooling a newspaper reporter or government investigator.

Jurors laughed too -- but it was like the last laugh at two men caught in the act.

FBI - Stevens-2152

There was no evidence presented that Stevens ever wrote the phony check, but the two friends expressed no doubts he would if asked.

The phone call was the closest thing so far to a smoking gun in Stevens' felony trial. It closed out the seventh day of testimony, giving jurors something to think about overnight as the government neared the conclusion of its case. Prosecutors may present the last of their witnesses today.

Stevens is accused of seven counts of failing to disclose more than $250,000 in gifts and favors, mainly from Allen and his Anchorage-based oil-field service company, Veco.

DEFENSE CROSS-EXAMINES ALLEN

Earlier Tuesday, Brendan Sullivan, Stevens' lead defense attorney, continued to tear into the government's case as he cross-examined Allen, who has already pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers in Alaska. Sullivan worked to leave jurors with the impression that Allen deliberately held back information from Stevens about bills, and that the senator would have paid them had he ever been sent an invoice.

Sullivan also sought to dismiss the idea that Veco got special benefits when Stevens came to the company's defense over a pipeline in Pakistan, a labor training program for Russians, a logistics contract with the National Science Foundation and support for a proposed natural gas pipeline.

Sullivan on Tuesday questioned Allen about his plea deal with the government and the risk his non-cooperation would be to the sale of Veco last year to CH2M Hill, the international engineering and construction firm based in Colorado. The company withheld $70 million from the cash it paid the owners of Veco -- Allen, his three children, and two top executives -- to protect against contingencies, including the possibility Veco itself would be indicted.

At one point, Sullivan all but accused Allen of lying on the witness stand about a remark Allen attributed to Persons. That came in testimony last week, when Allen told of receiving a handwritten note from Stevens in 2002 thanking him for renovating his home in Girdwood.

In that note, Stevens told Allen he wanted a bill for all of Veco's work. But Stevens also advised Allen to talk about the bill with Persons, a neighbor who has looked after Stevens' home for years.

When Allen did, he testified, Persons told him: "Don't worry about getting a bill -- Ted's just covering his ass."

The phone call four years later between Allen and Persons did nothing to discredit Allen's testimony.

FBI - Stevens-2153

By February 2006, the FBI was deep in its investigation of public corruption in Alaska, though nothing had surfaced publicly yet. The government had obtained wiretap warrants for all of Allen's phones and had been listening for months when the plumbing bill came up.

PLUMBING PROBLEM

In earlier testimony, Veco electrician Jack Billings said he had gotten called one evening to Stevens' home in Girdwood over a failure of the heating system. Stevens and Allen were there when he arrived from Anchorage.

Billings said he soon figured it was a plumbing problem, not electrical. It was late to call someone, but Allen told Billings to call his plumber: Charlie Hart of Chugach Sewer & Drain of Anchorage.

Hart didn't specialize in boilers, but he figured the problem was the boiler's circulating pump. He replaced it, but put the new one in b[illegible]ward.

"I got a call later -- it was Bill Allen. We didn't help anything -- it made the situation worse," Billings testified Sept. 30. Stevens had a fireplace to keep warm, and they decided to call Hart back on a non-overtime basis.

Hart, testifying Tuesday after Allen, said he reinstalled the pump and put in a new pressure tank and other parts. At Allen's request, he sent the $1,118 bill for the parts to Stevens by way of Persons. He sent the $1,080 bill for labor and travel time to Allen at his Veco office.

The labor bill falsely listed the job site as 1644 W. 11th Ave in Anchorage -- Allen's home. The parts bill sent to Stevens had this notation: "Repair Materials for Heating System. Labor paid by Bill."

INTERCEPTED PHONE CALLS

Three intercepted calls were played to the jury Tuesday, all of them related to that bill.

On Feb. 2, 2006, Allen spoke to Persons and told him how he had split the bill and planned to take care of the labor himself. In the same call, Persons discussed how famously tight Stevens was with his money, referring to something he heard from Stevens' wife, Catherine.

"As Catherine says, Ted gets hysterical when he has to spend his own money," Persons said. "The flip side of it is, he can't really afford to pay a bunch of money."

Two weeks later, Allen got a call from his secretary, Linda Croft. She said that Stevens had sent him an e-mail saying he just got his bill for parts from Chugach Sewer & Drain. "It says 'Labor paid by Bill,'" Stevens wrote. "I should pay those plumbers. Please have someone send me a bill."

When Allen spoke with Persons later that day, he told him about the e-mail.

"I faxed him a bill," Persons said. "Isn't that what you wanted me to do?"

"What did it say about me doing it?" Allen asked.

"It doesn't say anything," Persons said. But then he decided to take another look at the bill.

"Oh s---, I didn't even see this. Oh, 'Labor paid by Bill.' Ouch. I didn't see that. I'm sorry," Persons said. At least it went straight to Stevens' house and wasn't seen by anyone else, Persons said.

But Allen's secretary knew, and so did the plumber, the men realized.

"We don't need this thing floating around," Persons said. "You tell that guy that he needs to, if he's got this bill in a file that he needs to get rid of it."

Only briefly did the two men discuss getting Stevens to actually reimburse Allen for that $1,080 he paid. Rather, they decided to just tell Hart, the plumber, that happened.

"Make him understand that Ted's paying for everything," Persons said. "That's the safest thing, Bill."

That's when Persons came up with the phony check idea.

"Have Ted write you a check for that," Persons said.

"Huh?" said Allen.

"To have Ted write you a check for that. You don't have to cash it -- just have it."

"Yeah. Yeah," said Allen.

"And then if it ever comes up, say screw you, here's the check," Persons said.

"That's the thing to do it, right there."

"I'll call Ted and tell him, send you a check," Persons said.

The prosecution is expected to wrap up its case today, when the judge overseeing the trial will also hear a motion by Stevens' legal team for a mistrial.

Judge limits evidence, won't halt trial

By RICHARD MAUER and ERIKA BOLSTAD

WASHINGTON - The corruption case against Sen. Ted Stevens suffered a blow to its credibility this afternoon when a federal judge ruled that prosecutors erred and jurors won't be able to consider crucial evidence about the time two workers spent renovating his house.

Jurors will be told to disregard evidence they've seen concerning how much time two Veco Corp. workers, Robert "Rocky" Williams and Dave Anderson, spent remodeling Stevens' home in Girdwood in 2000 and 2001. They'll also be told that prosecutors knew the hours Anderson said he worked could be inaccurate and yet still presented it to the jury as part of the $188,000 total that Veco accounting records show the oil field services company spent on the Stevens remodel.

"It's very troubling that the government would utilize records the government knows were false," said Judge Emmet Sullivan said. "And there's just no excuse for that whatsoever."

Judge Sullivan made his ruling Wednesday immediately after a hearing on a motion to throw out the case or declare a mistrial -- the fourth such move by Stevens' Washington, D.C.-based defense team. Prosecutors had just presented their final witness, an FBI agent who walked jurors through dozens of e-mails showing Stevens' awareness of the progress and the extent of the home repairs to his so-called chalet in the ski town.

submit each year as a U.S. senator. Alaska Republican is accused of accepting more than $250,000 in gifts and home repairs, mostly from Veco and its chief executive, Stevens' former close friend Bill Allen.

Stevens' team, led by Brendan Sullivan, filed its motion late Sunday after they had the opportunity to review more than 300 FBI interview reports and 83 grand jury transcripts the judge ordered government lawyers to turn over.

The defense team got those documents last week after Judge Sullivan ruled prosecutors had dragged their feet in turning over evidence that might be helpful to Stevens' case. That evidence included statements by Anderson that he thought Stevens would have paid bills for repairs - had he ever been given an invoice.

Which Stevens will jurors judge?

Stevens' defense rests

Testimony ends in Stevens trial

"This is a criminal case with a career on the line, and the court has responsibilities, the defense has responsibilities, the government has responsibilities," said one of Stevens' lawyers, Robert Cary. "Time and time and time again the government has not lived up to them."

The documents the defense team received last week typically aren't turned over in their entirety to defendants, but, skeptical that the government had turned over everything, Judge Sullivan had prosecutors send them to Stevens' lawyers. The evidence showed that Anderson testified during a grand jury that he was in Portland, Ore., at the end of 2000, even though he submitted timesheets to Veco for work in Alaska on the Stevens place at the same time.

That chips away at the government claim that Veco spent $188,000 on Stevens' home, Stevens' lawyers argued. The $188,000 figure was one of the first numbers jurors saw, when a Veco bookkeeper testified in excruciating detail in the opening days of the trial about the total expenses the company's records showed had been spent on Stevens' home.

Prosecutors argued that they didn't think the Anderson time was an issue because there was a whole list of tradesmen -- many of whom have testified during the trial about the work they did at Stevens' home - whose time wasn't reflected in the spreadsheet explained by the Veco bookkeeper.

"There was a significant amount of time that Veco put in that never got put on that spreadsheet," said Nicholas Marsh of the Justice Department's Public Integrity unit. "There's a ton of Mr. Anderson's time that never got put on that spreadsheet."

But Judge Sullivan was especially incredulous that Marsh sat in on Anderson's grand jury testimony two years ago and heard him say he wasn't in Alaska yet still presented the worker's timesheets as accurate to jurors in the opening days of the trial

"We didn't look at the case that way," Marsh said as he explained his theory that there were countless hours of work not reflected on the Veco spreadsheet. "I'm being very truthful."

"You closed your eyes then," Judge Sullivan said. "You had to have closed your eyes to that testimony. Someone on that team knew Anderson wasn't in Alaska, he was in Portland. Someone on that team had an obligation to say, 'Something smells here.' "

It is the third major misstep by prosecutors, although it is only the first that will be evident to jurors. Prosecutors were chided previously by the judge for sending Williams home to Alaska without telling anyone. Williams, who was so ill that prosecutors were concerned for his life, wasn't used as a prosecution witness although other witnesses have mentioned his name repeatedly.

Although the judge's ruling leaves the government's case against Stevens intact, jurors will be told to disregard evidence because prosecutors failed in their obligation to disclose crucial information to the defense team.

In addition to the warning about the accounting records, they'll be given a second instruction to disregard all evidence regarding an automobile trade Stevens made with Allen. Judge Sullivan decided to strike that evidence after Stevens' lawyers complained yesterday they were never shown a check that shows Allen paid $44,000 for a Land Rover. The SUV was traded to Stevens, who gave it to his daughter, for the senator's 1964½ Mustang and $5,000.

Stevens' team spent substantial time this week trying to prove that Allen didn't actually pay $44,000 on the car but failed to land a "gotcha" moment because prosecutors came forward with a cancelled check that showed he had paid that much for it. Angered, they filed their fourth motion for a mistrial.

They should have been shown the check, Judge Sullivan agreed. He said he was surprised prosecutors never entered it as evidence, since it could have boosted the credibility of Allen's testimony.

Allen has already pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers in Alaska and is cooperating with the government in exchange for leniency in his own sentencing.

The chief Justice Department prosecutor in the case, Brenda Morris, told the judge that the swift-moving nature of this trial was bound to lead to snags in turning over information to the defense. Stevens, who has held office since 1968, is up for a difficult re-election bid and asked for a speedy trial so he could have a verdict before voters make their decision about his future on Nov. 4.

But Judge Sullivan said speed was no excuse.

"It's not about the pace of litigation, it's about the fairness of the proceedings," he said. "We don't sacrifice fairness for expedience."

WASHINGTON -- Prosecutors in the corruption case against Sen. Ted Stevens suffered a blow to their credibility Wednesday when a federal judge said their error required him to throw out some crucial evidence about the time two workers spent renovating Stevens' house.

They didn't name the witness, but they had originally announced Williams, a foreman, would testify for the government, but then sent him back to Alaska, saying he was suffering from health issues.

In that motion, the government also asked Sullivan to not point fingers at the government in front of the jury.

DISCREPANCIES IN EVIDENCE

Stevens, 84, is on trial for seven counts of filing false statements on the financial disclosure forms he's required to submit each year as a U.S. senator. The Alaska Republican is accused of accepting more than $250,000 in gifts and home repairs, mostly from Veco and its chief executive, Stevens' former close friend, Bill Allen.

Stevens' lawyers, led by Brendan Sullivan, filed its motion Sunday night after they reviewed more than 300 FBI interview reports and 83 grand jury transcripts the judge ordered government lawyers to turn over.

The documents the defense team received last week typically aren't turned over in their entirety to defendants, but skeptical that the government had turned over everything, Judge Sullivan had prosecutors send them to Stevens' lawyers. The evidence showed that Anderson testified to a grand jury that he was in Portland, Ore., at the end of 2000, even though he submitted timesheets to Veco for work in Alaska on the Stevens place at the same time.

That chips away at the government claim that Veco spent $188,000 on Stevens' home, Stevens' lawyers argued. The $188,000 figure was one of the first numbers jurors saw, when a Veco bookkeeper testified in excruciating detail in the opening days of the trial about the total expenses the company's records showed had been spent on Stevens' home.

Prosecutors argued that they didn't think the Anderson time was an issue because there was a whole list of tradesman -- many of whom have testified during the trial about the work they did at Stevens' home.-- whose time wasn't reflected in the spreadsheet created by the Veco bookkeeper.

FBI - Stevens-2160

"There was a significant amount of time that Veco put in that never got put on that spreadsheet," said Nicholas Marsh of the Justice Department's Public Integrity unit. "There's a ton of Mr. Anderson's time that never got put on that spreadsheet."

But Judge Sullivan was especially incredulous that Marsh sat in on Anderson's grand jury testimony two years ago and heard Anderson say he wasn't in Alaska, and yet still presented the worker's time sheets as accurate to jurors.

"We didn't look at the case that way," Marsh said, as he explained his theory that there were countless hours of work not reflected on the Veco spreadsheet, and that prosecutors never vouched that the summary was anything more than a Veco business record. "I'm being very truthful."

"You closed your eyes then," Judge Sullivan said. "You had to have closed your eyes to that

VEHICLE SWAP OFF LIMITS

The judge's ruling Wednesday represented the third major misstep by prosecutors, although it's only the first that will be evident to jurors. Prosecutors were chided previously by the judge for sending Williams home to Alaska without telling anyone. Williams, who was so ill that prosecutors were concerned for his life, wasn't used as a prosecution witness although other witnesses have mentioned his name so frequently -- and positively -- that jurors may think they know him.

Although the judge's ruling leaves the government's case against Stevens intact, jurors will be told to disregard evidence because prosecutors failed in their obligation to disclose crucial information to the defense team.

In addition to the warning about the accounting records, they'll be given a second instruction to disregard all evidence regarding an automobile trade Stevens made with Allen. Judge Sullivan decided to strike that evidence after Stevens' lawyers complained on Tuesday that they were never shown a check that shows Allen paid $44,000 for a Land Rover. The SUV was traded to Stevens, who gave it to his daughter, for the senator's rare 1964 ½ Mustang and $5,000.

Stevens' team spent substantial time this week trying to prove that Allen didn't actually pay $44,000 for the SUV, introducing the window sticker with a price of about $42,125 and a dealer invoice for much less. But they failed to land a "gotcha" moment because prosecutors came forward with a cancelled check that showed that with dealer preparation and other charges, Allen actually paid $44,339.51. Angered, they filed their fourth motion for a mistrial.

Stevens' lawyers should have been shown the check as soon as the government knew about it, Judge Sullivan agreed. He said he was surprised prosecutors never entered it as evidence, since it could have boosted the credibility of Allen's testimony. Allen has already pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers in Alaska and is cooperating with the government in exchange for leniency in his own sentencing.

The chief Justice Department prosecutor in the case, Brenda Morris, told the judge that the swift-moving nature of this trial was bound to lead to some snags in turning over information to the defense. Stevens, who has held office since 1968, is up for a difficult re-election bid and asked for a speedy trial so he could have a verdict before voters make their decision about his future on Nov. 4.

But Judge Sullivan said speed was no excuse.

"It's not about the pace of litigation, it's about the fairness of the proceedings," he said. "We don't sacrifice fairness for expedience."

Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, the first defense witness in Stevens' corruption trial, told jurors that fellow senators have "absolute faith" in the 84-year-old. The two have been friends since Stevens entered the Senate in 1968, Inouye testified, and are so close that Stevens' youngest daughter, Lily, calls him 'Uncle Dan.' "

"I can assure that his word is good. As far as I'm concerned, it's good enough to take to the bank," he said of Stevens, whose friendship is such that the two call each other "brother."

With Inouye, Stevens' legal team began its defense, calling witnesses who are famous, such as former Secretary of State Colin Powell, and many who are famous in Alaska, such as David Monson, widower of Iditarod champion Susan Butcher.

Powell, referred to by the judge as "General Powell," will testify Friday afternoon. He is among about 10 character witnesses who Stevens' lawyers hope to introduce, but the judge is likely to limit them to three or so.

Stevens is charged with seven counts of filing false statements on the financial disclosure forms he's required to submit each year as a U.S. senator. He's accused of accepting more than $250,000 in gifts and home repairs, mostly from Veco and its former chief executive, Bill Allen, once a friend of Stevens and the star witness in the case against Stevens

Stevens' lawyers began to chip away at evidence prosecution witnesses have presented about gifts the senator is alleged to have received over the years. This afternoon, they zeroed in on a sled dog Stevens' friends bought him for $1,000 at the Kenai Classic auction in 2003.

Early in the trial, Sullivan told how Stevens got one of the dogs at an auction and was so smitten with the puppy that he bought another one for about $250. But the dogs were too much of a handful for Stevens in Washington, D.C., and he and his wife decided to send them back to Alaska, where Monson and Butcher cared for them. Stevens and his wife sent two $500 checks for the dogs' care.

Testimony ends in Stevens trial

In an e-mail read Wednesday in court, Stevens haggled with his friend Bob Penney over how much to value the dog on his financial disclosure paperwork, calling it a "GD disclosure form."

The dog sold at the auction was nearly worthless as a sled dog, testified kennel owner and Iditarod champion Dean Osmar. He gave it to his friend, James Varsos, the Alaska singer known as Hobo Jim, to offer up at the auction, an annual charity fundraiser attended by political bigwigs.

"I think most people went home with things they didn't really want," Varsos said of the auction.

Prosecutors rested their case earlier in the day, with one final witness. U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan decided to allow prosecutors to call David Anderson, a former welder who worked for Veco Corp. and supervised repairs that nearly doubled the size of Stevens' home in Girdwood.

Anderson, who is Allen's nephew, wasn't scheduled to testify. But prosecutors asked to allow him after the judge overseeing the case determined that some of the evidence they presented about Anderson's time on the project might have been inaccurate.

Stevens' defense team asked for a mistrial late Sunday, after they had the opportunity to review more than 300 FBI interview reports and 83 grand jury transcripts the judge ordered government lawyers to turn over. The defense team got those documents last week after Judge Sullivan ruled prosecutors had dragged their feet on turning over evidence that might be helpful to Stevens' case. That evidence included statements by Allen that he thought Stevens would have paid bills for repairs had he ever been given an invoice.

The evidence showed that Anderson testified to a grand jury that he was in Portland, Ore., at the end of 2000, even though he submitted timesheets to Veco for work in Alaska on the Stevens place at the same time.

Incensed, Sullivan on Wednesday punished prosecutors by ordering that jurors disregard the testimony from a Veco bookkeeper about Anderson's time.

Jurors also were told to disregard evidence they've seen concerning how much time Veco employee Robert "Rocky" Williams spent remodeling Stevens' home. They'll also be told that prosecutors knew the hours Anderson said he worked could be inaccurate and yet still presented it to the jury as part of the $188,000 total that Veco accounting records show the oilfield-services company spent on the Stevens remodel.

To compensate for the loss of evidence, prosecutors asked Thursday morning whether they could have Anderson testify. Judge Sullivan gave a reluctant OK over the objections of Stevens' legal team.

"They were sanctioned for their conduct," said one of Stevens' lawyers, Robert Cary. "Reverse, rewind and pretend like it never happened. We all understood that this case was closing. This is an afterthought, it's an attempt to pretend that a serious constitutional error never happened."

But prosecutors argued that Anderson's testimony will "provide the jury, the parties and the court with an alternative to sole reliance on any Veco" records. They also argued it was even more fair to Stevens, because his attorneys would have an opportunity to cross-examine Anderson and show jurors how he may have misled his bosses about the time he spent on the Girdwood renovations.

Anderson began his testimony midmorning Thursday. He testified he was working as much as 10 hours a day, six days a week, "between travel time and stuff," Anderson said. So was Williams, he said.

Anderson detailed the work he and Williams did on the home, including jacking it up to add a bottom story.

STEVENS TRIAL: He says Alaska senator's word can be "taken to the bank."

WASHINGTON -- The Hawaii Democrat whom Sen. Ted Stevens calls his "brother" opened the charge Thursday in defense of the Alaska Republican's character and integrity.

Sen. Daniel Inouye, the first defense witness in Stevens' corruption trial and one of the few sitting senators to have served longer than Stevens, told jurors that fellow senators have "absolute faith" in his 84-year-old Republican friend. The two World War II veterans met when Stevens entered the Senate in 1968 and discovered they had many bonds, Inouye testified. They are so close that Stevens' youngest daughter, Lily, calls him "Uncle Dan."

"I can assure that his word is good, as far as I'm concerned, it's good enough to take to the bank," he said of Stevens.

Under cross examination, Inouye refused to be drawn into a conversation about what he would think if he learned a person he had met had told a lie under oath.

"I'm not inclined to respond to a hypothetical question," Inouye said. "I don't operate that way -- the people I meet have substance."

With Inouye, Stevens' legal team began its defense. Today, they plan to call another famous character witness, former Secretary of State Colin Powell. Following Inouye on Thursday were witnesses with some celebrity among Alaskans, like musher David Monson, the widower of Iditarod champion Susan Butcher, and the balladeer Hobo Jim.

Powell and Inouye are among at least 10 character witnesses that Stevens' lawyers said they hoped to introduce, but U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan said that many would be redundant. Most trial courts don't allow more than three, government lawyers argued, though Judge Sullivan said he might allow as many as five.

In eliciting testimony from a friendly witness, defense attorney Brendan Sullivan was engaged in a much different encounter with Inouye than the one Sullivan is famous for.

In the 1987 Iran-Contra hearings, Inouye was the committee chairman and Sullivan was the attorney for Olliver North, one of the key targets of the congressional investigation. Tired of hearing Sullivan answering for North, Inouye said that maybe the witness should speak for himself.

"Well, sir. I'm not a potted plant," Sullivan replied. "I'm here as the lawyer. That's my job."

Testimony ends in Stevens trial

SLED DOG'S WORTH

Stevens is charged with seven counts of filing false statements on financial disclosure forms he's required to submit each year as a U.S. senator -- each amounting to a lie on an oath signed with his own hand, said Nicholas Marsh, a trial attorney with the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section.

Stevens is accused of accepting more than $250,000 in gifts and home repairs, mostly from the defunct oil-field service company Veco and its former chief executive, Bill Allen, once a friend of Stevens and the star witness in the case against him.

Stevens' lawyers began to chip away at evidence prosecution witnesses have presented about gifts the senator is alleged to have received over the years. Thursday afternoon, they zeroed in on a sled dog bought for $1,000 at a 2003 auction.

In his opening statements to the jury, Brendan Sullivan told how Stevens got one of the dogs at an auction and was so smitten with the puppy that he bought another one for about $250. But the dogs were too much of a handful for Stevens in Washington, D.C., and he and his wife decided to send them back to Alaska, where Monson and Butcher cared for them. Stevens and his wife sent two $500 checks to Butcher for upkeep.

In an e-mail read Wednesday in court during the government's case, Stevens haggled with his friend, Bob Penney, over how much to value the dog on his financial disclosure paperwork, calling it a "GD disclosure form." The e-mails showed Stevens attempting to change the way he got the dog -- not as a $1,000 gift from Penney, the Anchorage real estate developer and sportfishing advocate who bid on the dog, but as a gift from the Kenai River Sportfishing Association, which Penney founded.

Long after he got the dog, Stevens asked Penney to turn his auction bid into a donation to the association so that the dog wouldn't appear to be worth as much.

Hobo Jim -- James Varsos -- testified that well-to-do bidders at the association's annual Kenai River Classic frequently bid up items out of all proportion because the money goes to charity. Varsos said he has donated his own $60 cowboy hats to the auction and has seen them go for as much as $450.

"I think most people went home with things they didn't really want," Varsos said of the auction.

Varsos, who helped out at the classic for about 10 years, picked up the puppy that was eventually auctioned to Stevens from the Clam [illegible]h kennel of musher Dean Osmar, an Id[illegible]d champion.

Osmar described the female as the "runt" of a litter who would normally be shunned by mushers because it had blue eyes and white fur -- possible indicators of a genetic respiratory disease. It might have been worth $50 or $100 as a pet, he testified, though he donated it to the association.

After acquiring the blue-eyed female, Stevens bought another puppy from Osmar for $250. It was a better dog, he said.

But Taz and Keely proved too big a handful for the Stevenses in Washington. They asked Monson and Butcher for help.

"I agreed to take the sled dogs off their hands and take them back to Alaska," Monson testified.

VECO WELDER TESTIFIES

The final prosecution witness took the stand Thursday morning, just before the government rested its case against the Alaska Republican. David Anderson, a former welder who worked for Veco Corp. and supervised repairs that nearly doubled the size of Stevens' home in Girdwood, was not originally announced as a witness in the government case, but the judge allowed his testimony.

Anderson, who is Allen's nephew, was called after prosecutors had some of their evidence ruled inadmissible by Judge Sullivan.

Through a Veco account manager, the government presented evidence that Veco spent $188,000 on the Stevens remodel between 2000 and 2001.

But defense attorneys discovered in reviewing government evidence belatedly sent them that within that account manager's total were hours for Anderson and another Veco supervisor, Rocky Williams, that were worked elsewhere.

Judge Sullivan said the government knew some of those wages were inappropriately charged internally to the house project. As a sanction against the government, he told the jury to ignore the entire costs attributed to Williams and Anderson in the account manager's testimony.

On the witness stand Thursday morning, Anderson testified that he worked as much as 10 hours a day, six days a week on the house project. So did Williams, he said.

Anderson detailed the work he and Williams did on the home, including jacking it up to add a bottom story.

Powell testifies to Stevens' high reputation

CHARACTER WITNESSES: All say senator is a force for good.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER

WASHINGTON -- Colin Powell, the retired Army general and former secretary of state, took the witness stand Friday on behalf of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, raised his right hand and swore to tell the truth.

"Gen. Powell, good afternoon," U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan said to the biggest celebrity to testify as a character witness for Stevens, on trial on felony disclosure violations. "Sorry to keep you waiting yesterday."

"It's all right, Your Honor," Powell said.

Speaking in a courtroom suddenly packed with spectators and to jurors leaning forward in their seats, Powell recounted his long career, ending with his "dabbling in diplomacy," as he self-deprecatingly described his four years as secretary of state.

He then turned to Stevens, whom he has known for 25 years. Powell described Stevens as a "trusted individual" and a man with a "sterling" reputation.

"He was someone whose word you could rely on," said Powell.

Stevens was honest with him, he said, whether the news was good or bad.

Stevens' defense rests
Testimony ends in Stevens trial

Stevens, on trial for lying about gifts on financial disclosure forms, has the right during the defense portion of the trial to ask character witnesses to speak on behalf of his "truthfulness and veracity." The first such character witness, Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, spoke Thursday. Three others are set to testify on Stevens' behalf, but the defense's wish to call Sen. Ted Kennedy was derailed by Kennedy's setback in his fight against a brain tumor.

Under cross examination, Powell said he had never been to Girdwood and has no independent knowledge of the charges Stevens faces.

Stevens, 84, faces charges of failing to disclose more than $250,000 in gifts between 1999 and 2006. Most of that total is related to a major renovation project that doubled the size of Stevens' home in Girdwood, with much of the work allegedly done for free by an oil-field service company run by Stevens' friend Bill Allen.

Julie Kitka, the president of the Alaska Federation of Natives, testified as someone who was familiar with Stevens' work in Alaska on behalf of Natives.

The AFN represents some of Alaska's biggest and most powerful corporations, like Cook Inlet Region Inc. and Arctic Slope Regional Corp., which have benefitted from special legislation by Stevens. But when Kitka turned to the jury to describe the AFN, she said it was "something like the NAACP," the civil rights organization.

The jury also heard from several other Alaskans who have had positive encounters with Stevens over the years, including a pediatric physician at the Alaska Native Medical Center in Anchorage, Dani Bowman. Stevens was instrumental in arranging an Air Force evacuation for a sick baby who needed emergency treatment not available in Alaska, Bowman said.

"He didn't listen to the rest of the question, he said, 'Yes I'll help you,' " she said, choking up with emotion. "It was beautiful."

Two former heads of the Alaska AFL-CIO, Mano Frey and Jim Sampson, testified that Stevens also was instrumental in requiring that union labor be used in big proposed projects like the gas pipeline or drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. The oil industry and especially nonunion Veco opposed such project labor agreements, Sampson testified.

That defense evidence was used to counter prosecution assertions that Stevens took up Veco's agenda in Washington because of gifts he received.

The defense team also called a private real estate appraiser and two assessors from the Municipality of Anchorage to testify on the value of the Veco addition to Stevens' home.

The city's valuation jumped $104,800 from 2001 to 2002 when the city took into account the addition, said municipal assessor Marty McGee.

That's less than a third of the cost of the actual work, according to earlier testimony. Stevens himself paid about $160,000, and Veco spent about $180,000.

McGee said his figures were based on an inspection of only the outside of the house, and he acknowledged under cross-examination that city records apparently missed one room that was added. The city's value is based on what the property could be expected to sell for, not what it cost to renovate, he said.

"A lot of times it costs a whole lot more to do the renovation work?" asked prosecutor Nicholas Marsh.

"That's possible," McGee said.

The judge earlier rejected a defense theory Stevens would have received a benefit from Veco's work only if it raised the appraised value of the Girdwood home. His lawyers have argued that the value is zero under that theory.

Colin Powell: Stevens reputation 'sterling'

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER

WASHINGTON - One of the nation's best-known retired Army generals, Colin Powell, described Sen. Ted Stevens in court today as a "trusted individual" and a man with a "sterling" reputation.

"He was someone whose word you could rely on," said Powell, secretary of state in President Bush's first term, who self-deprecatingly described himself as someone who retired as the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and then "dabbled a bit in diplomacy."

Stevens, on trial for lying about gifts on financial disclosure forms, has the right to ask character witnesses to speak on behalf of his "truthfulness and veracity." The first such character witness, Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, spoke Thursday. Another three are set to testify on Stevens' behalf, but the highest-profile witness, by far, will be Powell.

The former secretary of state said he had known Stevens for 25 years, mostly in the senator's role as the top defense appropriator on a Senate defense appropriations committee. In Stevens, "I had a guy who would tell me when I was off base, he would tell me when I had no clothes on, figuratively, that is, and would tell me when I was right and go for it," Powell said. "He's a guy who, as we said in the infantry, we would take on a long patrol."

When asked outside of the courtroom after his testimony whether Stevens asked him personally to testify to his character, Powell said he couldn't recall if it was the senator or "Not at all," he said, snapping his fingers to signify it was a snap decision.

Powell's endorsement followed a morning of testimony from people who worked on Stevens' home and were paid by Stevens and his family, or were aware of gifts he had received.

The former chairman of a nonprofit in Alaska testified that he was directed by a close friend of Stevens to "create a paper trail" that would show a husky puppy given to the senator was worth one-fourth what the friend paid for it.

Stevens, 84, faces charges of failing to disclose more than $250,000 in gifts between 1999 and 2006. Most of that total involved a major renovation project that doubled the size of Stevens' home in Girdwood, with much of the work allegedly done for free by an oil-field service company run by Stevens' friend Bill Allen.

The testimony Friday morning, on the 10th day of trial, was only about a dog, but it's also part of the case against Stevens.

Ronald Rainey, a retired utility worker from Soldotna, was called by Stevens' defense to discredit a prosecution contention that the blue-eyed husky was a $1,000 dog -- a value far in excess of the $285 gift limit in effect for the Senate that year.

Rainey testified that the Kenai River Sportfishing Association gave the dog to Stevens, not the man who bid $1,000 for it at the group's annual charity auction. The bidder was Bob Penney, an Anchorage real estate developer, the founder of the association and Stevens' good friend.

But if Penney bought the dog with his $1,000 bid, why did Stevens report it in his 2003 Senate disclosure as a gift from the association with a value of $250?

According to Rainey, Penney bid up the value of the dog. When the auction hammer came down, he was the last bidder.

"It was a joke," Rainey said. "We knew he got stuck with something he didn't want."

Rainey described Penney as the founder of the association. He still had huge sway over the group, Rainey said. Penney proposed donating the dog back to the association; the association would then give it to someone who wanted it, Rainey said. That would be Stevens and his wife, Catherine, he testified.

But the document prepared by the association the night of the auction, shown to the jury earlier as a prosecution exhibit, showed Penney won the bid and took the dog. The statement listed the dog's fair market value as $500 and the paid-in-full bid as $1,000.

On Wednesday, the government introduced an e-mail written by Stevens to Penney on May 2, 2004, 10 months after the auction, in which he complained he was filling out his "GD disclosure form" and had a problem with the dog. Penney couldn't give him the dog because it was worth more than $285, Stevens said. He said the gift instead should be a present from the association.

"In May of 2004, Bob Penney asked you to create a paper trail concerning the sled dog?" asked prosecutor Nicholas Marsh.

"That's correct," Rainey said.

An e-mail introduced Friday from Rainey to Penney on May 6, 2004, said the association considered the dog was a "thank-you" to Stevens for all his work on its behalf.

"You did this because Bob Penney asked you to create a paper trail?" Marsh said.

"Yes," said Rainey. But he said the documentation reflected the association's intent at the time of the auction.

Earlier, the defense provided the names of 10 character witnesses it hoped would testify for Stevens. But the judge said he would only allow five, a more usual number.

Another proposed witness, Sen. Ted Kennedy, D-Mass., is probably too ill to testify, the defense said. The defense said it would like to call Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, former Transportation Secretary William Coleman, former District of Columbia council member John Ray, Olympic medalist and sportscaster Donna DeVerona and a fellow veteran from Stevens' World War II Army Air Corps unit, Leroy Parramore.

Prosecutors subpoena e-mails of Stevens' wife

SUBPOENA: Evidence sought, including documents related to diamond earrings.

WASHINGTON -- Even as Sen. Ted Stevens' trial approaches a likely end this week, federal prosecutors are still attempting to gather more evidence, including correspondence between the Alaska senator and his wife, Catherine, as well as e-mails she may have sent to 34 others about their home renovation and gifts the senator may have received.

The federal subpoena to Catherine Stevens' law firm, dated Sept. 15, became public over the weekend when Stevens' legal team asked the judge in the case to prevent the government from obtaining thousands of documents from the law firm, Mayer Brown.

Prosecutors are also looking for communications between her and anyone with a U.S. Senate e-mail address, as well as documents relating to anything of value given or provided to Stevens, his wife or his daughter, Lily. That includes "any documents relating to diamond earrings," according to the motion.

FBI - Stevens-2174

But Stevens' defense team doesn't want them turned over, accusing prosecutors of going on a fishing expedition and saying in their motion that a "more oppressive, non-specific subpoena could hardly be imagined."

The 84-year-old senator is on trial for lying on the Senate financial disclosure forms he's required to file each year. He's charged with accepting gifts and home renovations worth more than $250,000, chiefly from Veco Corp. and its former chief executive, Bill Allen, who was the star witness for the prosecution.

The renovations in 2000 and 2001 doubled the size of the Stevens' home in Girdwood, transforming it from a small, A-frame cabin into a two-story retreat with multiple decks, a Jacuzzi tub and a Viking outdoor grill. Prosecutors have been laying out a case that much of the work, including the decks as well as plumb[illegible] and a complete electrical overhaul, was[illegible]d for by Veco.

TRIAL IN DEFENSE PHASE

Stevens' trial, about to begin its fourth week, is in the midst of the defense phase. Prosecutors rested their case last week and his defense team began building a case that the senator was unaware that the renovations in question may have exceeded what he spent on it, an estimated $160,000. Several character witnesses, including former secretary of state Colin Powell, have also testified on Stevens' behalf.

Stevens' attorneys asked to quash the subpoena over the weekend after one of the prosecutors, Edward Sullivan, sent an e-mail asking for the documents the government had requested.

According to the filing, last year, prosecutors asked for and received more than 26,000 pages of documents from Catherine Stevens' law firm. But the law firm didn't turn over communications between Catherine Stevens and her husband because spouses are generally protected by law from having to provide evidence against each other in criminal case, according to the filing.

Prosecutors asked for the documents again on Sept. 15, just a week before jury selection began in the case.

The law firm did a search and handed over three discs containing thousands of e-mails to Stevens' defense team in early October, according to the filing. They reviewed them in search of privileged conversations between husband and wife and found none, but also found "no relevant ones," wrote one of Stevens' lawyers, Joseph Terry. The first 100 e-mails are about nothing more than "the recent death of Mrs. Stevens's mother; Lily Stevens' wedding; and grave illnesses of personal friends."

Prosecutors on Friday night asked again for the e-mails, prompting Stevens lawyers to file a motion asking the judge to keep them from getting them.

NEW NAMES EMERGE

The government's subpoena also lists some names that haven't come up before in the case, including Anchorage jeweler George Walton and his Alaska Gold and Diamond Co. and New York socialite Marylou Whitney and her husband, John Hendrickson, formerly from Alaska. Whitney and Hendrickson have been involved in the horse business with Stevens.

Also listed was Anchorage real estate developer Jon Rubini and one of his companies, Centerpoint LLC, in which Stevens was once an investor.

Stevens' lawyers also filed a motion Sunday night asking the judge to strike references to "the public's right to know" when it comes to disclosure of financial information.

"Any such public interest is irrelevant to the charges in this case, which are and must be based on alleged false statements to the government, not the public at large," Stevens' lawyers wrote. "The government obviously wishes to inflame the jury with assertions that the defendant has injured the public at large -- including the jurors themselves -- by supposedly depriving the populace of important information. This inflammatory suggestion should not be permitted."

Earlier, the defense successfully blocked the government from using the testimony of an advocate of public disclosure, Kent Cooper, about how disclosures are used by the media, public advocacy groups and the public at large.

The trial, on break today for the federal Columbus Day holiday, is scheduled to resume Tuesday morning.

WASHINGTON -- Susan Covich found her father's house in Girdwood to be a convenient place to stop and spend the night during frequent trips between her home in Kenai and Anchorage, where between 2002 and 2004 she was furthering her own education and later attending to an ill friend's affairs.

Susan Stevens Covich testified Oct. 14, 2008.

But there were times, she testified in her father's trial Tuesday, that she arrived in Girdwood late at night to find strange cars in front of the chalet and people behind closed bedroom doors inside. One of those people would be Veco chairman Bill Allen, the oil-field contractor who helped renovate the place for her father and stepmother, Sen. Ted Stevens and Catherine Stevens.

Covich, a substitute teacher in the Kenai public schools, testified there were times that Allen appeared to have more control of the house than she did.

"I slept on the couch," Covich said of one such occasion when none of the five bedrooms was available. Allen appeared in the morning and told her she could move to one of the upstairs bedrooms, she said.

Another time, she said, "I was planning to make my stopover into my Dad's house," she said. "There w lights on, cars in the parking lot. It just too creepy, so I just drove on."

DEFENSE TACTIC

Stevens is on trial on seven felony counts of failing to disclose about $250,000 in gifts and services on his annual financial statements. Most were from Allen and Veco and involved their effort to renovate and furnish Stevens' home.

With Covich's testimony, the first by a member of the Stevens family, the defense appeared to be making the point that Allen had himself in mind for some of the improvements he made to the home, and that Stevens didn't want all that Allen did. In one note from Stevens to Allen entered as evidence early in the trial, Stevens said he considered a $6,000 outdoor barbecue grill to belong to Allen, though Veco permanently plumbed it to a gas line on Stevens' upper deck and installed it there with a crane.

What could not be known Tuesday was how the jury would react to the assertion that Covich couldn't use her family's home on multiple occasions because Allen was there using his own key, apparently with the authorization of her father. There was no testimony about why Allen was there.

Covich also testified about another point that came up in the trial, this one involving her son. She confirmed that Veco got a job for her son, John Covich, on the North Slope, after he got out of a special high school program for troubled teens.

But, sobbing softly, Covich said her son had a "substance abuse problem" and "had some run-ins with the law because of that." When he begin missing the plane to the Slope, he was fired, Covich said, though Veco offered to take him back if he went straight.

That apparently happened in 2003, when Veco began paying his tuition and expenses to learn heavy diesel mechanics at the state vocational training center in Seward, she said.

"He survived the first semester, but right after Christmas he got back into abusing drugs again and was kicked out of the program in January 2004," Covich said. "He is residing in a correctional facility now."

State records show John P. Covich was locked up at the Wildwood Correctional Center in Kenai on April 29 for a probation violation with no set release date.

TRIAL WRAPPING UP

The defense has announced that Ted Stevens and Catherine Stevens will probably follow Covich to the witness stand later this week, though that could change. U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan said Tuesday that he expected the case to wrap up Monday with closing arguments and jury instructions.

It might have been possible for the case to go to the jury Friday, he said, but he doesn't like to start deliberations just before a weekend since the jury may feel pressured to reach a quick verdict.

FBI - Stevens-2177

That schedule would mean that the jury could return a verdict less than two weeks before the veteran Republican stands for re-election. He faces Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, a Democrat.

In other testimony Tuesday, lawyers for the senator continued to attempt to sow doubt in the minds of the jury as part of their effort to prove the central theme of their defense: that the Alaska Republican thought he was paying every bill he was given for his home renovations.

They bolstered their case with testimony from Augie Paone, owner of Christensen Builders of Anchorage. The contractor did the bulk of the carpentry that doubled the size of Stevens' once modest A-frame.

Prosecutors are trying to show that Veco paid for much of the work, including the decks, plumbing and a complete electrical overhaul. To that end, jurors heard exhaustive testimony from Veco employees and tradesmen -- especially the electricians -- who worked on Stevens' home yet never submitted bills for their work.

But Paone, a defense witness, said Tuesday that even though he was primarily the carpentry contractor, he also purchased electrical and plumbing supplies -- and presented them as line items in his bills, with the complete invoices from suppliers as backup.

His testimony suggested Stevens and his wife could have thought they were paying for everything themselves, even though Veco paid for the plumber and electricians and at least some of the material, according to earlier testimony.

Paone said he was very careful to do everything by the book, knowing Stevens' position. After meeting with Allen in late summer 2000 to go over the project's parameters, they decided Allen would review his invoices before they were sent to Stevens.

Paone said Stevens' wife, Catherine, paid him promptly when he sent the first five bills.

But the sixth bill, for $19,818, is another matter. It's clear Stevens never paid it, but Paone's testimony about why was delayed by a legal dispute that led to the jury going home early Tuesday.

In their opening statements, Stevens' lawyers told jurors that Paone was told by Allen and the construction foreman Robert "Rocky" Williams that he was going to "eat that bill."

But prosecutors argued that Paone's testimony Tuesday seemed likely to contradict his own testimony to a grand jury, where he said that Allen never explicitly said he would "eat" the bill, but implied it. Allen also testified he never specially told Paone he was stuck with the bill.

The judge will make a decision this morning on how to proceed.

OTHER TESTIMONY

In other defense testimony Tuesday, Jeanne Penney, a close friend of Stevens' wife, Catherine Stevens, testified about a $3,000 stained glass window that she bought as a housewarming present once the Stevenses finished construction on their home. Prosecutors have presented evidence that Stevens never disclosed the window as a gift.

Tuesday, Penney stumbled when she described for whom the gift was intended.

"I gave her a gift. I gave them a gift," she said, adding, "The interest of that gift was primarily to my friend, Catherine Bittner Stevens."

She described her friendship with Catherine as predating Catherine's marriage to Stevens and as one of two women who can sit around for hours in their pajamas, drinking coffee and talking.

Two other character witnesses also testified Tuesday. Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, a Senate colleague since 1976, described his friend as a "fine, decent, honorable man."

"I'd rate him at the very top," Hatch said. "He's one of the true lions of the Senate, along with my friend Ted Kennedy. He's totally honest, totally straightforward, fights for his state like you can't believe."

Also on Tuesday, Double Musky owner Bob Persons took the stand briefly outside the presence of the jury while Judge Sullivan called Persons' lawyer, Eric Sanders, in Anchorage. Persons, listed as one of Stevens' final witnesses, had asserted his Fifth Amendment right to not testify when he was subpoenaed to the grand jury in Washington before Stevens' indictment, lawyers for both sides said in court.

But now, he was willing to testify on behalf of his friend, Stevens, and the judge wanted to be sure that Sanders had advised his client of the risks of self-incrimination. Sanders assured the judge that Persons knew what he was doing.

Persons has emerged as a key figure in the house expansion. His name is on the construction documents filed with the Anchorage city building department, and witnesses said he was a frequent visitor to the project. The government has introduced dozens of e-mails showing how he kept Stevens abreast of the work.

RULING ON E-MAILS

Sullivan ruled Tuesday morning that thousands of e-mails from Catherine Stevens' work account will be turned over to federal prosecutors, who first asked for them more than a year ago. The defense had fought to prevent the documents from being turned over on relevancy grounds and also under the spousal privilege doctrine, which generally prevents one spouse from testifying against the other in a criminal case.

Prosecutors argued that communications between the couple "will be relevant to show the material elements of the charges in the indictment, including defendant's knowledge, intent and motivation for concealing the benefits he received from Veco."

They added that "in particular, we anticipate that certain documents at the time of the renovations will reflect that both Catherine Stevens and defendant knew they had not paid for the Veco work, and documents thereafter will reflect that Catherine Stevens and defendant took steps in 2004 to mislead the press when the media was investigating the costs associated with the renovations."

Sullivan said he saw no reason for prosecutors not to have the documents, and he ordered Stevens' lawyers to turn them over. But after reviewing the e-mails during the day, prosecutors said Stevens' law firm had failed to turn over any from the most relevant time frame -- from 2001, when she started work there, to 2004.

Stevens' lawyers should finish their defense late Wednesday or Thursday, and prosecutors will have the opportunity to present rebuttal witnesses. They'll likely have closing arguments Monday, said U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan; then he'll give jurors the case.

Today, lawyers for the senator continued to work to sow doubt in the minds of the jury as part of their effort to prove the central theme of their defense: that the Alaska Republican thought he was paying every bill he was given for renovations to his home in Girdwood.

They bolstered their case with testimony from Augie Paone, the Anchorage carpenter who did the bulk of the renovations that doubled the size of Stevens' once-modest A-frame.

Stevens, 84, is on trial on charges that he lied on the Senate financial-disclosure forms he's required to file each year. He's accused of failing to report gifts and home renovations worth more than $250,000, chiefly from Veco Corp. and its former chief executive, Bill Allen, who was the prosecution's star witness.

FBI - Stevens-2180

Prosecutors made the case that Veco paid for much of the work, including the decks, plumbing and a complete electrical overhaul. To that end, jurors heard exhaustive testimony from Veco employees and tradesmen -- especially the electricians -- who worked on Stevens' home yet never submitted bills for their work.

But Paone, a defense witness, said today he was very specific about billing the Stevenses for plumbing and electrical supplies, suggesting Stevens and his wife could have thought they were paying for everything themselves.

Since Stevens is an elected official, Paone said, he was very careful to do everything by the book. He met with Allen in late summer 2000 to go over the project's parameters.

194A-AN-13620-M

"We were both under the impression that we were going to, based on the senator being an elected official, I was going to present all my bills to the senator or Bill to make sure he knew exactly what he was getting," Paone said.

Paone said Stevens' wife, Catherine, paid him promptly when he sent the first five bills.

But when Paone began to testify about the sixth bill, for $19,818, the judge stopped him, based on objections from prosecutors. In their opening statements, Stevens' lawyers told jurors that Paone was told by Allen and the construction foreman Robert "Rocky" Williams that he was going to "eat that bill."

Prosecutors argued that Paone's testimony today seemed likely to contradict his testimony to a grand jury, in which he said Allen never explicitly said he would "eat" the bill but implied it. The judge will make a decision Wednesday morning on how to proceed.

Other witnesses weren't quite as successful for the defense as Paone. Jeanne Penney, a close friend of Stevens' wife, testified about a $3,000 stained-glass window that she bought as a housewarming present once the Stevenses finished construction on their home. Prosecutors have presented evidence that Stevens never disclosed the window as a gift.

Tuesday, Penney stumbled when she described for whom the gift was intended.

"I gave her a gift. I gave them a gift," she said, adding, "The interest of that gift was primarily to my friend, Catherine Bittner Stevens."

One of Stevens' daughters, Susan Covich, testified about another alleged benefit Allen offered Stevens: a pricey mechanical training course for Covich's son, Stevens' grandson. Allen helped Covich's son get into a Veco job-training program when he was a troubled young man struggling with addiction to drugs. She broke down as she described how her son, now incarcerated, lost his job with Veco, despite his family connections.

Covich also offered testimony designed to help boost another defense theme: that Stevens neither needed nor wanted the gifts Allen was giving, and that they were for the benefit of the Veco chief when he used the Girdwood home.

She testified that she often stayed at her father's home in Girdwood in 2002 when she was traveling between college classes in Anchorage and her home three hours south. Allen was often there when she arrived late at night, she said. One time, there were cars in the driveway and when she went inside, all the bedroom doors were closed.

"I was planning to make my stopover into my dad's house," she said. "There were lights on, cars in the parking lot. It just got too creepy, so I just drove on."

Two other character witnesses also testified Tuesday. Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, a Stevens colleague in the Senate since 1976, described his friend as a "fine, decent, honorable man."

"I'd rate him at the very top," Hatch said. "He's one of the true lions of the Senate, along with my friend Ted Kennedy. He's totally honest, totally straightforward, fights for his state like you can't believe."

FBI - Stevens-2181

Stevens' wife is tentatively scheduled to testify too, although the senator's lawyers haven't said whether she will.

Stevens himself is at the end of the witness list, as a potential final witness, but it remains unclear whether he will actually testify. Judge Sullivan reminded Stevens -- out of the presence of the jury -- that he was under no obligation to do so.

"It's your choice. You don't have to say anything," Sullivan said this morning.

Sullivan ruled this morning that thousands of e-mails that Catherine Stevens sent will be turned over to federal prosecutors, who'd first asked for them more than a year ago.

Communications between Stevens and her husband "will be relevant to show the material elements of the charges in the indictment, including defendant's knowledge, intent and motivation for concealing the benefits he received from Veco," prosecutors argued.

They added that "in particular, we anticipate that certain documents at the time of the renovations will reflect that both Catherine Stevens and defendant knew they had not paid for the Veco work, and documents thereafter will reflect that Catherine Stevens and defendant took steps in 2004 to mislead the press when the media was investigating the costs associated with the renovations."

Stevens' lawyers had tried over the weekend to quash a Sept. 15 subpoena seeking the documents from her law firm, Mayer Brown.

Prosecutors had asked for communications between Catherine Stevens and anyone with a U.S. Senate e-mail address, as well as documents relating to anything of value given or provided to Ted Stevens, his wife or his daughter, Lily. That includes "any documents relating to diamond earrings," according to a motion filed by Stevens' attorneys.

Sullivan said he saw no reason for prosecutors not to have the documents, and he ordered Stevens' lawyers to turn them over.

Contractor: Allen advised not billing Stevens

WASHINGTON - It would have been "business suicide" to cross the powerful Bill Allen, testified the carpenter who renovated Sen. Ted Stevens' home in Girdwood and who said he was bullied into not sending the senator a final $13,393 bill.

Susan Stevens Covich testified Oct. 14, 2008.

Allen told him he should "eat" the final bill from the home renovations, said Augie Paone, who took the stand today as a defense witness in the senator's corruption trial. Allen, the chief executive of Veco Corp., an oil field services company that was one of Alaska's largest private employers before it was sold last year, was overseeing renovations at Stevens' home in Girdwood in 2000 and 2001.

Those renovations and other gifts are at the heart of the case against Stevens, whose corruption trial is in its fourth week. The 84-year-old Alaska Republican was charged with seven felony counts of making false statements on Senate financial-disclosure forms.

Stevens' wife, Catherine, is poised to testify Thursday, and the senator himself might take the stand. During the lunch break today, Stevens got onto the witness stand to determine whether he could hear and see the lawyers. He also tested the microphones.

Stevens, who's listed as the final defense witness, doesn't have to take the stand. The judge has reminded him repeatedly that jurors aren't supposed to hold it against him if he doesn't.

Paone testified today that he objected to "eating" the bill for work at Stevens' home and said so in a meeting with Allen, who told the carpenter he should "look at it as a political contribution," Paone said.

"At first I was shocked," Paone said. "I also tried to hold on to my composure. I knew I was in a bind, because I knew he had me in a spot where I really couldn't do anything."

Paone said he "thought about sending it over to the senator, but I knew it would be business suicide. I knew that I was between a rock and a hard place. I thought it was wiser - or better business sense on my side - to just leave it alone."

A few months later, Allen asked Paone's Christensen Builders to do work on his own house. Allen padded the cost of his own renovations to compensate for the $13,393 that Paone lost on the Stevens remodel, the carpenter testified.

"The understanding was that I will do some work for you but you still owe me $13,000," Paone said in court. "I was adamant that I was going to get paid for that bill that he owed me."

Stevens' legal team used Paone, who came across as a straight shooter, to chip away at Allen's credibility. Allen, who was the star witness for the prosecution, has pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers as part of the wide-ranging corruption investigation that drew in Stevens. Allen hasn't been sentenced yet.

One of the major themes of the defense case has been that Stevens and his wife paid all the bills that they received, and that Allen and other friends hid the true cost of the renovations, done mostly while the couple was in far-off Washington.

Yet some of Paone's testimony to a 2006 grand jury countered that theory, said prosecutor Joe Bottini, an assistant U.S. attorney in Anchorage. He asked Paone to refer to what he told grand jurors two years ago when the case was under investigation.

Didn't he go back to do additional work on the Stevens place?

He did, Paone said. He went back to work on the garage floor as well as to build shelves, including ski racks. Veco paid that $2,700 bill, Paone acknowledged. He also did some tiling on a fireplace at Stevens' home, he said, and the $850 expense was charged to Allen as part of the renovation work Paone did on the Veco chief executive officer's home.

Stevens' team also tried to use one of the senator's neighbors, Bob Persons, to attack one of the most memorable moments in the trial so far, when Allen told jurors that Persons said Stevens was "just covering his ass" and wasn't serious when he asked for a bill in 2002 for work on his house.

Persons, who owns the Double Musky restaurant in Girdwood, had a power of attorney to obtain a building permit on Stevens' behalf, oversaw the initial construction and handled bills for the family. Stevens' attorney asked him whether he, in fact, had told Allen that the senator was "just covering his ass" in asking for bills. Persons said he never said it.

"No," Persons said, adding under his breath, "crazy."

Persons, whose folksy mannerisms began when he took the stand and told the judge he'd rather be fishing, got a mild scolding for joking with members of the jury while they were leaving for their afternoon break. The judge, warning Persons that he was to have no contact with jurors, asked him what he said.

"I said, 'Do you have a bathroom back there?' " Persons said, a question that elicited chuckles even from Stevens, who usually sits stone-faced during testimony.

Stevens friend testifies about billings

BOB PERSONS: Double Musky owner downplays Veco role.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER
Anchorage Daily News

(10/16/08 00:58:48)

WASHINGTON -- A few days before he was supposed to fly from Alaska to Washington and testify before a grand jury in May 2007, Bob Persons, the owner of the Double Musky restaurant in Girdwood, met with the investigation's target -- U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

The unusual timing of that meeting, and Stevens' suggestions to him about the facts in the case the government appeared to be building, became a subject of Persons' testimony Wednesday in Stevens' trial.

Persons was testifying on behalf of Stevens, his longtime friend and Girdwood neighbor, accused in a seven-count indictment of failing to report more than $250,000 in gifts and services, primarily from the oil-field service company Veco and its chief executive, Bill Allen.

Allen organized and paid a portion of the remodeling, furnishing and repairs of Stevens' home starting from 2000 to 2006, according to charges and evidence in the case.

Persons is expected to conclude his testimony this morning. The defense has announced just two more witnesses: Stevens' wife, Catherine, who the defense says was in charge of paying bills and financing the remodeling of the couple's Girdwood home; and Stevens himself.

Though it projected an examination of Stevens of several hours and potentially involving dozens of exhibits, the defense can still rest without calling him.

But as if to prove its intent, Stevens sat in the witness stand during a recess Wednesday and tested his ability to see the computer monitor where exhibits are displayed and to hear questions from his attorney spoken in a normal voice. Stevens, who is hard of hearing, has been listening to the trial with the assistance of court-supplied earphones, but he was without that aid in the practice run.

Once the defense rests, the government can present rebuttal witnesses, probably on Friday. Prosecutors said that so far, they just have three, and they won't be on the stand for long.

U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan said he hoped to conclude the case with closing arguments and instructions to the jury Monday.

PERSONS DOWNPLAYS VECO ROLE

FBI - Stevens-2186

Under friendly questioning by Robert Cary, one of Stevens' attorneys, Persons downplayed the role of Veco in the main phase of the renovations from late summer 2000 to early spring 2001. That's when the size of home was doubled -- through the work of contractors paid by Stevens, and from Veco workers, whom he didn't.

One of the trial's most memorable lines so far was uttered by Allen in his testimony for the prosecution two weeks ago, when he reported on a key conversation he had with Persons in 2002. Stevens had sent a note to Allen asking for a bill for Veco's work on the Girdwood house. But the note also asked Allen to speak with Persons about that very request.

When he did, Persons told him the request was for show, Allen said.

"Mr. Persons, did you say to Bill Allen, 'Bill, don't worry about getting a bill -- Ted's just covering his ass?' " Cary asked, quoting Allen's testimony.

"No," Persons said. "Crazy," he added, under his breath.

But Persons' testimony under cross-examination, despite claims of a bad memory, played into the government's assertions that Stevens was well aware of at least some of Veco's largesse on his behalf.

In May 2007, two months before the FBI raided Stevens' home for evidence of the Veco work, Persons was summoned to a grand jury that was meeting one floor below the courtroom where Stevens' trial is now under way.

Before he left for Washington, Persons said, he met with Stevens and told him the subjects the government was interested in. Among the items listed on his subpoena were "generators" and "decorative lights of any type" provided to Stevens.

"He said the generator really wasn't what he wanted," Persons recalled Stevens saying.

But the government has already presented testimony and exhibits showing that Stevens feared losing power due to the so-called Y2K bug between Dec. 31, 1999, and the new year. Veco paid to install a $6,000 generator with an automatic starter that would fire it up if the power failed. Stevens expressed his thanks for the work -- and never paid, according to the evidence.

Veco electricians and workers spent days installing rope lights around the house and buried a cable between the house and a 60-foot-plus spruce tree so the tree could be lit from bottom to top. Persons told the grand jury that the Stevens family "hated the lights," he said Wednesday, especially the ones in the tree.

Prosecutor Nicholas Marsh reminded Persons how he told the grand jury that Stevens said that he had just recently heard that Veco installed the lights.

"That's what you told the grand jury, because that's what Ted Stevens told you," said Marsh, who also was Persons' interrogator before the grand jury.

Then Marsh asked Persons to read a note Stevens wrote to Allen on Nov. 8, 2002, thanking him for all the work on the Girdwood home.

"The Christmas lights top it all -- our 60 foot tree lighted to the highest point!" Stevens wrote.

Persons also testified his home above his restaurant was among the places raided in a massive FBI operation around Alaska on Aug. 31, 2006. That's when six legislative offices were also searched, including the offices of the state senate president, Ben Stevens, Ted's son.

Persons agreed to an interview by agents searching his house but told them he had trouble remembering things, he said Wednesday. Reading from an FBI report of the encounter, Marsh said, the agents said Persons explained he had a family history of Alzheimer's disease.

Then why, Marsh asked, was he so good at remembering things from years ago during his examination by Stevens' attorney?

FBI - Stevens-2187

"When I see something that refreshes my memory, it helps," Persons said.

Persons, whose folksy mannerisms began when he took the stand and told the judge he'd rather be fishing, got a mild scolding for joking with the jury while they were leaving for their afternoon break. The judge, warning Persons he was to have no contact with jurors, asked him what he said.

"I said, 'Do you have a bathroom back there?' " Persons said, a question that elicited chuckles even from Stevens, who usually sits stone-faced during testimony.

'BUSINESS SUICIDE'

Earlier Wednesday, Augie Paone, the carpentry contractor on the Stevens renovation, said Catherine Stevens paid his first five bills after they were checked by Veco. But his sixth bill was never approved for submission to Stevens, and Paone decided not to send it to Stevens himself.

It would have been "business suicide" to cross Allen, Paone testified in explaining why he was bullied into not sending the senator a final $13,393 bill.

Allen told him he should "eat" the final bill from the home renovations, said Paone, who took the stand Wednesday as a defense witness. Paone, a residential specialist, said he was hired by Allen when it became apparent that Veco employees more used to oil-field work would be unable to complete the Stevens job before winter set in.

Paone testified Wednesday that he objected to not getting paid for his work at Stevens' home, especially after shelling out the cost of materials and wages. He testified he told that directly to Allen.

Allen told Paone he should "look at it as a political contribution," Paone testified.

"At first I was shocked," Paone said. "I also tried to hold on to my composure. I knew I was in a bind, because I knew he had me in a spot where I really couldn't do anything."

Paone said he was out of his league. He had five employees, Allen about 5,000.

Paone said he "thought about sending it over to the senator, but I knew it would be business suicide. I knew that I was between a rock and a hard place. I thought it was wiser -- or better business sense on my side -- to just leave it alone."

A few months later, Allen asked Paone's Christensen Builders to do work on his own house. Allen padded the cost of his own renovations to compensate for the $13,393 that Paone lost on the Stevens remodel, the carpenter testified.

"The understanding was that I will do some work for you but you still owe me $13,000," Paone said in court. "I was adamant that I was going to get paid for that bill that he owed me."

The bill he submitted to Allen, and which Allen paid, had a "Girdwood line item for "invoice from last year," though it didn't mention Stevens by name.

ALLEN'S CREDIBILITY ATTACKED

Stevens' legal team used Paone to chip away at Allen's credibility. Allen, who was the star witness for the prosecution, has pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers as part of the wide-ranging corruption investigation that drew in Stevens. Allen hasn't been sentenced yet.

One of the major themes of the defense case has been that Stevens and his wife paid all the bills that they received, and that Allen and other friends hid the true cost of the renovations, done mostly while the couple was in far-off Washington.

Yet some of Paone's testimony to a 2006 grand jury countered that theory, said prosecutor Joe Bottini, an assistant U.S. attorney from Anchorage. He asked Paone to refer to what he told grand jurors two years ago when the case was under investigation.

Didn't he go back to do additional work on the Stevens place?

He did, Paone said. He went back to work on the garage floor as well as to build shelves, including ski racks. Veco paid that $2,700 bill, Paone acknowledged. He also did some tiling on a fireplace at Stevens' home, he said, and the $850 expense was charged to Allen as part of the renovation work he did on the Veco chief executive officer's home.

In his cross-examination, Bottini countered with the argument that Stevens knew work was being done that he should have paid for but didn't. Work that Paone did after the main remodel was something that Stevens should have known he needed to pay for, Bottini suggested.

"This additional work that you did, months later, fixing the garage floor, putting the shelves up in the garage, the fireplace work, that was all work that anyone would notice, isn't it?" Bottini asked.

"I guess it would," Paone said.

Paone said his initial intent on taking the job was to fully document everything, with extreme care, because of Stevens' position. That plan fell apart in the end, he said.

"Didn't you tell the grand jurors that you always thought that someday something like this might happen?" Bottini asked.

"I was concerned that the senator wasn't getting billed for some of that stuff and I was concerned that something like this would happen," Paone said.

Stevens' wife takes stand for defense

By RICHARD MAUER AND ERIKA BOLSTAD

(10/16/08 08:40:32)

WASHINGTON - Jurors have seen photos of her home, heard from her friends, and seen dozens of checks she wrote, but Thursday, they finally heard from the wife of Sen. Ted Stevens herself, as she began testifying as a defense witness in her husband's corruption trial.

Catherine Stevens, a lawyer who appeared calm and poised while her husband's attorney, Robert Cary, questioned her, took the stand to help support the defense theory that the senator paid all bills he was given in connection with the renovations. She often turned and spoke directly to the jury.

Stevens may testify himself this afternoon. The 84-year-old Republican is on trial for failing to report more than $250,000 in gifts and services, largely from the oil-field service company Veco and its chief executive, his former friend, Bill Allen. Most of the gifts are connected to home renovations that doubled the size of the Stevens cabin in Girdwood.

Stevens' wife, who oversaw the financial details of the renovation work, said she assumed that two Veco Corp. employees on the job site in 2000 and 2001 were being paid by the contractor doing most of the work, Christensen Builders.

"He was working with Christensen Builders," Catherine Stevens said of Robert "Rocky" Williams. "He was on the job there. He was paid by them."

Same for David Anderson, another Veco employee working on their home, said Catherine Stevens.

"He was at the job site, I assumed he was working with Christensen Builders," she said.

Both workers were on the Veco payroll, according to earlier testimony. And Catherine Stevens testified that when she sent Williams a thank you gift certificate from Delta Airlines for all his work on their project, she sent it care of Veco's office in Anchorage.

"I don't know why, unless he asked that I sent it there," Catherine Stevens said. "He worked for Veco, I don't know how long."

Earlier in the day, prosecutors wrapped up their cross-examination of Bob Persons, Stevens' longtime friend and Girdwood neighbor, and a defense witness. Stevens' lawyers called him to strengthen their theory that the senator paid all bills he was given in connection with the renovations.

FBI - Stevens-2190

But prosecutors hit Persons hard both Wednesday and Thursday, pointing to inconsistencies in his testimony. When one of Stevens' defense attorneys, Robert Cary, asked Persons about conversations he had with Allen, Persons said he "reminded Bill (Allen) of all the times that the senator had told him that he had to give him bills for anything and everything that was done at that house."

Yet when asked by prosecutor Nicholas Marsh if he ever actually got an invoice from Allen, Persons said no.

One of Stevens' defense attorneys, asked Persons to describe a February 2006 interview with two FBI agents. The interview was very confusing, Persons said. It "reached a point where I don't know whether I was answering questions or he was," Persons said, describing the demeanor of one of the two agents who interviewed him at his home in Girdwood.

"It was like being mentally water-boarded," Persons said. "The guy was awe. That was the most hateful human being I ever met in my life. That guy made me understand why there's a lot of innocent people in prison."

"Senator, when you signed those forms, did you believe they were accurate and truthful?" asked his lawyer, Brendan Sullivan.

"Yes sir," Stevens said.

"Did you ever intentionally file false disclosure forms?" his lawyer asked.

"No, I did not," Stevens said.

"Did you ever engage in any scheme to conceal anything from the Senate?" Sullivan asked.

"No sir," Stevens said.

Sen. Stevens takes the stand

Senator voluntarily testifies in his defense on the same day his wife is cross-examined

By RICHARD MAUER and ERIKA BOLSTAD
Anchorage Daily News

(10/17/08 05:03:20)

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Ted Stevens took the stand in his own defense Thursday afternoon, erasing any doubts that he would finally break his public silence and answer at least some of the allegations of misconduct dogging him for the last two years.

After a day in which Stevens' wife faced sharp cross-examination, the jury returned from a late afternoon recess to see lead defense attorney Brendan Sullivan and Stevens standing at the defense table after everyone else sat down.

The judge summoned the courtroom to order, then Sullivan announced: "We call Sen. Ted Stevens."

With Stevens in the witness chair, his experienced trial attorney wasted no time getting to the central issue of the case: did the 40-year veteran of the Senate disgrace his career by filing false disclosures to hide some $250,000 in gifts between 1999 and 2006.

"Senator, when you signed those forms, did you believe they were accurate and truthful?" asked Sullivan.

"Yes, sir," Stevens said.

"Did you ever intentionally file false disclosure forms?" his lawyer asked.

"No, I did not," Stevens said.

"Did you ever engage in any scheme to conceal anything from the Senate?" Sullivan asked.

"No, sir," Stevens said.

The 84-year-old Alaska Republican is on trial on seven counts of filing false senate disclosures. Most of the alleged gifts were from the Alaska-based oil field service company Veco, now defunct, and its chief executive, Stevens' former friend Bill Allen. Most of the gifts are connected to renovations from 2000 to 2001 that doubled the size of the Stevenses' Girdwood home.

After the brief assertion of his innocence, Stevens' lawyer switched to a gentler line of inquiry: a 20-minute autobiography that began with Stevens' humble Depression-era origins in Indiana, outlined his World War II career flying transports in Asia, and talked about his journey into law and public service. Stevens told the jury about the plane crash in Anchorage that killed his first wife, Ann, and four others. From the stand, Stevens acknowledged the only other survivor of the crash, Tony Motley, a former diplomat who sat with other Stevens supporters in the courtroom Thursday.

Stevens is not required to take the stand, and jurors could not hold it against him if he had decided not to testify, the judge advised the senator before he began his testimony.

FBI - Stevens-2194

But Stevens, a senator since 1968, faces not just jurors in Washington, D.C., but the first competitive race of his Senate career back in Alaska. He has been stuck inside a federal courtroom for the past four weeks while 3,500 miles away, the Democratic mayor of Anchorage, Mark Begich, has been campaigning to replace him.

More than that, he has refused to discuss questions about his own integrity that have arisen since the FBI investigation of public corruption in Alaska surfaced with a coordinated series of raids on Aug. 31, 2006.

SENATOR IS ADAMANT ABOUT TESTIFYING

With the jury out, U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan asked Stevens and Brendan Sullivan to stand before the bench and answer questions to ensure Stevens understood his right to not testify. Stevens, once a territorial prosecutor in Fairbanks, was adamant about taking the stand.

"It's a privilege and a duty," he said.

The court recessed for the day as Stevens concluded his autobiography. Brendan Sullivan said he had about two hours of questions for his client when testimony resumes this morning, then the prosecution will get its turn.

The case is expected to go the jury early next week.

Stevens was preceded on the witness stand by his second wife, Catherine, who played either a major role or modest role in the renovations, depending on which theory of the case to believe. The defense says she handled the Stevens family finances and oversaw the home, but the government has introduced testimony and scores of e-mails, notes and other contemporaneous documents that show Sen. Stevens himself commenting on details of the Girdwood renovations by Veco employees.

Virtually every day for the first 12 days of trial, the government introduced evidence showing that Veco employees -- particularly electricians and a plumber -- were on the job daily, that the project's two supervisors, Robert "Rocky" Williams and Dave Anderson, were being paid by Veco. Veco provided much of the materials for the renovation and all the later additions and some repairs and furnishings, according to the evidence.

There has been no evidence that the Stevens ever paid Veco a penny for the work.

On the other hand, a parallel work team, from the home-building contractor Christensen Builders of Anchorage, also worked on the job, mainly doing the carpentry. The Stevenses paid more than $100,000 to Christensen -- all but one of their invoices. Christensen's final $13,000 invoice was paid by Allen.

CATHERINE STEVENS STICKS TO HER STORY

In her testimony Thursday, Catherine Stevens acknowledged that Christensen Builders was recommended by Allen. How did she know Allen had enough experience with home contractors to make an intelligent recommendation, she was asked under cross examination.

"He had a firm involved in construction," she said.

What kind of construction?

"I don't know what he did," she said.

Does he build houses?

Stevens replied that Allen's firm works on the North Slope, there were houses on the North Slope, so therefore he might have built houses.

Every other witness to testify about Veco's scope of expertise said it only encompassed oil-field, industrial and commercial work, though some employees had prior residential experience.

Catherine Stevens acknowledged that Williams and Anderson worked on the project but asserted that she believed they were being paid by Christensen -- even though she said she knew they were Veco employees before, knew they were Veco employees later, and sent mail to Williams at the Veco offices.

"He was working with Christensen Builders," she said of Williams. "He was on the job there. He was paid by them."

The same was true for Anderson, s[illegible] added. She said she assumed she w[illegible] paying their wages in the Christensen bills she paid.

She was the only witness in the case to offer such a theory.

Catherine Stevens, also an attorney and former prosecutor, stuck to her story even under cross examination by the lead trial attorney for the government, Brenda Morris. She professed to not know anything or have any curiosity about the man who drew the architectural plans, a Veco engineer, including whether he was qualified. She said she had no idea how a large deck appeared on the new first floor of her house a year after Christensen Builders finished their job -- work done by Veco.

"I don't know who built the deck," Catherine Stevens said. "We paid for the deck, I thought."

"Weren't you responsible for paying the renovations at the chalet?" Morris asked. "Who sent you a bill you thought was paid?"

Stevens' wife said she called the bookkeeper in her husband's Senate office to see if a bill had come in, but then said, "I forgot about it" and never followed up.

'IT WASN'T MY FURNITURE'

Under direct testimony, Catherine Stevens continually expressed anger over things she found in her house or that were added in construction -- items that came from Allen. There was the grated steel steps, built at great expense by Allen's nephew, Anderson, so snow would fall through and not have to be shoveled.

What was her reaction when she saw it?

"I was extremely angry," she told defense attorney Robert Cary. She wanted wood.

What about the steel platform at the bottom of the steps?

"I was extremely upset because they were very dangerous," she said.

How about the big Viking grill that Allen's employees bought and installed on her deck with a crane?

"I was angry because I did not know how it got there." For some reason, though natural gas was plumbed throughout her house, the fact that the grill used gas also made her angry -- and fearful of fire.

"I did not want any kind of gas anything," she said.

How about the furniture Allen gave to her from the apartment he was leaving?

"I was a very unhappy person when I saw it in my chalet," she said. "It wasn't my furniture, and my furniture wasn't there."

Under cross examination, she couldn't explain why, after seven years, she never got rid of the furniture she disliked so much, or why she didn't demand the contractors take out the steel stairs, or tell Allen to get rid of the grill.

"You make close to a half million dollars a year, why can't you get that out of there?" Morris asked. "Why does Bill Allen have to get it out of there?"

She said it belonged to Allen.

"Then send it to the dump!" Morris said. "He doesn't know any better."

Morris, through her questions, portrayed Catherine Stevens as a wealthy Washingtonian who treated Stevens' office staff like servants. Stevens aide Barbara Flanders maintained her checkbook, Stevens acknowledged, paying her bills from Nordstrom, Neiman Marcus and Sacks Fifth Avenue.

"She was your human ATM machine," Morris said, getting cash when she needed and sending it home in Sen. Stevens' briefcase.

Stevens bristles under cross-examination

By ERIKA BOLSTAND and RICHARD MAUER
Anchorage Daily News
(10/17/08 15:38:05)

WASHINGTON - Throughout his four-week corruption trial, Sen. Ted Stevens has sat quietly, listening to testimony from tradesmen about free home repairs and gifts, silent as the star witness told jurors that the Alaska Republican was merely "covering his ass" when he asked for bills.

But by late this afternoon, jurors had gotten a taste of the cranky 84-year-old senator who once called himself "the meanest man in town."

"Aren't these e-mails really what you're doing, you're covering your bottom?" asked Brenda Morris, the lead Justice Department prosecutor on his case, asking Stevens about how he handled a 2004 press inquiry into who paid for his renovations.

"My bottom wasn't bare," Stevens snapped back.

Stevens spent a grueling day on the witness stand, beginning with his lawyer guiding him through nearly four hours of testimony in the morning and early afternoon. In the final hours of the day, Morris spent more than an hour on follow-up questions.

The senator stuck with the two prevailing themes of his defense: that he wanted none of the gifts he had been given, and that his wife was responsible for the home renovations that led, in part, to his federal indictment. Stevens is accused of failing to disclose more than $250,000 in gifts - including free labor - that helped double the square-footage of his modest A-frame cabin in Girdwood.

Stevens, whose 40-year career in the Senate has given him a temperament more accustomed to being the one doing the questioning, bristled at having to wait to be asked. He wasn't always able to control himself, and he made his disdain for Morris clear by occasionally responding to her questions with inquiries of his own.

"I think you better rephrase your question; your question is tautological," he lectured Morris in response to a question about renovations to his deck.

Stevens testified he and his wife wanted none of the gifts and that they were especially annoyed when they returned to their newly renovated home in 2000 and found that Bill Allen, the chief witness against him, had replaced their furniture with used stuff of his own.

FBI - Stevens-2198

"If you didn't want all these items, why didn't you just ask for your key back?" Morris asked. "Why didn't you take away his key?"

"He was a good friend, and I trusted him," Stevens said of Allen, former chief of Veco Corp., an oilfield-services company and one of the largest private employers in Alaska. "He did things I didn't like and I asked him to change and he said he would. But he didn't."

Earlier in the day, under questioning by his own lawyer, Stevens had accused Allen of lying to jurors about conversations the two had when they were still friends.

Allen testified earlier in Stevens' corruption trial that he never gave Stevens invoices for work done on the senator's home in Girdwood, even though Stevens asked for them. Allen, who pleaded guilty last year to bribing Alaska state lawmakers, agreed to testify in Stevens' trial and two others in exchange for leniency in his own sentencing.

-869 194A-AN-13620-

Stevens disputed Allen's account of a 2006 conversation in Arizona, where they were both vacationing on their annual "boot camps" - get-togethers in which they would drink wine and walk in the desert to shed weight. Allen testified that he and Stevens talked about the need for the senator to receive invoices for the Veco work on the house. But Stevens denied the conversation.

"That's just an absolute lie - I heard it," Stevens said, referring to Allen's courtroom testimony. "It's just an absolute lie."

Stevens also disputed Allen's account of a conversation the two had in Alaska at a restaurant owned by a mutual friend in Girdwood. Stevens told him he was aware that his friend had done more work on the house than he was letting on, Allen testified.

That was "another falsehood," said Stevens.

Stevens also expanded on the "teepee" theory his lawyer, Brendan Sullivan, first introduced in the opening day of the trial. His wife was responsible for everything inside the teepee, Stevens said.

"What goes on inside" was up to Catherine, Stevens said. "Outside is my business."

When Stevens described his initial vision for renovating their cabin by adding a garage and a bunkroom on the first floor, he testified that it wasn't what his wife wanted and, therefore, they came up with a more elegant design.

"When she said she didn't like that plan, there was a new plan, and there was no argument," Stevens said. "And I wasn't unhappy about it. I was happy about that."

Catherine was in charge of all of it, Stevens testified. She obtained the line of credit, maintained the checkbook for their house-related expenses and received all of the bills. She paid them all too, Stevens said.

"She got all the bills and paid all the bills," he said.

Yet Stevens himself demonstrated extensive knowledge of how much money was going into the project. He asked his old law school friend, George Reycraft, to dissolve a trust worth about $50,000 to devote to the renovations. He instructed his bookkeeper to open up a bank account with $10,000, and he and his wife took out a line of credit together.

Stevens - and not his wife - also met with the Veco engineer who drew up the plans for the house. Once the drawings were complete, he wrote a note to the engineer asking for a bill, telling him that "under Senate rules, I must pay you for what you have done," and adding, "Now I want you to give us a bill for your work."

He never got a bill from Veco or the engineer, John Hess, Stevens testified today, and could not find any record of Hess replying to his letter.

Stevens' wife had a differing version of the story Thursday, when she testified. Hess' design was drawn up before they hired their main contractor, Christensen Builders, but Catherine Stevens testified she thought they were paying for the plans through Christensen Builders.

"I assume that it was part of the contract when we were paying for the construction of the chalet," she testified Thursday.

"You just took a drawing from someone you never met?" asked the prosecutor.

"Yep," said Catherine Stevens.

The trial, which began Sept. 22 with jury selection, is likely to conclude Monday.

The jury could begin deliberations as soon as Tuesday.

Senator spars with prosecutor

STEVENS TRIAL: He says he concealed nothing: There was nothing to conceal.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER
Anchorage Daily News

(10/18/08 03:57:34)

WASHINGTON -- As it was, the witness chair was an unfamiliar venue for the senator of 40 years. But the aggressive, hostile questions Friday from a senior government prosecutor landed hard on Sen. Ted Stevens, famed for his short fuse.

Baited with rapid-fire challenges to his integrity, honesty and credibility, Stevens mainly answered "yes" or "no" before a jury that will soon be judging him, and keeping to his story that he didn't believe he received any gifts from the oil-field service company Veco or its chairman, Bill Allen.

Earlier Friday, questioned by his own attorney, Stevens dismissed earlier testimony from Allen that the senator once acknowledged owing the Veco boss money for the work. He called what Allen said in court "an absolute lie."

By late Friday afternoon, jurors had gotten a taste of the testy 84-year-old senator, who once called himself "the meanest man in town."

"Aren't these e-mails really what you're doing, you're covering your bottom?" asked Brenda Morris, the lead Justice Department prosecutor on his case, asking Stevens about how he handled a 2004 press inquiry into who paid for his renovations. The question referred back to the most memorable line of the trial, when Allen testified Oct. 1 that Stevens was just "covering his ass" in asking for invoices he had no intention of paying.

"My bottom wasn't bare," Stevens snapped back at Morris.

Stevens spent a grueling day on the witness stand, beginning with his lawyer guiding him through nearly four hours of testimony in the morning and early afternoon. Morris spent more than an hour on follow-up questions before the trial recessed for the weekend. Stevens is scheduled to be back in the witness chair Monday morning.

Stevens is charged in a seven-count felony indictment with lying on Senate disclosure forms from 1999-2006 by failing to report gifts, services and other benefits. Most were from Veco or Allen, both deeply involved in the renovations on Stevens' official residence in Girdwood starting in 2000.

Stevens' veteran defense attorney, Brendan Sullivan, spent most of the direct examination going over the list of alleged gifts item by item, with Stevens' specific refutation.

E-MAIL EVIDENCE

FBI - Stevens-2200

The process, used by both prosecution and defense, has become almost a rite: The witness, in this case Stevens, is directed to read a passage in an e-mail or note projected on monitors throughout the courtroom, including a large number of flat-screen panels shared by jurors. Often the same correspondence is used by the opposing side, only with different emphasis.

By now, some jurors could probably recite by heart the first three sentences of Government's Exhibit 509. It's come up with both Allen and Stevens to prove the government's case that Stevens knew about the work Veco did on his home, and by the defense to prove Stevens' intentions were honest.

The exhibit is a handwritten note from Stevens to Allen on Nov. 8, 2002 -- a few days after Stevens won his sixth full term.

"Many thanks for all you have done to make our living easier and our home more enjoyable. The Christmas lights top it all -- our 80-foot tree lighted to the highest point!"

The lights, in fact, have turned into a key matter of contention. Veco installed hundreds of feet of rope lighting on the house, then built an underground cable to the spruce and installed two electric boxes and weather-proof outlets on the trunk. Veco workers ran the lights up the tree using a boom truck.

Despite the note, Stevens said he didn't like the lights and only wanted Allen to find someone to put up his own small colored lights he stored in his garage. Some of the strands he bought at post-Christmas sales, he said.

The third sentence in Government Exhibit 509 is: "Don't forget we need a bill for what's been done at the Chalet."

Stevens never got a bill from Allen.

UNWANTED 'GIFTS'

The tedious list of refutations by Stevens during his direct examination became quick fodder for Morris when she opened her cross examination with a jolt.

You didn't want the rope lights, she asked.

That's right, said Stevens.

You didn't want the first-floor deck?

I said I didn't expect it, corrected Stevens.

You didn't want the plastic roof over the deck?

I didn't know about that, said Stevens.

You didn't want the steel staircase?

No.

You didn't want the gas grill?

No.

You didn't want the fish statue?

No.

You didn't know about the repairs to the garage?

I did.

You didn't want the big black furniture?

No.

You didn't want the tools?

No.

Stevens said all those items appeared without him asking, starting in 2001. He couldn't stop Allen from giving them to him.

"If you didn't want all these items, why didn't you ask for the key back?" Morris said.

"Because we were still friends," Stevens said. "He was still using the place more than I was."

"You were the 'Lion of the Senate,'" she said, a sarcastic reference to character witness testimony earlier in the week by Sen. Orrin Hatch. "But you didn't know how to stop a man from putting stuff in your place?"

"He was a good friend," Stevens again said of Allen.

"He did things I didn't like and I asked him to change and he said he would," Stevens added later. "But he didn't."

JUNK-YARD STAIRCASE

Stevens continually denied knowing that Veco itself provided any material or labor. But pressed on the grated steel staircase, custom-welded by Allen's nephew, Stevens said that Allen told him it came from the junk yard after it was removed from an oil platform

Did Allen have a junk yard in his home, Morris asked, or was it Veco's junk yard?

Stevens said he figured its cost was folded into the bills his wife actually paid to one of the contractors, Christensen Buildings. The owner of the company had earlier testified he had nothing to do with the staircase.

Over the course of the trial, the Washington jury has had a crash course in Alaskaology: the state's vast distances and regions, its unique Native corporations, dog mushing, the Kenai River and salmon fishing, the conflict between sport and commercial fishermen, Girdwood weather, roof glaciation and heat tape, moose on the highways, time zones, Statehood, the unending number of people planning to came to Alaska for a year or two only to stay for decades, and lots more.

Stevens added two new ones.

While Stevens made several requests for bills over the course of the cabin renovation, Morris noted, why didn't he ever ask for the price? The Veco architect who drew plans -- Stevens sent him a note at his Veco office, asking for a bill. Yet Stevens never asked, before or after, how much the plans would cost -- if he was serious about paying, why did he not get an estimate first, Morris asked.

"I don't ask him about his hourly wage. I just asked him for his bill. That's the Alaska way," Stevens said.

Did he check the architect's references, see whether he was licensed? No, said Stevens, he trusted Allen's recommendation.

Did he see whether the architect was bonded?

FBI - Stevens-2202

"We don't require anyone to have a bond," Stevens said. "That's not the Alaska way."

The architect, John Hess, was a Veco engineer who testified that he drew up the plans on company time. Hess said he wrote Stevens back that he couldn't charge for his time -- Stevens would have to pay Veco, he said.

Stevens said he never got that reply from Hess.

Stevens bristled at times during the cross-examination, having to wait for a question before he could reply. Sometimes the judge intervened. Stevens showed his disdain for Morris' questions by occasionally responding with inquiries of his own.

"I think you better rephrase your question, your question is tautological," he lectured Morris in response to a question about renovations to his deck.

And for a brief moment, Stevens and Morris traded roles.

Morris said he knew he was getting gifts when he sought a bill.

"If it's a gift, why did I ask for a bill?" said Stevens, redirecting the question to Morris.

"To cover your butt," she replied.

"That wasn't fair, ma'am," Stevens said.

WORKING ARRANGEMENTS

Earlier in the day, under questioning by his own lawyer, Stevens had accused Allen of lying to jurors about conversations the two had when they were still friends.

Allen testified earlier in Stevens' corruption trial that he never gave Stevens invoices for work done on the senator's home in Girdwood, even though Stevens asked for them. Allen, who pleaded guilty last year to bribing Alaska state lawmakers, agreed to testify in Stevens' trial and two others in exchange for leniency in his own sentencing.

Stevens disputed Allen's account of a 2006 conversation in Arizona, where they were both vacationing on their annual "boot camps" -- get-togethers where they would drink wine and walk in the desert to shed weight. Allen testified that he and Stevens talked about the need for the senator to receive invoices for the Veco work on the house. But Stevens denied the conversation.

"That's just an absolute lie, I heard it," Stevens said, referring to Allen's courtroom testimony. "It's just an absolute lie."

Stevens also expanded on the "teepee" theory his lawyer, Brendan Sullivan, first introduced in the opening day of the trial. His wife was responsible for everything inside the teepee, Stevens said.

"What goes on inside" was up to Catherine, Stevens said. "Outside is my business." That system suited them both, he said.

When Stevens described his initial vision for renovating their cabin by adding a garage and a bunkroom on the first floor, he testified that it wasn't what his wife wanted and, therefore, they came up with a more elegant design.

"When she said she didn't like that plan, there was a new plan, and there was no argument," Stevens said. "And I wasn't unhappy about it."

Which Stevens will jurors judge?

ARGUMENTS: Attorneys present

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER
Anchorage Daily News

(10/21/08 20:35:23)

WASHINGTON — The man Alaskans have chosen to represent them in the U.S. Senate for 40 years was decried by prosecutors Tuesday as mean-spirited, sputtering liar who is so lacking in character that he'd blame anyone — including his wife — to avoid shouldering responsibility himself.

Not so, countered defense attorney Brendan Sullivan: "They ask you to brand him a criminal, tarnish everything he's done for 84 years, despite the fact the evidence is unrefuted that he's an honorable, truthful man."

Thus two visions of Sen. Ted Stevens, 84, clashed in sharp relief as a federal jury heard six hours of closing arguments in his disclosure trial. Stevens, who's running for re-election, is charged in a seven-count indictment of lying year after year about gifts and benefits on his official Senate disclosure statements.

The central item is the renovation of his house in Girdwood from 2000 to 2001, in which the oil-field service company Veco, under chairman Bill Allen, provided substantial labor and material.

But the government also brought in evidence of other gifts from 1999 through 2006 from Allen, Veco, and friends Bob and Jeanie Penney and Bob Persons, owner of the Double Musky restaurant in Girdwood. They include a powerful back-up generator, an outdoor gas range, an expensive massage chair, a puppy of sled-dog pedigree, a stained glass window, furniture, tools and home repairs and improvements.

U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan said he will deliver about two hours of instructions to the jury this morning before it retires for deliberations. Then, after a trial spanning nearly a month, the waiting begins.

Under court rules, prosecutors had two shots for their arguments, with the defense sandwiched in the middle. Each side had three hours to make its case.

GOOD FRIEND NAMED ALLEN

Joe Bottini, an assistant U.S. Attorney from Anchorage on loan to the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in its broad investigation of public corruption in Alaska, began the government's case with a soft-spoken, methodical rendition of its evidence.

Bottini re-introduced the players in the drama, leading with Allen.

FBI - Stevens-2204

"Ted Stevens had a good friend and his name was Bill Allen," Bottini said. Stevens knew that Allen would give him "hundreds of thousands of dollars of free benefits," Bottini said.

Bottini cut to a short audio clip of Allen and Persons talking in a wiretapped conversation.

"Ted gets hysterical when he has to spend his own money," Persons told Allen. "The flip side of it is, he can't really afford to pay a bunch of money."

That's where's were Allen came in, Bottini said.

"Bill Allen was rich, Bill Allen was generous — Bill Allen was not hysterical about spending his own money," Bottini told the jury.

The case starts in 1999, when Stevens, fearful of a Y2K power failure, asked Allen to "hook up" a generator.

In his testimony, Stevens said he meant he wanted Allen to rent a small portable unit just for the period around New Years Eve. What he got was a generator that was lifted with a crane, installed in a permanent shed and wired to the house with an automatic switch that started up if the power went off — a $6,000-plus set-up. The next fall, when Veco began working on his addition, it moved the generator to the other side of the house and put in a new transfer switch with double the rating.

Stevens knew full well what he got, Bottini said, and never told Allen to get rid of it, or made an offer to pay for it. Yet he never listed the generator as a gift.

"He disclosed nothing because he didn't want anyone to know," Bottini said. "Can you imagine what the press would have done if he put it on that form? It would have been front-page news." The pressure from the public would have put a stop to any more gifts, Bottini said.

Bottini went through the list of smaller items. Anticipating that the defense might ridicule the prosecution for "making a federal case about this dog," Bottini explained that the dog showed how Stevens engineered a cover up in 2004.

"The case isn't about the dog. It's about what he did," Bottini said.

'CLASSIC COVER-UP'

According to testimony, Stevens was ogling a blue-eyed, white-fur husky puppy at the Kenai River Classic charity auction in 2003. He made an early bid, but Penney, an Anchorage real estate developer with a passion for Kenai River sportfishing, won the dog for $1,000. Stevens ended up with the dog anyway. The following May, when he was preparing his disclosure, he sent e-mails to Penney and others suggesting that he couldn't accept the dog as a $1,000 gift because that was over the gift limit.

"He calls it his, pardon me, his 'goddam' disclosure form," Bottini said, quoting one of the e-mails. "That pretty much displays his attitude."

By the time Stevens filled out his disclosure, it became a $250 gift. How? Penney claimed he donated the $1,000 dog not directly to Stevens but to the Kenai River Sport Fishing Association. The association then donated the dog to Stevens, who listed it as a $250 present — a value within the Senate rules.

"This is a classic cover-up, ladies and gentlemen," Bottini said. "What they tried to do is structure a story so that he launders the dog through the Classic."

While the dog and other gifts played out among his small circle of friends, the home remodel was something else: It took place in public and required specialist contractors who couldn't be trusted — or who may not want to give Stevens anything, Bottini said.

The solution? Have a mix of contractors paid by Stevens and workers from Veco — 19 in all — paid by Allen. As Bottini spoke, the names of the Veco workers appeared on a monitor.

FBI - Stevens-2205

Stevens and his wife paid about $160,000 to the contractors. The value of Veco's work, even after the judge removed some of the evidence, was at least $100,000, Bottini said.

Even if Veco didn't do the most efficient job because it specialized in oil field construction, so what. "He knew that the price was right — he was going to get this work for free," Bottini said.

'INNOCENT MAN'

Stevens' lawyer, Sullivan, accused prosecutors of offering a "twisted" account of Sen. Ted Stevens' life over the past eight years. He told jurors that "you have an innocent man on your hands" and that government investigators have exaggerated the case against the Republican senator.

"If you look at life through a filthy, dirty glass, then the whole world looks dirty," Sullivan said of the corruption case that the Justice Department brought against Stevens. "You have here evidence that this is a very decent man. Would he be involved in a conspiracy, year after year, covering up?"

Sullivan, famous for his courtroom theatrics, modulated his voice, rising from shouts of outrage with his arms pumping over his head to soft-spoken, almost intimate conversation. At one point, jurors in the back row stopped him and said they couldn't hear his words.

Sullivan reminded jurors that in a case such as this, where Stevens' truthfulness is at stake, they can take into account the testimony of character witnesses. A parade of character witnesses, including Gen. Colin Powell, testified to Stevens' truthfulness, character and integrity earlier in the trial.

"The law thinks that a good life is worth something," Sullivan said. "It permits that kind of evidence so that you can rely upon it when you have to go in that room to make a decision that affects his life." Sullivan also used his time to focus on the same themes that he worked to elicit from Stevens himself when the senator took the stand in his own defense in the final three days of the trial.

Stevens maintained throughout his own testimony that he didn't want the things he was given and that he never received bills for some of the work done on his home, even though he asked for invoices. He placed the blame on his wife, Catherine, saying repeatedly that she was responsible for overseeing the renovations that led, in part, to his federal indictment.

"They believed they paid their debts and they didn't think they were getting anything for free," Sullivan said.

Sullivan ridiculed the government's case as an effort to paint Stevens as "some mastermind of conspiracy."

"Honest, truthful men like that don't engage in six-year conspiracies," he said.

On the other hand, Allen, the government's chief witness, had a strong motive to lie, Sullivan said. Allen was protecting his family in the deal he made with the government when he pleaded guilty to bribing state legislators, he said. In the deal, the government agreed to not prosecute his son, Mark, or any other family member.

"What will a man say on the witness stand to prevent his children from being charged?" Sullivan suddenly thundered in the courtroom. "Have you ever heard of a motive to lie worse than holding your family and son hostage?"

'STAND UP TO HIM'

Look beyond his title of senator, said Brenda Morris, the lead Justice Department prosecutor on the case, as she concluded the government's closing arguments.

"I ask you to do something that very few people have done," Morris said, recalling Stevens' sometimes snarling responses to her cross examination. "Stand up to him. Behind all that growling, and all those snappy comebacks and that righteous indignation, he's just a man. He should stand up and take responsibility like everyone who comes into the courtroom. Make him responsible."

Stevens was eloquent on the stand when he spoke of his own accomplishments, Morris said. But when he was asked about the renovations, she said, "he started stuttering and sputtering. Because he can't answer that because what he was telling you nonsense."

More than the other two lawyers, Morris tried to connect personally with the jury, asking them to think what it would be like to talk about the case in a friend's kitchen.

"Don't leave your common sense at the door," she said.

Recalling all the times Stevens said that he was surprised to find items left by Allen, Morris said: "Maybe since the defendant lives so close to the North Pole, maybe Santa and his elves came down and did this work and completed it. He had no idea."

Stevens said his wife managed the construction project, but the testimony only showed her writing checks and making some minor decorating de ns, Morris said.

"Why all the sudden now is Catherine going to be responsible for this renovation? She's the mover and shaker on this? All you see her name associated with is the starfish knobs and paint," Morris said. "He testified here on Friday that his wife explained herself quite well," Morris said of Stevens. "That woman, Catherine Stevens, is still recovering from the bus he threw her under."

Through most of her presentation, Stevens sat with his eyes closed, his face gray. How could Stevens not be able to stop Allen from giving him things, she said.

"He didn't know how to get his key back?" she asked, reminding the jury that even after he changed the locks, he gave Allen the new key. "He didn't know how to stop a crazy man from putting stuff all up in his house?"

She said Stevens kept changing his story as his needs changed.

"What is consistent is that everyone is to blame but the defendant," she said. It was Bill Allen's fault. It was his wife's fault. It was his secretary's fault. It was the fault of Veco employees.

"This is a lawyer. This is a man who knows details. And it's everyone's fault but his," she said.

Stevens' defense rests

TRIAL: Senator is last witness; final arguments are scheduled for today.

By RICHARD MAUER and ERIKA BOLSTAD
Anchorage Daily News

(10/21/08 00:36:26)

WASHINGTON -- The defense rested Monday in Sen. Ted Stevens' disclosure trial after the Alaska senator spent another tense, and at times contentious, three hours in the witness chair.

For the second day, Stevens was confronted with contradictions in his story by the lead prosecutor in the case, Brenda Morris. If Stevens didn't consider furniture from Veco chairman Bill Allen a gift when he received it in 2001, for instance, why did he offer it to his son Ben in 2005?

Stevens replied that he never owned the furniture.

How about the $2,695 massage chair that Girdwood neighbor and Double Musky owner Bob Persons had delivered to Stevens' Washington home in 2001 and intended it to be a present, based on e-mails Persons sent when he first attempted to get the chair?

It was not a gift, Stevens said. It belongs to Persons. It's just been in his house in Washington for seven years.

"I told him I would not accept is as a gift," Stevens said. "We have lots of things in our house that do not belong with us."

Then how about the e-mail in December 2001 which Stevens sent to Persons, Morris asked. "The chair arrived and it's great, you can't tell him how much you enjoyed it. Why are you thanking him for a loan?" she asked.

"Because that's what he said it would be," Stevens replied.

In fact, Stevens said, he planned to ship the chair back to Persons in Alaska with other furniture from Washington to use in the Girdwood house, but there wasn't any room in the "chalet" -- the place was filled with Allen's stuff, he said.

Where was his original furniture?

"Bill Allen stole our furniture and put his in our chalet," Stevens said.

"Why didn't you call the police?" Morris asked.

FBI - Stevens-2208

"It never crossed my mind to call the police at that time," Stevens said. "I might now."

CLOSING ARGUMENTS TODAY

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan sent the jury home at lunchtime with instruction to return for closing arguments at 9:30 a.m. today.

Both sides were planning three hours each to sum up their case. Sullivan then plans to instruct jurors in the law Wednesday morning before identifying and dismissing the four alternates and sending the remaining 12 to the jury room for deliberations.

Even as his trial unfolded over the last month in a courtroom in Washington, Stevens' surrogates have been running his re-election campaign for a seventh full term 3,500 miles back in Alaska against Anchorage Mayor

-872 194A-AN-13620-M e

Mark Begich, a Democrat.

But each day that passes without a verdict is one day closer to the Nov. 4 election with the central question in the Senate race -- Stevens' guilt or innocence -- unanswered.

Stevens, a Republican, had sought an early trial date hoping he could face voters riding the crest of a not-guilty verdict. But with 15 days of testimony and additional time spent on legal wrangling, the case will get to the jury just two weeks before the election. Lead prosecutor Brenda Morris from the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section began her cross-examination of Stevens on Monday where she left off Friday: the free stuff that appeared at his home in Girdwood from Bill Allen, the chairman of the oil-field service company Veco and a big-time Republican contributor. Stevens and wife Catherine said they didn't ask for the furniture that Allen brought from his old apartment in Anchorage in 2001 -- hated it, in fact.

The furniture was never listed as a gift on Stevens' disclosure forms, a Senate requirement for presents over $260 that year.

The government charges that Veco, Allen and other Alaska friends of Stevens gave him at least $250,000 in gifts and other benefits from 1999 to 2006. The gifts themselves weren't illegal, prosecutors say. Rather, it was Stevens' cover up -- his alleged failure to report them, they said. His motive? Keep Alaska voters in the dark so they wouldn't question his ethics, prosecutors said.

FURNITURE, SERVICES AND BEN STEVENS

Stevens has offered a variety of explanations for why he committed no crime. He thought he paid for some of the services, like the major renovations of his Girdwood home from 2000-2001, and some of the Veco-provided maintenance and repairs that followed. Some things he never wanted and when they arrived, he didn't use. Other items were loans, he said.

"The big, black leather furniture that Bill Allen left at your house -- do you recall?" Morris asked when her cross examination resumed Monday.

"Yes," Stevens said.

"With the cigarette burns?" said Morris.

"That's correct," said Stevens.

"It remains there?" said Morris of the furniture that arrived in 2001.

"Yes," said Stevens.

Morris showed Stevens an e-mail he sent to Allen on July 14, 2005.

"Ben and Elizabeth are looking at a larger house," the e-mail said. "We told them if they got one we'd let them have the black furniture you brought to the Chalet. I hope that is OK. Is the old stuff we had still in the warehouse?"

FBI - Stevens-2209

Morris asked Stevens, "You're trying to regift the furniture that's so hideous to your son, isn't that correct?"

"No," said Stevens

That's the same Ben Stevens who got $243,000 from Veco, Morris asked, referring to a brief reference earlier in the case to "consulting fees" Veco paid to Ben.

"He worked for Veco, I don't know how much money he got," Stevens said.

The same Ben Stevens who made $715,000 from the Special Olympics? Morris said, referring to what she earlier said were newspaper reports of Ben Stevens' salary when he ran the Anchorage committee putting on the winter games in 2001.

Stevens said he didn't know how much his son was paid.

Why would Stevens give furniture to his son that he didn't own in the first place, Morris asked.

Referring to the e-mail to Allen, Stevens replied, "Why would I ask for permission if it's a gift to me?"

That brought an admonishment from the judge to him: "Answer the question, sir."

'GO RIGHT AHEAD WITH YOUR QUESTIONS, MISS'

On Friday, Stevens, famous for his testiness, answered many questions with questions of his own, but the judge's rebuke seemed to have had an effect Monday.

Stevens answered most the questions with "Yes, ma'am" or "No ma'am," but a few times he curtly called Morris "Miss."

For instance, when Morris was questioning him about his possession of a $29,000 fish sculpture on his deck that he claimed was a gift to his future senatorial library "when I'm gone," he said, "It belongs to the foundation. ... You go right ahead with your questions, Miss."

At one point in her cross examination, Morris tried setting a trap for Stevens over who was paying the salary of Rocky Williams, the Veco supervisor on the Girdwood remodeling project. The evidence in the trial was that Williams was paid by Veco, making his work a gift to Stevens. But did Stevens know that when he compiled his disclosure forms for the years 2000 and 2001?

In late September 2000, when work on the house was well under way with Williams and other Veco workers framing the addition that doubled the size of the house, Allen recommended Stevens hire Christensen Builders of Anchorage, owned by Augie Paone, for carpentry and cabinet work. From then until around March 2001, Catherine Stevens paid Christensen more than $100,000 for the work -- less than half the total cost of the project, according to the government.

Catherine Stevens earlier testified that she assumed she paid Williams' salary through Christensen's bills -- even though she knew he worked for Veco before and after the project and received mail at Veco's headquarters during the project.

With Ted Stevens on the stand, Morris began a methodical display of e-mail messages received and sent by the senator that referenced Williams. Most were from Persons, who kept his eye on the project for Stevens.

On July 20, 2000, Persons wrote Stevens, "Rocky will begin the (addition) drawings Friday and hopefully will have them for me on Monday."

Aug. 23, 2000: "I kind of torment Rocky to keep him concentrating on the chalet rather than all the projects Bill keeps him working on."

FBI - Stevens-2210

Sept. 10, 2000: "I can't emphasize enough how much and how well Rocky does, Bill has a true gem there. The guy works seven days a week on Bill's projects."

Sept. 11, 2000: "Rocky is pretty impatient to get the plywood on the walls because the north wind is beginning to blow."

"There's no mention of Augie in this e-mail and there's no Christensen Builders at this point, is there?" Morris asked.

"No," said Stevens.

She repeated the question after several more e-mails. Just who is Williams working for, she asked?

Stevens acknowledged that sometimes Williams worked for Veco. "But working on my house, he's working for me." Stevens said he had no idea how he paid Williams -- that was his wife's department.

"Catherine paid for the work that was done at our house, she paid the bills and that's all there is to it," Stevens said, in what ended up being the final words by the final witness in his trial.

Testimony ends in Stevens trial

Testimony ends in Stevens trial

By RICHARD MAUER and ERIKA BOLSTAD
Anchorage Daily News

(10/20/08 17:52:03)

WASHINGTON - The defense rested Monday in Sen. Ted Stevens' disclosure trial after the Alaska senator spent another tense, and at times contentious, three hours in the witness chair.

For the second day, Stevens was confronted with contradictions in his story by the lead prosecutor in the case, Brenda Morris. If Stevens didn't consider furniture from Veco chairman Bill Allen a gift when he received in 2001, for instance, why did he offer it to his son Ben in 2005?

Stevens replied that he never owned the furniture.

How about the $2,695 massage chair that Girdwood neighbor and Double Musky owner Bob Persons had delivered to Stevens' Washington home in 2001 and intended it to be a present, based on e-mails Persons sent when he first attempted to get the chair?

It was not a gift, Stevens said. It belongs to Persons. It's just been in his house in Washington for seven years.

"I told him I would not accept is as a gift," Stevens said. "We have lots of things in our house that do not belong with us."

Then how about the e-mail in December 2001 which Stevens sent to Persons, Morris asked. "The chair arrived and it's great, you can't tell him how much you enjoyed it. Why are you thanking him for a loan?" she asked.

"Because that's what he said it would be," Stevens replied.

In fact, Stevens said, he planned to ship the chair back to Persons in Alaska with other furniture from Washington to use in the Girdwood house, but there wasn't any room in the "chalet" - the place was filled with Allen's stuff, he said.

Where was his original furniture?

"Bill Allen stole our furniture and put his in our chalet," Stevens said.

"Why didn't you call the police?" Morris asked.

FBI - Stevens-2212

"It never crossed my mind to call the police at that time," Stevens said. "I might now."

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan sent the jury home at lunchtime with instruction to return for closing arguments today at 9:30 a.m.

Both sides were planning three hours each to sum up their case. Sullivan then plans to instruct jurors in the law Wednesday morning before identifying and dismissing the four alternates and sending the remaining 12 to the jury room for deliberations.

Even as his trial unfolded over the last month in a courtroom in Washington, Stevens' surrogates have been running his re-election campaign for a seventh full term 3,500 miles back in Alaska against Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, a Democrat.

But each day that passes without a verdict is one day closer to the Nov. 4 election with the central question in the Senate race - Stevens' guilt or innocence - unanswered.

Stevens, a Republican, had sought an early trial date hoping he could face voters riding the crest of a not-guilty verdict. But with 15 days of testimony and additional time spent on legal wrangling, the case will get to the jury just two weeks before the election. Lead prosecutor Brenda Morris from the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section began her cross examination of Stevens on Monday where she left off Friday: the free stuff that appeared at his home in Girdwood from Bill Allen, the chairman of the oil-field service company Veco and a big-time Republican contributor. Stevens and wife Catherine said they didn't ask for the furniture that Allen brought from his old apartment in Anchorage in 2001 - hated it, in fact.

The furniture was never listed as a gift on Stevens' disclosure forms, a Senate requirement for presents over $260 that year.

The government charges that Veco, Allen and other Alaska friends of Stevens gave him at least $250,000 in gifts and other benefits from 1999 to 2006. The gifts themselves weren't illegal, prosecutors say. Rather, it was Stevens' cover up - his alleged failure to report them, they said. His motive? Keep Alaska voters in the dark to they wouldn't question his ethics, prosecutors said.

Stevens has offered a variety of explanations for why he committed no crime. He thought he paid for some of the services, like the major renovations of his Girdwood home from 2000-2001, and some of the Veco-provided maintenance and repairs that followed. Some things he never wanted and when they arrived, he didn't use. Other items were loans, he said.

"The big, black leather furniture that Bill Allen left at your house - do you recall?" Morris asked when her cross examination resumed Monday.

"Yes," Stevens said.

"With the cigarette burns?" said Morris.

"That's correct," said Stevens.

"It remains there?" said Morris of the furniture that arrived in 2001.

"Yes," said Stevens.

Morris showed Stevens an e-mail he sent to Allen on July 14, 2005.

"Ben and Elizabeth are looking at a larger house," the e-mail said. "We told them if they got one we'd let them have the black furniture you brought to the Chalet. I hope that is OK. Is the old stuff we had still in the warehouse?"

Morris asked Stevens, "You're trying to regift the furniture that's so hideous to your son, isn't that correct?"

"No," said Stevens

That's the same Ben Stevens who got $243,000 from Veco, Morris asked, referring to a brief reference earlier in the case to "consulting fees" Veco paid to Ben.

"He worked for Veco, I don't know how much money he got," Stevens said.

The same Ben Stevens who made $715,000 from the Special Olympics? Morris said, referring to what she earlier said were newspaper reports of Ben Stevens' salary when he ran the Anchorage committee putting on the winter games in 2001.

Stevens said he didn't know how much his son was paid.

Why would Stevens give furniture to his son that he didn't own in the first place, Morris asked.

Referring to the e-mail to Allen, Stevens replied, "Why would I ask for permission if it's a gift to me?"

That brought an admonishment from the judge to him: "Answer the question, sir."

On Friday, Stevens, famous for his testiness, answered many questions with questions of his own, but the judge's rebuke seemed to have had an effect Monday.

At one point in her cross examination, Morris tried setting a trap for Stevens over who was paying the salary of Rocky Williams, the Veco supervisor on the Girdwood remodeling project. The uncontroverted evidence in the trial was that Williams was paid by Veco, making his work a gift to Stevens. But did Stevens know that when he compiled his disclosure forms for the years 2000 and 2001?

Stevens gets help from some friends

TEXAS SENATOR: Kay Bailey flies in to help with campaign.

By TOM KIZZIAtkizzia@adn.com

(10/22/08 02:36:34)

Sen. Ted Stevens had another proxy campaigner in Alaska on Tuesday.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas flew into Anchorage for the day for a short meeting with 14 invited businesswomen, followed by a press conference, a reception and a trip back to Ted Stevens Anchorage International Airport.

Her message, delivered alongside Sen. Lisa Murkowski: "Within the Senate family, there is great support for Ted Stevens." Alaska's senior senator has played an important role in building up the military, said Hutchison, who sits with Stevens on the Senate Appropriations Committee.

Stevens has been tied up in court in Washington, D.C., of course, unable to campaign but generating plenty of headlines. Stevens has put up a spirited defense against charges that he did not report gifts from the oil field services company Veco.

His two Republican surrogates in Anchorage Tuesday were asked if their support would extend to voting to seat Stevens in the Senate if he were convicted but managed to win re-election anyway. Hutchison said it would be premature for the Senate to reject him because Stevens would surely appeal any conviction — "for one thing, because the trial was not moved (to Alaska) to give him the right to a jury of people who understand."

Murkowski said there would be other grounds for an appeal, based on what she has read in press accounts: "Alaskans can see the prosecution failed, blundered in numerous instances . . . For us in the Senate to be acting before it's over one way or another is probably premature."

Hutchison said she can feel what Stevens is going through because she went through something similar. In 1993, when she was first elected to the U.S. Senate, Hutchison faced state criminal ethics charges that she used her office staff as Texas state treasurer for political gain, then covered up evidence. The case against her eventually collapsed after a judge found problems with the prosecution's case.

"I did tell him of some of the experiences that I had. I said you will get through this. You have so many friends who believe in you."

Hutchison, a Republican leader in the Senate, follows longtime Stevens friend Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, who was here to speak up for Stevens last week.

Judge sends Stevens jurors home for day

By RICHARD MAUER AND ERIKA BOLSTAD
Anchorage Daily News
(10/22/08 14:11:33)

WASHINGTON - Sen. Ted Stevens' fate is now in the hands of jurors.

"The case is yours," U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan told them just before lunch Wednesday.

The jury returned to Sullivan's court at 4:25 p.m. Sullivan said they had sent a note.

Paraphrasing, he said jurors wanted to leave early. "Kind of stressful right now - we need a minute of clarity right now."

No problem, Sullivan said. "Of course I will let you go."

The judge earlier said he would normally dismiss jurors for the day at 4:45 p.m. They start at 9:30 a.m. and have an hour for lunch.

It took Sullivan one hour and 20 minutes to read through 81 pages of instructions to the jury on how to apply the law to the evidence they heard. They must decide whether Stevens, 84, is guilty of deliberately submitting false public statements about his personal finances covering the years 2000 to 2006.

The first of seven counts accuses Stevens of scheming to cover up false filings, while the other six charge him directly with lying on the Senate forms for failing to disclose gifts and benefits in excess of the Senate gift limits. Those limits ranged from $260 in 2000 to $305 in 2006.

The charges are all felonies.

Over 15 days of testimony in his trial here, prosecutors presented evidence that Stevens received some $250,000 in gifts and services from a group of close friends, especially former Veco chairman Bill Allen. Allen, who pleaded guilty to bribing Alaska legislators and is awaiting sentencing, was the government's chief witness.

The defense said Stevens was unaware of Veco's role in the renovations to his home in Girdwood. As for the other alleged gifts, Stevens said he didn't want them, didn't know where they came from, thought they were paid by his wife, or were not as valuable as the government asserted.

Each felony count carries a punishment of up to five years in federal prison, although jurors are forbidden from considering potential punishment when they decide the senator's guilt or innocence.

The outcome of the jury's decision will likely affect Stevens' fate at the polls. On Nov. 4, he faces Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, a Democrat. Stevens has been in the courtroom for the past month as the campaign has gone on without him in Alaska.

FBI - Stevens-2216

Sullivan dismissed the four alternate jurors, but admonished them to not talk about the case on the outside chance that they may be called back if something happens to one of the remaining 12.

The alternates were randomly selected at the start of the trial, but their identities were known only to the judge, his staff, and the parties. Two of the alternates hugged as they left the courtroom Wednesday.

That left a jury even less diverse than before: a mostly middle aged group of eight women and four men. By appearances, 10 seem to be African American, one white, and one Hispanic.

In his instructions, Sullivan told the jurors that they may consider the five character witnesses they heard in determining the senator's guilt. The role of character witnesses is so important in a case based on Stevens' truthfulness that their testimony alone can be considered to raise a reasonable doubt of guilt in the minds of jurors.

Sullivan also cautioned them about Allen, the star witness in the trial and a former close friend of the senator. Many of the gifts Stevens is accused of accepting, including home renovations valued at more than $100,000, came from Allen or Veco.

Witnesses who've entered into plea agreements are under the same obligation to tell the truth as any other witness, the judge said, adding that Allen's guilty plea to bribing state lawmakers in Alaska has no connection to this case.

"Those charges have nothing to do with Senator Stevens," Sullivan said.

It's up to jurors to weigh Allen's biases and interests against those of other witnesses who testified in the trial, Sullivan said.

Jurors are allowed to consider several other alleged acts as evidence of motive, although Stevens wasn't charged with any crimes in connection with those acts. They include accepting a loan from a friend for a real estate deal and failing to report it, asking Allen to help his son and grandson find jobs and accepting a generator from Allen.

Those acts may be considered for "proof of motive, intent, opportunity, preparation, plan, knowledge, or absence of mistake or accident," Sullivan said.

The judge reminded jurors of the evidence he has stricken: all testimony about a car trade that Allen made with Stevens for Stevens' daughter, Lily; evidence showing how much Veco paid two Veco workers, Rocky Williams and Dave Anderson, during the time that they worked on Stevens' home; and a gift bag and shotgun that Stevens received from the Kenai River Sport Fishing Association and a punching bag and frame he got from Veco.

The car and the time records had originally been struck early in the trial following sharp complaints by the defense and a rebuke by the judge that prosecutors had failed to provide evidence to the defense. But the language in the instructions laid no blame for why the evidence wasn't to be considered.

Stevens jurors want woman removed for 'violent outbursts'

By ERIKA BOLSTAD

(10/23/08 10:17:17)

WASHINGTON - Eleven of the jurors deliberating in Sen. Ted Stevens' corruption case asked that the 12th juror be removed because she has had "violent outbursts" with other jurors and has been "rude, disrespectful and unreasonable."

The juror in question, No. 9, works for the National Guard as a bookkeeper.

The judge read from the note the jury foreman sent him, which began "we the jury, request that juror No. 9, be removed from the jury."

"She is being rude, disrespectful and unreasonable. She has had violent outbursts with other jurors and that's not helping anyone. The jurors are getting off-course. She's not following the laws and rules that are being stipulated to in the main instructions."

The judge did consider asking the foreman to come in and explain what he meant by "violent," because he was concerned about the jury's safety, but will instead ask the whole panel to come in and will remind them that they have an obligation to be civil to one another.

Defense attorney Robert Cary urged the judge to proceed slowly and not overreact.

"It cannot be the law that 11 people on a jury can ask that one person be removed," Cary said.

"If they're being violent they can," the judge responded.

Senate would decide Stevens' ultimate fate

HISTORIC: If senator is guilty and re-elected, colleagues could expel.

By TOM KIZZIA
tkizzia@adn.com

(10/23/08 00:03:32)

If Sen. Ted Stevens is found guilty and re-elected, it will be up to the Senate to decide whether he can keep his seat or should be expelled.

It's never happened before. Four senators in U.S. history have been convicted of crimes, but two resigned, one died and one saw his term expire before an expulsion vote took place. Two-thirds of the Senate would have to vote to expel.

"The Senate is a very collegial body and really doesn't like to act in that sense," Don Ritchie, an associate Senate historian, said in an interview Wednesday. He said the Senate would be likely to wait for any appeals to be settled before taking action.

The last actual expulsion of a senator occurred during the Civil War. Sen. Jesse Bright, D-Indiana, was kicked out for writing a letter to Jefferson Davis, president of the Confederate states, recommending a friend's gun manufacturing business in Texas.

Bright's letter was written a month before the Confederacy shelled Fort Sumter to start the war. He was expelled in early 1862.

Stevens is the 11th senator to be indicted for a crime. In September, on a visit to Anchorage, he said he would not consider stepping down or quitting his campaign for re-election because he expects to win his legal case.

"Put this down: That will never happen -- ever, OK?" Stevens said. "I am going to run through and I am going win this election."

The Constitution leaves it up to the Senate to decide who can serve. Senators do not like to step forward until after the voters and the judicial branch have spoken, Ritchie said.

Nine senators in U.S. history have been subjected to a lesser rebuke known as censure, which does not cost them their seats.

The most recent senatorial expulsion case involved ethics charges but no criminal indictment. Oregon Republican Bob Packwood resigned in 1995 after the Senate Ethics Committee recommended expulsion based on multiple accusations of sexual harassment.

FBI - Stevens-2223

In 1990, Sen. David Durenberger, R-Minn., was denounced by the Senate for circumventing rules about outside income, and he spent the last two years of a 17-year career under indictment for misusing public funds. He did not run for another term in 1994, and eight months after leaving the Senate he pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor, for which he was fined and sentenced to probation.

One senator pushed it to the brink. In 1981, Sen. Harrison Williams, D-NJ, was convicted of accepting bribes from a fake business in the FBI's Abscam investigation. That FBI sting also resulted in convictions of five members of the House of Representatives.

Williams continued serving as he appealed, arguing unsuccessfully that he'd been entrapped. After an expulsion debate on the Senate floor in 1982, Williams resigned before a vote could be taken.

The two other senators convicted of crimes while in office were Sen. Joseph Burton, R-Kansas, who resigned in 1906, and Sen. John Mitchell, R-Oregon, who died in office in 1905 while his case was on appeal.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, who came to Anchorage this week to campaign for Stevens, was indicted in Texas shortly after her election in 1993 on charges that she had used her office as state treasurer to campaign for the Senate. The charges were eventually dropped.

No senator convicted of a crime has ever received a presidential pardon. Williams sought a pardon from President Bill Clinton but was turned down.

Stevens jury goes home after chaotic day

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER
Anchorage Daily News
(10/23/08 13:39:55)

WASHINGTON - A juror in Sen. Ted Stevens' corruption case who fellow jurors complained has been "rude, disrespectful and unreasonable" and engaged in "violent outbursts" will stay on the panel even though her 11 peers wanted her ousted.

Jurors spent their second day of deliberations today and went home for the day around 4:45 p.m. (12:30 Alaska time). They're considering whether to find Stevens guilty of making false statements on his Senate financial-disclosure forms.

Yesterday, they passed U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan a note asking to be dismissed a little early because deliberations had gotten "stressful" and they needed a break for "clarity."

Today, jurors passed Sullivan four notes, including one about the combative juror in question. The juror, No. 9, works for the National Guard as a bookkeeper.

Out of the jury's presence, Sullivan read from the note the foreman had sent him, which began, "We the jury request that juror No. 9 be removed from the jury."

"She is being rude, disrespectful and unreasonable," the foreman wrote. "She has had violent outbursts with other jurors and that's not helping anyone. The jurors are getting off-course. She's not following the laws and rules that are being stipulated to in the main instructions."

The jurors have taken center stage in a trial that, from the beginning, has had its share of drama simply because of the notoriety of the defendant. At one point, the trial threatened to fall apart entirely when Stevens' legal team filed a motion seeking a mistrial because prosecutors failed to hand over evidence that could have helped Stevens' defense.

The jurors apparently worked out their problems by this afternoon, although they again asked to go home a little early. They sent the judge a final note sometime after 4 p.m. saying "We have given the evidence consideration and have exhausted ourselves for this day." In a bit of jury humor, they added that they were "unanimous in requesting a break" and fully intended to resume their deliberations Friday.

Today, Sullivan said out of the jury's presence that he thought about asking the foreman to explain to the court what he meant by "violent," because he was concerned about the safety of jurors. Instead, though, he called the whole jury to the courtroom so that he could remind the members of their obligation to be civil to one another and foster an atmosphere of "mutual respect."

Once in the courtroom, the judge greeted the jurors, said he was happy to see them all smiling and told them that he was sympathetic to the amount of time they'd devoted to the case already. Jurors sat through the testimony of 52 witnesses over nearly four weeks, capped by three days of Stevens on the stand.

"It's been a long trial," Sullivan said. "We started selection the 22nd of September. We've been together a long time."

He also told the jurors that he wished he could give them all black robes because "you folks are the judges of the facts. It's not my job. Your job is to consider all the evidence, all the testimony."

Lawyers for both sides were concerned about how to handle the rude juror because the trial is at a delicate stage.

-878 294A-AN-13620.m

If the judge had brought the foreman for questioning, he would have had to tiptoe around any queries that would suggest which way the jurors are leaning. Lawyers for Stevens as well as prosecutors were worried about singling out one juror.

"The incremental approach . . . is an appropriate one," said one of Stevens' attorneys, Robert Cary.

However, a recalcitrant juror also could be a good omen for the defense, if her obstinacy means that the jury is having trouble coming to a unanimous decision.

Sullivan told the lawyers after the jury left the courtroom that he'd watched the foreman carefully and thought that he and the other jurors had received his message to be courteous to one another.

"His response to my instruction was appropriate," Sullivan said. "He wasn't shaking his head as if to disagree. He didn't show any emotion one way or the other. It may well be that the court's response is the only response necessary. Only time will tell."

The jurors also had asked earlier for Page 20 of Stevens' indictment, which inadvertently had been left out of the evidence and exhibits they were given for their deliberations.

They also wanted a better explanation of "liabilities" and the limit that the senator should have disclosed each year on his forms. The charges against Stevens accuse him of failing to report gifts as well as liabilities, which are debts or obligations he might have incurred by accepting a gift and not reporting it. The judge declined to do so.

Absent juror halts Stevens trial

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER
Anchorage Daily News
(10/24/08 07:09:54)

WASHINGTON - Sen. Ted Stevens' corruption trial all but ground to a halt Friday morning as a judge tried to determine how to handle a grieving juror who had to leave town to attend her father's funeral. U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan told jurors "everyone needs a day off now and then" and sent jurors home for the day at 9:50 a.m. without telling them why their fellow juror was gone.

Jurors, who have cheered in the past when Sullivan let them go early, didn't appear to be happy about the extra time off this time around. The jurors have been sitting in on the trial since jury selection began Sept. 22.

Sullivan will hold a hearing Sunday evening to see whether the grieving juror, who is in California for her father's funeral, will be available to return. First, he'll call the juror at 5 p.m. to determine her availability.

But even if she is available, it is unlikely deliberations would begin again until Tuesday or even Wednesday, a scheduling uncertainty that postpones any verdict in the senator's case until just days before he's on the ballot in Alaska Nov. 4.

Sullivan was disinclined to add an alternate juror because they would have to start from scratch on their deliberations, an option Sullivan said would put them in the same place as they would be if they didn't start again until later in the week.

However, he did bring in one of the alternate jurors to ask her whether she would be available if needed. He asked her whether she had spoken to anyone about the case or had formed an opinion on it. She said she hadn't talked about the case, but hesitated when Sullivan asked her whether she had made up her mind yet.

"I paused because I wanted to think if I'd formed an opinion," the juror said, adding that she didn't believe she had.

Sullivan also said he was reluctant to proceed with just 11 jurors, given the near-meltdown on the jury already. If they were to lose another juror they would have "major problems," Sullivan said. Federal juries are allowed to proceed with fewer than 12 jurors, but case law is unclear about proceeding with fewer than 11.

Problems with the jury began Thursday, just a day and a half after the panel got the case. The issues appear to have little to do with the actual deliberations in the case, which involve determining whether Stevens is guilty of making false statements on his Senate financial-disclosure forms. First, on Thursday, 11 of the jurors sought to boot the 12th from the panel after they complained that she had been "rude, disrespectful and unreasonable" and had engaged in "violent outbursts."

Then, after the judge appeared to have resolved the problem and jurors were all smiles, he had to call an emergency hearing at 6:30 p.m. because a second juror learned her father had died and she needed to go to California for his funeral.

Stevens' lawyers argued Friday morning for waiting to see whether the juror could return to the jury, rather than calling an alternate in or proceeding with 11 jurors. Prosecutors said they would prefer to avail themselves of the options available to replace the juror by going with the alternate juror.

"This is a lot placed on this juror," said Nicholas Marsh, one of the prosecutors on the Justice Department team.

Stevens jurors squabble

One simply leaves; others try to oust 'rude' colleague

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER
Anchorage Daily News
(10/24/08 03:55:33)

FBI - Stevens-2229

WASHINGTON -- The episodic dramatics and messiness that marked the hastily convened four-week trial of Sen. Ted Stevens spread to the jury Thursday when, after less than two days of deliberations, two members of the panel were in jeopardy of expulsion.

The first juror, a woman identified only as Juror 9, a National Guard bookkeeper, was accused in a note by the jury foreman of "rude, disrespectful and unreasonable" behavior and of making "violent outbursts with other jurors." The foreman said he and the other 10 jurors wanted Juror 9 kicked off the panel.

That dispute appeared to have been resolved peacefully with a folksy appeal for civil behavior by the judge, and the jurors could be seen leaving the courthouse for the day smiling and chatting among themselves.

Then, after dark, U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan summoned lawyers back to his courtroom with another problem: Juror 4, a woman who works as a paralegal at a mortgage company, alerted a marshal that she had to attend to a family emergency in Texas and then dropped from sight.

Sullivan called a special hearing for 9 a.m. today to resolve what to do next. If Juror 4 can be located and would promise to be back in Washington in time for Monday's session, Sullivan said, he would probably accommodate her by canceling deliberations today.

Just in case, he also told marshals to summon Alternate 1, also a woman in the female-dominated panel, and have her report for duty at the time of the hearing. Sullivan said he would consider replacing Juror 4 with the alternate, or allow 11 jurors to decide the case. He asked attorneys for both sides to research the issue and submit their recommendations by 7 a.m.

Stevens was indicted July 29 on seven counts of failing to disclose gifts he received from 2000 to 2006, mainly expensive house renovations from the oil-field service company Veco Corp. and its then-chief executive, Bill Allen. Though the law firm defending Stevens, Williams & Connolly, is famous for normally extending the pre-trial period with a deluge of motions, Stevens demanded a speedy trial, his constitutional right. He said he planned on being acquitted before he faced voters on Nov. 4.

That unusually fast schedule for such a major trial may have had consequences. The 7 a.m. deadline for document filings in the jury matter today is nothing unusual. Attorneys for both sides, along with the judge, his law clerks and staff, have often worked late into the night after the day's testimony and on weekends. It's not just for normal witness preparations but to make and respond to the numerous challenges and arguments that have cropped up, many of which might have been resolved at a less sleep-deprived pace had there been a longer lead-up to trial.

At one point, the government revealed a check that Allen had used to buy a Land Rover that he traded to Stevens' daughter after the defense went through contortions trying to show how much Allen had paid without that evidence. Judge Sullivan said he would have understood why the government failed to provide the check to the defense if it had gotten lost in the rush. Prosecutors said it was true they rediscovered the check in their mounds of evidence late in the game, but they also didn't think it was relevant to the defense.

That led to one of two sanctions imposed by the judge on the prosecution, striking all evidence about a car trade that allegedly benefitted Stevens. He also struck some evidence about how much money was spent on Stevens'

The attorneys and judge spent only two days picking the jury from a pool of 150.

Tensions inside the jury room emerged soon after deliberations began Wednesday. At 3:55 p.m., the foreman sent out a note that read:

"Can we leave a little early today? Would that be a problem, your honor. Kinda stressful right now. We need a minute of clarity for all."

The judge told them no problem. But before noon Thursday, two more notes came from the foreman and the judge summoned the attorneys to his courtroom to hear them read.

The first note was no problem: Somehow, page 20 of the indictment had failed to make it to the jury. The second note was a little more difficult to resolve. They wanted a better explanation of term "liabilities" and the limit that the senator should have disclosed each year on his forms.

The charges against Stevens accuse him of failing to report gifts as well as liabilities, which are debts or obligations that he might have incurred by accepting a gift and not reporting it. After some debate among the lawyers, the judge declined to do so.

While Sullivan was reading the second note, a marshal handed him a third. That was the show stopper.

"Judge Sullivan: We the jury request that Juror No. 9 be removed from the jury. She's being rude, disrespectful and unreasonable. She has had violent outbursts with other jurors and that is not helping anyone. The jurors are getting off course. She is not following the laws and rules that were stipulated in the instructions."

Sullivan said out of the jury's presence Thursday that he thought about asking the foreman to explain to the court what he meant by "violent" in the note, because the judge was concerned about the jurors' safety. Instead, he called the whole jury to the courtroom so that he could remind the members of their obligation to be civil to one another and foster an atmosphere of "mutual respect."

Absent Stevens juror admits father didn't die

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
Anchorage Daily News
(11/03/08 08:44:09)

WASHINGTON -- Juror No. 4 in Sen. Ted Stevens' federal corruption trial, otherwise known as Marian Hinnant, did not leave to attend her father's funeral in California, as she told the judge.

Instead, Hinnant had a plane ticket to see the Breeder's Cup at the Santa Anita race track and didn't want to miss it, she told the judge this morning, in what sounded like completely irrational and perhaps even delusional remarks.

"I just wanted to go to the Breeder's Cup," she told reporters after a hearing the judge held to find out why she left town and lost contact with him, forcing him to replace her as a juror just hours before the jury found Stevens guilty.

Hinnant also told reporters that she would have found the Alaska senator guilty had she remained on the jury.

"He was guilty, but these other guys are just as guilty," she said, referring to other members of Congress.

Her lawyer, federal public defender A.J. Kramer, tried to keep her from saying much in court, telling the judge only that "her state of mind was such that she had to go to California."

"She apologizes to the court. In fact, her father did not die," Kramer said. "The story about her father was just one that popped into her head."

But Hinnant cut in, and in a thick Kentucky drawl, gave a rambling, incoherent and baffling monologue about her former employers in the horseracing industry in Kentucky. She mentioned drugs, wiretaps and horseracing, but made little sense.

"I'm not the one who was selling the drugs, I'm not the one who was doing the drugs," she said.

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan let her go, saying that he was going to "accept Mr. Kramer's representation that you were not able to (deliberate) and for reasons that were serious to you."

He added: "I'm convinced you were not able to deliberate."

Sullivan told her that she did not have to speak to the media, but she said she was willing to talk, and she did. Outside of the courthouse, a pack of about 10 reporters followed her to the nearby Metro stop, as did several of Stevens' attorneys. Kramer escorted her to the station and encouraged her not to say much, but Hinnant appeared not to be able to restrain herself.

Hinnant, 52, told reporters that she works at Avis car rental in Union Station in Washington D.C. She worked in horseracing for many years and simply wanted to see the race, since she already had a plane ticket to California.

"I've not been convicted yet," Stevens said Thursday in a meeting with the editorial board of the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner. "There's not a black mark by my name yet, until the appeal is over and I am finally convicted, if that happens. If that happens, of course I'll do what's right for Alaska and for the Senate. ... I don't anticipate it happening, and until it happens I do not have a black mark."

Stevens reiterated that position during a televised debate late Thursday night, declaring early in the give-and-take with Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, "I have not been convicted of anything."

The senator said Gov. Sarah Palin and the other Republicans who have called on him to resign are only doing so for political gain, not because they are sincere. "I wouldn't hold it against them, I understand what they're doing, trying to get elected."

Begich argued during the debate that Stevens can't be effective for the state while he fights his conviction, and with Senate colleagues calling on him to resign.

"Senator Stevens has some serious issues he has to deal with that will distract him," Begich said.

A Washington, D.C., jury Monday convicted Stevens of seven felony counts of lying on financial disclosure forms about thousands of dollars of gifts and home renovations from Veco Corp.

Begich leads in the polls but is trying to keep his supporters from getting too confident, saying it will be a close election Tuesday. It's clear there's a reservoir of goodwill for the 84-year-old Stevens.

The latest bumper sticker to appear in Anchorage: "Vote For Ted Until He's Dead."

Begich, in speaking to a group of BP employees in Anchorage on Thursday, acknowledged that a lot of Alaskans are having a hard time voting against Stevens.

"We have to do what's right, it's painful because he has done a lot of things for us, there's no question about that ... but we must think about the future, not about individuals' desires. He made a comment he's going to fight the appeal as hard as he can with every ounce of energy. We need that energy focused on Alaska," he said.

"I know it's a tough call for a lot of people because there are a lot of emotions around this election, and I recognize that," Begich said.

Begich said that even if re-elected, Stevens would not be able to serve. "The fact is, even if elected his own minority leader has said he has 100 percent likelihood not to be seated, that he will be expelled from the Senate," Begich said.

But that's not exactly what Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell said.

McConnell said that if Stevens is re-elected "and the felony charge stands through the appeals process there is zero chance that a senator with a felony conviction would not be expelled from the Senate." Stevens' claim is that he'll be vindicated through the appeals.

Stevens has alluded to the possibility that if he loses on appeal, he could then resign so there would be a special election giving another Republican a shot at the seat.

That's a scenario talked up by the state Republican Party, which says conservatives need to vote for Stevens to at least send it into overtime instead of just handing it to the Democrats.

Stevens said in a KTVA Channel 11 online debate that he's fighting for re-election not just for himself, but because he believes a Republican should have the seat. "When the appellate process is over, I will accept the result, good or bad, and do what's best for Alaska and the Senate. I am bruised but not beaten; my integrity will be vindicated," Stevens said.

Senate Republicans including minority leader McConnell have said Stevens should resign. So has Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin, the Republican vice presidential nominee, and her running mate, John McCain.

Stevens, in his meeting with the Fairbanks paper's editorial board, dismissed that as "statements made on the trail, in the heat of battle." Alaska's junior senator, Republican Lisa Murkowski, was more critical of Republicans turning on him.

"For all of them, it's a very close election. I think they're looking to their own political skin. If it helps them in their effort to gain re-election, they will, unfortunately, throw Ted under the bus," she said.

Begich, 46, has not called on Stevens to resign, but the state Democratic Party has. In Anchorage, the Democratic Party invited faith leaders to meet with the press Thursday and talk about the need for politicians to have a moral compass in the wake of the Stevens verdict.

"Trying to serve the state while appealing something of this nature is going to be very, very difficult," said Dianne O'Connell, a retired Presbyterian minister.

But one of the speakers, Rev. Dr. William Greene of Eagle River Missionary Baptist Church, offered a somewhat surprising message, given that it was a Democratic event. Greene told the press he has no reason to mistrust Stevens and that plenty of innocent people are wronged by the court system.

FBI - Stevens-2233

Both Stevens and Begich will be barnstorming the road system for votes in the final days of campaigning. Stevens has a rally in Soldotna today and is going back to Fairbanks on Saturday. Begich is in Juneau today for his own rally, then goes on a campaign swing through the Kenai Peninsula on Saturday.

Both sides have post-conviction advertisements running on TV and radio. Stevens' say it should be up to Alaskans, not an Outside jury, to decide whether he's fit to serve the state. Begich's say now that a verdict is in, it's time to move on.

Begich is pitching himself as pragmatic and a centrist. He told BP employees he has some concerns about the way the state increased taxes on the oil industry last year.

Begich said he couldn't answer if the tax increase, which was supported by Democrats in the Legislature as well as Palin, went too far. But he said the state didn't take the right approach and suggested it was done in a punitive spirit.

"This was kind of like, let's just jam it on you and end of story, you're going to pay," he said.

One of the BP employees Begich spoke with in Anchorage, a man who also builds homes, complained Begich raised property taxes so much that he believes it "has hindered people from actually building houses and building larger houses."

Begich disagreed the tax was slowing home building. He said property taxes aren't as big a proportion of the budget as before he came to office, and the growing city has more police officers and fire stations, as well as improved snow removal.

"That doesn't come for free," Begich said. "But you get something for it."

Candidates square off

The heavyweights met face to face for the final time Thursday. Incumbent Alaska Republican Rep. Don Young squared off against his Democratic challenger, Ethan Berkowitz, and incumbent U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, a Republican, tangled with his Democratic challenger, Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich. They talked about corruption trials and whether Stevens should resign, how Congress might cut your energy bills and save the economy, and whether Gov. Sarah Palin is ready to step in as president of the United States. On that last one Young and Stevens say Palin's up to the top job, Berkowitz said her opponents are more qualified, and Begich left it to voters. New names emerge in Allen FBI interviews FBI QUESTIONING: He talks about what he did for specific lawmakers.

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com

(10/31/08 04:01:55)

The very first day that former Veco Corp. chairman Bill Allen sat down with FBI agents, he described questionable dealings with a number of Alaska politicians, some of whom are now in prison for the corrupt acts he described.

Newly filed court documents outline the extent of Allen's initial revelations to the FBI, including his interactions with public figures that haven't previously been reported -- and who haven't been charged.

In his first interview, the same day he learned of the investigation, Allen told the FBI about financial favors sought by and given to politicians.

He said he hired a lawyer for former state Rep. Bev Masek when she was fighting allegations of misspending campaign money. He said former state Rep. Cheryll Heinze came to his house seeking a job while she was in office. He said he bought property from former state Sen. Jerry Ward to provide him campaign money. And he talked about golf tournaments that generated cash for U.S. Rep. Don Young, though he also described Young as someone who couldn't be bought.

Heinze strongly disputed the allegations and Young, who faces re-election next week, has denied any wrongdoing. Masek and Ward did not return phone calls.

Whether federal authorities are still investigating or plan to bring cases against any of the newly named individuals isn't clear. FBI spokesman Eric Gonzalez would only say the investigation is ongoing. It's also unknown whether the FBI later obtained information that contradicted any of Allen's assertions.

The new documents -- summaries of Allen's initial interview with the FBI and a subsequent interview -- were filed earlier this month during the trial of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens in Washington, D.C. The summaries were attached to motions filed by Stevens' lawyers. The summaries recount what Allen told investigators, and make no attempt to verify his assertions.

The first interview occurred on Aug. 30, 2006, after agents brought Allen into FBI headquarters in downtown Anchorage and he agreed to cooperate. The broad, multi-faceted investigation into Alaska corruption wouldn't become public knowledge until the next day, when federal agents swarmed legislative offices with search warrants. The FBI had been monitoring Allen's phone calls for months.

Allen pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy in May 2007. As part of his plea deal, prosecutors agreed not to seek charges against Allen's son, Mark, or other relatives.

FBI - Stevens-2235

Allen became one of the main prosecution witnesses at the federal trials last year of former state Reps. Pete Kott and Vic Kohring, who are both now in prison, and U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, convicted Monday of seven felonies. Allen secretly recorded calls for the FBI were used as evidence against Stevens and Kott.

Here is some of what Allen asserted in the interviews:

REP. DON YOUNG

In his initial interview, Allen told the FBI about the pig roast fund-raiser that he hosted for Young. He said Marx Brothers Cafe catered it and he thought that Young covered the bills but wasn't sure. He said he paid for the alcohol with his Veco credit card, according to a summary of his interview with the FBI.

After the investigation surfaced, but before Allen's role was known, the Young campaign tried to reimburse Allen $37,626 for expenses associated with the annual pig roasts, the campaign has said. The check never was cashed, so the campaign sent the money to the U.S. Treasury.

Allen also talked to the FBI about "golf outings" organized by a Veco vice president, Rick Smith, to benefit Young. Smith also has pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy.

"Allen recalled that participants contributed $100 a piece to play. Allen said that the money given to Young was not a big deal and he considered it a 'thank you' to Young," the FBI interview summary said.

"Allen described Young as a life long friend and a person he calls his brother," the interview summary said. "Allen said that you can't 'buy' Young."

Gary Sanford, manager of the Moose Run Golf Course on Fort Richardson, said this week that he remembered the Smith-organized golf outings for Young, and recalled prizes like golf balls and putters, but not cash. However, last year, an Associated Press story reported that Sanford said he was sometimes around when cash prizes were handed out. In that story, Sanford said that he didn't remember Young receiving any cash that he didn't win.

Sanford said this week that he has never been interviewed by the FBI about the golf outings.

Young's chief of staff, Mike Anderson, said in his six years with Young, the congressman has never pushed legislation to specifically benefit Allen or Smith.

Young has said he cannot talk about the investigation but also that he wouldn't be running again if he had done anything dishonorable.

Young has reported spending more than $1.2 million in campaign contributions on legal fees since early 2007.

Young, 75 and a Republican, is running for his 19th term as Alaska's only U.S. House member. He has not been charged with any wrongdoing.

JERRY WARD

Allen told the FBI he bought a piece of land in Sterling from Ward for about $30,000, according to a summary of his initial interview. Ward suggested the deal because he needed money for his re-election campaign, Allen said. Allen told agents that he thought the price was inflated. The interview summary doesn't include a year, but Allen said that the deal was conducted with the help of someone named Earl Robinson. State land records show that Ward sold property in Sterling to Earl Paul Robinson of Oklahoma in October 2000, when Ward was running for re-election to his Senate seat.

Ward won in 2000 but lost to Tom Wagoner two years later. When Ward tried to wrest back the seat in 2004, he again approached Allen for money, according to the FBI interview summary. This time, Allen refused but he agreed not to help Wagoner, the incumbent.

Ward, a Republican who represented South Anchorage and the Kenai, served in the Senate from 1996 until his third term ended in 2003. He also served a House term in the early 1980s. FBI - Stevens-2236

Ward also has been linked to the criminal case against former halfway house operator Bill Weimar, who has pleaded guilty to two charges and is awaiting sentencing. Weimar has admitted being part of a conspiracy to funnel money to a campaign consultant for an unnamed candidate, knowing the candidate supported a private prison. That candidate appears to be Ward.

Ward did not return calls for this story or following Weimar's guilty plea in August. Ward has not been charged with any wrongdoing.

BEV MASEK

Allen helped out Masek, a former Republican state representative from Willow, "as she needed things," according to the summary of his initial interview. "For example, he would pay to fill her gas tank when she had no money," the statement said. He helped her with a flat tire. And, he told the FBI, he gave her cash.

When Masek faced complaints before the Alaska Public Offices Commission and the legislative ethics committee, Allen said he directed lawyer Jack Miller to represent her. Veco paid the bill, Allen told the FBI. He couldn't remember the total but said it could have been as much as $30,000. A call to Miller was not returned.

Masek didn't return repeated telephone calls seeking comment.

She served five terms in the state House, but lost in the 2004 primary election.

In September 2004, after a lengthy investigation generated by a complaint, the public offices commission fined Masek $1,000 for improperly spending campaign funds on personal items and to repay loans. The next year, a House ethics subcommittee found cause to believe that she broke state ethics law by using an aide for personal errands on state time and for "financial convenience." The employee had complained he had to loan her money or be fired. By then she was no longer in office, so no sanctions were imposed.

APOC wondered back in 2004 whether Allen was paying Masek's legal bills, Chris Ellingson, APOC assistant director, said this week.

"We suspected since it was his attorney that represented her. It didn't matter on our part," Ellingson said. While that may have been an ethical breach, it wasn't within the purview of APOC, she said.

Masek has not been charged with any wrongdoing.

CHERYLL HEINZE

As to Heinze, Allen said she was still in the Legislature when she came to his house seeking a job for herself or her husband, according to the FBI summary of his initial interview.

"At the time, Allen thought he was being set up by Heinze and Allen refused her request for a job," the interview summary said.

That didn't happen, Heinze said when reached on the phone this week.

"Good Lord!" she said. "I'm sorry. He's naming anyone and everyone he can name and trying to save something for his own kids. And he better the hell leave me out of it."

She remembers going to Allen's home for the Young fund-raisers, but says she never talked to Allen about a job.

"You know when he did the pig roast, everybody went. That's it," she said.

Heinze, a Republican from Anchorage, served a single House term after being elected in 2002. She suddenly dropped out of her 2004 race. That fall, her attorney, Jeff Feldman, confirmed that the FBI had been investigating her after complaints about her soliciting consulting work from Railbelt utilities. But nothing ever came of that.

At any rate, Heinze said this week she has never spoken with the FBI about anything. She has not been charged with any wrongdoing.

BEN STEVENS

In his interviews with federal agents, Allen couldn't recall work that former Senate President Ben Stevens did for Veco after becoming a legislator in 2001. Ben is Ted Stevens' son. For years, both before and after he was in the Legislature, Ben was a paid Veco consultant.

In his interview with agents in December 2006, Allen said that all Ben Stevens did for Veco the preceding year was work on the proposed gas pipeline and an oil tax that North Slope oil producers wanted.

"He knew more about these issues than anyone else," according to the summary of interviews from Dec. 11 and 12, 2006.

Before Ben Stevens was appointed to the Senate, he was a smart and capable consultant, Allen told federal agents.

When Veco had trouble getting what it was due from Pakistani officials for a pipeline, Ben Stevens went to the World Bank and negotiated payment, Allen said. He also helped on a project building a harbor on Sakhalin Island in Russia, Allen said.

But once he became a senator, his work dropped off, Allen acknowledged.

"There was concern in Veco that Ben Stevens was not doing any work and he was billing Veco monthly for work," according to the December 2006 interview summary, which was prepared by Internal Revenue Service agents.

Veco's lawyer and chief financial officer were worried the company would get in trouble, the interview summary said.

In one five-year stretch, from 2001 through 2005, Ben Stevens made $252,000 from Veco, according to his state disclosure forms.

"Ben, since the date the search warrants were executed more than two years ago, has insisted that he is innocent and did nothing wrong," his attorney, John Wolfe of Seattle, said Thursday. "He has been quite clear that Mr. Allen's statements about him are false and nothing new has transpired to cause him to change that opinion."

Ben Stevens has not been charged with any wrongdoing.

'SPECIAL BONUSES'

In those December 2006 interviews with the IRS and the FBI, Allen described Veco's special bonus program in detail.

Extra or special bonuses were paid to some Veco executives for political purposes, Allen told the federal agents. Allen said Veco President Pete Leathard, Smith, and himself had a meeting each year to determine which politicians, charities and community events they wanted to support. They mostly supported oil-industry-friendly Republicans, he said. Allen and Smith would review who was up for election and "guesstimate" bonus amounts based on the number of candidates and anticipated contribution amounts, he said.

A select group of executives received the special bonuses: Leathard, Smith, Roger Chan, Tom Corkran and Jamie Slack, Allen said, the summary said.

Allen figured the executives would not make political contributions on their own without the special bonuses, but also told the agents that no one was obligated to make contributions and a couple of executives weren't in the program.

FBI - Stevens-2238

"The Veco executive often agrees to the amount and Rick Smith will write that amount on the executive's business card as an IOU," the IRS summary said. He then would give the IOU to their personal assistant, Linda Croft, Allen told the agents.

Sometimes, they contributed in races Outside. Stevens urged Allen to support Republican Mike McGavick in his ultimately unsuccessful challenge two years ago to Democratic U.S. Sen. Maria Cantwell in Washington state, the interview summary said. McGavick later returned the donations, according to news reports.

Allen told the agents that he thought the special bonus program was legal, and he testified the same way at Kott's and Kohring's trials.

Leathard also thought it was legitimate, said his attorney, David Marshall of Bellevue, Wash.

"He believes what happened was completely legal and that there's nothing wrong with a bonus program for people who make their own choices as to who they wish to contribute to," Marshall said.

Leathard has not been charged with any wrongdoing. Allen and Smith are the only former Veco executives who have been charged.

For years before the company was sold in 2007, the Veco executives were among the state's most active campaign contributors.

Juror's absence might hold up Stevens decision

FATHER DIED: Deliberations could go on with 11; alternate may be tapped.

By RICHARD MAUER and ERIKA BOLSTAD
Anchorage Daily News

(10/25/08 03:35:39)

WASHINGTON -- Eleven jurors went home early Friday without deliberating the fate of Sen. Ted Stevens after the judge located the 12th in California, where she had flown on short notice to attend her father's funeral.

The unplanned day off may be followed by another on Monday and possibly again Tuesday, depending on how U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan decides to proceed.

On Wednesday, the jury began considering whether Stevens is guilty of seven counts of failing to disclose gifts he received from 2000 to 2006, but little has gotten done so far.

Sullivan ordered attorneys for both sides to his court at 9 a.m. Friday, when he reported on a conversation he had with Juror 4 late the night before. The juror, initially reported to have gone to Texas for a family emergency, was in California, where her father had died, the judge said.

Sullivan said he didn't want to press the juror on her ability to return so soon after she had arrived. He said he had arranged to call her again Sunday afternoon from his chambers, with one attorney from each side present, to let her give a self-assessment of her emotional state, her desire to continue on the jury and her next availability in Washington.

Without committing himself, Sullivan said he might allow her until Wednesday to return to the jury room. Because jurors can't deliberate without all members present, that would amount to a five-day juror holiday at the late stage of a trial -- and with Stevens' election looming.

Stevens' attorneys said that was fine with them, but prosecutors said a long break would be too disruptive.

Sullivan said he had two other options. He could dismiss Juror 4 and allow the jury to continue with 11 members. The law allows that. In fact, the first trial brought by federal prosecutors in the current public corruption investigation in Alaska, the bribery case of former Rep. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage, was decided by an 11-member jury. Anderson was convicted in July 2007 and is now in a federal penitentiary.

Sullivan could also replace Juror 4 with one of the four alternates who sat through the trial. To keep that option open, Sullivan asked the first alternate on the list -- Juror 11 -- to appear Friday morning to see if she were available and still qualified.

FBI - Stevens-2240

The juror, perhaps the most copious note-taker on the panel, testified under gentle questioning from Sullivan that she had not talked to anyone about the case and had successfully avoided media and Internet accounts of it, as the judge had admonished the alternates on Wednesday.

When Sullivan asked her whether she had made up her mind on Stevens' guilt, the juror hesitated for a moment. She said she hadn't, but the judge wanted to know what she was pondering.

"I paused because I wanted to think if I'd formed an opinion," Juror 11 said. That answer seemed to satisfy Sullivan, who said he'd be back in touch with her Sunday, one way or another.

Sullivan also summoned the remaining 11 jurors to his courtroom. "Everyone needs a day off now and then," he told them, without explaining the cause of the holiday.

-883

The jurors have been part of the case since Sept. 22, when jury selection began. During the trial, a day off or even an early dismissal by Sullivan was invariably greeted with big smiles and muted cheers by the jury, followed by boisterous conversation as they passed out the back door of the courtroom and into the secure hallway.

There was none of that Friday. Only the day before, the foreman had indicated they were making progress in the afternoon note he sent out to mark the end of Thursday's deliberations. There was no way to know what the jurors were thinking when they left the courtroom Friday morning, but their mood was noticeably subdued.

After seeing the jury leave and after he questioned Juror 11, Sullivan appeared to be reconsidering the notion that he would allow the grieving juror until Wednesday to return.

Would he call in the alternate? One downside, he said, was that he would have to instruct the jury to start their deliberations over with the new juror.

But there were other considerations. On Thursday, a disruptive juror slowed progress and led the rest of the jury to ask that she be removed. That was resolved by a heart-to-heart talk from the judge, but it was enough for him to express caution about proceeding with only 11.

"We lose another juror, we have major problems," he said. "I'm not sure I'll --" he started to say, then stopped. "We have major problems."

Stevens' lawyers argued Friday morning for waiting to see whether the juror could return, rather than calling in an alternate or proceeding with 11 jurors. Prosecutors said they'd prefer to go with the alternate juror.

"This is a lot placed on this juror," said Nicholas Marsh, one of the prosecutors on the Justice Department team.

Sullivan said that after his Sunday conversation with the grieving juror, he'll return to the open courtroom at 6 p.m. for further discussion -- and perhaps a decision -- on how to proceed.

Stevens jury gets an alternate

FUNERAL: Judge Sullivan replaces the missing juror; the trial will resume today.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(10/26/08 23:53:47)

WASHINGTON -- After a one-day delay in jury deliberations, Sen. Ted Stevens' corruption trial will resume again this morning with an alternate juror replacing the one who left last week for her father's funeral in California.

Judge Emmet Sullivan paused proceedings Friday morning after the juror learned the previous night that her father had died and she needed to depart to attend his funeral. He had hoped to bring the juror back to continue deliberating with the other 11, but couldn't reach her Friday or over the weekend to determine whether she would still be available.

Instead of the trial being delayed any further, an alternate will take the missing juror's place and jurors will continue deliberating this morning. The juror who's in California will be dismissed.

"We have four alternates for this reason," Judge Sullivan said in court Sunday evening, in a rare weekend hearing. The four alternate jurors have sat through the entire trial.

The delay pushes a verdict in the case one day closer to Election Day, when Alaska voters also have a say in determining the Republican senator's fate. Stevens, who was indicted in late July, asked for an expedited trial date in the hopes of going to voters with an acquittal in hand, but his trial is now entering its sixth week. On Nov. 4, Stevens faces the most competitive race of his Senate career, against Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, a Democrat.

The Justice Department was fine with the alternate juror, said prosecutor Nicholas Marsh, especially since the jury is "in the infancy of deliberations."

Stevens' attorneys offered only mild objections to the alternate, but did say they preferred to proceed with 11 jurors. The deliberations are at a "sensitive juncture," said one of Stevens' lawyers, Robert Cary, and they were reluctant to force the jurors to start over.

But Sullivan said he was leery of proceeding with just 11 jurors, based on the issues that have already arisen with the jury.

FBI - Stevens-2242

EARLY STRESS

Their first day of deliberations last week, jurors asked to go home early because they were stressed and needed "clarity." The second day, Thursday, 11 of the jurors complained in a note about a 12th juror and asked her to be removed from the panel for being rude and prone to "violent outbursts with other jurors." The judge resolved the problem with a stern lecture on civility and the jurors left Thursday afternoon all smiles.

Then, just hours later on Thursday evening, the juror learned her father had died and Sullivan halted the proceedings until he could figure out how to handle the issue of the missing juror.

Federal juries are allowed to proceed with fewer than 12 jurors, and while it's common to reach a verdict with just 11, it's almost unheard of to proceed with fewer than that. An alternate does require the whole jury panel to start from scratch, however, and although jurors had only deliberated about a day and a half so far, they appeared to be moving at a pretty fast clip. Jurors passed the judge a note Thursday afternoon saying that they had already reviewed all the evidence.

The jury of eight women and four men must review seven felony counts to determine whether Stevens is guilty of lying on his Senate disclosure fo about gifts, mostly home repairs fr the oil-services company Veco Corp. and its former owner, Bill Allen. Stevens is also accused of accepting other gifts from other friends and failing to report them.

The first of seven counts accuses Stevens of scheming to cover up the false filings; the other six charge him directly with lying on the Senate financial-disclosure forms for failing to disclose gifts and benefits in excess of the Senate gift limits. Those limits ranged from $260 in 2000 to $305 in 2006.

The government estimates the value of the gifts at more than $250,000 over a six-year period. That includes the value of the renovations that doubled in size Stevens' home in Girdwood.

Friend's eatery located on road Stevens got paved

$2.7 MILLION: Spokesman says senator set aside funds at local officials' request.

By GARANCE BURKE and ADAM GOLDMAN
The Associated Press

(10/26/08 23:12:11)

GIRDWOOD -- Just 0.7 miles long, Crow Creek Road isn't a road to nowhere. It runs straight to the Double Musky Inn, a Cajun bistro owned by Bob Persons, a close friend of Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens.

It cost taxpayers $2.7 million to widen and pave that road, and Alaska had higher priorities. But an Associated Press examination of government e-mails and interviews with state transportation officials found that Stevens moved the project to the front of the line.

Persons, owner of the popular watering hole where the Republican senator frequently dines, testified as a defense witness this month in Washington, D.C., where Stevens is on trial for failing to disclose more than $250,000 in gifts.

"This is a classic pork barrel project that just confirms everyone's fears," said David Williams, a vice president for policy at Citizens Against Government Waste. "It's like 'Hey, if you're my buddy, I'll just get you a few million dollars and make you a road to your restaurant.' "

Details of the Crow Creek deal emerged as Stevens awaits a verdict in his trial. He is charged with lying on Senate financial disclosure forms about gifts, including more than $250,000 in home improvements to his cabin, not far from the Double Musky.

Trial testimony indicated that Stevens granted Persons power of attorney to guide the home renovation. Among the many presents Stevens is charged with concealing is a nearly $2,700 massage chair from Persons. Stevens says the chair was a loan. But his explanation of why he kept it in his house for seven years led to one of the more awkward exchanges of his testimony.

Telephone messages left at Persons' home and the restaurant were not immediately returned.

Stevens' spokesman, Steve Wackowski, declined to answer specific questions from the AP concerning Stevens' communications with Persons about the road. In a statement, he said the senator set aside the money at local officials' request and believed paving the road would boost tourism to a historic gold mine two miles beyond where the asphalt ends.

Stevens' intent, as relayed through his staff to state officials, "was that any improvements or construction must continue all the way up to the mine," according to the statement.

FBI - Stevens-2244

In 2002, when Stevens was chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, he inserted last-minute language in a transportation bill to secure $10 million for "Girdwood: Road Improvements." He then ensured that his intentions to pave his friend's road were carried out.

Girdwood officials planned to cut that project, however, and repair residential streets with the money, according to the e-mails. They had other priorities such as fixing trails and easing traffic.

That was unacceptable to Stevens, the longest serving Republican senator. Stevens, in office since 1968, has brought home billions in projects to his state.

In a June 2003 e-mail, a Stevens office worker, Lisa Sutherland, warned the director of Alaska's state office in Washington, D.C., that Stevens "would then be criticized for fixing up his own street. Remember he lives there. The best person to talk to to get guidance is Bob Persons."

-885 194A-AW-13620-m

Persons was ready to help.

At Sutherland's suggestion, a state transportation official, David Post, called Persons to clarify the senator's intent. Persons said the senator wanted the money to pave Crow Creek Road, a spruce-lined path dotted with a few commercial businesses.

Post told the AP he found it unusual to get direction on a publicly funded project from someone outside government. "It struck me as odd, yes," said Post, a regional transportation planning manager.

In an e-mail from June 24, 2003, the department's chief of planning for the central region wrote a colleague about Post's conversation with Persons.

"Spoke with Bob Persons this morning as Lisa suggested and his understanding from the Senator was that Crow Creek Rd. is number 1 priority because it is in such bad shape," reads the e-mail from John Tolley. "This is 'somewhat' consistent with the board of supervisors' priorities, however they have some other improvements in their top 7 priorities."

In fact, the paving of Crow Creek Road was No. 6.

Stevens and Persons have known each other for 25 years. Persons and his wife, Deanna, have contributed nearly $7,000 to Stevens' campaigns over the past decade.

The New Orleans-themed restaurant, which has been featured on the Food Network's "Best Of" series, is less than two miles from Stevens' house, near the Mount Alyeska ski resort. Stevens wrote an introduction for Persons' cookbook, praising his "honestly good meals."

In 2000, when the senator needed to renovate his cabin, he asked Persons for help. Prosecutors say Persons knew Stevens was not paying the full cost for the work and that he helped cover up who was -- an Alaska oil-services company.

Persons' son Justin, who co-owns the Musky, told the AP his father voiced concern about the paving project when crews took out trees along their property line this year.

Justin Persons said his father did not support the paving because the family long had enjoyed the "novelty of driving down a bumpy dirt road to a great restaurant."

But Post said Persons never objected to it when he called in 2003.

The restaurateur submitted one comment at a public meeting about the road project in 2004, urging authorities to "keep it narrow and add speed bumps w/ gravel shoulders for walkers & runners."

The repaving originally was intended to stretch 3.5 miles but had to be scaled back in part due to the cost of replacing a bridge farther along Crow Creek Road, said Jennifer Witt, a transportation department chief.

Today, the asphalt ends just past the Double Musky. Witt said in an interview it's a coincidence.

But had Stevens done a favor for his friend?

"I could see where it appears that way," said Witt.

Associated Press writers Justin Pritchard in Girdwood and Matt Apuzzo in Washington contributed to this report.

Stevens jury gets down to detail work

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER
Anchorage Daily News
(10/27/08 11:23:48)

WASHINGTON - Jurors weighing whether Sen. Ted Stevens is guilty of lying on his financial disclosure forms have developed a reputation for flaky behavior over the past several days, but they are apparently giving the evidence a meticulous reading.

Today, the jury picked up on a discrepancy between the indictment and the evidence in the case against the 84-year-old senator from Alaska. Why, jurors wondered, does the indictment say Stevens checked "no" on his 2001 financial disclosure form when asked whether he accepted any gifts?

The indictment also alleges Stevens did not attach any schedule detailing what gifts he received. Yet Stevens actually checked "yes," acknowledging that he had received gifts, the jurors noticed. Stevens also disclosed a gift: a $1,100 gold commemorative coin struck for the 2001 Special Olympics in Alaska.

The judge decided to answer the question by instructing jurors that "the indictment is merely a charging document; it is not evidence. You must consider all the evidence and my instructions to determine whether the government has proven each element of an offense in the indictment beyond a reasonable doubt."

The juror question refers to the first page of the disclosure form, on which senators are asked to report any gift of a value of $260 or more from 2001. Senators who check "yes" are directed to fill out a supplement schedule listing each gift, its source and its value.

For some of the years covered in the indictment, Stevens checked "yes." For instance, in 2004 he reported receiving an $800 rug from the president of Azerbaijan, which he donated to the secretary of state. But in no instance from 2000 to 2006 did Stevens list gifts from Veco or Bill Allen, the two people accused of providing most of the unreported gifts to him.

The discrepancy caught by jurors got by nearly everybody -- the judge, lawyers on both sides and even reporters who have sat through the proceedings. Still, U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan disagreed with prosecutors when they called it a typographical error.

"Presumably somebody reads these indictments before they return them," he said, his voice dripping with sarcasm. "Presumably."

The jury's attention to detail suggests its members are combing carefully through their instructions and matching up all of the counts in the instructions with the evidence and the allegations in the indictment.

"This jury is very perceptive; they aren't missing anything," Judge Sullivan said.

The jury's question is an important one because the year 2001 is at the heart of the government case, which accuses Stevens of accepting more than $250,000 in gifts over six years and willfully failing to disclose them on his financial disclosure forms.

FBI - Stevens-2246

In 2001 alone, Stevens is accused of accepting $110,153.64 in materials, labor and other renovation expenses to his home in Girdwood. He also is accused of accepting furniture for that home and a $2,695 massage chair for his home in Washington, D.C. Other gifts prosecutors said he accepted include a new tool cabinet with tools, a new professional Viking gas grill and a stained glass window.

One of Stevens' attorneys, Craig Singer, argued that Stevens can't be accused of making false statements when he did answer "yes" that he accepted gifts.

But prosecutors countered that the discrepancy doesn't matter. Even if Stevens did check "yes" on the form, he was legally obligated to report all gifts he received, and he never disclosed receiving any of the home repairs he got from Allen, Veco and others.

The jury passed the note to the judge shortly after noon on Monday Washington time, about three hours into their deliberations.

Jurors, who got the case Wednesday afternoon after four weeks of testimony, were ordered to start deliberating from scratch Monday after one of the jurors had to be dismissed over the weekend and replaced with an alternate. The dismissed juror learned her father died last week, holding up deliberations for a day while the judge determined whether to proceed without her.

Jurors got their flaky reputation last week when just a day into deliberations, they sent the judge a note asking for one of the jurors to be removed. The juror was having "violent outburst with other jurors," they told the judge. He lectured them on civility and jurors left for the day all smiles, the problem apparently resolved.

But then a juror's father died and she had to leave. The judge lost touch with the grieving juror, No. 4, over the weekend and couldn't determine whether she'd be available this week, so he decided Sunday to appoint an alternate juror.

Sullivan had halted deliberations Friday, but he decided in a hearing Sunday night to begin again with the alternate Monday morning.

As soon as court began for the day, Sullivan brought the alternate in for a brief conversation to see whether anything had happened over the weekend that would make her unable to deliberate and then told her to rejoin the jurors.

"We really appreciate your availability. Thank you," he told her. As one of four alternates, she'd sat through the trial but was dismissed once the jury began its deliberations last week. However, she and the other three alternates were warned not to read anything about the trial or talk to anyone about it because they might still be asked back.

The judge brought in the other jurors and told them not to speculate about why juror No. 4 no longer was present. He didn't tell them about her personal situation.

He also told them they needed to start their deliberations from scratch with the alternate juror but that how they did it was for them to decide.

Federal juries are allowed to proceed with fewer than 12 jurors. However, while it's common to reach a verdict with just 11, it's almost unheard of to proceed with fewer than that. Stevens' attorneys had advocated continuing with 11 rather than replacing the missing juror with an alternate.

The jury of eight women and four men must review seven felony counts to determine whether Stevens is guilty of lying on his Senate disclosure forms about gifts, mostly home repairs from the oil-services company Veco Corp. and its former owner, Allen. The Alaska Republican also is accused of accepting other gifts from other friends and failing to report them.

Although it's impossible to tell where it was in its deliberations before losing - and then regaining - a juror, the jury appears to be moving at a pretty fast clip so far. It got the case Wednesday afternoon and sent Sullivan a note Thursday afternoon asking to go home a little early and saying it had reviewed all the instructions.

The jury's prompt and apparently meticulous start Monday morning was a positive development for a panel that's had more than its share of theatrics since it began its deliberations. The judge took note after it left the courtroom to begin deliberating.

"Everyone was smiling. Everyone seems to be in a good mood this morning," the judge said. "No one appeared to be agitated or displeased. That's all I have to say."

1999: Stevens invests another $50,000 in a Fairbanks apartment project developed by Rubini and Hyde.

2000: Stevens intervenes to help Rubini, Hyde and other partners -- which do not include Stevens -- after the U.S. Air Force backtracked on a deal for the group to build, renovate and run housing on Elmendorf Air Force Base. The group ultimately wins the lucrative contract.

May 2002: A Rubini and Hyde group buys the Calais office buildings in Midtown Anchorage from an Outside company.

August 2002: A Rubini and Hyde group buys land on Fifth Avenue downtown on which to build a headquarters for the National Park Service. Mark Begich, who was not in office, was the real estate agent on the sale, making $22,500.

December 2002: Rubini and Hyde give Begich an interest in Calais partnerships.

Feb. 5, 2003: Begich announces he is running for mayor.

Feb. 23, 2003: Congress approves $3.75 million appropriation to buy land for a new archives center in Anchorage.

April 1, 2003: Begich wins in a narrow victory over incumbent Mayor George Wuerch.

May 5, 2003: Leonard Hyde offers to sell either of two parcels to the federal government for a National Archives center. One is nine acres at 40th Avenue and Denali. The other, also in Midtown, is in what's called Centerpoint II, which includes Stevens as an investor.

June 2003: Rubini and Hyde's group, Eagle River Center LLC, buys the nine acres at 40th and Denali for $1.5 million from a retired teachers group.

Nov. 13, 2003: Agreement reached between Eagle River Center LLC and Midtown park committee to give it 20 percent of any net profit if the land is sold for a National Archives building in exchange for the group's support on a rezoning from residential to commercial.

December 2003: Federal government gets two appraisals on the land at 40th and Denali. One sets the market value at $2.9 million, which factored in the strong likelihood of the rezoning. The other put the value at $1.95 million under residential zoning and $4.5 million if rezoned commercial.

FBI - Stevens-2248

Jan. 23, 2004: Congress approves another $2,250,000 for the archives land.

Feb. 2, 2004: Begich writes letter to the municipal Planning and Zoning Commission supporting the rezone of the property.

Feb. 9, 2004: Planning and Zoning Commission recommends rezoning.

-887 194A-AN-13620-N

June 2004: Rubini and Hyde's group sell the nine acres at 40th and Denali to the federal government for $3.5 million. Terms had been agreed to in March.

July 6, 2004: Archives property rezoning is approved by Assembly. Zoning is not effective unless a structure plan is approved within five years.

June 15, 2004: Stevens sells his interest in all investments with Rubini and Hyde. One investment was sold earlier in the year. He received $1,038,000 but also had to pay hefty taxes.

March 6, 2006: Begich sold his interest in the Calais partnerships for $53,430.

The Verdict: count-by-count

(10/27/08 12:53:29)

Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, was convicted on all seven charges of making false statements on Senate financial documents about gifts he received from contractor Bill Allen, oil services company VECO Corp., and others.

Below are the charges. The verdict form is broken down by year and jurors did not have to indicate which gifts, if any, they believe Stevens concealed.

COUNT ONE: False Statements, Scheme

ACCUSATION: Stevens engaged in a scheme to conceal from his Senate financial disclosure documents home renovations and other gifts he received from Allen and VECO from 2000-2006. Stevens contends he never asked for any freebies and believed he paid for everything he received.

VERDICT: Guilty

COUNT TWO: False Statements

ACCUSATION: Stevens knowingly made false, fictitious or fraudulent statements on his 2001 Senate financial disclosure form regarding gifts from Allen and others. That year, VECO employees dramatic renovated Stevens' mountain cabin, building a new first floor and installing a new electrical system. Allen also filled Stevens' house with furniture, left a tool box in his garage and installed a grill on the porch. Stevens also received from another friend an expensive massage chair, which Stevens said was a loan, and a custom work of stained glass, which Stevens said his wife arranged and he knew nothing about.

VERDICT: Guilty

COUNT THREE: False Statements

ACCUSATION: Stevens knowingly made false, fictitious or fraudulent statements on his 2002 Senate financial disclosure form regarding gifts from Allen and others. That year, VECO employees installed a new roof, wraparound deck and rope lighting system on Stevens' home. An expensive fish statue, donated to his foundation by an Alaska nonprofit group, was also charged as a gift because it ended up on Stevens' front porch.

FBI - Stevens-2250

VERDICT: Guilty

COUNT FOUR: False Statements

ACCUSATION: Stevens knowingly made false, fictitious or fraudulent statements on his 2003 Senate financial disclosure form regarding gifts from Allen and others. That year, Stevens received an Alaskan sled dog puppy from a friend who paid $1,000 for it at a charity auction. Stevens reported the gift's value as $250 and wrote that it was from a charity in honor of his public service.

VERDICT: Guilty

COUNT FIVE: False Statements

ACCUSATION: Stevens knowingly made false, fictitious or fraudulent statements on his 2004 Senate financial disclosure form regarding gifts from Allen and others. That year, VECO employees installed or repaired kitchen appliances and performed maintenance on a rooftop snow-melt system at Stevens' house.

VERDICT: Guilty

COUNT SIX: False Statements

ACCUSATION: Stevens knowingly made false, fictitious or fraudulent statements on his 2005 Senate financial disclosure form regarding gifts from Allen and others. That year, VECO employees performed roof and gutter repairs and electrical wiring.

VERDICT: Guilty

COUNT SEVEN: False Statements

ACCUSATION: Stevens knowingly made false, fictitious or fraudulent statements on his 2006 Senate financial disclosure form regarding gifts from Allen and others. That year, a VECO employee and an outside contractor performed work on the boiler at Stevens' house. VECO's costs were never paid and Allen paid the outside contractor's labor. Stevens says he asked to be billed and didn't consider it a gift.

VERDICT: Guilty

Jury finds Stevens guilty of lying about gifts

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER
Anchorage Daily News
(10/27/08 15:47:57)

WASHINGTON - A jury today found U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens guilty of all seven counts of lying on his financial disclosure forms.

It is the highest-profile felony conviction in a sweeping four-year federal investigation into corruption in Alaska politics, and a rare conviction by a jury of a sitting U.S. senator.

Jurors found Stevens, 84, guilty of willfully filing false financial-disclosure forms that hid such gifts as a $2,695 massage chair, a stained glass window, a sled dog and renovations that doubled the size of his Girdwood home. Those gifts, valued at as much as $250,000 over seven years, came mostly from his former friend Bill Allen, the star prosecution witness in Stevens' trial and the former owner of Veco Corp.

The oil field-services company was one of Alaska's largest private employers before Allen, caught up in the federal corruption probe himself, was forced to sell it last year.

Now, Alaska voters will decide whether Stevens, who's represented the state in the Senate since 1968 and before that served in the state legislature and as a former assistant U.S. attorney and Interior Department official, should continue to serve as their senator.

That decision came quickly for they jurors, who deliberated for less than two full days. As the jury foreman read out the first guilty count this afternoon, the senator slumped slightly but was silent. When the second count was read, his lawyer Brendan Sullivan reached over and put his arm around Stevens. Sullivan shook his head in disappointment as the verdict was read.

As the senator exited the packed courtroom, his wife, Catherine, kissed him on the cheek.

"It's not over yet," he told her. She responded: "You got that right."

Then he added, "Not over yet."

Stevens' lawyers, whose firm is well known for not speaking to the news media, exited the courthouse with the senator, who sped off in a van without saying anything.

FBI - Stevens-2252

Several hours after the verdict, Stevens issued a defiant statement maintaining his innocence. He accused prosecutors of misconduct and announced his intention to remain a U.S. Senate candidate on the Nov. 4 ballot.

"I am obviously disappointed in the verdict but not surprised given the repeated instances of prosecutorial misconduct in this case," Stevens said. "I will fight this unjust verdict with every ounce of energy I have."

For the first time in his career, Stevens faces a competitive re-election fight, against Democratic Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich. The Alaska Democratic Party called for Stevens to resign, but Begich was more measured.

"This past year has been a difficult time for Alaskans, but our people are strong and resilient and I believe that we will be able to move forward together to address the critical challenges that face Alaska," Begich said in a statement.

Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin, the Republican vice-presidential candidate, issued a statement keeping in line with the anti-corruption rhetoric that figured in her campaign trial stump speech.

"This is a sad day for Alaska and for Senator Stevens and his family," Palin said. "The verdict shines a light on the corrupting influence of the big oil service company that was allowed to control too much of our state. That control was part of the culture of corruption I was elected to fight. And that fight must always move forward regardless of party or seniority or even past service."

Stevens, who was indicted in late July, sought an early trial date, gambling that he'd face voters as an innocent man. Even without the conviction, though, in order to re-elect Stevens, voters would have to overlook four weeks of testimony that exposed some of the senator's innermost financial and personal secrets.

The guilty verdict will complicate not only his re-election bid but also the remainder of his term in the Senate. His colleagues have the option -- never exercised -- of voting to expel him before his term ends in January. Four U.S. senators have been convicted of crimes, historians note, but not one has received a presidential pardon.

The rules of succession are complicated in Alaska, where courts haven't ruled on a referendum that prohibits the governor from appointing a senator if the office is vacant. That referendum was enacted after then-Gov. Frank Murkowski appointed his daughter, Lisa Murkowski, to the U.S. Senate seat he vacated.

The corruption trial, which began Sept. 22, featured 24 government witnesses and 28 defense witnesses. Jurors began their deliberations Wednesday afternoon, but halted Friday morning when one of the juror's left town for her father's funeral. U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan appointed an alternate juror Monday morning, and by 4 p.m., the panel had reached a verdict.

Stevens took the stand in his own defense, a tactic that appeared to hurt him after prosecutors painted him as a disagreeable and mean-spirited man who considered himself above the law.

"This has been a long and hard fought trial," said the head of the Justice Department's criminal division, Matthew Friedrich, in a press conference outside the courthouse after the trial. "The Department is proud of this team not only for this trial but for the investigation which led to it. "This investigation continues, as does our commitment to holding elected officials accountable when they violate our laws."

The senator's defense rested on the theory that he and his wife had paid all the bills they'd received in connection with the renovations of their home in Girdwood.

Catherine Stevens also took the stand, providing contradictory testimony that may have persuaded the jurors that their conflicting stories meant that they were lying or covering up a crime.

The jurors had to weigh the husband and wife testimony against that of Allen, who pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers in Alaska in an unrelated case. Allen agreed to testify in Stevens' trial and two others in exchange for leniency in his own sentencing and the promise that prosecutors wouldn't charge his children in the corruption investigation.

The jury also heard from a parade of tradesmen who had nothing to gain by their testimony.

Almost daily for the first two weeks of the trial, the government introduced evidence showing that Veco employees -- particularly electricians and a plumber -- were on the job daily. Prosecutors also showed that the project's two supervisors were being paid by Veco and that the company provided much of the materials for the renovation and all the later additions and some repairs and furnishings. Stevens' lawyers never presented evidence in the case that Stevens or his wife ever paid Veco a penny for the work.

The Justice Department has charged 11 people in connection with its corruption probe in Alaska, including five former and current state legislators in Alaska. Other than Stevens, five pleaded guilty, three were convicted by juries in Alaska and two await trial.

Judge Sullivan has not yet set a date for sentencing and first must hear a series of post-trial motions, such as one from Stevens seeking a new trial. Each of the seven felony counts carries a sentence of up to five years in prison.

Stevens guilty: 'It's not over yet,' he says

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER
Anchorage Daily News
(10/27/08 20:51:00)

WASHINGTON — A federal jury on Monday convicted U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens on all seven counts of lying on his financial disclosures, a crippling blow not just to his election chances next week but to his legacy as Alaska's longest serving and most accomplished living politician.

Stevens also risks jail time. The seven felonies each carry a penalty of five years in prison, though it's unlikely a significant prison sentence, if any, would be imposed on an 84-year-old, first-time offender with a long record of public service and a longer list of character references.

"It's not over yet!" Stevens said angrily to his wife as he walked from the courtroom Monday afternoon.

"You've got that right," Catherine Stevens replied as she reached for him through the crowd of supporters rushing past reporters for the door.

"Not over yet," Stevens said.

Neither he nor his lawyers talked to reporters as he left the courthouse and climbed into a waiting white van amid a throng of cameras.

He later issued a statement maintaining his innocence and saying he will continue to fight the charges and accusing prosecutors of misconduct. He remains a candidate for office, he said. Neither his Senate office nor his campaign responded to an e-mail request for an interview.

Stevens is by far the highest profile defendant among nine legislators, businessmen, lobbyists and an state administration official to have been convicted in the massive FBI investigation of corruption in Alaska. Two other legislators await trial in Anchorage.

"This investigation continues, as does our commitment to holding elected officials accountable when they violate our laws," said Acting Assistant Attorney General Matt Friedrich, reading a statement on the courthouse steps after the verdict.

Among those still under investigation are Stevens' son Ben, a former president of the Alaska senate, and U.S. Rep. Don Young, who's standing for election Tuesday with Stevens.

Stevens' defense team has until Dec. 5 to file motions for a new trial and other relief from Judge Emmet Sullivan, who set a hearing date of Feb. 25. Sullivan indefinitely postponed sentencing.

FBI - Stevens-2254

UNREPORTED GIFTS

In convicting Stevens, the jury had to unanimously decide he lied on his financial disclosure by not reporting gifts and benefits.

Though the jurors heard character witnesses for Stevens, including former Secretary of State Colin Powell, none started out with the kind of knowledge of Stevens that most Alaskans could recite: his long history of securing federal money for his homestate, of supporting Alaska's military bases and Native institutions, his connections to fisheries and the trans-Alaska pipeline, or that "Ted Stevens" is part of the name of the biggest international airport in Alaska, the marine research center in Juneau and the science education center in Kenai.

The judge relayed a message from the jurors that they would not consent to interviews. Their identities were never disclosed in open court and they left the courthouse while Sullivan's court was still in session after the verdict.

The Stevenses were the two final witnesses in a trial that began with jury selection on Sept. 22. Fifty other witnesses testified, many of them from the now defunct oil-field service company Veco. They told of being directed to perform renovations and repairs on Stevens' official residence in Girdwood, turning the modest green A-frame with a loft into a five-bedroom retreat with a new garage and kitchen.

In all, the government said Veco and its chief executive, Bill Allen, provided Stevens with some $250,000 in services, gifts, furnishings and other benefits. Two other friends of Stevens — Bob Penney, the real estate developer and sport fish advocate, and Bob Persons, the owner of Girdwood's Double Musky restaurant — also provided gifts of a $1,000 dog, a $3,200 stained glass window and a $2,700 chair that Stevens didn't disclose, according to evidence in the case.

Stevens and his defense challenged those dollar values on multiple fronts. Stevens said he didn't know that Veco provided a dime's worth of work, and he disputed that any of the gifts were actually his to own, even though they were in his homes in Girdwood and Washington — often for years.

But Senate rules provide a low threshold for reporting gifts — from $260 in 2000 to $305 in 2006 — making it easier for the jury to decide than it might have been if the Senate values were much higher.

For instance, the jury didn't have to determine to the penny the validity of Veco's accounting that the house renovations cost the company $82,000 in 2000 and another $110,000 in 2001. Those were the numbers initially entered into evidence early in the trial, but were later shown to be significantly flawed even before the government rested its case.

Whatever the actual number was for the renovations, the evidence was overwhelming it was more than $260.

Under the law, any gift over the threshold amount had to be listed. Yet Stevens' forms never showed anything from Veco, Allen, Penney or Persons.

'NOT A TYPOGRAPHICAL ERROR'

The jury began deliberations for the day about 9:30 a.m. It was the start of the third day of deliberations for all but Juror 11, an alternate who had just taken the place of another juror who left to attend her father's funeral in California. The judge instructed the jury that they would have to restart their deliberations to accommodate their newest member, a prolific note-taker during the trial who runs a Web site for her church.

Late morning, the jury sent out a note with a "significant question." It turned out they had discovered an error in the indictment that had gotten though the prosecution team, the grand jury, two months of pre-trial wrangling by both sides and a month's worth of trial. None of the 25 or so journalists regularly covering the case noticed it, either.

The issue involved Count 2 and its reference to the fifth set of checkboxes on the front page of Stevens' 2001 report. It was there that Stevens was supposed to check whether he received more than $260 in reportable gifts that year.

FBI - Stevens-2255

The indictment said Stevens checked "No." But the jury discovered from looking at the actual disclosure that Stevens checked "Yes."

They wanted to know how to deal with that discrepancy.

With the jury waiting in their room for an answer, the embarrassed prosecution team said the error in the indictment could be considered a typo, but in any case wasn't significant. The gift Stevens listed in his back-up schedule was a $1,100 gold coin struck to commemorate his honorary chairmanship of the Special Olympics winter games in Anchorage that year. There was nothing in the schedule from Veco, Allen, Persons or Penney, as charged in the indictment.

The defense said that if the jury found there was no proof that Stevens checked "No," that might be reason enough for a not guilty verdict.

The judge decided to send an instruction to the jury that the indictment is not evidence — only the disclosure document itself was. The implication was that the jury could ignore the error.

As for the prosecution, Sullivan was displeased.

"Presumably someone reads these before they are submitted on the docket — it's not a typographical error," he said.

On the other hand, he had high praise for the sharp-eyed jury. By then, the jurors were taking lunch. Unknown to anyone in the courtroom, they were also nearing a verdict.

'GUILTY'

Shortly after 3 p.m. Washington time (11 a.m. in Alaska), the jury foreman, a balding, middle-aged man who works for a drug rehabilitation agency, handed another note to the marshal guarding the door. As Stevens, his lawyers, prosecutors and reporters responded to the summons from court officials, there was no direct word about what the note said. Then Shelton Snook, the court administrator, told reporters that no one would be allowed to dash from the courtroom, movie style, until the judge declared a recess. The marshal ordered everyone to leave their cell phones and Blackberrys outside the courtroom.

At 3:53 p.m., the jury walked in the courtroom door. Everyone in the room stood. The only sound was from people settling back into their seats. The jurors looked toward the judge and each other. None appeared to steal a glance at Stevens or his wife in the front row of the spectator benches.

If they had, they would have seen two grim faces. Stevens' face was slightly flushed, his wife pale.

Brenda Morris, the lead prosecutor, touched her fingers together and closed her eyes, like she was meditating. Prosecutors Joe Bottini and Nicholas Marsh and FBI agent Mary Beth Kepner, the others at Morris' table, held pens in their hands, ready to scrawl on legal pads.

"I will take the verdict," Sullivan told the foreman.

The foreman passed a sealed manila envelope to the marshal, who carried it to the judge. Sullivan ripped open the flap, checked the form to make sure it was complete, then put it back in the envelope. He passed the envelope back to the marshal, who returned it to the foreman.

Sullivan gave no hint of the verdict.

The foreman grabbed a microphone and stood. The only others on their feet where the three marshals guarding the back door.

"As to count one, what is the verdict of the jury?"

In a deep baritone, the foreman replied, "Guilty."

Not a whisper moved through the court. Stevens didn't move.

Count two, asked the judge?

"Guilty," said the foreman.

The gray-haired Brendan Sullivan, Stevens' lead defense attorney, put his arm around Stevens' shoulder.

Count three?

"Guilty," said the foreman.

Stevens closed his eyes.

Count four?

"Guilty."

Catherine Stevens' lips were quivering. Stevens' daughter Beth, who attended every minute of the trial, looked at her feet.

Count five?

"Guilty."

Stevens shook his head from side to side. Morris was stoned face. Bottini, Marsh and Kepner wrote furiously and showed no reaction. .

And so it went for the next two verdicts. Another defense attorney, Robert Cary, requested that the jurors all be polled as to whether they agreed to the verdict, a common request of a losing side in court.

Each juror spoke. The verdict was unchanged.

Stevens plans return to campaign Wednesday

DOUBT: Conviction effects may be unknown until election next week.

By SEAN COCKERHAM and DON HUNTER
Anchorage Daily News
(10/28/08 00:36:21)

A defiant Sen. Ted Stevens is returning to Alaska on Wednesday to resume his re-election campaign, despite being convicted of felonies that carry the potential of years in prison.

Stevens, 84, faces a challenge of historic proportions with just one week before the election. He'd be the first convicted U.S. senator ever elected, on appeal or not.

Alaska pollsters and political consultants were skeptical of Stevens' chances Monday but not prepared to count out the longest serving Republican in Senate history. Several pointed out that, contrary to most predictions, Stevens surged in the polls after his indictment in late July, coming from far behind to what's essentially a tie with Democratic opponent Mark Begich in most recent polls.

"That had to be people rallying to Ted against these Outside influences attacking their senator. It's possible, extremely unlikely, that with the conviction we'll get another backlash against this Outside influence," said Anchorage pollster Marc Hellenthal.

The mood at Stevens' Anchorage campaign headquarters was one of stunned horror immediately after the conviction came down mid-day Monday. People milled inside while two young volunteers stood in the cold guarding the door. One of them looked close to tears.

Hours later, the news had settled in. The guards were gone, the campaign ordered Moose's Tooth pizza for its workers and Stevens' backers started talking about what's next.

"I think it will be a battle but we're going to throw every ounce of effort into doing so," said political consultant Art Hackney, who is working on the Stevens campaign.

Hackney said it's going to be a "nonstop campaigning, very aggressive," once Stevens gets back to Alaska. He said the campaign has to ask people to withhold their judgment.

"And basically what I think most people understand, it's really three words -- prosecutorial misconduct and appeal," he said. "And other than that it's campaigning on the record of what he's done and what he can do."

FBI - Stevens-2258

SHARP DIVIDE

Larry Sabato, who publishes the nationally watched Crystal Ball forecasts of congressional races, said he can't imagine Alaskans would re-elect a U.S. senator just convicted of seven felonies.

"It would make Alaska a national laughingstock," said Sabato, who directs the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia.

The National Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee appears to have given up on Stevens.

"Ted Stevens served his constituents for over 40 years and I am disappointed to see his career end in disgrace," said NRSC Chairman John Ensign, a senator from Nevada.

Carl Shepro, a political science professor at the University of Alaska Anchorage, said that kind of talk might be premature. Shepro said he believes Stevens still has a real chance to win re-election next week despite the conviction.

"Right now I'm in Fairbanks. It's pretty amazing the advertisements for him and the testimonials and stuff," Shepro said. "It's certainly difficult to think they are just going to turn around because of the conviction, and with appeals this could drag out for years."

Stevens' Democratic opponent, Anchorage Mayor Begich, was playing it safe on Monday. Begich read a 14-second statement that said it's been a tough year but time to move on. He then refused to answer any questions from reporters.

Democratic Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, who recruited Begich to run, wasn't feeling so shy. He called on Stevens to "now respect the outcome of the judicial process and the dignity of the United States Senate." The Alaska Democratic party said Stevens should resign.

U.S. Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky said Stevens must face the consequences of the verdict and will be held accountable so public trust can be restored.

But Alaska's other U.S. senator, Republican Lisa Murkowski, said the prosecution committed several gaffes during the trial and she'll stand with Stevens as he pursues his appeal.

RURAL SUPPORT

There's nothing in the U.S. Constitution or Senate rules to keep a convicted felon from being a senator.

Stevens' colleagues could expel him with a two-thirds vote if he's re-elected, or even before his current term ends in January.

If Stevens resigned or was expelled, the seat would stay empty until a special election within 90 days.

Todd Larkin of North Pole, who has been active in the state Republican Party, said Stevens could win, and then resign, allowing the Republicans to put up a candidate in the special election. That's a potential scenario state party officials are talking about to keep the seat out of Democratic hands.

Stevens isn't talking about resigning yet. His campaign sent a message to supporters Monday saying "overzealous prosecutors" deprived Stevens of his rights and that 12 jurors who have never been to Alaska shouldn't decide the race.

Stevens is particularly strong in rural Alaska. Matthew Nicolai, president of the Calista Corp., one of 13 regional Native corporations, estimated Stevens represents about $1 billion a year in federal projects to rural Alaska. He said the 40-year senator has visited nearly all of the 56 villages in the Calista region at one time or another. Nicolai said he thinks Stevens can still be re-elected.

Rep. Reggie Joule, who represents Kotzebue in the state Legislature, heard news of the verdict while preparing for a caribou hunt. Joule is a Democrat but has stumped for Stevens during the campaign.

During the Alaska Federation of Natives convention, some rural voters walked to the nearby Anchorage City Hall to cast early ballots last week -- before the verdict, he said. "Sen. Stevens has a lot of loyal backers, and a lot of people have voted already."

Asked if he still plans to vote for Stevens, Joule hadn't decided.

"There's a piece of me that's really torn. So, I guess when I get inside the polling booth, I'll cast my vote," he said.

Alaska Republican Congressman Don Young, who is under federal investigation and facing his own tough re-election battle, said he thinks Stevens can still win next week.

"He's the best thing for that, for the Senate. Alaskans know this. This is a trumped up charge. ... I can remember Richard Nixon, you know, his years of service, what he's done. And everybody were ridiculing him and he ended up being the greatest president in the history of our century," Young said.

Young, who has not been charged, said the Stevens conviction doesn't make him more concerned about what federal prosecutors might be planning for him.

"I have no problem with anything. I know where I'm going, where I've been and what I've done," he said.

POLLSTERS GET BUSY

Pollsters said a Stevens acquittal could have given Young a needed boost, helping to give voters doubt about the federal investigation of Young. Clem Tillion, a Republican former president of the state Senate, seemed to agree.

"I think it's going to be harder on Don Young than it is on Ted Stevens," Tillion said.

Alaska pollsters will be scrambling in the coming days to test the effect of Monday's conviction on both Young's U.S. House race and Stevens' Senate bid.

Most recent polls have showed Begich and Stevens being statistically tied. But a Craciun Research Group Inc. poll over the weekend put Begich in the lead by 12 percentage points, after the closing arguments but before the jury came in with a verdict.

Pollster Anne Hays said it's been a close race, according to her numbers, but she expects "the dam to open up," following the conviction. Ivan Moore, another Anchorage pollster, said there's no way to know for sure what the conviction will bring.

"This is one of those situations where nothing like this ever happened before," Moore said. "But I think it's pretty clear Ted's going to have a hard time winning next week."

McCain calls on Stevens to step down

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
(10/28/08 07:36:03)

WASHINGTON -- Wasting no time in separating his presidential campaign from what he described as the "corruption and insider dealing that has become so pervasive in our nation's capital," Sen. John McCain called on fellow Republican Sen. Ted Stevens to step down from the U.S. Senate.

Stevens, 84, was convicted Monday by a jury in Washington, D.C., of accepting thousands of dollars in freebies, including renovations that doubled his home in size. Stevens has vowed to appeal the seven felony convictions and press on with his own re-election campaign in the week leading up to the Nov. 4 election. He is only the fifth sitting senator to be convicted of such a serious crime in the history of the Senate.

"It is clear that Senator Stevens has broken his trust with the people and that he should now step down," McCain said in a written statement. "I hope that my colleagues in the Senate will be spurred by these events to redouble their efforts to end this kind of corruption once and for all."

Unlike that of Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nevada, McCain's statement offers no niceties about their shared time in the Senate and expresses no sympathy for Stevens' family. Its intensity is somewhat surprising given that McCain is a fellow Republican, but not unexpected given the frosty relations the two men have long had. They have sparred over opening up the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling, McCain's opposition to earmarks and their differing positions on global warming.

Reid, who personally recruited Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich to run against Stevens, called the verdict "a personal tragedy for our colleague Ted Stevens." He also urged Stevens to "respect the outcome of the judicial process and the dignity of the United States Senate" but didn't suggest he step down.

McCain's call for Stevens' resignation also goes well beyond that of his vice-presidential running mate, Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin. Hours after the verdict, Palin released a statement calling Stevens' conviction "a sad day" for Alaska, but she stopped short of demanding he step down.

"The verdict shines a light on the corrupting influence of the big oil service company that was allowed to control too much of our state," Palin said. "That control was part of the culture of corruption I was elected to fight. And that fight must always move forward regardless of party or seniority or even past service."

In her statement, Palin asks Alaskans to "join me in respecting the workings of our judicial system. I'm confident Senator Stevens will do what is right for the people of Alaska."

She would not tell reporters whether she planned to vote for Stevens.

FBI - Stevens-2261

But if Stevens were to resign from his seat or be expelled by his fellow senators, Palin has a potential -- and complicated -- role in choosing a replacement. No one in Alaska can say for sure how it would work because Alaska's law on senatorial succession was changed twice in 2004 -- once by the Legislature and once by ballot initiative.

Those laws were changed following then-Gov. Frank Murkowski's 2002 appointment of his daughter, Republican Lisa Murkowski, to his vacated U.S. Senate seat.

Both of the 2004 laws call for a special election within 60 to 90 days of the vacancy. But they disagree on whether the governor appoints an interim senator in the meantime. The Alaska Supreme Court would ultimately have to decide which law the state follows.

Stevens could keep seat in Senate

IF IT'S OPEN: Voters would have 60 days to pick a new senator.

By TOM KIZZIA
tkizzia@adn.com

(10/28/08 00:36:02)

Can Sen. Ted Stevens still run for office after being convicted by a jury on Monday? Yes.

Can a re-elected Stevens keep his seat in the Senate if he loses on appeal? Doubtful, but that would be up to his fellow senators.

If Stevens were to resign from his seat or be expelled, how would a replacement be chosen?

Nobody can say for sure.

That's because Alaska's law on senatorial succession was changed twice in 2004 -- once by the Legislature, and once by ballot initiative. Both laws call for a special election within 60 to 90 days of the vacancy. But they disagree on whether the governor appoints an interim senator in the meantime.

The Alaska Supreme Court would ultimately have to decide which law the state follows.

But first things first.

There's nothing in the U.S. Constitution that says a politician convicted of a crime can't run for re-election to the Senate.

Assistant Attorney Gen. David Jones said Monday the only qualifications for Congress are those spelled out in the U.S. Constitution -- basically, matters of residency. He cited a report by the Congressional Research Service saying no other state or federal requirements can be imposed. That includes any effort to bar someone convicted of a felony, the report said.

The Senate gets to set its own rules about who can serve, however. It can expel a member by a two-thirds vote. Such a vote is unlikely while a criminal case is on appeal, according to the Senate historian's office. In fact, such a vote would be unprecedented. Four senators have been convicted of crimes: two resigned, one died, and one saw his term expire before an expulsion vote could be held.

Last week, two outspoken Stevens defenders, Sen. Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, and Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, predicted the Senate would surely seat Stevens if he lost his jury trial but won re-election while appealing the verdict. They even spelled out several causes they considered fruitful for an appeal: failure to move his trial to Alaska or prosecutorial misconduct.

If Stevens loses the appeal and his seat is vacated, his successor is chosen by rules set by the state of Alaska.

Each state gets to set its own rules for filling vacancies, according to the 17th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, ratified in 1913. That amendment said senators are to be elected by popular vote, rather than by the state legislatures. It's up to individual states to decide whether temporary appointments can be made when a vacancy occurs.

Alaska's rules of succession have been changed again and again, each time to benefit the majority party in the Legislature.

Before 1968, the rule was that a newly appointed senator had to be from the same party as the deceased or departing senator. But when Democrat Bob Bartlett died that year, Republican Gov. Wally Hickel wanted to appoint a Republican, so the Legislature repealed the rule. The appointee was Stevens, who later won a special election in 1970 and has held the seat since.

In 1998, the Legislature put the same-party rule back, ensuring that Democratic Gov. Tony Knowles would have to appoint a Republican if the Stevens or Frank Murkowski seats came open.

In 2002, the Republican Legislature changed the law again so Knowles could not name Murkowski's successor if Murkowski won the governor's race.

Murkowski won and got to name his successor. He chose his daughter, Lisa, touching off a furor. By 2004, with signatures rolling in on an initiative petition, the Legislature changed the law to require a prompt special election unless a vacancy occurs within 60 days of a regular election. But the Legislature allowed the governor to appoint someone to keep the seat warm until that election.

Democrats backing Proposition 4 in 2004 objected to any appointment at all. They said an interim appointment gave the chosen successor an incumbent's edge in the ultimate election.

Opponents of the measure said waiting to fill a U.S. Senate seat would leave Alaska without full representation for months. And they argued the backers were being a touch devilish, reminding voters of the nepotism issue in Lisa Murkowski's first, and ultimately successful, race for the Senate.

The initiative backers, who called themselves Trust the People, had to win a ruling from the state Supreme Court to get on the 2004 ballot. The Murkowski administration argued the new state law was essentially the same, making the ballot measure redundant. The justices said there was an essential difference -- whether a temporary senator gets appointed during those 60 to 90 days.

Since the initiative had yet to pass, however, the Supreme Court declined to rule on an important secondary issue: whether the initiative supplanted the state law. State officials at the time argued that the 17th Amendment gave the decision about succession to legislatures, not to a public vote. But the issue was never settled.

The case was known as State of Alaska v. Trust the People.

Jones said the Department of Law has not drawn up a legal opinion on the matter.

Bottom line: if the Senate seat were to open up, voters would get to choose a new senator in a special election within 90 days. In the meantime, it would be up to Gov. Sarah Palin to decide whether to trigger a quick constitutional test by appointing an interim senator.

Unless, that is, Palin has been elected vice president. In which case the decision would be up to her successor, Lt. Gov. Sean Parnell.

McCain, Palin urge Stevens to quit

SAVING THE SEAT: The Alaska GOP, however, wants voters to support him.

By SEAN COCKERHAM and ERIKA BOLSTAD
Anchorage Daily News

(10/29/08 00:47:50)

Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin on Tuesday joined top Republicans including her running mate, John McCain, and the Senate Republican leader in calling for Ted Stevens to resign from office.

"After being found guilty on seven felony counts, I had hoped Senator Stevens would take the opportunity to do the statesman-like thing and erase the cloud that is covering his Senate seat," Palin said in a written statement. "He has not done so. Alaskans are grateful for his decades of public service but the time has come for him to step aside."

Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky said Stevens should resign and, if he doesn't, he could be expelled from the U.S. Senate. It would take a two-thirds vote of the Senate to expel the Alaska senator.

"If he is re-elected and the felony charge stands through the appeals process, there is zero chance that a senator with a felony conviction would not be expelled from the Senate," McConnell said while campaigning in Kentucky.

The Republican Party of Alaska is urging voters to support Stevens anyway as he returns to Alaska today to make a final push before Tuesday's election. The message: If Stevens wins and then resigns or is expelled from the Senate, there would be a special election giving Republicans another opportunity to keep the seat out of Democratic hands.

"If it's not Sen. Stevens, we need the choice to have someone else," said McHugh Pierre, the Alaska party spokesman. "But right now Sen. Stevens is our candidate, we're behind him 100 percent, he says he's innocent, he's going to fight these charges, I believe he's innocent and we're going to make sure that our membership and other conservative Alaskans can find it in them to vote for him and prolong their options." Both the Stevens campaign and the state GOP suggested that Palin, who characterizes herself as a reformer as she campaigns for vice president, is saying what she needs to say to get votes in the Lower 48 and Alaska voters should not listen. Pierre said McCain and Palin are in a tough spot, because they want a Republican in the seat to keep the Democrats from obtaining a 60-seat, filibuster-proof majority.

"They can't come out and endorse him; how's that going to look?" Pierre said. Palin, in her statement, seemed open to the possibility that Stevens could stay in office long enough to win re-election next week and then resign, saying that, "even if elected on Tuesday, senator Stevens should step aside to allow a special election to give Alaskans a real choice of who will serve them in Congress."

Stevens' Democratic opponent, Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, on Tuesday stopped short of calling on Stevens to resign, saying that "it's up to him to make that decision." He said the issues facing the state are too important to wait months or longer for Stevens' case to be appealed.

FBI - Stevens-2264

NOT ALL BUY PARTY MESSAGE

McCain said Stevens has broken his trust with the people and should now step down. Other Republican senators calling for Stevens to resign include Sens. Jim DeMint of South Carolina and Norm Coleman of Minnesota, who faces a competitive race against comedian Al Franken. Republican Gordon Smith of Oregon, also in a competitive race, echoed their call for his immediate resignation. McCain's close friend and campaign companion Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., also asked for Stevens to resign and "pursue his legal rights as a private citizen."

And not all Alaska Republicans were buying their state party's message. Some said Tuesday that Stevens is through and they'll vote next week for Alaskan Independence Party candidate Bob Bird or the Libertarian in the race, David Haase.

-893 199A-AN-13620-

"Sen. Stevens is an 84-year-old man who needs to find a dignified way to get himself out of this predicament other than depending on the people of Alaska," said Spike Jorgenson of Tok, a state party central committee member who said he won't vote for Stevens this year.

Other prominent Republicans, including Anchorage Baptist Temple pastor Jerry Prevo, said they are sticking with Stevens, who has represented Alaska in the U.S. Senate since 1968.

"Based on all that he's done and being a pastor, pastors are a little bit, their tendency is to extend forgiveness and preach forgiveness, so that would just be a natural thing," Prevo said.

State House Speaker John Harris, a Republican from Valdez, said he's supporting Stevens, but only because there isn't enough time to get another Republican on the ballot.

"Had this trial taken place significantly before the election, I'd say he ought to step down. Now, there isn't enough time," Harris said. "I hope he wins, and we'll see what happens after that."

STEVENS BACK TODAY

Stevens shows no sign of stepping down. He is returning to Alaska today and there's going to be a 5:30 p.m. rally for supporters at the PenAir hangar in Anchorage.

"We think Alaskans are fighting (alongside) the senator and we expect that to continue," said Stevens' campaign spokesman, Aaron Saunders.

Saunders said Stevens is running to win. It's far too early to speculate on whether he might later resign, Saunders said, as Stevens "has a series of legal options and he'll be exploring those."

Frank McQueary of Anchorage, a state Republican Party official, said Stevens doesn't deserve what's happening and Alaskans should support him as he appeals his conviction.

"From what I've seen of the transcripts of the trial, the only criminal activities demonstrated were on the part of the prosecutor and the FBI," McQueary said.

Anyone who is even somewhat conservative needs to back Stevens, he said.

"If Sarah (Palin) were truly conservative, her overriding concern should have been not turning that seat over to a liberal ... other than wanting to stand up and look virtuous and chasing public opinion and chasing polls, there was no reason to (call for his resignation). The process hasn't played out with Stevens," he said.

Stevens' campaign announced endorsements Tuesday from the Alaska Eskimo Whaling Commission and retired Air Force Lt. Gen Tom McInerney, former head of the Alaska Command.

Nick Stepovich of Fairbanks, a Republican Party official and former state legislator, said he thinks voters will fall back on Stevens' years of service next week and elect him to another term.

FBI - Stevens-2265

"I think many Alaskans feel that Stevens is still not done yet," he said.

Palin to return Monday

Gov. Sarah Palin is returning to Alaska on Monday night, her campaign announced Tuesday. It's the first time she's been back to the state since mid-September.

Palin, the Republican nominee for vice president, will vote Tuesday morning in her hometown of Wasilla before leaving for Phoenix, Ariz., to join running mate John McCain for Election Night.

Anchorage rally welcomes Stevens

Supporters cheer 'lion of Alaska'

By SEAN COCKERHAM
scockerham@adn.com

(10/30/08 01:08:28)

Sen. Ted Stevens returned to Alaska on Wednesday for the first time since his conviction, telling a crowd of supporters he made a mistake but is not a criminal and needs their help to save his re-election.

"Like most people, I'm not perfect. I naively trusted someone I thought was an honest friend. When he was neither honest nor a friend," Stevens said.

Stevens was talking about Bill Allen, former chief executive of the oilfield services company Veco Corp. and the prosecution's star witness against him. A Washington, D.C., jury on Monday convicted Stevens of seven felony counts of lying on financial disclosure forms about thousands of dollars of gifts and home renovations from Veco.

"My future is in God's hands," the Republican told the crowd of roughly 500 gathered in the PenAir hangar at Ted Stevens International Airport. "Alaska's future is in your hands."

Stevens' return marks the beginning of what his campaign says will be an aggressive, whirlwind, effort to persuade Alaskans to re-elect the 84-year-old senator. With the election just five days away, Stevens has little time and a big challenge.

But the crowd at his Anchorage rally seemed to harbor little doubt that Stevens, who showed flashes of both humility and defiance, would beat his challengers. They include Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, a Democrat, who was holding a dueling rally at a union hall at the same time as Stevens' event.

There was undisguised hostility toward the federal government and the FBI at the Stevens event, with people wearing T-shirts that said "F*#@ the feds, vote for Ted."

"Anyone who thinks you can get a fair trial in the heart of liberalism, Washington, D.C., is smoking dope. He was railroaded," said Mark Kelliher, a retired engineer.

Talk radio host Rick Rydell told the crowd he knows Stevens, a D.C. jury doesn't.

"I don't particularly like it when outsiders tell me what to do," Rydell said, before Stevens took the stage. "You can kiss my Alaska moose-hunting behind."

Stevens reiterated his innocence, assured his supporters that he would be vindicated on appeal, and said he's still the best choice for Alaska. Stevens said that when he filed his financial disclosure forms, he believed they were accurate and complete.

FBI - Stevens-2267

"The verdict was driven by prosecutors who were willing to do anything to win. If I had a fair trial in Alaska, I would have been acquitted," he said.

The crowd cheered and shouted, "We trust you," over and over again as he spoke. Former governor Bill Sheffield, former Anchorage mayor George Wuerch, and mayoral candidate Dan Sullivan were there. So was Alaska's junior U.S. senator, Republican Lisa Murkowski, who told the Stevens supporters they need to get their neighbors and co-workers out to support Stevens.

Republican congressional staffers in suits and stylish glasses came to the rally, but the crowd also included moms and old men in long beards and worn Carhartts. Some had a memorable experience with Stevens or one of his staffers helping them with a constituent problem, others just saw him as a lion of Alaska. They seemed to share an unshakeable faith in Stevens, a belief that if he said he didn't do it, he didn't.

Outside of the love and respect for Stevens in that hangar, though, the 40-year senator faces enormous hurdles in getting re-elected. No convicted senator has ever been elected, and a new Rasumusson poll released Tuesday indicates his race went from a statistical tie to an 8-point Begich lead following his conviction.

Several of Stevens' Republican colleagues in the Senate, including Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, have said Stevens broke the public trust and should resign. Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin, the Republican nominee for vice president, and her running mate, John McCain, have also called on Stevens to step down. Palin said Stevens should resign even if he wins next week, to allow a special election to pick his replacement. The McCain-Palin campaign has declined to elaborate on Palin's statement, though, and Palin won't say whom she plans to vote for.

Many Alaska Republicans are conflicted over Stevens, saying they'll vote for a third-party candidate, like Bob Bird of the Alaskan Independence Party or Libertarian David Haase. The state Republican Party's pitch to vote for Stevens is that it would keep Begich from winning, so if Stevens resigns or is expelled from the Senate, there could be a special election allowing another Republican to try and win the seat.

But people who turned out for Stevens' Wednesday rally weren't basing their votes on the hope that a Plan B Republican could emerge in a special election. For them it was all about Stevens, whom many called a "great man," the father of Alaska, a man who built the state and would never break the law.

John Sparaga, an Anchorage dentist, said he believes Stevens will win in Tuesday's election. Alaskans are exceptional, he said, and should turn out for the senator.

"I think Alaskans should prove themselves stronger than other types of people," he said.

Stevens gave an eight-and-a-half minute speech, often interrupted by cheers. He said he was the best person to represent Alaska during this economic crisis, as federal programs important to the state will be in danger of being cut.

"I will represent Alaska in the Senate while my lawyers pursue the appeal to clear my name," Stevens said. " I can advance Alaska's interests regardless of which party is in the majority, or whether I chair a committee."

He criticized the prosecutors in his trial, saying they manipulated evidence and interfered with his defense. On Tuesday, the day after his conviction, Stevens' chief lawyer, Brendan Sullivan, sent a letter to Attorney General Michael Mukasey complaining about misconduct in the case by prosecutors. The trial, the letter says, was "irretrievably tainted by the prosecution team's zeal to convict a high-profile but innocent defendant."

The Justice Department had no comment on the letter.

Meanwhile, Democrats said Wednesday that four main areas of contention raised by Stevens' defense were all brought to light during the trial, which reduces the chance an appeals court would consider them reason for a retrial. That includes an FBI note in which Veco owner Allen said Stevens would probably pay if given a bill, said Meg Simonian, an Anchorage lawyer and Democrat. She also dismissed the contention that the trial should have been held in Alaska, saying the crimes were committed in Washington, D.C., where Stevens lives, and that extensive questioning of the jury pool filtered out any jurors with built-in bias against Congress or Republicans.

"He is not entitled to a jury of supporters," she said.

Stevens is flying to Fairbanks this morning for a rally there as well as meetings with the editorial board of the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner and the local Rotary. He'll be back in Anchorage tonight for a public broadcasting debate. It's the first debate he's had with any of his challengers.

Daily News reporters Tom Kizzia and Erika Bolstad contributed to this story. Find Sean Cockerham online at adn.com/contact/scockerham or call him at 257-4344.

Final debate tonight

All four major candidates for U.S. Senate and U.S. House will debate tonight on statewide public television and radio between 8 and 10 p.m.

U.S. Rep. Don Young and former state Rep. Ethan Berkowitz debate between 8 and 9, and Sen. Ted Stevens and Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich debate between 9 and 10. In Anchorage, it's on KAKM-Channel 7 and KSKA-91.1 FM.

Stevens can vote until sentencing

JURY DECISION NOT ENOUGH: Penalties start when judge finishes.

By TOM KIZZIA
tkizzia@adn.com

(10/30/08 00:02:15)

Sen. Ted Stevens gets to vote in next Tuesday's election despite being found guilty of seven federal felonies because his conviction won't be final until he's sentenced, the state Department of Law decided late Wednesday.

Alaska law bars felons convicted of crimes involving "moral turpitude" from voting for the duration of their sentence, including any probation period.

Stevens' failure to report gifts is a Class D felony under federal law and constitutes such a crime because it involves willful fraud, said an opinion by Michael Barnhill, a senior assistant attorney general with the state.

But when is a person deemed convicted? Barnhill conceded in his opinion there are two ways to read the law, with a popular interpretation being that the jury's verdict is enough. But most legal precedents lean toward waiting until the judge in the case has entered his formal judgment and sentence, Barnhill said.

No date for sentencing Stevens has been set.

Stevens first has the right to file for a new trial and other relief. The federal judge in the case, Emmet Sullivan, has given Stevens' defense team until Dec. 5 to file those motions, with a hearing set for Feb. 25.

Given the touchy nature of the voting question, it took the state legal department more than two days to sort through the precedents and draw up its four-page opinion for Division of Elections director Gail Fenumiai. Questions about Stevens' right to vote began coming to the division within hours of his conviction Monday.

The state's conclusion jibes with the opinion of several other lawyers, including federal public defender Rich Curtner in Anchorage. But Curtner added that the question of exactly when a felon loses voting rights had never come up in any of his federal cases.

"For most of my clients, that's the least of their worries," he said.

Two lawyers who spoke at a Democratic Party press conference on the Stevens case Wednesday -- Meg Simonian and Jeff Feldman -- agreed, saying the senator will also lose the right to a Permanent Fund dividend check after his sentencing.

In his legal opinion, Barnhill conceded it's a judgment call for the state. He cites a contrary example, in which the state recognizes a jury verdict alone as sufficient when a judge is looking for prior convictions at sentencing for a second crime.

FBI - Stevens-2270

"Given the weight of the authorities, and the Alaska Supreme Court's historical reliance on case law from Washington, Oregon and California, we think that if this question were presented to our courts, they would be more likely than not to adopt the majority case law view, and interpret 'conviction' according to its legal technical meaning," Barnhill concluded.

"Given the high profile nature of this issue, this conclusion may be challenged in court," he added. "If a legal challenge is mounted prior to Senator Stevens casting his ballot, the Division of Elections should provide Senator Stevens with a questioned ballot."

Kott seeks freedom while he appeals

Anchorage Daily News
(10/25/08 03:49:33)

Former Alaska House Speaker Pete Kott, now serving six years in federal prison on corruption charges, is asking a judge to free him during his appeal.

In court papers filed earlier this month in U.S. District Court, defense attorney James Wendt argued that Kott isn't likely to flee, isn't a danger and has a good chance of winning on appeal.

Prosecutors oppose the motion but haven't filed a detailed response.

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick gave prosecutors until Dec. 9 to respond.

A federal jury convicted Kott in September 2007 of bribery, conspiracy and extortion for his role in advocating an oil tax pushed by Veco Corp. executives and favored by North Slope oil producers. He received nearly $9,000, a political poll for his re-election campaign and the promise of a lobbying job, all from Veco executives, according to trial testimony.

Kott, 59, is serving his sentence at the Federal Correctional Institution in Sheridan, Ore.

Begich lead over Stevens grows

By SEAN COCKERHAM
(11/18/08 13:12:24)

Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich's lead over Sen. Ted Stevens is growing in today's ballot count in the race for U.S. Senate. The latest numbers, issued just before 1 p.m., show Begich up by 2,374 votes.

The Division of Elections expects to release more numbers between 4 and 5 p.m.

Today's count of about 24,000 absentee and questioned ballots should pretty much decide the race, although there will be a few more overseas absentees to count over the next couple days and a likely recount in early December.

Since the state moved to mostly machine counting, recent Alaska recounts have resulted in little change in the final tally.

The Division of Elections is counting ballots today from Anchorage, Southeast, the Kenai Peninsula and Kodiak. The state finished counting from other parts of the state last week.

If Begich wins, he'll be the first Democrat to represent Alaska in the U.S. Senate in nearly 30 years. His victory would also put the Democrats one step closer to their dream of having the 60 seats needed for a filibuster-proof majority in the U.S. Senate. To get 60 seats, the Democrats would also need Al Franken to beat Republican Sen. Norm Coleman in a Minnesota recount, and for Jim Martin to beat Republican Sen. Saxby Chambliss in a Georgia runoff election.

For Alaskans, the more sweeping impact of today's count is the potential close of the "Uncle Ted" era. Stevens' run started not long after statehood, when Gov. Wally Hickel appointed him to the Senate in 1968. Stevens has never even had a close election since, often drawing just token opposition.

Stevens steered billions of dollars to Alaska and had a hand in most of the major federal legislation that's shaped Alaska. He was honored as "Alaskan of the Century" and the state Legislature named the Anchorage airport after him.

That was before a Washington D.C. jury found him guilty of seven felonies a week before the election for lying on financial disclosure forms about $250,000 of gifts and home renovations from the oilfield services company Veco.

Now Stevens, 85, trying to be the first person ever elected to the Senate following a felony verdict. Stevens is appealing the verdict.

Jurors says Stevens hurt his case by testifying

By JESSE J. HOLLAND
(11/18/08 09:21:41)

To hear jurors tell it, Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens was his own worst witness during his corruption trial.

Two jurors - one of whom posted a Web log of her jury duty experience - say Stevens undermined his own defense by verbally jousting with Justice Department prosecutors and denying that just because he was given something didn't make it a gift.

"It was kind of weird," said Colleen Walsh, one of the jurors who found Stevens guilty on seven felony counts. "Throughout the case, he was kinda quiet and you know, kinda grandfatherly, but when he was up on stage, he was like a lion, and he was kind of demeaning to the lawyer, so it didn't help his case that much," she told the Associated Press in an interview.

Walsh, 32, and Brian Kirst, 25, an alternate who sat through the trial but did not join the deliberations, said Stevens' combative performance hurt him with the jury.

Kirst described the Justice Department's evidence as "hard-core," difficult to refute. Stevens' stories "just didn't add up," Kirst told the AP.

"The whole thing was just a mess. It was like, 'You're not helping, so why are you up here?'" Kirst said. "It was kinda interesting to see him shoot himself in the foot."

The jury convicted Stevens, the Senate's longest serving Republican, on seven felony counts of lying on Senate financial documents to hide hundreds of thousands of dollars of gifts and home renovations from millionaire businessman Bill Allen. Stevens, who won't be sentenced until early 2009, has said he will appeal.

The jury deliberations were filled with controversy from the start. Jurors complained of stress and violent outbursts from one of their members during deliberations. They asked for her to be replaced, but the judge refused.

Walsh joined the deliberations after a juror claimed her father had died, left for the West Coast and did not return phone calls from the judge. Walsh said the tension was obvious.

One of the jurors asked everyone "to keep their voices down, let everyone else have their say and no swearing and stuff like that," she said. "Basically, act like adults. I was like, 'What the heck happened last week?'"

The judge later discovered that the juror who disappeared, Marian Hinnant, 52, flew to California for the Breeders' Cup, not to her father's funeral.

FBI - Stevens-2274

Kirst and Walsh said most of the jurors decided not to talk to the media about their time in the courthouse. Walsh, however has started a blog about the trial, http://juror11.blogspot.com because of all the questions she was getting from her family and friends about the case.

Stevens witness says testimony wasn't true

By RICHARD MAUER

A key prosecution witness in the trial of Sen. Ted Stevens has told the trial judge that some of his testimony wasn't true and that he suspects prosecutors left him in a room with evidence and grand jury transcripts so he could surreptitiously refresh his memory about six-year-old events.

The witness is David Anderson, a nephew and once-trusted employee of former Veco chief executive Bill Allen, the government's star witness and a convicted briber. Anderson made his comments to U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan of Washington, D.C., in a letter dated Nov. 15 and made public Friday, the latest twist in a case with no shortage of unusual events.

In his letter, Anderson also said the government lied in a letter to Stevens' defense attorneys in which it described an affidavit he signed March 25. The government told the defense that Anderson himself had acknowledged the March affidavit was false.

A copy of the March affidavit, made public by defense attorneys Friday, showed that Anderson had asserted that government agents promised immunity to him and 12 other friends and relatives, including former state Sen. Jerry Ward, for cooperating in the FBI's investigation of public corruption in Alaska.

Ward has not been charged with wrongdoing, but he has surfaced in connection with the recent guilty plea by private prison advocate Bill Weimar. Ward appeared to be the beneficiary of an illegal $20,000 campaign contribution by Weimar, who was sentenced to six months in prison last week for making the payment. The recipient of Weimar's illegal $20,000 payment was identified in charging documents only as "Candidate A," but the description matched Ward.

For the past few months, Ward has not responded to phone calls or messages seeking comment on the allegations. He again didn't reply to an e-mail sent to him Friday.

MURDER PLOT ALLEGED

In the March 25 affidavit, Anderson said he had learned that he was targeted in a murder plot. He said he prepared the document to ensure his alleged deal with prosecutors would live on even if he didn't.

He didn't name the plotters in the affidavit, but did in the letter to Sullivan: Allen and his son, Mark, Anderson's cousin.

FBI - Stevens-2275

Bill Allen has testified he never tried or threatened to kill Anderson.

Stevens' attorneys demanded a hearing be held to look into the matter. In a court filing Friday, they said the Anderson letter was new evidence of government misconduct in the case. They've already said they planned to try to overturn Stevens' conviction on Oct. 27 of lying on Senate disclosure forms.

Most of the $250,000 the government alleged he failed to report were gifts from Veco and Allen. Anderson supervised the Veco-paid construction that doubled the size of Stevens' home in Girdwood, then fabricated an outdoor steel deck and stairs and helped build a deck for the home, none of which Stevens paid for.

Government prosecutors responded Friday that Anderson's letter, "simply put," is untrue. They said defense lawyers had ample opportunity to question Anderson about the March affidavit when he was on the witness stand, but chose not to.

194-AN-13620-A

Anderson didn't recant any of the his substantive testimony against Stevens, but his letter could cast doubt on his credibility as a witness. And during the trial, the judge rebuked prosecutors for not turning over evidence to the defense as they were required. Anderson's assertion that the government gave false information about him to the defense raises more questions about the prosecution's conduct, though it's unclear how significant they are.

'GENTLEMAN'S AGREEMENT'

In the March affidavit, the main subject of Anderson's Nov. 15 letter to the judge, Anderson said he agreed to cooperate with the government on condition that prosecutors grant immunity to Ward and his wife Margaret, Ward's three daughters and their husbands, Anderson's mother and son, and several others who couldn't be identified. Anderson lives with one of Ward's daughters, Kirsten Deacon. She was once Bill Allen's girlfriend and that fact is the cause of much of the friction between uncle and nephew, Anderson has said.

Anderson was the last prosecution witness in the government case. In his testimony on Oct. 9, Anderson said the affidavit was false and that no formal pledge of immunity was granted.

"It was kind of a gentlemen's agreement, you know," Anderson testified. "A handshake, you know, so, you know, I take it as an immunity, but it was never - that was never said."

On Sept. 9, two weeks before the trial, the government sent a letter to the defense disclosing facts about the government's case that could be beneficial to Stevens. One paragraph of the five-page letter concerned the March affidavit, which prosecutors said was drafted by Ward. "Anderson felt pressured to sign the affidavit because of his relationship with Ward's daughter," the prosecutors told the defense. In reality, Anderson admitted that "he and the other individuals mentioned in the affidavit were not promised, offered, or actually given immunity," prosecutors said.

But in his Nov. 15 letter to the trial judge, Anderson said that paragraph "is not true and completely false."

Reached by phone at his home in the Mat-Su Borough, Anderson said he felt he wasn't "treated right" by the government but declined to go into details.

"I laid it out there on the table so everyone can see what my dispute is," said Anderson, referring to his letter. He said it was like "fighting city hall."

'AN INTERESTED PARTY'

In its filing Friday, government prosecutors challenged Anderson's motives for sending the letter and changing his story.

"The government has now obtained substantial additional evidence, including both documents and video surveillance, that prove the falsity of Mr. Anderson's allegations and that further explicitly prove Mr. Anderson's collusion with an interested party in the preparation and transmission of Mr. Anderson's letter," prosecutors wrote. They said they would describe the additional evidence in a supplemental filing Monday.

Anderson wouldn't say what prompted him to write the letter or how it was drafted and sent.

The letter filed with the court Friday bore a fax header showing it was sent Nov. 16 from the Fed-Ex Kinkos at the corner of Northern Lights Boulevard and Lake Otis Parkway in Anchorage - more than a three-hour round-trip drive from Anderson's home.

A manager at that Kinkos who identified himself only as Jeff said the FBI had been there and spoke to a female employee about the letter. The manager wouldn't identify the woman and said she has since left Alaska. Asked whether the FBI had also viewed or obtained surveillance video from the store, the manager said, "I don't believe I should be talking to you about this" and referred questions to a Fed-Ex security official in Washington state, who wasn't in his office an didn't return a message left on his mobile phone.

FBI spokesman Eric Gonzalez, one of two FBI agents who initially interviewed Anderson in August 2006, declined to comment. In his letter, Anderson identified him as one of two FBI agents who promised to not prosecute his friends and family.

"Without the preparation from the prosecution and the reminders from them about my activities and the agreement I had with them about my family and myself I would not have given the same testimony," Anderson told the judge. "Without a shadow of a doubt I believe this trial would have gone much differently."

Stevens' attorneys said Anderson's allegations could be evidence of "a flagrant constitutional violation warranting a severe remedy, including dismissal of the indictment." They asked Judge Sullivan to convene a hearing in February in which they could question prosecutors and FBI agents under oath to learn what happened.

Stevens concedes Senate race to Begich

Anchorage Daily News
(11/19/08 12:53:09)

Sen. Ted Stevens conceded the election for U.S. Senate to Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich this morning, bringing to an end his 40 years as the dominant force in Alaska politics.

Stevens' office issued a written statement just before noon Alaska time:

"Given the number of ballots that remain to be counted, it is apparent the election has been decided and Mayor Begich has been elected.

"My family and I wish to thank the thousands of Alaskans who stood by us and who supported my re-election. It was a tough fight that would not have been possible without the help of so many Alaskans - people who I am honored to call my friends. I will always remember their thoughts, prayers, and encouragement.

"I am proud of the campaign we ran and regret that the outcome was not what we had hoped for. I am deeply grateful to Alaskans for allowing me to serve them for 40 years in the U.S. Senate. It has been the greatest honor of my life to work with Alaskans of all political persuasions to make this state that we all love a better place.

"I wish Mayor Begich and his family well. My staff and I stand willing to help him prepare for his new position."

Begich claimed victory Tuesday afternoon after the latest count of absentee and questioned ballots widened his lead to 3,724 votes. With only around 2,500 ballots from overseas remaining to be counted, the lead was insurmountable barring a major flaw in the counting. Begich leads by just over 1 percent with more than 315,000 votes cast in the race.

Stevens' statement made no mention of asking for a recount.

Stevens, who turned 85 on Tuesday, is the longest-serving Republican in Senate history.

A week before the election, a Washington, D.C., jury convicted Stevens of seven felonies for lying on his financial disclosure forms about more than $250,000 in gifts, including renovations of his Girdwood home. The gifts came from Bill Allen, chief of the oil-field services company Veco Corp. and the man at the center of the still unfolding federal investigation into corruption in Alaska politics.

Both Sen. Lisa Murkowski and Gov. Sarah Palin issued statements congratulating Begich.

STEVENS PARDON BY BUSH HAS SENATE SUPPORT (Politico): Sen. Ted Stevens hasn't yet joined the gallery of notorious felons, small-time crooks and aggrieved innocents seeking pardons from President Bush, but it appears he'll have the support of some of his soon-to-be-former colleagues if he does. "He has served this country for over 50 years," said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah), a widely respected member of the Judiciary Committee. "I think most anybody would probably say, 'Yeah, he should be [pardoned].' "

PALIN A GOP STAR BUT LITTLE LIKED BY CENTER (Politico): Gov. Sarah Palin's flash emergence on the national stage has left her as well positioned as any Republican to make a serious run for the GOP nomination in 2012, yet waning support from the political center may threaten her presidential ambitions, according to a Politico analysis of public polling.

Most of the stories, some of them semi-autobiographical, are set in Alaska; a nonfiction version of the first story, "Ichthyology," was published in the Daily News in 1992. RURAL SCHOOLS LOSE HUNDREDS OF STUDENTS A YEAR (Alaska Newspapers Inc.): State researchers hoping to determine how many people have left rural Alaska for bigger communities report that rural schools lost 1,802 students in the last five years. Stevens seeks retrial in Alaska DEFENSE: Separate motion calls for judge to overrule jury.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(12/06/08 03:30:19)

Defense lawyers said that U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens' monthlong trial was unfair, flawed and prejudiced against him in dozens of ways and asked that he be tried anew, this time in Alaska.

The motion for a new trial, filed Friday in Washington, D.C., was accompanied by a separate motion asking the judge in the case to overrule the jury and direct an acquittal. That would go a step further than asking for a new trial -- it would entirely void the verdict in which Stevens was convicted Oct. 27 of seven counts of failure to disclose gifts and other benefits, and let him walk a free man.

Stevens' lawyers also renewed a pretrial motion to dismiss six of the seven counts as duplications of the first. They also asked the judge to allow them to file some exhibits in support of their motions under seal because the exhibits refer to personal information about jurors and to the ongoing investigation by the government into political corruption in Alaska.

Under an earlier schedule set by U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan, the government has until Jan. 9 to respond to the defense's post-trial motions. A hearing is set for Feb. 25.

In asking for a new trial, the defense lawyers said Stevens' trial was fatally flawed with false evidence presented by the government, improper hearsay evidence from a witness who was the "linchpin" of the government's case, and by jurors who lied to the court and were prejudiced from the start against politicians.

Such post-trial motions are common in criminal trials but rarely succeed before the trial judge, who has ruled upon most if not all of the arguments before. However, they set out the basis for a likely appeal, and could also be used by advocates seeking a presidential pardon for Stevens to assert he was tried unfairly.

The motion for a new trial, filed by defense attorney Craig Singer, who specialized in motions during the trial, was accompanied by a hefty, 78-page legal memorandum. Singer had to request permission to exceed the district court's 45-page limit, and had gotten an OK for 75 pages.

The only completely new arguments in the document involve jurors and suggest the defense has been investigating the panel.

As it was, the jury had more than its share of drama. There was a disruptive juror whom the others wanted to boot; a juror who disappeared during deliberations after saying her father died, only to later admit she went to a California racetrack; and a replacement juror -- for the thoroughbred fan -- who, after the verdict, started an irreverent blog with snippy comments about the trial participants.

FBI - Stevens-2283

Now the Stevens defense is weighing in with allegations that two jurors lied in their written questionnaires used by the judge and the attorneys to determine whether they'd be fair and impartial. The defense didn't provide details -- juror information is usually kept private -- but suggested the two jurors had undisclosed contacts with the criminal justice system.

If it turns out the jurors lied, Singer wrote in the memorandum, it would "raise particular concerns in this case because jurors may associate or blame their prior personal experiences on government officials, including politicians like Sen. Stevens. The false statements may suggest an attempt to serve on the jury in order to vindicate prejudice toward government, politicians, or political parties."

90X

Singer asked for a hearing where the jurors could be questioned under oath. The "cumulative effect" of all the juror issues "is overwhelming, and a new trial should be granted," he wrote.

The defense also said a new trial was in order because the lead prosecutor, Brenda Morris, inappropriately appealed to "class prejudice" during her cross examinations of Stevens and his wife, Catherine. Morris portrayed the couple "as wealthy, privileged individuals" and equated their wealth with improper conduct, Singer said.

He cited a rapid-fire series of questions that Morris directed at Catherine Stevens concerning her use of her husband's taxpayer-paid Senate staff to walk her dogs, feed her cats, wrap her Christmas presents, pay credit card bills at expensive department stores, pay parking tickets and even write checks from Stevens' account to pay overdue Blockbuster video charges.

Those questions were irrelevant to the charges of whether Stevens failed to disclose gifts from the defunct oil-services firm Veco Corp. and its chief executive, Bill Allen, Singer said.

"The government's blatant appeals to class prejudice were improper, and indeed, intolerable," Singer wrote.

A Washington, D.C., grand jury indicted Stevens, and prosecutors argued that the capital was the proper venue for the trial because Stevens filed his disclosures with the Senate. Stevens sought to move the trial to Alaska because most witnesses were there, and he could campaign for his Senate seat in the run-up to the November election. But Sullivan kept the trial in Washington.

Singer said that was a mistake. More than half the witnesses came from Alaska, and the defense had to spend inordinate time on logistics while the trial was under way, he said.

"Had the trial been in Alaska, the Senator would have requested that the jury be permitted to visit the Girdwood residence so that it could determine whether the value of the renovations exceeded the amount Senator and Mrs. Stevens paid for them," Singer wrote. "The government sought to prove the value of the renovations by introducing the Veco accounting records and by showing the jury photographs of the renovations. The accounting records were utterly unreliable and should have been excluded in their entirety as hearsay. And the snapshots of the residence were no substitute for an actual view of the Stevenses' distinctly modest Girdwood home."

Another cause for a new trial is the most memorable line uttered in the case, Singer said. It happened early in the trial when Allen was on the witness stand and the day's testimony was drawing to a close. Allen was giving evidence about a handwritten note Stevens sent him on Oct. 5, 2002, in which Stevens said he wanted a bill for Veco's work on his home. Allen said he would send another friend to talk to Allen about that -- Bob Persons, the owner of the Double Musky restaurant in Girdwood.

Allen indeed talked to Persons, who told him, "don't worry about getting a bill," Allen testified. "He said, 'Ted is just covering his ass.' "

Singer asserted that Allen made up that quote. In about 20 interviews with the FBI and prosecutors, Singer said, Allen never mentioned such a statement before, according to agent notes the defense received.

"With this bombshell, the government sought not only to erase Senator Stevens' repeated requests for bills, but also to transform these exculpatory requests ... into further evidence of a scheme to deceive the Senate Ethics Committee," Singer wrote. "Mr. Allen's 'CYA' testimony was perhaps the single most important and explosive piece of evidence in the government's case."

Instead, Singer said, it was inadmissible hearsay -- and perhaps a lie told with government approval -- and justification for a new trial.

Stevens asks for new trial in Alaska

By RICHARD MAUER
(12/05/08 13:47:23)

Defense lawyers today cited 17 reasons that U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens' monthlong trial was unfair, flawed or prejudiced against him and asked that he be tried anew, this time in Alaska.

The motion for a new trial, filed this afternoon in Washington, D.C., was accompanied by a separate motion asking the judge in the case to overrule the jury and direct an acquittal, voiding the verdict in which Stevens was convicted Oct. 27 of seven counts of failure to disclose gifts and other benefits.

Judge sides with Stevens lawyers

PAGE COUNT: Defense gets more space to argue for new trial.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(12/04/08 01:12:25)

Sen. Ted Stevens' legal defense team will have a lot to say when it argues he should have a new trial -- so much so, they've asked the judge to allow them to submit a legal memorandum of 75 pages, 30 more than usually allowed in the D.C. district courts.

With a filing deadline of Friday approaching, defense counsel Craig Singer, who specialized in arguing motions during Stevens' trial, told U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan that the complexities of the case required more than average paper content.

"The trial in this case took an entire month and gave rise to numerous legal disputes, including motions, evidentiary objections, and juror issues," Singer wrote in a filing Tuesday.

In a tongue-in-cheek objection, Brenda Morris, the chief prosecutor in the case, replied Wednesday in what she termed a "brief opposition" -- a response of a single paragraph. She asserted the defense should be able to accomplish what it needed in 45 pages. Most of the issues expected to be raised by Stevens in his argument for a new trial were already argued and ruled upon before and during the trial, she said.

It didn't take Sullivan long to read the government reply. Eight minutes after the government filed, he granted the defense its wish. He also allowed the government to use the long-form approach in its response, due Jan. 9.

A hearing on the motion for a new trial -- a prerequisite to an appeal -- is set for Feb. 25. By then, the question of a pardon by President Bush will be long resolved.

Stevens was convicted in October of seven counts of failing to disclose about $250,000 in gifts and services from 1999 to 2006. A week later, Alaska voters turned him out of office after representing the state for 40 years. A sentencing date has not yet been set.

Don Young's campaign funds pay for more attorney bills

UNDEFINED: Nature of legal work hasn't been detailed.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(12/09/08 00:02:01)

WASHINGTON -- Rep. Don Young's most recent campaign finance report shows that he continues to pay his sizeable legal bills using his campaign account.

Young's most recent filing with the Federal Election Commission shows that the Alaska Republican spent $20,000 last quarter with the Seattle law firm Siderius, Lonergan and Martin. It's not clear whether those bills were for campaign-related expenses or connected to an ongoing federal criminal probe. Young's campaign spokesman didn't return a phone call seeking comment.

Earlier this year, Young's campaign paid $90,020 to John Wolfe, a Seattle attorney who represented Young's campaign manager, Steve Dougherty, in the investigation.

Since the beginning of 2007, Young has spent more than $1 million in campaign contributions on legal fees related to a Justice Department probe -- which includes an investigation into fundraising.

Federal Election Commission guidelines allow public officials to spend their campaign money on attorneys, as long as the legal work is connected to the lawmaker's role as an officeholder. But Young also set up a separate legal expense fund to pay some legal bills; so far, that fund has raised $77,000 and spent $48,000 on Young's legal bills.

In a debate during the campaign, Young said that his legal defense has been expensive, and that he has used campaign money because he doesn't have his own money to spend defending the inquiry. He has consistently refused to detail the exact nature of the investigation, but Congress has called on the Justice Department to investigate an earmark in Florida that stood to benefit a campaign contributor.

Young has also been tied to a federal probe into corruption in Alaska politics, which included the fundraising practices of the former oil-services company Veco Corp. and Bill Allen, its chief executive. Allen was the star witness in the October trial of Sen. Ted Stevens, who was found guilty on seven counts of failing to disclose gifts on his U.S. Senate financial disclosure forms.

Young's new report also shows that overall he raised $1.1 million in his successful bid to fend off opponents in August's primary and last month's general election. He spent $3.1 million, which included money he had amassed in previous election cycles. More than $1 million went toward his legal bills.

The reports show that his Democratic challenger last month, Ethan Berkowitz, spent all but $17,194 of the $1.6 million he raised for the campaign.

Weyhrauch seeks rehearing

9TH CIRCUIT COURT: He wants the Nov. 26 decision overturned.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(12/08/08 22:30:20)

Former Alaska Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch is asking the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to reconsider a decision two weeks ago that restored key evidence in his corruption indictment.

In a rehearing request to the court Monday, Weyhrauch asked the full appeals court to overturn the Nov. 26 decision of a three-judge 9th Circuit panel.

The three judges had ruled that federal law would require Weyhrauch, a Juneau attorney, to disclose his efforts to seek legal work from the defunct oil-field services company Veco Corp. at the same time he was serving in the Legislature and voting on an oil-tax bill heavily lobbied by Veco's chief executive, Bill Allen.

In his request for a rehearing, Weyhrauch says the decision imposed a higher standard of conduct than state law, which wouldn't have required such a disclosure. The decision represented an improper expansion of federal law over state law, Weyhrauch said, and he asked the full court to overturn it.

Weyhrauch never got the Veco job, though his votes were aligned with Veco.

He was indicted May 3, 2007, with former House Speaker Pete Kott and charged with four counts of bribery, extortion, fraud and conspiracy. Kott has since been convicted and is serving time in federal prison.

Before Weyhrauch's trial began, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick ruled that prosecutors couldn't use Weyhrauch's failure to disclose his job solicitation as evidence of defrauding citizens of his honest services because such a disclosure wasn't required by Alaska state law. Prosecutors appealed the ruling.

Meanwhile, one other pending corruption trial, the two-count conspiracy and bribery case against State Sen. John Cowdery, appeared headed for its second postponement.

Last week, Cowdery's attorney, Kevin Fitzgerald, asked the court for a delay until at least late March because of an overwhelming load of evidence he recently received from the government, including information from 11 months of court-ordered wiretaps. Prosecutors don't oppose a delay, Fitzgerald told the judge, but the two sides couldn't work out a new proposed date.

U.S. District Judge Ralph Beistline set a hearing Dec. 16 to resolve the trial date.

FBI - Stevens-2288

In arguing for a rehearing at the appellate level for Weyhrauch, his attorney, Doug Pope, said that the three-judge panel decision goes well beyond what two other circuit courts have said about honest services fraud. Those circuits, based in New Orleans and Philadelphia, have limited the application of the federal mail fraud statute only to violations of state law, Pope said.

The San Francisco-based 9th Circuit judges debated and rejected that limitation, noting that other circuits have done so as well. They ruled "that conduct on par with bribery and nondisclosure of material information lies at the heart of public honest services fraud."

Pope said the split among the different appeals courts has created confusion for state and local officials who may wonder what the law actually is.

But the circuit judges said it was the New Orleans- and Philadelphia-based appellate courts that sowed confusion because they encouraged different enforcement of federal law based on the law of a particular state.

Their own reading of the law, the 9th Circuit judges said, "establishes a uniform standard for 'honest services' that governs every public official," they wrote. Applying that standard to Weyhrauch, they ruled, "the government may proceed on its theory that Weyhrauch committed honest services fraud by failing to disclose a conflict of interest or by taking official actions with the expectation that he would receive future legal work for doing so."

Pope argued the 9th Circuit is creating inappropriate inroads into state law by allowing federal prosecutors to enforce "federal preferences of good government" using the mail fraud statutes.

Young loses top spot on House committee

By ERIKA BOLSTAD ebolstad@adn.com
(12/10/08 14:00:12)

WASHINGTON -- U.S. Rep. Don Young, who wielded considerable power on the House Committee on Natural Resources in the 1990s as chairman and in recent years as its senior Republican, on Wednesday lost his top spot on the panel.

The move came from fellow Republicans who are determining this week who will take leadership roles on committees when Congress begins its new term next year.

Young said he was "confident that the cloud that hangs over me will eventually clear as I know I have done nothing wrong.

"However, for the good of the Republican Party, the right thing for me to do is temporarily step down from my post as ranking member on the House Committee on Natural Resources while my name is cleared. At that time, I look forward to regaining my post."

Young has been Alaska's sole representative to the House of Representatives since 1973 and is its second-most senior Republican. He squeaked through in the primary election and then went on to a decisive Nov. 4 victory over a Democratic challenger -- despite persistent rumblings of an FBI investigation into fundraising and other potential wrongdoing.

Since 2007, Young has spent over $1.1 million in campaign funds on legal fees connected to the federal probe.

But soon after winning the election, it became clear that despite his win, Young's days were numbered as the ranking member of the Natural Resources panel. Last month, Rep. Mike Simpson, R-Idaho, replaced Young as the small-state representative on the steering committee, a move that left the Alaska Republican without a voice while its 27 members worked out this week who gets what top committee assignments for the next Congress.

Then Tuesday, Young met with Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the Republican House leader. Boehner told Young he wouldn't support him continuing on as the ranking Republican on the committee. He also told him that the steering committee controlling which Republicans get the top spots on House committees was unlikely to support the Alaska Republican. Still, Young went forward Tuesday with a presentation to the committee, which is a requirement for all of the members seeking top committee post.

Young acknowledged that there remains a cloud hanging over his head because of the criminal probe. But he characterized his move as a temporary one and said he hoped to reassume the top spot on the committee.

FBI - Stevens-2290

As the next session of Congress takes shape, Republicans have worked to rid themselves of the taint of corruption remaining from GOP lawmakers with close ties to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

House Republicans have also taken Democrats to task for continuing to allow Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y. to chair the powerful Ways and Means Committee despite allegations of ethical lapses. Having Young in a leadership role on an important committee may have undercut those arguments for Republicans, who during the election attacked Democrats who accepted campaign contributions from Rangel.

"I wish all the best to the incoming ranking member" of the committee, Young said. "I look forward to continuing my work as a member of the Committee on Natural Resources this upcoming Congress with my good friend, Chairman (Nick) Rahall, and to resuming my post in the future."

-908

Boehner issued a statement later Wednesday commending Young for stepping down.

194A-AN-13620-M

"Today Congressman Don Young asked that he be relieved of his duties as ranking member on the House Natural Resources Committee so that he can focus on resolving questions he is facing. The Steering Committee granted his request.

"I commend Don Young for putting the interests of the Republican Conference, the House and the American people first by making this decision. In the interests of Don, his family and his constituents, it is my hope that this matter will be resolved as soon as possible."

It is an end of an era, said Deborah Williams, who now heads Alaska Conservation Solutions. Williams worked for then-Interior Secretary Bruce Babbitt as a top aide on Alaska issues when Young headed the Resources Committee, and in that role she often testified about Alaska-related issues at his committee meetings.

"When Don Young sought to advance the public good in that position, it was a pleasure to work with him and he was very effective," Williams said. "But again and again, when he sought to advocate for legislation or interests that were not in the public interest...he was thwarted and spent a lot of energy and political capital on issues that did not advance."

Young took over the committee in 1995 after Republicans regained control of the House of Representatives in the 1994 elections. At that time, the committee was renamed the House Public Lands and Resources Committee -- a signal that its focus would be less on conservation and more on resource development. At one of Babbitt's first meetings with Young at the helm, at a committee hearing on a federal wolf reintroduction program, he told Young: "Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt about who the alpha wolf is in this room."

Young held the chairmanship of the committee until internal House rules on term limits for committee chairmanships forced him to step aside for a Republican he had mentored, Rep. Richard Pombo of California.

Young then took over as chairman of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, where he oversaw the $286.4 billion highway spending bill in 2005 that included money for what became known as Alaska's "bridge to nowhere." It also earmarked $10 million for the now-infamous Coconut Road interchange study in Florida that, this year, prompted Young's colleagues to ask for a federal investigation into how it was inserted in the bill.

Judge calls hearing for flip-flopping Stevens witness

ALLEN'S NEPHEW: Defense requests for evidentiary hearing will be heard.

-909

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(11/26/08 00:02:57)

The strange developments involving a prosecution witness who said he was untruthful in the case against Sen. Ted Stevens inched forward Tuesday with an order by the trial judge for a "brief hearing" in the matter Dec. 1.

After dealing with cantankerous and AWOL jurors, a lawyer who he thought was signaling a witness, and multiple accusations of prosecutorial misconduct by the defense, U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan now has a witness who appears to be recanting at least part of his testimony.

Sullivan, in a one-sentence order to attorneys in the case, indicated he was seeking ideas about how to proceed with the witness, David Anderson, the estranged nephew of former Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen. Anderson, a welder by trade, helped supervise Veco-financed improvements made to Stevens' home in Girdwood starting with a clean-up crew that spent about a week there in the spring of 1999.

Stevens' defense team is a seeking a full-blown evidentiary hearing in February so they can question FBI agents and government attorneys under oath about how they prepared Anderson for his testimony. They also want to learn whether Anderson had gotten immunity for himself, his family and friends for cooperating in the FBI's public corruption investigation in Alaska.

Sullivan said next week's hearing will be to discuss the defense requests.

Prosecutors said Anderson lied in his letter claiming he didn't tell the truth on the witness stand about the immunity deal. Instead, the government said he was truthful when he said he had no formal immunity agreement.

Prosecutors said last week they would respond more fully to Anderson's letter on Monday, but nothing has appeared on the public docket.

Anderson has offered multiple versions of what he considered to be his deal with the government, though none are in writing. In March, he signed a sworn statement that he and 13 friends and relatives, including former state Sen. Jerry Ward, the father of his girlfriend, were covered by his immunity agreement.

Prosecutors have said they learned about that affidavit in August but haven't explained what brought it to their attention. However, on Aug. 11, former private prison advocate Bill Weimar pleaded guilty to making illegal payments to assist the campaign of a state Senate candidate in 2004. The candidate wasn't named in Weimar's plea, but the description closely matched Ward.

FBI - Stevens-2292

Two days after Weimar's plea, FBI agents interviewed Anderson about the March statement, according to a copy of the agents' report and a summary that was provided to Stevens' lawyers. Both documents have been publicly filed in the Stevens docket.

According to the documents, Anderson told the agents that the March affidavit was drafted by Ward, and that Ward decided who would be covered by the purported immunity.

The government said that Ward was the subject of an investigation but provided no details.

In the Aug. 13 FBI interview, the government said, Anderson acknowledged that the only agreement he had with prosecutors was that he would not be required to provide direct testimony against any family member. It's unclear whether Ward or even his daughter would fit into that limited a deal, since they are not related to Anderson by blood or marriage.

"Anderson knew that there had been no agreement relative to immunity or promises of immunity by the government as to anyone," prosecutors said in a pleading Friday.

Anderson, the government's 24th and final witness, was a last-minute addition when he was called to the stand Oct. 9.

Prosecutors previously announced their intention to rest their case the day before, but decided they needed additional testimony on how much work Anderson performed on Stevens' house when evidence of his work hours was stricken from the record because of faulty Veco accounting.

Misconduct alleged in Stevens trial

UNETHICAL: Agent says prosecutors covered up evidence, corruption investigations tainted.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(12/23/08 00:02:58)

An Alaska FBI agent has accused fellow agents and at least one prosecutor of misconduct and unethical behavior in the public corruption investigation in Alaska and the trial of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

The agent's complaint to internal investigators in the Justice Department was made public Monday in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., by the judge in Stevens' case.

The complaint had sharp words about one supervising agent, accused of getting too close to sources, including Allen. It said agents took gifts and accepted favors from sources and revealed confidential grand jury information and investigative practices to sources and reporters.

And the complaint said that prosecutors deliberately withheld and covered up evidence favorable to Stevens during his month-long trial, contradicting their statements to the judge at the time that their errors in not producing material to Stevens were accidental.

The judge, who said he wanted to protect the privacy of the complainant and those who were named, covered up almost all identifying details in heavy black ink, making some allegations difficult to follow.

But the agent who produced the explosive eight-page complaint, drafted in November, was clearly someone with intimate knowledge of the government's investigation in Alaska and the preparation and conduct of its trial of Stevens.

"I have witnessed or learned of serious violations of policy, rules, and procedures as well as possible criminal violations," the whistle-blower asserted in the complaint, which is now before the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility.

The whistle-blowing agent ran at least one of the sources in the investigation who gave grand jury testimony. And the whistle-blower described being in the room on Aug. 30, 2006, when agents were convincing the man who would become their most important witness, former Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen, to cooperate in the investigation.

In releasing the complaint, U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan made good on a pledge he made in an order Friday following a closed-door hearing with prosecutors, the defense, and the whistle-blower's attorney.

FBI - Stevens-2294

Prosecutors and the whistle-blower sought to keep the document under seal. The defense asked for its release.

Sullivan said the document was too important for the public and the defense to remain secret, though he acknowledged that some of the people named in the complaint have a right to privacy -- at least for now.

In the order Monday that accompanied the redacted complaint, Sullivan said he would entertain a request by the defense to reveal more of the document.

Just 49 minutes after Sullivan put the complaint in the public docket, Stevens' attorneys cited it as the smoking gun in an 18-page motion to dismiss the case, or at least get a new trial.

CWS 194 -910

The whistle-blower complaint "confirms what the defense has long believed and alleged: the government cheated and lied in order to obtain a verdict against Sen. Ted Stevens," attorney Robert Cary said in the motion.

"This has been a case of prosecution by any means necessary," Cary wrote. "The court should exercise its power to dismiss this indictment."

David Heller, a spokesman for the FBI in Anchorage, referred questions to the Justice Department in Washington. There, a spokeswoman, Laura Sweeney, said the government would only address the matter in court.

"We will continue to litigate in the court all matters, including these allegations, related to the jury's conviction of Senator Ted Stevens," she said in an e-mail.

In his complaint, the whistle-blower described himself as a five-year agent who started working on the public corruption investigation shortly after he came to Anchorage.

The case was code-named "Polar Pen" because it began as an investigation of efforts to build a private prison in Alaska by a private joint venture that included Veco.

But the FBI focus shifted after agents tapped Allen's phones and heard him talking about the extensive remodeling and repair work Veco did on Stevens' home in Girdwood starting in 1989. Then, a hidden FBI camera in the Veco suite in Juneau caught Allen and a vice president bribing legislators with $100 bills.

Stevens was convicted in October of lying on his Senate financial disclosures by failing to report gifts from Veco, Allen and others. Allen, who has pleaded guilty to bribery, was the lead witness against Stevens and two legislators convicted in 2007.

Allen has testified that he agreed to work for the government on Aug. 30, 2006 -- one day before the investigation became public with a series of raids of legislative and business offices in Alaska. The whistle-blower said that the agent working on Allen revealed far too much information about other subjects of the investigation.

Later, with Allen on their team, an agent -- possibly the same one -- told Allen that a source being run by the whistle-blower had testified before a grand jury, a possible violation of federal law. The whistle-blower said Allen or his attorney were also tipped off about an unrelated Anchorage Police investigation of him, probably involving accusations reported earlier this year that he had sexual relations with a minor in the 1990s.

During the Stevens trial, the agent inappropriately met with Allen in a hotel room more than once, the whistle-blower said. During Allen's testimony, the agent dressed in a way that was meant to be a "surprise/present for Allen," the whistle-blower said.

A witness issue erupted during the trial when the government sent home the Veco supervisor at Stevens' home, Rocky Williams, without calling him to the stand. Prosecutors said he was too ill to testify. But Williams was also under subpoena as a defense witness, and the defense team didn't know Williams was back in Alaska until he called from home. That led to a loud objection from Stevens' lawyers and a stern lecture from the judge.

The whistle-blower agreed that Williams was ill and feared that Williams could die in Washington if not treated. But the whistle-blower said the prosecution team ignored his pleas that the defense and the judge be told of the plan to send Williams home.

"The defense and judge found out, were very angry, and suggested prosecutorial misconduct had occurred," the whistle-blower wrote.

The whistle-blower also said that someone from the prosecution team didn't want to send a complete copy of an FBI interview of Allen to the defense because it contradicted information sent earlier in a letter to the lawyers.

The whistle-blower said he initially brought his complaints directly to the agent or agents, and also to Eric Gonzalez, the chief division counsel to the FBI in Anchorage, but the problems were not solved, he said.

He decided to take his complaint to Washington after one of the FBI sources, former Alaska corrections official Frank Prewitt, wrote a self-published book about the investigation that contained information he "should not have known." Another book is being written in prison by one of the people convicted in the case, the whistle-blower said, "and I feared more problems would occur and I would be in the middle of [an agent's] problems again."

The whistle-blower said he was also upset by what happened during Stevens' trial.

On Nov. 21, he wrote, he asked for protection under federal law as a whistle-blower, fearing he would be punished for coming forward. FBI officials, from the Public Corruption Unit in Washington "to the highest levels" are extremely pleased about the Alaska investigation.

"I am concerned about possible retaliation," the whistle-blower wrote.

Stevens witness affirms immunity offer

TRIAL: Anderson sends judge a letter saying government granted him and 12 friends a deal.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(12/24/08 00:01:31)

David Anderson, the government witness at the center of the storm involving ex-state Sen. Jerry Ward and allegations of misconduct in U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens' trial, has written a new letter to the judge in the Stevens case asserting again that prosecutors promised him and his friends immunity.

In his latest letter, Anderson offered a more detailed explanation about why he prepared an affidavit in March in which he listed 13 people whom he said were promised immunity by the government in exchange for his cooperation.

Ward, the father of Anderson's girlfriend, was on the list.

Prosecutors have denied they ever promised immunity to Anderson or anyone on his list. Anderson testified during the Stevens trial that the March affidavit was false.

The messy controversy, one of several that have erupted since Stevens' conviction Oct. 27 on seven felony disclosure violations, has become one of the grounds for Stevens' defense attorneys to demand dismissal of charges or a retrial. They called on U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan, who presided over the Stevens trial in Washington, D.C., to hold evidentiary hearings -- essentially mini-trials -- into the Anderson matter and an FBI whistle-blower complaint that surfaced Friday.

A defense attorney, Robert Cary, filed Anderson's letter in court Tuesday as an exhibit to his request for the hearing. Anderson's letter was dated Dec. 15 and follows up his first letter of a month earlier, in which he asserted his testimony refuting the March affidavit was itself false.

Both letters start the same way: "My name is David Allen Anderson."

Anderson, the estranged nephew of Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen, wrote the latest letter in response to the government's opposition to re-open the Stevens case. Prosecutors said that Ward, under scrutiny in the corruption investigation, had a hand in drafting the March affidavit and in sending the November letter. Both documents were tainted by Ward's self-interest, they asserted.

Anderson addressed that point in his latest letter. He said he dictated, then signed, the two letters and the affidavit.

FBI - Stevens-2297

"I am not a typist or an officer worker, but a welder," he said.

Anderson was one of two Veco supervisors at the renovation project that doubled the size of Stevens' Girdwood home from 2000-2001. Anderson built an outdoor staircase and part of a deck out of steel, helped move a generator installed by Veco and fixed things for Stevens when they broke -- all paid by Veco. Anderson was the last witness to testify for the prosecution.

But Anderson said in his first letter, and emphasized in the new letter, that he would not have taken the stand if he thought there was no immunity deal.

"I would like to be perfectly clear," he wrote this month. "I would have pleaded the fifth."

Anderson said he didn't sign the March affidavit to protect Ward or any of the others. He was trying to save himself from being killed by Allen and Allen's son, Mark, he said.

-911 CWS/BS 194A-AN-13620-M

"It was to protect ME," he wrote.

Though 11 exhibits accompanied the government's opposition to re-open the case, none even discussed, let alone refuted, "the fact that Bill and Mark Allen had a contract to murder me," Anderson said.

He wrote the March affidavit, he said, because he was traveling to New Mexico, a haunt of Allen and his son, and feared for his safety.

"My thought process was that if it was in writing and anything happened to me, people would know where to look," Anderson said in his letter.

A copy of the affidavit, filed last month, doesn't mention either Allen by name. While it refers to a murder plot, it makes no suggestion about who to question should he be killed.

Rather, the affidavit appears to be an effort to immortalize an immunity deal for Ward and the other 12 named people if Anderson died and couldn't claim it himself.

Bill Allen has denied in testimony that he ever intended to kill Anderson. Mark Allen didn't return a call left at his ranch in Roswell, N.M.

If the judge wanted to confirm the murder plot, Anderson wrote, he should call an Anchorage reporter, Tony Hopfinger, who produces the Web site Alaska Dispatch.

"He has seen the documents under seal regarding the murder-for-hire scheme and is also aware that from day one I believed immunity was granted," Anderson said.

But in an interview Tuesday, Hopfinger said he never saw any such documents.

"I was read something that was regarding an FBI wiretap where some conversation of a kind of cryptic nature of hurting Dave, or hiring somebody to hurt Dave -- I was read that by a source," Hopfinger said. "And I asked Dave about it."

But his source was "very guarded about the material," Hopfinger said.

In a story he wrote about Anderson, Hopfinger said he originally had a paragraph saying that Allen had considered killing Anderson. That paragraph was sourced to "others who have viewed the sealed government affidavit," Hopfinger said, but he cut the paragraph from his story because he couldn't verify it.

On the matter of immunity, though, Hopfinger said Anderson always maintained he had gotten protection from the government. Anderson said something similar in interviews with the Daily News starting in May.

A man answering the phone at Anderson's house Tuesday said he wouldn't deliver a message to Anderson.

FBI man is Stevens case whistleblower

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com
(12/22/08 13:52:58)

A five-year FBI agent assigned to the Alaska corruption investigation is the whistleblower who brought a complaint of misconduct against other agents and at least one prosecutor involved in the trial of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

The redacted -- meaning partially blacked-out -- complaint was publicly filed this afternoon in Washington, D.C., by the judge in the Stevens trial over the objections of Justice Department lawyers and the attorney for the unidentified whistleblower. Stevens' lawyers wanted the full document released without restrictions.

The whistleblower's name was blacked out, as were the names of nearly everyone else in his complaint. But the whistleblower's explosive allegations about misconduct by other members of the FBI and the prosecution suggest intimate, firsthand knowledge of the full investigation from the start, and of the activities surrounding Stevens' trial.

"I have witnessed or learned of serious violations of policy, rules and procedures as well as possible criminal violations," the whistleblower asserted in his complaint to the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility.

The whistleblower said agents got too close to sources, took gifts and favors from sources, and revealed confidential grand jury and investigation information to sources and reporters.

The whistleblower also said members of the prosecution team intentionally withheld information from Stevens' defense that was required by law to be turned over. In addition, the prosecution deliberately failed to alert the defense that it was sending a key witness back to Alaska without testifying even though that witness was under a defense subpoena.

Prosecutors and agents also failed to properly log and track evidence, the whistleblower said.

In releasing the eight-page complaint, addressed to internal investigators in the Justice Department, U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan made good on a pledge he made Friday after a closed-door hearing with prosecutors, the defense and the whistleblower's attorney. Sullivan said the document was too important for the public and the defense to remain secret, though he acknowledged that some of the people named in the complaint have a right to privacy -- at least for now.

FBI - Stevens-2299

In the order today that accompanied the redacted complaint, Sullivan said he would consider a request by the defense to reveal more of the document.

Within an hour of the judge's release of the document, Stevens' attorneys filed a motion to dismiss the case or at least grant the senator a new trial. The whistleblower complaint "confirms what the defense has long believed and alleged: The government cheated and lied in order to obtain a verdict against Sen. Ted Stevens."

Whistle-blower adds twist to Stevens case

WHISTLE-BLOWER: Federal employee accuses government of misconduct.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com
Published: December 21st, 2008 12:00 AM
Last Modified: December 21st, 2008 12:18 AM

A whistle-blower inside the Justice Department has accused members of the team investigating public corruption in Alaska of official misconduct, according to the judge who presided over Sen. Ted Stevens' trial in Washington, D.C.

The whistle-blower's complaint, dated Dec. 2, is now the subject of an internal investigation by the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility, according to a memorandum and order signed Friday by U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan of the District of Columbia.

Sullivan revealed the existence of the complaint, and three secret hearings about it last week, in his 29-page order.

Sullivan said little about the nature of the alleged misconduct. Among the allegations was that a government employee accepted "multiple things of value" from sources cooperating in the investigation, Sullivan said.

FBI - Stevens-2301

The judge also reported that the whistle-blower accused at least two federal employees of intentionally violating government policies in the corruption investigation in Alaska and in connection with material that was supposed to be provided to Stevens for his defense, Sullivan said.

Stevens was found guilty Oct. 27 of seven felony counts of failing to report gifts and services on his annual Senate disclosures.

Sullivan said it was premature to say whether the allegations, if true, could have affected the outcome of the trial. But Sullivan said the allegations were clearly relevant to the Stevens case.

Stevens is asking for a new trial, arguing that his case was tainted by government misconduct, among other issues. The motion will be heard by Sullivan in February.

The whistle-blower is a federal employee "with extensive knowledge of the investigation and trial in this case," Sullivan said. The whistle-blower and the people named in the complaint "are not strangers to these proceedings, but rather were significantly involved in the investigation and prosecution of the defendant."

His order advised lawyers representing the Justice Department, Stevens and the whistle-blower that he intended to make public a redacted version of the complaint Monday at 4 p.m. Eastern Standard Time -- noon in Alaska.

The public version of the document will not reveal the names of the complainant or the subjects of the internal investigation, Sullivan said, but will otherwise disclose the allegations.

Prosecutors had sought to keep the complaint secret since informing the judge of its existence Dec. 11. Sullivan, in his order Friday, soundly rejected that effort, citing the constitutional rights of Stevens to a fair trial and the public to observe the administration of justice. But he acknowledged that the whistle-blower and the officials cited in the complaint had privacy rights, at least in the current stages of the internal investigation.

SECOND INVESTIGATION

Stevens' lawyers, who complained throughout the month-long trial of prosecutorial misconduct, had sought full public disclosure of the document, Sullivan said. The whistle-blower, concerned about the consequences of being exposed, joined with the government in seeking to keep it secret, he said.

The complaint is the second time the Office of Professional Responsibility, which investigates misconduct by Justice Department attorneys and law enforcement personnel, has gotten involved in the Stevens case.

In mid-trial, lead prosecutor Brenda Morris told Sullivan that she and the other members of her team had self-reported that they had failed to turn over material to the defense as required by law.

The material involved FBI agent notes of interviews with the government's chief witness, Bill Allen, the former chief executive of Veco Corp.

At the time, Sullivan said he thought the government was intentionally hiding information and ordered prosecutors to sweep through their files and give everything connected to Stevens to the defense.

With the jury gone from the courtroom Oct. 2, Morris acknowledged the government committed "a gross error" in withholding the material, but denied any intentional misbehavior.

ARTWORK AND A JOB

From the onset, the government sought to keep the latest problem secret, Sullivan said. When it alerted the court to the complaint Dec. 11, it did so in a sealed memorandum, he said.

Prosecutors asserted the complaint bore "no relationship whatsoever" to the Stevens case.

"The court flatly rejects the government's position," Sullivan wrote. The complaint alleged a person involved in the investigation accepted "multiple things of value," including "artwork and employment for a relative" from cooperating sources, the judge noted with some irony.

"Surely the court does not need to remind the government that the defendant in this case was convicted for failing to disclose that he had accepted multiple things of value and, in fact, the trial included testimony about his receipt of artwork and employment for a relative," Sullivan wrote.

During one of the secret hearings last week, Sullivan said, he was unable to get any kind of answer from a government lawyer to repeated questions about whether the complaint contained favorable information that needed to be disclosed to Stevens. The lawyer's refusal to answer "blinks at reality," Sullivan wrote.

In his order, Sullivan cited a long history of court decisions supporting the public's right to know about government conduct.

"To seal the complaint would be to deprive the public of information that directly addresses courtroom conduct, documents that were introduced at trial, and information that was relied upon by the court for various decisions throughout the proceedings," Sullivan said. "To say that the public's interest in this case was and is significant would be an understatement. In fact, even post-trial, the media has an interest in the case," he said, citing recent reports in the Anchorage Daily News and the Washington Post.

But Sullivan acknowledged the complainant also needed protection, referring to a case involving the Alyeska Pipeline Service Co., where a number of whistle-blowers were subject to reprisals in the 1980s and 1990s.

At the secret hearing Friday, the lawyer representing the whistle-blower "argued that the complainant would not have filed the complaint, at least in the form it was filed, had the complainant known that it might be made public."

But whistle-blower rights don't trump those of Stevens or the public, Sullivan said. Hiding the identities in the document is adequate protection, he said.

Witness in Sen. Stevens' trial regrets testifying

By JESSE J. HOLLAND
(12/23/08 12:43:49)

A witness in convicted Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens' corruption trial has told the judge he never would have testified if he'd known he did not have immunity from prosecution.

"I would like to be perfectly clear ... I would have pleaded the Fifth," welder David Anderson said in a Dec. 15 letter to U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan. Anderson was referring to his Fifth Amendment protection against self-incrimination.

The letter was made public Tuesday in papers from Stevens' lawyers, who have asked Sullivan to hold a hearing on Anderson's charges and to let them investigate. It was unclear when Sullivan would rule.

Anderson says he thought he had an immunity agreement with the Justice Department, even though he tetsified during the trial that he did not have such a deal. The Justice Department previously has said the government never made any agreement of immunity with Anderson or for any of his family or friends.

Department spokeswoman Laura Sweeney declined further comment Tuesday.

Stevens, 85 and the Senate's longest-serving Republican, was convicted in late October on seven felony counts of lying on Senate financial disclosure forms to hide hundreds of thousands of dollars in gifts and home renovations from millionaire businessman and VECO Corp. founder Bill Allen, who is Anderson's uncle.

The senator, who is scheduled to be sentenced next year, has said he will appeal. He lost his Senate seat to Democrat Mark Begich in the November election.

Anderson's allegation is the latest against the Justice Department since Stevens' conviction.

An FBI agent, in a heavily redacted letter released Monday, complained about some of the department's tactics during the trial, including not turning over evidence to the defense and an "inappropriate relationship" between a government representative and the prosecution's star witness.

Stevens' lawyers on Monday asked Sullivan to throw out the conviction or order a new trial because of the allegations. Sullivan has not yet responded to their request.

Anderson supervised the start of the 2000 renovation of Stevens' Girdwood, Alaska, home and later responded to maintenance requests by Stevens and his wife. Anderson complained in an earlier letter to the judge that he thought he had an immunity agreement with the Justice Department for himself, his family and friends.

"I discuss the fact that I would have pleaded the Fifth had I have known that an agreement had not been made for immunity," Anderson said in the most recent letter. "I would like to be perfectly clear ... I would have pleaded the Fifth."

Anderson also told Sullivan that he had told an Alaska reporter about the immunity deal, and accused the government of trying to cover up a plot by Allen to have him killed.

Ted Stevens' D.C. Bar License Suspended

It's becoming increasingly more unlikely—if there was ever the thought—that convicted felon Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens will work as a lawyer in the District of Columbia, where Stevens has been a member of the bar since April 1951. Chief Judge Eric Washington of the D.C. Court of Appeals today ordered the temporary suspension of Stevens' license—pending further review of the case—at the request of the Office of Bar Counsel.

Bar Counsel Gene Shipp says the D.C. Court of Appeals made its decision after receiving a certified copy of the Stevens conviction on seven counts of filing false financial disclosure forms with the Senate. Justice Department prosecutors accused Stevens of concealing $250,000 in home renovations and gifts to conceal the source of most of the stuff—a longtime friend and Alaska businessman named Bill Allen.

The nine-member Board on Professional Responsibility will take up the Stevens matter to determine whether the crime itself constitutes one of moral turpitude. If the board cannot decide, a three-person committee will examine whether the underlying facts of the charge involve moral turpitude. A finding that the charge itself or the supporting facts involves moral turpitude results in disbarment, Shipp says.

A sentencing date in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia has not been set. Stevens, whose wife is a partner at Mayer Brown in D.C., is pushing for a new trial. The Alaska Bar Association has asked the Alaska Supreme Court to suspend his license in that state.

I sure hope that the Prosecutors of this case are disbarred as well.

Posted by: AKConstant | December 12, 2008 at 04:28 PM
I'd like to submit that it was revealed in that case that the prosecution (the government) filed false evidence, withheld proof of innocence, and introduced BRIBED (with immunity of prosecution) witnesses into court. And contractors admitted to padding their bills to VECO, and Bill Allen (so the remaining 1/3 of that $250K in question could very well be a price considerably less still) The judge (a democrat?) refused to throw the case out regardless of how the prosecution bungled it.

I think they even filed the indictments wrong too!!!! I could be mistaken, but the fact they indicted a man for 7 counts of corruption without doing their homework first shows fault in the indictments.

This is a perfect example of how someone can be railroaded by the government. The fact the Stevens' had receipts paid in full for over 2/3 of that so called $250 thousand. Were NOT given bills for much of the remaining and very questionable 1/3, so were not aware of them. seems to be completely dismissed by the courts and the press alike! That's the crime of moral turpidude!

They received goods and services they didn't WANT. Ted Stevens and his wife are not construction contractors, they're lawyers. How would they know they got a "gift" in contractual services if they never saw the bill? Sen. Stevens erroneously let his "friend" Bill Allen oversee those renovations...he thought that he could trust him.

But it's obvious that even in D.C. he is the victim of false friends and snakes in the grass. I think the fact this article about the courts revoking his law license can be written proves that. Can't even wait for the results of his appeal can they?

Ward tied to scheme to avoid prosecution

FBI - Stevens-2306

STEVENS TRIAL: Filing describes ex-senator who persuaded witness to lie.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(12/16/08 00:05:21)

Former state Sen. Jerry Ward convinced a key witness in the Ted Stevens trial to invent and then lie about a broad immunity deal because Ward was trying to protect himself from federal prosecution, the Justice Department said in a new court filing Monday.

Ward, though not directly identified in a series of documents filed electronically after hours in Washington, D.C., was unmistakably described by Justice officials as the instigator who sought protection through witness Dave Anderson.

The Justice Department said in the documents it had an active investigation of Ward growing out of his relationship with private prison advocate William Weimar, who pleaded guilty last summer to making illegal payments to benefit Ward's Senate campaign in 2004.

The filings Monday — a pleading to the trial judge in the Stevens case, affidavits by prosecutors and the FBI counsel in Alaska, and investigative reports by FBI agents — were in response to a demand by Stevens' lawyers that Anderson and agents be examined under oath in an evidentiary hearing about Anderson's trial testimony.

Stevens says the hearing could uncover evidence that prosecutors engaged in misconduct with Anderson and result in a new trial for Stevens, or dismissal of charges altogether.

But the government said there was no need for even an evidentiary hearing because the facts in their filing Monday demonstrate Anderson told the truth at the trial — that he had no immunity deal for himself or anyone else.

Anderson testified Oct. 9 as the prosecution's final witness in its case against Stevens. Anderson did extensive work on Stevens' home in Girdwood while on the payroll of the defunct oil-field service company Veco Corp. Stevens was convicted on all seven counts of failing to disclose gifts from Veco, its chief executive Bill Allen and others.

But last month, in letters to the judge, defense and prosecution, Anderson said he lied in his testimony, in particular his repudiation from the witness stand of a sworn statement he signed in March. That March statement said his cooperation with the government was based on a pledge of immunity for Ward and 12 other relatives of Ward and Anderson.

The tangle of characters associated with Veco and Allen gets to its most complicated snarl in the Anderson-Ward matter.

Allen once dated Kirsten Deacon. Deacon is Ward's daughter. Anderson is Allen's nephew, the son of Allen's sister. Anderson now lives with Deacon. Their home is on Ward family property in the Mat-Su Borough.

Allen and Anderson have such animosity toward each other that a defense attorney in another corruption case asked Allen whether he wanted to have Anderson killed. Allen said no — he just wanted to beat him. Anderson's March affidavit purports to be an effort by Anderson to speak from the grave.

"It has come to my attention that I may not be available to confirm this prearranged agreement of immunity for the above listed people on information given to me by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and others that a contract to murder me has been discovered," he wrote. "In the event of my murder I have issued this sworn statement to clarify my arrangements with the Federal Bureau of Investigation." Anderson, in his letter to the judge and attorneys, said Allen and [illegible]s son Mark — Anderson's cousin — [illegible] taken out the contract on his life.

"The government has given both of them immunity for crimes they have committed and they refuse to honor their agreement with me," Anderson said.

But the government, in its filings Monday, said Anderson's efforts were all about Ward. In some documents, Ward is identified as "Family Member A." In others, his name is blacked out. But the context shows unmistakably that Family Member A or the blacked-out name is Ward.

The government said there was no immunity deal for Anderson, Ward or anyone else in the March affidavit. An investigation shows that Ward and Deacon actually sent Anderson's letter from Anchorage in November and that Ward was actively meddling in an effort to save himself from prosecution.

"Anderson's allegations are factually incorrect, fraudulently presented, and designed to help exculpate from criminal prosecution an individual wholly unrelated to the Stevens trial," the government said, referring to Ward.

Prosecutors said that Ward "substantially" prepared the March affidavit about two weeks after learning "that he was being investigated by the FBI for public corruption offenses." The government said an unidentified state investigation in 2004 had uncovered evidence that Ward "was in a conspiracy to violate federal law." Weimar was described as another member of the conspiracy.

On March 16, 2008, Anderson told an FBI agent over the phone that Ward was growing extremely anxious about the possibility of indictment. Anderson "is concerned because [Ward] has diabetes and has not slept in the past three nights," the agent's notes said.

Anderson said he had suggested to Ward that he cooperate with the FBI.

In another interview two days later, the agent said Anderson reported Ward "wants immunity so he can sleep at night."

In multiple contacts with the FBI in that period, Anderson never asserted he or anyone else had immunity, the government said.

The FBI didn't learn about the immunity affidavit until Weimar pleaded guilty Aug. 12, 2008. His plea described the conspiracy to funnel money to Ward's campaign.

The next day, the FBI was contacted by Ward's attorney, who asserted Ward and the other family members had been protected by Anderson for crimes committed over a 10-year period. The attorney faxed the March document to the FBI.

Two agents immediate drove to Anderson's home. He told them the affidavit was inaccurate, the government said. Of the 13 people listed on it, only one was the subject of an active investigation, the government said.

The matter heated up again after Stevens' trial as a result of Anderson's testimony repudiating the affidavit, the government said.

Anderson helped arrange a meeting with prosecutors, Ward and Ward's attorney on Nov. 14. The meeting lasted all of five minutes when Ward's attorney indicated he was only interested in hearing the evidence against Ward, not in providing information to the government, the pleading said. As a parting shot, the government told Ward of his target status "in the federal criminal investigation."

The next day, Anderson sent his letters to the FBI, the defense and the judge. A surveillance camera at the Kinkos at Northern Lights Bouldvard and Lake Otis Parkway in Anchorage showed that Ward and his daughter faxed the documents, with Anderson standing nearby, the government said.

Stevens case flares up again

SECRET: Judge received data on Anderson, defense says.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

FBI - Stevens-2308

(11/26/08 20:41:22)

Attorneys for Sen. Ted Stevens said in papers filed in court Wednesday that additional information prosecutors promised to provide about a disgruntled government witness had been submitted secretly to the trial judge in the case.

The filing by the defense appears to clear up the mystery of what happened to the government's promise to explain why the witness claimed to have given false testimony. The promise, made by prosecutors in a public filing last week, was made good on Monday with a sealed document to be read only by U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan in Washington, D.C., according to the defense.

But the defense filing raised another mystery: Stevens' lawyers said the sealed filing involved an ongoing federal investigation that could involve a wiretap, but they had no more details. They demanded to be let in on the document's contents even while promising to not tell anyone else.

A month after Stevens' conviction on seven counts of failing to disclose gifts and benefits, primarily from the former oil-field service company Veco Corp. and its chief executive Bill Allen, there's no sign that the contentious relationship between defense and prosecution is letting up.

The latest flare-up began last week. David Anderson, Allen's estranged nephew, said in a letter to the trial judge that some of his testimony in the Stevens case was false.

At issue wasn't any evidence of wrongdoing by Stevens, but whether Anderson's testimony had been brokered by an immunity deal for him and more than a dozen of his friends and relatives. Anderson has gone back and forth on that issue, but in his letter appeared to assert that he believed he had such a deal. He had said the opposite in his testimony.

There is nothing in writing, and government lawyers said in court filings their only arrangement with Anderson was that he would not be asked to testify against his relatives. Anderson's girlfriend is the daughter of former Sen. Jerry Ward, a subject of the federal corruption investigation in Alaska.

Stevens' lawyers said the question of immunity is important because they could have used it to discredit Anderson's testimony. Last week, they asked Sullivan to order a hearing in February in which they could question Anderson, FBI agents and prosecutors about whether the deal existed and whether it was improperly withheld from Stevens' defense team.

The government responded Friday with its own filings, asserting that Anderson's claims in his letter were false. Prosecutors promised to provide more information Monday, including descriptions of documents and surveillance video, but the day passed without any new filings. A spokeswoman for the Justice Department in Washington said that if the government's explanation was filed under seal, she couldn't acknowledge its existence.

In the defense pleading filed Wednesday, Stevens' lawyers said they received an e-mail from prosecutors saying the additional information was filed in secret for only Sullivan to view.

The defense lawyers asserted such a filing was inappropriate and violated the law and court rules, saying the circumstances were the same as another case in 2007 that was reversed on an appeal.

194A-AN-13620-m; 925

"Just as in this case, the government justified its (private communications with the judge) to protect the secrecy of its investigation -- a wiretap -- in an unrelated case," the defense attorneys wrote.

They said that, at a minimum, the government should have formally notified the defense before the sealed filing to allow it to object.

"Instead, the government took unilateral action, indistinguishable from marching into Chambers and speaking to the judge outside the presence of the defense. As a result, the trial judge in a criminal case apparently has heard evidence, to which the Defendant has no access, regarding a contested motion that affects the Defendant's liberty. Such conduct by the government should not be tolerated," Stevens' team said.

Sullivan had ordered the attorneys into his court Dec. 1 for a "brief hearing" to "discuss" the letter and the defense concerns. But on Wednesday, he changed the brief hearing to a more formal status conference.

Cowdery pleads guilty to Veco conspiracy

Conspiracy: recommended sentence will be up to a year's confinement served at home.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(12/19/08 22:23:00)

State Sen. John Cowdery pleaded guilty to a federal conspiracy charge Friday and was added to the growing list of public officials who have fallen in a broad corruption investigation in Alaska.

Cowdery, 78, admitted conspiring with top officials of the former oil-field services company Veco Corp. to bribe another state senator into agreeing to take Veco's position on pending oil-tax legislation in 2006. Veco and the other state senator, Donny Olson, never consummated the deal, which would have gotten Olson $25,000 in illegal campaign contributions.

Olson has said he cooperated with the federal investigation.

In return for Cowdery's guilty plea, made in U.S. District Court in Anchorage on Friday morning, the government promised to recommend a sentence of between six and 12 months confinement served at home instead of prison.

The government will also recommend a fine of no more than $25,000, unless a presentence report determines Cowdery has unusual wealth, in which case the government recommendation could rise to $75,000.

Prosecutors agreed to drop a charge of bribery against Cowdery.

Cowdery is the 10th person to be convicted in the federal corruption investigation, with one other legislator awaiting trial. A Republican who spent most of his working life in the construction business, Cowdery has represented parts of the Anchorage Hillside and the Lake Otis Parkway area for 14 years in the Alaska House and Senate.

He has resisted calls to step down and will continue to be paid as a senator until his term expires Jan. 20.

Cowdery's plea means that two freshly convicted felons now represent Alaska constituents. The other is U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, convicted Oct. 27 of seven counts of submitting false financial disclosures that failed to mention some $250,000 in gifts he received from Veco, Allen and others.

Cowdery's plea deal doesn't require him to testify against anyone else or to cooperate in the ongoing investigation.

FBI - Stevens-2310

U.S. District Judge Ralph Beistline accepted Cowdery's guilty plea in a 32-minute hearing. Beistline set sentencing for March 10.

"I'd like it as soon as possible," Cowdery said, but the judge responded that neither he nor the officials who prepare the pre-sentence report could do it much sooner.

Cowdery, who attended in a wheelchair, said he was concerned that he be allowed to visit his doctor during his confinement.

Beistline said that if Cowdery was in home confinement he would certainly be allowed to go for medical treatment.

-92b

"If you go to jail, that's easy, because the doctors are right there," Beistline said, raising a chuckle from the spectator bench occupied by Cowdery's wife and daughter.

As is usually the case when a defendant pleads guilty, much of the hearing was taken up with the judge ensuring that the defendant understood what he was doing and what rights he was waiving. Defense attorney Kevin Fitzgerald said Cowdery wasn't wearing his hearing aide and asked that people speak a little louder than normal.

"You want to plead guilty to count one, is that right?" Beistline said slowly and clearly.

"That's true," Cowdery said without hesitation.

By agreeing to plea, Cowdery gives up his right to appeal and must accept the sentence he receives, the judge told him.

Cowdery understood, he said.

"You say you've read the plea agreement?" Beistline asked him.

"Yes, several times," Cowdery replied.

As a felon, the judge told him, "you couldn't possess a firearm for the rest of your life."

Cowdery acknowledged the limitation.

You may never be able to vote again, the judge went on, hold public office, sit on a jury or get certain federal grants.

"It's been explained to me," Cowdery said, sounding a little exasperated.

"The law requires me to do it," Beistline said.

"I forgive you," Cowdery said.

For several minutes more, prosecutor James Goeke, an assistant U.S. Attorney in Anchorage, read a six-page statement of facts that accompanied the plea. Cowdery swore they were true.

The document contained a conversation over breakfast at the old Sunrise Grill in Midtown on June 25, 2006, among Cowdery, Allen and Olson, a Nome Democrat who is still in the Legislature. FBI agents had staked out the place -- they knew about the meeting from a wiretap on Allen's phone -- and managed to get part of the talk recorded.

"As I told you there in my home, this (legislation) is important to (Allen)," Cowdery was recorded saying to Olson. "I told him that I thought you would probably go, you guys would probably vote the way we voted."

FBI - Stevens-2311

Allen asked Olson how much he would need for his upcoming primary election bid. Olson said he had $100,000 of his own but would need more.

"How much are you good for?" Olson asked Allen.

"What?"

"How much are you good for?" Olson repeated.

"Oh, we can probably go 25," Allen said.

"That's a good start," Olson said.

After Olson walked away from the table, Allen and Cowdery continued the conversation.

"What do you think?" Cowdery said.

"I think he'll be there, if he gives us his word," Allen said.

"Absolutely," said Cowdery. "That's what he did."

FBI - Stevens-2312

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, v. THEODORE F. STEVENS, Defendant.	Criminal No. 08-231(EGS)

FBI - Stevens-2313

ORDER

On the afternoon of December 11, 2008, the government filed a "Sealed Memorandum" accompanied by a motion to seal and for a protective order. The government's pleading notified the Court that the government's attorneys in this case had received a copy of a "self-styled whistleblower complaint" on December 2, 2008. The complaint, authored by a Special Agent with the Federal Bureau of Investigation ("FBI") with extensive knowledge of the investigation and trial in this case, raised allegations of misconduct by certain government employees involved with the investigation and prosecution of the defendant.

In its motion to file ex parte and its motion to seal, the government represented to this Court that it had received the complaint on December 2, 2008 and over the course of the following days "received additional information, guidance and advice to satisfy itself that any possible statutory and regulatory confidentiality concerns surrounding a request for whistleblower protection had been fuly [sic] explored and addressed, and would not prohibit a disclosure to the Court at a minimum." (emphasis added). Neither the complaint nor the substance of the complaint was filed or revealed to the Court until nine days after its receipt by attorneys in the Office of Public Integrity.

The defendant objected to any sealing of the complaint. In addition to First and Sixth Amendment arguments, the defense argued that any redactions would make it more difficult for the defendant to adequately address and argue the allegations made in the complaint. The government and counsel for the complainant strenuously argued that the complaint should not be made public based on whistleblower and privacy concerns. The government also maintained that publication of the complaint would interfere with an ongoing investigation into the allegations being conducted by the Department of Justice's Office of Professional Responsibility ("OPR"). The Court ordered briefing on the government's motions to file ex parte and to file under seal and, following a hearing on December 19, 2008, the Court issued a 29-page Opinion and Order later that day, ordering that the complaint be filed on the public docket, with identifying information about the complainant's and the individuals named in the complaint redacted. Pursuant to that Opinion and Order, the redacted complaint was made public on December 22, 2008. Also on December 22, 2008, the defendant filed a Motion to Dismiss the Indictment, or, in the Alternative, Motion for a New Trial, Discovery, and an Evidentiary Hearing, based on the allegations made in the complaint.

On January 14, 2009, the government initiated a call to chambers, with defense counsel on the line, to request that it be permitted to file on the public docket a version of the complaint with fewer redactions. The Court scheduled a hearing for 2:00 p.m. on January 14, 2009 to hear arguments related to that request. At the hearing, held in open court, the government explained that it had found it difficult to respond to the defendant's Motion to Dismiss the Indictment, or, in the Alternative, Motion for a New Trial, Discovery, and an Evidentiary Hearing, without revealing the government employees' identities. Moreover, the government explained, it had contacted the government employees and they did not object to having their identities revealed. Finally, in response to a question from the Court, the government acknowledged that the author of the complaint, Agent Chad Joy, had not been granted whistleblower protection by the Office of Inspector General ("OIG").[1] In response to a follow-up question by the Court, the government then revealed to the Court - for the first time - that Agent Joy had been notified as early as December 4, 2008 that he had not been afforded whistleblower protection. That notification came at least seven days before the government filed its motions to file ex parte and to seal the complaint - seven days when, according to the prosecution, it was receiving "additional information, guidance and advice to satisfy itself that any possible statutory and regulatory confidentiality concerns surrounding a request for whistleblower protection had been fully explored and addressed" - and fifteen days before the hearing and the Court's Opinion and Order.

Based on the government's repeated representations, this Court and the defendant proceeded on the understanding that Agent Joy had whistleblower protection or that his status as a whistleblower was as yet undecided due to the ongoing investigation by OIG and/or OPR. Had the Court known that the government had already legally determined that Agent Joy was not entitled to whistleblower protection by the time it first filed the complaint under seal, the Court would have proceeded differently.

Therefore, it is hereby ORDERED that Attorney General Michael B. Mukasey personally sign a declaration under oath to be filed by no later than 12:00 p.m. on Friday, January 16, 2009, and provide copies of all relevant correspondence, detailing precisely (1) who within every office of the Department of Justice knew about the complaint filed by Agent Joy, (2) what those individuals and offices knew, and (3) when those individuals and offices received the relevant information. That declaration must also address all decisions, correspondence, and communications within the Department of Justice related to Agent Joy's status as a whistleblower and the determination that he was not entitled to whistleblower protection. It is further ORDERED that the government's request to file on the public docket a version of the Joy complaint with fewer redactions is GRANTED and the government shall file that complaint on the public docket by no later than 6:00 p.m. on January 14, 2009. It is further ORDERED that in view of the information in the complaint that will now be made public, the defendant may file a revised Motion to Dismiss the Indictment, or, in the Alternative, Motion for a New Trial, Discovery, and an Evidentiary Hearing by no later than January 26, 2009. It is further ORDERED that a status hearing is set for January 29, 2009 at 9:30 a.m. in Courtroom 24A.

SO ORDERED.

This document contains the identities of FBI Sources, sophisticated techniques, and other sensitive information. This document is sensitive but unclassified.

Background

My name is Chad Joy and I have been a Special Agent with the FBI since August 2003. My first office was Anchorage Division and I have remained there since January 2004. Soon after arriving in Anchorage, I was made co-case agent on a sensitive public corruption case, POLAR PEN [redacted]. The primary case agent was Mary Beth Kepner. My role was to be the Supervising and Administrative Agent on Title III electronic surveillance and to co-manage the case. POLAR PEN involved the investigation and prosecution of federal and state legislators, lobbyists, and corporate officials. The most recent conviction was of United States Senator Ted Stevens. DOJ Public Integrity Section lead the prosecution team.

Summary of Complaints

As the co-case agent on POLAR PEN for the past five years, I have witnessed or learned of serious violations of policy, rules, and procedures as well as possible criminal violations. When the problems initially began to surface, I attempted to rectify the problems by addressing them directly with SA Kepner. My efforts were unsuccessful. My next step was to keep my supervisor aware of all problems/issues that I encountered thereafter. I would also "vent" with two agents that I trusted throughout the years. In addition, on multiple occasions I advised my CDC of some of these issues/problems. Below is a summary of the key areas of concern that I can recall.

Details of Complaints

1. Kepner mishandled her sources
   a. Overall, SA Kepner mishandled her sources by becoming too close to each of them. SA Kepner would meet with sources in her home and have dinner with them and her husband at her home or their home. Kepner unnecessarily disclosed details about FBI investigations, unnecessarily provided information related to FBI techniques and internal workings, and would accept things of value from sources. Kepner documented very little in FBI files.
   b. Sources I am aware of mismanagement:
      i. [redacted]
      ii. [redacted]
      iii. [redacted]
      iv. [redacted]
      v. Rick Smith
      vi. Bill Allen
   c. [redacted]
      i. Source was previously in the state gaming enforcement area.
      ii. Kepner closed the source at some point.
      iii. Source gave Kepner's husband his current job as a security guard at the Port of Anchorage.
      iv. Kepner tried to have me reopen the source as my own source but I refused.
   d. [redacted]

i. [redacted] met with Kepner at her home in Juneau, AK on multiple occasions.

ii. [redacted] had access to Kepner's home, even when she was not home.

iii. [redacted] met with Kepner and her husband on multiple occasions.

e. [redacted]

i. Kepner told [redacted] details about [redacted] Smith, and Allen's cooperation and status as FBI sources.

ii. Kepner told [redacted] virtually all case details when [redacted] did not have a need to know case and operational details.

iii. Kepner met with [redacted] on many occasions alone or with her husband.

iv. Kepner ate dinner or lunch with [redacted] and [redacted] at their house on many occasions.

v. Kepner provided [redacted] detailed information about my personal background, my [redacted] and [redacted] without my permission and knowing I would not have allowed her to do so.

vi. When Kepner moved from Juneau to Anchorage, Kepner utilized [redacted] to locate homes ([redacted] was a licensed real estate agent).

vii. [redacted] drew and provided Kepner a large original drawing of Kepner's dog as a gift. This artwork is hanging on a wall in Kepner's home near her stairs.

f. [redacted]

i. Kepner attempted to provide [redacted] information about my personal background, my [redacted] and [redacted] without my permission. I had to kick her leg under the table to stop her from revealing personal information about me.

ii. After [redacted] was convicted and sent to prison, Kepner began communicating with [redacted] in writing without documenting the communications in FBI files.

iii. I believe Kepner lied to SSA Seale in my presence on or about 11/20/2008 when she told Seale she did not know she needed to document in FBI files the letters received and sent to [redacted].

g. Smith

i. Kepner went golfing with her husband, Smith, and [redacted] (another individual that was captured on Title III electronic surveillance and was a potential subject).

ii. This information was provided by SA Mary Jo Herrett.

h. Allen

i. Most recently, Kepner met with Allen by herself in her hotel room in Washington D.C. When I found out that occurred, I told AUSA Joe Bottini that if he knew that was going to happen again, to advise me so I could stop that from happening again. I also told Kepner not to do that again. She ignored me.

ii. Kepner wore a skirt for Allen during the recent trial during his testimony. Kepner does not wear skirts. She advised it was a surprise/present for Allen.

iii. Kepner told Allen during the pitch for him to cooperate on or about 08/30/06 that [redacted] accepted bribes from the FBI. Kepner told him details of the case and that [redacted] had cooperated with the FBI. It was unnecessary to reveal all that information. I believed it was absolutely unnecessary to provide details about other cases to someone we were wanting to cooperate. I advised the other agent in the room and he agreed but did not feel comfortable stopping Kepner from revealing further information.

iv. Kepner told Allen my source was cooperating and information that my source provided to the FBI. Kepner told Allen my source testified before the grand jury. Kepner provided Allen with information my source told the FBI.

v. Kepner may have revealed to Allen and/or his attorney the status of an ongoing Anchorage Police Department investigation involving Allen [redacted]

2. Kepner accepted multiple things of value from sources
   a. As referenced above, I am aware of a drawing/artwork, house-hunting assistance, and employment for Kepner's husband. I believe there were more gifts that I do not know about.
3. Kepner may have violated 6E Grand Jury rules
   a. As referenced above, I believe Kepner may have violated grand jury rules when she admitted to me that she told Allen that my source testified before the grand jury. I learned of this because Allen passed on the information to a family member, who passed on the information to my source's mother, who passed it on to my source. My source was upset that Allen knew he testified. I do not recall how much Allen knew about the content of my source's grand jury testimony.
4. Kepner failed to enter large amounts of evidence into FBI systems as 1B or 1C evidence
   a. There is a large amount of records currently in the Squad 4/5 conference room that the FBI has had in it's custody for some time that do not appear to be entered into evidence. Kepner defends herself and others by saying the documents are not originals even though much, if not all of the evidence, was obtained via grand jury subpoena and must be protected.
5. Kepner failed to disclose one or more searches performed in a Title III affidavit
   a. In one of the first Title III affidavits, I discovered that Kepner's affidavit did not reference the fact that the FBI had performed one or more searches. I advised Kepner and she told me not to worry about it, that it was too late to change it, and that it was irrelevant and would not have changed the fact the judge signed the affidavit. I was a new agent and left the issue alone. I don't recall whether I informed anyone else.
6. Kepner provided a variety of sensitive information and a piece of FBI equipment to her husband
   a. I am aware that Kepner keeps her husband up to date with the details and status of FBI investigations, regardless of the sensitivities involved or rules/regulations/laws that are broken.

b. After approaching [redacted] and gaining his cooperation, Kepner either received or made a call on her cell phone and began telling the caller everything that transpired in the approach to [redacted], about our techniques used (details like the shock room), what occurred, and the results of our efforts. I assumed it was her partner from Juneau. After she completed the call, I asked if the caller was her partner, SA Russ Ashenden. She said it was her husband. I chastised her for telling him sensitive information. She said, "Who else am I supposed to tell? He's in law enforcement and I have to tell someone..." I told her I knew he was not in law enforcement and that she should not be doing that. From that point on, Kepner tried to conceal the fact that she continued to keep her husband informed but I knew she did not change her habits.

c. Kepner transferred from Juneau to Anchorage. Kepner had a covert FBI cell phone (obtained [redacted]) to use when communicating with sensitive sources. One day I attempted to contact Kepner on her cover cell phone and her husband answered the phone. I asked Kepner why he answered her covert FBI cell phone and she advised they did not have a home phone yet so she decided to lend him the phone for his personal use.

7. Kepner had inappropriate relationships/communication with members of the media

a. Kepner had relationships and communicated with [redacted], [redacted], and [redacted]. Kepner had extensive communication with [redacted] about Allen and my source.

8. Kepner disclosed sensitive techniques and actions of our technically trained agents to a source

a. On one occasion, Kepner told Allen that our tech agents performed work in his phone box and on his phone line.

9. Kepner and others intentionally redacted Brady/Jenks material that defense counsel was entitled to receive a. At the recent trial of Ted Stevens, the prosecution was required by the court to turn over redacted FD-302s. Kepner redacted the Allen FD-302s/FD-1023s. The court learned the prosecution redacted information that should not have been redacted. The court openly chastised the government. Later that day, Kepner advised me that she redacted the information and did so because she wanted the FD-302s she was redacting to fit the Brady/Giglio letter that had previously been provided to the defense.

b. Kepner and others decided not to provide defense counsel Allen's bank account documents. During the trial of Ted Stevens, the prosecution decided to use a check of Allen's as an exhibit even though it had not previously been turned over in discovery. Prosecutors decided not to provide that check to the court and defense before using it as a government exhibit. The defense and the judge were upset.

10. SA Kepner's husband may have disclosed the of location and purpose of official travel by SA Kepner to a member of the media

a. Kepner's husband knew details of FBI investigations. Kepner's husband is very outgoing and likes to talk. Kepner's husband played softball with [redacted], a [redacted]. Shortly after Kepner flew to [redacted] to make the pitch for [redacted] to cooperate, my source advised that [redacted] told [redacted], a subject of our investigation who did not know he was a subject, that the FBI was going after [redacted]. I spoke to Kepner and Kepner's initial response was that her husband plays softball with [redacted] and he may have told [redacted]. Later she told me that she talked to her husband and he did not say anything to [redacted].

11. Nick Marsh, DOJ Public Integrity Section, inappropriately created scheme to relocate prosecution witness that was also subpoenaed by defense during trial
    a. During the trial of Ted Stevens, prosecutors subpoenaed Robert Williams. Williams was brought to Washington D.C. weeks before the trial for multiple trial preparatory sessions. Williams health was very poor. I requested that Williams be the first to testify so he could testify, get home, and continue to receive medical attention as necessary. I did not want him to die while we had him in Washington D.C. After the final preparatory session, which included a mock cross examination, prosecutors decided Williams was not a witness the prosecution wanted to use. Nick Marsh advised he came up with a great plan to send Williams home because he was so "concerned" about Williams' health that it would allow prosecutors to send him back to Alaska, even though Williams was also under a defense subpoena. I advised Nick and others multiple times that they should advise the defense counsel and the judge before executing their plan. I was ignored. They had me send Williams home. The defense and judge found out, were very angry, and suggested prosecutorial misconduct had occurred.
12. Marsh attempted to conceal from defense counsel an FD-302 discovered that had exculpatory information during trial that had not previously been provided to the defense
    a. During the trial of Ted Stevens, prosecutors planned to use SA Michelle Pluta as a witness. This caused the discovery of the fact that one of her Jenks FD-302s contained information that was not previously provided to the defense. The judge had previously required prosecutors to turn over all FD-302s and this was one that was not provided. The information had to be turned over to the defense. Nick Marsh was absolutely against turning over the FD-302 trying to convince the group why it was unnecessary. I left the conference room because I felt very uncomfortable with where the discussion was heading. In the end, the FD-302 was turned over.
13. Marsh or Ed Sullivan, DOJ Public Integrity Section, accepted approximately 30 boxes of paper evidence from defense counsel and did not forward that evidence to FBI to process and enter into databases as 1B or 1C evidence
    a. When I arrived at Public Integrity Section in Washington D.C. to prepare for the trial of Ted Stevens, I found many boxes of documents stacked outside the office of Nick Marsh. The FBI did not have custody of any of the material and the evidence had not been reviewed by FBI personnel. Because of evidence being in the custody and control of Public Integrity Section, discovery for the case had to occur from both Alaska (evidence in the custody and control of the FBI) and Washington D.C. (evidence in the custody and control of Public Integrity Section attorneys).
14. Marsh or Ed Sullivan, DOJ Public Integrity Section, accepted original evidence from one or more witnesses during grand jury and failed to provide that evidence to the FBI to process and enter into databases as 1B evidence and in one instance temporarily lost that evidence

a. [redacted] provided prosecutors with an original gold key-chain he received from Ted Stevens. He provided it during grand jury. During a trial preparatory session with [redacted] in Alaska, Brenda Morris, DOJ Public Integrity Section, instructed me to provide [redacted] with an FBI receipt for the key-chain because [redacted] advised he wanted to get the key-chain returned to him after the case was completed. I did not provide him with a receipt because that key-chain was never in the custody and control of the FBI. I was previously told that Nick Marsh had lost the key-chain but later found it in a file cabinet within Public Integrity Section.

b. I saw other original evidence at Public Integrity Section that did not appear to have been entered into FBI evidence systems or reviewed by the FBI.

My Motivation to Further Report

I could have kept going with the status quo but I chose to step up and make my concerns known at a higher level because of multiple reasons:

1. There were many serious problems I encountered in the recent trial of U.S. Senator Ted Stevens that frustrated me and I feel many of them stem from case mismanagement that occurred for too long;
2. One of SA Kepner's sources wrote and published a book about [redacted] work with the FBI, which publicly disclosed the mismanagement of that source, provided information about our investigations that [redacted] should not have known, the book mentioned me in multiple places, and because I closed [redacted] as a source and [redacted] wrote a letter complaining to the Director of the FBI;
3. Anchorage Division management recently decided to reassign SA Kepner's sources to others including myself and I believed SA Kepner would continue to have contact and mismanage the sources, causing other agents to be in inappropriate situations as I had been in the past five years;
4. I was scheduled to re-contact [redacted], a source who was convicted and is currently in prison. I found out [redacted] was also in the process of writing a book and I feared more problems would occur and I would be in the middle of Kepner problems again;
5. I recently began sharing my current concerns with two agents and they encouraged me to help everyone on our squad by reporting these problems to rectify the situation for all;
6. My efforts to rectify the problems have not been solved by reporting them to management; and
7. I re-read the FBI's core values and found they have not been upheld in the areas mentioned throughout this document.

Concerns For Myself

I work in the smallest field office within the FBI. In addition, FBIHQ from PCU to the highest levels are extremely pleased with the successes of POLAR PEN. I am concerned about possible retaliation. On 11/21/2008 I requested whistleblower protection status from my ASAC who was my Acting SAC at the time. I don't want to be punished for coming forward. I am absolutely outside my comfort zone by reporting my concerns beyond my efforts I listed in this document. Because my ASAC was a bit unclear as to whether he granted my request for protection, I request any and all whistleblower protections available again.

Actions I have Taken

Other than the previously noted actions, I recently discussed my many concerns with two other agents within my office. They helped guide and encourage me to report this information to higher authorities. I made a few more attempts to report these violations within my command structure in Anchorage Division. I was unsuccessful in these attempts. I decided I was more comfortable telling a neutral, outside party about my concerns. One of the agents I spoke with provided me with the hotline number to the Office of Integrity and Compliance (OIC). I called on 11/21/2008 at approximately 11:25 a.m. The preamble to the call stated that the hotline was operated by a third party and that if my concerns involved sensitive information, that I should not provide the information to them. I then called OIC directly and spoke with Assistant Director Patrick Kelley [redacted] Kelley was interested in what I had to say but advised that due to the nature of my concerns, I needed to provide the information to Inspection Division or DOJ OIG. Kelley provided me with the contact information for Inspection Division, Internal Investigation Section Chief Linda M. Krieg [redacted]). At approximately 12:12 p.m. I contacted Krieg. Krieg encouraged me to write down my concerns and provide them to Angela Byers (FBIHQ [redacted]), the person responsible for the initial processing of complaints. I hoped my concerns could be looked into without my name being known as the one who started the mess, to avoid any possible retaliation.

During lunch on 11/21/2008, I found out that one of the agents I spoke with met with SSA Seale and informed him that someone was going to report these concerns to OPR. When I returned from lunch, Seale spoke with me in private and told me that to protect myself, I needed to write down everything and provide it to him. Seale affirmed that I kept him informed of problems in the past but that he had forgotten a lot of what I told him. I felt I had to advise him of my contact earlier that day with Kelley and Krieg. I knew Seale was going to go talk to the ASAC and advise him of the situation. I told Seale that I should tell the ASAC my concerns. Shortly thereafter, I was called to the ASAC's office and asked to explain my concerns. I requested whistleblower protection and suggested it might not be appropriate for Seale or the CDC to sit in on this meeting because part of my story included them. ASAC Heller brought SSA Hastie into the office. I advised the ASAC of my contact with Kelley and Krieg. ASAC was not pleased I went outside of my office's chain of command. I explained why I didn't feel comfortable using my office's command structure and how I even got the feeling from him once that made me believe it would not be smart to go to the ASAC with these concerns. ASAC Heller advised me to follow the instructions Krieg had given me but that I should have provided the information to him. Heller told me not to discuss the concerns with others in the office and if anyone else had concerns they were to provide them to him. Heller had me immediately retrieve my notes regarding who at HQ I spoke with so he could call them and let them know he was dealing with the situation.

This document contains the identities of FBI Sources, sophisticated techniques, and other sensitive information. This document is sensitive but unclassified.

This document is supplemental to my original letter (file name: "[redacted]").

On 11/24/2008 at approximately 7:57 a.m., SA Mary Beth Kepner called me at my desk. She advised she got into a little trouble with front office. SA Kepner explained she told the ASAC the reason she told [redacted] (a source) so much information about the cases was because he was a "listening ear."

We discussed other matters throughout this conversation. I can provide my notes if necessary. SA Kepner explained that last Friday she couldn't get a hold of anyone. This was the day I felt I had to reveal to my SSA and ASAC that I had called Inspection Division. SA Kepner advised that SSA Colton Seale called SA Kepner while she was walking over to a meeting at the U.S. Attorney's Office (USAO) regarding [redacted] (subject of POLAR PEN) and SSA Seale told her she could no longer participate in the investigation of [redacted] my source) and [redacted] The prosecutors were recommending immediate search warrants. Once SA Kepner reached the USAO, AUSA Bottini advised SA Kepner that he had received a call from ASAC Dave Heller and that ASAC Heller said SA Kepner would not be participating in the [redacted] debrief. Later, ASAC Heller told SA Kepner she needed time to "decompress." SA Kepner believed that the results of her meeting with the ASAC on Thursday was that she only had to back off on her informants. SA Kepner wondered why she was hearing this information from AUSA Bottini.

ASAC Heller had told Kepner she could be involved in trial preparations but not lead any of her sources. SA Mary Jo Herrett was assigned Bill Allen with SA Kepner as the co-handling agent. SA Kerry Sparks was assigned [redacted] with SA Kepner as the co-handling agent.

On Friday afternoon, ASAC Heller asked SA Kepner to meet with him in his office. SA Kepner advised that the day before, she met with ASAC Heller to talk about her sources. SA Kepner thought, "what the hell is going on..." SA Kepner then said to me, "this is between only us..." SA Kepner said the ASAC told her in the Friday meeting that "something is going on but I can't tell you but I've got your back." SA Kepner further explained that the ASAC said, "it relates to the trial." SA Kepner thought it was probably the Brady issue where she did the redactions. SA Kepner advised management did not want her in a position to have to testify like an affiant until SA Kepner was interviewed by whoever was investigating the matter. SA Kepner believed the matter was initiated from outside the FBI. The ASAC would not say who it was coming from. SA Kepner asked the ASAC if SA Chad Joy was in same position. ASAC Heller asked SA Kepner, "wasn't Chad in a secondary role?" The ASAC further told SA Kepner, "Trust me, we've got your back." SA Kepner asked the ASAC how long it would take for the investigation to be resolved/completed. The ASAC advised that they would try and get it resolved as soon as possible. SA Kepner then told me that it's not our responsibility for Brady material but obviously she was integral. SA Kepner advised that once she got that information out of the ASAC, she felt better.

SA Kepner continued to tell me that she didn't see me having any problems. She said I did everything properly for [redacted] She said I was excellent with [redacted] [We talked further about [redacted] Again, I can provide my notes.] SA Kepner said again that she didn't think I'm in any trouble and that I've done an impeccable job. [We further discussed new transfers and my cubicle that I was moving back into.]

SA Kepner said "[redacted] told me not to worry about the evidence stuff." SA Kepner said she was just getting her bearing back from dealing with the [redacted] (source) issue with ASAC on Thursday. [The "evidence stuff" relates to all the boxes of evidence that is in the Squad 4/5 conference room that does not appear to have ever been entered into FBI evidence.]

SA Kepner talked about the letters to and from [redacted] SA Kepner thought SSA Seale should have told her she had to document the letters in FBI files. SA Kepner then said, "I guess I should have known..." At this point I told SA Kepner, "Yes, you definitely should have known..." SA Kepner's response to me was that I should have told her she needed to document the letters. My response was that I assumed she was documenting the letters.

Regarding the Thursday meeting SA Kepner had with the ASAC regarding sources, SA Kepner was told to get with our [redacted] in our office to get a little training on sources and how to be a little more cautious. SA Kepner said, "this is how they [ASAC] wanted to cover their butts..."

We further discussed stress and how we are dealing with it. We discussed a trip we had planned to Oklahoma to present the POLAR PEN case at the WCC conference on December 4, 2008. I informed her that I backed out of that trip and did not feel comfortable presenting.

GOVERNMENT'S MOTION FOR RECONSIDERATION AND TO VACATE JANUARY 14, 2009 ORDER DIRECTING THAT THE ATTORNEY GENERAL PERSONALLY SIGN A DECLARATION UNDER OATH

The United States of America, by and through its undersigned attorneys, respectfully asks this Court to vacate its January 14, 2009 order directing that Attorney General Michael B. Mukasey personally sign a declaration under oath detailing precisely (1) who within every office of the Department of Justice knew about the complaint filed by Agent Joy, (2) what those individuals and offices knew, and (3) when those individuals and offices received the relevant information. As explained below, the Court's order was premised on a misstatement by government counsel at the January 14 hearing to the effect that Agent Joy has been denied whistleblower protection and had been so notified as early as December 4, 2008, by the Office of Professional Responsibility (OPR). Government counsel was mistaken; they had misconstrued a letter sent to Agent Joy by OPR. The Department has never determined that Agent Joy is not entitled to whistleblower protection, and has never so advised him. We apologize for this error. A copy of the OPR letter is attached.

FBI - Stevens-2328

Because the Court's order is premised on a misunderstanding of Agent Joy's status, we respectfully ask the Court to relieve us of the obligation of providing the Court with a complete list of every Department of Justice employee who has knowledge of the Joy complaint. Even if the Court is not willing to relieve us of the obligation to provide that information, the Court should vacate its order to the extent that it directs the Attorney General to sign a declaration providing facts about which he lacks first-hand knowledge.

1. Sometime in late November or early December 2008, Special Agent Chad Joy submitted an undated complaint containing allegations of misconduct regarding his co-case agent and federal prosecutors in the above case. In the complaint, Agent Joy explicitly requested "any and all whistleblower protections." Complaint at 7. The complaint was referred to the Office of Professional Responsibility (OPR), which advised Agent Joy, on December 4, 2008, that it intended to investigate the matters raised in his letter about his co-case agent and the Stevens prosecutors. OPR further advised Agent Joy that because Agent Joy had not alleged any reprisals resulting from his complaint, OPR lacked "jurisdiction to initiate an investigation pursuant to 28 C.F.R. §27.3 into whether you are entitled to relief as an aggrieved whistleblower." Exh. A.

Meanwhile, on December 1, 2008, Criminal Division officials received a copy of the Joy complaint, and, in the following days, attempted to determine whether, in light of the allegations in the complaint, they were free to provide a copy of the complaint to the trial prosecutors, and, thereafter, to the Court or to counsel. The trial team provided the Court with a copy of the complaint under seal on December 11, 2008, and, as the Court has noted, argued thereafter that the complaint should not be made public based on privacy concerns relating not only to Agent Joy but also to co-case agent Kepner who had not yet been apprised of the complaint. The Court released the complaint on December 22, 2008, after redacting information identifying Agents Joy and Kepner, the prosecutors, and others.

On January 14, 2009, the government asked the Court to lift some of the redactions in the complaint, noting that Agent Kepner and the prosecutors named in the complaint did not object to publication of their names. 1/14/2009 Tr. 2-3. The government further noted that unsealing some of the redacted portions of the complaint would facilitate litigation of defendant's misconduct claims. Id. at 3. At this point, the Court advised the parties that it was "the Court's inclination to make public the identity of the complainant." Id. at 5. As the discussion continued, government counsel advised the court that the complainant (Agent Joy) "does not qualify for whistleblower status." Id. at 8. The Court asked the prosecutors when their "office" had learned that Agent Joy "was denied whistleblower protection," (id. at 15), and the prosecutors were unable to identify the date, although they believed it was after the December 19 hearing (id. at 17): "because after I apprised OPR of what was going on here, that's when I was informed that there was a – that Mr. Joy had been given a letter as early as December 4th telling him he had been denied whistleblower status." The Court then stated: "If your office knew this man had been denied whistleblower status, it had an obligation to tell me before we had that hearing. * * * if you learned about it afterwards, as soon after you learned about it, you had an obligation to let the Court know." Id. at 20. The Court then ordered the government to produce a full accounting of "everything that happened with respect to this whistleblower issue" in the form of a declaration from the Attorney General. Ibid.; 1/14/2009 Order at 4-5.

The factual premise on which the Court's order is based – that Agent Joy had been denied whistleblower status – is incorrect. The prosecutors had misconstrued the OPR letter, which merely advised Agent Joy that because he had not alleged retaliation, OPR lacked jurisdiction to initiate an investigation into whether he was entitled to any relief as an aggrieved whistleblower.[1] OPR had not denied Agent Joy whistleblower status.

Indeed, it would have been inappropriate for OPR – or any component of the Department of Justice – to do so. The Whistleblower Protection Act of 1989, Pub. L. No. 101-12, 103 Stat. 16 (1989) (codified in scattered sections of 5 U.S.C.) (WPA) "provides most federal agency employees with protection against agency reprisals for whistleblowing activity, such as disclosing illegal conduct; gross mismanagement, gross wasting of funds, or actions presenting substantial dangers to health and safety. See 5 U.S.C. § 2302(b)(8)." Stella v. Mineta, 284 F.3d 135, 142 (D.C. Cir. 2002). Because the FBI is not an "agency" within the meaning of the Act, see 5 U.S.C. § 2302(a)(2)(C)(ii), the Department of Justice promulgated a series of regulations that provide similar whistleblower protection to FBI employees. See 28 C.F.R. § 27.1 et seq. Those protections apply where the disclosing employee "reasonably believes" that the information he is providing evidences:

> (1) A violation of any law, rule or regulation; or
> (2) Mismanagement, a gross waste of funds, an abuse of authority, or a substantial and specific danger to public health or safety.

28 C.F.R. § 27.1(a). If the disclosing employee satisfies this threshold, the FBI whistleblower regulations bar his supervisors from taking any personnel action in "reprisal for a protected disclosure." 28 C.F.R. § 27.2(b).

[1] As prosecutor Brenda Morris advised the Court on more than one occasion, the prosecutors are not versed in whistleblower law. See, e.g., 1/14/2009 Tr. 24: "And if you recall, Judge, when I initially reached out to the Court, I was very ginger because I'm just not familiar with this aspect of the law and what I could and couldn't say, and that was when I first contacted the Court and with Defense counsel to say, 'This issue has come up. I'm just not familiar with the law with what I can't and can't say.'"

At this time, OPR has not completed its investigation of Agent Joy's allegations. Further, it is not the province of the Public Integrity Section or the Criminal Division to determine whether Agent Joy is entitled to protection under the applicable regulations. Moreover, Agent Joy has not alleged any reprisal, and therefore no Justice Department official has yet determined whether his belief in the accuracy of the allegations in his complaint is "reasonable." In short, there has been no formal determination of Agent Joy's whistleblower status, and he is presently entitled to the same prohibition against retaliation as any FBI employee.

We apologize again for the confusion caused by our misinterpretation of OPR's December 4 letter. Accordingly, the facts are as we represented them in our earlier pleadings and at the December 19, 2008 hearing.

In light of the above, we ask that the Court relieve us of the responsibility of identifying everyone within the Department of Justice who knew about the complaint filed by Agent Joy. Such an inquiry is no longer likely to benefit the Court.

2. Wholly apart from the misunderstanding that led to the Court's January 14 order, the Court should vacate its order directing that the Attorney General personally sign a declaration under oath providing detailed information about which Department of Justice employees have knowledge of Agent Joy's complaint. Under well-established principles, there is a strong presumption against compelling high Executive Branch officials to provide testimony in law enforcement proceedings (or be subjected to interrogatories or depositions) absent exceptional circumstances. See, e.g., In re United States (Reno and Holder), 197 F.3d 310, 314 (8th Cir. 2000) (finding that the Attorney General and the Deputy Attorney General could not be compelled to testify because of the absence of "extraordinary circumstances"); In re United States (Kessler), 985 F.2d 510, 512 (11th Cir. 1993) (per curiam) (defendants were not entitled to subpoena FDA Commissioner because "[t]his case does not present extraordinary circumstances or a special need for the Commissioner's testimony"); In re Office of Inspector General, 933 F.2d 276, 278 (5th Cir. 1991) (per curiam) (directing district court to "remain mindful of the requirement that exceptional circumstances must exist before the involuntary deposition of high agency officials are permitted"); Energy Capital Corp. v. United States, 60 Fed. Cl. 315, 318 (Fed. Cl. 2004) ("[C]urrent high-ranking government officials may only be deposed and otherwise personally involved in a civil suit if 'exceptional circumstances' exist that required their personal testimony."). The D.C. Circuit has previously applied this rule in affirming a district court's refusal to require top Department of Labor officials to testify. Simplex Time Recorder Co. v. Sec'y of Labor, 766 F.2d 575, 586 (D.C. Cir. 1985) ("[T]op executive department officials should not, absent extraordinary circumstances, be called to testify regarding their reasons for taking official actions.") (citing United States v. Morgan, 313 U.S. 409, 421-22 (1941)). See also Peoples v. U.S. Dep't of Agri., 427 F.2d 561, 567 (D.C. Cir. 1970) ("[S]ubjecting a cabinet officer to oral deposition is not normally countenanced"). More recently, the Fifth Circuit vacated a district court's discovery order that the Attorney General himself provide a signed letter asserting privilege, refusing to discuss at length its reasons for doing so because the "request was obviously inappropriate." In re United States (Ashcroft), 397 F.3d 274, 286 n.16 (5th Cir. 2005).

The reasons for such a rule are clear. Agency heads are charged with sweeping statutory responsibilities in furtherance of the public interest. At the same time, their agencies are generally involved in litigation in courts across the nation. If agency heads could routinely be ordered to provide sworn testimony in civil and criminal proceedings, their ability to execute the duties of their offices and thus serve the public interest would be severely impaired. As the Supreme Court explained in United States v. Morgan, 313 U.S. 409, 422 (1941), subjecting high officials to regular scrutiny concerning the reasons for their official actions would compromise the "integrity of the administrative process." Such testimony should thus be required only if absolutely necessary, such as when the information sought is not available from any other source or witness. See Bogan v. City of Boston, 489 F.3d 417, 423 (1st Cir. 2007) ("[W]ithout appropriate limitations, [high ranking government] officials will spend an inordinate amount of time tending to pending litigation."); In re United States (Reno), 197 F.3d at 314 (exceptional circumstances could not be demonstrated absent showing that discovery sought from Attorney General and Deputy Attorney General "cannot otherwise be obtained"); In re FDIC, 58 F.3d 1055, 1062 (5th Cir. 1995) (holding that district court erred by failing to quash deposition subpoenas issued to the Acting Chairman of the FDIC, the Comptroller of the Currency, and the Acting Director of the Office of Thrift Supervision) ("We think it will be the rarest of cases * * * in which exceptional circumstances can be shown where the testimony is available from an alternate witness."); In re United States (Kessler), 985 F.2d at 513 ("Because of the time constraints and multiple responsibilities of high officials, courts discourage parties from calling them as witnesses and require exigent circumstances to justify a request for their testimony."); id. at 512 ("The reason for requiring exigency before allowing the testimony of high officials is obvious. High ranking government officials have greater duties and time constraints than other witnesses."); United States v. Winner, 641 F.2d 825, 834 (10th Cir. 1981) (finding that the Assistant Attorney General could not be compelled to testify until it was established that other witnesses could not provide the necessary information).

Finally, the presumption against requiring high-level Executive Branch officials personally to provide information in civil or criminal legal proceedings is even stronger where, as here, the official lacks personal or first-hand knowledge of the detailed information sought. Bogan, 489 F.3d at 423 (permitting access to high government officials through the discovery process requires, at a minimum, "first-hand knowledge related to the claim being litigated"); Simplex Time Recorder Co., 766 F.2d at 586 (upholding ALJ's decision to strike top Department of Labor officials from plaintiff's witness list because "any testimony which these officials might provide would be irrelevant since they had no first-hand knowledge of the case"). A requirement that the official have personal knowledge of the information sought complements the principle that high officials should not be forced to testify or submit to discovery if an alternate witness could provide the information requested. See Buono v. City of Newark, 249 F.R.D. 469, 470 (D.N.J. 2008) (describing requirement that "the official has first-hand information that could not be reasonably obtained from other sources"). Accord United States v. Koubriti, 305 F. Supp. 2d 723, 754 (E.D. Mich. 2003) (finding "no compelling need" for the Attorney General's in-court testimony even though "[t]he conduct at issue here unquestionably is that of the Attorney General himself and his direct staff, as opposed to a more general matter of departmental policy or agency decisionmaking"); Energy Capital Corp., 60 Fed. Cl. At 318 (noting that high-ranking government officials may be subject to depositions "if the party has personal knowledge of the facts in issue"). Here, the court's order compelling an affidavit from the Attorney General would require the Attorney General to issue a sworn statement setting forth detailed facts about which he lacks personal, first-hand knowledge. See, e.g., Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e)(1) ("A supporting or opposing affidavit must be made on personal knowledge * * *.") (emphasis added); Wicker v. Oregon ex rel. Bureau of Labor, 543 F.3d 1168, 1178 (9th Cir. 2008) ("[A]ffiants' assertions about a meeting which they apparently did not attend and about which they had no personal knowledge are not the proper subject of an affidavit.").

We thus respectfully submit that this court's order directed to the Attorney General, who lacks first-hand knowledge of the detailed information sought by the Court, does not present one of the rare situations in which the personal testimony, in the form of a sworn declaration, of a high-level Executive Branch official is necessary or appropriate.

For the foregoing reasons, the Court should vacate its January 14, 2009, order.

Special Agent Chad Joy
Federal Bureau of Investigation
FBI Anchorage Division
101 East Sixth Avenue
Anchorage, AK 99501

Dear Special Agent Joy:

This Office was referred for handling your undated document (Document) containing complaints about the conduct of a Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) Special Agent identified as your co-case agent in the FBI's POLAR PEN investigation.

As you may be aware, the primary jurisdiction of the Office of Professional Responsibility (OPR) is to investigate allegations of misconduct involving Department of Justice (DOJ) attorneys that relate to their authority to investigate, litigate or provide legal advice, as well as allegations of misconduct by DOJ law enforcement personnel when they are related to allegations of attorney misconduct within OPR's jurisdiction. Your Document appears to raise such allegations against the FBI Special Agent and several Department of Justice prosecutors identified in your letter as being involved in the prosecution of United States v. Theodore Stevens, No. 08-231 (D.D.C.). We therefore intend to investigate the matters raised in your letter pursuant to this primary jurisdictional authority.

As you may also be aware, pursuant to 28 C.F.R. §27.3, OPR also has jurisdiction to act as an "Investigating Office" regarding allegations of "reprisals" against FBI employees disclosing violations of laws, rules or regulations. Since, however, this secondary jurisdictional authority is limited to instances of alleged reprisal taken against the disclosing employee, and since your Document did not allege any such reprisal, please be advised that we lack jurisdiction to initiate an investigation pursuant to 28 C.F.R. §27.3 into whether you are entitled to relief as an aggrieved whistleblower. Should you come to believe that you have been subjected to or threatened with any such reprisal, please contact either this or any other office identified as a "Receiving Office" in 28 C.F.R. §27.1 for reconsideration of the matter.

The matters alleged in your Document bear heavily on the Stevens case which, as you are undoubtedly aware, is the subject of ongoing litigation. Please be further advised, therefore, that attorneys responsible for the litigation of that case or investigating agents acting at their direction may seek to interview you regarding those matters pursuant to their obligation to conduct the Stevens litigation.

If you have any questions, please contact this Office at 202-514-3365.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, v. THEODORE F. STEVENS, Defendant.	No. 08-cr-231 (EGS)

SENATOR STEVENS'S OPPOSITION TO GOVERNMENT'S MOTION FOR RECONSIDERATION AND TO VACATE JANUARY 14, 2009 ORDER THAT THE ATTORNEY GENERAL PERSONALLY SIGN A DECLARATION UNDER OATH

The government never wanted the public to know that one of its own agents, Chad Joy, had submitted a whistleblower complaint asserting that he "witnessed or learned of serious violations of policy, rules, and procedures as well as possible criminal violations" by members of the team that prosecuted Senator Stevens. Dkt. 262. In its efforts to convince the Court that these allegations should be hidden from the public, the government "strenuously argued that [Agent Joy's] complaint should not be made public based on whistleblower and privacy concerns." Dkt. 261 at 2. The Court disagreed, but redacted Agent Joy's name out of deference to the government's (and Joy's counsel's) representations. Dkt. 256 at 2.

The defense was forced to prepare its motion to dismiss using generic terms and without using Agent Joy's name. When the time came for the government to respond to the motion to dismiss, the government did not want to play by the same rules. It apparently wants to attack Agent Joy in public by name. In order to achieve that end, the government told the Court that Agent Joy "does not qualify for whistleblower status" after all and that he "was denied whistleblower protection." Tr. (Jan. 14, 2009), at 8, 15. Clearly, when it suited its strategic goal to try to keep Agent Joy's complaint confidential and hidden from the public, the government relied on Agent Joy's whistleblower status. But when the government wanted to attack Agent Joy by name in public, the government claimed that Agent Joy was not a whistleblower after all.

Justifiably concerned about this inconsistency, the Court ordered the Attorney General to "sign a declaration under oath . . . and provide copies of all relevant correspondence, detailing precisely (1) who within every office of the Department of Justice knew about the complaint filed by Agent Joy, (2) what those individuals and offices knew, and (3) when those individuals and offices received the relevant information." Dkt. 261 at 4-5. The Court further ordered that the "declaration must also address all decisions, correspondence, and communication within the Department of Justice related to Agent Joy's status as a whistleblower and the determination that he was not entitled to whistleblower protection." Id. at 5.

After the Court issued its Order, the government changed its position once again, telling the Court on January 15, 2009 that Agent Joy is a whistleblower after all and that he was never denied whistleblower protection. Confronted with the falsity of its representations on January 14, 2009, the government now states that "government counsel was mistaken" and "apologizes" for their "error", Dkt. 264 at 1. This is a familiar refrain from this team of Public Integrity prosecutors, calling to mind the Court's inquiry early in these proceedings, "How does the Court have any confidence that the Public Integrity Section has integrity?" Tr. (Oct. 2, 2008 p.m.) at 29.

The pattern is unmistakable. Over and over again the government has been caught in false representations and otherwise failing to perform its duties under the Constitution and the Rules. And over and over again, when caught, the government has claimed that it has simply made good faith mistakes. When the government failed to produce Rocky Williams's exculpatory grand jury testimony, the government claimed that this testimony was immaterial. Dkt. 105. When the government sent Mr. Williams back to Alaska without advising the defense or the Court, the government asserted that it was acting in "good faith." Dkt. 105-4. When the government affirmatively redacted exculpatory statements from FBI Form 302s, it claimed that "it was just a mistake." Tr. (Oct. 2, 2008, a.m.), at 19; see also Tr. (Oct. 2, 2008, p.m.), at 27, 29. When government counsel told the Court that Allen had not been re-interviewed the day before a hearing on its Brady disclosures, this was a "mistaken understanding." Dkt. 134 at 15. When the government failed to turn over exculpatory statements from Dave Anderson, it claimed that they were immaterial. Tr. (Oct. 8, 2008, p.m.), at 58, 62, 64, 67. When the government failed to turn over a critical grand jury transcript containing exculpatory information, it claimed that it was "inadvertent." Tr. (Oct. 6, 2008, p.m.), at 95. When the government used "business records" that the government undeniably knew were false, it said that it was unintentional. Tr. (Oct. 8, 2008, p.m.), at 76. When the government failed to produce the bank records of Bill Allen and then sprang them on the defense, it claimed this check was immaterial to the defense. Tr. (Oct. 8, 2008, a.m.), at 3.

The defense (and the Court) was forced to spend hundreds of hours dealing with these "mistakes" in the middle of trial. It strains credulity to believe that these were all good faith mistakes, and the defense submits that an evidentiary hearing will demonstrate that they were not (if the Court is not convinced already). Even after getting caught making one so-called mistaken statement after another, the government as late as Wednesday, January 14, 2009, was still recklessly (at best) making false representations to the Court. The conclusion is clear: neither the defense nor the Court can rely upon the representations of government counsel from the Office of Public Integrity.

The defense submits that the Attorney General should be required to comply with the Court's Order of January 14, 2009. The Court and the defense are entitled to know who knew what and when. The cases cited by the government are not remotely similar to this case. These cases generally involve oral testimony,[1] and none involves a case where the government has been caught violating the Rules and the Constitution repeatedly. This is precisely the sort of situation where a declaration from the Attorney General is appropriate. In Simplex v. Sec'y of Labor, which was cited by the government, the Court found that the party seeking testimony from Department of Agriculture officials had "not suggested any information in the possession of these officials . . . that it could not obtain from published reports and available agency documents." 766 F.2d 575, 587 (D.C. Cir. 1985). Here, the defense and the Court have been trying and trying to obtain reliable information from the government. It is unlikely that any government official other than the Attorney General reaches over the myriad of Justice Department offices implicated: the Office of Public Integrity; the Office of the Inspector General; the Office of Professional Responsibility; the Federal Bureau of Investigation; the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of Alaska, and perhaps others.

In the alternative, the defense would not object (if, but only if, it were acceptable to the Court) if the Court decided to order declarations from the head of each Justice Department office implicated. These officials presumably would have direct knowledge of the government's actions in this matter.

GOVERNMENT'S EMERGENCY MOTION FOR A STAY OF THE JANUARY 14, 2009 ORDER DIRECTING THAT THE ATTORNEY GENERAL PERSONALLY SIGN A DECLARATION UNDER OATH BY NOON TODAY

On January 15, the United States of America, by and through its undersigned attorney, respectfully asked this Court to vacate its January 14, 2009 order directing that Attorney General Michael B. Mukasey personally sign by noon today a declaration under oath detailing precisely (1) who within every office of the Department of Justice knew about the complaint filed by Agent Joy, (2) what those individuals and offices knew, and (3) when those individuals and offices received the relevant information. Defendant Stevens filed an opposition to the government's motion this morning. The government's motion is still pending. The government respectfully asks this Court to stay its order pending a decision on the government's motion. Further, if the Court denies the government's motion, the government asks the Court to stay compliance with its order for two weeks for the following reasons:

1. Although we are in the process of collecting the information requested by the Court, we have not yet completed that task. Additional time is also needed to gather all the information requested. The Joy Complaint has now been released to the public with minor redactions. Thus, the number of persons within the Department of Justice with knowledge "of the complaint filed posted on AGN web page

- 931

by Agent Joy"is potentially quite broad. Even if we narrow our inquiry to individuals who received a copy of the complaint before it was released to the public, we must canvas multiple components within Main Justice, the Office of the United States Attorney for the District of Alaska, and the FBI. We note, however, that because, as the government explained in its filing yesterday, the Department has not determined that Agent Joy "was not entitled to whistleblower protection," we have no documents that are responsive to the portion of the Court's order directing the Attorney General to address "all decisions, correspondence, and communications within the Department of Justice related to "the determination that [Agent Joy] was not entitled to whistleblower protection."

2. As set forth in our Motion for Reconsideration and to Vacate, there is a strong presumption against compelling high Executive Branch officials, such as the Attorney General, to testify or provide information under oath. This is especially true where, as here, the official lacks first-hand knowledge of the information sought. If the Court denies the government's motion, the Solicitor General needs time to review this Court's order directing the Attorney General to provide a sworn declaration, and to decide whether to seek review of that order in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. Moreover, should he decide to seek such review, time will be needed to file the appropriate papers and to obtain a decision from the circuit court.

3. Although Attorney General Michael B. Mukasey leaves office shortly, the information the Court has directed us to provide does not turn on his presence.

FBI - Stevens-2347

CONCLUSION

For the above reasons, the Court should stay the portion of the January 14 order directing the Attorney General to submit a declaration by noon until it rules on the government's Motion to Reconsider and to Vacate. If the Court denies the government's motion, we request a stay for two weeks to provide the Solicitor General with time to consider and pursue appellate remedies.

i. [redacted] told [redacted] details about [redacted] and Allen's cooperation and status as FBI sources.

ii. [redacted] told [redacted] virtually all case details when [redacted] did not have a need to know case and operational details.

iii. [redacted] met with [redacted] on many occasions alone or with [redacted]

iv. [redacted] ate dinner or lunch with [redacted] and [redacted] at [redacted] house on many occasions.

v. [redacted] provided [redacted] detailed information about my personal background, [redacted] without my permission and knowing I would not have allowed [redacted] to do so.

vi. When [redacted] moved from [redacted] to [redacted] utilized [redacted] to locate homes [redacted] was a licensed real estate agent).

vii. [redacted] drew and provided [redacted] a large original drawing of [redacted] dog as a gift. This artwork is hanging on a wall in [redacted] home near [redacted] stairs.

f. [redacted]

i. [redacted] attempted to provide [redacted] information about my personal background, [redacted] without my permission. I had to kick [redacted] leg under the table to stop [redacted] from revealing personal information about me.

ii. After [redacted] was convicted and sent to prison, [redacted] began communicating with [redacted] in writing without documenting the communications in FBI files.

iii. I believe [redacted] lied to [redacted] in my presence on or about 11/20/2008 when [redacted] told [redacted] did not know [redacted] needed to document in FBI files the letters received and sent to [redacted]

g. [redacted]

i. [redacted] went golfing with [redacted] and [redacted] (another individual that was captured on Title III electronic surveillance and was a potential subject).

ii. This information was provided by [redacted]

h. Allen

i. Most recently, [redacted] met with Allen by [redacted] in [redacted] hotel room in Washington D.C. When I found out that occurred, I told [redacted] that if [redacted] knew that was going to happen again, to advise me so I could stop that from happening again. I also told [redacted] not to do that again. [redacted] ignored me.

ii. [redacted] wore [redacted] for Allen during the recent trial during his testimony. [redacted] does not wear [redacted] [redacted] advised it was a surprise/present for Allen.

iii. [redacted] told Allen during the pitch for him to cooperate on or about 08/30/06 that [redacted] accepted bribes from the FBI. [redacted] told him details of the case and that [redacted] had cooperated with the FBI. It was unnecessary to reveal all that information. I believed it was absolutely unnecessary to provide details about other cases to someone we were wanting to cooperate. I advised the other agent in the room and [redacted] agreed but did not feel comfortable stopping [redacted] from revealing further information.

iv. [redacted] told Allen [redacted] was cooperating and information that [redacted] provided to the FBI. [redacted] told Allen my source testified before the grand jury. [redacted] provided Allen with information [redacted] told the FBI.

v. [redacted] may have revealed to Allen and/or his attorney the status of an ongoing Anchorage Police Department investigation involving Allen [redacted]

2. [redacted] accepted multiple things of value from sources
   a. As referenced above, I am aware of a drawing/artwork, house-hunting assistance, and employment for [redacted] I believe there were more gifts that I do not know about.
3. [redacted] may have violated 6E Grand Jury rules
   a. As referenced above, I believe [redacted] may have violated grand jury rules when [redacted] admitted to me that [redacted] told Allen that my source testified before the grand jury. I learned of this because Allen passed on the information to a family member, who passed on the information to my source's [redacted] who passed it on to my source. [redacted] was upset that Allen knew he testified. I do not recall how much Allen knew about the content of [redacted] grand jury testimony.
4. [redacted] failed to enter large amounts of evidence into FBI systems as 1B or 1C evidence
   a. There is a large amount of records currently in the Squad 4/5 conference room that the FBI has had in it's custody for some time that do not appear to be entered into evidence. [redacted] defends [redacted] and others by saying the documents are not originals even though much, if not all of the evidence, was obtained via grand jury subpoena and must be protected.
5. [redacted] failed to disclose one or more searches performed in a Title III affidavit
   a. In one of the first Title III affidavits, I discovered that [redacted] affidavit did not reference the fact that the FBI had performed one or more searches. I advised [redacted] and [redacted] told me not to worry about it, that it was too late to change it, and that it was irrelevant and would not have changed the fact the judge signed the affidavit. I was a [redacted] and left the issue alone. I don't recall whether I informed anyone else.
6. [redacted] provided a variety of sensitive information and a piece of FBI equipment to [redacted]
   a. I am aware that [redacted] keeps [redacted] up to date with the details and status of FBI investigations, regardless of the sensitivities involved or rules/regulations/laws that are broken.

b. After approaching [redacted] and gaining [redacted] cooperation, [redacted] either received or made a call on [redacted] cell phone and began telling the caller everything that transpired in the approach to [redacted] about our techniques used (details like the shock room), what occurred, and the results of our efforts. I assumed it was [redacted] partner from [redacted] After [redacted] completed the call, I asked if the caller was [redacted] said it was [redacted] I chastised [redacted] for telling [redacted] sensitive information [redacted] said, "Who else am I supposed to tell? [redacted] in law enforcement and I have to tell someone..." I told [redacted] I knew [redacted] was not in law enforcement and that [redacted] should not be doing that. From that point on, [redacted] tried to conceal the fact that [redacted] continued to keep [redacted] informed but I knew [redacted] did not change [redacted] habits.

c. [redacted] transferred from [redacted] to [redacted] [redacted] had a [redacted] FBI cell phone [redacted] to use when communicating with sensitive sources. One day I attempted to contact [redacted] on [redacted] cover cell phone and [redacted] answered the phone. I asked [redacted] why [redacted] answered [redacted] cell phone and [redacted] advised they did not have a home phone yet so [redacted] decided to lend [redacted] the phone for [redacted] personal use.

7. [redacted] had inappropriate relationships/communication with members of the media

a. [redacted] had relationships and communicated with [redacted] and [redacted] [redacted] had extensive communication with [redacted] about Allen and [redacted] source.

8. [redacted] disclosed sensitive techniques and actions of our technically trained agents to a source

a. On one occasion, [redacted] told Allen that our tech agents performed work in his phone box and on his phone line.

9. [redacted] and others intentionally redacted Brady/Jenks material that defense counsel was entitled to receive a. At the recent trial of Ted Stevens, the prosecution was required by the court to turn over redacted FD-302s. [redacted] redacted the Allen FD-302s/FD-1023s. The court learned the prosecution redacted information that should not have been redacted. The court openly chastised the government. Later that day, [redacted] advised me that [redacted] redacted the information and did so because [redacted] wanted the FD-302s [redacted] was redacting to fit the Brady/Giglio letter that had previously been provided to the defense.

b. [redacted] and others decided not to provide defense counsel Allen's bank account documents. During the trial of Ted Stevens, the prosecution decided to use a check of Allen's as an exhibit even though it had not previously been turned over in discovery. Prosecutors decided not to provide that check to the court and defense before using it as a government exhibit. The defense and the judge were upset.

10. [redacted] may have disclosed the of location and purpose of official travel by [redacted] to a member of the media

a. [redacted] knew details of FBI investigations. [redacted] is very outgoing and likes to talk. [redacted] played softball with [redacted] Shortly after [redacted] flew to [redacted] to [redacted]

make the pitch for [redacted] to cooperate, my source advised that [redacted] told [redacted] a subject of our investigation who did not know [redacted] was a subject, that the FBI was going after [redacted] I spoke to [redacted] and [redacted]'s initial response was that [redacted] plays softball with [redacted] and [redacted] may have told [redacted] Later [redacted] told me that [redacted] talked to [redacted] and [redacted] did not say anything to [redacted]

11. [redacted] DOJ Public Integrity Section, inappropriately created scheme to relocate prosecution witness that was also subpoenaed by defense during trial

a. During the trial of Ted Stevens, prosecutors subpoenaed Robert Williams. Williams was brought to Washington D.C. weeks before the trial for multiple trial preparatory sessions. Williams health was very poor. I requested that Williams be the first to testify so he could testify, get home, and continue to receive medical attention as necessary. I did not want him to die while we had him in Washington D.C. After the final preparatory session, which included a mock cross examination, prosecutors decided Williams was not a witness the prosecution wanted to use. [redacted] advised [redacted] came up with a great plan to send Williams home because [redacted] was so "concerned" about Williams' health that it would allow prosecutors to send him back to Alaska, even though Williams was also under a defense subpoena. I advised [redacted] and others multiple times that they should advise the defense counsel and the judge before executing their plan. I was ignored. They had me send Williams home. The defense and judge found out, were very angry, and suggested prosecutorial misconduct had occurred.

12. [redacted] attempted to conceal from defense counsel an FD-302 discovered that had exculpatory information during trial that had not previously been provided to the defense

a. During the trial of Ted Stevens, prosecutors planned to use [redacted] as a witness. This caused the discovery of the fact that one of [redacted] Jenks FD-302s contained information that was not previously provided to the defense. The judge had previously required prosecutors to turn over all FD-302s and this was one that was not provided. The information had to be turned over to the defense. [redacted] was absolutely against turning over the FD-302 trying to convince the group why it was unnecessary. I left the conference room because I felt very uncomfortable with where the discussion was heading. In the end, the FD-302 was turned over.

13. [redacted] or [redacted], DOJ Public Integrity Section, accepted approximately 30 boxes of paper evidence from defense counsel and did not forward that evidence to FBI to process and enter into databases as 1B or 1C evidence

a. When I arrived at Public Integrity Section in Washington D.C. to prepare for the trial of Ted Stevens, I found many boxes of documents stacked outside the office of [redacted]. The FBI did not have custody of any of the material and the evidence had not been reviewed by FBI personnel. Because of evidence being in the custody and control of Public Integrity Section, discovery for the case had to occur from both Alaska (evidence in the custody and control of the FBI) and Washington D.C. (evidence in the custody and control of Public Integrity Section attorneys).

14. [redacted] or [redacted] DOJ Public Integrity Section, accepted original evidence from one or more witnesses during grand jury and failed to provide that evidence to the FBI to process and enter into databases as 1B evidence and in one instance temporarily lost that evidence

a. [redacted] provided prosecutors with an original gold key-chain [redacted] received from Ted Stevens. [redacted] provided it during grand jury. During a trial preparatory session with [redacted] in Alaska [redacted], DOJ Public Integrity Section, instructed me to provide [redacted] with an FBI receipt for the key-chain because [redacted] advised [redacted] wanted to get the key-chain returned to [redacted] after the case was completed. I did not provide [redacted] with a receipt because that key-chain was never in the custody and control of the FBI. I was previously told that [redacted] had lost the key-chain but later found it in a file cabinet within Public Integrity Section.

b. I saw other original evidence at Public Integrity Section that did not appear to have been entered into FBI evidence systems or reviewed by the FBI.

My Motivation to Further Report

I could have kept going with the status quo but I chose to step up and make my concerns known at a higher level because of multiple reasons:

1. There were many serious problems I encountered in the recent trial of U.S. Senator Ted Stevens that frustrated me and I feel many of them stem from case mismanagement that occurred for too long;
2. One of [redacted] wrote and published a book about [redacted] work with the FBI, which publicly disclosed the mismanagement of [redacted] provided information about our investigations that [redacted] should not have known, the book mentioned me in multiple places, and because [redacted] and [redacted] wrote a letter complaining to the Director of the FBI;
3. [redacted] management recently decided to reassign [redacted] to others including [redacted] and [redacted] believed [redacted] would continue to have contact and mismanage [redacted] causing other agents to be in inappropriate situations as I had been in the past [redacted]
4. I was scheduled to [redacted] contact [redacted], a source who was convicted and is currently in prison. I found out [redacted] was also in the process of writing a book and I feared more problems would occur and I would be in the middle of [redacted] problems again;
5. I recently began sharing my current concerns with two agents and they encouraged me to help everyone on our squad by reporting these problems to rectify the situation for all;
6. My efforts to rectify the problems have not been solved by reporting them to management; and
7. I re-read the FBI's core values and found they have not been upheld in the areas mentioned throughout this document.

Concerns For Myself

[redacted] In addition, FBIHQ from PCU to the highest levels are extremely pleased with the successes of POLAR PEN. I am concerned about possible retaliation. On 11/21/2008 I requested whistleblower protection status from my [redacted] who was my [redacted] at the time. I don't want to be punished for coming forward. I am absolutely outside my comfort zone by reporting my concerns beyond my efforts I listed in this document. Because my [redacted] was a bit unclear as to whether [redacted] granted my request for protection, I request any and all whistleblower protections available again.

Actions I have Taken

Other than the previously noted actions, I recently discussed my many concerns with two other agents within my office. They helped guide and encourage me to report this information to higher authorities. I made a few more attempts to report these violations within my command structure in [redacted]. I was unsuccessful in these attempts. I decided I was more comfortable telling a neutral, outside party about my concerns. One of the agents I spoke with provided me with the hotline number to the Office of Integrity and Compliance (OIC). I called on [redacted] The preamble to the call stated that the hotline was operated by a third party and that if my concerns involved sensitive information, that I should not provide the information to them. I then called OIC directly and spoke with [redacted] was interested in what I had to say but advised that due to the nature of my concerns, I needed to provide the information to Inspection Division or DOJ OIG. [redacted] provided me with the contact information for Inspection Division, Internal Investigation Section [redacted] At approximately [redacted], I contacted [redacted] encouraged me to write down my concerns and provide them to [redacted] for the [redacted] of complaints. I hoped my concerns could be looked into without my name being known as the one who started the mess, to avoid any possible retaliation.

[redacted] I found out that one of the agents I spoke with met with [redacted] and informed him that someone was going to report these concerns to OPR. When I returned from lunch, [redacted] spoke with me in private and told me that to protect myself, I needed to write down everything and provide it to [redacted] affirmed that I kept [redacted] informed of problems in the past but that [redacted] had forgotten a lot of what I told him. I felt I had to advise [redacted] of my contact earlier that day with [redacted] and [redacted]. I knew [redacted] was going to go talk to the [redacted] and advise him of the situation. I told [redacted] that I should tell the [redacted] my concerns. Shortly thereafter, I was called to the [redacted] office and asked to explain my concerns. I requested whistleblower protection and suggested it might not be appropriate for [redacted] or the CDC to sit in on this meeting because part of my story included them. [redacted] brought [redacted] into the office. I advised the [redacted] of my contact with [redacted] and [redacted] [redacted] was not pleased I went outside of my office's chain of command. I explained why I didn't feel comfortable using my office's command structure and how I even got the feeling from [redacted] once that made me believe it would not be smart to go to the [redacted] with these concerns. [redacted] advised me to follow the instructions [redacted] had given me but that I should have provided the information to [redacted] [redacted] told me not to discuss the concerns with others in the office and if anyone else had concerns they were to provide them to [redacted] had me immediately retrieve my notes regarding who at HQ I spoke with so [redacted] could call them and let them know [redacted] was dealing with the situation.

Ailing Stevens trial witness dies in Anchorage

ROCKY WILLIAMS: He'd been scheduled to testify by both sides.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(12/31/08 21:52:45)

Rocky Williams, the witness whose non-testimony at the trial of Sen. Ted Stevens proved as controversial as the statements of some others who did take the stand, died in Anchorage Tuesday. He was 58.

Williams was a trusted employee of Bill Allen, president of the oil-field service company Veco Corp., and oversaw Veco's extensive renovations to Stevens' home in Girdwood starting in 2000. He told the Daily News in a series of interviews last year that he worked for Veco until around 2004, when he found himself on the outs with the Allen family with little explanation.

Williams said he was approached by the FBI in 2006 and was interviewed extensively by the two main agents on the case, his contact Chad Joy and agent Mary Beth Kepner. He also testified before a federal grand jury in Anchorage, he said. He didn't feel the need to get an attorney, he said, and didn't negotiate an immunity deal.

"I've got nothing to hide. Don't worry about it a whole lot," he said.

Prosecutors flew Williams to Washington in September and announced him as a witness in Stevens' trial. Williams would potentially offer proof that Stevens got gifts from Veco that he failed to disclose on annual financial statements.

But Williams, who often professed admiration and fondness for Stevens, was also listed as a defense witness.

Without ever calling him to the stand, the government sent him to back to Alaska.

The defense said it learned of Williams' departure when he got back to Anchorage and called. They described the government's action as misconduct, but prosecutors said they were concerned about Williams' health. They didn't publicly disclose all his ailments, but Williams had symptoms of serious liver disease.

The judge was skeptical of the government's claims, questioning whether its real motive was that Williams had turned against prosecutors.

The defense cited information provided by Williams in his call to them to argue that the government overstated the hours that Williams and another high-level Veco employee, Dave Anderson, had worked on the Stevens' home.

The judge agreed the evidence was inflated and told the jury to disregard all the hours accounted by Veco for Williams and Anderson. That still left plenty of evidence that Veco had provided tens of thousands of dollars of free services and material for Stevens, who was convicted on all seven counts.

The recently disclosed FBI whistle-blower complaint, filed by an agent in the corruption investigation against at least one other agent and several Justice Department attorneys involved in the case, backs up the contention that Williams was seriously ill in Washington.

"Williams health was very poor," said the whistle-blower, whose name, along with the subjects of the complaint, was blacked out by the judge. "I requested that Williams be the first to testify so he could testify, get home, and continue to receive medical attention as necessary. I did not want him to die while we had him in Washington, D.C."

But following a mock cross-examin[illegible]n, a prosecutor decided against calli[illegible] Williams and used the health issue to send him home, the whistle-blower said.

"I advised ... and others multiple times that they should advise the defense counsel and the judge before executing their plan," the whistle-blower said. "I was ignored. They had me send Williams home. The defense and judge found out, were very angry, and suggested prosecutorial misconduct had occurred."

Williams lived in south Anchorage since 1977 in an old trailer crammed with tools and boxes of personal belongings. A manager at the trailer court said a relative paid the rent on Monday because Williams was hospitalized. The relative said doctors didn't give him long to live.

Bush pardon for Stevens isn't out of the question

UNCLEAR: But so far, the senator hasn't asked for presidential clemency.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

FBI - Stevens-2361

(11/26/08 22:44:50)

WASHINGTON -- With President George W. Bush issuing a round of pardons this week and presumed to grant as many as two more rounds before he leaves office, it raises the question: Will Sen. Ted Stevens ask for one?

The 85-year-old Republican senator was convicted Oct. 27 by a federal jury on seven counts of lying on his financial disclosure forms. After a cliffhanger of an election that took two weeks to count, Stevens last week lost the Senate seat he had held for 40 years. With his sentencing looming sometime early in 2009, Stevens faces as much as five years in prison on each corruption count.

But it's unclear whether Stevens even intends to ask for a pardon -- and the prospect of Bush circumventing his customary clemency procedures to pardon Stevens is unlikely. It's even less likely under a Democratic president.

However, Stevens has pressed forward with an appeal of his conviction. During his farewell speech on the Senate floor last week, Stevens made it clear he intends to continue his appeal, saying he can "still see the day when I can remove the cloud that currently surrounds me." And just last week his lawyers continued their attack on the conduct of prosecutors in the case by asking for a hearing, scheduled for Monday, to examine a claim by one of the witnesses against Stevens that he was lying on the stand about an immunity deal.

Stevens also told a pack of news media, "No, no, no," when asked the day he lost the election whether he would seek a pardon, but his spokesman, Aaron Saunders, said he wasn't saying "no" to the idea. The outgoing Alaska senator was simply declining to answer the question, Saunders said.

Later that same day, when asked by the Daily News to clarify his remarks, Stevens didn't rule out seeking a pardon. "That's something that's beyond me," he said, waving his hands as though to push the question aside. "That's beyond me."

Wev Shea, the U.S. attorney for Alaska between 1990 and 1993 and a Stevens supporter, said he hasn't spoken to him about a pardon. But he encourages Stevens to seek one -- and also urges him to continue to appeal his conviction.

"Should he? He absolutely should seek a pardon," Shea said. "If I were counsel to him, I would encourage him. I strongly believe President Bush should pardon Senator Stevens."

If Stevens were to seek a pardon, it would not be through the traditional path, which can take years. Stevens "hasn't submitted an application for any sort of clemency" to the Justice Department's Office of the Pardon Attorney, said Laura Sweeney, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department. Typically, any applicants start with the Justice Department, although its pardon office doesn't even look at requests from those who have been convicted but not yet sentenced.

However, the president has broad constitutional authority to issue pardons and could act outside the scope of the process if he so chooses.

Bush circumvented the Office of the Pardon Attorney last year when he commuted the sentence of Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff. Libby had faced a 2½-year sentence for lying and obstructing justice in the CIA leak case, and by having his sentence commuted, he avoided serving prison time. Bush did not issue Libby a full pardon, though at the time he would not rule out doing so at a later date.

But [redacted] elected official whose conviction and eventual sentencing on corruption charges could be seen as a cautionary tale to other officeholders, Stevens might be out of luck. So far, Bush has been a reluctant pardoner, and lawyers who have been watching the process say that he's unlikely to change his practices in the final days of his presidency. Few of his pardons, with the notable exception of Libby, have been of high-profile people.

The White House wouldn't comment.

"We never comment on pardons," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino. "People who are eligible to apply for a pardon can do so through the pardon attorney at the Department of Justice. And we don't comment on the deliberations that are under way."

Monday, Bush granted 14 pardons and commuted two sentences. Including the most recent, he has pardoned just 171 people and commuted eight sentences since taking office.

That's fewer than half the pardons granted by former president Bill Clinton, who drew criticism for an undisciplined end-of-term pardon spree that led to congressional investigations. Overall, Clinton pardoned 396 people and commuted 61 sentences.

Of those, Clinton's pardon of former Arizona governor Fife Symington bears comparison with Stevens, said clemency expert Daniel Kobil, a law professor at Capital University in Columbus, Ohio.

Symington resigned after a jury found him guilty in 1997 of having defrauded lenders in his previous career as real estate developer. His conviction was overturned on appeal and Clinton pardoned him in the final days of his administration in 2001.

Kobil said it would be unsurprising for Stevens to pursue multiple avenues to clear his name, including a traditional appeal of his conviction and an attempt to seek a pardon. Forty years as a senator gives him access to decision-makers that ordinary people don't have, Kobil said.

"Given his obvious political connections, he might have a shot at going directly to the White House," Kobil said. "I certainly wouldn't rule it out if I was his attorney. I would try to use back-channel ways. He's got to go right to the top."

Is a presidential pardon in the cards for Ted Stevens?

FBI - Stevens-2363

State Sen. John Cowdery, elected to six terms in the Alaska Legislature and the state's oldest active lawmaker, announced Thursday he intends to plead guilty Friday to one count of conspiracy to commit bribery and extortion.

Cowdery was facing a two-count indictment and was scheduled to be tried on the federal charges in March.

Kevin Fitzgerald, Cowdery's attorney, said Thursday evening that the government would drop the second count, a bribery charge, in return for the guilty plea.

Cowdery will appear in court this morning to officially enter his change of plea.

As part of the deal, the government will recommend to U.S. District Judge Ralph Beistline that Cowdery, 78, be sentenced to home confinement and not prison, Fitzgerald said. Cowdery is in poor health and appeared at a hearing earlier this week in a wheelchair.

The government will also recommend a fine in the range of $7,500 to $75,000, Fitzgerald said.

Cowdery, a Republican who has represented parts of the Anchorage Hillside and Lake Otis Parkway area, was first elected to a two-year term in the House in 1982 at a time when the Republicans were just beginning a leadership reign that continues today. He ran again in 1996 and was elected to two consecutive two-year House terms. In 2000, he won a two-year Senate seat and was re-elected in 2002 and 2004. Facing the federal investigation and then indictment in July, he chose not to seek re-election this year.

Cowdery was in his legislative office in downtown Anchorage on Aug. 31, 2006, when a squad of federal agents descended on the building. His office was one of the targets of the search warrants being executed by the agents.

Cowdery, then using a walker, met with agents in a conference room, then shuffled back to his own office surrounded by reporters. Asked by one whether he was under investigation, Cowdery replied, "I don't think so."

But Cowdery's name figured prominently in the investigation and in some of the early corruption trials involving other lawmakers. Bill Allen, the government's lead witness, has described him as a friend and a man with a similar background in the construction business.

Allen has pleaded guilty to bribing a host of legislators and is one of Cowdery's alleged coconspirators in an effort to bribe another state senator. That senator, identified in Cowdery's indictment as "State Senator A," didn't take the money -- $25,000 in illegal campaign donations -- and hasn't been charged.

- 936 194A-AN-13620-M

Senator A has been identified in media accounts as Sen. Donny Olson, D-Nome, who was running for lieutenant governor in 2006. Olson told reporters he was cooperating with the federal investigation.

Like the cases against other state legislators, the charge against Cowdery involved Allen's effort to win favorable oil-tax legislation for the state's oil producers in 2006.

If Cowdery's plea proceeds as planned this morning, he will the 10th person convicted in the federal public corruption investigation with one other legislator, former Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, R-Juneau, awaiting trial. U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, and three legislators have been found guilty by juries, while the rest have pleaded guilty.

The government says its investigation is continuing. One other alleged member of Cowdery's conspiracy, identified in Cowdery's indictment as "State Senator B," has not been charged. His description matches that of a legislator previously identified as a subject of the federal investigation, former Sen. President Ben Stevens, Ted Stevens' son. Ben Stevens has denied wrongdoing.

When Cowdery's indictment was announced July 10, a number of officials, including Gov. Sarah Palin, asked him to resign for the good of the state. He refused and was supported in his defiance by Senate President Lyda Green, R-Wasilla, and other lawmakers.

Weimar goes to prison; Montana spread for sale

ARIZONA: His plan was to bring Alaska prisoners back to serve time closer to home.

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com

(01/06/09 22:24:46)

Bill Weimar, once king of Alaska's halfway houses, this week began serving a six-month prison sentence in Arizona for two federal felonies.

And back in Montana, where he's lived for years, his estate overlooking Flathead Lake is on the market for $5.25 million.

Weimar, 68, reported to U.S. Penitentiary Tucson on Monday, a spokeswoman for the federal Bureau of Prisons said. The prison is high security, but he's at the nearby minimum-security prison camp, said his attorney, David Bukey of Seattle.

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick had recommended that Weimar serve his time at a federal prison in Sheridan, Ore., the closest one to Alaska. The prison bureau assigned him to Tucson; Weimar never requested to go there, Bukey said.

Weimar pleaded guilty in August to conspiracy and a financial charge related to his funneling money in 2004 to a political consultant for a state Senate candidate, knowing the candidate would back a private prison if he won. The candidate hasn't been named in court documents but matches the description of former Sen. Jerry Ward, who in 2004 made an unsuccessful bid to regain the seat he lost two years before.

In November, Weimar was sentenced to six months in prison, followed by six months of home detention and two years of probation. Sedwick also ordered Weimar to pay a $75,000 fine, noting he had "substantial annual income and net worth." A court filing summarizing his finances was sealed.

Weimar's spread in Big Arm, Mont., includes a six-bedroom home, two-bedroom caretaker's cottage, indoor shooting and archery ranges, equestrian center, two-lane bowling alley, heated swimming pool, racquetball and tennis courts and helipad, all on 60 acres.

"It's definitely an amazing property," said Missoula-based broker Jennifer Bertland, one of the listing agents. "It's set up to be your own little world, which is great because in this part of western Montana, you kind of need that."

Weimar had been living in Montana awhile and was ready to move on, Bertland said. Beyond that, she said, she couldn't talk about his personal life.

The estate has been on the market since early 2008, she said. They originally priced it at $9.75 million but with the economy in a slump, they reduced the price a few weeks ago. It usually takes a few years to sell a multimillion-dollar property, she said.

The Weimar place is at the end of a road with a top-of-the-world view of Flathead Lake, Wild Horse Island and the Mission Mountains.

"People that have these properties, they want to be tucked away," Bertland said.

In Alaska, Weimar was a leader in an effort to build a private prison here. The private prison group said the project would bring home hundreds of Alaska inmates being housed in Arizona because of crowding in state prisons. The project never happened.

Ex-state representative Weyhrauch plans appeal of court ruling

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com
(01/07/09 22:17:58)

Former state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch plans to appeal an appeals court ruling against him to the U.S. Supreme Court, his lawyer, Doug Pope of Anchorage, said Wednesday.

The issue is whether Weyhrauch should have disclosed his efforts to seek legal work from the defunct oil-field services company Veco Corp. regardless of whether state law specifically required that.

In Weyhrauch's case, prosecutors say, he was soliciting a Veco job at the same time he was voting on an oil tax pushed by Veco's chief executive, Bill Allen. Prosecutors argue that a failure to disclose what they describe as a conflict of interest amounts to honest services fraud, a federal offense.

But the defense says that imposes a higher standard of conduct than in state law, which doesn't specifically require disclosure in those circumstances.

Weyhrauch was indicted in May 2007 on bribery, extortion, fraud and conspiracy charges.

In November, a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that prosecutors can move forward with their theory of fraud.

Weyhrauch then asked for the entire appeals court to reconsider. On Wednesday, the three-judge panel denied Weyhrauch's petition for a rehearing, setting the stage for him to go to the Supreme Court.

Whistle-blower agent ID'd in Stevens case

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
Anchorage Daily News
(01/14/09 12:24:13)

WASHINGTON -- The FBI agent who complained about misconduct and unethical behavior in the investigation and prosecution leading up to Sen. Ted Stevens' conviction on corruption charges is Chad Joy, court officials revealed today.

Joy's name was released during a court hearing to determine whether to release to the public additional blacked-out sections of the agent's whistle-blower complaint about alleged misconduct by federal investigators and prosecutors.

Justice Department prosecutors, who initially fought even allowing the complaint to be made public, during the hearing asked for an even more revealing version of the document to be filed. Their aim was to make it easier to respond to a motion filed by Stevens' lawyers to dismiss the case -- or to win a new trial.

"For practical purposes, it's going to be difficult to respond to the motion to dismiss using pseudonyms," said William Welch, head of the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section.

Stevens' defense team has always sought to make the whole document public, as part of their post-conviction effort to overturn the former senator's conviction.

During Wednesday's hearing, Welch also told U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan that Joy's name could be revealed because the agent didn't qualify for whistle-blower status under federal guidelines.

That surprised the judge, who wanted to know when exactly the Justice Department attorney on the case knew that Joy wasn't granted whistle-blower status. Had he known that during a secret hearing last month when they first discussed the matter, Sullivan said, he would have treated it much differently. He would have been less inclined to release a heavily redacted version of the complaint, Sullivan said.

"I would have done things completely differently had I known he'd been denied status," Sullivan said. "It would have made a significant difference."

Brenda Morris, the lead prosecutor in Stevens' case, said she was unaware of the exact date that they learned he didn't have whistle-blower status -- but said she had to seek the information out herself. She also indicated that it was a matter she had some discomfort with, because it was being handled by the Justice Department's internal investigative unit, the Office of Professional Responsibility.

"We didn't have any contact with Agent Joy, we still haven't," Morris said, then covered her mouth with her hand, as though she had revealed too much.

FBI - Stevens-2369

Sullivan, who frequently displayed annoyance with the Justice Department's handling of the case during the trial, ordered Morris and Welch to seek a signed declaration by the attorney general detailing exactly what the attorneys knew -- and when -- about Joy's whistle-blower status.

"I want a paper trail and I want an information trail," he said.

Prosecutors admit error

STEVENS CASE: "whistle-blower status" causes turmoil.

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com

(01/15/09 23:46:16)

On Wednesday, federal prosecutors revealed that Anchorage FBI agent Chad Joy was the person alleging misconduct in the Ted Stevens corruption investigation and also said he had been "denied whistle-blower status."

On Thursday, they told the judge they were wrong on the second point.

A document filed in court late Thursday reveals the latest misstep for the prosecution in the case of former U.S. Sen. Stevens, convicted last year of seven felonies for failing to reveal gifts on federal financial disclosure forms.

Joy has accused another agent, Mary Beth Kepner, of becoming too close to witnesses, accepting "things of value," and compromising the investigation by revealing too much information to outsiders, including her husband.

He also accused Nicholas Marsh, a federal trial attorney with the Public Integrity Section, of trying to keep critical evidence and witnesses from the Stevens defense. For example, Joy wrote that Marsh came up with a scheme to send a witness who was ailing and in Washington, D.C., for the trial back to Alaska without telling the defense or the judge, even though the defense had subpoenaed the same witness.

Joy's complaint is quickly becoming a central element of efforts by Stevens for a new trial.

In December, prosecutors alerted U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan to Joy's complaint but wanted it withheld from Stevens and his lawyers, as well as the public. The judge ordered that it be provided to the Stevens team in its entirety but ruled that most names and other identifying details should be blacked out from the copy made public.

At Wednesday's hearing, the judge was angered when prosecutors told him that Joy didn't qualify for whistle-blower status. Had he known that earlier, he would have handled the complaint differently last year, he said. He ordered a new version released with most of the deleted information restored.

"I want to know what your office knew and when," Sullivan demanded at the hearing. He ordered that Attorney General Michael Mukasey sign a declaration under oath concerning who knew what when about Joy's whistle-blower status.

But on Thursday, prosecutors admitted they got that part wrong and are asking that the judge back off his order for Mukasey to get involved.

"Government counsel was mistaken; they had misconstrued a letter sent to Agent Joy by OPR," Patty Merkamp Stemler, chief of the U.S. Justice Department's criminal appeals section, wrote. "We apologize for this error."

"OPR" refers to the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility. In the Dec. 4 letter to Joy, the office said it would investigate his complaint but also said it didn't have jurisdiction to investigate whether he was "entitled to relief as an aggrieved whistle-blower."

That authority only kicks in when an employee alleges reprisal, and Joy hadn't done that, H. Marshall Jarrett, counsel for the office, wrote in the letter. If he is subjected to or threatened with reprisal, the office would reconsider, Jarrett wrote.

194A-AN-13620-M e

An expert in whistle-blower law interviewed later Thursday said that there is no such thing as "whistle-blower status."

Someone who files such a complaint is by definition a whistle-blower, said Michael Kohn, general counsel for the National Whistleblowers Center, in Washington, D.C. The protections don't kick in unless the person suffers retaliation on the job, such as a bad evaluation, demotion or firing, Kohn said.

Whistle-blowers in general tend to get lumped in with the subgroup who are retaliated against because that's what so often happens, Kohn said

"A common misconception is that whistle-blowers get some sort of status and that they can't be discriminated against or harmed in their workplace when, in fact, it's just the opposite," Kohn said.

"Once you are identified as a whistle-blower, you essentially get a target put on your back because the protections are so anemic," he said.

Even if a fired whistle-blower wins a case, the most the employee gets is back pay and the job back -- there are no punitive damages, he said.

He hadn't been following the whistle-blower complaint in the Stevens case, but he said that around the country the FBI has treated whistle-blowers poorly. In fact, FBI agents or officials who retaliate against whistle-blowers tend to be promoted up the ranks, he said. The nonprofit center has represented hundreds of whistle-blowers over the years, including some FBI agents, he said.

Joy had requested "whistle-blower protection status."

"I don't want to be punished for coming forward," Joy wrote in the complaint. He also said, "I hoped my concerns could be looked into without my name being known as the one who started the mess, to avoid any possible retaliation."

There are no specific confidentiality protections for whistle-blowers, though complaints aren't automatically public, either, Kohn said.

Stevens trial judge orders explanation from Mukasey

WASHINGTON -- Seemingly stunned by the conduct of the Justice Department in the weeks following former Sen. Ted Stevens' trial, the judge in the case today ordered U.S. Attorney General Michael Mukasey to provide an accounting for how his prosecutors handled a whistle-blower complaint last month.

By 5 p.m. Saturday, Mukasey or his designate must turn the so-called "declaration" about who knew what and when about the whistle-blower status of an FBI agent who criticized the government's handling of the case, ordered U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan on Friday.

"This court is very sensitive to the extremely important, numerous, and competeing demands made on high-level government officials such as the attorney general, and therefore the court does not ordinarily burden officials at that level with matters that can be addressed by others," Sullivan wrote.

"However, based on the record in this case and the appearance that several attorneys in this matter -- in multiple departments within the Department of Justice -- may have intentionally withheld important information from the court, it is the court's view that a declaration from an official at the highest levels of the Department of Justice is appropriate and warranted in this instance."

Kott loses bid to leave prison

Anchorage Daily News
(12/31/08 21:29:02)

A federal judge has turned down former Alaska House Speaker Pete Kott's bid to get out of prison while he appeals his conviction last year on corruption charges.

In his decision, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick wrote that Kott had waited too long to make the request, without good reason.

"To put these concerns in context, it must be noted that if Kott may wait for 10 months after his conviction to file a motion in the trial court without any explanation or justification for the delay, every defendant convicted in any United States District Court could do the same thing," Sedwick wrote.

Kott's lawyer had argued that the former legislator isn't likely to flee, isn't a danger and has a good chance of winning on appeal.

A federal jury convicted Kott in September 2007 of bribery, conspiracy and extortion for his role in advocating an oil tax pushed by Veco Corp. executives and favored by North Slope oil producers. He received nearly $9,000, a political poll for his re-election campaign and the promise of a lobbying job, all from Veco executives, according to trial testimony.

Kott, 59, is serving his sentence at the Federal Correctional Institution in Sheridan, Ore.

A Justice Department official said nothing was filed because the government appealed the unusual order on Friday by U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan directing Attorney General Michael Mukasey to account for the agent's complaint. A stay of Sullivan's order was granted in the District of Columbia Circuit Court of Appeals, said the official, who spoke on the condition of not being identified by name.

A copy of the appeal or the stay couldn't be obtained independently from the court on Saturday. With pre-inaugural plans and events taking over Washington, the normally difficult job of finding official information on a Saturday became nearly impossible.

Sullivan, the trial judge in whose courtroom former Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, was convicted in October of felony disclosure violations, has been dealing with a number of post-trial issues, including the complaint by FBI agent Chad Joy. Joy, one of the agents investigating political corruption in Alaska, asserted that the lead agent in the case engaged in unethical and possible illegal activities during the investigation. He also charged that Justice Department attorneys intentionally withheld information that Stevens' lawyers were entitled to.

Sullivan said he was dissatisfied with explanations from prosecutors about how Joy's complaint was handled and demanded a sworn statement from Mukasey himself or one of his top deputies.

Murkowski seeks pardon for Stevens

By RICHARD MAUER / rmauer@adn.com

With less than 48 hours left of the Bush presidency, U.S. Sen. Lisa Murkowski's spokesman said today that Murkowski had asked the White House to pardon the former senior senator of Alaska, Ted Stevens. Michael Brumas, Murkowski's communications director, said the pardon request was made earlier this month. He declined to give other details, including whether Stevens himself wanted the pardon and had asked Murkowski to pursue it on his behalf. "It's just a very sensitive issue and a sensitive time - a couple days left," Brumas said. "We're just not saying anything more."

Stevens, a Republican, was convicted in Washington, D.C., Oct. 27 of seven felony charges of failing to disclose gifts and services he received from 2000 to 2006. A week later, Alaska voters turned him out of office in November after 40 years in the Senate.

Stevens is asking for a new trial, alleging prosecutorial misconduct, juror misconduct and other issues. A hearing is scheduled next month, but would be rendered moot by a pardon.

Stevens, 85, had vowed to continue to fight the charges and said he would appeal if he doesn't get a new trial.

In a recent interview, former Gov. Bill Sheffield said he had heard that several people had asked the White House for a pardon for Stevens, but that Stevens himself wasn't among him.

While Sheffield is a Democrat, he has been close to Stevens over the years and held and participated in numerous fundraisers for him. "I've been told that he said he'll never ask for a pardon," Sheffield said. "I don't think he wants one. I think he's going to want to clear his name with an appeal."

Stevens has maintained a low profile since he lost the election to former Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich.

Sheffield said he hasn't talked to Stevens but has received several notes from him in recent weeks. The only thing Stevens said about his case was that he was working on his appeal, Sheffield said.

"He's living in Washington, D.C. He's trying to go through his papers and everything, because he can't leave there because he's got to be close to his attorneys," Sheffield said. "He's trying to go through his papers, get the boxes out of the office and get them someplace. There's a ton of work, you know."

After his election, Begich said that Stevens shouldn't serve jail time, but wouldn't talk about a possible pardon.

The Constitution grants the president nearly unlimited discretion in asserting his power of pardon and clemency.

President-elect Barack Obama is due to be sworn into office in ceremonies that begin at 10 a.m. Tuesday.

In his final speech to the Senate, Stevens vowed to "remove the cloud" surrounding him. He later told reporters he would not seek a pardon, but also didn't rule out the possibility he would later.

"We don't expect any more" pardons and commutations, Stuart Siciliano said.

A pardon essentially erases a crime from a defendant's record, while a commutation of sentence lessens the punishment. Both types of leniency are afforded under the Constitution through a president's clemency powers.

In one of his last acts as president, Bush on Monday commuted the sentences of two former Border Patrol agents convicted in a 2005 shooting.

U.S. Sen. Lisa Murkowski had sought a pardon for her former colleague. Her press secretary, Michael Brumas, said the senator was traveling on Monday and he didn't know whether she had been notified one way or another.

Whether Stevens himself wanted a pardon is unclear. Stevens was convicted in October of seven federal felonies over his failure to report gifts on required Senate disclosure forms. His lawyers are pushing to have the case thrown out or, at the least, win Stevens a new trial. He intends to appeal if those efforts before the trial judge are unsuccessful.

On Monday, Bob Penney, a close friend of Stevens, said he doubted that the former senator wanted to erase his record through a presidential pardon.

"I don't believe Sen. Stevens is looking for or has asked for a pardon. I believe his intent is to prove himself innocent," Penney said from his winter home in California.

Penney said that's his opinion based his knowledge of "the stature of the man," not on anything specific Stevens has said.

"He's going to prove himself innocent. He feels he's been aggrieved, and I certainly do agree," Penney said.

The criminal case has become mired in allegations of government misconduct. One of the FBI agents in the ongoing federal investigation into political corruption has filed a complaint accusing a prosecutor of withholding information that the defense was entitled to see before the trial. The agent, Chad Joy, also has accused the lead agent in the corruption investigation of becoming too close to sources and accepting "things of value," including a painting of her dog and help with house-hunting.

Efforts to reach Stevens were unsuccessful. His daughter Beth said in an e-mail that she relayed a request for an interview to her father and "he had no comment."

Brumas declined to say whether Murkowski consulted with Stevens before seeking the pardon. He also wouldn't say how Murkowski communicated the request to the president.

"It's kind of a sensitive time right now so we are not commenting," Brumas said.

The pardon request did not go through the federal Office of the Pardon Attorney, but rather went directly to Bush, as many do.

In his eight years in office, President Bush has been sparing in his use of clemency, granting fewer requests than any two-term president in modern times.

Bush's action Monday commuted the sentences of two former Border Patrol agents. They are serving prison time after being convicted of assault for shooting an unarmed, fleeing drug smuggler in the buttocks, then trying to cover up what they had done, according to news reports. The border agents are now to be released from prison in March when they still had years left to serve, the Justice Department said in a prepared statement.

Technically, Bush could act on clemency matters until 8 a.m. today Alaska time, when Barack Obama is due to be sworn in as president.

Murkowski initiated failed bid for pardon

UNSOLICITED: Friends of ex-senator say he wants to clear name.

By RICHARD MAUER

FBI - Stevens-2380

(01/20/09 22:20:33)

The Bush administration came to an end Tuesday, and with it went the chance of a pardon for Alaska's most powerful political figure since statehood, Ted Stevens.

Stevens, the longest-serving Republican senator until his defeat in November, is now left to fight his conviction in the courts.

According to his friends, that's exactly how he wants it.

When Stevens was indicted July 29 on seven counts of lying on his financial disclosures statements, he demanded the earliest trial date possible, asserting he would be declared not guilty in time to face the voters for his seventh full term. That plan collapsed Oct. 27 when a District of Columbia jury convicted him on all counts.

"It's not over yet!" Stevens declared as he walked out of the courtroom. But his 40-year career representing Alaska in Washington, D.C., was doomed. Former Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich, a Democrat, defeated him a week later.

Lisa Murkowski, a Republican who has taken Stevens' place as the senior senator from Alaska, sought the pardon from Bush in a letter to the White House on Jan. 7. Whether others also petitioned the president on behalf of Stevens couldn't be determined.

Murkowski's plea surfaced last weekend, but she declined to make her letter public, fearing it could somehow backfire in the waning hours of the Bush presidency. When a pardon was rendered moot with Barack Obama's swearing-in Tuesday, she released the text. Through her spokesman, she declined an interview request.

"Senator Stevens has indicated that he does not intend to seek a pardon," Murkowski said in her letter. "I am pursuing this request, on my own initiative, in the interest of justice and out of compassion for a man who has served our Nation and the State of Alaska with great distinction for all of his adult life."

Two friends of Stevens, former Gov. Bill Sheffield and developer and sportfishing advocate Bob Penney, said in recent interviews that Stevens wanted to fight to clear his name. They said they believed that Stevens wouldn't want a pardon because it would short-circuit his efforts to get his charges thrown out or to win a new trial. Stevens worried that a pardon would forever cloud his legacy, they said, even as it would keep him safe from prison and spare him a felony record.

Murkowski noted Stevens' desires in her letter to Bush, and explained why she was going ahead anyway.

"Senator Stevens' efforts to protect his rights might cause some to suggest it is premature to consider a pardon. In this instance I submit that the equities weigh heavily in favor of a pardon. Senator Stevens is 85 years old. Further proceedings in the courts will be lengthy and costly. It is not unreasonable to suggest that they could dominate Senator Stevens' attention for the remainder of his life."

Murkowski said Stevens could more productively be engaged with "chronicling his extraordinary life of public service for the benefit of generations to come than continue to pursue justice in an adversarial environment."

With the pardon off the table, Stevens' case continues to bump through the courts. The post-trial phase has been particularly messy, with one FBI agent accusing another agent and Stevens' prosecutors of unethical and possibly illegal conduct, a key witness saying he gave false testimony, and revelations that one juror ducked out of the case to attend a horse race in California only to be replaced by another who wrote a tell-all blog with uncomplimentary nicknames for most of the trial participants.

The case is proceeding on at least three tracks. Stevens' lawyers have filed a 78-page motion for dismissal of the charges or a new trial, alleging prosecutorial and juror misconduct, errors by the judge, and other issues. The government responded with an 80-page rebuttal, asserting the trial was fair and the evidence against Stevens compelling. Arguments on those motions are scheduled for Feb. 25 before the trial judge, Emmet Sullivan, though some filing deadlines have already slipped.

Related to the motions is an effort by Stevens to uncover facts about the witness who said he testified falsely, though that testimony, about an alleged deal for his cooperation, didn't bear directly on the case itself. The Stevens legal team also wants to question officials and witnesses under oath about the allegations in the complaint by the FBI agent, Chad Joy. How that will be handled is the subject of another hearing before Sullivan Jan. 29. The defense hopes he orders a full-blown evidentiary hearing that would run like a mini trial.

A third matter is now before the Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. The Justice Department is appealing an order from Sullivan directing the attorney general to account for how Joy's complaint was handled in the weeks before it became public. Sullivan complaint about getting conflicting stories from different prosecutors and ordered Michael Mukasey or a deputy to respond by last Saturday with an official account.

In a petition filed Saturday, the Justice Department asked the circuit court to intervene, saying the time allowance was too short and that the attorney general was the wrong person to supply the answers.

The appellate court stayed Sullivan's order and directed a written response by Stevens' lawyers to be hand-filed by noon Friday eastern time and a reply by the government not later than 4 p.m. Monday.

Stevens judge says statement not needed

Anchorage Daily News
(01/21/09 21:07:02)

WASHINGTON, D.C. -- The judge in Ted Stevens' false-disclosure case reversed himself Wednesday and said neither the attorney general nor any other top level Justice Department official would be required to give a sworn statement about an Anchorage FBI agent's whistle-blower complaint.

Instead, U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan ordered in Washington that the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section provide him and Stevens' lawyers with all its communications related to the agent's complaint. The material, due Jan. 29, will be filed under seal, Sullivan ruled, preventing public disclosure.

The FBI complaint, by agent Chad Joy, has clouded Stevens' conviction on seven counts of failing to disclose gifts and services over six years. Joy alleged that the public corruption investigation in Alaska was tainted by another agent's improper source handling, and that prosecutors in Stevens' trial knowingly withheld evidence that Stevens was entitled to see.

Sullivan has complained that he has gotten multiple and contradictory answers from prosecutors as he sought to unravel the status of Joy's complaint. Last week, he demanded answers from the outgoing attorney general himself or one of his top deputies.

The Justice Department appealed Sullivan's order and got an emergency stay Saturday from the District of Columbia Circuit Court of Appeals until the issue could be heard. Prosecutors said that they had no objection to providing Sullivan the information, but that the attorney general had no direct knowledge of the Joy complaint and in any event had his hands full with security and other matters related to the Obama inauguration.

Now that Sullivan has withdrawn his order, the appeal appears to be moot.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, v. THEODORE F. STEVENS, Defendant.	)	No. 08-cr-231 (EGS)

SENATOR STEVENS'S MOTION TO DISMISS THE INDICTMENT; OR, IN THE ALTERNATIVE, MOTION FOR A NEW TRIAL, DISCOVERY, AND AN EVIDENTIARY HEARING

A complaint submitted by FBI Agent Chad Joy now confirms what the defense has long believed and alleged: the government cheated and lied in order to obtain a verdict against Senator Ted Stevens. Agent Joy is in a position to know, as he was the "co-case agent," with responsibility to "co-manage the case." Dkt. 262 at 1. Agent Joy reports "many serious problems . . . encountered in the recent trial of U.S. Senator Ted Stevens" and that he "witnessed or learned of serious violations of policy, rules, and procedures as well as possible criminal violations" by members of the prosecution team. Id. These serious violations include fostering an improper relationship with the government's star witness (whom the defense contends fabricated the most important testimony in the case), intentionally withholding exculpatory information from the defense, and scheming to keep an important witness away from the defense after the government's attempts to prepare that witness to testify went badly. Agent Joy's complaint shows unmistakably that government representatives lied to the Court or stood by silently while other members of the prosecution team represented facts to the Court that simply were not true.

Of course, government misconduct was known to the defense and the Court even before Agent Joy's revelations. The Court has already found that the government used "documents that the government [knew were] false, not true." Tr. (Oct. 8, 2008, p.m.), at 57. And the Court has found that the government intentionally violated Rule 16 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure by withholding relevant bank records from the defense. Compl. ¶ 9.b; Tr. (Oct. 8, 2008, p.m.), at 26-29. Indeed, as the defense pointed out in its objection to the government's motion for reconsideration,

> The pattern is unmistakable. Over and over again the government has been caught in false representations and otherwise failing to perform its duties under the Constitution and the Rules. And over and over again, when caught, the government has claimed that it has simply made good faith mistakes. When the government failed to produce Rocky Williams's exculpatory grand jury testimony, the government claimed that this testimony was immaterial. Dkt. 105. When the government sent Mr. Williams back to Alaska without advising the defense or the Court, the government asserted that it was acting in "good faith." Dkt. 105-4. When the government affirmatively redacted exculpatory statements from FBI Form 302s, it claimed that "it was just a mistake." Tr. (Oct. 2, 2008, a.m., at 19; see also Tr. (Oct. 2, 2008, p.m.), at 27, 29. When government counsel told the Court that Allen had not been re-interviewed the day before a hearing on its Brady disclosures, this was a "mistaken understanding." Dkt. 134 at 15. When the government failed to turn over exculpatory statements from Dave Anderson, it claimed that they were immaterial. Tr. (Oct. 8, 2008, p.m.), at 58, 62, 64, 67. When the government failed to turn over a critical grand jury transcript containing exculpatory information, it claimed that it was "inadvertent." Tr. (Oct. 6, 2008, p.m.), at 95. When the government used "business records" that the government undeniably knew were false, it said that it was unintentional. Tr. (Oct. 8, 2008, p.m.), at 76. When the government failed to produce the bank records of Bill Allen and then sprang them on the defense, it claimed this check was immaterial to the defense. Tr. (Oct. 8, 2008, a.m.), at 3.

Defense Opposition at 2-3 (quoted by the Court in its Order of January 16, 2009, Dkt. 268). Agent Joy's complaint reveals that the prosecution's misconduct was far more pervasive than previously revealed. It also reveals that the prosecution's misconduct was born of bad faith. As the Court has noted, "[i]f the complaint provides information that was not available to the Court [during trial], and/or information that contradicts the government's representations to the Court at the time, that information could obviously bear on the integrity or result of the trial." Dkt. 255 at 22. As described below, the Joy complaint provides exactly this kind of new information, showing both that the government's misconduct was worse and more extensive than previously known, and that the government lied to the Court about it.

This has been a case of prosecution by any means necessary, which should not be condoned by the Court. The Court should exercise its power to dismiss this indictment. As Judge Black found in United States v. Omni International Corporation, 634 F.Supp. 1414, 1438 (D. Md. 1986), a case litigated by Senator Stevens's senior trial counsel, the supervisory power doctrine "is designed and invoked primarily to preserve the integrity of the judicial system." In this case, though the Court labored to try to provide a fair trial, the Court necessarily had to rely on the integrity of the government, and it is now clear that the government's prosecution of Senator Stevens lacked integrity. A federal election has been irreversibly affected. It is too late to change that. But it is not too late to impose a sanction that lets the government know that this kind of conduct will not be tolerated in the future.

At the very least, Senator Stevens is entitled to a new trial – this time with the benefit of all of the information to which he was entitled the first time. And Senator Stevens is entitled at the least to a new trial in which his defense lawyers are not required to devote enormous amounts of time and other resources to attempting vainly to extract from the government information and materials to which any defendant is entitled.

While Agent Joy's complaint informs the Court of all it should need to know in order to dismiss this case, it would appear that there is still much that the defense and the Court do not know. Only discovery and an evidentiary hearing could hope to uncover the full truth. After such discovery and an evidentiary hearing, the Court could assess whether the defense has finally received all of the information and materials to which it was entitled or whether the government's failure to maintain proper records and evidence (as reported by Agent Joy) has made it impossible for Senator Stevens ever to receive a fair trial.

AGENT JOY'S COMPLAINT

Agent Joy filed an administrative complaint sometime before December 2, 2008. The complaint sets forth Agent Joy's observations of misconduct by members of the prosecution team, apparently over a long period of time. Though Agent Joy witnessed these events as they happened – and other members of the prosecution team either witnessed or participated in them – Senator Stevens did not learn of his observations or opinion about them until December 11, 2008 – 46 days after the jury returned its verdict. By that time, Agent Joy had submitted his complaint to government officials outside the prosecution team, and the government had no choice but to reveal it to the defense as Brady material.[1]

While Agent Joy's complaint speaks for itself, the information highlighted below is particularly noteworthy.

1. Improper Relationship with Bill Allen. Bill Allen was the government's star witness. Allen's testimony that Bob Persons told Allen that Senator Stevens was just "covering his ass" when he requested a bill from Allen was the most important evidence in the case. As set forth in Senator Stevens's Motion for a New Trial, Dkt. 249, at pages 36-39, the defense contends that Allen recently fabricated this testimony. There was no reference to it in any government interview memorandum relating to Allen. It is inconsistent with other information provided by Allen during the investigation. The government never asked Bob Persons about it, and the government had to prod this testimony out of Allen.

[1] Even then, the government saw fit to wait until after Senator Stevens's December 5 deadline for filing post-trial motions had passed before disclosing Agent Joy's complaint. Agent Joy's complaint is undated, but the government admits that the Office of Public Integrity learned of it no later than December 2.

The government knew, but the defense did not know, that a member of the prosecution team had fostered an inappropriate relationship with Allen and was meeting with Allen in a hotel room with nobody else present. Compl. ¶ 1.h.i. Indeed, Agent Joy strongly suggests that the inappropriate relationship was sexual. He reports that "most recently, Kepner met with Allen by herself in her hotel room in Washington D.C.," and Kepner "ignored" Joy's warnings "not to do that again." Id. Agent Joy further alleges that Kepner "wore a skirt for Allen" on the day that he was to testify. "Kepner does not wear skirts. She advised it was a surprise/present for Allen." Compl. ¶ 1.h.ii (emphasis added). What could be more relevant to a defense that Allen's testimony was recently fabricated?

Agent Joy also believes that Agent Kepner violated the grand jury secrecy rule and improperly revealed other information to Allen, including information regarding an investigation of Allen. Specifically, Agent Joy believes that the government representative may have advised Allen of the status of an investigation that [redacted] This information is highly relevant to Allen's motivation to please the government and should have been disclosed to the defense.

FBI - Stevens-2387

2. Intentional Redaction of Information Helpful to the Defense. Agent Joy also reports that, after the Court excoriated the government for concealing crucial exculpatory material, Kepner admitted to Joy "that she redacted the information [from an FBI Form 302] and did so because she wanted the FD-302s she was redacting to fit the Brady/Giglio letter that had previously been provided to the defense." Compl. ¶ 9.a (emphasis added). The September 9 Brady/Giglio letter to which Agent Joy refers was false, see Dkt. 249 at 33, and providing the exculpatory information that we now learn was intentionally redacted from the Form 302 would have put the lie to that Brady/Giglio letter. The defense believed that this was done intentionally to perpetuate the falsehood of the September 9 Brady/Giglio letter, but the government represented to the Court over and over again that it was not engaged in "hide the ball" and that any redaction was an unintentional mistake. See e.g., Tr. (October 2, 2008, a.m.) at 27 ("It wasn't hide the ball); id. at 11 ("I think it was – it was an error in not giving it, and judge, I would submit to you too that it was not done intentional[ly] by any stretch of the imagination. . . . It was human error."); Tr. (Oct 2, 2008, p.m.) at 32 ("I can just tell you it was a mistake. Nobody had any, any conscious decision or any malintent (phonetic) to come forward with this Court to try to deliberately deprive this defendant of any, any information or this Court of any order that it issued."); id. at 27 ("Judge, it was a mistake. Again, if it was in any way intentional, we could have explained this away or rationalized it away as to why it didn't have to be turned over, and that's not – no, it was a mistake, but again –."). Agent Joy's complaint shows that these government representations were not true.

Agent Joy reports that even after the full prosecution team learned that exculpatory information had been redacted from the Form 302, at least one member of the team – prosecuting attorney Nick Marsh – remained "absolutely against" turning over the exculpatory information. Compl. ¶ 12.a. Joy recounts, "I left the conference room because I felt very uncomfortable with where the discussion was heading." Id. Although the exculpatory information was ultimately revealed to the defense, this episode raises serious questions about the extent to which that particular member of the team honored his obligations to disclose other exculpatory information and material.

3. Allen's Bank Account Information. Similarly, Agent Joy's complaint confirms that the government intentionally withheld relevant discovery – Allen's bank account information – and ambushed the defense with it at trial. Kepner and other members of the prosecution team "decided not to provide defense counsel Allen's bank account records," and when "the prosecution decided to use a check of Allen's as an exhibit even though it had not previously been turned over in discovery," "[p]rosecutors decided not to provide that check to the court and defense before using it as a government exhibit." Compl. ¶ 9.b (emphases added). Although the Court imposed a sanction for this deliberate flouting of the discovery rules, again it raises serious questions: What else would have been revealed in the checking account records? What else did the government fail to provide to the defense? How is it possible to give back to the defense the countless hours it spent before and during trial trying to guess at what was contained in documents that the government intentionally did not provide to the defense?

4. Scheming to Keep a Witness and Brady Information Away from the Defense. Agent Joy states that Marsh "inappropriately created [a] scheme to relocate [a] prosecution witness that was also subpoenaed by the defense during trial." Compl. ¶ 11 (emphasis added). Agent Joy recounts that the government brought Rocky Williams to Washington, D.C. "weeks before trial for multiple trial preparatory sessions." Compl. ¶ 11.a. What happened next bears quoting at length:

> After the final preparatory session, which included a mock cross examination, prosecutors decided Williams was not a witness the prosecution wanted to use. Nick Marsh advised he came up with a great plan to send Williams home because he was so "concerned" about

> Williams' health that it would allow prosecutors to send him back to Alaska, even though Williams was also under a defense subpoena. I advised Nick and others multiple times that they should advise the defense counsel and the judge before executing their plan. I was ignored. They had me send Williams home.

Id. Williams had exculpatory information in his possession that had not been disclosed. See Dkt. 103 at 1, 5-8, Ex. C. When the defense complained, the government claimed that there was "no Brady-related evidence suppressed by the government, and at no time did the government intend to engage in any type of deception." See Dkt. 106 at 1. The government maintained that its decision to send Williams back to Alaska without first notifying the defense or the Court was "made in good faith." Id. We now know from Agent Joy that these representations were false.

5. The Government Investigation. Agent Joy reports additional mind-boggling violations of the government's obligation to turn over information helpful to the defense. For example, we learn from Agent Joy that lead FBI Agent Kepner "accepted multiple things of value" from potential witnesses including artwork and employment for her husband. Compl. ¶ 2. As the Court has observed, the government at trial offered evidence that Senator Stevens received artwork and employment for relatives. Dkt. 255 at 10. The parallel is stunning. Yet, the government never provided this information to the defense.

Agent Joy also reports information that reflects poorly on the credibility of the government investigation. For example, lead FBI Agent Kepner had inappropriate relationships with a number of other potential witnesses besides Allen, improperly shared information on a number of occasions and engaged in misrepresentations to others in law enforcement and to at least one court.

6. Improper Documentation and Handling of Evidence. Agent Joy reveals that lead agent Kepner "documented very little in FBI files" and that large amounts of records have been mishandled. The Court may recall that the defense's Information Technology specialist found the government's electronic production in this case to be the "most disorganized hardest to figure out electronic production" he had ever seen. Tr. (Oct. 8, 2008, p.m.) at 25; Tr. (Sept. 12, 2008) at 18-21. The defense was forced to come to the Court on multiple occasions to try to rectify the problems, and the defense has no confidence at all that it received the information and the materials that it should have received. See, e.g., Dkt. 60; Dkt. 65. The revelation that records and evidence have been mishandled suggests that it may be impossible ever to have confidence that the government has made a complete production of information and materials. Indeed, the charges in Agent Joy's complaint suggest that the government interview memoranda in this case may well be totally unreliable, which calls into question whether the government can ever now meet its obligation to produce exculpatory information to the defense.

7. Inappropriate Relationships/Communication with the Media. Agent Joy reports that lead agent Kepner "had inappropriate relationships/communication with members of the media." Compl. ¶ 7. This allegation warrants further exploration. Any attempt to influence the media which in turn could impact the jury is utterly unethical and improper. In light of this danger, the defense team had no substantive communications with the media.

ARGUMENT

FBI - Stevens-2391

I. The Indictment Should Be Dismissed.

United States v. Omni International Corporation, 634 F. Supp. 1414 (D. Md. 1986), should be a guidepost to the Court. Senator Stevens's senior trial counsel was defense counsel in that case. Omni was a criminal tax prosecution in which the defense asserted before trial that the indictment should be dismissed because the government inappropriately learned of attorney-client privileged communications. Id. at 1416. During the course of a 28-day evidentiary hearing on whether the attorney-client privilege was breached, it was discovered (after considerable work by the defense and Judge Black) that the government had altered interview memoranda in order to strengthen its position that the attorney-client privilege had not been breached. Id. at 1423-25. The government produced the memoranda to the defense and the court without indicating that they had been altered.

The government argued in Omni that a no-harm, no-foul standard should apply, because, in fact, the attorney-client privilege had not been breached. Id. at 1438.

Judge Black rejected the government position:

> Repeated instances of deliberate and flagrant misconduct justify dismissal of the indictment . . . . Court decisions emphasize the unifying premise in all of the supervisory power cases – that although the doctrine operates to vindicate a defendant's rights in an individual case; it is designed and invoked primarily to preserve the integrity of the judicial system. The Court has particularly stressed the need to use the supervisory power to prevent the federal courts "from becoming accomplices to such misconduct." . . . It simply is wrong for Government personnel to act as they have done here. This type of conduct cannot and must not be condoned; in fact it must be strongly condemned.

Omni, 634 F. Supp. at 1438-39 (citation omitted) (quoting United States v. Payner, 447 U.S. 727, 745 (1980)).

Here, Agent Joy's complaint, combined with the record developed to date, leaves little doubt that there have been "repeated instances of deliberate and flagrant misconduct," that have gravely jeopardized the "integrity of the judicial system." Id. This misconduct includes:

1. [redacted]

2. The government knowingly presented false evidence to the jury. See Tr. (Oct. 8, 2008, p.m.) at 54, 89.

FBI - Stevens-2392

3. The government deliberately "schemed" to remove a witness from the jurisdiction so that the defense would not learn that the evidence was false. See Compl. ¶ 11.

4. The government did not tell the Court the truth when it told the Court that it removed the witness from the jurisdiction in "good faith." Compare Compl. ¶ 11, with Dkt. 106 at 1.

5. The government created a false Brady/Giglio letter on September 9, 2008. See Dkt. 130, Ex. E, at ¶ 17(c).

6. The government deliberately redacted exculpatory material from a FBI Form 302 so as not to reveal the falsity of its September 9, 2008 Brady/Giglio letter. See Compl. ¶ 9.a.

7. The government falsely represented to the Court that the redaction of exculpatory material was inadvertent. Compare Compl. ¶ 9.a with Tr. (Oct. 2, 2008, a.m.) at 11, 27; Tr. (Oct. 2, 2008, p.m.) at 27, 32.

8. Lead FBI Agent Kepner fostered an inappropriate relationship – likely sexual in nature – with the government's star witness, who delivered the blockbuster "Ted's just covering his ass" testimony. See Tr. (Oct. 1, 2008, a.m.) at 52; Compl. ¶ 1.h.

9. The government failed to keep appropriate records and failed to maintain evidence properly. See Compl. ¶¶ 13-14.

10. The government intentionally withheld bank records to which the defense was entitled under Rule 16 and then intentionally surprised the defense at trial with a check that had not been produced. See Compl. ¶ 9.b; Tr. (Oct. 8, 2008, p.m.) at 26-29.

11. The government had inappropriate relationships/communications with members of the media. See Compl. ¶ 7.

12. The government failed to turn over large quantities of exculpatory information, including the subject matter of Agent Joy's complaint itself. See generally Compl.; ¶ Dkt. 103 at 1-2, 5-7; Dkt. 126 at 1-6; Dkt. 130 at 13-16.[2]

The misconduct in this case is far more pervasive than that which confronted Judge Black in Omni. It is also more pervasive and severe than what occurred in United States v.

[2] A government witness has also alleged severe government misconduct. See Dkt. 243 (Letter from Mr. Anderson). That allegation is the subject of a separate defense motion for discovery and an evidentiary hearing. Dkt. 241.

Chapman, 524 F.3d 1073 (9th Cir. 2008), in which the Ninth Circuit upheld the trial court's dismissal of a criminal prosecution after the prosecution team failed on three occasions to turn over impeachment material in a timely manner. If this is not a case for dismissal, what is?

Not only should the case be dismissed under the supervisory powers doctrine, but it should also be dismissed under the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. See United States v. Wang, No. 98 CR. 199 (DAB), 1999 WL 138930, at *37 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 15, 1999) (finding a due process violation and dismissing an indictment due to the government's failure to provide defense counsel with "material information" until the "eve of trial," and its delay in disclosing that its key witness was unavailable and would not be called to testify); United States v. Lyons, 352 F. Supp. 2d 1231, 1251-52 (M.D. Fla. 2004) (finding a due process violation, dismissing the remaining counts of the indictment, and refusing to order a new trial because of the government's multiple and flagrant Brady and Giglio violations).

Prosecutors play a special role in our system of justice, and by necessity, courts and defendants rely on the government fulfilling its responsibilities with integrity. The government's "obligation to govern impartially is as compelling as its obligation to govern at all; and [its] interest, therefore, in a criminal prosecution is not that it shall win a case, but that, justice shall be done." Strickler v. Greene, 527 U.S. 263, 281 (1999) (quoting Berger v. United States, 295 U.S. 78, 88 (1935)). Sadly, that did not happen here. The Court and the public can have no confidence in the integrity of this proceeding, because it can have no confidence in the integrity of the government's conduct in this case. The indictment should be dismissed.

II. A New Trial Should Be Ordered, with Discovery and an Evidentiary Hearing

If the Court is not inclined to dismiss the case at this juncture, Judge Bates's decision in United States v. Quinn, 537 F. Supp. 2d 99, 107 (D.D.C. 2008), should guide the Court as it considers whether to grant a new trial. In Quinn, the government failed to disclose to the defense that it had become highly suspicious of the truthfulness of a government witness it intended to call. Id. at 109-110. The government decided before trial not to call the witness, but instead of informing the defense of its concerns, allowed the defense to deliver an opening statement based on the assumption that the witness would testify and that the government believed that the witness was truthful. Id. at 105. Defense "counsel was left to formulate the defense theme and opening statement on the erroneous belief that the 'critical' government witness would be appearing." Id. at 109. When the witness did not in fact testify, the government argued that there was no prejudice to the defendant. Id. at 112-13. Judge Bates disagreed. He found that if the information had been disclosed, the defendant "could have presented a very different opening and closing argument and could have conducted stronger cross-examinations, particularly of [a government agent] to great effect." Id. at 116. Judge Bates, citing the Supreme Court's decision in Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419 (1995), found that this information could have been used to conduct a "pointed attack on the government's investigation." Quinn, 537 F. Supp. 2d at 115-16. As the Tenth Circuit has observed, "[a] common trial tactic of defense lawyers is to discredit the caliber of the investigation or the decision to charge the defendant, and we may consider such use in assessing a possible Brady violation." Bowen v. Maynard, 799 F.2d 593, 613 (10th Cir. 1986); see also Lindsey v. King, 769 F.2d 1034, 1042 (5th Cir. 1985) (granting new trial because withheld Brady evidence carried with it the "potential . . . [for] the discrediting . . . of the police methods employed in assembling the case.")

Here, a government insider "witnessed or learned of a series of violations of policy, rules and procedure as well as possible criminal violations" by members of the prosecution team. Compl. "Summary of Complaints." In a clear violation of Brady, this insider's view was not disclosed to the defense until after the trial. Agent Joy's observations contain substantial impeachment material against the government's key witness. The defense also could have used Agent Joy's allegations to raise questions in the jurors' minds about the integrity of the government's investigation, of this prosecution, and of the government's entire case against Senator Stevens. Senator Stevens also needed to have Senator Stevens's information in order to investigate whether additional misconduct occurred. The government has an affirmative duty to disclose evidence that may be the "tip of the iceberg" of other misconduct even if the government has not investigated whether or not that is the case. See United States v. Burnside, 824 F. Supp. 1215, 1258 (N.D. Ill. 1993) (government has an affirmative duty to disclose mere indications of improper conduct by witnesses and government personnel "so as to enable defense counsel to undertake the inquiry which the government deliberately avoided"); see also United States v. Shaffer, 789 F.2d 682, 691 (9th Cir. 1986) (affirming grant of new trial where failure to disclose the impeachment evidence regarding key government witness undermined confidence in trial outcome, including "tip of the iceberg" evidence).

Furthermore, Senator Stevens's complaint alleges an inappropriate relationship between lead agent Kepner and Bill Allen. It alleges that Agent Kepner revealed confidential information to Allen, and may even have disclosed the existence of other investigations of Allen's criminal conduct. Improper favors to key witnesses are a recognized basis for a new trial. As the Seventh Circuit held in United State v. Boyd, 55 F.3d 239 (7th Cir. 1995), "[h]ad the jury known that the prisoner witnesses were receiving favors . . . all with the permission or connivance of the U.S. Attorney's Office, the jury might have wondered whether the witnesses were not receiving implicit assurances of compensation for their testimony going far beyond anything promised in their plea agreements, the terms of which had been revealed to the jury."

Id. at 246. "In short," the court asked, "might not the prosecution's case have collapsed entirely had the truth come out about the behavior and the treatment of these witnesses?" Id.

At the very least, Senator Stevens is entitled to a new trial with the ability to use this information in his defense.[3] But Agent Joy's complaint also leaves many questions unanswered that can and should be explored through discovery and an evidentiary hearing, if the Court elects not to enter an immediate dismissal. For example, what information was revealed to Allen by the government? What was said during one-on-one meetings with Allen? How many times did government representatives meet with Allen alone? Were these meetings documented consistent with FBI policies and procedures? What government actions were not documented? What do the agents' notes say? Can the government's interview memoranda ever be relied upon? What evidence was not handled properly? What did the government find so troubling about its preparation of Rocky Williams that it schemed to send him to Alaska? Why was the September 9 Brady/Giglio letter created with false information in it? How was the redaction of the interview memoranda performed? How is it possible that so much exculpatory information was not disclosed? Why was a government representative "absolutely opposed" to providing exculpatory material to the defense? What else should have been produced to the defense but was not? What were the nature of the inappropriate relationships and communications with the media? Why didn't the government disclose that at least one of its representatives received things of value from potential witnesses?

A district court has discretion to order discovery and an evidentiary hearing post-trial in appropriate circumstances, including when newly discovered information comes to light.

[3] The misconduct in this case far exceeds what the defense understood occurred in the case of United States v. Oruche, 484 F.3d 590 (D.C Cir. 2007). The breadth of the misconduct,

United States v. Velarde, 485 F.3d 553, 560 (10th Cir. 2007). "According to the Supreme Court, 'where specific allegations before the court show reason to believe that the petitioner may, if the facts are fully developed, be able to demonstrate that he is' entitled to a new trial, 'it is the duty of the court to provide the necessary facilities and procedures for an adequate inquiry.'" Id. (quoting Harris v. Nelson, 394 U.S. 286, 300 (1969)). "In fulfilling this duty, a district court has broad discretion to fashion discovery mechanisms suitable to the case before it" and "is required to conduct [an] evidentiary hearing . . . if the admissible evidence presented by the petitioner, if accepted as true, would warrant relief as a matter of law." Id.[4] See also, e.g. See United States v. Kelly, 790 F.2d 130, 134 (D.C. Cir. 1986) (holding that district court abused its discretion in denying an evidentiary hearing "[i]n the absence of countervailing sworn evidence from the government"); United States v. Koubriti, 297 F. Supp. 2d 955, 959, 972 (E.D. Mich. 2004) (court conducted post-trial evidentiary hearing to ascertain the impact of government's failure to disclose a letter containing arguably exculpatory information; Court ordered non-party to produce relevant documents). As the D.C. Circuit has noted, "Factual findings are particularly important where, as here, the governmental misconduct charged is extraneous to the trial and so is not documented in the trial record." Kelly, 790 F.2d at 139.

supported by the complaint of a government insider, undoubtedly impacts the integrity of the entire prosecution.

[4] In Velarde, the court found that the petitioner did not satisfy the Tenth Circuit's standard for an evidentiary hearing "because, by his own admission, he was unable to procure the necessary evidence . . . without judicial compulsion." 485 F.3d at 560. As a result, the court granted petitioner's request for judicially compelled discovery. Id.; see 3 Charles Alan Wright et al. Federal Practice and Procedure § 557 at n.41 (3d ed. 2004 & Supp. 2008) (citing Velarde) ("Where the defendant made showing that further investigation would more likely than not lead to facts the defendant could use to effectively cross-examine government witness, it was error to deny defendant's motion for a new trial without granting an opportunity for discovery under the court's subpoena power.").

In United States v. Espinosa-Hernandez, 918 F.2d 911 (11th Cir. 1990), a Customs Service agent in charge of the criminal investigation of the defendant was indicted, after the defendant's trial, for making false statements on his job application regarding past use and sale of drugs. Id. at 913. The district court refused to conduct an evidentiary hearing, holding that the newly discovered evidence "would be purely impeaching." Id. The Eleventh Circuit reversed, asserting that the Customs Agent "stands accused of serious and disturbing breaches of the public trust. Without the benefits of discovery and an evidentiary hearing, it is impossible to say that evidence of [the Agent]'s misconduct is merely impeaching." Id. at 914. Thus, even thought the agent was not accused of misconduct in the defendant's trial, the court noted that evidentiary hearing might turn up evidence of "perjury in a proceeding similar to [defendant's] trial. If so, the discovered evidence would be beyond that of mere impeachment and a new trial would be necessary to 'remove the taint' from [defendant's] conviction." Id. at 914.

Agent Joy's complaint goes well beyond the allegations in Espinosa. It alleges misconduct relating to and fundamentally affecting this defendant's trial. The allegations come from "a federal employee with extensive knowledge of the investigation and trial in this case." Dkt. 255 at 4. Many of them raise additional questions or suggest additional avenues of inquiry. Discovery and an evidentiary hearing are necessary to explore the allegations and to fashion a remedy if the Court is not persuaded to dismiss on the face of the complaint.

In the Omni case, Judge Black was reluctant to hold an evidentiary hearing. Most judges, of course, rely on the representations of government representatives, as well they should in appropriate circumstances. But here the government's representations to date have not been reliable. Judge Black found, at the end of the hearing that he had been reluctant to hold, that:

> The AUSA's failure to be fully candid could have had tragic consequences. The Court was faced with the issue of whether or not to permit an evidentiary hearing. If the Court had blindly relied on the AUSA's representations, no hearing would have been held. . . . In light of all the testimony adduced at the [28-day-long] evidentiary hearing, it is clear that this case rises to the high threshold imposed for invocation of the supervisory power [to dismiss]. The Court condemns the manner in which the Government proceeded, and cannot now stand idly by, implicitly joining the federal judiciary into such unbecoming conduct.

Omni Int'l Corp., 634 F. Supp. at 1434, 1438–39.

If the Court has not learned enough to date to dismiss this case, it should hold an evidentiary hearing. Only then will we know the full story.

CONCLUSION

In a case awash with extraordinary revelations, Agent Joy's complaint is perhaps the most shocking and important. An FBI Special Agent has alleged that his colleagues engaged in intentional constitutional violations in the course of investigating and prosecuting this defendant and others. Because of their source, these allegations are highly credible. The misconduct is utterly inexcusable. The Court should dismiss the indictment or, at a minimum, grant a new trial and order discovery and an evidentiary hearing.

Judge says trial evidence against Kott argues against his innocence

Anchorage Daily News
(02/04/09 21:15:13)

The effort of former Alaska House Speaker Pete Kott to get out of prison pending an appeal of his corruption case was dealt a setback when the trial judge said the evidence of Kott's wrongdoing was overwhelming. Last month, Kott, an Eagle River Republican serving a six-year sentence at a minimum security federal facility in Sheridan, Ore., asked the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to set him free while he tries to overturn his 2007 conviction. Kott's attorney, Sheryl Gordon McCloud of Seattle, said Kott fit the profile of a candidate for release: He posed no danger to the community, he would stick around, and his appeal raised serious doubts about his trial.

Asked his opinion by the 9th Circuit, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick filed a response last week in which he agreed that Kott was neither dangerous nor likely to run away. But he said Kott faced daunting odds that he would get his conspiracy, extortion and bribery charges overturned, making his release inappropriate.

"The evidence against Kott at trial was overwhelming, including numerous videotapes and recordings, the crime is a very serious one which threatened the integrity of the state legislative process, this court has previously denied a motion for a judgment of acquittal or a new trial, and the government's opposition to the arguments advanced by Kott in support of his appeal are very persuasive," Sedwick wrote.

DOJ Apologizes for Misstatements in Stevens Case

The Public Integrity Section has taken plenty of lumps from U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan over the course of the case of former Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens, who was convicted of corruption charges in October. By the looks of these court pleadings filed today, it can expect a few more.

In an attached letter dated Jan. 30, the section's director, William Welch II, told the judge he "deeply regrets the drain on the court's resources and loss of credibility in the court's eyes."

Why the apology? Two things.

First: In a court hearing last month, Welch mistakenly told the judge that an FBI agent did not qualify for "whistleblower status." The agent, Chad Joy, has filed a complaint alleging that the Stevens prosecutors schemed to relocate a witness and attempted to conceal exculpatory evidence. He's also accused another agent of having an inappropriate relationship with the government's chief witness in the case. (Stevens' lawyers at Williams & Connolly allege it was sexual in nature.) Welch actually meant that Joy was not yet entitled to protections as an "aggrieved whistleblower" because the agent has not alleged any reprisal or retaliation, according the government's filing.

The second mistake is more glaring. At the same hearing, Welch told Sullivan that the Anchorage-based government employees named in Joy's complaint "prefer their identities to be known and that essentially they want their story made public." As a result, an unredacted version of the complaint was made available to the public.

Apparently, some of those employees didn't want their names disclosed. Welch said in the letter that he and Brenda Morris, his principal deputy and the lead prosecutor in the case, instructed D.C.-based FBI agents to interview Anchorage personnel named in the complaint and explain to them that their interviews would be converted into public affidavits. But some of the employees "believe that the above described notice was not sufficient to infer or conclude that they had consented to disclosure of their names in the Joy complaint," Welch said.

Welch ended the letter, "I apologize to the court if I misled the court in any way, and certainly did not intend to do so. I believed my representation to the court to be accurate at the time based on the above described facts. I deeply regret any error, particularly in light of the fact that this is my first appearance before this court."

So much for first impressions.

United States District Court Judge
Federal Courthouse
333 Constitution Avenue, N.W.

Re: United States of America v. Theodore F. Stevens
Criminal No. 08-231 (EGS)

Dear Judge Sullivan:

As an initial matter, I apologize for the confusion that I created due to my misunderstanding and misuse of the phrase "whistleblower status" at the January 14th hearing. I deeply regret the drain on the court's resources and loss of credibility in the court"s eyes.

I unfortunately must write to clarify a second representation that I made during the January 14th hearing. At that hearing, I stated that the government had contacted the government employees, and that the government employees "prefer their identities to be known and that essentially they want their story to be made public." In reliance on that representation, you stated in your orders of January 14, January 16 and January 21, that the government had contacted the government employees, and that they did not object to their identities being revealed.

I based that representation on the following set of facts. After the first publication of the redacted Joy complaint on or about December 22, 2008, I and Principal Deputy Morris had several conversations with the FBI Anchorage office management in which they described the negative impact that the Joy complaint was having on the office, and inquired when DOJ would respond publicly to the allegations. Moreover, as the court is well aware, the Joy complaint focuses on allegations of misconduct committed by Special Agent Mary Beth Kepner. Special Agent Kepner has expressed her desire to have her name public and more importantly to release any and all information related to the allegations against her.

During the week of January 5, 2009, pursuant to the protective order, Principal Deputy Morris and I instructed Washington, DC based special agents to interview FBI Anchorage personnel who had been named in the Joy complaint as having personal knowledge of the alleged misconduct of Special Agent Kepner. We instructed those agents that the FBI Anchorage personnel should be told that their interviews would be converted into affidavits that would be made part of a public court filing. I understood that those instructions had been followed. Based upon my belief that FBI Anchorage management spoke for the office, and my reliance upon the fact that the aforementioned instructions had been followed and the FBI Anchorage personnel were in fact interviewed without objection, I made the aforementioned representation.

I wish to note for the public record that I did not personally contact and canvass each FBI Anchorage employee on the issue of disclosure relating to the Joy complaint itself. Some, but not all, of the FBI Anchorage personnel believe that the above described notice was not sufficient to infer or conclude that they had consented to disclosure of their names in the Joy complaint. To my knowledge, no other government employee has made a similar objection.

I apologize to the court if I misled the court in any way, and certainly did not intend to do so. I believed my representation to the court to be accurate at the time based upon the above described facts. I deeply regret any error, particularly in light of the fact that this is my first appearance before this court.

Finally, as I had to be out of the District on a personal matter, I had someone sign this letter on my behalf. Please know, however, that I personally reviewed this letter and authorized the signature on my behalf.

Sincerely,

William M. Welch by BKraus

GOVERNMENT'S SUBMISSION IN RESPONSE
TO THE COURT'S JANUARY 21, 2009 ORDER

The Government respectfully submits this memorandum in connection with its response to the Court's January 21, 2009 Order, in which the Court directed the Government to file under seal and provide to the defendant, > all communications to, from, or between anyone in [the Public Integrity Section ("PIN")], and any other office within DOJ, including but not limited to the Office of Inspector General ("OIG"), the Office of Professional Responsibility ("OPR"), the FBI, and the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of Alaska, between November 15, 2008 and the present regarding the complaint filed by Special Agent Chad Joy ("the Joy Complaint")[.]

Dkt. 274 ("the January 21 Order") at 1-2.

The Government deeply regrets that the proceedings surrounding the Joy Complaint have escalated to this stage. We submit this memorandum in an attempt to clear up any existing confusion regarding two related but distinct concepts: "whistleblower status" and "whistleblower protection." In prior statements to the Court, Government counsel have sometimes used these two terms imprecisely, and their statements have contributed unnecessarily to the confusion. See January 21 Order at 1 (inquiry focused on the Government's "determination" that Agent Joy "was entitled to whistleblower protection, and when any such determination was communicated to [PIN]"); id. at 10 ("none of the four attorneys present for the government * * * informed the Court that Agent Joy had not been afforded whistleblower status,"); id. at 12 (quoting PIN Chief William M. Welch's statement that Agent Joy "does not qualify for whistleblower status"); id. (quoting PIN Principal Deputy Chief Brenda K. Morris's agreement that Agent Joy was notified by OPR that he had been "denied whistleblower protection"). The Government never intended to mislead the Court. Instead, its misstatements resulted from counsel's failure fully to understand the relevant procedures and protections applied to "whistleblower" complaints.

Because the distinction between "whistleblower status" and "whistleblower protection" is critical to understanding the context for the Government's prior statements to the Court, we turn first to a brief discussion of applicable legal principles and then to an explanation of the nature and timing of the Government's knowledge with respect to Agent Joy's status and protections. We believe that, with these legal principles and this factual background in mind, the Government's submission of materials today fully demonstrates its good faith and truthful dealings with the Court.

APPLICABLE LEGAL PRINCIPLES

The Department of Justice has adopted regulations that establish procedures and protections for Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) employees who, as "whistleblowers," make a "protected disclosure." See 28 C.F.R. § 27.1, et seq. ("Whistleblower Protection for Federal Bureau of Investigation Employees"). Under the regulations, a disclosure is "protected" if "the person making it reasonably believes it evidences":

(1) A violation of any law, rule or regulation; or

(2) Mismanagement, a gross waste of funds, an abuse of authority, or substantial and specific danger to public health or safety.

28 C.F.R. § 27.1(a). Once a "protected disclosure" has been received, the regulations protect the "whistleblower" from "reprisal" for the disclosure in the form of an adverse "personnel action." See 28 C.F.R. § 27.2(a).[1] The FBI whistleblower regulations also establish procedures for investigating allegations of a reprisal, and for awarding corrective action and other relief to a whistleblower who has been retaliated against for making a protected disclosure. See 28 C.F.R. §§ 27.3 - 27.6. Accordingly, under the regulations, "whistleblower protection" includes both the protection against retaliation that attaches as soon as the employee makes a protected disclosure and the corrective action and other relief that can be awarded in the event of reprisal.

Unlike the term "whistleblower protection," the term "whistleblower status" does not appear in either the FBI regulations or in the Whistleblower Protection Act of 1989, 5 U.S.C. § 1213 et seq. The courts, however, occasionally use that term to describe the status of someone who has made a protected disclosure, and hence is protected from reprisal. See Horton v. Dep't of Navy, 66 F.3d 279, 284 (Fed. Cir. 1995) (Merit Systems Protection Board erred in finding that employee was not entitled to "whistleblower status" because the disclosed misconduct was not sufficiently serious); Gardner v. Dep't of Treasury, 64 F.3d 671 (Table), 1995 WL 375943 *1 (Fed. Cir. 1995) ("The administrative judge (AJ) concluded that the OSHA complaint constituted a protected disclosure and, therefore, Gardner qualified for whistleblower status."); Marano v. Justice, 2 F.3d 1137, 1143 (Fed. Cir. 1993) (equating the "fact of disclosure" with "the whistleblower's status as a whistleblower"); Fiorillo v. U. S. Dept. of Justice, Bureau of Prisons, 795 F.2d 1544, 1550 (Fed. Cir. 1986) ("[T]o be given 'whistleblower' status and thus the protections under 5 U.S.C. § 2302(b)(8), the primary motivation of the employee must be the desire to inform the public on matters of public concern, and not personal vindictiveness.").

1/ "Personnel action," which is defined in 28 C.F.R. § 27.2(b) and 5 U.S.C. § 2302(a)(2)(A), does not, by its plain terms, include disclosure of a whistleblower complaint to a Court for use in a criminal proceeding.

As the regulations and the case law make clear, an allegation of an adverse personnel action is not a prerequisite to protection from reprisal. As long as the "whistleblower" reasonably believes that the information he disclosed evidenced a violation of any law, rule, or regulation by another Department of Justice employee, he falls within the protection of the FBI whistleblower regulations – i.e., he is entitled to "whistleblower status."

FACTUAL BACKGROUND[2]

Sometime in late November 2008, Special Agent Chad Joy, one of the two case agents assigned to the Stevens trial, submitted a self-styled whistleblower complaint alleging instances of misconduct against his fellow case-agent and the prosecutors. This complaint explicitly requested "any and all whistleblower protections," but made no allegations of reprisals. D.E. 262 at 7. Agent Joy's complaint was referred to the Office of Professional Responsibility (OPR), which advised him on December 4, 2008, that it intended to investigate his misconduct allegations. [redacted] OPR further advised Agent Joy that because he had not alleged any reprisals resulting from his complaint, OPR lacked "jurisdiction to initiate any investigation

[2] The January 21 Order was prompted by a remark made by PIN Chief William M. Welch at a January 14, 2009 status conference. At this status conference, Chief Welch informed the Court that FBI Agent Chad Joy did not "qualify for whistleblower status." In its subsequent orders on January 14, 2009, January 16, 2009, and January 21, 2009, the Court expressed its concern that, in light of Chief Welch's remark, the Government had previously misled the Court and/or failed adequately to keep the Court informed regarding the whistleblower status of this FBI Agent.

On December 5, [redacted] Later that day, Principal Deputy Chief Morris called to apprise the Court and defense counsel that the Government would be making a filing the following week. [redacted]

Nonetheless, Chief Welch and others at PIN remained concerned about the privacy rights of Agent Joy and others identified in his complaint, including FBI Special Agent Mary Beth Kepner. [redacted] Accordingly, on December 11, 2008, the Stevens trial team provided the Court with Agent Joy's complaint ex parte and under seal. (Defense counsel were provided with a redacted copy.) [redacted] In an accompanying pleading, the Government argued that the complaint should not be made public because disclosure "could threaten or impede ongoing investigations, the rights of innocent third parties, and the privacy interests of individuals and entities." Motion for Leave to File Under Seal and for a Protective Order filed 12/11/08 at 1. Likewise, in a December 15, 2008 teleconference, Principal Deputy Chief Morris expressed uncertainty about whether the Joy complaint could be publicly disclosed and continued to emphasize the privacy interests at stake. 12/15/08 Tr. 7-8.

[redacted]

On December 16, 2008, Agent Joy advised that he did not intend for his complaint to be made public. [redacted] At a hearing on December 19, 2008, Principal Deputy Chief Morris continued to argue that the complaint should not be made public in light of the privacy interests at stake, including those of Agent Kepner. 12/19/08 Tr. 5-27, 41-54. She did not, however, argue that Agent Joy's status as a "whistleblower" precluded public disclosure of his complaint. Id. Moreover, although Agent Joy's counsel argued that Agent Joy had "intended to invoke whistleblower protections," id. at 37, he acknowledged under questioning from the Court that he knew of no authority that would permit the Court to seal the complaint on this basis alone. Id. at 39.

[redacted]

As the Government turned to the task of responding to the defense motion to dismiss based on Agent Joy's complaint, Chief Welch and Principal Deputy Chief Morris discussed the difficulty of responding based on the redacted complaint that had been publicly released after the December 19, 2008 hearing. They decided to seek to lift certain remaining redactions, while still protecting Agent Joy's identity to avoid allegations or appearances of reprisal or retaliation.

[redacted]

Chief Welch made this proposal at the January 14, 2009 status hearing, identifying several reasons why the existing redactions were cumbersome and unwarranted, but continuing to adhere to the view that Agent Joy's identity "may still be redacted." 1/14/09 Tr. 4. Chief Welch also noted at that time that Agent Joy "does not qualify for whistleblower status." Id. at 8. In making this statement, Chief Welch was merely relaying his understanding that Agent Joy had still not alleged reprisal or retaliation. [redacted] He did not mean to suggest to the Court that Agent Joy had no protections against any future reprisal or retaliation, that his complaint was no longer pending, or that any legal determination had been made about the merits of that complaint. [redacted]

[redacted]

Chief Welch came to the conclusion that, instead of informing the Court that Agent Joy "does not qualify for whistleblower status," he should have informed the Court that, although Agent Joy had not yet alleged facts sufficient to warrant any remedy as an aggrieved whistleblower, there had been no denial of his whistleblower protections against reprisal or retaliation or any legal determination on his claim. [redacted]

The factual recitation set forth above clarifies several issues highlighted in the Court's previous orders.

First, the Government's December 11, 2008 filings did not misrepresent the relevant facts to the Court. In particular, the Government's Sealed Memorandum correctly represented that, in the days following December 2, 2008, the Government "received additional information, guidance and advice to satisfy itself that any possible statutory and regulatory confidentiality concerns surrounding a request for whistleblower protection had been fuly [sic] explored and addressed, and would not prohibit a disclosure to the Court at a minimum." Sealed Memorandum filed 12/11/08 at 2. In fact, as the discussion above makes clear, during that period the Government's attorneys did seek and receive guidance regarding whether Agent Joy's request for whistleblower protection precluded disclosure to the Court, and they further considered the privacy interests of those implicated by Agent Joy's complaint, including Agent Joy himself.

Second, the Government did not argue during the December 19, 2008 hearing that "the complaint should not be made public in view of the potential whistleblower protections * * * at stake." January 21 Order at 8. Indeed, the Government did not even mention the word "whistleblower" during this hearing. Instead, the Government argued that Agent Joy's complaint should remain under seal based on Agent Joy's desire to keep his allegations confidential, the privacy interests of Agent Joy and others, and the existence of an on-going OPR investigation. See 12/15/08 Tr. 5-7, 9, 14.

Third, any confusion regarding Agent Joy's "status" as a "whistleblower" was not the result of an intentional attempt to mislead the Court. Based on their interactions with OPR, Chief Welch and Principal Deputy Chief Morris mistakenly linked the term "whistleblower status" to an allegation of reprisal. They did not intend to convey, however, that any component of the Department of Justice had determined that his complaint did not satisfy the requirements for a protected disclosure or that his supervisors were free to retaliate against him. In fact, as we explain above, as long as Agent Joy reasonably believed at the time he filed his complaint that his disclosures evidenced a violation of any law, rule or regulation by another Department of Justice employee, he was entitled to status as a "whistleblower," and his supervisors could not take adverse personnel action or otherwise retaliate against him on account of his disclosure.

THE GOVERNMENT'S SUBMISSION

Read literally, the January 21 Order would require the disclosure of any communication "to, from, or between anyone in OPI, and any other office within DOJ" between November 15, 2008 and January 21, 2009, that relates in any way to "the complaint filed by Agent Joy." January 21 Order at 18. Other, more specific statements by the Court, however, suggest that the focus of the January 21 Order is more limited.

For example, the January 21 Order makes clear the Court's "determination that an accounting of the communications with OPI regarding Agent Joy's whistleblower status is necessary." January 21 Order at 15; see also id. at 14 ("More importantly, the government does not explain the basis for Mr. Welch's representation to the Court at the January 14, 2009 hearing that [PIN] had ascertained that Agent Joy did not qualify for such protection."); 1/14/09 Tr. at 20 ("THE COURT: I want a declaration from the Attorney General. I want to find out what – how the Government handled this whole matter on whistleblower status * * * . I want to know what your office [i.e., PIN] knew and when it knew it."); id. at 23 ("THE COURT: So what's critical is, did your office know that he'd been denied whistleblower status?"); ibid. ("THE COURT: All right. I want a paper trail and I want the information trail. I need to know. I need to know."); ibid. ("THE COURT: It's completely different if the Government told him, 'You aren't entitled to this status,' and that's something I should have known because I would have done things completely differently had I know, had I known that he'd been denied status.").

FBI - Stevens-2416

In light of these statements, the Government's submission provides materials relating to what the Government (and specifically attorneys within PIN) knew about Agent Joy's "whistleblower" status and protections, when the Government learned what it knew, and the reasons for the Government's representations to the Court regarding Agent Joy's "whistleblower" status and protections. To that end, the Government hereby submits under seal for in camera inspection the following: (1) email communications; (2) declarations from William M. Blier, Paul Colby, Raymond Hulser, Elaine N. Lammert, Patty Merkamp Stemler, and William M. Welch. Collectively, these materials detail communications requested by the Court "related to the Department of Justice's determination as to whether [Special Agent Chad Joy] was entitled to whistleblower protection, and when any such determination was communicated to [PIN]." January 21 Order at 1.

To the extent the Court desires a broader disclosure, the Government respectfully objects. First, in the Government's view, the specific concerns identified in the Court's orders do not require a more sweeping disclosure. Second, in light of one of the defendant's pending motions to dismiss (which focuses on Agent Joy's allegations), attempting to catalogue all of the communications "to, from, or between anyone in OPI, and any other office within DOJ" regarding Agent Joy's complaint would be impossible. Finally, and perhaps most important, requiring the wholesale disclosure of internal Department of Justice communications made during pending litigation would impermissibly intrude on the Department's work product protections. See infra at 12-13 & n. 6.[5]

[5] To be clear, the Government is compelled to preserve any and all applicable privileges with respect to both the material it submits today as well other materials not provided to the Court – and specifically materials that would reveal the communications and mental impressions

The January 21 Order directed the Government to provide its responsive production "to the defendant pursuant to the protective order already in place in this case." January 21 Order at 18. The Government is nonetheless making its submission in camera because, in the process of gathering all potentially responsive materials and information, it has become apparent that compliance would require the production of substantial amounts of privileged and work-product protected materials. For the same reason, the Government is providing defendant (and the Court) with a redacted version of this memorandum.

As noted above, the attached documents outline in detail various communications between and among PIN attorneys and other Department of Justice components regarding Agent Joy's "whistleblower" status, including their knowledge of that status, when they learned what they knew, and what actions they contemplated taking and did take in response to what they learned. These materials reveal core work-product protected material: communications, mental impressions, strategic considerations, and litigation decisions undertaken by attorneys who were at all relevant times (and indeed still are) in the midst of litigation.[6] Under the circumstances, the of attorneys currently in the midst of preparing the Government's response to the defendant's Motion to Dismiss based on the Joy Complaint. The latter material, in the Government's view, has no bearing on the concerns expressed by the Court in its January 21, 2009 Order, and thus is not "directly related" to the information the Government provides today. United States v. (Under Seal), 748 F.2d 871, 875 n.7 (4th Cir. 1984); see also Fed. R. Evid. 502(a).

6/ It is beyond dispute that the work product doctrine applies to government attorneys conducting criminal investigations or prosecutions. See Fed. R. Crim. P. 16(a)(2) ("Except as Rule 16(a)(1) provides otherwise, this rule does not authorize the discovery or inspection of reports, memoranda, or other internal government documents made by an attorney for the government."). See also United States v. Koskerides, 877 F.2d 1129, 1133-34 (2d Cir. 1989) ("Rule 16 clearly recognizes the prosecution's need for protecting communications concerning legitimate trial tactics") (internal marks and citation omitted); United States v. Milikowsky, 896

Government – with its filing under seal and with a request for in camera review – has sought fully to preserve its rights with respect to the production of privileged or otherwise protected materials.[7]

CONDITIONAL REQUEST FOR A STAY

As noted above, the government has construed the January 21 Order not to require that it produce communications unrelated to Agent Joy's whistleblower status. Should the Court disagree with this construction, we hereby request that the Court stay its January 21 Order for two weeks, a period that would permit the Government to seek reconsideration and/or appellate review. The Government has also objected to the portion of the Court's order directing it to provide the defendant with copies of its internal communications. Likewise, if the Court should overrule the Government's objection to providing its communications to the defendant, the Government asks that it provide notice of this decision before releasing any communications, and that it afford the Government a two-week period in which to evaluate how best to proceed, in light of its concerns that the communications in question are privileged, and not subject to disclosure.

F.Supp. 1285, 1307-09 (D. Conn. 1994) (declining to provide defendants with review of government's "work product," based on prior version of Rule 16), aff'd, 65 F.3d 4 (2d Cir. 1995); United States v. Gangi, 1 F.Supp.2d 256, 263 (S.D.N.Y. 1998); United States v. Fort, 478 F.3d 1099 (9th Cir. 2007) (Rule 16(a)(2) extends to state police reports written prior to federal involvement).

7. The Government's production of these materials to the Court for in camera review does not itself waive any applicable privileges. United States v. Stevens prosecutors admit another error

APOLOGY: Letter says not all federal employees wanted names released.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(02/06/09 01:24:38)

Federal prosecutors have found a new reason to apologize over misleading information they've provided to the judge in former Sen. Ted Stevens' trial, and this time Stevens' lawyers are saying the government should be held in contempt.

In a letter to the judge dated Jan. 30 and made public Thursday, William Welch, head of the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, said he erred when he said in January that government employees cited in an FBI agent's complaint alleging improprieties by government officials "want their story to be made public."

In fact, he wrote, not all of them gave their consent to having their names released Jan. 14 in a publicly filed copy of the eight-page complaint, though he didn't identify which ones.

In the complaint, agent Chad Joy accused a fellow agent and prosecutors of violating FBI policy and fair-trial rules in the wide-ranging public corruption investigation in Alaska and in Stevens' trial last year.

The new apology comes on top of a series of errors and misstatements made by prosecutors in connection with the complaint and other issues that arose during and after Stevens' trial.

In fact, Welch started his letter with an apology for an earlier "misunderstanding and misuse" of the phrase "whistle-blower" in connection with Joy's complaint -- and that was before he even revealed the newest misstatement.

How serious are the government's current problems? U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan hasn't expressed an opinion beyond obvious annoyance.

The basic facts of the case remain largely unassailed: that Stevens got tens of thousands of dollars' worth of gifts and services, primarily from the oil field service company Veco Corp. and its chief executive Bill Allen, didn't report them, then schemed to cover up his omissions.

But in a new motion filed Thursday on the collateral issues, Stevens' lawyers cited the latest material from prosecutors as additional grounds for their demand that Stevens' charges be dismissed over government misconduct, or that he at least get a new trial. And they added a new wrinkle: a request to Sullivan that the government be held in contempt.

"The government still does not get it. Over and over again, it has been caught red-handed making false representations to the Court and the defense," defense attorney Robert Cary said in his motion, filed publicly Thursday after initially having been submitted under seal Monday.

Not only did the government admit another error, Cary said, but it failed to comply with Sullivan's order of Jan. 21 to produce every communication in its files about Joy's complaint and to share that material with the defense.

SHIFTING POSITIONS

In the court documents put on the record Thursday, prosecutors acknowledged they weren't complying with the literal words of Sullivan's order but said they thought "other, more specific statements" by Sullivan required only a disclosure of communications related to whether Joy was a protected government whistle-blower. - 951

194-AN-13620-n Q

That issue has been a subplot in the ever-growing post-trial din. Initially, when prosecutors sought to keep the complaint secret, they said he was a protected whistle-blower. When they sought to make the complaint public, they said he wasn't.

"The Government deeply regrets that the proceedings surrounding the Joy Complaint have escalated to this stage," said the most recent filing.

In explaining the shifting positions, prosecutors say now that the complaint was the sort that could lead to protection. But since Joy hasn't alleged any reprisals, he doesn't fall within the law that protects whistle-blowers, they said.

If the judge wants a larger disclosure or if he demands that sensitive attorney work-product documents be shared with the defense, the prosecutors asked they be given a two-week stay so they could decide whether to appeal.

In a new order docketed this week, Sullivan said he wasn't ready to determine whether the government filing conformed to his order. But he didn't seem very willing to give prosecutors more time.

"Moreover, for the reasons already stated by the Court in previous Orders and because much of the recent litigation is in response to the government's requests for relief and admitted misrepresentations, intentional or not, the Court will review further requests for extensions of time with disfavor," Sullivan wrote.

TROUBLE EARLY ON

Stevens' trial concluded Oct. 27. Even before the verdict, prosecutors got into trouble with the judge for not turning over evidence to the defense and for producing an inflated accounting of free work done for Stevens by Veco. Sullivan imposed sanctions on the government, stripping it of a small part of its case, but the jury appeared to have found more than ample evidence to convict Stevens on all seven disclosure counts.

Since then, Stevens' attorneys have taken two main approaches. They have said an accumulation of errors by the judge in interpreting the law and by the prosecution in its handling of the case should be sufficient for Stevens to get a new trial. And they've argued that government misconduct was so extreme that the judge should dismiss the case entirely. Now the latest filing adds a contempt citation to Stevens' proposed remedies.

"The government's excuse for this umpteenth alleged misunderstanding makes absolutely no sense," Cary said.

Prosecutors have acknowledged making mistakes but they said none were deliberate.

Joy's complaint, filed with the Justice Department in late November, has fueled the defense's post-trial effort, and Stevens' lawyers are demanding a full accounting in open court -- especially assertions by Joy that the government deliberately hid evidence favorable to Stevens.

Welch's letter also gives some insight about the internal fallout of Joy's complaint when a heavily edited version became public in December. It had a "negative impact" in the Anchorage FBI office, he said.

Many of Joy's complaints were against his co-case agent, Mary Beth Kepner, the lead agent in the corruption investigation.

"Special Agent Kepner has expressed her desire to have her name public and more importantly to release any and all information related to the allegations against her," Welch said.

During the first week in January, FBI agents from Washington, D.C., interviewed personnel in Anchorage, Welch said. The Washington agents told the interviewees that their statements eventually would be submitted publicly in court. But some Alaska personnel complained they didn't consent to their names being used in the Joy complaint when a less-edited version was refiled publicly Jan. 14 with the names of all government officials exposed, Welch said.

Stevens prosecutors found in contempt

By NEDRA PICKLER
The Associated Press
(02/13/09 11:15:23)

WASHINGTON -- A federal judge held Justice Department attorneys in contempt Friday for failing to deliver documents to former Sen. Ted Stevens' legal team.

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan said it was "outrageous" that government attorneys would ignore his deadline for turning over documents.

Last month, Sullivan ordered the Justice Department to turn over all the agency's internal communications regarding a whistleblower complaint against the FBI agent leading the investigation into the former Alaska senator.

The agent, Chad Joy, bitterly complained about some Justice Department tactics during the trial, including not turning over evidence and an "inappropriate relationship" between another agent working the case and the prosecutor's star witness.

Stevens was convicted in October of lying on Senate disclosure documents about hundreds of thousands of dollars in gifts and home renovations from an Alaska businessman. In November, Stevens lost his bid for re-election to the Senate seat he had held since 1968.

Stevens and his lawyers complained during the trial about prosecutors withholding information. In December, they asked for his conviction to be tossed out. As part of their request, they asked for the documents related to Joy.

During Friday's hearing, Sullivan repeatedly asked three Justice Department attorneys sitting at the prosecution's table whether they had some reason not to turn over the documents. They finally acknowledged they did not, and Sullivan exploded into anger.

"That was a court order," he bellowed. "That wasn't a request. I didn't ask for them out of the kindness of your hearts. ... Isn't the Department of Justice taking court orders seriously these days"

He said he didn't want to get "sidetracked" by deciding a sanction immediately and would deal with their punishment later. But he ordered them to produce the material by the end of the day.

"That's outrageous for the Department of Justice -- the largest law firm on the planet," he said. "That is not acceptable in this court."

Sullivan held all three attorneys sitting at the table in contempt and demanded repeatedly to know who else was involved in withholding the information. Another government attorney sitting in the back of the courtroom stood up and gave her name.

We are continuing to report this story and will post further updates as soon as we have them. See

Key players contest FBI whistle-blower allegations

STEVENS TRIAL: The defense is using complaint to get a new trial or charges against ex-senator dropped.

By RICHARD MAUER and LISA DEMER
Anchorage Daily News
(02/15/09 21:47:45)

As the Justice Department prepares its official response to the FBI whistle-blower complaint that surfaced in the case of former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, people with first-hand knowledge of some of its issues, including some named in the complaint, say it represents overblown concerns of an inexperienced agent.

The unusual complaint was brought by FBI agent Chad Joy, one of the key investigators in the five-year-old federal inquiry into corruption in Alaska politics. He accused the lead agent in the broad investigation and several prosecutors in the Stevens case of wrongdoing.

One former confidential source in the corruption investigation took issue with some of the facts alleged in the complaint by Joy. The source, Frank Prewitt, a former state corrections commissioner, said in an interview recently that he never observed FBI case agent Mary Beth Kepner, the chief target of the complaint, cross the line into improper or unethical conduct.

And the retired second-in-command of the Anchorage FBI office, Robert Burnham, described Kepner as a top-notch, creative investigator. Joy, her co-case agent turned antagonist, was meticulous with numbers but inexperienced and uncomfortable with the discretion that agents in the field sometimes need, Burnham said.

The opinions of Prewitt and Burnham contrast sharply with those of lawyers representing Stevens, the former Alaska senator who was convicted of seven felony disclosure crimes in October in a case investigated by Kepner, Joy and others. Stevens' attorneys cite Joy's complaint as evidence of government misconduct. They are using the complaint in their efforts to win a new trial or outright dismissal of charges against Stevens.

Joy's eight-page complaint, written in late November and made public by the trial judge in Stevens' case on Dec. 22, contains dozens of allegations of rule bending and possible criminal violations by Kepner and the prosecutors who took Stevens to trial.

Joy's charges are under investigation by the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility. The complaint has also interrupted the ongoing corruption investigation, which has so far yielded 10 convictions. While FBI officials won't talk about their management of the investigation, code-named "Polar Pen." Joy said in a supplemental filing to his complaint that several of Kepner's key sources have been reassigned to other agents and that her role has changed.

As the Anchorage bureau office and prosecutors scramble to respond to the post-trial developments in the Stevens case and the Justice Department investigation, it's unclear what the ultimate effect will be. At least three current or former elected officials have been identified as still under investigation: U.S. Rep. Don Young, former state Senate President Ben Stevens and former state Sen. Jerry Ward.

FBI - Stevens-2424

194A-AN-13620-m -953

One or more federal grand juries are still actively involved in the corruption investigation, according to a Jan. 16 court order in the case of Jim Clark, chief of staff for former Gov. Frank Murkowski. Clark is cooperating and awaiting sentencing.

Stevens' lawyers said Joy's complaint contains strong evidence that government misconduct tainted the investigation and the trial, not just by Kepner but prosecutors too.

"On their face these allegations suggest that the entire POLAR PEN investigation -- which Kepner spearheaded as the government's lead case agent, and which led to the Stevens indictment -- was corruptly handled," the defense attorneys said in their motion for a new trial. "If the agent in charge accepted favors from witnesses, did favors for witnesses, inappropriately revealed information to witnesses and the media, and failed to properly catalog and store documents, then the government's factual presentation and its discovery cannot be trusted."

Neither Kepner, Joy, prosecutors in the case, nor other FBI or Justice Department officials would comment directly on the allegations, saying they will answer in court and in the official investigation.

But the investigation doesn't stop others from talking, and some agreed to be interviewed about the complaint.

EVOLUTION OF AN INVESTIGATION

According to his complaint, Anchorage was Joy's first FBI assignment. He wrote that he was assigned to the corruption investigation in 2004, shortly after his arrival. He became deeply involved in managing sources of his own and assisting the prosecution of Stevens.

Kepner served in the field office in Juneau, where her husband, Floyd Spinner, was a city cop. For part of her seven years there, a second agent was assigned to the Juneau office, but by necessity she often worked solo, Burnham said.

Burnham was the assistant special agent in charge in Anchorage from 2000 to 2006. He retired from the FBI in 2007 and is now working in private security in the West. He asked in a telephone interview that his actual location not be disclosed because of his prior law-enforcement work.

Kepner, now a 17-year veteran of the bureau, was responsible for initiating and expanding the corruption investigation, and she pushed hard to get the Alaska FBI headquarters in Anchorage to provide resources for the case, Burnham said. That was difficult until Joy arrived with other transferring agents in January 2004.

While other agents had assisted Kepner from time to time, Joy was the first besides Kepner herself to be assigned to the corruption case full-time, Burnham said.

"He's got a financial background and I'm sure that some of our thinking was that he would be meticulous, which is what we needed to handle some of the admin responsibilities that go with cases like this," said Burnham. "Since Mary Beth was quite experienced and I had complete faith in her direct supervisor (white-collar-crime squad chief Colton Seale), it seemed like a pretty good match as far as what we thought his talents would be and what the need was for."

In his 2008 book "Last Bridge to Nowhere," Prewitt described how he became Kepner's "Confidential Source One" in April 2004. The overall investigation was still small then and focused on an influence scheme to get the state to accommodate a private prison in Alaska -- hence the FBI code name "Polar Pen."

The name seemed incongruous later when the investigation expanded to include illegal efforts by the oil-field service company Veco Corp. and its chief executive Bill Allen to dominate state politics, promote construction of a natural gas pipeline under terms favored by the oil industry, and to influence Washington.

The bigger case materialized "because Mary Beth was so dogged and determined and so creative in developing cooperating witnesses, cooperating subjects," said Burnham, who was her direct supervisor when the inquiry began.

First a target of the investigation then the subject of a search warrant, Prewitt, hired by the companies promoting the private prison, eventually learned he would face no charges. Kepner asked him to voluntarily cooperate. He agreed.

His book describes how the investigation dominated his life over the next four years. He secretly recorded conversations, attempted to turn other witnesses and consulted with agents and prosecutors about the politics, personalities and government of Alaska, he wrote. But Prewitt acknowledges his book embellishes the truth with fiction, making it a less-than-reliable text.

In his complaint, Joy says Kepner became too close to Prewitt and his wife, Vicki, and other confidential sources. He accused Kepner of accepting "multiple things of value from sources," specifically artwork, help with house hunting, and a job for her husband. Kepner also revealed too many of the secrets of the investigation to them, Joy charged.

Allegations concerning Kepner's relationship with Frank and Vicki Prewitt appear on four of the complaint's eight pages.

Veco's Allen is mentioned even more. Allen and Prewitt are among a half dozen confidential sources whom Joy said were mismanaged by Kepner.

For instance, Joy thought it was wrong for Kepner to meet Allen alone in a hotel room when both were in Washington for the Stevens trial. He reported that Kepner wore a skirt instead of her usual pants as a "surprise/present" for Allen when he testified.

Stevens' defense has leaped on those allegations as evidence that Kepner and Allen had a sexual relationship, though Joy made no such claim.

Allen, through his Anchorage attorney Bob Bundy, declined to address any of Joy's allegations. Bundy said it would be inappropriate for him to discuss the complaint because of Allen's status as a cooperating witness. Allen pleaded guilty to conspiracy, bribery and tax charges and is awaiting sentencing.

But overall, said Bundy, a former U.S. Attorney, Joy's complaint appears baseless as it relates to Allen.

"What bothers me tremendously is that I do not believe there was ever any kind of improper relationship between Mary Beth Kepner and Bill Allen, from everything I was ever able to see," Bundy said.

Burnham said there is nothing in FBI policy that would prohibit an agent from meeting a source alone.

Eric Gonzalez, chief counsel for the FBI in Anchorage and the agency's local spokesman, said he couldn't comment on Joy's complaint. But speaking in general terms, there are no restrictions on where agents can meet sources, he said. They can meet one-on-one, can go to the home of a source, can eat out or share a meal at the source's home, if one is offered.

Successful agents work hard to cultivate good sources, Gonzalez said.

"You need to be very personable. Your sources have to trust you. And, you know, it's a relationship," Gonzalez said.

Prewitt's name was blacked out in the copy of Joy's complaint made public by the judge who heard Stevens' case. But in a recent interview in their South Anchorage home, Frank and Vicki Prewitt said their identities were unmistakable in the document.

CLOSE CONTACT

Among Joy's specific complaints are assertions that Kepner ate dinner or lunch with Prewitt and his wife at their home on many occasions, and met with Prewitt without another agent being present -- facts that would appear to be of no issue based on FBI policies. In any event, the Prewitts dismissed those claims as no big deal.

"Yes, I had lots of meetings with Mary Beth alone," Prewitt said. Sometimes his father-in-law was in his apartment in their home, sometimes Vicki Prewitt was there. And sometimes Kepner's husband picked her up.

"Any suggestion that agent Kepner and I were improperly close was preposterous," he said.

And it's true, he said, that he discussed cases with Kepner -- and with other agents and prosecutors too.

"Of course I discussed details because I was part of the investigative team involved in all of those cases," Frank Prewitt said. "They were always very careful not to say anything more about any ongoing investigation than they needed to get something out of my head."

"Chad was a friend too," Frank Prewitt added.

Joy's complaint included an assertion that Kepner provided the Prewitts with "detailed information about my personal background, my (wife) and (children) without my permission knowing I would not have allowed her to do so."

But the Prewitts said it was Joy himself who revealed those details -- to their teenage daughter while Frank Prewitt was talking to Kepner.

"That's how we knew about his family," Vicki Prewitt said.

As the focus of her work shifted to Anchorage, Kepner was spending increasing amounts of time living out of a suitcase, Prewitt said. In the summer of 2006, she and her husband, Spinner, moved to Anchorage.

"When Kepner moved from Juneau to Anchorage, Kepner utilized (Prewitt's wife) to locate homes," Joy said in his complaint, noting that Vicki Prewitt was a licensed real estate agent.

The allegation contains a partial truth, but the implication that she did professional or business favors for Kepner is wrong, Vicki Prewitt said. When she learned that Kepner was moving, it was natural for her to try to help, she said.

FBI - Stevens-2427

"I'm an Alaskan. I network," she said. "I just said my favorite builder is selling his home soon." The builder, Larry McBain, builds custom houses, occupies them for a time, then sells them, she said. The Prewitts knew McBain because he had built an addition on their home.

"He's an agent. He lists his own houses," Vicki Prewitt said.

She said she introduced Kepner and Spinner to McBain, but the sides came to terms on their own. Vicki Prewitt said McBain offered her a commission but she turned it down. Though she had a current license, she no longer was an active agent, she said.

Vicki Prewitt said that Joy's assertion that she showed Kepner multiple homes is wrong.

"I knew somebody. I didn't act as an agent. I didn't receive any money," Vicki Prewitt said.

In a telephone interview, McBain said he sold the couple the house on a view lot on the upper Hillside in August 2006 for $445,000. He described the call from Vicki Prewitt as "just a coincidence" a couple weeks before he planned to list the house.

"I didn't pay anything to Vicki. There was no referral fee, nothing," McBain said. And he didn't lower the price of the house because he didn't have the expense of an agent, he said -- Kepner and her husband paid very close to the asking price. It was still a sellers' market then, he said.

"I ended up with all the proceeds from the sale of the house," McBain said. "There was no benefit to (Kepner and her husband) at all." If anyone was done a favor by Vicki Prewitt, he said, it was him.

A few weeks ago, two FBI agents interviewed McBain about the transaction. He told them the "same thing I'm telling you," he said.

Joy also complained about a gift from the Prewitts to Kepner. Vicki Prewitt "drew and provided Kepner a large original drawing of Kepner's dog as a gift. This artwork is hanging on a wall in Kepner's home near her stairs."

Vicki Prewitt, an art major in college, said that after painting part-time over the years, she has found her niche as a painter of dog portraits and wildlife in watercolor. The Prewitts run Rae'vens Brush studio (her middle name is Rae) from their home.

For Christmas 2007, she said, she painted some 30 dog portraits for friends and relatives, "every single person I knew, whether they wanted it or not." She painted Kepner's yellow Lab, Ranger, from a photo, and surprised Kepner and Spinner with the gift.

RELATIONSHIP SOURS

What happened next is the subject of a long passage toward the end of Prewitt's book. Just after the 2008 new year, Kepner asked Prewitt to meet her at a South Anchorage coffee shop. At the table, she said, someone in the FBI learned about the gift and expressed a concern, according to the book.

Kepner wrote a check for the picture. Vicki Prewitt remembers it as $300.

In his complaint, Joy said he was unhappy to have been mentioned several times in Prewitt's book, and he thought that Prewitt revealed too much about the case and named suspects who hadn't been charged. Joy also expressed displeasure that Prewitt complained about him to the FBI after he formally closed Prewitt as a source.

Prewitt said he felt mistreated in that final encounter with Joy and another agent about two months ago. He said Joy told him the FBI was ending its relationship with him because he "betrayed" the agency with his book.

Prewitt said there was nothing improper in his book, and he felt unceremoniously dumped after the investigation consumed four years of his life.

Prewitt declined to provide a copy of the letter he sent about Joy to FBI director Robert Mueller.

Another claim by Joy, that a different source of Kepner's got Spinner a job after he moved from Juneau, could only be partially checked. The source's name was blacked out in the complaint and his or her identity couldn't be determined.

"Source gave Kepner's husband his current job as a security guard at the Port of Anchorage," Joy complained.

Security at the port is run by an independent contractor, Doyon Universal Services. The port director, former Gov. Bill Sheffield, is a friend of Stevens and has criticized the federal prosecution. Sheffield said Doyon has full authority to hire security guards. He said he asked around, and no one reported interference in the hiring of Spinner, and he said he played no role.

"He was a cop in Juneau and they put out a search for people and he qualified and they hired him," Sheffield said.

Bruce Lester, a Doyon employee and Spinner's supervisor at the port, said there was nothing unusual in his hire. "There was no favoritism. He met our requirements and that's all I'm going to say."

Bob Kean, the Doyon Universal vice president over the security division, said he read a copy Joy's complaint from the Internet and termed its reference to Spinner's hire as "truly one of the most bizarre allegations I've ever seen."

No one lobbied Doyon for or against Spinner, he said.

"There is no credibility to that allegation. Floyd was hired on his own skills and prior job experience. We had no idea Mary Beth was an agent till after he was hired. The hiring authority at this office had no idea his wife was an agent, nor would it have mattered," Kean said.

Judge lets attorney off hook for contempt in Stevens trial

Anchorage Daily News
(02/14/09 22:35:35)

WASHINGTON, D.C. -- The judge presiding over the aftermath of former Sen. Ted Stevens' trial let one Justice Department attorney off the hook from a contempt citation Saturday.

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan of the District of Columbia said that attorney Kevin Driscoll shouldn't have been among the prosecutors he cited Friday for contempt for failing to turn over documents to Stevens' legal team.

Sullivan, who oversaw Stevens' trial last fall, issued the unusual Saturday order, saying Driscoll was new on the case and handling just one post-trial issue. Sullivan said Driscoll wasn't responsible for not following his earlier order to hand over the material involving an FBI whistle-blower's complaint to Stevens' team.

Sullivan said his order still stands against William Welch, the head of the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section; Brenda Morris, his chief assistant and the lead trial attorney in Stevens case; and the chief of the Justice Department's criminal appeals section, Patty Merkamp Stemler.

Stevens, convicted in October of seven counts of failure to disclose gifts and services, is seeking a new trial, saying that government misconduct denied him a fair trial. The whistle-blower complaint, by an agent who worked on the Stevens investigation, surfaced in December and contains allegations that prosecutors acted improperly during the trial.

Kohring writes from prison, asked for pardon

Former Wasilla area Rep. Vic Kohring and his attorney John Henry Browne talk to the media May 8, after a federal judge sentenced the former lawmaker to 3 1/2 years in prison. Bill Roth / Earl, Roth

From Kyle Hopkins in Anchorage --

Former Rep. Vic Kohring asked President Bush for a pardon -- or at least a lesser sentence -- just before Bush left office.

That according to a letter the longtime Valley lawmaker wrote to the Daily News this month.

"I felt my odds were greatly against me with both requests," Kohring wrote. "But needed to ask anyway, otherwise I'll always wonder if they would have been granted."

They weren't.

Kohring's still in a minimum-security prison in Taft, Calif., where he insists he never committed any crime and is awaiting appeal.

A federal judge sentenced him in May to three and a half years for bribery, conspiracy and attempted extortion. The handwritten letter is one of two he wrote to the paper Feb. 2.

In the first, a letter to the editor, Kohring gives an update on his appeal and generally sounds like any inmate would after a few months in prison. He says he misses his family. He says he's been passing the time reading and studying and writing letters, and hopes people will write him back.

"I have been incarcerated for seven months now, although it seems longer," he writes.

In the second letter, he talks about the pardon request.

"If I had succeeded, it would have been akin to winning a million-dollar lottery, as literally thousands of prisoners have applied including high-profile people such as ex-Senator Stevens, ex-Congressman Duke Cunningham and ex-Governor George Ryan."

(Actually, Sen. Lisa Murkowski applied on Stevens behalf.)

When Stevens didn't get a pardon, Kohring knew he wouldn't either, he wrote.

Just as well, he says: "I'd much prefer to win my appeal, be granted a new trial and prove my innocence."

...

Here's a video I shot of Kohring on the day he went to jail:

Stevens' prosecutors removed from misconduct proceedings

TRIAL AFTERMATH: Move comes on heels of contempt ruling.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(02/16/09 21:12:46)

The Justice Department said Monday it has removed the legal team that prosecuted former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens from further post-trial proceedings that concern allegations of government misconduct.

The terse announcement, made as part of a larger filing by prosecutors, leaves questions unanswered about the scope of the decision. A spokeswoman for the Justice Department declined to elaborate.

The latest turn of events in the increasingly bitter and messy aftermath of Stevens' conviction in October follows the contempt ruling against three Justice Department attorneys last week by U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan of the District of Columbia.

Sullivan, who presided over Stevens' trial, cited the lawyers for not following his orders to turn over internal Justice Department files about an FBI whistle-blower to Stevens. Sullivan said he would withhold for the time being a decision about how to punish the government lawyers.

The four-page filing by prosecutors Monday was mainly a public notice that the government had decided to not stand on its claim that the material sought by the defense was protected by attorney work-product privilege, a rule that usually prevents having to turn material over to the other side.

"In deciding to release these materials to the defendant, the government acknowledges the importance of resolving the pending post-trial motions as expeditiously as possible," the prosecution wrote. "By foregoing any further litigation about the release of these documents, it hopes to avoid distractions and remain focused on the post-trial motions defendant has filed -- motions that include claims of prosecutorial misconduct before and during his trial."

The filing announced the replacement of the original team of attorneys led by the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section from "litigation relating to allegations of misconduct in this matter." The team is headed by William Welch, chief of that office, and his main deputy, Brenda Morris, who was the lead attorney in the Stevens trial. Also affected are two other lawyers in that office, Nicholas Marsh and Edward Sullivan, and two on special assignment from the U.S. Attorney's office in Anchorage, Joe Bottini and James Goeke.

Replacing them will be Paul O'Brien, chief of the Narcotic and Dangerous Drug Section, David Jaffe, deputy chief of the Domestic Security Section, and William Stuckwisch, senior trial attorney in the Fraud Section.

Defense arguments of misconduct figure into several demands for a new trial or dismissal of charges by Stevens' attorneys, mainly involving the allegations of Anchorage FBI agent Chad Joy and a witness in the case, Dave Anderson.

194A-AN-13620-M -956

Joy, part of the team investigating political corruption in Alaska since 2004, said the lead agent in the probe grew too close to sources and violated policy then, with prosecutors, worked to prevent Stevens from obtaining favorable evidence before and during the trial. Anderson, the government's final witness, said he gave false testimony about a plea deal he believed he had with the government, and that prosecutors knew it.

The government has denied wrongdoing but hasn't publicly answered the allegations in any detail.

The defense cites other issues in its demand for a new trial that have nothing to do with misconduct by prosecutors, such as a decision by the judge to hold the trial in Washington, D.C., instead of Alaska, or juror misconduct. It is unclear whether the initial prosecution team will continue to work on those issues, or what will happen if the judge orders a new trial.

Masek pleads guilty to conspiracy, awaits sentencing

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com
(03/12/09 11:21:23)

Former state Rep. Beverly Masek completed her bargain with federal prosecutors this morning, pleading guilty to a conspiracy in which she accepted bribes to kill a bill that would have raised oil production taxes.

U.S. District Judge Ralph Beistline set sentencing for May 28. Under her plea deal with the government, filed on the public docket Wednesday, Masek faces 18 to 24 months in prison and a fine ranging from $4,000 to $40,000. The maximum penalty for a bribery conspiracy is five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

In court this morning, Masek, 45, was represented by two attorneys from the federal public defender's office. She answered questions from the judge. Aside from her lawyers, she appeared to be alone.

According to the charging document, Masek sent an emissary to a vice president of the oil-field service company Veco Corp., Rick Smith, asking for a meeting with him or his boss, Bill Allen, to complain about her financial condition. Her plea to the Veco executives, known for their generosity to lawmakers who supported their positions, was made during the legislative session in 2003.

Two days later, an Allen relative handed her at least $2,000 in cash, the charge said.

The next month, she introduced a bill that would have eliminated a big tax break for oil companies on Alaska's North Slope. A day later, Allen came to her office and told her it was a terrible idea. She withdrew the bill and accepted another $2,000 in cash.

Masek was defeated in the 2004 Republican primary after serving in the House from Willow starting in 1995.

Whistle-blowers may get to testify in Stevens trial

INVESTIGATION: Judge wants a status report from the prosecution.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

FBI - Stevens-2435

(03/10/09 20:51:28)

WASHINGTON -- The judge who oversaw former Sen. Ted Stevens' trial said Tuesday he may allow testimony in open court from two of the people who have come forward with complaints about how the investigation and prosecution unfolded.

Stevens, who was found guilty on seven counts of filing false statements on his U.S. Senate financial disclosure forms, was convicted Oct. 27. Since then, though, the former Alaska senator's lawyers have filed several motions to outright dismiss his original indictment or to grant Stevens a new trial. Their motions have been based in part on allegations in a whistle-blower complaint by Anchorage FBI agent Chad Joy, and a witness in the case, Dave Anderson.

"A lot has happened since the verdict was returned in October," said U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan, who during Tuesday's hearing largely dealt with housekeeping matters connected to the Joy complaint and a letter submitted to him by Anderson.

The judge on Tuesday agreed to put on hold all other pending motions in the trial until prosecutors give him a written status update about their progress and plan for releasing documents and other materials to the defense. The documents in question are connected to information revealed in Joy's whistle-blower complaint and in Anderson's letter to the court.

Anderson, the government's final witness in the trial, did extensive work on Stevens' home in Girdwood while on the payroll of the defunct oil-field service company Veco Corp. He said in a letter to the court following Stevens' conviction that he gave false testimony about a plea deal he believed he had with the government, and that prosecutors knew it. The government has disputed Anderson's account.

Separately, Joy said the lead agent in the probe grew too close to sources and violated FBI policy. Part of the team investigating political corruption in Alaska since 2004, Joy also alleged that prosecutors worked to prevent Stevens' lawyers from seeing favorable evidence before and during the trial.

"We are mindful the verdict was returned in October and has been lingering before the court," said Paul O'Brien, a Justice Department attorney who was recently assigned to the case.

"It's not been lingering," Sullivan said, adding that the corruption case is "just as active" post-trial as it was before and during the trial.

Justice Department lawyers told the judge Tuesday that they have already begun turning over information, including the results of interviews conducted by the department's internal investigators. They've also been conducting witness interviews with people within the department with knowledge about Joy's complaint and knowledge about the matters he outlined in it.

Tuesday's hearing was the first to feature the Justice Department's new legal team on the case: O'Brien, chief of the Narcotic and Dangerous Drug Section; David Jaffe, deputy chief of the Domestic Security Section; and William Stuckwisch, a senior Fraud Section trial attorney. The three are handling all post-trial matters connected with allegations of attorney misconduct.

The new team took over after Sullivan last month held in contempt the lead attorney during the trial, her supervisor, and an appellate attorney at the Justice Department for failing to turn over to Stevens' legal team internal Justice Department files about Joy.

The government has until April 9 to file an update on where prosecutors are on releasing information about Anderson and Joy to the court. Stevens' team has until April 14 to file its response. Another hearing is set for April 15.

Former Alaska State Senator Sentenced on Public Corruption Charges

WASHINGTON – John Cowdery, a former elected member of the Alaska state senate, was sentenced today to three years probation with a special condition requiring him to serve six months of home confinement for conspiring to bribe another Alaska state legislator, Acting Assistant Attorney General Rita M. Glavin of the Criminal Division announced.

U.S. District Judge Ralph Beistline for the District of Alaska also ordered Cowdery to pay a $25,000 fine.

On Dec. 19, 2008, Cowdery pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit bribery concerning programs receiving federal funds. In court documents, Cowdery admitted to conspiring with Bill J. Allen, the former chief executive officer of VECO Corporation (VECO), a now-defunct multinational oil field services company, and Richard L. Smith, a former VECO vice president, to offer at least $10,000 in purported campaign contributions to State Senator A in exchange for State Senator A's support of a proposed petroleum profits tax, or PPT, that VECO wanted the Alaska state legislature to pass in 2006. Cowdery admitted that he and Allen met State Senator A on June 25, 2006, at an Anchorage restaurant to offer State Senator A the bribe. Cowdery admitted that he and Allen specifically conditioned receipt of the bribe, which State Senator A did not accept, on State Senator A's support for the PPT legislation sought by VECO and Allen. Allen and Smith both pleaded guilty to multiple federal corruption charges in May 2007 and both are awaiting sentencing.

Including Cowdery's guilty plea and those of Allen and Smith, there have been ten criminal convictions to date arising out of the ongoing investigation into public corruption in the state of Alaska. Thomas T. Anderson, a former elected member of the Alaska House of Representatives, was convicted in July 2007 and sentenced to five years in prison for extortion, conspiracy, bribery and money laundering for soliciting and receiving money from an FBI confidential source in exchange for agreeing to perform official acts to further a business interest represented by the source. Peter Kott, a former speaker of the Alaska House of Representatives, was convicted in September 2007 and sentenced to six years in prison for extortion, bribery and conspiracy. Victor H. Kohring, a former elected member of the Alaska House of Representatives, was convicted at trial in November 2007 for attempted extortion, bribery and conspiracy, and was sentenced to three and a half years in prison. In March 2008, James Clark, chief of staff to a former governor of Alaska, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit honest services mail and wire fraud. Former Anchorage lobbyist William Bobrick pleaded guilty in May 2007 to felony public corruption charges. U.S. Sen. Theodore F. Stevens was convicted at trial on Oct. 27, 2008, of making false statements regarding his required U.S. Senate financial disclosures for 2001 through 2006. Former Alaska businessman William Weimar was sentenced to six months in prison on Nov. 12, 2008, after pleading guilty on Aug. 12, 2008, to conspiracy to commit honest services mail and wire fraud and structuring financial transactions.

The case was prosecuted by trial attorneys Nicholas A. Marsh and Edward P. Sullivan of the Criminal Division's Public Integrity Section, headed by Chief William M. Welch, II, and Assistant U.S. Attorneys Joseph W. Bottini and James A. Goeke from the District of Alaska. The case was investigated by the FBI and the Internal Revenue Service Criminal Investigative Division.

Former Young aide is indicted in lobbying scandal

GRATUITY: All-expense paid trip to World Series wasn't reported.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(03/06/09 21:38:12)

A second former high-level committee aide to Rep. Don Young was accused Friday of violating federal anti-corruption laws in the long-running Abramoff lobbying scandal.

A three-count indictment charged Fraser Verrusio, policy director for the House Transportation Committee when Young was chairman of the panel, with conspiracy, accepting an illegal gratuity in the form of an all-expense paid World Series weekend in New York, and failing to report the gift.

In return for the October 2003 trip to see the Yankees host the Florida Marlins in the Bronx, the Washington grand jury charged that Verrusio conspired with lobbyists, a Senate aide and an equipment rental company to change national policy in the committee's federal highway bill.

An amendment inserted in the Senate and then defended by Verrusio in the House would have encouraged public works agencies collecting federal highway money to rent rather than own equipment, the indictment charged. Rather than purchase their equipment, the amendment created incentives for agencies to rent from the leasing company, which wasn't named in the indictment.

Verrusio, 39, was one of Young's first hires when he took over as chairman of the Transportation Committee in 2001. According to the Congress-tracking Web site Legistorm, Verrusio started as director of outreach for the committee on Feb. 16, 2001, a position designed to mobilize constituent groups like contractors or truckers in support of bills. Verrusio was promoted to policy director in April 2002 at an annual salary of more than $130,000.

The other Young aide caught up in the Abramoff scandal, committee lawyer Mark Zachares, pleaded guilty in April 2007 to helping Abramoff and his associates get business and inside information from the committee in exchange for cash, gifts and job favors. His sentencing was postponed indefinitely while he cooperates with the ongoing federal investigation.

Zachares and Verrusio were supervised by Young's chief of staff on the transportation committee, Lloyd Jones, a former Republican state senator from Ketchikan married to another ex-state senator, Jan Faiks of Anchorage. Jones, Zachares and Verrusio had nearby offices in the Rayburn House Office Building.

A call to the Jones and Faiks home in Virginia wasn't returned. Young's office also declined to comment. A phone number listed for Verrusio on a 2008 lobbyist registration form belonged to someone else and he couldn't be reached.

FBI - Stevens-2439

Neither Young nor Jones have answered questions about the Abramoff scandal since Zachares' plea.

There has been no formal indication that Young himself in under investigation in the Abramoff scandal. But Young, who has reporting spending more than $1 million in legal defense fees from his campaign account, is under investigation in Alaska in connection with the wide-ranging FBI corruption probe centered on the defunct oil-field service company Veco Corp.

Young has denied wrongdoing but has never answered specific questions, even when he campaigned for re-election last year. Veco's chief executive, Bill Allen, told the FBI that Veco illegally paid for a Young fundraiser, and that a Veco vice president organized golf outings in which participants paid $100 each to Young as a "thank you" gratuity, according to documents made public during the trial of Sen. Ted Stevens. Allen indicated to the agents that he didn't consider the payments bribes -- "you can't 'buy' Young," the agents' notes quoted Allen as saying.

Under federal law, a gratuity to a public official is only illegal if it is tied to a specific act. A bill in Congress now would remove that restriction, making it illegal to privately pay someone for being a public official.

The equipment rental conspiracy alleged in the Verrusio indictment has already resulted in guilty pleas from the two Abramoff associates -- Todd Boulanger and James Hirni -- and the Senate aide, Trevor Blackann, who at the time worked for Sen. Christopher Bond, R-Mo.

Term limits forced Young to give up the Transportation Committee in 2006. Young took Jones and several other key staffers with him to the House Resources Committee, where he became ranking Republican member, but Verrusio stayed at Transportation until May 2007, according to Legistorm. Senate records show he then became a lobbyist for an engineering company.

According to the indictment, the highway bill was in committee in both the House and Senate when Boulanger and Hirni began pushing for amendments favorable to their client.

Hirni offered Verrusio the all-expense paid trip to New York on Oct. 17, 2003, the day before the World Series opened in Yankee Stadium. The lobbyists paid for his airfare from Washington to Queens, two days with a chauffeured, seven-passenger limousine, a night in a New York hotel, dinner at a steak joint and the baseball tickets. As they were leaving the Stadium, Verrusio asked Hirni to buy him a souvenir baseball jersey for about $130. The indictment didn't specify the team or player, but Verrusio got his souvenir.

After the game, the party finished up with drinks at a strip club paid for by Hirni. Verrusio's share for entertainment and booze at the club was $150. Altogether, his share of weekend's cost was about $1,300, the indictment charged, but it might as well have been priceless for anyone looking at Verrusio's annual disclosure the next year -- there was no mention of it.

Three days later, Hirni e-mailed Verrusio information about the amendments he wanted in the highway bill. By November, they had been inserted in the Senate version of the highway bill with Blackann's assistance. Over the next months, companies that sold equipment directly to agencies got wind of the measure and mounted a vigorous opposition. Verrusio helped fight off that effort, the indictment charged.

An official from the rental company boasted in an e-mail that he was confident his side would prevail, the indictment said.

"Our guys don't think it is going to be a problem," the official wrote. "We have a much stronger relationship and we are already in the bill, and soon to be in the house bill too."

In January 2004, Verrusio suggested the lobbyists use the "grassroots" techniques he practiced at the Transportation Committee before he became policy director: he told them to organize a letter-writing campaign to Congress by the owners and operators of local affiliates of the rental company.

Unsealed record shows DOJ response to Stevens whistleblower

by Jill Burke
Tuesday, February 17, 2009

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- New details have emerged in former Sen. Ted Stevens' corruption case as previously sealed documents are being made public.

Justice Department prosecutors argue that the misconduct allegations of an FBI whistleblower who worked the case are not a basis for a new trial.

The government argues Special Agent Chad Joy's claims of witness and evidence mishandling are based on speculation and inaccurate portrayals.

Based on those allegations, Stevens' defense team has demanded a new trial.

Prosecutors claim the defense is trying to drum up "inflammatory press coverage and embarrass the government."

Prosecutors attempted to keep the whistleblower complaint out of public view, citing the need to protect the rights of government employees, as well as ongoing investigations.

Former Veco chief executive Bill Allen and a Veco vice president, Rick Smith, won't have to worry about prison again until at least June 30, when federal prosecutors will present another status report on their cooperation in the long-running FBI investigation.

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick accepted the most recent status report, filed under seal Tuesday by prosecutors from the U.S. Attorney's office in Anchorage. He agreed to allow the filing in secret "because it relates to on-going investigations," he wrote in an order.

Sedwick's order was the fifth time he has delayed sentencing and asked for status reports since the two men pleaded guilty in May 2007 to corrupting Alaska legislators. Their trial testimony has since led to guilty verdicts against two legislators and former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

Federal guidelines entitle Allen and Smith to shorter sentences if they continue to cooperate until they are no longer needed. The latest delay is the strongest indication yet that the government is still pursuing its investigation despite setbacks following the Stevens conviction, including an FBI agent who claimed another agent and prosecutors violated Justice Department policy and may have broken the law.

The four-month delay before the next status report is substantially shorter than the previous delay, which was seven months. Assistant U.S. Attorney Joe Bottini said there was nothing significant about the disparity other than the belief of prosecutors that the judge preferred a shorter period. Two earlier delays were three months each, and a third was sixth months.

Cowdery gets home confinement, fine

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com
(03/10/09 09:33:59)

Former state Sen. John Cowdery was ordered this morning to serve six months in home confinement and fined $25,000 for conspiring to bribe another senator into supporting the oil-industry position on petroleum production taxes in 2006.

U.S. District Judge Ralph Beistline said Cowdery, 79, could leave home for medical visits or to attend church. The judge reprimanded Cowdery for violating the public's trust. When asked if he had anything to say, Cowdery said no. "My attorney covered everything I was going to cover," he said.

The judge sentenced Cowdery to three years' probation.

"Mr. Cowdery, it will be a miracle if you survive the period of probation," the judge said, based on what he had read in the pre-sentence reports. Cowdery arrived at court this morning in a wheelchair, pushed by his grandson.

Cowdery was still in office last July when the Justice Department charged him in a two-count indictment with conspiring with Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen to get as much as $25,000 in illegal campaign contributions to "State Senator A."

Federal prosecutors said the deal was never consummated. Sen. Donny Olson, D-Nome, has said he was State Senator A and that he cooperated with the FBI.

Cowdery says he is in poor health and argued he should get no more than six months of home confinement. Prosecutors agreed that prison wasn't appropriate for him but said his sentence should be a year.

The two sides also disagreed about the size of the fine, with the defense suggesting it should be $7,500 or less and the government asking for $25,000 -- the amount of the alleged bribe.

Cowdery is the 10th person convicted in the wide-ranging FBI corruption investigation in Alaska, begun in secret in 2004. Five of the convicted are lawmakers, including former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens. A sixth is awaiting trial.

Cowdery's wife, Juanita, and daughter Pamela wrote letters to Beistline stating their belief that Cowdery wasn't guilty and that his decision to enter into a plea bargain was made to avoid the rigors of trial.

"I believe John is innocent," Juanita Cowdery wrote Feb. 14. "He was just trying to help a friend."

"Our family as a unit decided not to fight the charges against my father due to my parents' ages and health issues," Pamela Cowdery said. "Given their ages and health, trial would have been too stressful for them."

A Republican who spent most of his working life as a contractor, Cowdery represented parts of the Anchorage Hillside and the Lake Otis Parkway area for 14 years in the Alaska House and Senate. He didn't seek re-election in November.

Stevens, who was found guilty on seven counts of filing false statements on his U.S. Senate financial disclosure forms, was convicted Oct. 27. Since then, his lawyers have filed several motions to dismiss his indictment or grant him a new trial. Their motions have been based, in part, on allegations by Anchorage FBI agent Chad Joy and a witness in the case, Dave Anderson.

Joy, part of the team investigating political corruption in Alaska since 2004, said the lead agent in the probe grew too close to sources and violated the FBI's policy. He also alleged that prosecutors worked to prevent Stevens from obtaining favorable evidence before and during the trial. Anderson, the government's final witness, said he gave false testimony about a plea deal he believed he had with the government, and that prosecutors knew it.

"A lot has happened since the verdict was returned in October," said U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan said during a hearing today.

The judge agreed to postpone for 30 days all other pending motions until the government gives him a written status update about where prosecutors are on releasing documents and other materials to the defense. The documents in question are connected to the information revealed in Joy's whistle-blower complaint and Anderson's letter to the court.

The government has until April 9 to file an update on where prosecutors are on releasing such information to the court. They told the judge they have already begun turning over information, including the results of interviews conducted by the Justice Department's internal investigators.

The defense has until April 14 to file a response. A hearing is set for April 15.

But Cowdery, due to be sentenced next week by U.S. District Judge Ralph Beistline, pleaded that he should get the minimum punishment of six months and a much lower fine due to his failing health, long career in public service and business, and his agreement to admit guilt.

In a sentencing memorandum filed Tuesday morning, Cowdery's attorney, Kevin Fitzgerald, said he and the prosecutors are largely in agreement. The only two unresolved issues for the judge are the length of home confinement -- six months or a year -- and the amount of the fine.

Fitzgerald said the government told him that $25,000 is the amount at issue in the bribery allegation, so that should also be the fine. But Fitzgerald asked Beistline to fine Cowdery at the "lower end" of a range that starts at $2,000.

Cowdery also filed a stack of 27 letters from politicians, lobbyists, contractors, businessmen, friends and relatives asking for leniency. Most cite Cowdery's age and failing health -- he's 79 and has been hospitalized for numerous ailments -- and his 60-year life in Alaska as a contractor and legislator.

FBI - Stevens-2446

His daughter, Pam, added a letter of her own that she e-mailed to the Daily News and said she would deliver to Beistline at her father's sentencing. In it, she pleaded for leniency and suggested that Cowdery might not have offered up his guilty plea if he hadn't been in ill health.

"Our family as a unit decided not to fight the charges against my father due to my parents' ages and health issues," she wrote. "Please have mercy, your honor, my Dad, Mom and family have been punished enough -- what with the media coverage, people cooking pork in my parents' driveway, reporters banging on the doors, the never-ending phone calls -- all this while my Dad was in the hospital and Mom was home alone."

CALL FOR LENIENCY

Among the other letter writers, his only grandson, Frank McHenry, said Cowdery was a special force in his life. Cowdery taught him how to run heavy equipment at age 8. "He taught me how to fly his plane, how to shoot a gun, how to operate a boat and how to run a snowmobile -- all before

194A-AN-13620-M; 9666 C

I was 14."

While Beistline doesn't have to follow the recommendations of the government or the defense, McHenry, who has children of his own, urged that Cowdery not get prison time.

"To speak bluntly, I am very afraid that if you sentence my Grandfather to serve any jail time, I think it will be a death sentence not only for my Grandfather, but also for my Grandmother. With his failing health, he has a hard enough time getting up and down the stairs or getting across the house to use the restroom. ... I am unsure if you are aware about my Grandmother's poor health. She has heart problems, has a pacemaker installed and has issues with her blood -- just to name a few things. She is one tough woman, but I think one of the main reasons she is still with us is to take care of her husband."

Former Anchorage mayor and state legislator Tom Fink also weighed in on behalf of Cowdery, echoing others when he urged leniency: "I believe he has contributed substantially to the well being of the citizens of this city and this state."

PROSECUTORS POINT TO CRIME

But the two prosecutors in the case, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jim Goeke and trial attorney Edward Sullivan of the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, said Cowdery was a corrupting force in the Legislature.

"It cannot be disputed that the defendant's crime, particularly given his past leadership roles in the Alaska State Senate, has struck a severe blow to the public's faith in the Alaska State Legislature and their elected leaders," Goeke and Sullivan wrote in the government's memorandum.

In December, while still a member of the state Senate, Cowdery pleaded guilty to conspiring with Allen and a Veco vice president, Rick Smith, to bribe another state senator into agreeing to take Veco's position on pending oil-tax legislation in 2006. Veco and the other state senator, Donny Olson, never consummated the deal, which would have gotten Olson $25,000 in illegal campaign contributions.

In return for the plea, the government dropped a second charge of bribery.

Olson has said he cooperated with the federal investigation.

In describing the case, Goeke and Sullivan said Cowdery tried "to induce another Alaska State Senator to sell his office for personal gain. Fortunately for the State of Alaska and its citizens, the other Alaska State Senator did not agree to sell his office."

Cowdery is the 10th person to be convicted in the broad federal corruption investigation in Alaska, with one other legislator awaiting trial. A Republican who spent most of his working life as a contractor, Cowdery represented parts of the Anchorage Hillside and the Lake Otis Parkway area for 14 years in the Alaska House and Senate.

Veco, an oil field service company, and Allen have been at the center of the investigation. Cowdery said he became friends with Allen years ago when both were contractors with similar backgrounds: poorly educated men who dropped out of school at an early age and turned to construction to support themselves and their families, eventually owning successful businesses.

Home confinements vary, depending on how a judge sees the issues. Some defendants are just given curfews, while others are essentially incarcerated at home. At an earlier hearing, Beistline indicated that Cowdery would be free to come and go for medical treatment.

The federal probation and pretrial services office enforces home confinements with an ankle bracelet and a phone link that dials an officer if the bracelet gets out of range. Some jurisdictions use GPS monitors that can track the location of a defendant.

Attorney general drops Stevens prosecution

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and RICHARD MAUER
Anchorage Daily News
(04/01/09 04:54:06)

WASHINGTON -- The Justice Department moved to dismiss former Sen. Ted Stevens' indictment this morning, effectively voiding his Oct. 27 conviction on seven counts of filing false statements on his Senate financial disclosure forms.

The decision by U.S. Attorney General Eric Holder comes after a new prosecution team discovered a previously undocumented interview with the star witness in the case that sharply contradicted the most dramatic testimony in the four-week trial. The information had never been turned over to the defense, the Justice Department said in its motion.

"After careful review, I have concluded that certain information should have been provided to the defense for use at trial, Holder said in a statement released this morning. "In light of this conclusion, and in consideration of the totality of the circumstances of this particular case, I have determined that it is in the interest of justice to dismiss the indictment and not proceed with a new trial."

The government is seeking dismissal of the charges "with prejudice," meaning that they cannot be filed again.

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan ordered a hearing on the government's motion for April 7.

"I always knew that there would be a day when the cloud that surrounded me would be removed," Stevens said in a written statement this morning. "That day has finally come. It is unfortunate that an election was affected by proceedings now recognized as unfair. It was my great honor to serve the state of Alaska in the United States Senate for 40 years."

Stevens was reported to be traveling in Alaska today and not immediately available for an interview.

In a written statement, Stevens lawyers decried the "corrupt" conduct of attorneys and the FBI in the case, though it said Holder and the new prosecution team, along with Sullivan, the trial judge, were "heroes" for bringing the information to light.

"This jury verdict was obtained unlawfully," said the statement by Washington-based law firm of Williams & Connolly and the two attorneys who led the defense team, Brendan Sullivan and Robert Cary. "The misconduct of government prosecutors, and one or more FBI agents, was stunning."

It was the lawyers' first statement to reporters since they began representing Stevens at least two years ago.

In a brief news conference this morning in Washington, defense attorney Brendan Sullivan said the former senator should never have been prosecuted.

"It was a bad judgment to have done so in the first place," said Sullivan. "He's a war hero. He served in the Senate for 40 years, and he was the target of prosecutors who wanted to enhance their own reputation."

The action today clears Stevens' name, Sullivan said.

"To us, while this is a joyful day and we're happy that Sen. Stevens can resume a normal life without the burden that he's carried over these last years, he said, "at age 85, it's a very sad story too. Because it's a warning to everyone in this country that any citizen can be convicted if the prosecutor ignores the Constitution of the United States."

-967 e

The dramatic testimony that brought down the case after months of post-trial wrangling came Oct. 1 during the second day on the witness stand for Bill Allen, the chairman of the defunct oil-field services company Veco Corp. It was the fifth day of a trial that would run more than a month.

Allen had described how he had spent tens of thousands of dollars renovating Stevens' home in Girdwood starting in 1999 - gifts that Stevens never disclosed. On Oct. 6, 2002, Stevens sent a handwritten note to Allen asking that it be "done right" - he wanted to pay for Veco's services. He told Allen that their mutual friend in Girdwood, Double Musky restaurant owner Bob Persons, would talk to him about the matter.

"You owe me a bill," the note from Stevens said. "Remember Torricelli, my friend. Friendship is one thing, compliance with the ethics rules entirely different." Robert Torricelli was a New Jersey senator who got into trouble in 2002 for accepting improper gifts from a donor.

Allen testified that he had a conversation a short time later with Persons. But Persons told him the note from Stevens shouldn't be taken seriously, Allen said.

"Don't worry about getting a bill - Ted's just covering his ass," Allen quoted Persons as saying.

The Allen statement came at the close of testimony for the day.

With the jury out of the courtroom, a defense attorney yelled foul, saying that in all the material turned over to the defense by the government under fair-trial rules, there was nothing from Allen quoting Persons like that. The defense accused the government and Allen of conspiring to make up the testimony. Even worse, they said, was that Allen's testimony came at the end of the day, leaving the jury to ponder it, unchallenged, overnight.

The newly discovered interview wasn't transcribed in the usual way, the Justice Department said this morning. Rather, it was discovered in the notes of attorneys who questioned Allen on April 15, 2008.

"The notes of the April 15 interview indicate that Bill Allen said, among other things, in substance and in part, that he (Bill Allen) did not recall talking to Bob Persons regarding giving a bill to the defendant," the Justice Department said in its motion to dismiss the case. "This statement by Allen during the April 15 interview was inconsistent with Allen's recollection at trial where he described a conversation with Persons about the Torricelli note."

The interview notes also say that Allen thought the market value of Veco's work on Stevens' home was about $80,000. The government introduced evidence from Veco's bookkeeping that suggested it was worth about $250,000, though the judge threw out some of that evidence because it proved to be wrong.

"Defendant Stevens was not informed prior to or during trial of the statements by Bill Allen on April 15, 2008," the department's motion for dismissal said. "This information could have been used by the defendant to cross-examine Bill Allen and in arguments to the jury."

In his statement, Holder didn't say precisely what he meant by the "interests of justice" dictating that Stevens not undergo a new trial. But Stevens' lawyers had argued that government misconduct was so extreme that the only remedy for the judge was to completely dismiss the case.

Stevens, who is 85, lost his re-election bid in November to the former Anchorage mayor, Democrat Mark Begich.

Since Stevens' conviction, the former senator's lawyers have filed several motions to outright dismiss his original indictment or to grant Stevens a new trial. Their motions have been based in part on allegations in a whistle-blower complaint by an Anchorage FBI agent, and other allegations of prosecutorial misconduct that emerged after Stevens' conviction.

FBI - Stevens-2449

The complaint by agent Chad Joy said prosecutors deliberately withheld information from Stevens' defense team.

The government appointed a new team of prosecutors when Judge Sullivan held in contempt the chief trial lawyer, Brenda Morris, and her boss at the Public Integrity Section, William Welch, in contempt for failing to turn over material to the defense uncovered in the investigation of Joy's allegations. It was the new team, led by Paul O'Brien, chief of the Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs Section, that last week discovered the April 15 meeting with Allen, the Justice Department said.

The Justice Department immediately turned over the notes of the April 15 meeting to the defense, it said.

Holder said that the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility "will conduct a thorough review of the prosecution of this matter."

"This does not mean or imply that any determination has been made about the conduct of those attorneys who handled the investigation and trial of this case," he said. "The Department of Justice must always ensure that any case in which it is involved is handled fairly and consistent with its commitment to justice. Under oftentimes trying conditions, the attorneys who serve in this department live up to those principles on a daily basis. I am proud of them and of the work they do for the American people."

Stevens' lawyers said Judge Sullivan was key to uncovering the misconduct by the Justice Department in the case.

"Judge Sullivan gave the defense the ability to press for evidence of misconduct," the statement said. "When he did so, more and more evidence came to light, including the most recent revelation about false testimony. Had Judge Sullivan accepted the word of government prosecutors as is done often in our courts, the extraordinary misconduct would never have been uncovered, and the trial verdict might have survived appellate review. Judge Sullivan prevented such a tragic outcome."

Rep. Don Young, who as Alaska's sole congressman spent 30 years working with Stevens, said he thought "justice has finally been served."

"It's a shame that Alaskans lost one of the best lawmakers they've ever had last year over a false conviction, but his legacy in Alaska will always live on," he said. "I join my fellow Alaskans today in standing by Ted and congratulating him and Catherine on the courage they've shown throughout this ordeal and the end of this difficult journey."

Stevens' replacement, Begich, said in a statement that "the decision by President Obama's Justice Department to end the prosecution of Senator Ted Stevens is reasonable."

"I always said I didn't think Senator Stevens should serve time in jail and hopefully this decision ensures that is the case," he said. "It's time for Senator Stevens, his family and Alaskans to move on and put this behind us."

Sen. Lisa Murkowski, now Alaska's senior senator, said in a statement, "I was pleased with the news that the Justice Department will drop all charges against Senator Ted Stevens, but I am deeply disturbed that the government can ruin a man's career and then say 'never mind.' There is nothing that will ever compensate for the loss of his reputation or leadership to the state of Alaska."

Murkowski decried the violation of Steven's rights. "Our nation is governed by the rule of law, and violations of our civil liberties cannot be tolerated," she said. "Prosecutors and law enforcement have the power to bring the full weight of the government to bear on individuals. If they are willing to bend the law, they put all of our civil liberties at risk."

The Senate Republican eader, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, called the Justice Department's move "a relief to Stevens and his family." But he also said that had the Justice Department acted last year, before the election, Republicans might not have lost the seat. It would give Democrats -- who have 58 seats in the Senate and are likely to gain a 59th -- one less seat toward a 60-vote, filibuster-proof majority.

FBI - Stevens-2450

"It was disappointing to lose the seat, no question about it," McConnell said. "No question that if this decision had been made last year he'd still be in the Senate."

GOP calls for Begich resignation, new election

FBI - Stevens-2452

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(04/02/09 13:06:21)

WASHINGTON -- The head of the Alaska Republican Party today called on Sen. Mark Begich to step down from the U.S. Senate, saying that the state's voters would have re-elected former Sen. Ted Stevens had they known the U.S Department of Justice would abandon its prosecution of him.

The party chairman, Randy Ruedrich, said that the only reason Begich won his race was because "a few thousand Alaskans thought that Senator Stevens was guilty of seven felonies."

He added that he thought Begich should step down "so Alaskans may have the chance to vote for a senator without the improper influence of the corrupt Department of Justice."

Gov. Sarah Palin concurs with Ruedrich and believes a special election is appropriate, said a spokeswoman for Palin's political action committee, Meg Stapleton. "I absolutely agree," Palin said in a statement.

Begich fired back Thursday, saying that although he believed it was clear there was misconduct during the senator's trial, he stepped into the race "long before Senator Stevens' legal troubles began, because Alaskans were looking for a change and a senator as independent as Alaska."

"Today, with our country in a severe recession, it's more important than ever that we have a senator focused on fixing our economy so Alaskans have the jobs they need to support their families," he said. "That is my job in the Senate, and I'm honored to serve Alaskans for the next six years."

Attorney General Eric Holder announced Wednesday that the Justice Department will move to dismiss the indictment against Stevens, who was convicted Oct. 27 on seven counts of failing to disclose gifts, including home renovations, on his U.S. Senate financial disclosure forms.

Holder made the move after Justice Department attorneys handling the post-trial motions in the case discovered that the trial team failed to turn over to Stevens' lawyers notes from an interview conducted with the star prosecution witness in the case.

It was the most recent ethical lapse by some members of the prosecution team, which was repeatedly chided by the judge in the case during the trial, and then cited with contempt after the trial when prosecutors failed to follow a judge's instructions to turn over documents to Stevens' lawyers.

DOJ found discrepancies between the interview and the courtroom testimony of the star witness, Bill Allen, the former oil-services company chief executive officer who plied Stevens with gifts. Those gifts, which went unreported on Stevens' senate financial disclosure forms, included renovations that doubled the size of the senator's residence in Alaska. Allen, who pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers in Alaska, is awaiting sentencing in his own case.

Stevens, 85, spent the six weeks leading up to the election on trial in Washington, D.C., and lost the race just days after a jury convicted him.

Begich's victory was a coup for Democrats in Alaska, where he unseated a Republican incumbent who had served for 40 years. But it also was a victory for Democrats in the U.S. Senate, who with Begich's win landed 58 of the 60 votes they need to have a filibuster proof majority.

Despite Ruedrich's call for a new election, the other senior elected Republicans from Alaska said it was time to move on.

"In light of the good news yesterday, I am sure many of us wish we could turn the clock back to last November," said Begich's Senate colleague, Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska. "Unfortunately, that is not an option."

Rep. Don Young told Fox News Channel after Wednesday's announcement by Holder that although he thought Stevens "would have have won hands-down. I would say by 70 percent had the Justice Department investigation not figured into his re-election campaign.

"The seated senator there, Mark Begich, will be in the Senate, he will do a good job," Young said in the Fox interview. "It's just sad that Alaskans were frankly hoodwinked into malfeasance of office work by the Justice Department itself."

Holder vows change after Stevens debacle

By NEDRA PICKLER
The Associated Press
(04/09/09 10:24:50)

WASHINGTON -- Attorney General Eric Holder said today he plans changes in response to allegations of prosecutorial misconduct in the case of former Sen. Ted Stevens.

Holder said he's taking "a hard look at a variety of things in the department," including new training and resources, as a result of problems with the high-profile congressional corruption case. He said he soon will publicly announce his assessment.

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan on Tuesday accepted Holder's request to throw out Stevens' conviction and dismiss all charges against the 85-year-old Alaska Republican because the government failed to provide certain evidence to his defense team. Stevens, who had served 40 years in the Senate, lost his seat a few days after a jury found him guilty of corruption charges last fall.

Sullivan said he had never seen such mishandling of a case by prosecutors. He opened an investigation into whether the Justice Department attorneys broke the law by withholding evidence, and he encouraged Holder to increase training for new and experienced prosecutors.

Holder said in response to the case that he's been telling lawyers in his department that their job is to do justice, not just win cases.

"There are things that we have to take into account given what has happened recently, with regard to training, with regard to resources, and I expect that we'll have some announcements to make to you all in the not too distant future," Holder told reporters in a brief news conference at the Justice Department.

Asked whether he was taking another look at the other public corruption prosecutions, such as the conviction of former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman or cases against others in Alaska, Holder said he didn't have any reviews under way.

"But I always want to ensure that the Justice Department acts in a way that is consistent with the long tradition of this great department -- that we treat people fairly, that if we make mistakes we admit them and that we then take the appropriate action," Holder said.

Judge dismisses Stevens trial conviction

By NEDRA PICKLER and MATT APUZZO I The Associated Press
(04/07/09 07:17:28)

WASHINGTON -- A federal judge dismissed the corruption conviction of former Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens today and took the rare and serious step of opening a criminal investigation into prosecutors who mishandled the case."In nearly 25 years on the bench, I've never seen anything approaching the mishandling and misconduct that I've seen in this case," U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan said.

Sullivan appointed a special prosecutor to investigate Justice Department lawyers who repeatedly mishandled witnesses and withheld evidence from defense attorneys during the monthlong trial. Stevens was convicted in October of lying on Senate forms about home renovations and gifts he received from wealthy friends.

The case cost Stevens a Senate seat he had held for 40 years. Once the Senate's longest-serving Republican, he narrowly lost to Democrat Mark Begich shortly after the verdict.

As Sullivan dismissed the case, Stevens turned to his friends and held up a fist in victory as his wife and daughters broke into loud sobs.

"Until recently, my faith in the criminal system, particularly the judicial system, was unwavering," Stevens told the court in his first public comments since Attorney General Eric Holder announced he would drop the case. "But what some members of the prosecution team did nearly destroyed my faith. Their conduct had consequences for me that they will never realize and can never be reversed."

Sullivan appointed Washington attorney Henry Schuelke as a special prosecutor to investigate contempt and obstruction by the Justice Department team. He said the matter was too serious to be left to an internal investigation by the department, which he said has dragged its feet looking into the misconduct.

In a criminal case, the prosecutors could face prison time and fines. The decision raises the question of whether the prosecutors, who include the top two officials in the department's public corruption unit, can remain on the job while under criminal investigation.

Sullivan repeatedly scolded prosecutors for their behavior during trial. After the verdict, an FBI whistleblower accused the team of misconduct and Sullivan held prosecutors in contempt for ignoring a court order.

FBI - Stevens-2455

The prosecution team was replaced and, last week, new prosecutors acknowledged that key evidence was withheld from Stevens. That evidence included notes from an interview with the government's star witness, contractor Bill Allen.

On the witness stand, Allen said a mutual friend told him not to expect Stevens to pay for the home renovation project because Stevens only wanted the bill to cover himself.

-970

But in the previously undisclosed meeting with prosecutors, Allen said he had no recollection of such a discussion. And he valued the renovation work at far less than what prosecutors alleged at trial.

"I was sick in my stomach," attorney Brendan Sullivan said Tuesday, recalling seeing the new evidence for the first time. "How could they do this? How could they abandon their responsibilities? How could they take on a very decent man, Ted Stevens, who happened to be a United States senator, and do this?"

With the prosecution team now under the scrutiny Stevens felt for years, the 85-year-old smiled and posed for pictures with his family on the courthouse steps.

"I'm going to enjoy this wonderful day," he said.

Stevens judge seeks prosecution documents

STILL IN CHARGE: Sullivan issues the orders on his own.

FBI - Stevens-2457

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(04/05/09 20:34:25)

The judge who presided over former Sen. Ted Stevens' trial last fall issued two orders Sunday indicating he may not be ready to give up jurisdiction of the case even as the government is asking for all charges to be dismissed.

In the first of the unusual weekend orders, filed at 5:22 p.m. Eastern time (1:22 p.m. Alaska time) in Washington, U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan directed federal prosecutors to provide him copies of everything they had gathered in the post-trial reviews and investigations and which they had provided to Stevens' defense attorneys. He also directed them to provide everything they had uncovered and produced related to the complaint by Anchorage FBI agent Chad Joy into the conduct of the Alaska corruption investigation and the prosecution of Stevens' case.

Sullivan also demanded the notes of prosecutors from an April 15, 2008, interview of former Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen.

It was the discovery of those notes two weeks ago by a new prosecution team that led Attorney General Eric Holder to seek dismissal of all charges against Stevens "in the interest of justice." The notes directly contradicted a key piece of Allen's testimony six months later at Stevens' trial and should have been turned over to the defense, Holder said.

Sullivan directed prosecutors to produce the information no later than 10 a.m. Eastern time today.

At 8:42 p.m., 3½ hours after filing his first order, Sullivan issued another order directing the Justice Department, the FBI, the IRS "and any and all other government agencies" that investigated or prosecuted Stevens to not destroy any evidence or documents connected to the case. His order demanded preservation of e-mails, notes, memos, investigative files, audio recordings and "any and all electronically stored information."

The orders were issued by Sullivan on his own, without a request by either party.

Stevens was convicted Oct. 27 on six counts of lying on his Senate disclosures and a seventh count of scheming to prevent discovery of his false statements.

Over the course of Stevens' five-week trial, Sullivan grew increasingly frustrated with prosecutors for failing to turn over evidence in a timely manner to Stevens' lawyers, eventually stripping some aspects of the case as a sanction. After the trial, when prosecutors continued to withhold information from Stevens' defense, Sullivan held three of them in contempt. The Justice Department replaced them with another team, and it was those lawyers who discovered and reported the notes of the April 15, 2008, interview with Allen.

Joy's complaint surfaced in late November. It criticized the conduct of the lead agent in the case, and said that prosecutors deliberately withheld information from Stevens' defense during the trial.

194A-AN-13620-m -971

Sullivan had planned to announce a decision at a hearing April 15 about whether to call Joy to testify about his complaint as requested by Stevens' lawyers. The lawyers also wanted to hear from a government witness who said after the trial that he gave false testimony about whether he had gotten immunity for himself and his family and friends.

The Justice Department's motion last week to dismiss all charges against Stevens seemed to render that April 15 hearing moot. But the orders Sunday may indicate Sullivan isn't ready to let go of the matter and will continue to review the government's conduct.

He scheduled a hearing on Tuesday to hear the motion to dismiss the case.

Biographies of prosecutors facing criminal investigation

The Associated Press
(04/07/09 12:14:31)

Brief biographical sketches of six federal prosecutors under investigation for mishandling the trial of former Sen. Ted Stevens.

BRENDA MORRIS: A longtime prosecutor with the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, Morris now serves as its principal deputy. She helped supervise the investigation into disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and has prosecuted corruption cases around the country. She teaches corruption investigations within the Justice Department and is a professor at Georgetown Law School. A graduate of Howard University law school, she served as the lead attorney in the Stevens trial, giving the government's opening statement and cross-examining Stevens.

NICHOLAS MARSH: One of two Public Integrity trial attorneys on the case, Marsh handled much of the courtroom work during the trials of Alaska lawmakers caught up in the scandal. He has been part of numerous other public corruption investigations, including a scheme in Mississippi to defraud a $400 million fen-phen settlement. An FBI whistleblower accused Marsh of intentionally withholding evidence from Stevens and sending a witness back to Alaska during trial to prevent potentially damaging testimony. The prosecution team denies those accusations.

JOSEPH BOTTINI: An assistant U.S. attorney in Alaska, Bottini was a key figure in the Stevens case. He questioned the government's star witness, Bill Allen, and delivered the second half of the government's closing argument. Much of Allen's testimony had been discredited. The contempt investigation will look into whether prosecutors knew there was evidence of inconsistencies in Allen's statements but concealed it. Bottini graduated from California Western School of Law.

WILLIAM WELCH: The chief of the Public Integrity section, Welch supervised the Stevens case but did not participate in the trial. He has supervised every major public corruption case brought by the department in the last several years. A former prosecutor in Springfield, Mass., Welch prosecuted former veterans hospital nurse Kristen Gilbert for killing four patients by injecting them with a heart stimulant. A graduate of Northwestern University Law School, Welch has been mentioned as a possible candidate for the U.S. attorney job in Massachusetts.

EDWARD SULLIVAN: The other Public Integrity trial attorney in the case, Sullivan has been part of the trial team that won convictions of several Alaska lawmakers caught up in the corruption scandal. But he played a mostly behind-the-scenes role in the Stevens trial and his role in any mishandling of evidence is unclear.

JAMES GOEKE: An assistant U.S. attorney in Alaska, Goeke also had a largely behind-the-scenes role in the Stevens trial. He has been a key figure in the prosecution of other politicians wrapped up in the Alaska corruption scandal.

Stevens judge orders prosecution inquiry

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com
(04/07/09 07:17:28)

WASHINGTON -- A special prosecutor will investigate whether government attorneys broke the law by failing to ensure former Sen. Ted Stevens received a fair trial, a federal judge announced Tuesday as he dismissed corruption charges and a jury's guilty verdict against the Alaska Republican. "In 25 years on the bench, I've never seen anything approaching the mishandling and misconduct that I've seen in this case," U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan said. "When the government does not meet its obligation to turn over evidence, the system falters."

U.S. Attorney General Eric Holder had asked Sullivan last week to dismiss the verdict and the indictment after acknowledging that prosecutors had failed to share with Stevens' attorneys notes from an interview with the prosecution's key witness that contradicted the witness's trial testimony. Withholding materials that could be helpful to criminal defendants has become a troubling Justice Department trend, Sullivan said, citing Stevens' case and that of a Guantanamo detainee who fought to have his medical records released to his lawyers.

The Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility is investigating the Stevens prosecution team for its handling of evidence during the trial as well as how it handled a post-trial whistleblower complaint from an FBI agent. Sullivan said, however, that he wouldn't be satisfied with an internal investigation that the Justice Department is unlikely to make public.

Sullivan has asked a former military judge, Henry Schuelke III of Washington, D.C., to investigate the conduct of six prosecutors in the case for potential criminal contempt and obstruction of justice.

They are: the head of the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, William Welch; the lead trial attorney, Brenda Morris; two trial attorneys in the Public Integrity Section, Nicholas Marsh and Edward Sullivan; and two assistant U.S. attorneys in Alaska, Joseph Bottini and James Goeke.

"I have not pre-judged these attorneys for their culpability, and I hope the record will find no intentional obstruction of justice," Sullivan said.

Sullivan will file an order explaining how the special prosecutor will work and what sort of authority he will have. Sullivan said he made the appointment under Rule 42 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, which allows a judge to appoint an attorney to investigate and prosecute criminal contempt charges.

Sullivan said he reminded prosecutors repeatedly of their obligations to turn over to Stevens' legal team evidence that might help exonerate their client -- requirements that stem from the 1963 Supreme Court case Brady v. Maryland. Tuesday, Sullivan cited 10 missteps on the part of prosecutors during and after the trial and even referred back to his own remarks at the time, including his scold to prosecutors during the trial that "the fair administration of justice does not depend on the luck of the draw, a lucky day or a lucky continuance."

-973

FBI - Stevens-2460

1944-AN-13620-m

"We must never forget the Supreme Court's direction that a criminal trial is a search for the truth," Sullivan said. "I urge the president and the attorney general, as they select new U.S. attorneys, to obtain from those appointees their commitment to fulfilling these most important prosecutorial obligations."

Sullivan also announced that he would refer a complaint about the attorney for star witness Bill Allen to the U.S. attorney's office in Washington for investigation. Anchorage lawyer Robert Bundy, who sat in the courtroom while his client testified, was accused by the judge and several of Stevens' attorneys of sending signals to Allen on the stand. Bundy, himself a former U.S. attorney for Alaska, has denied the accusations.

'YOUR ACTIONS HAVE GIVEN ME HOPE'

The 85-year-old Stevens walked out of the courthouse Tuesday surrounded by well-wishers, including his three daughters. As they strode down the sidewalk with their arms draped around one other, they smiled and posed for the throngs of photographers assembled outside the courthouse.

"I'm going to enjoy this beautiful day," Stevens said when asked what he would do next and what message he had for Alaskans. Then, in a reference to his exuberant former Senate colleague, Sen. Robert Byrd of West Virginia, he added, "If I were Senator Byrd, I'd say, 'Hallelujah!' "

Other federal judges, lawyers and Stevens friends and supporters crowded into the courtroom along with dozens of reporters. Among the lawyers: John Dowd, the Washington attorney whose firm has been paid more than $1 million for handling the federal investigation into the office of Rep. Don Young, R-Alaska.

Stevens, whose 40 years in the U.S. Senate made him the longest-serving Republican in the body's history, lost his re-election bid to Democrat Mark Begich within days of the jury verdict.

The former senator spoke briefly at the hearing after his lawyer, Brendan Sullivan, spoke. Stevens thanked his legal team, saying that he was "deeply indebted" to them and is thankful "they were willing to take on this case." He also thanked his friends and family and, in particular, Judge Sullivan for repeatedly holding prosecutors accountable.

"Until recently, my faith in the criminal justice system was unwavering, but what some members of the prosecution team did nearly destroyed my faith," Stevens said, then told Judge Sullivan, "Your actions have given me hope that others may be spared."

Stevens also thanked Alaskans.

"As I traveled around the state, almost every Alaskan said, 'I've said a prayer for you, Ted,' " Stevens said.

FBI - Stevens-2461

The Justice Department twice on Tuesday apologized for its conduct.

"In analyzing that information, we reached the conclusion that in the interest of justice, the defense was entitled to a new trial," said Paul O'Brien, the head of the Justice Department team that was assigned to the case after Sullivan cited Welch, Morris and another government attorney with contempt for failing to turn over documents connected with a whistleblower complaint by an FBI agent. "We deeply regret this occurred."

O'Brien personally delivered the documents to Brendan Sullivan's law office. But while he was complimentary of the work of O'Brien and his team, no apology will ever be enough sufficient to make up for the wrongs done to Stevens, Brendan Sullivan said.

"Nothing can be done that will give the citizens of Alaska the senator they surely would have elected," he said.

FBI: INVESTIGATION CONTINUES

All 13 of the defense attorneys who worked on the case appeared in court with Stevens -- five at the defense table with him and another eight in a row of chairs lining the courtroom. His family, including his wife, Catherine, and his daughters Beth, Susan and Lily, sat directly behind him in the front row of the spectator section.

A jury found the former Alaska senator guilty on Oct. 27 on seven counts of failing to disclose gifts, including home renovations, on his U.S. Senate financial disclosure forms. The government presented stacks of e-mails and other evidence that Stevens knew about the free services from Allen and Allen's company, Veco Corp.

Stevens was the largest target in an investigation of public corruption in Alaska that began in 2004. Eric Gonzalez, a spokesman for the FBI in Alaska, said Tuesday the inquiry is ongoing.

"For us, nothing's changed," Gonzalez said. "Our investigations are active and continuing."

Stevens' lawyer Brendan Sullivan said he was physically sickened when he learned that prosecutors had failed to turn over notes from an interview last April 15 with Allen.

Allen's company performed much of the work renovating the senator's Alaska home. Stevens' failure to disclose those renovations as gifts in the years they were made was at the heart of the charges against him.

Stevens had written a note to Allen in 2002 asking him to talk to Bob Persons, a mutual friend who'd overseen the work, about giving him a bill for the renovations. That note was to have been the underpinning for Stevens' defense.

Allen undercut that approach, however, when he testified that Persons had told him not to worry about a bill. "Ted's just covering his ass," Allen said Persons told him.

The testimony floored Stevens' legal team, Brendan Sullivan said. When he subsequently learned Allen had told investigators last April that he and Persons had never talked about the billing issue, Sullivan said, he went into "a silent rage."

His team was no match for "corrupt prosecutors" intent on manufacturing evidence from a witness, he said. Allen, who has pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers in Alaska, has yet to be sentenced.

"It's prosecution to win at all costs, and wrongdoing can flourish if that's the attitude of a leader," Sullivan said.

FBI-Stevens-2462

Four prosecutors -- two in Anchorage and two in Washington -- and one FBI agent were aware of the Allen interview, Brendan Sullivan said. But he added on Tuesday that he would be fair and point out that the lead prosecutor "may not have known" about the interview. It's unclear if he was referring to Welch or Morris.

Brendan Sullivan also told the judge that despite writing three times to former Attorney General Michael Mukasey with his concerns about prosecutors, he never heard from the Bush administration appointee -- not even so much as an acknowledgement that his letter was received.

"Shocking," Judge Sullivan said, "but not surprising."

Judge lists what he says federal prosecutors did wrong

MISSTEPS: False business records and undisclosed data cited.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com
(04/07/09 21:41:49)

Judge Emmet Sullivan cited a series of prosecutorial missteps that occurred before, during and after the Stevens trial that warrant further investigation and possible charges of criminal contempt. Among the examples he cited Tuesday:

• The government failed to produce witness Rocky Williams' grand jury testimony.

The testimony would have shown that Williams, a trusted Veco employee, didn't work full time at the Stevens renovation project as his time sheets indicated, often with overtime hours as well. Williams was often at the site but working on other Veco projects. The result was that Veco's gift of services to Stevens was thousands of dollars less in value than the $250,000 asserted by the government, though still substantial.

• When the government sent Williams back to Alaska without testifying, prosecutors didn't inform the judge and asserted they acted in good faith.

Williams, subpoenaed as both a prosecution and defense witness, was suffering from liver and kidney disease. Prosecutors said they sent him back to Alaska because his health was failing and they feared he would die if he wasn't treated by his doctor. The defense said it should have been informed so it would have had the opportunity to call him to the stand. Sullivan agreed, and said he should have been told too. And later, an FBI agent said that another reason Williams was sent back was that he did poorly in a mock examination before the trial.

Prosecutors said that they asked Williams to call the defense law firm of Williams & Connolly before he left Washington, and in fact he did and left a message that wasn't returned. Williams called again from Alaska and told defense attorneys about his timesheets.

Williams was indeed in poor health and died in December.

• The government redacted exculpatory information from FBI interview notes that it provided to the defense.

The government was obligated to provide the defense with any material that tended to exonerate Stevens. But the material it turned over was incomplete and sometimes heavily edited. In one record of an FBI interview, the blacked-out section said that Allen told agents that Stevens would have paid a bill for Veco's services if he had given him one. The government turned over the complete document while Allen was still testifying, and he was questioned about it.

• The government failed to turn over exculpatory information on witness David Anderson.

Like Rocky Williams, David Anderson was a supervisor at the Girdwood project. He was also Bill

974

194A-AN-13620-M

Allen's nephew. And like Williams, all of Anderson's timesheets during the main phase of construction were counted in the benefit Stevens got from Veco. But Anderson told the government that he was in Portland for part of that time, working on a project for his aunt, Bill Allen's sister.

• The government used business records it knew were false.

Again part of the Williams and Anderson controversy. A Veco bookkeeper assembled a summary of the labor and materials used in renovating Stevens' home. She included the full hours of Williams and Anderson when the government knew they had only worked part time. The summary showed expenses of $181,699 from October 2000 to March 2001.

In their defense, the government said thousands of dollars of Veco services were not in the spreadsheet. They also said that they never claimed it was accurate to the penny, only that it exceeded the average $300 annual limit on gifts to senators.

• The government failed to provide the check used by Bill Allen to buy a Land Rover for Stevens' daughter Lily.

In defending the allegation that Stevens got a benefit of about $20,000 in trading an old Mustang for a new Land Rover, Stevens' attorneys spent a long time with witnesses, dealer invoices and window stickers trying to show that Allen didn't pay anywhere near the $44,339 asserted by the government for the Land Rover. When it came time for the government to rebut the defense, it simply produced Allen's check, making the defense effort look ridiculous.

With the jury out, defense lawyers steamed to the judge that the government should have turned over the check before the trial. The prosecutors said they didn't anticipate that the defense would make an issue about the price of the Land Rover. The judge said it wasn't a matter for the government to decide and later directed the jury to ignore all evidence about the vehicles.

• When the government informed the court after the trial that an FBI agent in the case had filed a complaint, it asserted that the matter would have had no effect on the verdict and would be adequately addressed by an internal review.

The complaint, by co-case agent Chad Joy, dealt primarily with the conduct of the corruption investigation in Alaska and his allegations of shortcomings by the chief case agent, Mary Beth Kepner. But Joy also alleged that prosecutors mishandled evidence in the Stevens case and deliberately withheld information from the defense.

• As recently as Feb. 6, the government told the court there was no need for court-ordered discovery or an evidentiary hearing on matters that emerged after the trial.

As recently as last week, new and serious allegations of government misconduct surfaced, demonstrating that not everything had been revealed.

Stevens judge cites 'pervasive' withholding of evidence

By ERIKA BOLSTAD and MARISA TAYLOR
Anchorage Daily News
(04/07/09 16:52:57)

WASHINGTON - In setting aside former Sen. Ted Stevens' indictment Tuesday, a federal judge declared war on what he said is an increasingly pervasive government tactic in the administration of American justice: the penchant on the part of federal prosecutors to withhold evidence.

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan said he has seen "troubling evidence" across a spectrum of cases where prosecutors have failed to turn over to defense attorneys what's known as exculpatory evidence -- information that might help criminal defendants with their cases. Such problems weren't limited to Stevens' case, Sullivan noted Tuesday. Public officials, private citizens and even Guantanamo Bay detainees have all had their rights trampled on, he said.

"We must not forget the Supreme Court's direction that a criminal trial is the search for the truth," Sullivan said during the hearing to drop Stevens' case.

Last week, Sullivan rebuked the government for not turning over medical records to lawyers for Guantanamo Bay detainees, and ordered Justice Department lawyers to explain why he shouldn't cite them for contempt of court.

"How can this court have any confidence whatsoever in the United States government to comply with its obligations and to be truthful to the court?" he asked.

Sullivan used almost identical language during Stevens' trial, and was equally irate with federal prosecutors. In Stevens' case, though, Sullivan actually did hold three government attorneys in contempt for failing to turn over documents in post-trial matters. And on Tuesday, Sullivan appointed a special prosecutor to investigate whether government attorneys had broken the law by failing to ensure that Stevens received a fair trial.

U.S. Attorney General Eric Holder said in an interview with CBS News Tuesday night that he "took actions as quickly" as he could in the Stevens case and that he will continue an internal review of how prosecutors handled the case. On Tuesday, Sullivan mentioned his "high regard" for Holder as lending weight to his decision to end the case. The two are friendly and overlapped in their time on the District of Columbia Superior Court before moving on to higher office. A spokeswoman for the Justice Department said Tuesday they will review Sullivan's order in the Stevens case and "will continue to cooperate with the court on this matter."

"We take seriously the court's comments regarding the discovery process and will review them for possible future actions," said spokeswoman Laura Sweeney. "As the Attorney General indicated last week, the fact that there is an inquiry into the prosecutors' actions does not mean or imply any determination has been made about their conduct."

Ronald Safer, a white-collar defense lawyer and former head of the criminal division of the U.S. attorney's office in Chicago, called the dismissal "a tremendously powerful statement to make at the beginning of the administration."

"It tells prosecutors don't fool around with your constitutional obligations - don't hide evidence you should turn over," Safer said. "If you do, the attorney general will dismiss even the biggest, highest profile cases and see that you are disciplined for your actions."

Guy Singer, a former Justice Department lawyer who prosecuted corruption cases during the last administration, described the dismissal as "a stunning decision."

"Part of Eric Holder's role clearly is to re-instill confidence that the Department of Justice is not being political," Singer said. "I don't think he would take lightly abandoning his prosecutors when there are allegations of misconduct out there. My guess is that he believed it was the right thing to. It's a message to prosecutors that if you're out there committing misconduct you're on an island."

Sullivan suggested Tuesday during Stevens' final court hearing that he would like to see Holder make mandatory training reminding all of his prosecutors that they have an obligation to turn over favorable evidence under the 1963 Supreme Court case, Brady v. Maryland.

Sullivan said Tuesday he may go as far as to enter an order at the beginning of each criminal case reminding federal prosecutors of their Brady disclosure duties. He urged other federal judges to do the same.

The 61-year-old judge, who was appointed to the bench by presidents of both parties, may be in the perfect position to make such suggestions.

President Ronald Reagan first named Sullivan to the Superior Court of the District of Columbia in 1991. President George H.W. Bush appointed him to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals in 1991, and President Bill Clinton named him to the federal bench in 1994.

A Washington D.C. native, Sullivan has an undergraduate and law degree from Washington D.C.'s Howard University. He married his high school sweetheart and has two children and two grandchildren

Sullivan had a relatively mild manner in court during the Stevens trial, unless prosecutors angered him. After blowing his fuse, though, he would retreat to his chambers and then return to the courtroom calmer, and with a clear plan for how to proceed.

He bent over backwards to accommodate jurors during the trial by making sure they had plenty of breaks and scheduling the events of the day around their needs. The trial went on during football season, and on Mondays during the trial, he always had a joke for the jurors about the Washington Redskins.

At one point during Stevens' trial last fall, the chief Justice Department prosecutor in the case, Brenda Morris, told Sullivan that the swift-moving nature of the senator's trial was bound to lead to some snags in turning over information to the defense. Stevens was up for a difficult re-election bid and asked for a speedy trial so he could have a verdict before voters make their decision about his future on Nov. 4.

But Sullivan countered that speed was no excuse.

"It's not about the pace of litigation, it's about the fairness of the proceedings," he said at the time. "We don't sacrifice fairness for expedience."

Alaska Bar withdraws motion on license

Anchorage Daily News
(04/08/09 20:23:50)

With the dismissal of all charges against former Sen. Ted Stevens, the Alaska Bar Association on Wednesday withdrew its motion seeking suspension of Stevens' law license.

Bar Counsel Steve Van Goor said he acted as soon as he got a copy of the dismissal order that was filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C.

The bar moved against Stevens' license after a jury found him guilty Oct. 27 of seven felony counts for violating Senate ethics rules. The bar argued in its motion to the Alaska Supreme Court that his license should be automatically suspended because of the nature of the crime.

But Stevens fought the interim suspension, saying he was seeking a new trial in Washington or dismissal of the charges because the verdict wasn't reached fairly. And he said there was no practical reason for the bar to go after his license because he was on the bar's inactive list and couldn't practice law in Alaska anyway.

Van Goor said the Supreme Court had not yet acted on Stevens' license, so there was nothing to fix. The court is the discipline body for Alaska lawyers.

Stevens' license was suspended in two other jurisdictions where he had been licensed since 1951, California and Washington, D.C. The Web sites of those bar associations show the suspensions remain in effect.

Stevens rejected plea deal before trial, transcripts show

By NEDRA PICKLER
The Associated Press
(04/14/09 10:23:02)

WASHINGTON -- Former Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens turned down a plea offer that would have spared him a corruption trial and the possibility of imprisonment, according to newly released transcripts of conversations between attorneys and the judge.

Stevens took his chances that a jury would find him innocent and instead pleaded not guilty on the day of the conversations. Three months later, the jury returned a guilty verdict but Stevens recently was cleared of all charges because of prosecutorial misconduct in the case.

When U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan dismissed the charges last week, he also ordered the release of all transcripts of bench conferences held in the case. The plea offer was revealed in the transcript from July 31, 2008.

With prosecutors and defense attorneys gathered in front of him at the bench, Sullivan asked Justice Department attorney Brenda Morris whether the prosecution had offered a plea deal or planned to do so. Stevens attorney Brendan Sullivan interjected that there was a plea offer, but that Morris probably wasn't aware of it because she wasn't present when it was made.

Brendan Sullivan said the offer was for Stevens to plead guilty to one felony count and in exchange serve no jail time. "We turned it down," Steven's attorney said. He didn't elaborate, but even without imprisonment such a plea deal would likely have cost Stevens the Senate seat he had held for 40 years.

Whatever offer may have been on the table in the past, both sides told the judge they wanted to press ahead with trial and were not willing to negotiate.

Morris was not aware the deal had been offered, but told the judge: "I'd like to make clear on the record that there is no offer at this point."

Brendan Sullivan responded, "And if one is made, it will not be accepted."

Stevens was in court that day, but wouldn't have heard the conversation along with the rest of the courtroom since it was held at the bench. Stevens didn't speak publicly that day, but during the hearing Brendan Sullivan told the court that the senator wanted a speedy trial that would clear his name before the November election.

Instead, Stevens would be convicted just a few days before voters went to the polls. He narrowly lost re-election.

Judge Sullivan threw out the conviction at the request of the Justice Department, which found that important evidence had not been turned over to Stevens' defense team.

The judge took the extraordinary step of opening a criminal investigation into how prosecutors handled the case. Morris is one of the targets of that investigation.

Kott, Kohring appeal convictions to federal judicial panel

The Associated Press
(04/14/09 12:04:52)

SEATTLE -- A federal appeals panel was asked Tuesday to overturn the corruption convictions of two former Alaska lawmakers.

Lawyers for former House Speaker Pete Kott and former Representative Victor Kohring question the impartiality of U.S. District Judge John W. Sedwick, who presided over their trials.

A three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals was told Sedwick was a next-door neighbor of the government's key witness, Veco Corp. principal owner Bill Allen. Kohring's lawyer, John Henry Browne, also said Sedwick should have withdrawn from his client's trial because the judge's wife had been a bitter political opponent of Kohring.

Browne and Kott's lawyer, Sheryl Gordon McCloud, also said Sedwick should not have closed hearings on whether to limit cross-examination of Allen -- a next-door neighbor of the judge.

This is a developing story; check back for updates.

Kott, Kohring file motions on evidence

Anchorage Daily News
(04/13/09 23:34:55)

Former Alaska legislators Pete Kott and Victor Kohring, in prison on federal corruption charges, on Monday asked the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to order federal prosecutors to produce any favorable evidence they may have in their files.

With oral arguments in their appeals scheduled before a circuit court panel this morning in Seattle, Kott and Kohring invoked last week's dismissal of charges against Sen. Ted Stevens in their motions.

The government was already obliged to produce such exculpatory information before and during their 2007 trials. But Kott, a former House speaker from Eagle River, and Kohring, who represented Wasilla, cited the government's failure to turn over favorable information to Stevens as reason to ask again for the material.

If similar information was withheld in their cases, Kott and Kohring could seek new trials or dismissal of their charges.

The judge in Stevens' case dismissed the guilty verdicts and all charges when a new team of prosecutors discovered critical evidence hadn't been turned over by the original prosecutors. The judge also ordered an investigation into misconduct by six of the government attorneys who handled the Stevens prosecution.

At least two of those attorneys, James Goeke and Edward Sullivan, are scheduled to appear today in the Kott appeal. In the Kohring appeal, a Justice Department attorney not associated with the original case or with Stevens, Kevin Gingras, entered the case last week.

Young now paying lawyers solely from defense fund

DISCLOSURE FORMS: He raised $72,180 in first quarter of 2009.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(04/15/09 19:45:30)

WASHINGTON -- Rep. Don Young is no longer paying lawyers with his campaign account, federal disclosure forms show, and the Alaska Republican actually got a refund from one attorney who was representing a campaign employee.

A report filed Wednesday with the Federal Election Commission shows that Young raised $72,180 in the first three months of the year, but he also got $30,573 back from attorney John Wolfe. The Seattle lawyer had been representing Young's former campaign manager, Steve Dougherty, as part of a federal investigation into fundraising practices in Alaska politics.

The refund came from a retainer the campaign had paid Wolfe, said Young's chief of staff, Pamela Day. She said she didn't know whether that meant Wolfe's services were no longer needed. Dougherty left the campaign after the November election.

Last year, Young's campaign paid Wolfe $90,020, according to federal filings. Wolfe said Wednesday he was "not in the position to talk about legal fees" and would not discuss why he refunded money to the campaign.

Young set up a legal expense fund last year to help pay for lawyers connected to an FBI probe of his office. The fund was established so that his campaign cash wouldn't have to go toward lawyers, but also so that he could tap a new source of donors, including people who had already given to his campaign. In recent months, Young has been paying his legal bills from the legal expense fund.

Last year, Young raised $1.1 million in his successful bid to fend off opponents in the August primary and the November general election. Over the election cycle, he spent $3.1 million, including money he had amassed in previous years. More than $1 million went toward his legal bills.

Young has had three fundraisers this spring: a Puerto Rico event in February, one in Washington this spring and a third in Anchorage this week. The Puerto Rico fundraiser appears to have netted the congressman about $17,450, according to an analysis of donors with addresses on the island or in Miami. He currently has $120,674 cash on hand.

The Justice Department team charged with prosecuting former senator Ted Stevens miscalculated by not seeking more time to prepare for the high-stakes corruption trial and fell victim to inexperience and thin staffing, which contributed to its alleged mishandling of witnesses and evidence, according to interviews with more than a dozen lawyers who followed the case.

Last year's compressed trial timeline forced government lawyers to jam their preparations into seven weeks and intensified a series of challenges: the late addition of a new lawyer; an aggressive adversary who deluged them with requests for documents; and a skeptical judge whose behavior turned unpredictable, then punitive.

The difficulties led U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan last week to dismiss a conviction against Stevens, a Republican who represented Alaska in the U.S. Senate for nearly 40 years, and to turn the tables and initiate a criminal probe of six of the prosecutors.

Former prosecutors, defense lawyers and onetime Justice Department officials also described more chronic liabilities in the department's Public Integrity Section: Once the "A Team" for fighting corruption in state legislatures, judges' chambers and Congress, the unit in recent years lost staffing, strong supervision, some of its varnish and its insulation from politics.

Only days after the case against Stevens collapsed, lawyers inside and outside the department were chronicling its demise and picking apart the skill of the prosecution team, at least one of whose members had watched cases fall apart in the past. But government officials and defense attorneys alike said they do not think that prosecutors in the Public Integrity Section or its leaders acted out of base political motivations.

The Justice Department, already laboring under well-documented episodes of political interference during the Bush years, is now facing intense scrutiny over whether it flouted the rules in one of the highest-profile cases of the past decade.

Prosecutors and FBI agents are hiring their own lawyers and pointing the finger at one another, even as a special prosecutor and the department's ethics watchdogs are trying to determine whether members of the team broke the law to cheat their way to victory or merely succumbed to lapses of incompetence, inexperience or lax supervision.

The six members of the prosecution team declined to comment or did not return phone calls and e-mail messages left with them and their friends. But department spokeswoman Laura Sweeney said the unit has a solid record, having secured nearly 400 convictions since 2001.

"For more than 30 years, the Public Integrity Section has been effectively prosecuting public officials, regardless of political affiliation, who abuse their office and their obligation to the American people," Sweeney said. "Every day, in courtrooms nationwide, these prosecutors work under challenging circumstances to hold our public officials accountable for their conduct, and they will continue to do so."

The very nature of the section's mandate, to target corruption across the country, has posed recurrent challenges.

Former department attorneys, for example, cited chronic problems that have plagued the unit: competition and confusion with partner prosecutors in U.S. attorney's offices around the country. Federal prosecutors in the District, for instance, were consulted about the Stevens case starting in 2006 but declined to participate, thinking that the charges were shaky, according to sources familiar with the discussions. The assistant U.S. attorneys also considered overly aggressive the prosecutors' early plan, later abandoned, to get a warrant to search the lawmaker's D.C. area home, the sources said.

The government's path could have been eased had the U.S. attorney's office been part of the case, adding players who were familiar with the courthouse and the personality of the trial judge.

The Stevens case had been handled for years by Joseph W. Bottini and James A. Goeke, two career lawyers from the U.S. attorney's office in Alaska, and two attorneys from the Public Integrity unit, Nicholas A. Marsh and Edward P. Sullivan, whose prosecution of Alaska officials had led to charges that Stevens had failed to report gifts on his Senate ethics forms.

As the indictment loomed against Stevens last summer, authorities in the department's criminal division pondered whether to add a more magnetic courtroom presence to the team. Department officials decided to tap Brenda Morris, a feisty, sharp-tongued trial lawyer who had been serving as deputy chief of the Public Integrity Section, to put Stevens on the hot seat and to build rapport with the jury. But that required the other lawyers to spend hours schooling Morris on the nuances of the case, keeping them from tackling boxes of documents related to the case, according to sources close to the lawyers.

It was to be the most high-profile prosecution of Morris's career.

Four years earlier, Morris had run into trouble in a case she handled when a federal jury in Texas acquitted San Antonio criminal defense lawyer Alan Brown, who had been charged with tax offenses. In a subsequent civil suit filed by Brown, who alleged that FBI agents had wrongfully pursued him based on a sketchy account from his disgruntled secretary, the government ultimately paid Brown $1.34 million to settle the claim.

Brown and his lawyers say that Morris ignored warnings from local federal prosecutors who cast doubt on the credibility of a critical witness, an office assistant who peddled questionable information about Brown in a bid to win a reduction in the prison sentence of her boyfriend. A judge in San Antonio had thrown out the case before it went to trial, but an appeals court revived the prosecution, which Morris led.

"She is the race car driver who blew past the red flag," said Bill Reid, a lawyer for Brown in the civil wrongful prosecution case.

But last week, current and former colleagues of Morris defended her reputation and her ethics, saying they do not think that she would intentionally run afoul of the rules.

The Public Integrity Section has had five chiefs in six years. The latest is William M. Welch II, who was honored three years ago by the attorney general for exposing corruption in the Springfield, Mass., government. Welch, one of the six prosecutors now under investigation, did not play a major role in the courtroom during the Stevens case but took a more active posture after the judge raised questions about sharing evidence.

Indeed, during the presidential transition period, incoming Justice Department officials heard complaints about whether career lawyers properly understood their obligations to hand over materials to criminal defendants, prompting Attorney General Eric H. Holder Jr. last week to call for additional training and oversight. The Stevens case, perhaps the starkest example of the troubles, brought the severity of the problem into the national spotlight.

Former prosecutors described public corruption probes as particularly tricky. Defendants are used to seizing the stage, they generally have the money to pay for top-flight defense lawyers, and they do not hesitate to pick apart the inner workings of cases or to cast aspersions on the motives of prosecutors.

Others said the Stevens case, along with the acquittal of former Puerto Rican governor Anibal Acevedo Vilá (D) last month, exposed deeper problems with a lack of supervision of the Public Integrity Section, which has experienced heavy turnover.

"In high-profile cases, particularly cases involving public officials, the vetting process has fallen down," said Thomas C. Green, a Washington defense lawyer who won Vilá's acquittal. "I think what happens is that they get caught up in the competition and there's no experienced voice of reason who says we cannot do this, we should not do this, we must not do this. These two cases could not have happened if the vetting process was in place and operating as it should."

But Gerald E. McDowell, who ran the Public Integrity unit for a dozen years, said that supervisors typically do not "nitpick" the work of their subordinates because there is not enough time, given caseloads.

In the Stevens case, signs of frustration began emerging early. At one pretrial hearing, defense lawyers hammered prosecutors with requests to produce thousands of pages of electronic evidence. Morris became flustered. "Just because he has 'U.S. Senator' before his name doesn't mean we have to drink out of a fire hose every time they call us," she said in court.

In another unusual twist, the conduct of public corruption unit lawyers was questioned by Chad Joy, an FBI agent from the Anchorage office assigned to help with the trial. In a 10-page whistleblower complaint, Joy reported seeing boxes of unprocessed evidence stacked outside Marsh's D.C. office, asserted that Marsh had misplaced a piece of evidence and lodged more serious allegations about failure to turn over materials to the defense. The complaint became public after the trial, fueling calls by Stevens's lawyers to overturn the senator's conviction.

Among other issues, Joy chronicled internal battles among the prosecutors about whether to turn over notes and argued that lawyers had delegated to his colleague, FBI case agent Mary Beth Kepner, the task of going over interview notes and deciding what should be redacted before handing the papers to the defense team.

Current and former prosecutors said it is highly unusual to delegate that task to an FBI agent because it involves legal questions and sensitive judgment calls for which prosecutors ultimately will be held responsible.

Compared with other Justice Department lawyers, those in the Public Integrity Section generally have been stingier about turning over materials to defense lawyers, former department attorneys said, and the section lacked clear rules on the question. It was a more difficult question in the Stevens case, with much of the evidence 4,000 miles away in Alaska.

One of the key questions now for ethics investigators and Henry F. Schuelke III, the special prosecutor appointed by the trial judge, revolves around a mid-April 2008 interview of the government's key witness, Bill Allen. Notes from that meeting in Alaska were uncovered earlier this month by the new Justice Department team examining the case, raising fresh questions about inconsistencies in Allen's trial testimony and prompting Holder to abandon the conviction.

"I always want to ensure . . . that if we make mistakes that we admit them, and that we then take the appropriate action," Holder said Thursday.

But, in a fashion befitting the strange and troubled course of the Stevens case, the people who are now the subject of "appropriate action" by authorities are the half-dozen men and women who prosecuted him.

Federal investigations still alive

Anchorage Daily News
(04/20/09 20:33:35)

WASHINGTON, D.C. -- The federal investigation of political corruption in Alaska may have been damaged by allegations of prosecutorial misconduct, but it's still active, according to a court order signed Monday in Washington.

Emmet Sullivan, the U.S. District Court judge who presided over the failed prosecution of Sen. Ted Stevens and who is now pressing ahead on the contempt investigation of the Stevens prosecution team, ordered that any material turned over to the independent prosecutor he appointed be kept secret.

In an order signed at 6:50 p.m. EDT, Sullivan found that "ongoing investigations" could be impeded by disclosure of "certain investigative files, documents, e-mails, grand jury transcripts, interview notes, interview memoranda and other information." Sullivan also said that disclosure could damage the rights and privacy of innocent people and entities.

The protective order had been sought by the attorney representing the Justice Department in the contempt investigation, Deputy Attorney General Gary Grindler of the criminal division.

On April 7, when Sullivan dismissed charges against Stevens, he also appointed Washington lawyer Henry Schuelke to investigate six of the Stevens prosecutors for contempt for failing to turn over information to the defense.

Grindler asked Sullivan for the protective order before turning over Justice Department files to Schuelke. Schuelke did not oppose Grindler's request.

The assertion that one or more investigations are continuing confirms what the FBI office in Anchorage said after the Stevens dismissal: While Stevens can't be retried on charges that he failed to disclose gifts and free services, other crimes are still under investigation. Among the most prominent subjects of the Justice Department and IRS probes are Stevens' son Ben, the former state Senate president, and U.S. Rep. Don Young.

Commercial fishermen honor Stevens at Kodiak event

By JULIA O'MALLEY

(04/24/09 11:24:26)

In a rare public appearance since a federal judge threw out charges against him for accepting illegal gifts, former Sen. Ted Stevens was in Kodiak on Thursday to be honored by United Fishermen of Alaska.

At a banquet on the U.S. Coast Guard base, Stevens joined 20 other charter members to become part of UFA's "Seafood Hall of Fame."

Stevens also received a lifetime achievement award for his work on the Magnuson-Stevens Act, originally passed in 1976, which protects fishing within 200 miles of U.S. shores and creates standards for sustainable fisheries management and harvest, said Mark Vinsel, UFA's executive director.

UFA also honored his support of a ban on high-seas driftnets and efforts to stop illegal, unreported and unregulated fishing, he said.

Gov. Sarah Palin spoke as part of the event, Vinsel said.

UFA is an umbrella organization with 37 member groups representing fishing fleets of Alaska and offshore waters. For more information visit: www.ufa-fish.org

Stevens prosecutor may be removed from another case

JUDGE: U.S. attorney under investigation is lead in lobbyist trial.

The Associated Press

(04/25/09 21:36:57)

A federal judge wants to keep a prosecutor already under investigation for his role in the Ted Stevens case out of a separate congressional corruption trial.

So far, the Justice Department has not explained whether prosecutor William Welch will be removed as the case's supervisor.

U.S. District Judge Ellen Huvelle made it clear that's what she expects at a hearing in the case of Kevin Ring, a former associate to criminal lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Abramoff is in prison for defrauding his clients and bribing public officials, and Ring is fighting charges that he was involved in the corruption conspiracy.

Welch is the chief of the Justice Department's public integrity section, which is prosecuting Ring. Although he's not been in the courtroom litigating the case, he is closely involved. He is supervising attorneys who are in the courtroom, is listed as a lead attorney, has conducted witness interviews and his signature was at the top of government filings as recently as last week.

Welch is himself under criminal investigation, along with four other federal prosecutors, for withholding evidence from defense attorneys in the Stevens trial.

Stevens, who lost his re-election race just days after being convicted on the now-dismissed corruption charges, represented Alaska in the U.S. Senate for 40 years and was the longest serving Republican in Senate history. The guilty verdict was thrown out this month after the Justice Department acknowledged it had improperly withheld evidence.

Will feds pursue Stevens on fisheries?

By JOHN STROHMEYER
COMMENT
(04/18/09 17:27:41)

The federal authorities who rammed through seven faulty felony convictions against Sen. Ted Stevens should be ashamed of their careless conduct. The attorney general was right in asking for dismissal of the case because federal prosecutors failed to disclose evidence deemed helpful to the defense. And Judge Emmet Sullivan struck a blow for judicial ethics in ordering a criminal investigation into the appalling conduct of the federal prosecution team.

However, the government should feel more ashamed of bringing those pussycat charges in the first place. The feds had a chance to dig much deeper into Alaska corruption, particularly as it involved the senator's twisting of this nation's fishery policies and earmarking taxpayer dollars to benefit private interests.

Not one of the charges against the senator involved abuse of taxpayer money. But the senator had been deeply involved in steering taxpayer money in strange ways, particularly ways that benefited his son, Ben Stevens.

Stevens co-authored the 1976 Magnuson-Stevens Act, which kicked the foreign fleets out of American waters. He deserves to be honored for that. However, the record suggests the senator got greedy as his power grew.

Stevens pushed legislation to help Alaska's $2 billion a year fishing industry. By no coincidence, his son Ben Stevens, handsomely benefited.

A former commercial fisherman and once president of the Alaska Senate, Ben Stevens capitalized on his father's prestige. Once his father started rolling federal money into the Alaska fisheries, Ben Stevens cashed in big by setting up a consultant firm for clients that directly benefited from federal earmarks and changes in fishing regulations directed by his father. Some notable instances:

• When a funding earmark by Ted Stevens created the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board, son Ben became the first chairman. The board approved grants to companies that paid the younger Stevens consulting fees, according to a state financial disclosure report.

• In 2000, Congress approved a $100 million federal loan program to buy Alaska crab boats to trim the size of the fleet and boost prices. The Bering Sea Crab Effort Reduction Fund, which sought the buyout, hired Ben Stevens' company, Advance North, as a consultant.

• In 2003, an earmark inserted by Ted Stevens gave exclusive pollock fishing rights to Alaska Natives at Adak in the Aleutians. This was a direct political intrusion that revised the boundaries drawn scientifically by the North Pacific Management Council to protect the Steller sea lions. The measure to harvest pollock in once-restricted waters was said to be worth millions for Adak Fisheries.

FBI - Stevens-2483

That Native company paid Ben Stevens $295,000 between 2000 and 2004, according to the state financial disclosure reports. When the earmark went through, Ben Stevens secretly had held an option to buy into Adak fisheries.

While three Alaska state legislators in the federal bribery investigation had been tried and jailed in 2007, no charges had been brought against Stevens or his son as that year ended. On July 29, 2008, the federal government indicted Sen. Ted Stevens, the longest serving Republican senator, on seven felony charges, but none was related to fisheries.

Alaskans have a right to ask why the federal government concentrated its case on Stevens' failure to report gifts, which did not involve public dollars, rather than pursue his suspicious abuse of taxpayer dollars to benefit private interests.

Did they conclude they didn't have the facts? Or did the federal prosecutors feel they had a slam-dunk case against one of the nation's famous senators and could walk away with a trophy conviction without having to dig deeper?

Was taking Bill Allen's money all there is to the Stevens corruption scandal? Or are we still going to hear more?

Stevens legal defense bill tops $1 million

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(05/14/09 10:24:52)

WASHINGTON -- Former Sen. Ted Stevens spent at least $1 million on legal bills defending himself against charges he failed to report gifts, according to a final financial disclosure form filed this week with the U.S. Senate.

Stevens owes the Washington, D.C., law firm Williams and Connolly between $1 million and $5 million for his defense, the forms show. In October, a jury found Stevens guilty of seven counts of lying on financial disclosure forms about gifts, including renovations that doubled the size of his home in Girdwood. But in April, a judge dismissed the jury's guilty finding and threw out the indictment, saying the Justice Department withheld evidence that might have been favorable to Stevens at trial.

The disclosure forms don't ask for an exact amount, merely a range, so Stevens checked off the $1 million to $5 million box. He also owes $50,000 to $100,000 to another D.C. law firm, Utrecht and Phillips.

The information about what Stevens owes in legal bills was disclosed in the same disclosure paperwork that was at the heart of the corruption case against Stevens. It is the final disclosure form required of Stevens, who just days after his conviction lost his re-election bid to Democrat Mark Begich. It covers the year 2008.

Stevens attached an unusual document to his final disclosure form, known as a termination report. In it, he notes that the Justice Department in its indictment and at trial took the position that "I either received gifts from Veco Corporation or others or owed money to the Veco Corp. or others."

The indictment was dismissed, Stevens notes, but adds that he is "not in a position at this time to know what, if any, money I owe on account of work performed at my Girdwood home."

Stevens in September set up a legal expense fund with the Senate but never filed any disclosures to it. Since he no longer is a senator, the Senate Ethics Committee no longer requires him to submit such information.

Is Alaska corruption investigation still alive?

ACTIVITY: Since Stevens case was thrown out, not much has gone on.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

FBI - Stevens-2486

(05/23/09 22:31:49)

Does the mess that befell the prosecution of Sen. Ted Stevens create such a cloud over the long-running Alaska corruption investigation that it's all but over?

That's a question heard with some frequency since April, when the Stevens case was thrown out and the FBI agents and Justice Department prosecutors who were part of the broader Alaska corruption inquiry were themselves put under investigation.

The Justice Department continues to say the investigation is moving forward, though as recently as last week a spokeswoman would provide no details. Aside from assigning new prosecutors to its only Alaska case awaiting trial, the department has not demonstrated much activity in public. Before the Stevens case was dismissed, its record in the corruption prosecutions was a perfect 11-for-11.

Most legal experts who discussed the situation said that the team involved in the Alaska cases since the investigation became public in 2006 has been so tainted that they will be unable to play a significant role in any other case arising from the investigation.

But neither that restriction, nor the embarrassment and demoralization from such a public failure, is reason to stop now, said Ken Boehm, chairman of the National Legal and Policy Center in Washington, D.C., a conservative-leaning watchdog group.

"I can see they're a little singed around the edges, but at the same time, they all take the oath to pursue the evidence of crime wherever it leads, and they do have a duty to the public to the degree that there's people out there that are selling their office in one way or another -- they owe it to the public to follow up," Boehm said.

Even if a related case touched Stevens himself, such as one that might result from the investigation of Stevens' son Ben, a former state Senate president, it should be pursued, said Boehm, a former local prosecutor.

"The question to me is, how do they go forward on some of these other issues and things that involve other people if there's a tie-in to Sen. Stevens?" said Boehm.

Should a connection to Stevens amount to a "get-out-of-jail-free card as a result of this bungled thing?" Boehm asked. "By any yardstick of justice, the answer should be no. Nobody should be above the law."

Former U.S. Attorney Wev Shea has sharply criticized the prosecutors and agents in the Stevens case, writing in op-ed columns and blogs that some might have committed crimes. He has been among the many supporters of Stevens in Alaska who assert that political and professional ambition got in the way of justice.

But he too says the broader investigation should continue to move forward.

"Corruption is corruption," Shea said in an interview Friday. Just because the government "did such a despicable job" with Stevens doesn't mean the investigation shouldn't be taken up by a new team, he said.

"They should absolutely continue with what's going on," said Shea, including examining "the interrelationship of people involved with Ben Stevens."

In October, a jury found Stevens guilty of seven counts of failing to make required disclosures -- the 10th time prosecutors led by the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section got either a guilty verdict or guilty plea in the 10 cases decided to that point.

But things went downhill quickly. In April, Attorney General Eric Holder, himself a former prosecutor in the Public Integrity Section, personally intervened, ordering charges dropped after a series of revelations that prosecutors failed in their obligation to turn over favorable evidence to the defense.

DOMINO EFFECT

Ben Stevens, a former president of the Alaska Senate, was one of several legislators whose offices were raided in 2006 by FBI and IRS agents, though he has not been charged with a crime. While he was a state senator representing Anchorage, he received hundreds of thousands of dollars in "consulting fees" and others from oil and fishing interests seeking favors from the state and from Ted Stevens. His Seattle attorney, John Wolfe, didn't return a call last week seeking comment.

Rep. Don Young, R-Alaska, has also been a subject of the investigation. Through his spokeswoman, he declined to comment last week.

Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a liberal-leaning Congressional watchdog group, said the errors in the Stevens case were likely the result of a chronically understaffed and overworked public integrity team, not malicious prosecution. The situation was exacerbated when Stevens, hoping for an acquittal before the November election, demanded a speedy trial when he was indicted in July 2008.

Though prosecutors should be ready for trial when they obtain an indictment, the government lawyers on the Stevens case were obviously ill-prepared, said Sloan, who served as an assistant U.S. attorney in Washington for five years. Taking on a high-profile defendant with a top-flight legal defense under such circumstances could have the long-term effect of jeopardizing other cases -- and not just in Alaska, she said.

"I think it could harm all of these prosecutions," Sloan said. "Now that these prosecutors are kind of toxic, it's easy for any defense lawyer to trash the case that they're involved in."

It's like when a police officer is found to have lied under oath, she said. Everyone convicted in a case in which the officer testified begins clamoring for a new trial. Pending prosecutions might be abandoned if that officer's testimony is key.

"Some other team has to go in and start over and look at everything, and make sure we're not repeating these problems," Sloan said.

In fact, all around the country defendants are citing Stevens' case as a reason their charges should be dropped or that they should get a new trial -- even when none of the Stevens prosecutors were involved. One of the most prominent is former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman, a Democrat convicted of corruption charges, but he is far from alone.

'A LACK OF OVERSIGHT'

It's not as though Stevens' prosecutors shouldn't have expected push-back from his legal team led by Brendan Sullivan, one of the nation's top defense lawyers, Sloan said.

"Brendan Sullivan is known to cry foul against prosecutors in a heartbeat. They should've been prepared for that," she said. "And it's a super-high-profile case. He's the only senator you've currently got indicted -- how are you not pulling all your staff and letting other things fall by the wayside? How were these choices made? It's incomprehensible. And it does show a lack of oversight."

Anchorage activist Ray Metcalfe, an anti-corruption campaigner who himself made a run for the U.S. Senate in the Democratic primary last August, is so concerned the government might drop the investigation that he's begun a petition drive.

"Let me put it this way: If these investigations were brought to an end, horrific injustices would be being ignored," he said. If Ted Stevens got his charges thrown out because of prosecutorial misconduct, then change the prosecutors, he said.

So far, Metcalfe said, he has about 60 signatures on his petition to Holder and FBI director Robert Mueller, and hopes to get 1,000 in support of continuing the investigation.

"If things are hanging in the balance, I think it could make a difference," he said. "It reminds the people that made the decision to let Stevens go that there really are victims here. This isn't one guy saying this is horrible, this shouldn't happen, you should do something about this; there are about a thousand people saying this -- don't stop because they had had a bad situation."

Weimar reports to halfway house to finish sentence

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com
(05/27/09 13:59:12)

Bill Weimar, once Alaska's halfway house king as the owner of Allvest Inc., has himself reported to a privately-owned, federal halfway house to finish serving his time on corruption charges.

The U.S. Bureau of Prisons reported that Weimar entered a residential re-entry center in Butte, Mont, on May 13. A prisons management official in Seattle, William Brown, said the Butte facility is privately owned and contracts with the government to house qualified federal inmates toward the end of their sentences.

Weimar began serving a six-month sentence Jan. 5 at a federal prison in Arizona.

After his release, due July 3, he'll have another six months of home confinement under the sentence imposed in November by U.S. District Judge John Sedwick of Anchorage. At the time of his sentencing, Weimar lived in a $5 million mansion near Flathead Lake, Mont., but was trying to sell his place.

Weimar pleaded guilty last August to two federal charges stemming from his efforts to get the state to agree to house inmates in a private prison in Alaska. The prison was an outgrowth of his statewide chain of Allvest halfway houses, which he sold to the private prison company Cornell Corrections Inc. in 1998.

Weimar admitted funneling $20,000 to a campaign consultant in 2004 to help a state legislative candidate knowing the candidate would support a private prison. The payment amounted to an unreported, over-the-limit campaign contribution.

The candidate wasn't named in Weimar's charges, but the description matched former Sen. Jerry Ward, an Anchorage Republican who lost the 2004 election. Ward has not been charged.

Convicted legislators may be released

JUSTICE DEPARTMENT: Failure to disclose information is cited.

By RICHARD MAUER, LISA DEMER and SEAN COCKERHAM
Anchorage Daily News

(06/04/09 13:14:52)

In another shocking development in Alaska's political corruption investigation, the U.S. Justice Department on Thursday asked that two former state legislators be released from prison because their trials were tainted by the failure of prosecutors to disclose information favorable to the defense.

In filings with the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, the Justice Department said Pete Kott and Vic Kohring should be set free while their cases are sent back to U.S. District Court in Anchorage for further consideration. They were both convicted in that court in 2007.

The Justice Department didn't describe the new information it discovered. But the issue is similar to the problem that led to dismissal of charges against U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens in April after he was convicted on seven counts of failure to disclose gifts and services.

In a written statement issued just after 5 p.m. on the East Coast, Attorney General Eric Holder said he has asked the Justice Department's Criminal Division "to review the department's public corruption investigation in Alaska to ensure that all other discovery obligations have been met."

The move by the Obama administration's reconstituted Justice Department "is enough to make Vic Kohring become a Democrat," lawyer John Henry Browne joked about his arch-conservative client.

Gov. Sarah Palin, who sat in on part of Kott's trial, said this in an e-mail:

"Until I get more information on this newest twist, I can't comment beyond saying I am wildly curious what went on in DOJ back then, and what is going on in DOJ now that's resulted in these stunning turn of events. I agree with the attorney general that the Department of Justice should be about justice, not just about winning cases but I will withhold further comment until we see how this plays out."

"Wow, wow, wow," said Sen. Fred Dyson, the Eagle River Republican who helped the FBI in its investigation. "I'm surprised, to say the least. I sat all the way through the Kott trial and watched the video," said Dyson, referring to secretly made recordings by the FBI.

The videos, secretly taken from a lamp in a Juneau hotel suite in 2006, captured Kott and Kohring talking oil-tax strategy with officials from the now defunct oil-field service company Veco Inc. The government presented evidence that those officials, chief executive Bill Allen and vice president Rick Smith, also made illegal payments to Kott and Kohring. Allen and Smith have pleaded guilty to bribery and are awaiting sentencing.

"Particularly with Kott, I thought the evidence was compelling," Dyson said.

SIDES IN AGREEMENT

Kott's Seattle attorney, Sheryl Gordon McCloud, said Thursday afternoon she was trying to contact Kott in federal prison to tell him the news. She had earlier sought his release while he appealed his conviction, most recently in April, but the government opposed it at that time.

McCloud said she got a call from a Justice Department attorney shortly before the government filed its motions with the 9th Circuit in San Francisco. It will take an order from the 9th Circuit -- most likely from the three judges hearing the appeals -- to get the men out of prison. She said she expected the court to act quickly, given the fact that all sides are in agreement.

Kott and Kohring, both Republicans, were convicted by Anchorage juries in 2007. Kott, a former House speaker from Eagle River, began serving a six-year prison sentence in January 2008. He is being held at the Federal Correctional Institution in Sheridan, Ore. Kohring, from Wasilla, was sentenced to 3 1/2 years and reported to prison in June 2008. He is being held at the privately run Taft Correctional Institution in California.

Both filed their appeals before the collapse of the Stevens case in Washington. When the government admitted it had violated Stevens' rights to receive information that was favorable to him, Kott and Kohring demanded the government turn over information that might have been favorable to them as well and that wasn't disclosed at trial. Kott and Kohring argued their appeals April 14, just a week after Stevens' case was dropped. At the time, prosecutors said they hadn't had a chance to review their files for Brady material and that issue was left unresolved.

In the call, McCloud said the Justice Department attorney told her the review was still continuing, but enough undisclosed information had already been found to warrant release of Kott and Kohring and to send the cases back to the trial court to sort out what happens next.

McCloud said she hadn't seen the new documents, but they were being sent to her overnight. She was under an order to not publicly reveal the information, she said.

"It's always a good development when the government comes forward, discloses materials, is transparent, admits when it was wrong, tries to correct its errors and comes forward with evidence of innocence," McCloud said. "Of course, it's even better when they don't hide the ball in the first place and cause a man to spend time in prison on flaky evidence. But I certainly applaud the current government lawyers on the case for doing what they've done so far."

NEW INFORMATION

So far, the Justice Department's actions in the Kott and Kohring cases are more limited than what it did in the Stevens case. Rather than seek a new trial for Stevens, Attorney General Holder asked that all charges be permanently dismissed in the "interest of justice." Stevens' age -- he was 85 -- was frequently cited in commentary at the time to explain Holder's decision.

With Kott and Kohring, the government has not moved to dismiss the indictments, though presumably the defense lawyers will seek dismissal when they get back to U.S. District Court in Anchorage. The more common remedy in this kind of situation is a new trial.

"I don't know what 'sort everything out there' is going to mean," McCloud said, referring to her conservation with the Justice Department attorney. "It's an odd procedure because it's odd for the government to come forward with this sort of evidence this late in the game."

Kohring's attorney Browne, also of Seattle, said that if the government doesn't seek full dismissal of charges, he will. He also wants a new judge, someone other than U.S. District Judge John Sedwick, who heard Kohring's and Kott's cases.

After Kohring's trial, Browne accused Sedwick of having a conflict because the judge's wife, a former state commissioner, had an "extremely antagonistic relationship" with Kohring when he was in the Legislature. Kohring didn't realize that Judge Sedwick was married to Deborah Sedwick until after the trial, Browne has said.

The four Justice Department attorneys who prosecuted Kott and Kohring were also involved in the Stevens case. They, and two supervisors in the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, are the subject of a criminal contempt investigation ordered by U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan, who presided over the Stevens case.

Sullivan's order establishing the contempt investigation by a special prosecutor, Henry Schuelke, deals solely with potential violations of his own orders to prosecutors, so the Kott and Kohring cases would be outside his jurisdiction.

The Justice Department's Office of Projection Responsibility, which does have jurisdiction, is also looking at the conduct of the prosecutors and of FBI agents involved in all the cases.

REPUTATIONS 'TATTERED'

Family members and friends of Kott and Kohring stressed, in interviews after Thursday's announcement, that the news doesn't mean the cases are dismissed outright.

No matter what happens now, Kohring has lost everything, said Robert Hall, a witness for Kohring at his trial, owner of Gorilla Fireworks in Houston and a lawyer.

"His reputation has been pretty tattered. He cashed in all his retirement. His parents sold half the property they had to pay for his defense. He's broke. And his wife has divorced him," Hall said.

Kott's daughter, Pamela, said she didn't want to say too much with the case still pending. She is visiting her father at Sheridan this weekend on an already planned trip.

"That would be so nice if I could just take him home," Pamela said.

Meanwhile, lawyers for two defendants who pleaded guilty in the long-running corruption investigation say they want to re-examine their clients' cases in light of the latest twists.

Bob Bundy, a former U.S. attorney who represents Allen, said he needs to learn more about the new developments. Allen pleaded guilty to bribery and conspiracy charges in May 2007 and testified for the government against Kott, Kohring and Stevens. Allen is awaiting sentencing.

Former state Rep. Bev Masek is the most recent to plead guilty, admitting in federal court in March that she accepted a bribe to kill a bill that would have raised oil production taxes.

"We'll have to review what's going on now. This is breaking news for today, so I'll have to look at it and see," said Rich Curtner, Masek's federal public defender. Curtner said he will need to talk with government lawyers about the substance of the information being newly disclosed to Kott and Kohring's defense. "I don't know if there is anything there that pertains to our case or not."

Masek is scheduled to be sentenced June 25. That could be delayed in light of Thursday's developments, Curtner said.

Amid everything else, the FBI's investigation remainS ongoing, said Eric Gonzalez, the FBI's chief division counsel in Alaska.

"Just know that this case continues. We'll address these issues as they come up," he said.

Feds seek release of jailed legislators

Anchorage Daily News
(06/04/09 13:14:52)

The U.S.Justice Department this afternoon asked that two former Alaska state legislators imprisoned after convictions in public corruption cases be released, saying their trials were tainted by the failure of prosecutors to disclose favorable information.

In filings with the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, the Justice Department asked that the Pete Kott and Vic Kohring be set free while their cases are sent back to U.S. District Court, where they were convicted in 2007.

The Justice Department didn't immediately disclose what new information has come to light. But the issue is the same general problem that led to dismissal of charges against U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens in April after he was convicted on seven counts of failure to disclose gifts and services.

In a written statement issued this afternoon, Attorney General Eric Holder said he has asked the Justice Department's Criminal Division "to review the Department's public corruption investigation in Alaska to ensure that all other discovery obligations have been met."

"After a careful review of these cases, I have determined that it appears that the Department did not provide information that should have been disclosed to the defense," the statement says. "Department of Justice prosecutors work hard every day and perform a great service for the American people. But the Department's mission is to do justice, not just win cases, and when we make mistakes, it is our duty to admit and correct those mistakes. We are committed to doing that."

This is a developing story. Check back for updates.

Despite his lockup, Kohring still supports private prisons

REFORM: If the freed ex-legislator ever gets re-elected, he says he would work to improve conditions.

Former Rep. Vic Kohring says he still supports private prisons even as his enthusiasm clashes with his own observations from inside one, where he said equipment went unrepaired, meals lacked fresh produce and prisoner welfare appeared to take a back seat to saving money.

"That's the downside of the private-run facility," said Kohring, two days after he left the privately run Taft Correctional Institution in Taft, Calif. "There was a certain amount of indifference there."

Kohring spent about 10 months at the low-security camp at Taft following his conviction on federal corruption charges in 2007. He and former House Speaker Pete Kott were freed last week while they argue that their bribery convictions should be overturned because prosecutors failed to give them favorable evidence uncovered by the FBI.

Their first court hearing will be Wednesday, though it will mainly deal with their conditions for release, not the substance of their arguments.

Kott was held in a prison camp owned and operated by the U.S. Bureau of Prisons at Sheridan, Ore. Kott hasn't responded to interview requests.

Kohring was in the process of transferring from Taft to Sheridan when release orders were issued Thursday by U.S. District Judge John Sedwick of Anchorage. On Friday, after reporting to probation officers in Anchorage, Kohring spoke extensively with a reporter about his year inside the federal corrections system.

Taft is a federally owned facility in the California desert. It opened in 1997 as a demonstration project to test how private companies could operate a federal prison. Wackenhut Corrections and Geo Group Inc. held contracts there. In 2007, Management & Training Corp., a privately held company based in Centerville, Utah, took over operations under a four-year, $144 million contract.

"It seemed pretty apparent they were cutting -- they were trying to be ultra-efficient, cutting back as much as they could," Kohring said. "If things would break down, they'd stay broken down for a long time -- exercise equipment, telephones."

Meals were loaded with carbohydrates, "too many processed foods, not enough fresh produce," he said. "There was a lot of complaints that the food there wasn't up to par, at least not in comparison to, say, Sheridan."

Kohring also said that medical care was inadequate.

"I witnessed some pretty bad injuries when I was in Taft there. Guys falling over, one guy broke his femur, another broke his hip, one guy was punched in the face and he had glass embedded in his eye and it took him about a day before they finally took him to the doctor, at Bakersfield, in the hospital. It was horrid."

His own pre-existing back and neck injury, from a car accident, got him neither sympathy nor care, he said.

"My back didn't get any kind of attention at all, other than ibuprofen. I was told by the director of medical to shut up ... They said no to everything." He was warned that if he kept complaining, he'd wind up cleaning the kitchen, he said.

Carl Stuart, communication director for Management & Training Corp., said Saturday that his company does what's required under its federal contracts. Bureau of Prisons officials regularly inspect its operations, and some contract prisons have full-time, on-site government monitors, though he didn't know if that was the case in Taft.

Management & Training operates county, state and federal facilities in five states.

Kohring said that his experiences in Taft haven't shaken his belief in private prisons and said inmates' needs can be met in a profit-making environment. "They certainly have a moral obligation, perhaps even a legal obligation, to meet the basic needs in terms of health and welfare," he said.

And Kohring, who backed private prisons as a legislator, insisted he may play a political role again in the debate and be in a position to advance his ideas.

"One of the priorities for me, if I were ever able someday to be lucky enough to get in the Legislature in some elected capacity, would be to engage in prison reform," he said. "I'd like to conduct some investigations to determine exactly what the needs are in these facilities."

Kohring, a Republican, was first elected to the House from Wasilla in 1994 and was serving there when efforts to build a private prison began embroiling the state two years later. House Republicans first won passage of a private prison bill in 1996, but the effort was opposed by Democrats, including then-Gov. Tony Knowles, and also by local communities targeted for the facility -- at different times South Anchorage, Delta Junction, Kenai and Whittier, among others.

The issue stuck around for years, with backers shifting from community to community and keeping up pressure from the Legislature. Several of the promoters would become familiar names in the federal corruption investigation that surfaced in 2006. Though that investigation came to focus mainly on bribes and extortion related to oil-tax and gas-pipeline measures, it started out in 2004 as "Operation Polar Pen," looking at corruption in the private-prison effort.

While Veco Corp. and its chief executive, Bill Allen, mainly operated in the oil fields, for a time they were partners in the consortium seeking to build the private prison. So was Bill Weimar, the Anchorage businessman who owned a string of private halfway houses. Lobbyist Bill Bobrick and former State Corrections Commissioner Frank Prewitt were also part of the team.

Ultimately, Weimar and Bobrick pleaded guilty to corruption charges related to the prison effort and have completed their prison terms -- Bobrick at Taft. Former Rep. Tom Anderson, R-Anchorage, was convicted of taking bribes to advance the private prison and is serving five years in Sheridan. Allen has pleaded guilty to paying bribes, but in the legislative effort to hold down oil taxes. He's awaiting sentencing. Prewitt assisted the FBI in its investigation.

Former legislators Pete Kott, looking trim, and Vic Kohring, his hair freshly styled and stubbly beard shaved off, said Wednesday they were relishing their freedom from prison after a judge confirmed their continued release without cash bond.

Their back-to-back hearings in U.S. District Court behind them, Republicans Kott, a former House speaker from Eagle River, and Kohring, elected six times from Wasilla, told reporters they were looking forward to going fishing and spending time with family and friends. Both said they planned to work, Kohring selling fireworks at a friend's stand in Houston and Kott in the family flooring business.

Kott and Kohring appeared to be in no danger of missing the Fourth of July -- or Labor Day, for that matter -- even if they eventually fail in their bids to get their 2007 corruption convictions voided and charges thrown out.

James Trusty, the prosecutor speaking for the new Justice Department team on the Alaska corruption cases, said in court that the government doesn't expect to complete its review of evidence in the case until July 31, an essential step before anything else can proceed.

Prosecutors are searching through FBI and attorney files going back at least to 2004, looking for evidence that should have been turned over to the defense before their trials.

Kohring's lawyer, John Henry Browne of Seattle, told reporters he's already gotten about 1,000 pages of such material in the last week or so.

"There was a lot of evidence that should've been turned over to us that pointed directly at his innocence," Browne said. He couldn't say why the evidence was relevant -- a protective order prohibits him and Kott's lawyers from disclosing anything about it. Prosecutors were not talking publicly about the material either.

The former legislators, convicted of bribery and conspiracy for selling their votes on an oil-tax bill in 2006, were freed from federal prisons last week after the government admitted it failed to adhere to one of the central tenets of a fair trial: providing defendants with evidence that could help convince a jury they were not guilty.

Talking to reporters at the courthouse, Kohring said his good friend, Gorilla Fireworks owner Robert Hall, offered him a job at one of the fireworks stands on the Parks Highway. Kohring said he may have an offer from another friend as well. He wouldn't describe that other job, except that it was in an office.

Kohring, notorious for claiming poverty, said he mooched a free haircut this week from a friend at the Beehive Beauty Shop in Wasilla, the same place that helped Sarah Palin develop her "updo." Kohring said he was so busy accepting lunch invitations and seeing visitors at home that he hasn't had a chance yet to go fishing. When he does, he said, he'll dipnet for salmon on the Copper River.

"I'm going to sit on the rocks and find a good eddy," Kohring said.

"He told me he's going to pay me in fish," Browne added.

Kott, standing beside his girlfriend and two grown children, said he has been taking it easy since getting back.

"It's been a tough year and half. It's just nice to be back with all the supporters, family and friends," he said.

Kott said he planned to return to his business, now run by his son.

"I'm still a flooring contractor by trade," Kott said. "I've had several people already approach me and ask me to work for them around the state. At this point, I'm just going to relax for a few days and maybe do some fishing this weekend and enjoy some of the Alaska outdoors that I've missed for the last year and half."

During the hearings, which each lasted less than 20 minutes, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick ordered defense and prosecution to file suggestions by Aug. 31 about how the cases should proceed. Sedwick could determine the material wasn't prejudicial and send the men back to prison; he could order new trials; or he could dismiss charges outright. Prosecutors haven't said yet what they will ask for.

When a similar situation arose after a jury found U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens guilty of lying on his financial disclosures, U.S. Attorney General Eric Holder moved to dismiss charges "in the interest of justice," widely interpreted to be a reference to Stevens' advanced age -- 85.

Browne said Holder and the Justice Department should do the same for Kohring.

Kott declined to characterize his case for reporters.

"It's going to be left up to the government to determine what course of action they want to pursue and I think until they review all the information, and we have an opportunity to review all the information, nobody can really say one way or other how this is going to end up," Kott said.

"It's a positive step for me, regardless, that we're at this point, this juncture."

Kott's trial attorney, Jim Wendt, announced in court he was leaving the case in favor of Kott's appeals attorney, Sheryl Gordon McCloud of Seattle, who listened to the hearing by telephone.

Kott said he could no longer afford an attorney and asked the court to pick up McCloud's fees. Sedwick said he would take that matter under advisement once Kott provided a financial statement.

In the hearings, Sedwick said he planned to impose the same minimal restrictions on Kott and Kohring as he did prior to their trials: no need for cash bail, freedom to move about the state, no curfew. At Kott and Kohring's requests, he loosened the rules even further. Rather than require them to get a judge's permission before leaving the state, they now only have to provide an itinerary to the federal probation office.

Kohring said he planned to go to the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., to continue treatment on an injured neck and back.

In one other development, interim U.S. Attorney Karen Loeffler sat at the prosecution table for the first time in any of the corruption cases, signalling that the Anchorage office is once again part of the corruption case. Though she was one of the supervising attorneys in the very early stages of the corruption investigation, she and the Alaska U.S. Attorney's office were taken off the case by the Justice Department.

While two lawyers from the U.S. Attorney's office were assigned to the corruption investigation, they were supervised long-distance by the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section. Experts have cited poor supervision as one reason the Stevens case went so badly awry.

Loeffler, a career prosecutor who has specialized in white-collar cases, didn't give a reason in court why her office was back on the case and wouldn't talk about it afterward.

First batch of papers delivered

KOHRING, KOTT: Government's hefty packet surprises attorney.

FBI - Stevens-2500

(06/05/09 20:39:12)

A day after the U.S. Justice Department admitted it failed to provide two Alaska legislators with favorable evidence prior to their trials, the two men remained in federal custody awaiting an order that would release them pending hearings in Anchorage.

Attorneys for former Reps. Pete Kott and Vic Kohring said they received the first packages of fresh material from the Justice Department in express shipments Friday.

"I got an amazing amount of stuff," said Kohring's attorney, John Henry Browne of Seattle. "I was expecting maybe four, five to 10 pieces. And I got volumes of stuff that they think we should've had and were not given."

Browne and Kott's Seattle attorney, Sheryl Gordon McCloud, declined to provide details about what they received. They said they agreed to abide by protective orders drafted by the Justice Department to prevent disclosure of the material, some of which may involve privacy matters, grand jury testimony, or other investigations.

"I'm about a tenth of the way through the material that I got, and all of it is material that we should have had and would've been helpful to Vic's defense, and did not have," Browne said.

On Thursday, attorneys representing the Justice Department in Kott's and Kohring's appeals on corruption convictions told the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that the department had discovered information that should have been disclosed to the defendants before trial. They asked the appeals court to send the cases back to district court in Anchorage to determine how to proceed next.

Until the matter is resolved, the government said, it wouldn't object to releasing Kott and Kohring from prison on their own recognizance.

Kott, a former House speaker from Eagle River, is serving a six-year sentence and Kohring, who represented Wasilla in the state House, is serving 3½ years. Both men were convicted in 2007 and appealed their cases to the 9th Circuit. An appeals panel heard oral arguments April 14, but that was before the government acknowledged it had failed to turn over potentially relevant information.

Meanwhile, in Washington, D.C., the criminal contempt investigation of the prosecutors who took Sen. Ted Stevens to trial inched forward Friday. The issue in the Stevens case is similar to that of Kott and Kohring -- whether prosecutors failed to turn over favorable evidence to Stevens' lawyers in violation of orders by the trial judge, Emmet Sullivan. Four of the Stevens prosecutors also tried the Kott and Kohring cases; the other two supervised.

Stevens was found guilty on seven counts of failure to disclose goods and services, but the Justice

194A-AN-13820-M - 994

Department dropped all charges in April.

The Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility began an internal investigation of the prosecution team before the Stevens trial ended in October. As part of its investigation, it took statements from the six prosecutors and others.

When Sullivan appointed special prosecutor Henry Schuelke to determine if the Stevens prosecutors should be held in criminal contempt, he directed the Justice Department to turn over its internal investigative files.

The six prosecutors themselves have not had access to the material, including their own statements. On Friday, the Justice Department sought to remedy that situation by asking Sullivan to sign a secrecy order that would allow it to give the material to the six prosecutors, their attorneys and to witnesses on condition they not disclose it to anyone else. It said uncontrolled disclosure of the material "could impact the rights of innocent third parties and the privacy interests of individuals and entities, impede ongoing investigations," and reveal secret information presented to a grand jury or obtained from wiretaps.

The Justice Department said the proposed protective order was not opposed by Schuelke.

Judge clears way for release of Kott, Kohring from prison

MARSHALS SERVICE: Sedwick can set conditions for their release.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(06/10/09 11:31:08)

A federal judge in Anchorage on Wednesday ordered the U.S. Marshals Service to bring former Alaska Reps. Pete Kott and Vic Kohring from prison into his court "as soon as reasonably possible" to set their release pending further hearings.

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick filed his orders shortly after the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco sent the corruption cases back to his court with directives that both men be released from prison. The three-judge appeals panel left it to Sedwick to determine conditions of release, though they noted that prosecutors had recommended the men be set free without bond. In a pair of one-paragraph orders, Sedwick said he would schedule hearings for both men as soon as the Marshals Service told him when Kott and Kohring would be in Anchorage. An official for the Marshals Service in Anchorage said she hadn't seen a copy of Sedwick's order yet and couldn't comment on the specific situation but said it sometimes takes weeks to arrange transportation for a prisoner from the Lower 48 to Anchorage.

Kott is serving a six-year sentence at the federal correctional institution in Sheridan, Ore. Kohring is doing 3 ½ years in Taft, Calif.

Late Wednesday afternoon, Kott's trial attorney, Jim Wendt, asked Sedwick to clarify whether he wanted a marshal to escort Kott back to Alaska. He said Kott would prefer to be released in Oregon and given a ticket for a flight back to Alaska.

"Doing so would save the government the funds required to transport a U.S. marshal along with the defendant," Wendt said. He said Sedwick had already determined that Kott was neither a flight risk nor a danger to others.

The remand follows a motion to the 9th Circuit brought last week by a new team of federal prosecutors requesting the return of the cases to the lower court in Anchorage. The prosecutors said the Justice Department had recently discovered favorable evidence that should have been turned over to Kott and Kohring before their trials in 2007. The new prosecutors have not said yet what the evidence is, nor have they suggested a remedy.

FBI - Stevens-2502

Both legislators were convicted on bribery and other charges.

In cases when undisclosed favorable evidence could have had a significant effect on a trial, the usual remedy is a new trial, though in the recent case of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, all his charges were dismissed at the request of the Justice Department.

Unlike Stevens' case, secretly recorded videos by the FBI showed Kott and Kohring accepting money from former oil services company executive Bill Allen, who was the chief witness against all three men.

199A-AN-13620-M -995

In sending the cases back to Sedwick's courtroom, the 9th Circuit panel resoundingly rejected one point of Kohring's appeal -- that Sedwick should have removed himself from the case because of alleged bad blood between Sedwick's wife, a former state official, and Kohring.

Kohring raised that issue months after he was convicted and demanded a new trial with a different judge. Kohring said he didn't get a fair trial because of a public feud that began in the late 1990s with the judge's wife, Deborah Sedwick, a former state commissioner whose agency budget he tried to cut and whose department and job he said he eliminated.

Sedwick asked another federal judge for help, but that judge sent it back to him. Sedwick then ruled Kohring's complaint was late and without merit.

The 9th Circuit judges said Sedwick was right. "Kohring did not make this motion when the district judge was assigned the case, nor before the commencement of his criminal trial, nor at the conclusion of it," the 9th Circuit panel wrote. "He waited until three months after the jury entered its verdict, just prior to the sentencing date."

That was too late, the judges said.

"The underlying facts were known to Kohring many years before the trial. He claims he did not understand the significance of the facts until the last day of the trial. Nonetheless, with the exercise of the slightest amount of diligence, he could have ascertained the significance long before trial."

As for the substance of Kohring's complaint, the appellate panel said that Sedwick "handled all matters judiciously and fairly" and that a reasonable person with knowledge of the facts "would not reasonably question the judge's impartiality."

In sending both cases back to Anchorage, the 9th Circuit judges said Sedwick should rule only on the matters related to the undisclosed evidence. In doing so, they asked Sedwick to conduct a three-part test: to determine whether the government breached its obligation to provide favorable evidence; if so, whether the defendants were prejudiced by the violation; and if the defendants were prejudiced, what the remedy should be.

If the remands to District Court don't result in new trials or dismissal of charges, the cases go back to the 9th Circuit on other points of appeal raised by both defendants.

Judge orders swift release of Kott, Kohring

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com
(06/11/09 13:06:36)

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick put more urgency this morning into the release from prison of two former state legislators, directing corrections officials to immediately set them free and U.S. marshals to give them plane tickets back to Alaska.

The new orders, filed in U.S. District Court, expand on orders Sedwick issued Wednesday to the U.S. Marshals Service that it arrange for the return to Alaska of former Reps. Pete Kott and Vic Kohring "as soon as reasonably possible."

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ordered the release of Kott and Kohring when the Justice Department said their 2007 corruption trials were tainted by the failure of prosecutors to turn over favorable evidence. The appellate court directed Sedwick, the trial judge for both defendants, to set the conditions for release.

In his most recent orders, Sedwick said Kott and Kohring must be "immediately released from the custody of the Bureau of Prisons." He directed the Marshals Service to give both men plane tickets to Anchorage "at the earliest possible time."

And he ordered Kott and Kohring to immediately contact the U.S. Probation and Pre-trial Services Office in Anchorage as soon as they arrive in town. That office monitors federal defendants on parole, probation and home detention.

Kott was being held in Oregon and Kohring in California.

Sedwick also set back-to-back hearings for Kott and Kohring for June 17 "so the court may set terms and conditions" for their continued release.

He has not yet set a time to hear the substantive case involving the withheld evidence. The 9th Circuit directed Sedwick to determine whether the material was serious enough to prejudice their trials. If so, he could order new trials or dismiss charges entirely.

Kohring's lawyer, John Henry Browne of Seattle, said the material he's seen so far shows Kohring did not get a fair trial, and he hasn't gotten everything yet.

"There are many, many smoking guns," Browne said by cell phone from Yakima, Wash., where he had been in court. "There's hundreds of pages."

Browne said he was restricted from disclosing any details about the material but said he looked forward to having the matter heard in open court -- along with the possibility of putting prosecutors on the stand to testify about why they didn't turn it over in the first place.

The Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility is conducting just such an inquiry, -996

but it has not disclosed anything publicly. Separately, a special prosecutor in Washington, D.C., is looking at a similar issue involving the same prosecutors as a result of the collapse of the case against former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens. The special prosecutor was appointed by the trial judge in Stevens' case after the Justice Department admitted it violated law and the judge's orders in failing to turn over favorable evidence.

Bankruptcy trustee demands to see Weimar's financial papers

HALFWAY HOUSES: He used to run them, now he's in one.

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com
(06/19/09 21:44:30)

Bill Weimar, who once was the king of Alaska halfway houses and now is a convicted felon, should be forced to reveal recent financial documents to a bankruptcy trustee, the trustee argues in recent court filings.

The bankruptcy trustee, Ken Battley, is seeking the information to determine whether Weimar hid assets when he settled a bankruptcy case back in 2002. Weimar, who himself is serving time in a halfway house and is scheduled for release July 3, is fighting the effort. His lawyer argues too much time has passed, and that the information is private.

The financial information at issue was provided last year to the judge in Weimar's federal corruption case. But the information was filed under seal and the bankruptcy trustee has been unable to get it.

Weimar started and owned Allvest Inc., which operated the state's only chain of private halfway houses, provided drug treatment, and ran other services including animal control. In 1998, he sold five halfway houses in 1998 to Cornell Corrections for more than $20 million. But taxes took a large chunk.

In 2002, Allvest was forced into bankruptcy because of unpaid judgments in civil suits against the company. One case involved a man who died after being injured by workers in the community service patrol when Allvest ran it; the other involved five women who had been sexually harassed or assaulted by an Allvest worker, according to court records.

Weimar claimed the company had no assets by then, but eventually agreed to pay close to $3 million in a bankruptcy settlement, according to court papers. He said in a sworn statement that he was worth about $6 million at the time.

Now Battley is questioning whether Weimar had more to give.

At Weimar's sentencing in the corruption case last year, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick ordered him to pay a $75,000 fine, based on the sealed financial report. That was more than prosecutors asked for and above what federal guidelines call for. But Sedwick said Weimar could afford it.

FBI - Stevens-2506

When he reported to prison in January, Weimar's home in Big Arm, Mont., was on the market for more than $5 million.

Battley said Friday that he has a duty to compare what Weimar said he was worth in early 2003 to what was reported to the judge in 2008.

In the criminal case, Weimar admitted illegally funneling $20,000 in 2004 to a state legislative candidate, knowing that if elected the candidate would support his interest in a private prison. He was sentenced to serve six months in prison -- and is doing the tail end of that in a halfway house -- then six months of home confinement.

Feds will pick up Kott's legal bills

Anchorage Daily News
(06/22/09 23:33:52)

The federal government will pay the legal bills of former House Speaker Pete Kott over the next several months while a judge explores what to do about evidence that was improperly withheld from Kott's defense.

After a review of Kott's finances provided in a private filing to the court, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick said Monday that the ex-legislator and flooring contractor from Eagle River was only borderline indigent.

"However, the expansion of this case arising from the United States' admitted, and remarkable, failure to timely provide all of the discovery required . . . stretches Mr. Kott's modest means too far," Sedwick wrote. He ordered the government to pay Kott's appellate attorney, Sheryl Gordon McCloud of Seattle, for work she does after July 1. Kott is responsible for her fees up to then, the judge said.

Kott and former legislator. Vic Kohring were freed from prison two weeks ago when prosecutors agreed the government failed to provide evidence favorable to the defendants prior to their 2007 trials, though they haven't publicly disclosed any details.

Allen delays try judge's patience

SENTENCING: He wants the corruption figure to be punished.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(07/07/09 21:40:57)

Declaring that enough is enough, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick said Tuesday it is high time for former Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen to come to terms with his crimes and face sentencing for corrupting Alaska's political system.

Sedwick rejected suggestions made in secret filings last week by federal prosecutors that Allen and former Veco Vice President Rick Smith should continue to enjoy freedom indefinitely. In reporting that the government had asserted the two men were still needed for ongoing corruption investigations, Sedwick expressed displeasure at how long the matter was dragging out.

"The community has substantial interest in seeing the imposition of punishment for these crimes without undue delay," Sedwick wrote in a pair of matching orders filed Tuesday.

Unless prosecutors can convince him to the contrary with strong and detailed arguments, Sedwick said, he will sentence the men on Oct. 28 -- at 8:30 a.m. for Allen and 10 a.m. for Smith.

Sedwick also put prosecutors on notice that he was considering imposing the maximum fine on Allen regardless of prison-time reductions for his cooperation or any credit provided by federal sentencing guidelines. If Sedwick follows through, Allen would have to write a check for $750,000, a substantial chunk of his $6.5 million share of the 2007 sale of Veco to the international engineering and construction firm CH2M Hill.

On May 7, 2007, Allen and Smith each pleaded guilty to three felonies: conspiracy to commit extortion, bribery and fraud; bribery; and conspiracy to impede the Internal Revenue Service. Within months, each gave damning testimony in the corruption trials of former Reps. Pete Kott and Vic Kohring. Allen was also a central witness against former Sen. Ted Stevens, then became a central figure in the demise of Stevens' case.

In October, a jury found Stevens guilty of seven counts of filing false disclosures. But the government's case collapsed following revelations that prosecutors had failed to turn over favorable evidence to Stevens, including a statement by Allen five months before the trial that he couldn't recall a meeting he later testified about.

Kott and Kohring were released from prison last month while Sedwick considers the significance of favorable evidence they too did not receive before trial.

At the time of Allen's and Smith's guilty pleas, prosecutors asked that their sentences be delayed while the investigation of Alaska politicians continued. By cooperating, they could earn substantial reductions in their prison sentences -- two of the counts carry five-year terms, while the bribery charge is punishable by 10 years.

Sedwick agreed, and directed prosecutors to file a status report five months later. Since the pleas, prosecutors have filed six status reports, all under seal, asking for continuances. Their latest, filed June 30, asked Sedwick to agree to a seventh status report, on Sept. 30.

FBI - Stevens-2510

No way, Sedwick shot back.

"The court finds that it is no longer in the interest of justice to continue a seemingly endless series of status reports which push the imposition of punishment further and further into the future," Sedwick wrote. "Allen's sentencing date has been extended to the point that more than two years have now passed since he pled guilty, and some of the conduct which underlies his pleas of guilty took place as much as seven years ago."

While federal prosecutors have charged 12 former lawmakers, lobbyists and businessmen since the first indictment was handed up Dec. 6, 2006, only one person has been charged since Stevens' trial -- former Rep. Bev Masek, who agreed to plead guilty March 12 to a single count of conspiracy to commit bribery.

The investigation was disrupted by the fallout from the Stevens case and accusations by an FBI agent that investigators got too cosy with witnesses, including Allen. With an internal review by the Justice Department and a criminal contempt investigation by a special prosecutor in Washington, an entire new team of agents and prosecutors has taken over.

Where the Alaska investigation was once handled by two relatively junior attorneys in the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section and two lawyers on loan from the U.S. Attorney's office in Anchorage, seven government attorneys have recently entered appearances in the Alaska cases. One is interim U.S. Attorney Karen Loeffler, a career Alaska prosecutor, and another is Kendall Day, a trial attorney in Washington involved in the Abramoff lobbying scandal.

Sedwick recognized that the new team could stumble over his order and he offered them one out: They could file under seal a special request no later than Oct. 12 giving a detailed list of every suspect whom Allen and Smith are witnesses against, where the prosecutions of those suspects would take place, the date a grand jury is expected to bring charges, and whether Allen or Smith would testify at trial.

But Sedwick said he was strongly leaning toward imposing sentences on Oct. 28. The government could still come back up to a year later and ask for a reduction in sentence based on Allen's and Smith's cooperation.

"Until now, the court has been of the view that providing for the investigation of other persons warranted delay in the imposition of Allen's sentence," Sedwick wrote. "That view is necessarily (a) ffected by the passage of time. The United States has now had more than two years in which to use Allen's cooperation to present charges to a grand jury involving the remainder of those who are under investigation. What is more, it does not appear to the court that the likely remaining potential targets include anyone whose identity was not known at the time Allen entered his guilty pleas."

The names of a number of potential targets have surfaced in trials and elsewhere, and include Stevens' son Ben, a former Alaska Senate president; U.S. Rep. Don Young, who has spent more than $1 million of campaign funds on legal fees over the last three years; and former state Sen. Jerry Ward.

Kott, Kohring released from prison, return to Anchorage

FREED: Former legislators sat next to each other on plane trip from Oregon.

By RICHARD MAUER and LISA DEMER
Anchorage Daily News

(06/11/09 13:06:36)

Former state Reps. Vic Kohring and Pete Kott were back in Anchorage on Thursday night after being released from prison, reuniting with family and friends at Ted Stevens Anchorage International Airport.

Reached in a friend's car as they headed north to his family's home in Wasilla, Kohring joked:

"This is Vic 'Jailbird' Kohring."

Kohring said he and Kott sat next to each other on the plane trip from Oregon.

"When we touched down at the airport there, we looked at each other and we clasped our hands together in joy that we were finally home after this awful ordeal," Kohring said.

Kohring, sporting hair long enough for a ponytail he grew to protest his targeting by federal corruption fighters, and Kott were released under extraordinary orders issued Wednesday and Thursday by courts in San Francisco and Anchorage. He said he might cut his hair soon.

Kohring left prison in Taft, Calif., earlier Thursday with a Greyhound bus ticket to Oregon in his hand, his lawyer said. He had been in prison about a year.

After Kohring climbed down from the bus at Sheridan, in Oregon, officials gave him a ride to Portland International Airport and handed him a plane ticket to Anchorage, according to his Seattle attorney, John Henry Browne.

"I'm a free man and it's just the greatest feeling in the world after being down as they say, in prison terms, for a full year," Kohring said.

Kott was in prison at the federal correctional institution in Sheridan. He's been confined nearly a year and a half.

Reached Thursday before her father landed, Kott's daughter Pamela Kott said: "Excitement isn't the right word. No one can take away my happiness right now." Efforts to reach Kott directly weren't successful.

Pamela Kott was pregnant during her father's trial in 2007 on corruption charges. Now her little girl, Trinity, is nearly 17 months old. Pamela Kott said she and Trinity visited her father at Sheridan prison every few months last year and were there again last weekend. They planned a welcome-home celebration in Alaska with family and close friends.

FBI - Stevens-2513

Kohring said the worst part was being away from family.

"That separation was a killer," Kohring said. He said he heard family and friends were tying yellow ribbons around spruce trees in Wasilla.

He said he got through the ordeal with his faith in God, and the support of his family and his attorney.

Kohring, famous for his big appetite, said he lost 47 pounds in prison. He said he was famished when he arrived in Alaska.

194A-AN-13620-n; 1000

"The first thing I did when I got out of the airport was make a beeline for Kentucky Fried Chicken," he said.

Now he's looked forward to dipnetting for salmon on the Copper River, something he's done since he was a kid.

"I thought about that every single day of my incarceration," Kohring said. "That's where I'm headed, just to get away for a while."

On Wednesday, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco ordered both men released from prison when the Justice Department acknowledged it had failed to turn over favorable evidence before their 2007 trials on bribery, extortion and conspiracy. The Appeals Court left it to U.S. District Judge John Sedwick in Anchorage to actually set the men free pending resolution of the evidence issues.

Shortly after getting the 9th Circuit order on Wednesday, Sedwick directed U.S. marshals to get the two men to Anchorage "as soon as reasonably possible."

But Sedwick turned up the heat with new orders telling the U.S. Bureau of Prisons to release the men immediately.

Sedwick also ordered Kohring and Kott to contact the U.S. Probation and Pre-trial Services Office in Anchorage as soon as they arrived in town. That office monitors federal defendants on bail, probation and home detention.

Sedwick also set back-to-back hearings for Kott and Kohring for June 17 "so the court may set terms and conditions" for their continued release.

He has not yet set a time to hear the substantive case involving the withheld evidence. The 9th Circuit directed Sedwick to determine whether the material was serious enough to prejudice their trials. If so, he could order new trials or dismiss charges entirely.

Browne, Kohring's attorney, said the material he's seen so far shows Kohring did not get a fair trial, and he hasn't gotten everything yet.

"There are many, many smoking guns," Browne said by cell phone from Yakima, Wash., where he had been in court. "There's hundreds of pages."

Browne said he was restricted from disclosing any details about the material, but said he looked forward to having the matter heard in open court -- along with the possibility of putting prosecutors on the stand to testify about why they didn't turn it over in the first place.

The Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility is conducting just such an inquiry, but it has not disclosed anything publicly. Separately, a special prosecutor in Washington, D.C., is looking at a similar issue involving the same prosecutors as a result of the collapse of the case against former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens. The special prosecutor was appointed by the trial judge in Stevens' case after the justice department admitted it violated law and the judge's orders in failing to turn over favorable evidence.

Young announces he'll seek 20th term in Congress

By DAN JOLING
Associated Press
(06/29/09 11:39:57)

FBI - Stevens-2515

Rep. Don Young, Alaska's sole representative in the U.S. House, announced today he will seek re-election in 2010.

Young, 76, filed with the state Division of Elections and said he wanted to make it clear to potential challengers that he is in the race.

"We decided it was best to get it out on the table," he said.

The Republican was re-elected last year as he faced federal investigations of his connections to an Alaska businessman convicted of bribing state lawmakers and of an earmark in a spending bill that benefited a campaign supporter.

He easily defeated former House Minority Leader Ethan Berkowitz, an Anchorage Democrat, in the 2008 race. He faced a stiffer challenge in the Republican primary, beating Lt. Gov. Sean Parnell by 304 votes.

Young has been Alaska's congressman for 36 years.

He was the Republican candidate in the general election 1972 against popular incumbent U.S. Rep. Nick Begich. Three weeks before the election, Begich's plane disappeared on a flight from Anchorage to Juneau. Alaskans re-elected the Democrat anyway.

Begich was declared dead in December 1972 and Young won a close special election in March 1973.

Young is a conservative who defends gun rights, stands up for the military and brags about the earmarks he's been able to send back to Alaska to help build infrastructure.

He also has spent more than $1 million on legal fees, but has refused to answer questions about the investigations, on the advice of lawyers.

Both the House and Senate have requested an investigation into an earmark that made its way into the highway spending bill Young oversaw as chairman of the House Transportation Committee. The bill included $10 million to widen a Florida highway. The final version, until revised, redirected that money to an interchange that benefited a developer who did some fundraising for Young.

Young also is being investigated for his connections to Veco Corp., a former Anchorage oil services company headed by Bill Allen, who has pleaded guilty to bribing Alaska state lawmakers.

Allen has been the key witness in several federal corruption cases against Alaska lawmakers.

However, the conviction against U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens was vacated this year because of prosecutorial misconduct. The same federal prosecution team won convictions against two Alaska state representatives, Pete Kott and Vic Kohring.

But both men were freed from prison this month when prosecutors agreed the government failed to provide evidence favorable to the defendants before their 2007 trials.

The federal prosecutors now are under investigation themselves. That could threaten to derail the investigations into Young since the same team of prosecutors were handling the probes.

Weyhrauch case to be heard in front of Supreme Court

From Erika Bolstad in Washington D.C. --

The U.S. Supreme Court has agreed to review part of former Alaska Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch's pending criminal case.

The court will look at one specific area: whether prosecutors must prove Weyhrauch violated a state disclosure law to convict him on federal mail-fraud statutes.

Weyhrauch, awaiting trial on federal corruption charges, has asked the Supreme Court to overturn an appeals court decision that directly applied the federal mail-fraud statute to his case. At issue is one count in Weyhrauch's 2007 indictment. It charged him with violating the federal mail fraud statute by depriving Alaskans of his honest services when he served as a legislator in 2006.

According to the charges, Weyhrauch, a Juneau Republican, solicited legal work from the oil-field service company Veco Corp. at a time when Veco was pushing hard to win support for lower oil taxes in the Legislature.

Prosecutors said Weyhrauch never disclosed his conflict of interest. Weyhrauch said he didn't have to because state law didn't specifically require such disclosure.
A trial court in Anchorage agreed with Weyhrauch, but prosecutors appealed just before the start of his trial.
The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals sided with prosecutors, saying legislators had a duty to disclose such conflicts. The court reasoned that even if a state has weak ethics laws, it was no reason for its citizens to be deprived of the honest services of their public officials.

Weyhrauch acknowledged that two other circuit courts had made similar rulings, but said that another two had a different standard: They required a state law violation before the mail fraud statute could be used in a criminal case.

Young continues to pay legal bills from campaign funds

REPORTS: Payments made to law firms in the quarter were more than $37,000.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(07/15/09 13:38:25)

WASHINGTON -- Rep. Don Young, R-Alaska, continues to have sizeable legal bills, and he continues to pay them out of his campaign finance account, according to disclosure forms filed this week with the Federal Election Commission.

The reports show that Young's campaign spent at least $37,267 on lawyers over the past three months. The payments went to several law firms, but the disclosures don't say whether all three have been handling a federal probe of his fundraising and other matters, including an earmark that benefited a campaign contributor in Florida. The expenses include $5,000 to Akin, Gump, Strauss and Hauer of Washington D.C., which is representing Young in criminal investigations; $10,000 to the Seattle firm Siderrius, Lonergan and Martin; and $22,267.17 to Tobin, O'Connor, Ewing and Richard, also of Washington D.C.

Young's campaign also owes Tobin O'Connor $46,042, the FEC reports show.

Since early 2007, Young has spent $1.15 million from his campaign fund on legal bills connected to federal investigations. He also has spent an additional $73,415 on lawyers out of a separate legal expense fund he has created. Last year, about $77,000 was donated to that fund, according to the "gifts" section of his annual financial disclosure to the House.

Young raised $116,749 for his campaign in the last quarter, bringing his total fundraising for the 2010 election cycle to $232,108.

Young, who recently announced he was seeking his 20th term in office in 2010, has far less in his re-election account than previous election years, when he went into the campaign season with over $1 million. He has just $129,263 cash on hand this election cycle.

So far, no challengers have emerged to run against Young in 2010. Democrat Ethan Berkowitz, who ran against Young last year, has said he won't seek a rematch and is considering a run for governor instead. Young defeated Berkowitz by over 16,000 votes. Young had a more difficult contest in the Republican primary, beating Lt. Gov. Sean Parnell by just 304 votes.

Allen delays try judge's patience

SENTENCING: He wants the corruption figure to be punished. FBI - Stevens-2520

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(07/07/09 21:40:57)

Declaring that enough is enough, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick said Tuesday it is high time for former Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen to come to terms with his crimes and face sentencing for corrupting Alaska's political system.

Sedwick rejected suggestions made in secret filings last week by federal prosecutors that Allen and former Veco Vice President Rick Smith should continue to enjoy freedom indefinitely. In reporting that the government had asserted the two men were still needed for ongoing corruption investigations, Sedwick expressed displeasure at how long the matter was dragging out.

"The community has substantial interest in seeing the imposition of punishment for these crimes without undue delay," Sedwick wrote in a pair of matching orders filed Tuesday.

Unless prosecutors can convince him to the contrary with strong and detailed arguments, Sedwick said, he will sentence the men on Oct. 28 -- at 8:30 a.m. for Allen and 10 a.m. for Smith.

Sedwick also put prosecutors on notice that he was considering imposing the maximum fine on Allen regardless of prison-time reductions for his cooperation or any credit provided by federal sentencing guidelines. If Sedwick follows through, Allen would have to write a check for $750,000, a substantial chunk of his $6.5 million share of the 2007 sale of Veco to the international engineering and construction firm CH2M Hill.

On May 7, 2007, Allen and Smith each pleaded guilty to three felonies: conspiracy to commit extortion, bribery and fraud; bribery; and conspiracy to impede the Internal Revenue Service. Within months, each gave damning testimony in the corruption trials of former Reps. Pete Kott and Vic Kohring. Allen was also a central witness against former Sen. Ted Stevens, then became a central figure in the demise of Stevens' case.

In October, a jury found Stevens guilty of seven counts of filing false disclosures. But the government's case collapsed following revelations that prosecutors had failed to turn over favorable evidence to Stevens, including a statement by Allen five months before the trial that he couldn't recall a meeting he later testified about.

Kott and Kohring were released from prison last month while Sedwick considers the significance of favorable evidence they too did not receive before trial.

At the time of Allen's and Smith's guilty pleas, prosecutors asked that their sentences be delayed while the investigation of Alaska politicians continued. By cooperating, they could earn substantial reductions in their prison sentences -- two of the counts carry five-year terms, while the bribery charge is punishable by 10 years.

Sedwick agreed, and directed prosecutors to file a status report five months later. Since the pleas, prosecutors have filed six status reports, all under seal, asking for continuances. Their latest, filed June 30, asked Sedwick to agree to a seventh status report, on Sept. 30.

No way, Sedwick shot back.

"The court finds that it is no longer in the interest of justice to continue a seemingly endless series of status reports which push the imposition of punishment further and further into the future," Sedwick wrote. "Allen's sentencing date has been extended to the point that more than two years have now passed since he pled guilty, and some of the conduct which underlies his pleas of guilty took place as much as seven years ago."

While federal prosecutors have charged 12 former lawmakers, lobbyists and businessmen since the first indictment was handed up Dec. 6, 2006, only one person has been charged since Stevens' trial -- former Rep. Bev Masek, who agreed to plead guilty March 12 to a single count of conspiracy to commit bribery.

The investigation was disrupted by the fallout from the Stevens case and accusations by an FBI agent that investigators got too cosy with witnesses, including Allen. With an internal review by the Justice Department and a criminal contempt investigation by a special prosecutor in Washington, an entire new team of agents and prosecutors has taken over.

Where the Alaska investigation was once handled by two relatively junior attorneys in the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section and two lawyers on loan from the U.S. Attorney's office in Anchorage, seven government attorneys have recently entered appearances in the Alaska cases. One is interim U.S. Attorney Karen Loeffler, a career Alaska prosecutor, and another is Kendall Day, a trial attorney in Washington involved in the Abramoff lobbying scandal.

Sedwick recognized that the new team could stumble over his order and he offered them one out: They could file under seal a special request no later than Oct. 12 giving a detailed list of every suspect whom Allen and Smith are witnesses against, where the prosecutions of those suspects would take place, the date a grand jury is expected to bring charges, and whether Allen or Smith would testify at trial.

But Sedwick said he was strongly leaning toward imposing sentences on Oct. 28. The government could still come back up to a year later and ask for a reduction in sentence based on Allen's and Smith's cooperation.

"Until now, the court has been of the view that providing for the investigation of other persons warranted delay in the imposition of Allen's sentence," Sedwick wrote. "That view is necessarily (a) ffected by the passage of time. The United States has now had more than two years in which to use Allen's cooperation to present charges to a grand jury involving the remainder of those who are under investigation. What is more, it does not appear to the court that the likely remaining potential targets include anyone whose identity was not known at the time Allen entered his guilty pleas."

The names of a number of potential targets have surfaced in trials and elsewhere, and include Stevens' son Ben, a former Alaska Senate president; U.S. Rep. Don Young, who has spent more than $1 million of campaign funds on legal fees over the last three years; and former state Sen. Jerry Ward.

Special prosecutor in Stevens case can force testimony

PROBE: Judge also OKs subpoenaing FBI agent, Allen and attorney.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(07/28/09 20:27:12)

FBI - Stevens-2522

A special prosecutor in Washington, D.C., was granted authority Tuesday to compel testimony from the Justice Department team that took Sen. Ted Stevens to trial. He was also authorized to subpoena the former lead FBI agent in the Alaska corruption investigation and key witness Bill Allen and his attorney.

The subpoena authority was approved by U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan, who presided over Stevens' trial last year. When the Stevens case fell apart over charges of prosecutorial misconduct, Sullivan appointed the special prosecutor, Henry Schuelke III, to investigate the prosecutors for criminal contempt.

The matter is also being investigated by the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility, which is cooperating with Schuelke. The Justice Department investigation is expected to run at least into the fall.

The filings in Washington Tuesday -- Schuelke's two-page request and its quick approval by Sullivan -- show his investigation continues to move ahead even as little has shown above the surface.

Schuelke had been directed by Sullivan to only investigate the six prosecutors. With those orders unchanged, it's most likely Schuelke is seeking the testimony of the agent, Allen and Allen's attorney as witnesses.

During the trial, Sullivan accused Allen's attorney, former U.S. Attorney Bob Bundy, of sending signals from the spectators' benches to Allen on the witness stand. Sullivan asked the U.S. Attorney's office in Washington to look into the matter, not Schuelke. Bundy has denied sending any kind of message to Allen during the trial.

The agent, Mary Beth Kepner, was accused of getting too close to sources, including Allen, in a complaint made by a fellow agent after the Stevens trial. While she hasn't made any public statements, other agents have come to her defense.

Sullivan appointed Schuelke April 7 during the same hearing in which he dismissed all charges against Stevens. Attorney General Eric Holder had asked the charges be dropped and acknowledged the truth of a long-running complaint of the judge and of Stevens' defense attorneys: that the prosecution team failed in its constitutional obligation to turn over favorable evidence in its possession.

Among the information cited by Holder was a meeting between Allen, four of the prosecutors and Kepner in which Allen couldn't recall a meeting with one of Stevens' friends that he later testified about. Allen's failed recollection should have been relayed to the defense, Holder acknowledged.

194A-AN-13620-M-1005

In his request for the subpoenas, Schuelke said they were a natural extension of his appointment by Sullivan. It's unclear whether the six prosecutors will agree to depositions, since their own Fifth Amendment rights protect them against self-incrimination. Most, if not all, have given statements to Justice Department investigators.

The six are William Welch, chief of the public integrity section; Brenda Morris, chief trial attorney in the Stevens case; and Nicholas Marsh, Edward Sullivan, Joseph Bottini and James Goeke.

A jury found Stevens guilty in October of lying on financial disclosure forms covering six years in office. Sullivan later dismissed the charges.

Allen, former chief executive of the oil-field services company Veco, was the lead witness against Stevens. He testified to spending tens of thousands of dollars renovating and furnishing Stevens' Girdwood home -- gifts that Stevens never reported.

Asked under oath why he never sent Stevens a bill for the work despite Stevens' e-mailed request for one, Allen testified that one of Stevens' closest friends said the e-mail was just Stevens "covering his ass." That was the conversation that Allen couldn't initially recall in the meeting with Kepner and the prosecutors.

Ted Stevens is the featured guest at tonight's annual fundraiser for Don Young.

The event used to be known as the pig roast back when it was hosted by then-Veco chief Bill Allen, the star witness in the bungled federal prosecution of Stevens. Now it's called "Taste of Alaska" and is being held at the Anchorage home of former governor and fundraiser extraordinaire Bill Sheffield.

You can check out the details of the event at Don Young's campaign website.

Young will also be giving a noon speech today at the Anchorage Sheraton, sponsored by the World Trade Center Alaska.

Alaska corruption figure wins long delay in sentencing

TRIAL: Ex-Murkowski chief of staff to testify in Weyhrauch case.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(08/06/09 13:10:08)

Jim Clark, former Gov. Frank Murkowski's chief of staff, now has a date for his sentencing on corruption charges, but it's not until Oct. 15, 2010.

Expressing frustration over the pace of the Alaska corruption investigation but acknowledging there were legitimate reasons for delays, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick on Thursday said Clark will face prison only after the expected trial of former Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, R-Juneau.

Clark, who pleaded guilty in March 2008 to conspiring to violate Alaska's campaign finance laws, is expected to testify for the government in Weyhrauch's case.

Clark was one of the core players in the Murkowski administration's efforts to change oil taxes and promote construction of a gas line from the North Slope. He will likely testify about the politics and legislative maneuvers that surrounded those matters in 2006.

Sedwick ordered Thursday's hearing after federal prosecutors filed a motion to delay Clark's sentencing for the fourth time. Most of the hearing was held in secret at the request of trial attorney Kendall Day of the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section to allow him to discuss pending cases that might require Clark's testimony.

Sedwick opened the doors to his courtroom after about 20 minutes and acknowledged the public's concern "about the passage of time" in the investigation, which became public with a series of raids on legislative offices on Aug. 31, 2006. Twelve people have since been charged, though the most prominent, former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, had his indictment dismissed for prosecutorial misconduct after a jury found him guilty of lying on his Senate disclosures.

Clark, a Juneau resident, didn't attend the Thursday morning hearing in Anchorage, though his attorney, Patrick Gilmore, was there.

In his guilty plea, Clark admitted taking an unreported, $68,550 contribution from the oil-field service company Veco to help Murkowski's failed re-election bid in 2006. Clark has offered to help prosecutors and has apologized to the citizens of Alaska for his misdeeds, which he said were done without Murkowski's knowledge.

FBI - Stevens-2525

Prosecutors wanted to delay Clark's sentencing until he was no longer needed in any future case. That would allow them leverage to ensure he stuck to his bargain and would also allow Clark to get full credit for his assistance when Sedwick decides on his punishment.

But Sedwick has been growing impatient with the pace of the cases. He recently rejected a similar prosecution bid to grant blanket delays in the sentencings of two former Veco officials who also pleaded guilty, chief executive Bill Allen and vice president Rick Smith. They are currently scheduled for sentencing Oct. 28, though Sedwick said he might grant an additional delay if prosecutors could present him with a firm justification.

In the case of Clark, Sedwick acknowledged that prosecutors faced extenuating circumstances. Pre-trial appeals by prosecutors and Weyhrauch over the scope of one of his charges have landed the case in the U.S. Supreme Court, which won't rule on the matter until its next session. Sedwick has scheduled Weyhrauch's trial for September 2010, anticipating a Supreme Court decision by then.

Sedwick also recognized that a new team of federal prosecutors and agents have taken over the case "who don't have the benefit of what was learned by their predecessors."

The prior team was taken off the case after they became the focus of an internal Justice Department investigation and a criminal contempt investigation by a special prosecutor hired by the judge in the Stevens case. Those investigations are not expected to be resolved until the fall.

The first team -- especially lead FBI agent Mary Beth Kepner -- saw the events of the 2006 legislative debate on oil taxes unfold before their eyes with a peeper scope secretly installed at corruption central: Suite 604 at the Baranof Hotel in Juneau, rented by Veco. Allen and Smith were videotaped handing out cash and favors to legislators in return for support in holding down oil taxes.

With new attorney, Anderson will try to get out of prison

LIKE KOTT, KOHRING: His sentence has nearly 3 years to run.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(07/31/09 21:46:14)

Former state Rep. Tom Anderson, the only Alaska corruption defendant currently in prison, has a new attorney and is about to seek release from federal custody nearly three years before his sentence is complete.

Anchorage lawyer Fred Dewey filed notice last week in U.S. District Court that he was now representing Anderson. In a brief interview Friday, Dewey said he planned to follow the lead of two other former legislators who served time in prison, Pete Kott and Vic Kohring, in trying to get Anderson out.

"It's similar to Kott and Kohring but unique to his case," Dewey said. He declined to provide details, saying Anderson's positions will be made clear in motions next week.

After he was found guilty in 2007, Anderson admitted he had broken the law and deserved punishment, so it's unclear what options he might have now. Kott and Kohring appealed their convictions to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, while Anderson did not.

Kott and Kohring, convicted of bribery and conspiracy, were freed in June when the government admitted it had failed to turn over favorable evidence before and during their trials. A similar issue resulted in dismissal of charges against Sen. Ted Stevens after a jury found him guilty of lying on his Senate disclosures.

Anderson's case involved a different set of circumstances and witnesses than most of the others caught up in the FBI's corruption investigation. He was convicted of scheming with the lobbyist of a private prison company to take secret payments in return for his pushing the company's interests in Alaska.

Bill Allen, the former Veco Corp. chief executive with the wide-open wallet, played no role in Anderson's case. Allen was the chief witness against Stevens, Kott and Kohring, and some of the evidence improperly withheld from defense attorneys involved contradictory statements Allen had made to the FBI and prosecutors.

Allen pleaded guilty to conspiracy in May 2007 but has not yet been sentenced.

Meanwhile, other cases continue to plod on. U.S. District Judge John Sedwick must eventually decide whether the withheld evidence in the Kott and Kohring cases is significant enough to warrant new trials, or even dismissal of all charges.

Prosecutors told Sedwick during a hearing in June that they expected to complete a review of all their files by the end of July to determine the scope of withheld evidence. But on the eve of that deadline, prosecutors asked for a break.

"The government has worked diligently and industriously and has completed the bulk of its review, but respectfully requests a two-week extension to file its disclosure certification, from July 31, 2009, to August 14, 2009, purely out of an abundance of caution and in order to guarantee the thoroughness of its review," Peter Koski, a trial attorney in the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, wrote Sedwick.

FBI - Stevens-2527

On Friday, Sedwick agreed to the delay.

There have also been recent developments in the case of Jim Clark, former Gov. Frank Murkowski's chief of staff, who is awaiting sentencing on his March 4, 2008, guilty plea to conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud. He an Allen joined together to illegally spend $68,550 of Veco's money on Murkowski's failed re-election bid in 2006. Clark has said Murkowski was not part of the effort to foil Alaska's campaign spending laws.

Sedwick, also the judge in Clark's case, had agreed to hold off on sentencing Clark because he was cooperating with the FBI. But Sedwick has been growing impatient with the pace of the investigation.

In an order signed Wednesday, Sedwick ordered government prosecutors to a closed hearing on Aug. 6, where they could explain to him why they want Clark to remain free.

"The court must determine how best to accommodate the tension between defendant Clark's assistance in on-going investigations and possible upcoming trials with the need to bring the case against Mr. Clark to a conclusion," Sedwick wrote. It's possible that Clark could continue to cooperate from prison, Sedwick said.

Reached in Juneau, Clark declined to comment.

Clark has been assisting the FBI and prosecutors in explaining the complex events surrounding the 2006 debate in the Legislature over oil taxes and a possible gas pipeline. Kott and Kohring were convicted in part for their actions during that session, and pending charges against another former legislator, Bruce Weyhrauch, concern the same subject. Former Senate President Ben Stevens, Ted Stevens' son, has also been under investigation for his actions during 2006 session but has not been charged.

The Justice Department has replaced the FBI agents and prosecutors who led the investigation in its first four years, requiring a new team to become familiar with the issues and personalities.

Weyhrauch also was the subject of a Sedwick order issued from chambers Thursday. With the U.S. Supreme Court agreeing to hear arguments concerning the scope of one of the four counts of his indictment, Sedwick set a trial date of Sept. 13, 2010 -- enough time, the judge suggested, for the Supreme Court to resolve the issue.

Lu Young, wife of Rep. Don Young, dies at 67

By ELIZABETH BLUEMINK
ebluemink@adn.com
(08/02/09 13:21:17)

Lu Young, Rep. Don Young's wife of more than four decades, died overnight Saturday, according to his press secretary.

Friends and colleagues said the pair had an extremely close relationship -- both personal and professional -- that began deep in Interior Alaska on the Yukon River where they still owned a home.

The 67-year-old Gwich'in Athabascan from Fort Yukon was a daily fixture at the Alaska Republican's Washington, D.C., office, where she worked with him and greeted guests.

She died -- apparently of natural causes -- after falling asleep at the couple's Great Falls, Va., home, but the specific cause of death remains unknown, according to the congressman's press secretary, Meredith Kenny.

The couple was married more than 46 years. When they met, Lu was a bookkeeper in Fort Yukon, according to Young's congressional biography.

Her death was a big shock, said Curtis Thayer, a former aide to Don Young.

"She was such a part of (Don)'s life, always at his side," Thayer said.

"Everyone should strive each and every day to love each other as much (as) Don and Lu loved one another," said Art Nelson, their son-in-law.

a tight bond

The congressman in the mid-1990s told a crowd assembled at an Alaska Federation of Natives conference that Lu was his buddy, his wife, his mistress and his lover.

"They had the classic love affair," said former Anchorage Mayor George Wuerch.

"No question, the two of them were devoted to each other for many, many years," said Wuerch, who knew the couple for decades.

FBI - Stevens-2529

"They were the closest couple I have ever seen," said Steve Hanson, a Young aide for 21 years. "Don on the campaign trail was always saying, 'Look, you get a two-for-one deal.' "

Those weren't empty words because Lu worked hard on Capitol Hill, Hanson said. "She would be going in and out of other congressional offices, saying 'Don needs this for Alaska,'" he said.

"She was a tough bird, too," said Hanson, explaining that Lu wasn't shy about letting other people know if they were failing her husband in some way.

condolences

Fort Yukon village chief Mike Peter said he was sorry to hear about her death, and the community will be grieving for the congressman's loss.

He said the couple was always friendly when they were in town -- usually during moose hunting season.

"I've known both of them since I was a kid," he said. "Everyone is pretty close here."

Gov. Sean Parnell ordered flags to be lowered to half staff for Lu on Tuesday.

"Lu and Rep. Young have been a team for decades," Parnell said in a news release. "Sandy and I have admired their bond of friendship in marriage and the years of volunteer service Lu put into his congressional office."

"She was a very gracious and giving individual," said Matthew Nicolai, chief executive of Calista Corp., a regional Native corporation with Yup'ik shareholders based in Anchorage.

He recalled that she was heavily involved in her husband's political career from its beginnings in the 1970s. "She was an ambassador on Native issues. Whenever Don needed help, she reached out and got information," Nicolai said.

health concerns

In the summer of 2003, Don Young refuted rumors that he was leaving Congress because of Lu's health. He said she had experienced a "slight stroke" that winter.

"We're here as long as possible. I just want to let you know, the Youngs do not retire," he said during a press conference announcing his run for re-election. He has served in Congress since 1973.

Wuerch said there was never any question that Young would have given up his position to take care of Lu if she became ill.

In 2005, Young dubbed a $284 billion transportation bill that he steered -- the Safe Accountable Efficient Transportation Act: A Legacy for Users -- SAFETEA-LU. The bill was most famous for its inclusion of funds for Ketchikan's so-called "bridge to nowhere," linking the mainland to the city's airport on a nearby island.

She also has an Alaska road named after her: Lu Young Lane, off Point MacKenzie Road.

Thayer said the couple had been scheduled to return to Alaska in a few days.

In addition to the congressman, Lu Young's survivors include two daughters and 14 grandchildren. Information on funeral arrangements was not available Sunday night.

Cowdery given travel permission

Former State Sen. John Cowdery will get his passport back and be allowed to travel to Minnesota to get medical treatment at the Mayo Clinic, according to a judge's order filed Wednesday. U.S. District Judge Ralph Beistline temporarily relieved Cowdery of his home confinement to leave this week for eight days in Minnesota. Cowdery didn't ask for permission to leave the country.

Cowdery, 79, pleaded guilty in December to conspiring with oil-field company chief Bill Allen to bribe another legislator and is serving three years probation, including six months in home confinement. Cowdery sought mercy because of ill health and Beistline agreed not to send him to prison.

Judge to decide what happens next with Kott and Kohring

STATUS REPORTS: Justice department won't go for dismissal.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(08/28/09 22:03:25)

The Justice Department has apparently decided to not dismiss charges against convicted legislators Pete Kott and Vic Kohring as it did for U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens earlier this year, and may fight efforts by the men to get new trials.

In status reports filed Friday in Anchorage, the prosecution and defense said they couldn't agree on how the cases against Kott and Kohring should proceed, leaving it for U.S. District Judge John Sedwick to decide later this year or in 2010.

Attorneys for Kott and Kohring had sought dismissal of all charges based on the failure of prosecutors to turn over evidence favorable to the men. The status reports show the Justice Department is not acquiescing to that dismissal demand, as it did for Stevens earlier this year.

The reports show that even on the question of whether the government's conduct prejudiced the jury against Kott and Kohring, prosecutors and defense attorneys are not in agreement.

The corruption cases ran into a wall when the Justice Department admitted it had broken court rules on the favorable evidence question in the trials of Stevens, Kott and Kohring.

Stevens was found guilty by a jury of failing to disclose tens of thousands of dollars of gifts from an oil-field contractor and others. But the Justice Department dismissed his charges in April when the trial judge in Washington, D.C., accused prosecutors of misconduct.

Such a ruling has not been made in the cases of Kott and Kohring, convicted in Anchorage in 2007 of taking bribes from the same oil-field contractor, former Veco chief executive Bill Allen, who by then was helping the FBI. In June, with their cases before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, the Justice Department asked Sedwick to release Kott and Kohring from prison pending a determination of whether the government's failure to fully disclose information about Allen and others had tainted the trials.

Sedwick directed the sides to come up with a plan on how to proceed by the end of August.

The status reports, signed by all sides, suggest to Sedwick that he order Kott and Kohring to file motions arguing their cases by Sept. 30. Prosecutors would have a month to respond, with final defense replies by Nov. 13. The sides would then make oral arguments before Sedwick in November or December.

FBI - Stevens-2532

Based on instructions from the 9th Circuit, Sedwick would first have to rule on whether the government breached its obligations to turn over evidence, and, if so, whether the defendants were prejudiced. If the answer is no to either question, he could order the men back to prison. If yes, Sedwick would have to determine a remedy -- most likely new trials or dismissal of charges.

Law used to indict Blagojevich challenged

HONEST SERVICES: Former Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch among those taking vague fraud statute to task.

By MIKE ROBINSON
The Associated Press
(09/12/09 23:13:14)

CHICAGO.-- Among the corruption charges faced by former Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich is a statute of just 28 words with enough pop to send big names to prison for corruption, but it's under attack by those who consider it vague and unfair.

Former Illinois Gov. George Ryan, ex-newspaper mogul Conrad Black and one-time Enron CEO Jeffrey Skilling have all been convicted of what's known as honest-services fraud. The law makes it illegal for officials, executives and others to scheme to deprive those they serve and possibly others of "the intangible right to honest services."

"It causes fear. It causes confusion," said Chicago attorney and former federal prosecutor Zachary T. Fardon. "And that's the heart of the problem."

There are two separate cases challenging the law pending before the U.S. Supreme Court. Justice Antonin Scalia recently described the 21-year-old measure as so poorly defined it could be used to prosecute "a mayor for using the prestige of his office to get a table at a restaurant without a reservation."

Congress adopted the statute in 1988 after the Supreme Court held that prosecutors could not merely assume wire fraud and mail fraud statutes -- the workhorse laws in corruption prosecutions -- covered lost honest services. The mail and wire fraud laws require a defendant to obtain money or property from the wrongdoing; merely depriving a victim of honest services wasn't enough to win a guilty verdict.

In the years since, prosecutors have used the honest services law to bolster the more conventional charges of mail and wire fraud. But experts say aggressive federal prosecutors, such as Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the U.S. Attorney in northern Illinois, appear to be using it both more often and as a lead charge in an indictment.

In Blagojevich's case, honest-services fraud holds a prominent place in a 19-count indictment that accuses the impeached governor of depriving Illinois residents of his honest services through a wide-ranging scheme involving kickbacks, campaign money and a host of other misdeeds.

"The statute is very vague, and because it is vague, it is a pet statute of prosecutors," said Chicago attorney and former federal prosecutor Julian Solotorovsky. "They're stretching it to the fullest extent possible."

Among those challenging the law is former Alaska state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, who prosecutors say illegally failed to disclose that he was in job negotiations with oil-field service company Veco Corp. at the same time the state Legislature was also considering an oil tax bill heavily lobbied by the company. The case hasn't gone to trial as the high court considers whether the government can charge him with failing to make a disclosure not required by state law.

FBI - Stevens-2533

Weyhrauch faces three other felony counts that don't rely on the "honest services" provision of the federal fraud statutes, including bribery and the lead charge, conspiracy.

Black and two of his three co-defendants were convicted of depriving the Hollinger International media empire of their faithful services as corporate officers. The offense includes pocketing $5.5 million the government said belonged to the company's shareholders.

The executives initially said the money represented fees from companies that bought community newspapers from Hollinger. But Black and his co-defendants now say the money was really management fees the company owed them and which were "recharacterized" to avoid Canadian income tax.

They say that since they were trying to avoid Canadian taxes and not harm Hollinger, they didn't deprive the shareholders of their honest services and the charges should be thrown out.

The high court has yet to decide whether to take up Skilling's appeal, which argued the honest services law is so vague that it is simply unconstitutional.

"The Supreme Court's decisions to hear two appeals challenging the law in the same term could mean the justices have concerns about prosecutors extending the statute's reach," said Lisa Casey, a Notre Dame University law professor who has written about the law and its recent expanded use against corporate executives.

Just prior to accepting Black's case, the Supreme Court refused to hear the appeal of Chicago Mayor Richard M. Daley's patronage chief, Robert Sorich, who was convicted in 2006 in a City Hall hiring fraud scandal. But it was that case that prompted Scalia to say the time has come to clarify confusion over just what the law means.

"Indeed, it seems to me quite irresponsible to let the current chaos prevail," he said.

Feds recommend prison time for former Rep. Masek

Anchorage Daily News / adn.com
(09/09/09 20:59:32)

Federal prosecutors are recommending that former Rep. Bev Masek serve up to two years in prison on her conviction on corruption charges. In a sentencing memorandum filed Wednesday, trial attorney Marc Levin from the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section said Masek violated her public trust in accepting $4,000 from former Veco chief Bill Allen and spiking an oil tax bill Allen opposed.

"Crimes such as the defendant's have eroded the public's faith in the Alaska State Legislature and their elected leaders," Levin wrote. He urged U.S. District Judge Ralph Beistline to fine her $4,000 and sentence her to 18 to 24 months in prison followed by three years probation.

Federal Public Defender Rich Curtner has not yet submitted a sentence recommendation on behalf of Masek.

Masek was to appear for sentencing next week, but she's asked for a delay until October because of scheduling difficulties for one of her witnesses. Beistline will hear that request at a hearing this morning.

Masek, a Republican who represented parts of the Mat-Su Borough for nearly a decade in the Legislature, pleaded guilty in March to one count of conspiracy to commit bribery.

Masek sentencing for corruption delayed

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com
(09/10/09 12:09:07)

A federal judge granted former state Rep. Bev Masek a one-week delay in her sentencing on corruption charges this morning even as he admonished her for violating the terms of her release at least twice by getting drunk.

In granting the reprieve to Sept. 24, U.S. District Judge Ralph Beistline rejected Masek's plea for a delay of at least another six weeks. And he stiffened her release conditions, ordering her to live with her parents in Anchorage and not touch a drop of alcohol. He directed federal probation officials to test her for booze as often as daily and authorized them to immediately throw her in jail if she tested positive for alcohol.

Her public defender, Rich Curtner, had sought the longer delay so Masek could complete an evaluation "process" for substance abuse treatment as part of her sentencing, but Beistline said she has had more than ample time since her guilty plea for conspiracy to commit bribery in March.

Federal prosecutors are seeking a prison sentence of 18 to 24 months, while Curtner said he will probably ask that she be sent to a residential treatment facility. The judge said he will give her some prison time.

Masek asks for delay in sentencing

WITNESS: Doctor unavailable for hearing; he's for treatment.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(09/06/09 20:44:15)

Former Rep. Bev Masek has asked to have her sentencing on a bribery charge delayed because a witness won't be available for the hearing.

Masek, who pleaded guilty in March to conspiring to accept a bribe from former Veco chief executive Bill Allen, was due to learn her punishment on Sept. 16. Her plea bargain provides a range of 18 to 24 months in prison and a $4,000 to $40,000 fine, though U.S. District Judge Ralph Beistline can go outside that range if he finds cause to.

The maximum penalty is five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

In a motion filed last week, Masek's public defender said a key witness, Dr. Ted Mala, can't make it to the Sept. 16 hearing and asked that sentencing be delayed until the last week of October. If the delay is granted, it would be the third time Masek's sentencing, originally set for May, has been postponed.

Mala, one of three witnesses the defense expects to present at sentencing, is director of tribal relations at the Alaska Native Medical Center in Anchorage and an expert in combining traditional and Western medicine.

Federal Public Defender Rich Curtner said in his motion that Mala has known Masek for years and considers her a good candidate for the Southcentral Foundation's "Circle of Recovery" program.

The program, for Alaska Natives who have low incomes and little or no medical insurance, helps clients obtain mental health and substance abuse counseling, employment services and other support, Curtner said.

In June, Beistline delayed Masek's sentencing at Curtner's request so she could complete psychiatric and substance abuse evaluations.

Masek, a Republican who represented the Matanuska-Susitna area from 1995 to 2004, pleaded guilty in March to participating in a bribery conspiracy by accepting at least $4,000 from Allen.

In return for one of those payments, she killed a bill in 2003 that would have raised oil taxes after Allen told her it was "harmful" to his oil industry clients. Veco's main line of business was construction and specialized services in oil fields.

Former VECO CEO Bill Allen (KTUU-DT)

by Casey Grove and Leyla Santiago
Friday, September 25, 2009

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- Attorneys for former state Rep. Pete Kott filed a motion to dismiss his corruption case Thursday night, and the filing includes allegations of sexual trysts with underage girls set up by the federal government's key witness in a wide-reaching investigation of corruption in Alaska politics.

Kott was released from prison in June after the Justice Department learned that evidence may have been withheld from his defense team during his trial for taking bribes from VECO Corp. CEO Bill Allen.

The release came after the dismissal of the criminal case against former Sen. Ted Stevens based on withheld evidence.

Now, in a 58-page motion to dismiss, Kott's lawyers are now asking that his conviction be thrown out because of prosecutorial misconduct.

Kott's attorney listed nine ways the federal prosecutors covered up evidence, including the credibility of Allen and his No. 2 -- Rick Smith -- and Kott's exchange of political favors for benefits.

Kott's attorney, Sheryl Gordon McCloud, also links Allen to a sex scandal and underage prostitution ring from which five victims are referenced. The four victims mentioned in the filing ranged in age from 14 to 16 years of age.

A victim who was 16 years old at the time told detectives that Allen flew her up from Seattle to have sex.

The same victim gave what McCloud called "specific and detailed information about a physical characteristic of Bill Allen that would be considered extremely embarrassing, and that most men would seek to shield from public knowledge."

Another victim told detectives she exchanged gifts like condos and cars for sex.

The victims were interviewed as an offshoot of a complex probe into a sex and drug ring involving Anchorage businessman Josef Boehm.

The attorney states that federal agents were present during the victims' interviews and tried to cover up the evidence to protect the credibility of its key witness -- Allen.

Because of that case's complexity, federal prosecutors said they asked police to suspend their investigation of Allen. The Anchorage Police Department re-opened its investigation of Allen's alleged sex crimes in February.

McCloud claims the information should have been presented in court because it "showed prior acts of criminality and it showed Bill Allen's desperate attempts to convince his victims to lie to protect him."

During Kott's trial, the prosecutors said it was not relevant.

Kott seeks dismissal of corruption charges

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com
(09/25/09 16:08:30)

Former Alaska House Speaker Pete Kott says his 2007 trial on corruption charges was so tainted with prosecutorial misconduct that charges should be dismissed.

In a 59-page motion field in U.S. District Court yesterday, Kott's lawyer said the government deliberately hid information from Kott's trial team, including stunning details of lead witness Bill Allen's sexual activity with underaged girls and his efforts to get at least one to perjure herself to protect him.

Kott's Seattle lawyer, Sheryl Gordon McCloud, said the material casts sharp doubts on Allen's credibility, including his explanations of videotaped and eavesdropped conversations concerning alleged bribes to Kott.

The new information, provided over the last several months to Kott and former Rep. Vic Kohring, who also was tried and convicted on corruption charges in 2007, also casts doubt on other key parts of the government's case against Kott. Some of the new material corroborates assertions made by Kott on the witness stand that money and favors he got from Allen were not evidence of bribery or extortion but rather loans or other more innocuous transactions.

"Certainly there were recordings," McCloud wrote. "But the witnesses differed as to the meaning of those recordings. The government's witnesses -- testifying pursuant to plea agreements -- testified that those recordings showed bribery and extortion, that is, payments in exchange for favors."

But the new evidence suggests otherwise, she wrote.

The material stems from events following the trial of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens on charges that he failed to report hundreds of thousands of dollars of gifts and benefits from Allen, once the chief executive of the oil-field service company Veco Corp.

A Washington, D.C., jury found Stevens guilty on all counts in October, but the case began to unravel when an FBI agent said the investigation and trial were tainted by misconduct. By April, with investigations into the allegations under way, the Justice Department admitted it failed to give Stevens favorable evidence he was entitled to and asked that all charges be dismissed.

At the same time, it began a review of the convictions of Kott and Kohring, then serving time in federal prisons, and in June said similar problems occurred in their trials. At the government's request, Kott and Kohring were freed on their own recognizance pending resolution of the matter.

Lawyers for the two men were originally supposed to file motions by Monday, with the government response due in October and oral arguments, if necessary, in November. But Kohring's lawyer won a one-month delay because of other trials he is engaged in.

FBI - Stevens-2540

The trial judge in both cases, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick, hasn't said when he'd make a ruling. He could dismiss the charges or order new trials. It's also possible he could rule the new evidence wasn't significant, but given the weight and questions it poses, that possibility appears to be receding.

Information about Allen's sexual activity with a minor arose briefly in a closed hearing in Kott's case. In her motion, McCloud said it caught Kott's trial attorney, Jim Wendt, by surprise. When prosecutors assured the judge the information was irrelevant to Kott's trial, the matter didn't go further.

The matter played out similarly in Kohring trial.

Several months later, in early 2008, the Daily News and the Anchorage Press reported that an Anchorage police detective uncovered evidence in an unrelated 2003 case that Allen had sexual relations with a 14- or 15-year-old girl in the mid-1990s. The detective, Kevin Vandegriff, originally suspended his investigation in 2004 at the request of federal prosecutors, but had reopened it.

The case remains active, and information provided to Kott contained both evidence known at the time of Kott's trial and also new material recently unearthed by Vandegriff. There is no statute of limitations on those crimes.

The 2008 stories focused on Bambi Tyree, who by then was 27. Since then, another woman has come forward and said she had sex with Allen when she was underaged, and that Allen paid for her to fly to Anchorage from the Lower 48 to have sex.

But the new material goes much further, identifying five female victims.

"Its newly released documents contain allegations and evidence that Bill Allen committed a multitude of primarily sex crimes against children, and that he sought to have them swear that he never committed such acts," McCloud wrote in her motion.

One of the underaged victims said she signed an affidavit at Allen's request that falsely said she didn't have sex with him. The affidavit was presented to her by one of Allen's lawyers at the time, according to the motion.

This is a developing story. Check back for updates.

Judge shows leniency in Masek sentence for corruption

CORRUPTION: Former state representative must serve 3 years' probation after prison.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com
(09/24/09 09:24:17)

Former state Rep. Beverly Masek was sentenced to six months in federal prison Thursday on corruption charges, a lenient punishment that sliced a year from the minimum confinement recommended by federal guidelines.

In handing down the sentence, U.S. District Judge Ralph Beistline said Masek betrayed the public trust and the oath of office she took five times in Juneau -- once for each of the two-year terms she served representing the Willow area in the Legislature as a Republican.

Masek admitted to a felony charge of conspiracy to commit bribery by taking two illegal payments in 2003 of $2,000 each from former Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen. The second payment was a gift for spiking an oil-tax bill that Allen, an oil-field contractor, was concerned would hurt his clients.

In dealing her a sentence substantially below the 18- to 24-month recommendation in federal guidelines, Beistline cited the long delay between the commission of the crime and its prosecution by federal authorities, who didn't charge Masek until March. He also said he believed she had a good opportunity to rehabilitate herself, especially if she can control her alcohol dependency.

Masek, a former Iditarod musher, cried throughout the 80-minute hearing, including when she promised to obtain sobriety treatment after her prison sentence.

"I feel I've been operating on a broken sled runner," Masek said, recalling her days as a dog musher. "I feel I've been on that broken sled runner for quite a while. I'd really like to fix it."

Beistline said Masek would have to serve three years' probation after her prison time, during which she would be barred from consuming any alcohol or even entering a bar, nightclub or other place alcohol was served other than a "bona fide restaurant." The judge said federal probation officials could order Masek to enter a residential treatment facility for alcohol addiction for up to six months after prison as long as the facility was culturally sensitive for Alaska Natives.

FBI - Stevens-2542

Beistline said Masek was too broke to also be fined.

Masek's attorney, public defender Rich Curtner, had asked for even lighter treatment than she got -- six months of home confinement, the same punishment Beistline had given former state Sen. John Cowdery. Curtner said Cowdery's crime was worse than Masek's because it was "much more sophisticated, much more far reaching than Ms. Masek's."

Cowdery pleaded guilty for conspiring with Bill Allen to get $25,000 to another state senator's campaign to buy his support for oil legislation. The deal was never consummated, and the other senator cooperated with federal authorities.

Beistline disagreed -- Masek's crime was worse, though both were bad.

"He was guilty of facilitating a meeting or two -- he never took any money," Beistline said. Masek, on the other hand, solicited cash from Bill Allen and his vice president, Rick Smith.

"You sought them out when you were sober," he said. After she got the $4,000, "you sought more." She even raised the possibility of masking Veco payments as consulting fees and discussed a complex scheme where Allen would pay to sponsor her dog kennel as a way to get money to her.

"You engaged in this clearly illegal conduct," Beistline said.

Masek said she has "hurt, embarrassed and humiliated" herself and let her friends down.

"I know I have done things I should not have done. I know I need help. I'm ready to get back on track and get off this cliff that I fell off of," she said.

In a sentencing memo filed on behalf of Masek, Curtner said Masek accepted responsibility for her actions, but also blamed her ex-husband for being controlling and abusive and the environment in Juneau for depressing and confusing her.

Jan Masek, now an entrepreneur living in Panama, where his and Beverly's son Michael also lives, said the main thing he tried to control was the presence of alcohol in the family home. In an e-mail Thursday, he said that he would allow none. He denied being abusive.

"All my life I never put (a) hand on Bev, even when she got drunk," Jan Masek said. "I think this is (a) great insult."

"She start drinking in Juneau, with nice Republican rednecks," he added.

Beistline, from the bench, acknowledged that Masek may have been a "pawn in the hands of several legislators (and) her husband," but it didn't excuse her conduct. He said the idea that a legislator incapable of acting on her own and frequently drunk was "kind of scary, when you think about it."

Beistline said he was hopeful Masek could conquer her alcohol problems and become a useful member of society. But he also expressed skepticism because she hadn't gotten treatment despite her heavy drinking over the last decade and a driving while intoxicated charge. Under court supervision since her guilty plea in March, she's still been drinking to excess, the judge said.

"Up until two weeks ago you were disrupting the neighborhood with your drunken tirades," Beistline said.

FBI - Stevens-2543

Masek asked that she be allowed to serve her prison sentence in Alaska so she could be close to friends. But Beistline said prison wasn't supposed to be "fun," and besides, he added, there's no federal facility in the state. He allowed her to remain free on bond until a minimum-security prison slot was available, and said she could either report on her own, or if she couldn't afford the airfare, be transported to prison by the U.S. Marshals Service.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. Bureau of Prisons in Washington, D.C., said a spot is usually found for a convict within 48 hours of the agency receiving case documentation from the district court and the local pretrial services office.

Masek was the sixth state lawmaker and 12th person overall charged in the wide-ranging FBI investigation of corruption in Alaska politics. The investigation, while still ongoing, has been on hold while the Justice Department and a special prosecutor in Washington investigates the conduct of prosecutors and the FBI as a result of the collapse of its biggest case, the corruption trial of former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

Though a jury found Stevens guilty, the government agreed to dismiss all charges because prosecutors failed to turn over favorable evidence to Stevens' attorneys. Two Alaska lawmakers were released from prison on similar issues in June while a judge decides whether their trials were unfair, and if so, if they should be tried again or have their charges dismissed.

Beverly Masek's sentencing Thursday morning was a chance for her to take responsibility for pocketing $4,000 from an oil services company executive in exchange for her vote. And she told the judge she did. But what I heard in the courtroom was a long list of reasons why it wasn't really her fault.

The five-time elected member of the Alaska House of Representatives took a bribe in 2003 from Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen because she was depressed and going through a divorce, her attorney, Rich Curtner, explained to the judge. She was cash-strapped and desperate and drinking too much. The defense sentencing document -- built on letters from public figures and a psychiatric evaluation -- painted a picture of her that seemed fragile, like a besotted Victorian heroine wandering the halls of the capitol.

Masek was vulnerable and prone to relationships with domineering people, it said, a passive, dependent personality. She was unsophisticated and from a village, childlike, overwhelmed and adrift in Juneau when she had no one to tell her what to do. She was powerless to the pull of the Legislature's culture of corruption. Not to mention she had a habit of drinking too much. Reading all that, one might have expected her to faint right there in the courtroom. But instead she just sniffled, dabbing her eyes with a wadded Kleenex.

Masek was looking at 18 to 24 months under federal sentencing guidelines. But she didn't want to go to jail, her lawyer told the judge. She wanted to go to alcohol treatment.

In my seat in the front row, I was unmoved. Masek navigated the Iditarod Trail four times. Did she really have such a hard time, no matter how stressed or broke or hung-over she might have been, navigating the difference between right and wrong in Juneau? She had taken the oath of office five times, and been in the Legislature nearly 10 years when she deposited Allen's money in her bank account. The defense was reaching for heart-strings, playing a cloying victim tune. But it relied on a musty stereotype about Native women I don't buy. Masek was no naive village girl. She was an adult and an elected official. It seemed reasonable, even if she had an alcohol problem, that she should be expected to act like one.

I thought about the Saturday afternoons I spent down at the jail courthouse, watching less prominent defendants sitting in lines behind Plexiglas, waiting to hear their charges read for the first time. It was likely every one of them had problems with alcohol or dysfunction or divorce or desperation. Many were unsophisticated. But most of them ended up in jail. Why? Because being drunk or sad or dumb didn't make their crimes go away.

It was humiliating for Masek to walk through the Federal Building on Thursday morning followed by cameras. And certainly her life has not been easy. She was the first in her family to graduate from high school. Her attorney argued she had a difficult marriage to a controlling husband. Alcohol has been an ongoing struggle. But holding public office means meeting high standards. And there were others with similar stories who managed in Juneau just fine.

I might have had more sympathy had this been an isolated irresponsible decision. But there were others. There was her problem with using the campaign funds to pay personal bills. And the time she made her aide give her money or risk losing his job. And the Legislative session where she barely showed up. And, most serious, a drunken driving incident in 2005.

She told the judge she was sorry for what she did and that she was ready to change. Like a musher on a broken sled runner, she said, she wanted to get fixed and move on. But I couldn't help thinking that she'd known for months this day was coming. She was out of jail and could have entered any number of alcohol treatment programs. She could have found a 12-step program. But only two weeks before the sentencing, she was drunk despite a court order, causing a ruckus in her neighborhood. Was she really ready to change?

Soon it was Judge Ralph Beistline's turn to deliver the sentence. He said all the right things. She abused the public trust, stumbling significantly over the last 10 years. Her personal problems didn't mean she could commit crimes. Lots of fancy friends speaking on her behalf wasn't going to sway him.

But then he delivered the sentence: six months, a third of the minimum under court guidelines. And mandated alcohol treatment. He called it "compassionate," and it maybe was, but I couldn't help feeling it wasn't enough.

Masek pleads for leniency in sentencing for conspiracy

CORRUPTION: Her attorney calls her "an inspiring figure in alaska."

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(09/22/09 22:06:10)

Former state legislator Bev Masek says she shouldn't get prison time for her guilty corruption plea, blaming her failings on an overbearing husband, the retirement of her mentor in the Legislature, and her inability to fathom her elected office despite a decade in the job.

Masek is due to be sentenced Thursday by U.S. District Judge Ralph Beistline on her conviction of conspiracy to commit bribery. She admitted accepting $4,000 in 2003 from former Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen, an oil-field contractor. According to the charge, she begged for money from Allen and another Veco official, at one point killing a tax bill after Allen complained it would hurt his oil-industry clients, then collecting $2,000 for her effort.

In her bid for leniency, contained in a sentencing memo filed by her public defender last week, Masek argued against the suggestion of prosecutors that she be ordered to prison for 18 to 24 months, the standard sentence for her crime. The conspiracy charge carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison, but prosecutors said Masek shouldn't be considered for worst-offender status under federal sentencing guidelines.

"Beverly Masek has been an inspirational figure in Alaska," asserted Rich Curtner, her attorney. He cited her completion of the Iditarod Trail Sled Dog Race four times, her graduation from high school in Anvik, and her election by Mat-Su voters as a Republican to the Alaska House for five terms.

But Masek was also "vulnerable" to the suggestions of others, Curtner said.

"At the time of this offense, Ms. Masek was going through a divorce, suffering from major depression, economically devastated, and drinking heavily," Curtner wrote in his memorandum to Beistline.

Masek isn't looking for an excuse, Curtner said, and she has taken responsibility for her crime by pleading guilty and agreeing to interviews with the FBI and prosecutors. At the same time, her personal travails would be better dealt with through home confinement and treatment in a facility like the Ernie Turner Center run by the Cook Inlet Tribal Council in Anchorage, rather than a federal prison in the Lower 48.

Still, Masek blamed much of her troubles on her ex-husband Jan, now a businessman in Panama promoting environmentally sensitive development projects.

"Many of those who knew Jan and Beverly Masek as a couple describe Mr. Masek as a controlling and abusive husband," Curtner wrote. Jan Masek encouraged his wife to take up dog mushing and suggested she run for the state Legislature, Curtner said, but when they divorced he cut off her money.

FBI - Stevens-2547

Jan Masek didn't respond to an e-mail request for comment.

In addition to blaming her husband for her heavy drinking and depression, Curtner cited excerpts from a sealed psychiatric report to bolster his efforts to keep Bev Masek out of prison.

"During Ms. Masek's early years in the Legislature, her mentor was Rep. Ramona Barnes. They formed a close relationship and Ms. Masek took considerable guidance from Ms. Barnes," wrote Dr. Aron Wolf. When voters sent Barnes into retirement in 2000, Masek felt adrift, Wolf said.

Sarah Tugman, an Anchorage lawyer who has known Masek since the early 1990s, said in a letter submitted by Curtner that Masek was lost in Juneau.

"In the legislature, I also think that Beverly was largely controlled by other people," Tugman wrote. "I witnessed her reliance on her aides and other legislators as the job was unfamiliar to her and she was neither sophisticated nor did she have the background education or skills to allow her to be very independent with respect to the issues that she was presented with and with which she was somewhat overwhelmed."

Curtner didn't offer an explanation about why Masek continued to run for an elective office she was apparently unqualified for, but said it was in that atmosphere that she became susceptible to pressure from Allen, a close friend of Barnes.

The attorney described Masek's crimes as less severe than those of other defendants in the wide-ranging Alaska corruption scandal -- in particular those of former Sen. John Cowdery, who also pleaded guilty to a conspiracy charge.

Cowdery received six months of home confinement, a term just ended, and three years' probation. Prosecutors didn't object to home confinement because of Cowdery's age -- 79 -- and health so poor he had difficulty getting out of a wheelchair.

Curtner said Masek was sick too -- with depression and "a serious alcohol problem."

Raising the issue of race and gender, Curtner added, "It would be a tragic footnote in the Alaska corruption scandal that amidst the storm of corruption in Alaska's legislature, at this point the one person who is serving time in a federal prison is a Native Alaskan woman who was suffering from depression and alcoholism, who accepted four thousand dollars from Bill Allen."

Curtner wasn't entirely correct, though. While other defendants have finished their terms or are free pending resolution of their cases, one other former legislator, Tom Anderson, is about midway through a five-year prison sentence for conspiracy, bribery and money laundering. Two other former legislators, Pete Kott and Vic Kohring, were released from prison in June as they appeal their convictions but could be ordered back or face new trials.

In another development, Kohring's lawyer is seeking a delay in filing a motion on how Kohring's case should proceed. Kott and Kohring were supposed to file their motions by Sept. 28, but Kohring's attorney, John Henry Browne of Seattle, said he is involved in other cases that are demanding his attention. On Tuesday, he asked for a month's delay. U.S. District Judge John Sedwick hasn't yet ruled on that request.

Masek sentenced to 6 months in prison

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com
(09/24/09 09:24:17)

Former state Rep. Beverly Masek was sentenced to six months in federal prison this morning for her part in the Alaska political corruption scandal.

Masek, a former Iditarod musher who served five terms representing the Willow area of the Matanuska-Susitna Borough, pleaded guilty this year to conspiracy to commit bribery. She accepted $4,000 in 2003 from former Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen, an oil-field contractor.

Judge Ralph Beistline placed Masek on three years' probation after her prison term is complete. He also directed the federal probation office to find a facility where she could undergo residential treatment for alcohol abuse for up to six months after prison.

Under the terms of the probation, Beistline ordered her to not consume alcohol and said she is not allowed to go anyplace where alcohol is served other than "a bona fide restaurant." She's not allowed to own a firearm for the rest of her life.

Addressing the court, Masek said she accepted responsibility for what she did. The judge, however, said her behavior was especially egregious because it involved violating the oath of office that she took five times as a state representative.

According to the charge, she begged for money from Allen and another Veco official, at one point killing a tax bill after Allen complained it would hurt his oil-industry clients, then collected $2,000 for her efforts.

Prosecutors asked that she be sentenced to prison for 18 to 24 months, the standard sentence for the crime.

Masek's public defender lawyer asked the for leniency. In a pre-sentence filing, the attorney, Rich Curtner, described her as "an inspirational figure in Alaska," noting that she had completed the Iditarod four times.

This is a developing story. Check back for updates.

Supreme Court sets date for former legislator's appeal

WEYHRAUCH: Juneau Republican says statute doesn't apply in case.

The U.S. Supreme Court has set Dec. 8 as the date for oral arguments in the appeal of former Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, who is seeking to reinstate a court order that sharply limited the federal government's mail fraud case against him.

Weyhrauch, a Juneau Republican, is the only defendant awaiting trial in the wide-ranging federal corruption investigation in Alaska. He was originally supposed to be tried in 2007 alongside former House speaker Pete Kott, but his case was separated over the mail-fraud issue.

Kott was convicted and had served about two years of a six-year sentence when he was released in June. His prison term is on hold while U.S. District Judge John Sedwick decides whether his trial was tainted by prosecutors who withheld favorable evidence from his attorneys.

Before the cases were separated, Sedwick had ruled against prosecutors on one count of a four-count indictment charging Weyhrauch with conspiracy, extortion, bribery and fraud.

At issue was a job Weyhrauch sought from the oil-field services company Veco Corp. In 2006, while the Alaska Legislature was still in session, Weyhrauch, a lawyer, asked Veco to give him legal services work later in the year. At the same time, Veco was actively lobbying the Legislature in opposition to increased oil taxes.

Prosecutors said that Weyhrauch should have disclosed his job-seeking as a conflict of interest. But Weyhrauch's attorneys argued that because nothing in state law required such a disclosure, the federal fraud statute couldn't be used to charge him with defrauding Alaskans of his "honest services."

Sedwick agreed with Weyhrauch, but the government appealed and won in the 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals. Weyhrauch then appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court. Though the Supreme Court rarely intervenes before a trial, it agreed to take Weyhrauch's case.

Prosecutors again delay Zachares' sentencing

LOBBYING SCANDAL: Former Young aide pleaded guilty to conspiracy in April 2007.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

FBI - Stevens-2551

(10/09/09 21:40:57)

For the eighth time since Mark Zachares' guilty plea to a felony conspiracy charge in April 2007, prosecutors have gotten approval to delay the sentencing of a former top committee aide to U.S. Rep. Don Young.

Zachares, a lawyer and ex-Alaskan who rose to the position of special counsel to Young when the Alaska Republican was chairman of the House Transportation Committee, is continuing to cooperate with federal authorities "in several ongoing investigations," prosecutors said in a motion filed Thursday in federal court in Washington.

"The government anticipates that Mr. Zachares' cooperation will continue for the foreseeable future," prosecutors with the Justice Department's criminal division said. As is normally the case, they provided no details.

Zachares had been scheduled to appear before U.S. District Judge Ellen S. Huvelle for a status conference on Oct. 16. But in an order filed Friday, Huvelle canceled that hearing and ordered another for Jan. 8, indefinitely forestalling Zachares' sentencing.

Under his plea deal, he faces 18 to 24 months in prison, though the judge is not bound by the agreement. The charge carries a maximum sentence of five years.

Zachares' charge arose out of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal that has so far led to charges against 20 people, mainly public officials and lobbyists. Abramoff is now serving a four-year prison sentence for defrauding American Indian tribe clients and corruption of public officials.

Zachares admitted using his position in Young's committee to tip off Abramoff and his team of lobbyists to transportation projects, maritime issues and homeland-security matters.

In return, Zachares admitted, he accepted more than $30,000 in tickets to sporting events, a luxury golf trip to Scotland, and $10,000 in cash from Abramoff or his associates.

Abramoff got Zachares his job with Young around 2002, then told a fellow lobbyist that Zachares was "pulling our load inside" the committee.

Young, under investigation over unrelated matters in Alaska and Florida, was not named in Zachares' charge. But Abramoff has had several connections to Young over the years. In 2000, when Zachares was an official in the government of the Northern Mariana Islands and Abramoff was lobbying for the island government and the local garment industry, Young spiked a bill that would have imposed U.S. labor laws there.

That bill had been a pet project of a fellow Alaska Republican, then-Sen. Frank Murkowski, who said he was trying to stop near-slavery conditions in the Marianas, a U.S. territory in the Pacific.

194A-AN-13620-M

The bill didn't surface again until Abramoff was sentenced to prison. It passed Congress and was signed into law in 2008.

Starting in 1999, Indian tribes with gambling interests that were represented by Abramoff gave about $20,000 to Young's re-election efforts and his political action committee. Young's campaign used Abramoff's skybox at Washington's MCI Center for several fundraisers. And former Young aide Duane Gibson later went to work for one of Abramoff's firms.

In March, the former policy director on Young's transportation committee, Fraser Verrusio, was charged in a three-count indictment with conspiring to change a federal highway bill to benefit an Abramoff client. The charges said he accepted an illegal payment from Abramoff and associates: an expense-paid World Series trip to New York in 2003 that included a visit to a strip club, dinner at a steak joint and a night in a Manhattan hotel.

Verrusio was one of Young's first hires when he took over as chairman of the committee in 2001.

A trial date for Verrusio has not been set, but the judge in his case has ordered a status conference for Nov. 6.

Zachares and Verrusio were supervised by Young's chief of staff on the transportation committee, Lloyd Jones, a former Republican state senator from Ketchikan married to another ex-state senator, Jan Faiks, who was from Anchorage. Zachares, Verrusio and Jones -- now retired -- had nearby offices in the Rayburn House Office Building.

Young has refused to answer media questions about the federal investigations in which he's involved, and on Friday his spokeswoman said he continues to have no comment.

Public records show that since 2007 Young has spent more than $1 million from his campaign account and a legal defense fund on lawyers.

Zachares left Young's committee in 2005, the year of Young's massive transportation bill with its infamous "Bridges to Nowhere" funding for Alaska.

Since Zachares' plea, Judge Huvelle has twice allowed him to travel to Korea for business, the latest from Sept. 23 to Oct. 2. He hasn't had to publicly report what he does for a living, but his lawyer said in 2007 that he was working in sales.

Zachares' plea agreement also included a promise by the government to not charge his wife, Cynthia, in return for her cooperation. The couple have twin daughters and live in the Washington, D.C., area.

No motion for a stay was filed in the public docket of U.S. District Court by the cutoff day Monday -- a federal holiday -- or on Tuesday. There was no way to determine whether motions to delay the sentencing of Allen and former Veco Vice President Rick Smith were filed under seal.

If nothing was filed in the sealed docket, Allen and Smith will soon learn their punishment for their influence-buying spree among the ranks of Alaska's elected Republican officials.

It's been nearly two and a half years since U.S. District Judge John Sedwick accepted Allen's and Smith's guilty pleas to bribery, conspiracy and tax violations. In the intervening time, Sedwick agreed to stay their sentencings seven times while the pair testified in trials and held extensive debriefings with federal agents and prosecutors.

But Sedwick said the delays have gone on long enough.

"Allen's crimes are significant ones which involve the integrity of the political process in the State of Alaska," Sedwick wrote in his July 7 order accepting the previous government-proposed delay but suggesting it should be the last. "The community has a substantial interest in seeing the imposition of punishment for these crimes without undue delay."

In that order, he told prosecutors and defense attorneys to prepare for sentencing by the end of October. If prosecutors felt they needed an additional delay, they would have to comply with a much tougher standard than before: They would have to file a detailed statement by Oct. 12 in which they would identify the potential defendants against whom Allen and Smith were providing information, the date by which a grand jury would indict the defendants, the districts in which they would tried, and the likelihood that Allen or Smith would be called to testify.

Because that information would be sensitive, he told prosecutors they could file a new delaying motion under seal.

Normally, a prosecutor has to ask a judge before submitting a sealed filing, a request that shows up in the public docket. It's unclear whether that same process would occur in this case because Sedwick already told prosecutors they could file under seal. It's possible they have asked for a delay and that only Sedwick knows about it.

A spokeswoman for the Justice Department declined to comment. Sedwick didn't respond to a message left in his chambers.

Prosecutors often like to delay the sentencing of government witnesses as an incentive for their cooperation. By helping the government, a defendant can get a substantial reduction in prison time.

In his July order, Sedwick noted that the law also allows prosecutors to seek reduced prison time for a cooperating witness for up to a year after sentencing.

And in the case of Allen, the government has an additional hammer: Under Allen's plea deal, the government agreed to not charge his son, Mark, with crimes the FBI uncovered in the corruption investigation. If Allen stopped cooperating, his son could be in jeopardy.

In testimony about his plea deal in the 2008 trial of former Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, Bill Allen admitted his son paid off a legislator. While Allen didn't name the politician, former Rep. Beverly Masek, R-Willow, pleaded guilty in March to accepting an illegal cash payment of "several thousand dollars" from a relative of Allen's.

In addition to facing charges, a felony conviction would cost Mark Allen his New Mexico racehorse license. He is co-owner of 2009 Kentucky Derby winner Mine That Bird and has a stable of race horses in Roswell, N.M.

Allen was the lead witness in Stevens' trial, and he and Smith testified in the trials of former House speaker Pete Kott, R-Eagle River, former Rep. Vic Kohring, R-Wasilla. Former Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, R-Juneau, is awaiting trial on charges he conspired with Veco officials.

Allen has testified he made illegal payments to former state Senate President Ben Stevens, R-Anchorage. Ben Stevens, a son of Sen. Ted Stevens, has not been charged and has denied wrongdoing. U.S. Rep. Don Young, R-Alaska, has also been under investigation over his connections to Veco, but has not been charged and has also denied wrongdoing.

Charges against Ted Stevens were thrown out when the Justice Department admitted it failed to turn over evidence favorable to the defense prior to trial. The same issue has led to the release of Kott and Kohring from prison while Sedwick decides whether to order new trials or dismiss charges.

Disclosure forms Young filed this week with the Federal Election Commission show the 19-term congressman spent $54,793 from his campaign account on lawyers during the past three months.

Young's chief of staff, Pamela Day, said the bulk of those expenses went to pay his $46,042 in reported debt to the Washington, D.C., law firm of Tobin, O'Connor, Ewing and Richard. "It's no new action, just old debt that was paid," she said.

Young is left with $123,037 in the bank just over a year before the election. That compares with the almost $1.5 million he had at this point in his last campaign for Congress.

Since early 2007, Young has spent $1.2 million from his campaign fund on legal bills connected to federal investigations of his fundraising and other matters. He also has spent an additional $73,415 on lawyers out of a separate legal expense fund he created last year.

Young has declined to discuss details of the legal issues, other than to say he's done nothing wrong and is frustrated they have dragged on for so long. Day said she's not involved in the legal matters and does not know exactly what the bills are for.

Young brought in a total of $86,725 in contributions the past three months. The period included his big annual fundraiser, featuring former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens and held at the home of former Alaska Gov. Bill Sheffield. He spent $93,264 during the same period, on campaign expenses as well as the legal fees.

Former state legislator Andrew Halcro said he plans to file by the end of the month to challenge Young in next summer's Republican primary. Halcro said Young's numbers do not look good.

"If you raise 86 grand, spend 93, and 55 of that is for legal fees, that tells me you've got some problems," Halcro said.

Harry Crawford, a Democratic state representative running against Young for Congress, said his treasurer is working on his Federal Election Commission disclosure forms and he'll be filing them by tonight's deadline.

"We've just started on the fundraising, and it's going to reflect that," Crawford said. "I don't know how much we raised but it's somewhere in the neighborhood, I think, of $25,000."

He said he's had virtually no campaign expenses to this point. "I haven't had any legal expenses, if that's what you're asking," Crawford said.

Day said it is always tough to raise money in a non-election year and this has been a difficult time for Young, whose wife died in early August.

But she said people have been supportive of Young and that she's pleased with the recent fundraising. "He's committed to the race. He believes he can win it and is running to win. That's the only way he knows how to do it," she said.

Feds work to avoid another Stevens prosecution fiasco

Stevens still popular with oil industry

OVATIONS: Former senator continues to carry pro-development torch.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(10/01/09 21:54:37)

Former Sen. Ted Stevens on Thursday broke the public silence he has maintained since his election defeat in November, delivering a vintage pro-development speech to the Alaska Industry Support Alliance that steered clear of the issues that cost him his job.

Introduced to a standing ovation that lasted most of a minute, Stevens urged the business group to organize to fight "extreme environmentalists," whom he said would prevent Alaska from assuming its role in providing the world with energy and other resources.

He said Alaska still has huge potential to develop oil, gas and coal reserves. As for a gasline, he said the state wasted time and effort bickering over a route and in debating new taxation. In the meantime, other projects are coming to fruition elsewhere -- often in places that created tax incentives.

The friendly crowd of oil-industry related businessmen and women interrupted his speech once with applause, then stood and cheered him for another minute when he finished his 20-minute address.

Stevens, 85, the longest serving Republican senator, ran for re-election last year under the shadow of a long-running corruption investigation. A week before the election, he was found guilty by a jury in Washington, D.C., of failing to disclose gifts from a person who would have been one of the main figures in the room in earlier days -- Bill Allen, the ex-chief executive of the state's once leading oil-field contractor, Veco Corp.

Charges against Stevens were thrown out in April when the Justice Department admitted it failed to turn over favorable evidence to his lawyers. Now the prosecutors and perhaps some FBI agents are themselves under investigation by the Justice Department and a special prosecutor looking into possible criminal contempt.

In between handshakes and well wishes as he made his way to the podium, Stevens said he wouldn't talk about his personal situation while those investigations are pending.

"Well, I'll talk about that sometime -- I don't think it's time to talk about that yet," Stevens said.

In the brief interview, Stevens said he was spending more time commuting between his homes and offices in Washington and in Alaska than he did while asenator.

"I'm still trying to (go over) all the things I have accumulated over almost 52 years of government service," he said. "We call it memorabilia. Everything has a memory. The question is, what do you do with all this stuff?"

Stevens said his health is good, and he walked easily and swiftly through the room. He said he still works out every day.

FBI - Stevens-2557

"This is the first time I've made comments since I left the Senate. Then I'm going to fly back and take my wife on a trip for her birthday." He wouldn't say where they were going, only that it was in a different country. He said he just told his wife, Catherine, about the 10-day vacation.

"It's really a trip of a lifetime and I'm looking forward to it. We haven't had such a trip ever in our marriage. Got some time now."

Of the last year or so, Stevens would only give a quote from someone else.

"Winston Churchill once said, 'If you're going through Hell, keep going,' " he said.

Allen asks that sentencing be postponed until February

ALLEN: Prosecutors have delayed decision 7 times but don't back this one.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com
(10/20/09 16:39:29)

Former Veco chief executive Bill Allen is asking that his Oct. 28 sentencing on corruption charges be postponed four months because his cooperation in ongoing criminal cases is "incomplete," as is a contempt investigation of federal prosecutors in which he is also assisting.

Though prosecutors have previously initiated postponements seven times to encourage his cooperation, this time Allen is on his own.

According to Allen's motion, filed Tuesday afternoon, prosecutors believe Allen's request for a delay is not "meritorious" and were prepared to go ahead with his sentencing as scheduled.

Rick Smith, a former Veco vice president, is also scheduled to be sentenced on Oct. 28. He has not filed for a continuance and his attorney didn't return a call asking if one would still be sought.

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick told prosecutors to file a formal response to Allen's request by Thursday. Without saying how he would rule, he told both sides to be prepared for sentencing to go ahead Oct. 28.

Both Allen and Smith pleaded guilty in May 2007 to charges of corrupting public officials in Alaska to hold down oil production taxes.

Veco was a construction and maintenance company that mainly operated in oil fields in Alaska and around the world. Allen used his political operation, fueled with a mix of legal and illegal campaign money, undisclosed gifts and outright bribes, to improve the business climate for himself and his clients.

Allen's motion for a stay and an additional motion for an unusually quick resolution were initially filed under seal Tuesday. But Sedwick, who has grown increasingly wary of secret filings in the Alaska corruption cases, ordered Allen's attorneys to "immediately refile the motions on the public record."

Under federal sentencing guidelines, Allen and Smith can get time off an eventual prison sentence for cooperating with investigators and testifying truthfully. Both men have been working with the FBI since August 2006 and have testified in the trials of two former legislators, Pete Kott and Vic Kohring, who were both convicted. Allen was also the key witness against U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, who was found guilty of failing to disclose tens of thousands of dollars of gifts, mainly from Allen and Veco.

But Stevens' case fell apart when the Justice Department admitted it didn't turn over favorable evidence to Stevens, and charges were dismissed.

Among the unprovided evidence were Allen's statements to FBI agents and prosecutors that contradicted his later testimony at trial. One of the most serious was whether Stevens was honest when he sent a note to Allen asking him to send invoices for Veco renovations at the Stevens home in Girdwood.

During the trial, Allen said Stevens didn't really mean it when he asked for the bills. Stevens' attorneys asserted Allen was coached to lie on that point by prosecutors, an allegation the prosecutors denied.

In his motion to delay sentencing, Allen said he is now cooperating in the criminal contempt investigation of Stevens' prosecutors ordered by the Washington, D.C., judge who presided over Stevens' trial. In the last two days, there's been a flurry of activity in the docket of that investigation, though all six new filings have been under seal.

In July, Sedwick said he had seen enough delays and ordered Allen and Smith to appear for sentencing Oct. 28. He told prosecutors they could make one last appeal for delay if they acted by Oct. 12, but that date came and went.

Pre-sentence reports were prepared for both men. Those reports are normally under seal because of the private information they contain, but the fact they were prepared showed up on the dockets last week.

Sedwick said in his July order that Allen and Smith could still get credit for additional work with prosecutors under a federal rule that allows him to review sentences for up to a year after they are issued.

But in his motion for delay, Allen said he may be involved in investigations and prosecutions for more than one additional year. In addition, there is no procedural way for the special prosecutor in the contempt case -- a private attorney appointed by the judge -- to provide a complete evaluation of Allen's cooperation to Sedwick while that investigation is still ongoing, Allen's attorney said.

Allen proposed that his sentencing be delayed until Feb. 28, 2010, and said that even that date could be moved back by "new relevant developments."

"The degree of credit to which Defendant is entitled can only be properly evaluated when his cooperation is complete," the motion said.

Allen said it would also be improper for him to be sentenced while questions about his credibility remain unanswered. In addition, a noted Washington neurologist who has examined Allen, Richard Restak, would be unavailable to testify on Oct. 28 about Allen's "cognitive and communicative functions."

Allen suffered some brain damage in a motorcycle accident in 2001 and has difficulty with speech, though he has testified his recall of events is good.

"Dr. Restak can describe aspects of Defendant's mental and physical condition and functioning that bear directly on material aspect of Defendant's cooperation, including his statements to investigators and subsequent testimony," Allen's motion said, an apparent reference to the issue about bills that arose in the Stevens trial.

Allen's motion also describes additional cases he might be called to testify in. It's likely, he said, that those trials wouldn't be completed in the one-year time frame.

One is the bribery and conspiracy case of former Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, who is currently appealing the basis for one of his charges to the U.S. Supreme Court.

FBI - Stevens-2560

Like Stevens, Kott and Kohring didn't get favorable evidence they were entitled to and they may get new trials, which may require Allen's testimony again.

And there are uncharged cases still under investigation, the motion noted.

"The government has not yet advised Defendant (Allen) of other investigations or prosecutions regarding which Defendant could provide further cooperation, but it is clear that there are other individuals who fall within the scope of the ongoing investigation and against whom Defendant might still be called to testify," Allen's motions said. "For example, the public official identified as State Senator B in Defendant's (charges) has not yet been charged with any criminal offenses, nor has Veco Executive A or Veco Executive B."

State Sen. "B" matched the description of former Alaska Senate President Ben Stevens, Ted Stevens' son. The Veco executives match the descriptions of Veco Corp. President Pete Leathard and Chief Financial Officer Roger Chan.

Attorneys for all three have denied their clients engaged in criminal conduct.

Allen, 72, once ran the leading oil-field business in Alaska, Veco Corp. He used that position and his wealth to help elect politicians and keep them on his side whenever issues important to him -- oil taxes, resource development and labor matters -- arose in the state Legislature.

But court-ordered wiretaps and a tiny FBI camera in his hotel suite in Juneau laid bare his efforts to go beyond verbal persuasion by giving cash, jobs, vehicles and other illegal benefits to elected officials.

Five state legislators and U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens were charged with crimes related to their dealings with Allen. Three were convicted by juries, two pleaded guilty and one is awaiting trial. Stevens, one of those convicted, was freed when a judge said prosecutors engaged in misconduct in his trial.

Whatever punishment he and a former Veco vice president, Rick Smith, will receive in the federal courtroom of District Judge John Sedwick will be tempered by their extensive cooperation with prosecutors and the FBI. In 2007, when Allen testified against one of the legislators he bribed, former Rep. Pete Kott of Eagle River, he said he expected to get 10 to 11 years in prison.

But last week, prosecutors said they would ask for only 46 months, and Allen's lawyers said they would ask for six months.

Prosecutors are seeking 42 months for Smith, while Smith's lawyers said he should get a year.

Allen and Smith pleaded guilty May 7, 2007, but their sentencings were delayed to allow them to give evidence against others and reap the benefits of their cooperation. But in July, Sedwick called a halt to the delays and said it was time for the men to face justice.

Veco ceased to exist when Allen and his family sold most of its assets to the international engineering and construction company CH2M Hill in September 2007.

Allen's sentencing hearing is scheduled to start at 8:30 a.m. and Smith's at 10 a.m.

Allen gets 3 years in prison, $750,000 fine

FBI - Stevens-2563

As some of his family dabbed tears from their eyes, Bill Allen, a one-time Alaskan of the Year and employer of thousands of Alaskans, at last stood before a judge to face his punishment Wednesday.

Now 72, Allen once saw himself as the proxy for the state's petroleum industry through his oil-field service company Veco Corp. But the FBI caught him paying bribes and gratuities to elected officials and treating campaign finance laws like they were written for someone else.

"I'd like to apologize to you, to the people here in Alaska," Allen said haltingly, the effects of his 2001 motorcycle accident still making it hard for the words to emerge. "Instead of me really helping them, I pushed them down, really. I thought I was doing right, but I pushed too -- I went over the line, too far."

"Your honor, go ahead and sentence me," he concluded at the end of a 12-minute version of his life story and how he came to be in the dock of a federal courtroom in Anchorage. "But kind of remember, I done some good."

Three years, said U.S. District Judge John Sedwick, and a $750,000 fine. The prison sentence was substantially less than the 41-month maximum suggested by federal guidelines, but the fine was the biggest Sedwick could assess, and the judge said he would have levied a larger one if he could because Allen's crimes were partly motivated by greed.

The hearing over, portions of the Allen clan -- son Mark, daughter Tammy, two of her children, Tammy's lawyer -- left the courtroom, scuffled with a blogger with a video camera on the sidewalk, then hauled out to the Million Air fixed-base operation at the airport in three black SUVs protected by a beefy security detail. They boarded the private jet they bought with the millions they got from the forced sale of Veco in 2007 and left Alaska for points south.

Allen will be free until the U.S. Bureau of Prisons finds him a spot, probably in a low-security facility in Oregon or Arizona, the two such places closest to his children.

It could be awhile. Former Rep. Beverly Masek was sentenced Sept. 24 to six months for taking cash from Allen and his son Mark, and she's still not incarcerated, according to the Bureau of Prisons Web site.

As the Allen family was preparing for departure, Rick Smith, Allen's former vice president, took his turn in Sedwick's courtroom. Smith had pleaded guilty the same day as Allen -- May 7, 2007 -- to the same crimes -- conspiracy, bribery and tax violations. While Smith was culpable, Sedwick said, it was not to the degree of his boss, and he certainly wasn't as wealthy. Smith got 21 months and a $10,000 fine.

At 11:16 a.m., Sedwick's court adjourned and a long chapter in Alaska's political corruption saga came to an end.

Allen learned he was caught on Aug. 30, 2006, when the FBI showed him evidence they had gathered over three years of investigation, including video filmed with a camera hidden in a lamp in his hotel suite in Juneau.

"They gave me a tape that really embarrassed me," Allen said in his monologue to the judge. "I can't talk anyway, and when they were taping it, hell I can tell I was half drunk and I didn't like what I looked like to myself. So I made two decisions -- I was going to do the right thing, 'cause I did do wrong, I was trying to make it right. And I quit drinking. ... I'm not an alcoholic, it's just that you do a lot of drinking down there in Juneau, and that's the stupidest thing you can do with me or any of the legislators, because your reasoning is not as good as it should be."

That turned out to be a key decision. The next day, he convinced Smith to work with prosecutors too, and over the next eight months they wore wires to meetings with legislators, made recorded phone calls and gave numerous debriefings. On Wednesday, it emerged for the first time that Allen permitted the FBI to make video recordings on 11 occasions in his Anchorage home.

After their guilty pleas and their cooperation became known, blowing their cover, they testified at trials.

Under the federal sentencing guidelines, Allen would have faced more than eight years in prison had he not cooperated, prosecutor James Trusty told the court. Smith would have been looking at more than five years, prosecutor Kendall Day said.

Sedwick took pains to explain the disparities between the sentences for Allen and Smith -- the men with the money -- and two legislators who took the money, former Reps. Pete Kott and Vic Kohring. Kott got six years, Kohring 42 months.

"Mr. Allen has cooperated; he began cooperating the very day he learned he was subject to the investigation," Sedwick said. "They not only refused to cooperate, they refused to take responsibility for their crimes." He said Kott's own testimony appeared to have been disbelieved by the jury, Sedwick said.

Trusty noted that Allen was a polarizing figure. On one side was "a picture of a man who loves family, loves friends," and who engaged in "extraordinary acts of charity," an "admirable person who rose from nothing."

On the other side were "actions committed over a period a years that were very destructive," a "swath of harm created by Mr. Allen's corruption of others and tarnished political institutions," Trusty said.

Often, when there are such mixed descriptions of a defendant, the truth usually lies somewhere in between. Not so with Allen, he said, a man who instead embraces both extremes.

At one point in the proceedings, a question arose over whether Allen's payments of more than $200,000 over six years to "State Senator B" -- a reference to former Senate President Ben Stevens -- were bribes or gratuities. The distinction could have added or subtracted several months from the sentences that Allen or Smith could face.

Prosecutors argued they were bribes -- payments to achieve legislative goals, even if the goals weren't specified with each payment. Sedwick ruled they were gratuities -- payments to purchase influence that are less damning than bribes but also illegal. But he also said he didn't know all the evidence the government had.

Stevens, the son of former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, has been under investigation for years but has not been charged. He has denied wrongdoing.

Sedwick also recognized Smith's cooperation during his sentencing.

"As damaging and as corrosive as his crimes were, he did everything we ever asked," prosecutor Day told the judge.

Smith's attorney argued that Smith played a minor role in the scandal and the sentence should reflect that. He neither devised the strategy to corruptly influence Alaska politicians, nor could he vote on legislation like lawmakers. Organizing meetings doesn't amount to controlling legislators, Smith's attorney, Michael Keenan, told the judge.

"In the scheme, clearly Allen and the legislators had a dominant and superior role," Keenan said.

Sedwick took the middle ground, ruling Smith was neither insignificant nor the ringleader but bore responsibility as Allen's loyal lieutenant.

"He should have questioned what he was told," Sedwick said. "He should have quit."

For Allen's sentencing, the courtroom was packed with family and friends, lawyers and activists, reporters and bloggers. Spectators trying to catch a glimpse of Alaska history in the making stood in a line in the back the large courtroom.

By the time Smith's hearing began a few minutes later, most of the people had cleared out. Smith walked out with one of his lawyers and a man who wouldn't give his name but said he was a friend. Smith and his friend got in a pickup truck and drove away.

Leader of Detroit mosque killed, 11 charged in FBI raids," by Paul Egan for the Detroit News, October 28:

Detroit -- The leader of a Detroit mosque was shot and killed Wednesday during a series of FBI raids that resulted in charges against 11 and the death of an FBI dog.

At least six of those charged were in federal custody late Wednesday afternoon.

The case involves the Joint Terrorism Task Force and prosecutors from the national security unit of the U.S. Attorney's Office.

A complaint filed Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Detroit names Luqman Ameen Abullah, imam of the Masjid Al-Haqq mosque in Detroit, as "a highly placed leader of a nationwide radical fundamentalist Sunni group." He was killed in the raid, according to a joint statement by federal officials.

More than three people were arrested on charges including conspiracy to commit federal crimes, receipt of stolen goods, providing firearms to felons and changing vehicle identification numbers, said Special Agent Sandra Berchtold, a spokeswoman for the FBI in Detroit. Berchtold also confirmed that an FBI dog was shot and killed in one of the raids.

The operation involved locations in Detroit and Dearborn.

Yellow police tape was put up outside a trucking and warehouse firm on Miller Road just north of Michigan Avenue, and a Dearborn police car was parked outside.

Another site involved in the raids was on Tireman near Interstate 96 on the city's west side.

Asking for leniency and a sentence of only six months in prison, Bill Allen wants a federal judge to look beyond his corruption of Alaska politics to a life of charity and job creation in the state.

Bill Allen

In pleadings in advance of his sentencing Wednesday, attorneys for Allen, the former chief executive of Veco Corp., described a man who came a long way from humble, hardscrabble beginnings. Letters from family and friends speak of Allen's Depression-era childhood in a narrative that could have emerged from the pages of a Steinbeck novel.

"Clearly, the crimes to which he pled guilty were an aberration -- prior to his actions which led to his guilty plea, Mr. Allen led a law-abiding life full of kindness and charity," his attorneys wrote.

But that narrative ignores allegations that he maintained sexual relationships with underaged girls and asked two women to lie under oath about his sexual relationship with them, or that he first got caught violating laws governing political campaign finance in 1985.

Even as Allen prepared to learn his punishment for bribery and conspiracy from U.S. District Judge John Sedwick, newly unsealed documents in a related case provide a more detailed look at the ongoing police investigation of Allen's relationship with underage girls.

Allen has denied the accusations surrounding the girls and has told the FBI he never asked anyone to give false testimony. Because Allen hasn't been charged with a crime in connection with those allegations, they won't figure in Sedwick's sentencing decisions.

Allen, 72, is the central figure in the Alaska public corruption investigation begun by the FBI in 2003. Allen and a former vice president, Rick Smith, pleaded guilty in May 2007. Since then, Allen's testimony has been instrumental in convicting two legislators and U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens in trials, though charges against Stevens were later dismissed due to bungling by prosecutors. Evidence Allen and Smith provided was instrumental in the guilty pleas of two other legislators and the chief of staff to former Gov. Frank Murkowski, prosecutors said.

FBI - Stevens-2567

At the time of their pleas, they had already been cooperating with federal authorities for more than eight months. Prosecutors have asked that they get reductions in sentences that they might have otherwise received -- a 46-month recommendation for Allen and 42 months for Smith -- but attorneys for both men say that is still too tough and want to slash their time even more.

In their recommendations, neither Allen's attorneys nor federal prosecutors refer to documents that were unsealed last week in the case of Pete Kott, the former state representative from Eagle River sent to prison for taking bribes from Allen. Kott is asking that his case be dismissed because prosecutors failed to provide him with favorable evidence before his trial. He could have used the allegations against Allen to challenge Allen's credibility, he said.

Among the documents are reports of interviews of two women by city and federal investigators. One of the women said she had sex with Allen when she was 15. The other said she was 19 and working as a prostitute in the mid-1990s when Allen asked her to be his steady date, but she said she observed him having sex several times with 15-year-old girls.

One of the investigators, Anchorage Police Sgt. Kevin Vandegriff, said the Allen sexual abuse case remains active but wouldn't comment further.

Jeff Feldman, an Anchorage lawyer with an extensive federal practice and no involvement in the Allen case, said it's unlikely a judge would consider allegations in deciding how to sentence a defendant.

"If the conduct was uncharged, it remains unproven and the court cannot consider facts that have not been established," Feldman said. Prosecutors could attempt to prove allegations at sentencing, he added, but in Allen's case there was no sign that would happen.

SEX WITH TEENAGERS?

In February 2008, the Daily News published a story describing allegations that Allen had a sexual relationship with an Anchorage woman, Bambi Tyree, when she was 14 or 15, and that Allen provided her and her family with expensive gifts.

At the time the story was published, Allen denied there had been a sexual relationship and Tyree refused to grant an interview. Vandegriff said he had reopened the case after suspending it in 2004 but wouldn't provide details.

The material unsealed in the Kott case last week shed light both on Tyree's relationship with Allen and on Vandegriff's reopened investigation.

On Oct. 28, 2004, an FBI agent and assistant U.S. attorney interviewed Tyree at a federal detention center near Seattle, according to interview notes filed in the Kott case. Tyree, then 23, was a witness in another case, but she also gave the authorities information on Allen.

She said she "had sex with Bill Allen when she was 15 years old," the notes say, then signed an affidavit at Allen's request claiming she did not have sex with him.

Tyree's name was blacked out of the document except for one place. The same copy was filed separately by by Kott's lawyer and prosecutors.

Also in 2004, another woman whose name was also blacked out said that around 1996 or 1997, when she was a 19-year-old prostitute, she had an "arrangement" with Allen: "She said that he made her agree to have sex only with him. In exchange she got a car, a condo and money."

The 19-year-old said she watched a 15-year-old girl engage in sex with Allen in a car, according to Vandegriff's report. "She admitted to participating in threesome sex with a 15-year-old girl and Allen," according to another Vandegriff report.

She told Vandegriff she documented the relationship in her diary and saved copies of credit card receipts, plane tickets that Allen bought for her and her family, and other evidence. One of the trips was designed by Allen to get her out of state so she couldn't testify in an unrelated criminal case, but which could have revealed her relationship with him, she told Vandegriff.

When they broke up, Allen's attorney asked her to swear in a document it never happened and offered her $5,000, but she refused. She said she thought she could get more money from him, according to Vandegriff's 2004 report.

In January 2008, when he re-opened the case, Vandegriff got back in touch with that woman and asked her where the evidence was. She told him she turned it over during another interview with federal authorities in 2004 and never got it back. Vandegriff checked with an assistant U.S. Attorney who remembered getting documents from the woman in 2004 and thought they were turned over to the FBI.

There was nothing in the Kott file to indicate the documents had been found.

ANOTHER SIDE OF ALLEN

FBI - Stevens-2568

A far more poignant and benign picture of Allen was painted by his friends and relatives.

Addie Chancellor, an older sister -- Allen had eight siblings -- said when Allen was born in 1937, the family was living in a tent along the Rio Grande in Socorro, N.M.

"We were definitely the 'have nots,' the 'ragamuffins' at school, and that hurt," she wrote. She enclosed an old picture of Allen at age 8, with a horse.

"As you can see, he was a skinny kid, long skinny arms, and his pants were held up with a belt wrapped around him twice," his sister wrote.

That picture marked the end of Allen's childhood, Chancellor said. From there, the family moved to Oregon as migrant farmworkers, then picked cotton in California.

"The family lived in fruit picker shacks with no running water or electricity," wrote brother Joe W. Allen Sr. "Bill and Mom would pick until they were exhausted. ... Every since I can remember, Bill was the main support of our family."

Allen only sporadically attended school, sister Addie said, and dropped out altogether when he was 16 to work in the oil fields of northwestern New Mexico. He became a welder and loved the work.

"He appreciated the oil industry because a person could get a job and move up," she said. "His last goal before he retired was to help get the (gas) pipeline because of how it would be good for Alaska and the country. It would create jobs beyond the oil industry and there would be growth in Alaska."

She and others described him as generous brother, uncle and boss.

Granddaughter Ashleigh Allen said he just wanted to break the cycle of poverty for the family.

"It seems to be that the backhanded plotting, greedy and unethical oil contractor portrayed in the media and newspaper, is entirely different from the well respected Republican featured as one of the most influential men in Alaska every year for 10 years straight," Ashleigh Allen said.

"In taking responsibility and cooperating, all while bearing the constant stress of testifying, my dad has become a pariah in the very state that once named him Alaskan of the year," said daughter Tammy Todd Allen of Grand Junction, Colo. "Many of his lifelong friends no longer acknowledge him."

"Perhaps his greatest pain is the fact that he has been ostracized from the very community he dedicated his life to building," said Ken Marzocco, who once ran Veco's engineering section out of an office in Bellingham, Wash. "While I am a firm believer in the need to pay for crimes committed, I have seen the heavy price Mr. Allen has paid to date."

While the letter file is bulging with notes from Allen's relatives and former employees, few public figures came to the defense of the man who once was a major financier of Alaska election campaigns and who lobbied hard on behalf of the oil industry. One who made an appearance was John Shively, once an official in the Democratic administrations of Govs. Bill Sheffield and Tony Knowles. He described Allen as an enigma.

"He became an extremely successful businessman -- a multi-millionaire -- but I don't think he ever forgot that he came from a very poor background," Shively said. "He learned by doing and getting things done. He decided where he wanted to go and then set about getting there, and in the end that philosophy was probably his undoing."

Judge allows Kohring new lawyer, more time

Published: October 26th, 2009 10:09 PM
Last Modified: October 26th, 2009 10:09 PM

Former state Rep. Vic Kohring is getting a new lawyer -- and more time to argue that his conviction on federal corruption charges was tainted. U.S. District Judge John Sedwick on Monday granted a request by Seattle lawyer John Henry Browne to withdraw from Kohring's case because of conflicts stemming from a civil lawsuit. Kohring has sued Browne in state Superior Court over injuries he said were caused in a wreck in which Kohring was the passenger and Browne the driver.

Kohring was convicted in 2007 of bribery, conspiracy and attempted extortion related to an effort by then-Veco Corp. executives for a new oil tax scheme sought by the industry. But after his trial, prosecutors acknowledged they had not provided Kohring's defense with evidence that could have helped him. Prosecutors eventually turned over thousands of pages of additional materials.

With those materials in hand, Kohring had faced a Friday deadline to file court papers to dismiss the case or seek a new trial.

Sedwick's order says a new deadline will be set after Kohring gets another lawyer. The judge gave the former legislator until Nov. 6 to get a lawyer on his own or apply for a court-appointed one.

Kohring sues his lawyer

PERSONAL INJURY: He seeks money for wreck that happened while his attorney was driving.

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com

(10/23/09 22:34:27)

Days before a critical deadline in his corruption case, former state Rep. Vic Kohring has sued his own lawyer, who now wants out.

In the lawsuit, Kohring is seeking damages from Seattle lawyer John Henry Browne over injuries he contends were suffered in an Anchorage car crash in which Browne was the driver.

As a legislator, Kohring championed limiting awards in civil cases. But now he wants more than the $300,000 limit of Browne's insurance policy, according to Browne.

The suit in state Superior Court creates "an actual conflict of interest," Browne said. Since they are now adversaries in court, he cannot represent Kohring, Browne said.

The former legislator from Wasilla may be looking for a new lawyer as he has a chance to wipe away the federal criminal case that's dogged him since the FBI raided his office in August 2006.

A deadline of Oct. 30 is looming for Kohring to file a motion to dismiss the charges or seek a new trial because of the prosecutors' failure to turn over favorable evidence before his 2007 trial.

"This is not a situation wherein counsel is attempting to shirk his responsibilities in the final hours, but rather counsel's response to the fact that he was just last week named as the defendant in a personal injury complaint filed by Mr. Kohring," Browne wrote in his motion to withdraw.

As of Friday evening, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick hadn't ruled on Browne's motion or set aside the Oct. 30 deadline.

Efforts to reach Kohring were unsuccessful.

The lawyer handling his civil suit, Michael Flanigan, doesn't discuss pending cases, his paralegal said.

FBI - Stevens-2571

RUNNING A STOP SIGN

The wreck happened during the lunch hour on Oct. 17, 2007, a few days before the start of the trial that resulted in Kohring's conviction on bribery, conspiracy and attempted extortion charges.

Kohring's suit said that Browne ran the stop sign at Barrow Street and Eighth Avenue in downtown Anchorage, and his car was then T-boned by a vehicle with the right-of-way.

Browne said he was driving a rental car and wasn't familiar with Anchorage roads. He acknowledged that he ran the stop sign and said he got a ticket.

#86 11/2/2009

He said he knew Kohring's medical issues from the accident were unresolved and was unsure at first about taking the appeal of Kohring's conviction.

"I don't know what Vic's thinking is. I went ahead and did the appeal with the understanding from me and his attorney that they'd settle for (insurance) policy limits and there wouldn't be any problem," Browne said. "Of course, Vic is entitled to recover whatever his injuries were. There didn't seem to be any injuries when the thing happened."

The personal-injury suit, filed Oct. 13 just before the two-year statute of limitations runs out, said Kohring is facing medical bills as a result of injuries from the wreck but doesn't give specifics.

Kohring had previous neck and back injuries, Browne said in his motion. His injuries came up during his trial. He had been treated at the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota and once told Veco Corp. executives he was in debt for medical bills.

Wayne Anthony Ross, an Anchorage attorney who represented Kohring early in the corruption case, said Browne should have anticipated a lawsuit. Browne is putting Kohring "in a terrible position," Ross said.

"You don't leave your clients in the lurch like that," Ross said. "Basically Browne had the keys to Vic's jail cell in his pocket and he could have gotten the keys to Vic and maybe this whole terrible thing for Vic could be over with."

LEGAL ETHICS

Browne said he consulted with the bar association and ethics experts, and they agreed that once Kohring sued, he needed to step aside.

"Generally when this happens, the best course of action for a lawyer is to withdraw from the representation," said Steve Van Goor, counsel to the Alaska Bar Association. Lawyers who believe they can still represent the client competently could still do so, if the client agrees, but most times, the lawyer will withdraw, Van Goor said.

Kohring was convicted in November 2007 and sentenced to 3 1/2 years in federal prison. Jurors said later they were convinced he sold his office to Veco executives who wanted legislators' support on a 2006 oil tax bill.

That conviction came under review in June, when the government admitted it failed to provide Kohring's attorney with evidence that could have helped him convince a jury his client was not guilty. Kohring was freed from prison until the issues can be aired in court. Former House Speaker Pete Kott, also convicted in the Alaska corruption investigation, was freed at the same time for similar reasons.

The defense lawyers received thousands of pages of additional evidence since June. Browne said his staff has spent weeks going through it. He wanted to see the case through.

"Once I realized the government was hiding all this stuff, I was doing it as a matter of principle," Browne said. "I would have given everything of value that I own other than my family to cross-examine four U.S. attorneys."

FBI - Stevens-2572

"It's just a shame," he said.

Kohring had back surgery after his conviction but before reporting to the private prison in California to serve his sentence. He has said he didn't get treatment for his injured neck and back in prison. After he got out in June, he said he planned to return to the Mayo Clinic.

Justice Dept.: Kott verdict should stand

REJECT MOTION: They say evidence against ex-legislator is overwhelming.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(10/23/09 17:28:23)

After months of backtracking in its prosecutions of the Alaska corruption cases, the Justice Department said Friday that former House Speaker Pete Kott received a proper trial in 2007 and his conviction on bribery, extortion and conspiracy charges should stand.

The government's response was a flat-out rejection of a motion filed last month by Kott's attorney seeking dismissal of charges because prosecutors failed to turn over favorable evidence before his trial.

"Kott has not established a constitutional discovery violation warranting a new trial, much less dismissal," the Justice Department said in its reply to Kott. "This court should therefore deny his motion."

The Justice Department has been on the defensive since it won guilty verdicts in October in its seven-count corruption case against former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

That had been the government's 11th consecutive success at that point in its Alaska investigation, with no failures. But even as prosecutors were cheering their success in Washington, their case was unraveling.

Weeks later, a key Stevens prosecution witness said his testimony wasn't truthful and that prosecutors had mischaracterized some evidence. Then, an FBI agent in Anchorage complained the investigation had been conducted improperly and that Stevens was unfairly tried. Finally, under unrelenting pressure from Stevens' defense team and an increasingly skeptical judge, the Justice Department acknowledged it failed to provide favorable evidence to Stevens and asked for all charges to be dismissed.

The Stevens judge impaneled a special prosecutor to investigate the government lawyers for criminal contempt and the Justice Department began an internal investigation. Both investigations are ongoing.

Kott, an Eagle River Republican, and another former legislator convicted in Anchorage, Vic Kohring, a Wasilla Republican, were told by the Justice Department that they also didn't get all the favorable evidence they should have had before their trials. They were released from prison in June while U.S. District Judge John Sedwick considered what to do.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco directed Sedwick to review the evidence and decide whether to dismiss the cases entirely, retry them or declare the original trials were fair, likely sending the men back to prison.

'KOTT'S OWN ADMISSIONS'

11/2/2009

194A-AN-13620-M; 1035

With its new filing Friday afternoon, the Justice Department signaled it is not backing down and and is gearing up for a fight if Kott wants to bring one.

The prosecutors asserted that the evidence against Kott at trial, including secretly recorded video, was so overwhelming it took the Alaska jury but one day to convict him.

"Even though some of the information that the government recently disclosed could be considered favorable to the defendant, none of this information would have affected the jury's verdict when weighed against the compelling evidence introduced at trial, including Kott's own admissions," prosecutors said. "The undisclosed information therefore was not material to either guilt or punishment, and Kott could not have been prejudiced by any nondisclosure of the information upon which he now relies."

The 48-page response was jointly submitted by the Justice Department's criminal division in Washington and the U.S. Attorney's office in Alaska.

For much of the investigation, started in 2003, and for all the trials, the U.S. Attorney's office here was excluded out of concern that the powerful Alaska politicians being targeted could present a conflict of interest. But after the collapse of the Stevens investigation, partly blamed on poor supervision, the U.S. Attorney's office was brought into the still-active cases.

Over the last few months, the prosecutors said they turned over thousands of pages of documents, handwritten notes and other material to Kott and Kohring. In a normal case, much of that material would be properly withheld, they said. But they cited "unique circumstances" that made it necessary "to assure the defendant, the Court, and the public that the Department of Justice takes its discovery obligations seriously and to allow Kott the fullest possible opportunity to evaluate the fairness of his trial."

Under Supreme Court decisions, the Justice Department said "the prosecutor is not required to deliver his entire file to defense counsel, but only to disclose evidence favorable to the accused that, if suppressed, would deprive the defendant of a fair trial."

'TITILIATING HEADLINES'

While some of the previously undisclosed evidence was capable of producing "titillating headlines" -- a reference to an open Anchorage police investigation of government witness Bill Allen for sexual abuse of a minor -- it wouldn't have changed the outcome of the case, the prosecutors said.

"Indeed, the jury observed Kott on no less than 56 audio and video recordings brazenly taking money from oil executives in exchange for official acts," they said, referring to Allen and Rick Smith, former executives of Veco Corp. "The jury heard Kott boasting that he 'had to cheat, steal, beg, borrow, and lie,' and would 'sell his soul to the devil' in order to pass legislation favorable to a company whose two principals had promised him a future job, and had given him over $11,000 in cash and other things of value. The jury also heard Kott admit that he and one of these oil executives ordered hats with the emblem, 'CBC,' which stood for 'Corrupt Bastards Club.'"

Kott, in his motion to dismiss, said he could have done a better job challenging Smith's credibility if he had suppressed evidence of Smith's heavy drinking. But the prosecutors said Smith's drinking should have been no surprise to Kott.

"Kott had personal knowledge of Smith's drinking habits because he was one of Smith's drinking partners," they wrote. "The tapes, which the government provided to Kott before trial, reveal numerous instances of Allen, Smith, and others, including Kott, drinking heavily in Room 604 of the Baranof Hotel (in Juneau), where much of the corruption at issue in this case took place. Therefore, Kott already knew about Smith's drinking habits -- likely in better detail than the government -- and Kott could have cross-examined Smith on that point if he wished to do so."

Kott lawyer suggests perjury in corruption trial

LEGISLATOR: Judge to rule later; prosecutor says conviction proper.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com
(11/17/09 11:39:05)

The lawyer for former Rep. Pete Kott said in court Tuesday that federal prosecutors might have knowingly used perjured testimony to send Kott to prison on corruption charges.

But a Justice Department lawyer argued that Kott's 2007 trial was fair and that a jury properly convicted him on overwhelming evidence, including more than 50 secretly recorded conversations.

The opposing oral arguments before U.S. District Judge John Sedwick capped two months in which both sides filed hundreds of pages of motions, briefs and exhibits about whether Kott, an Eagle River Republican, should be retried, have his charges dismissed altogether, or be sent back to prison. The post-trial wrangling stems directly from the collapse in Washington, D.C., of the corruption case of former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens months after he was found guilty by a jury.

After hearing about 15 minutes of arguments from each side, Sedwick took the case under advisement. He didn't give a hint how he was leaning or even when he would decide, but he cautioned those in the courtroom to not expect an instant ruling.

"It may take awhile," Sedwick said.

Charges against Stevens were dismissed in April when the Justice Department admitted it hadn't turned over information that would've helped Stevens in his case.

While the charges against Stevens were not related to those against Kott or other Alaska legislators caught up in an FBI corruption investigation, there was a common thread: Bill Allen.

Allen, former chief executive of the oil-field service company Veco Corp. and an admitted briber about to start three years in prison, has been the government's central witness in its corruption cases.

Some reports of FBI and prosecutor interviews with Allen show him to start out saying one thing, only to end up saying another. But in their pretrial disclosures to defendants, the prosecutors sometimes failed to provide the contradictory statements and only showed the ones that bolstered their case.

Prosecutors by law are required to turn over favorable evidence to defendants, and that could include inconsistencies in what a witness has said to authorities.

Agents have attributed Allen's occasional difficulties in immediately recalling facts to a brain injury he suffered in a 2001 motorcycle crash. Defense lawyers -- especially Stevens' team -- suggested prosecutors planted the answers they wanted to get. By not getting a peek at the contradictions, they were hamstrung in their ability to cross-examine Allen, they said.

FBI - Stevens-2577

Six prosecutors are now under investigation for criminal contempt and a new team has taken over the Alaska cases.

After Stevens' charges were dismissed, the Justice Department turned over some 4,500 pages of FBI interviews and other documents to lawyers for Kott and another former legislator, Vic Kohring of Wasilla, who were already appealing their convictions.

In the hearing Tuesday, Sedwick asked the lawyers to limit their arguments to the central issues in the charges: for instance, the above-invoice $7,993 Allen paid Kott for floor work. Was the money an illegal payment that would allow Kott's son to take time off from the family flooring business to work on Kott's political campaign? Or was it a legitimate bonus for work well done at Allen's house?

Sheryl Gordon McCloud, Kott's lawyer, said she discovered Allen himself branded the payment as a bonus and not a bribe in part of an early interview with the FBI, but that information had not been turned over to Kott's trial lawyers. Had they had that information, they could have used Allen's own words to contradict his testimony that it was an illegal payment, instead of having to call Kott and Kott's son to testify on the matter and appear to be telling self-serving lies.

James Trusty, a trial attorney in the Justice Department's gang section in Washington assigned to help repair the Alaska cases, agreed that "in an abundance of caution" Kott should have gotten full disclosure. But if the entire interview of Allen is read instead of just the part cited by McCloud, it becomes clear that Allen intended the payment to be a "corrupt" transaction, he said.

At a minimum, McCloud said that Kott should get a new trial. While she stopped short of accusing prosecutors and agents of misconduct, she suggested that Sedwick hold a hearing where she could question them under oath about why the material wasn't turned over. If such a hearing showed federal authorities acted in bad faith and knew that Allen was providing false testimony, the charges should be dismissed, she said.

Trusty said Kott was tried fairly and that the new information doesn't "materially" affect his case, the standard for a new trial.

Questions have also been raised about the government's other chief witness, former Veco vice president Richard Smith. Like Allen, Smith pleaded guilty to corrupting legislators, but was less culpable than his boss and received 21 months.

McCloud has complained prosecutors suppressed information that Smith drank to extremes and suffered memory losses.

FBI - Stevens-2578

But Sedwick expressed skepticism that McCloud could make that issue stick.

"I'm sure that Mr. Kott knew that as well as anyone in the courtroom," said the judge, who viewed numerous secret videotapes of the heavy drinking in Veco's Juneau suite that often involved Kott.

Smith is apparently still involved in ongoing investigations. At his sentencing Oct. 28, Smith's lawyer, Michael Keenan, asked Sedwick to delay Smith's appointment with prison until mid-January.

"As the court is aware, the government has some matters scheduled next month for Mr. Smith," Keenan said, without elaborating.

After the hearing, Kott chatted with reporters outside the courtroom. Since his release from prison in June, in the middle of his six-year sentence, he's been trying to stay active, though the possibility he will return to prison limits his options, he said.

"I'm just working at staying busy, playing the grandpa role a little bit," he said. "I do a little work. I'm retired, but I do a little bit here and there."

Kohring was tried a month after Kott, found guilty, and sentenced by Sedwick to 42 months in prison. He was released the same time as Kott, and the two men were originally on identical filing schedules in their appeals.

But Kohring's lawyer asked for a delay because of a heavy trial schedule, then had to drop out of the case entirely because Kohring sued him over a car accident that occurred around the time of the trial.

Kohring only got his new lawyers Nov. 9, six weeks after his motion to dismiss was initially due. They are the Federal Public Defender in Seattle, Thomas Hillier, and Hillier's first assistant, Michael Filipovic. Sedwick ordered them to file notice by Monday about when they will be able to prepare their motion for Kohring.

Child sex-trafficker wanted Bill Allen as trial witness

Jill Burke

Nov 8, 2009

Documents unsealed in federal court last week show that a wealthy businessman charged in a 2003 child sex-trafficking case had wanted to subpoena former VECO chief executive Bill Allen to testify on his behalf.

The case against Josef Boehm and his associates is more than five years old, but issues kept secret during the trial are now coming to light at the request of the U.S. Attorney's office in Anchorage. It appears the request was made, in part, to try to dispel the notion that statutory rape allegations lodged against Allen were kept quiet to maintain momentum in a growing political corruption probe that was already under way by the Justice Department.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Frank Russo said last week that his office asked for the records to be unsealed since there was no longer a reason to keep them secret. Because of recent filings in one of the corruption cases, the allegations contained in the Boehm motions are already part of the public record, Russo said, adding that the policy manual for U.S. attorneys directs prosecutors to unseal records when the reasons for keeping them secret no longer exist.

It's one more twist in the ongoing saga of whether federal prosecutors and FBI agents suppressed potential evidence that could have helped defense lawyers discredit Allen, the government's star witness, during his testimony against Alaska politicians.

Allen became a target of the feds' corruption probe in December 2004, according to the FBI, and he pleaded guilty in May 2007 to bribing state lawmakers. He's cooperated in the investigation, including testifying against former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, and last month was sentenced to three years in prison.

Withheld impeachment evidence ultimately botched the government's case against Stevens and it is now an issue in the pending review of the 2007 convictions of former state Reps. Vic Kohring and Pete Kott.

In a recent motion to have Kott's case dismissed, his lawyer, Sheryl Gordon McCloud, argues that Allen's potential exposure in one or more sex-crimes investigations, along with allegations that he tried to cover his tracks by getting an underage girlfriend to deny their relationship, should have been disclosed during Kott's trial two year ago. McCloud says those facts could have influenced Allen's credibility with the jury and his motivation for cooperating with the government.

McCloud wants more information about why an Anchorage Police detective investigating statutory rape allegations against Allen was told by the feds to back off. Among her questions: Was it because of the Boehm case, the budding corruption probe, or something else?

A federal judge will hear arguments Nov. 17 on whether to dismiss the charges against Kott or hold a new trial.

The documents unsealed last week were originally filed with the court over a four-month period in 2004 - July to October - and appear to relate to Bambi Tyree, a co-defendant and witness in the Boehm case. Tyree was cutting a plea deal with the government in return for testifying against Boehm, including to say Boehm was the ringleader of a scheme to trade drugs for sex with underage girls at his South Anchorage home.

At the time, Boehm's lawyers aimed to discredit Tyree, claiming she was a ringleader herself, and wanted a judge to allow them to question her about certain subjects during Boehm's upcoming trial. But a federal prosecutor argued successfully to limit their questioning about her alleged sexual relationship with Allen when she was a teenager.

FBI - Stevens-2580

194A-AN-13620-M;1037

At that point in 2004, Tyree had already allegedly admitted that she started having sex with Allen when she was 15, according to notes from an interview with Tyree by the government. Fearing exposure, court records allege Allen asked Tyree to sign a statement saying she never had sex with him. When Boehm's attorneys learned she had signed the false statement, they pushed to use that fact to discredit her.

The government didn't dispute the allegations but wanted any discussion on the matter in open court limited to Tyree having made a false statement, without disclosing her alleged relationship with Allen. The documents show prosecutors felt Tyree's relationship with Allen was irrelevant to the Boehm case.

The documents also seem to show that prosecutors were not actively trying cover up any criminal wrongdoing by Allen.

"To be clear, the United States does not have any interest in protecting Allen from what he did," wrote Russo in the previously sealed motion, which was first filed July 26, 2004. "Indeed, he may still face charges for statutory rape. However, the United States is concerned about the potential distraction introduction of such evidence may create. Because Allen is a well-known figure in the community, there is danger of 'the sideshow taking over the circus.'"

Tyree's credibility was relevant, Russo concluded, but not her sexual history prior to her involvement with Boehm. Disclosing Allen's name would serve only to confuse the issues and result in "waste of time," he argued.

Still, the unsealed court documents leave one question unanswered: Why did Russo ask Anchorage Police detective Kevin Vandegriff to back off investigating Allen in 2004 over his alleged relationship with Tyree?

Documents filed by Kott's lawyer show Vangedriff was advised in March 2004 "to not actively investigate the case as it might interfere with a federal investigation involving Allen and Boehm."

By then Boehm had already been indicted (January 2004), a former mistress of Allen's had reported Allen's relationship with Tyree to police, and within one month (April 2004) the FBI was debriefing at least one witness in the political corruption probe.

In an interview last week, Russo said that during spring 2004 he wanted to make sure that any investigation of Allen focused on looking for connections to the larger sex and drug case related to Boehm. A single statutory rape allegation was outside the scope of the larger case at hand, he added.

As for any crossover between the Boehm case and the corruption probe, Russo said that in spring 2004 his office had no knowledge of any federal investigations of Allen, including the corruption probe that was about to gain steam later that same year.

Alaska Ear
The divine appendage

(10/24/09 21:27:23)

A FUGUE STATE ... Darlings, were you as amused as Ear by news that Bill Allen wanted his sentencing postponed so he could get credit for helping a special prosecutor go after the regular prosecutors who roped him in and aimed him at Uncle Ted? Is it very wrong for the Divine Appendage to imagine a courtroom moment when Bill testifies against the regular prosecutors -- his former handlers -- and they argue that he's an untrustworthy witness, a corrupt liar with possible brain damage whose testimony should not be believed?

Whenever Ear is tempted to feel sorry for Allen (on the third Tuesday of every month with an X in it), he does something to remind us that the rest of the corrupt bastards might be suffering, but the man who financed their corruption is still rich and free. Like reportedly strutting his stuff earlier this month at the latest Barrett-Jackson collectible car auction in Las Vegas, snapping up maybe 30 old cars for, what, $1 million plus? Ear didn't see it, but several earwigs say they caught Bill all over the live feed, where announcers were still asking, "Who is that guy?"

THE RIGHT BOOKS ... In a rather quixotic move for them, The Nation magazine is publishing a book of essays about Sarah Palin on Nov. 17, the same day Sarah's book "Going Rogue: An American Life" goes on sale. The Nation book is called "Going Rouge (not a typo): An American Nightmare" and has a cover very much like Sarah's tome. It features opinion pieces by progressive writers like Naomi Klein and Jim Hightower.

That's interesting, but here's the really cool part: Among the more than 20 noted writers invited to contribute are our own political bloggers Shannyn Moore (shannynmoore.wordpress.com) and Jeanne Devon (themudflats.net). Don't know about you, but Ear is totally impressed.

A FEW QUESTIONS ... Is Sen. Tom Wagoner, a Kenai Republican currently in the minority, negotiating to join the Senate majority?

... Is Gov. Parnell hiring the Connecticut consultant who ran Gabrielle LeDoux's congressional campaign to run his re-election campaign? And if so, why?

... Is Frank Bailey the only ex- Palin aide writing a book? Are several collaborating on a tell-all called "the View from Under the Bus?" (Ear assumes this one's a joke).

ON THE MOVE ... Earwigs report former Anchorage School Board president Jake Metcalf has replaced John Cyr as executive director of the Public Safety Employees Association, the troopers' union. Cyr became one of the best known union leaders in the state during the Troopergate flap.

-- Anchorage prosecutor John Skidmore, currently waiting for a verdict in the Sammy Cohen trial, will take over the top job in OSPA -- the state Office of Special Prosecutions and Appeals. He replaces Monica Janicek, who returns to the special assistant's job she held under Talis Colberg, this time for The Other Dan Sullivan, our invisible attorney general who, BTW, has been less invisible lately.

FBI - Stevens-2582

HOPE SPRINGS ETERNAL ... Rep, Harry Crawford, the latest Democrat seized by the unfathomable desire to throw himself against Don Young's unshakeable majority in next year's election, was reported back in D.C. this past week, making the rounds, lining up support.

True, that stuff in Bill Allen's motion to delay his sentencing that hints at legal problems waiting in the wings for Darling Don looks encouraging to opponents, but after what happened to Ted, Ear seriously doubts Alaskans will throw Don out even if he gets convicted of something.

OUT AND ABOUT ... Maybe. A couple of earmites claim to have seen Sarah tooling around her sister Molly's neighborhood recently in a big new yellow Dodge Ram pick-up. But the reported vanity plate raises doubts, with Ear anyhow: DRTDVA.

Dirt diva? Does that sound like She-who-was-governor?

One of the spotters suggested DRMAQN would be more convincing.

MYSTERY TUNE ... Well, maybe not so much. "Hurricane Dave," a local musician, has written and produced a song titled "Please Don't Ask Me About Her." He won't say who it might be about, but it's got lines like: "our love was a bridge to nowhere," and "she left me in the middle of our song."

"It's a country song about love gone bad," is how he puts it.

NEW NORTH STAR ... Have you seen the new Mariah Carey commercial for AT&T? Actually, Mariah is hardly in it. The character, dubbed "the assistant" by the ad agency, is the real star. And he is played by actor Dan Bittner, son of Anchorage lawyer Bill Bittner and nephew of Catherine Stevens. The kid looks like he's on his way. Ear is told he lives in NYC and has a part in the just released Jamie Foxx flick, "Law Abiding Citizen."

JUST KIDDING ... Ear is hurt not to have been invited to the Boss's Day bash at the Department of Law, criminal division's Anchorage office, pulled together by the secretaries. It was a "Woodstock" theme party, office neighbors report, featuring tie-dyed tee shirts, headbands, fake marijuana plants and goodie bags with drug paraphernalia and blotter acid -- also fake, Ear assumes.

FAMILIAR FACE ... Was that our Michael O'Callaghan, front and center in an Oregonian newspaper photo, camped in front of Portland City Hall, protesting an anti-homeless law that bans unauthorized camping. Yes, it was, although they apparently call him "Mike" in Oregon.

Prosecutors seek 46-month sentence for Bill Allen

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com
(10/21/09 22:00:32)

Former Veco chief executive Bill Allen should be sentenced to just fewer than four years in prison and fined $750,000 for his role as Alaska's corrupter in chief, federal prosecutors say.

"The actions of Bill Allen were corrupt, sustained, and damaging to the integrity of the legislative process," prosecutors said.

The government's recommendation was filed late Wednesday, a week before Allen and another Veco executive involved in a wide-ranging corruption scheme, Rick Smith, are due to be sentenced on their 2007 guilty pleas to conspiracy, bribery and tax charges.

The two men worked extensively with the FBI and prosecutors, giving detailed evidence in multiple debriefings about their illegal activities and making recorded phone calls at the government's request in an effort to elicit admissions from politicians. They also testified at trials.

Smith, once Veco's vice president and its unofficial lobbyist, should be dealt a 42-month prison sentence and a fine of $7,500 to $75,000, prosecutors recommended in a separate filing Wednesday.

Lawyers for Allen and Smith are asking for significantly lighter prison sentences and fines. The sentencing recommendations were accompanied by dozens of pages of documents filed by prosecutors and defense attorneys. Some of those documents revealed long-secret evidence involving U.S. Rep. Don Young, who has been known for more than two years to be under investigation by federal authorities.

In a 2007 "confession of additional criminal activity," signed a few days before he pleaded guilty, Allen spoke of 13 years worth of gift-giving by him and Smith to "United States Representative A," a thinly veiled reference to Young, as well as former Alaska U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

Prosecutors described those efforts by Allen and Smith as an effort "to corruptly influence and reward two federal public officials for official action beneficial to VECO."

"For instance, in or around June, 2006, Smith obtained a set of golf clubs, costing approximately $1,000, that Smith gave to United States Representative A. Smith used Allen's credit card."

Allen, 72, and Smith, 64, also admitted breaking federal campaign finance laws on Young's behalf, using corporate funds to pay the expenses of a yearly fund-raiser from 1993 to 2006. The illegal corporate donations were not reported.

"Each year, Allen and Smith arranged for the purchase of catering expenses, liquor, equipment rentals, and other associated costs," Allen's confession said. "These expenses were paid using Veco's corporate funds, and amounted to approximately $10,000 to $15,000 each year." The total spent by Veco over the years was between $130,000 and $195,000.

Young has issued general denials of wrongdoing, but has refused to answer specific questions from the news media about the corruption investigation. He has reported spending more than $1 million in campaign funds on attorneys' fees over the last two years.

Most of the admissions in Allen's 2007 confession concern Stevens and were aired in Stevens' month-long trial in 2008 that resulted in a guilty verdict on all seven counts. But Stevens' charges were dismissed earlier this year when the Justice Department admitted it failed to turn over favorable evidence to Stevens' defense team.

In making their sentencing recommendations, prosecutors said they were not taking into consideration Allen's crimes involving Stevens and Young, only the state legislators mentioned in Allen's 2007 charging document. Illegal payments to state officials total "just over $395,000" between 2002 and 2006.

Not all of that money was pure bribes -- payments for specific legislative action -- prosecutors said. But all of it was used by Allen to purchase influence, they said.

"The defendant was the pivotal figure in a conspiracy that lasted from 2002 to 2006, which included a series of corrupt acts that were designed to, and did, influence the Alaska legislature, particularly during and around its 24th Session in 2006," prosecutors said. "In sum, defendant Allen, representing VECO, curried favor with various state and federal legislators and awarded them with cash and other items of value so they would be favorably disposed toward voting for legislation that was of interest to VECO and the oil industry."

But the 46-month sentence recommended for Allen by prosecutors is substantially less than the six-year sentence former Rep. Pete Kott got on his conviction for accepting illegal payment in the thousands of dollars from Allen. Former Rep. Vic Kohring got 42 months for even less.

Still, Allen and Smith assert the government is being too harsh.

"Mr. Allen deeply regrets his actions and cooperated with the government to the best of his ability," Allen's lawyer wrote in a filing Wednesday. Allen should only get six months in prison and six months of community service, he said, and a fine of $150,000. Smith's attorneys are asking for a year and a day in prison for their client and 100 hours of community service.

Alaska Ear
The divine appendage

(10/31/09 21:44:12)

TIME ON HIS HANDS ... Well, darlings, it's done. The corrupter gets three years in a federal summer camp. And a fine he probably had in his wallet during his sentencing in federal court Wednesday. Ear agrees Bill Allen is less culpable than those guys we elected, the ones who promised to be honest and represent us, then sold us out. Still, Ear finds Allen annoying -- all that conspicuous consumption and hobnobbing with C List celebs. Being a felon isn't what it used to be.

There were numerous Allen family sightings around town in the days before the sentencing. One earwig spotted Mark, owner of this year's Kentucky Derby winner, at the Pantry restaurant in the lobby of the Captain Cook with his "get-out-of-jail-free card" -- Daddy Bill. Another caught the whole gang, including Mark in his black cowboy hat, at a big-table dinner Saturday night at the Corsair.

A bunch of Allen family and friends were in the courtroom Wednesday, but, unlike most such events, the FBI agents who put the corruption case together were noticeably absent. Guess they were busy.

Among the "media" present was blogger Dennis Zaki, who likes to cut through the high grass. As one reporter tells it, Allen's bodyguard had to save Zaki from Mark after Zaki -- video camera in position -- asked questions like, "How does it feel to know your father corrupted Alaska?" and "How does it feel to be the guy who wanted to kill Dave Anderson (his cousin)?" Or words to that effect. Over the top? Check out the video at www.alaskareport.com.

Ear loves political theater, but when the sentencing was over, the big questions remained unanswered: What about Ben? What about Don?

PSSSST ... Want a super deal on Sarah's book, the one that hasn't even been released yet? A local activist got an offer in the mail recently from Newsmax magazine: $4.97, compared to the list price of $28.99. And you get a free introductory subscription to the magazine with it. And who was the activist who got this special offer? Andree McLeod.

Doncha just love it?

'TIS THE SEASON ... The Omniscient Orifice suspects several hundred people had to consult Google Maps to find the Crowne Plaza Hotel, the location of Gov. Parnell's kickoff fundraiser Tuesday. (Do you know where it is?)

Ear wonders how guests who dropped $500 to get in felt about the no-host bar, but there was plenty of finger food and the crowd seemed to be in a good mood. Seen munching and crunching: Providence CEO Al Parish, former Gov. Bill Sheffield, Palinista photog Judy Patrick, former School Board member Macon Roberts, Rep. Craig Johnson and a gaggle of the usual lobbyists. Oddly, no commissioners were spotted. Maybe earwigs just missed them.

Rep. Don Young on Thursday would not talk about new court filings that for the first time directly tie him to the Alaska corruption investigation through gifts and illegal campaign contributions by Bill Allen and his oil-field service company Veco Corp.

"Don't bother me, don't bother me," Young said, with a wave of his hand, when asked by a reporter about the court filings as he entered the Alaska Federation of Natives convention.

The documents were filed late Wednesday as part of the preparations for the sentencing next week of former Veco chief Bill Allen, who is at the heart of the investigation into corruption in Alaska politics.

It included a 2007 "confession of additional criminal activity," made public for the first time in filings Wednesday, in which Allen alleged 13 years worth of gift-giving by him and fellow Veco executive Rick Smith to "United States Representative A," described as Alaska's representative in the House. Only Don Young fits that description.

Allen's confession said Veco spent between $130,000 and $195,000 on illegal corporate donations to Young by paying for his annual "pig roast" fundraiser in Anchorage from 1993 to 2006.

Another example offered in the same document signed by Allen in May 2007 was a gift of $1,000 golf clubs which prosecutors said Smith purchased with Allen's credit card for Young.

Young reported no gifts on his disclosure forms from 1995 until last year, when he disclosed $77,000 in donations that he received for his legal defense fund.

It was lack of disclosure on those same forms that led the Justice Department to indict then-Alaska Republican Sen. Ted Stevens on corruption charges also related to Veco. A jury convicted Stevens, but those charges were withdrawn earlier this year by the Justice Department after defense attorneys questioned the way prosecutors and the FBI handled witnesses and evidence.

Young was at the AFN convention in Anchorage Thursday to speak and attend a ceremony honoring his wife of more than 46 years, who died in August. Lu Young, a Gwich'in Athabascan from Fort Yukon, was lovingly recalled by Native leaders and her family as a mother, friend and advocate for her people.

The congressman appeared deeply touched throughout much of the morning, weeping during the speeches honoring his wife.

Young was warmly received at the convention, with no mention of the legal issues that have followed him for over two years without charges being filed.

Prosecutors wrote in a separate sentencing document filed Wednesday in Allen's case that the former Veco chief "curried favor with various state and federal legislators and awarded them with cash and other items of value so they would be favorably disposed toward voting for legislation that was of interest to Veco and the oil industry." Young's lawyer in Washington D.C., John Dowd, did not return a phone call or an e-mail regarding the latest filings.

There have been some media accounts tying Young to Allen and Veco, but the documents filed Wednesday were the first time that information came directly from government documents.

Harry Crawford, an Anchorage Democratic state representative running against Young for Congress in next year's election, questioned why charges have not been filed.

"I guess you get the kind of justice you can afford," Crawford said. "He's been taking campaign contributions and paying for the best legal help that you can find."

Since early 2007, Young has spent more than $1.2 million from his campaign account and legal expense fund on lawyer bills connected to federal investigations of his fundraising and other matters.

Former Anchorage state Rep. Andrew Halcro, who plans to run against Young in next summer's Republican primary, said he's not running because of legal issues but that the latest filings "just kind of add more context to the fact that maybe it is time for a change."

Young has said he did not do anything wrong. But he has consistently refused to discuss details of what's going on, saying that's on the advice of his lawyers.

Young won re-election last year despite the legal bills, barely winning the Republican primary and going on to beat Democrat Ethan Berkowitz by 16,379 votes.

An FBI spokesman in Anchorage, Eric Gonzalez, would not comment on Young, citing the agency's policy of refusing to talk about ongoing investigations.

Masek starts her term at California desert prison

SIX MONTHS: Ex-legislator was convicted in corruption probe.

Anchorage Daily News / adn.com

(11/11/09 21:17:02)

Former Alaska state Rep. Beverly Masek began serving her six-month prison sentence this week at the minimum-security Federal Correctional Institution-Victorville in Adelanto, Calif.

The prison camp for women is in the desert south of Barstow and about 85 miles northeast of Los Angeles. A medium-security facility for men is in the same U.S. Bureau of Prisons complex.

Masek, 46, a Republican who served five terms in the Legislature from Willow, pleaded guilty to a felony charge of bribery conspiracy for accepting more than $4,000 in illegal payments from former Veco Corp. Chief Executive Bill Allen and his son Mark. She was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Ralph Beistline in September.

She is now one of only two felons convicted in the federal corruption investigation in Alaska to be behind bars. The other is former Rep. Tom Anderson of Anchorage, who is at a federal prison camp in Sheridan, Ore., with a release date of April 9, 2012.

Two other former legislators, Pete Kott and Vic Kohring, are free while they appeal their 2007 convictions. Allen and a former Veco vice president, Rick Smith, have been sentenced but do not yet have spaces assigned in the federal prison system, according to the Bureau of Prisons. Allen got three years and Smith 21 months.

Eleven people in all have pleaded guilty or have been found guilty by juries in the investigation, while a twelfth is scheduled to be tried in Anchorage next September.

Kott's attorney requests judge reject 'no-harm' argument

Anchorage Daily News / adn.com
Published: November 4th, 2009 09:53 PM
Last Modified: November 5th, 2009 07:54 AM

The attorney for former Rep. Pete Kott asked a judge Wednesday to reject a Justice Department argument that no harm was done when favorable evidence was withheld from Kott at his trial. Sheryl Gordon McCloud, Kott's appeals attorney, said that if the judge refuses to dismiss charges against Kott or grant him a new trial, he should allow a special evidentiary hearing for her to question Justice Department officials about why the evidence was withheld.

Kott was convicted of corruption charges in 2007, but was released from prison in June when prosecutors acknowledged they failed to turn over favorable evidence. In a brief last month, they argued that the withheld material was insignificant.

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick will hear arguments on the issues Nov. 14. He hasn't said when he will make his ruling.

Weyhrauch case goes to Supreme Court

FRAUD: Question involves "honest services" officials owe to citizens.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(12/06/09 22:57:12)

WASHINGTON -- A case with roots in the Alaska political corruption investigation has worked its way up to the U.S. Supreme Court, which this week will take a look at it and another case in which an anti-corruption statute is now in question.

The Supreme Court on Tuesday will be looking at a narrow piece of former Alaska Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch's pending criminal case: whether prosecutors need to prove that Weyhrauch violated a state disclosure law to gain a conviction on federal mail-fraud statutes. Weyhrauch's case has not yet gone to trial.

The high court will be looking at the use of the 28-word "honest services fraud" statute adopted by Congress in 1988. The law governing such fraud is often used in the cases of public officials where federal prosecutors can't prove they accepted bribes -- but where they have enough evidence to show that those officials took freebies such as tickets or jobs.

The statute is based on the idea that people are entitled to the honest services of elected officials and executives in charge of big companies. But it often has very liberal applications, said Shana Regon, director of white collar crime policy at the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, which filed a friend of the court brief in the case.

"The statute is 28 words, and no one knows what it means," Regon said.

Weyhrauch's case landed at the Supreme Court after the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled against him and his case came to the attention of several high-profile criminal defense attorneys concerned about abuse of the honest services statute. They contacted his attorney, Doug Pope of Anchorage, who began working with a team that includes a veteran of 17 Supreme Court arguments, Washington, D.C., attorney Don Ayer.

On Tuesday, Pope and attorney Ray Brown, also of Alaska, will sit at the counsel bench at the Supreme Court while Ayer argues the case.

"I feel good about getting the case there, that was the important thing," Pope said. "My view is that this case should never have been brought against Bruce."

Weyhrauch's case is one of three similar honest services fraud cases the justices have chosen to hear this year, as they take a look at how prosecutors have been interpreting the statute. Tuesday, they'll first hear the case of former newspaper magnate Conrad Black, whose 2007 conviction was based in part on the assertion he deprived his company of his honest services. Next year, they'll take a look at how the law was applied in the case of Jeffrey Skilling, former CEO of the now-bankrupt energy giant, Enron.

Weyhrauch's case involves much lower stakes, but also is probably more straightforward, Pope said.

"The law is the law, but you win and lose cases on the facts," Pope said. "And the facts are really good here."

Weyhrauch, a Juneau Republican, solicited legal work from the oil-field service company Veco Corp. at a time when Veco was pushing hard to win support for lower oil taxes in the state Legislature. Federal prosecutors said Weyhrauch should have disclosed his job search as a conflict of interest.

But Weyhrauch's attorneys argued that state law didn't specifically require such disclosure and as a result, the federal fraud statute couldn't be used to charge him with defrauding Alaskans of his "honest services."

A District Court judge in Alaska agreed with Weyhrauch, but the government appealed and won in the 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals. The appeals court sided with prosecutors, saying legislators had a duty to disclose such conflicts. The court reasoned that even if a state has weak ethics laws, it was no reason for its citizens to be deprived of the honest services of their public officials.

Other circuit courts, though, have made contradictory rulings, hence the Supreme Court's willingness to step in to clear up the confusion.

Even some former federal prosecutors question the use of honest services fraud in corruption cases. Often, they use honest services fraud because it reduces the burden of proof prosecutors must meet, said Richard Craig Smith, a former federal prosecutor who now heads up the white collar crime practice at Fulbright & Jaworski in Washington, D.C.

Speaking at a seminar on the matter held last week by the Washington Legal Foundation, Smith said that it is difficult for prosecutors to prove bribery.

"Who wants to prove a quid pro quo?" he said. "Who wants that burden of really proving corrupt intent when you can simply say, 'he had a duty, he breached your duty, therefore he should be guilty.'"

But Smith acknowledges that he is "kind of torn" on the subject. Prosecutors have used the law to prosecute people in places where state law is weak and there is clear evidence of wrongdoing on the part of people in power.

"When you have the inability or lack of political will by state and local officials to address a corruption problem in their community," he said, "this statute allows the government to get its hands around it."

Alaska Ear
The divine appendage

(11/28/09 19:35:21)

PAGE 102 . . . Darlings, Ear really is trying to resist Sarah items, being personally sick of them, but the suction is irresistible. For instance, Slate, the online magazine, is publishing excerpts from "Going Rogue," including what they have labeled the book's single worst sentence.

It's strictly a matter of opinion of course, but Ear finds their choice eminently cringeworthy:

"As the soles of my shoes hit the soft ground, I pushed past the tall cottonwood trees in a euphoric cadence, and meandered through willow branches that the moose munched on."

"Euphoric cadence?" Ecstatic Ear would like a hit of whatever she's using. Anyhow, you can try your hand at purple prose and enter Slate's "Write like Sarah Palin" contest.

STARWATCH, NOT . . . In case you missed the "Entertainment Tonight" report, Levi Johnston reportedly had Thanksgiving dinner at the home of his attorney and agent, Rex Butler, with the cameras rolling.

How long do we think it will take for outlets like "Entertainment Tonight" to turn on Levi?

THE SUM OF ALL THINGS . . . It's admittedly early, and Ear is obviously biased in favor of Our Favorite Good Morning Newspaper, but a headline on www.adn.com Wednesday summed up 2009 in a way unlikely to be topped:

"Poll: Public wants more health care coverage, less Palin"

THE WHOLE TRUTH . . . When Uncle Ted was in the Senate, he had long coattails. And now that he's a former felon, he still has a long reach.

Recently, in a pretty routine meth/gun case, federal prosecutors in Anchorage -- seeming a little woebegone according to one earwig -- carefully questioned prospective jurors about whether the behavior of other federal prosecutors in the Stevens corruption case would prejudice them against the government.

You'll remember that prosecution misconduct led to dismissal of Ted's conviction and to an ongoing investigation of the people who charged him.

Anyhow, juror response was all over the board. One lady said she'd have to listen really carefully to the prosecution's claims. A bunch nodded in agreement but a few hailed the feds for taking Stevens down and said it should have happened years ago.

When the trial was over, the defendant was acquitted on the major counts, convicted on a minor charge.

GO WEST YOUNG BREW . . . A returning junketer reports there's a sign in the window of an unoccupied commercial space in Kona that says Humpy's of Alaska is coming soon. The alehouse's Web site says its Kailua-Kona bar could open as soon as January.

ONE FOR THE HOME TEAM . . . People with letters after their names say Bernice Joseph, vice chancellor at UAF, is one of the finalists for president of Alaska's most invisible university, APU. She's the only finalist from Alaska. Of course, Bernice currently manages five or six rural colleges and may not be attracted by an offer to run just one campus.

RSVP. . . Local activist Chris Constant is organizing a "training" campaign aimed at electing an openly gay or lesbian candidate to office. In its 50-year history, Alaska has certainly had more than one gay or lesbian legislator or assembly member, but apparently none who was out of the closet.

Anyhow, Ear noticed the press release about a fundraiser Monday because it came with a request that supporters send an invitation to Jim Minnery of the anti-gay Alaska Family Council.

Hey, folks. Better be careful. He might show up.

OUT AND ABOUT . . . It was a dark and stormy night in Port Hadlock, Wash., last Saturday. Simon Lisiecki, a former BP vice president here, now learning a new trade at the North West School of Wooden Boat Building, was dining with his wife, Petra, Anchorage Rep. Mike Doogan and his wife, Kathy. They chose the Ajax Cafe for its seafood, not for the funny hats it encourages customers to wear.

The four of them were enjoying a quiet, hatless meal when a large group arrived, headed by none other than Anchorage radio ranter Eddie Burke, who was soon wearing a hat earwigs described as a black clown wig.

Now, Port Hadlock is a tiny burgh on the Olympic Peninsula. It's not the end of the world but, like Fairbanks, you can see nowhere from there.

Supreme Court hears Weyhrauch arguments

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

FBI - Stevens-2595

(12/08/09 14:28:41)

WASHINGTON -- One of the attorneys urging the U.S. Supreme Court to strike down an anti-corruption statute told the justices on Tuesday that the law used in the case against a former Alaska lawmaker is "vague, amorphous," and "open-ended."

"Essentially," attorney Miguel Estrada said, it is "not very helpful."

The justices -- who heard two related honest services fraud cases Tuesday and will hear a third, similar case next year - appeared to agree. Prosecutors are "all over the place" in their application of the law in corruption cases, said Justice Antonin Scalia.

"And if the Justice Department can't figure out what is embraced by this statute," he said, "I don't know how you can expect the average citizen to figure it out."

The Supreme Court is taking a look at three cases in which prosecutors made use of the 28-word "honest services fraud" statute adopted by Congress in 1988.

The first case, an appeal by the newspaper magnate Conrad Black, focused on the law's application in cases against executives who defraud shareholders. The other, the federal case against former Alaska Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, focused on how the law is used as a weapon against corrupt political figures. The court will take a look next year at how the law was applied in the case of Jeffrey Skilling, former CEO of the now-bankrupt energy giant Enron.

Prosecutors often use the honest services fraud law to go after public officials and executives when they can't prove they accepted bribes -- but where they have enough evidence to show that those officials deprived their constituents or stockholders of their "honest services" by accepting freebies or engaging in self-dealing that lined their own pockets while on someone else's payroll.

In Weyhrauch's case, the court is considering whether prosecutors need to prove the former Juneau Republican violated a state disclosure law to gain a conviction on federal mail-fraud statutes. Weyhrauch's case hasn't yet gone to trial.

The attorney for the government, Deputy Solicitor General Michael Dreeben, told the justices that in Weyhrauch's case, the government aims to prove that the residents of Alaska were entitled to the former lawmaker's honest services. Officeholders are well aware they live in a "dual system in which citizens are governed by and accountable both by their states and by the federal government," Dreeben said.

He acknowledged to the justices that in some cases, the "core understanding of what honest services is may have been strayed from," but added that it "doesn't mean that the statute is vague."

But Justice Alito posed the question: Don't lawmakers have to vote on "all sorts of things that have an impact on their own financial interests or the financial interests of their family or associates," such as tax codes?

"Don't you need some kind of a disclosure code to separate the things that have to be disclosed from the things that don't have to be disclosed, because they are just too common?" Alito asked.

-1046

Federal prosecutors allege Weyhrauch solicited legal work from the oil-field service company Veco Corp. at a time when Veco was pushing hard to win support for lower oil taxes in the state Legislature. Federal prosecutors said Weyhrauch should have disclosed his job search as a conflict of interest.

Weyhrauch's attorneys argued that state law didn't specifically require such disclosure and as a result, the federal fraud statute couldn't be used to charge him with defrauding Alaskans of his "honest services."

A District Court judge in Alaska agreed with Weyhrauch, but the government appealed and won in the 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals. The appeals court sided with prosecutors, saying legislators had a duty to disclose such conflicts. The court reasoned that even if a state has weak ethics laws, it was no reason for its citizens to be deprived of the honest services of their public officials.

In court Tuesday, Weyhrauch's attorney, Don Ayer of Washington, D.C., argued to the justices that there was absolutely no duty for his client to disclose his job search under state law.

"He is a part-time legislator in a state that has a citizen legislature that has made a decision specifically not to have its disclosure rules be unduly burdensome," Ayer said. "That's their own specific language. They don't want them to be unduly burdensome. They have required certain disclosures. They have not required others."

Both of Weyhrauch's Alaska attorneys said they were pleased with the direction the case appeared to be headed on Tuesday, based on the questions asked by the justices. If the Supreme Court decides in their favor, his lawyers said they expect the rest of the case against Weyhrauch to disintegrate quickly.

"There is no evidence," Ray Brown, one of Weyhrauch's lawyers, said in front of the Supreme Court Tuesday once the arguments had concluded.

"The evidence that we confronted the government over, a couple of weeks before trial, was a videotape that they'd taken, where they allege that the deal was made," said Doug Pope, another of Weyhrauch's attorneys. "And once they produced it and we looked at it, there was no deal on the videotape. So tell me where they're going to get the evidence."

Several cases in a wide-ranging federal corruption probe into Alaska politics began falling apart this year during the trial of former Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska. Stevens, who was convicted in late 2008 of filing false financial disclosure forms, saw his indictment dismissed after defense attorneys questioned the way that prosecutors and the FBI handled witnesses and evidence in Stevens' case and others.

In two related cases, former Alaska state lawmakers Pete Kott and Vic Kohring were freed from prison in June when the government acknowledged they may not have gotten fair trials because favorable evidence was withheld from them. But prosecutors now say the favorable evidence wasn't material to their cases and have argued that their convictions should stand. The matter is before a federal district judge in Anchorage.

In Stevens' case, the Justice Department acknowledged that it had failed to share with the former senator's lawyers notes from an interview with the prosecution's key witness. Those notes contradicted the witness's trial testimony and could have been favorable to Stevens at trial.

Pope said his true thoughts on Weyhrauch's case were unprintable, "because I would use some bad language."

"This case should never have been brought because they didn't have the evidence," he said. "It was brought because some very ambitious prosecutors - who revealed their true side in the Stevens case -- thought that they had a theory that they could prevail on in trial. That's the reason we're here, right in front of the U.S. Supreme Court."

Based on questions the justices raised about the Skilling case, both Brown and Pope said they expect the court to rule on the Weyhrauch and Black cases after the Supreme Court hears the former Enron executive's case next year.

Alleged cover-up cuts into Allen credibility

CORRUPTION INVESTIGATION: Lawyer says juries should know if star witness tried to hide relationships with underage girls.

(7)

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com
(12/13/09 22:24:35)

Anchorage resident Lisa Moore says she traded sex with then-Veco boss Bill Allen in 1996 for an apartment, money and jewelry. He was 59; she was 19.

She also says she introduced him to a 15-year-old girl who became his sex partner.

But the next year, an ex-boyfriend of Moore's got into legal trouble and threatened to blow the whistle on Allen's relationship with Moore and other teens, including the 15-year-old, Moore said, triggering a string of alleged cover-ups that now threaten to undermine the Alaska political corruption investigation.

Allen's conduct with that underage girl and at least one other has been the subject of an active Anchorage police investigation since 2008. That inquiry developed more urgency last spring when a prosecutor with the Justice Department's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section joined local detectives in the case and began traveling to Anchorage to interview witnesses, including a visit just last week.

But long before the authorities got involved, Allen reportedly went to great lengths to keep his sexual activities secret. When Moore told Allen she expected to be called as a witness at her ex-boyfriend's trial and forced to reveal Allen's seamy and possibly criminal private life, Allen immediately sent her, her brother and her fiance on the lam to California to prevent her from being subpoenaed, Moore told an Anchorage police detective and elaborated in recent interviews with the Daily News.

That trip, characterized as a "potential obstruction of justice" when first made public in a federal court filing last month, are among the issues cited by former state House Speaker Pete Kott in his effort to throw out his conviction on corruption charges. Allen was a key witness in Kott's case, but Kott's lawyers weren't told by prosecutors about the California trip, which could have undermined Allen's credibility under cross-examination by a defense attorney.

Kott's lawyer has also said Allen's credibility could have been challenged by other allegations that were known by the government at the time of Kott's trial but only recently revealed to the defense. Among them: new details about assertions by the underaged girl, Bambi Tyree, now 28, that she lied under oath about her relationship with Allen at Allen's request, and that Moore was asked by Allen's attorney to swear that Allen did not have sex with Tyree when she was 15, even though she said she observed it.

Allen has told FBI agents he never asked anyone to lie under oath or tried to hide witnesses to avoid subpoenas. Messages left with his attorney in Anchorage this week weren't returned.

DISCREDITING INFORMATION FBI - Stevens-2597

Allen, after pleading guilty in 2007 to bribery and other corruption charges, was also the key witness in the trials of former state Rep. Vic Kohring and U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens. Stevens' charges were thrown out in April after his conviction. Kott and Kohring are saying they were likewise unfairly tried, and have been released from prison while their cases are sorted out. All said that prosecutors failed to provide them with discrediting information they knew about Allen and other witnesses as required by law.

For instance, in a letter to Stevens' defense team on the eve of his trial in 2008, prosecutors asserted "the government is aware of no evidence to support any suggestion that Allen asked the 'other female' (Tyree) to make a false statement under oath." But in 2004, Tyree told a federal prosecutor and an FBI agent from Alaska precisely that, and Allen's attorney admitted in a 2004 letter to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Anchorage that he had the statement in his files, though he refused to turn it over.

Defense attorneys in the corruption cases weren't allowed to raise the issue of Allen's sexual conduct. The judges in those cases agreed with prosecution arguments that even if Allen had a sexual relationship with a 15-year-old girl, a felony under state law, it was irrelevant to whether he gave bribes and illegal gifts to public officials. Just mentioning such a sensational allegation could inflame the jury against Allen and divert attention from the evidence, the judges ruled.

But the new material raises questions about how far Allen would go to protect himself. If Allen schemed to prevent a witness from testifying about his sexual conduct or tried to get two witnesses to lie under oath, that could give defense attorneys new ammunition to attack his credibility.

Kott's attorney is already making those arguments after reviewing the new material.

"It showed prior acts of criminality, and it showed Bill Allen's desperate attempts to convince his victims to lie to protect him," Sheryl Gordon McCloud said in her motion to dismiss the charges or at least get a new trial. "Its newly released documents contain allegations and evidence that Bill Allen committed a multitude of primarily sex crimes against children, and that he sought to have them swear that he never committed such acts."

The six prosecutors in the Stevens case, including the four who tried Kott and Kohring, are under investigation for criminal contempt by a special prosecutor appointed by Stevens' trial judge. The Washington Post reported Dec. 3 that the special prosecutor will wrap up his investigation over the next two months with interviews of the prosecutors.

Moore, now 32, originally told her story in 2004 to Anchorage police, the FBI and prosecutors in the Anchorage U.S. Attorney's office. She and her mother said they were led to believe that Allen would be prosecuted for sexual abuse of a minor or federal child exploitation violations. When nothing happened, Moore said in the interview, she figured Allen was so powerful he could avoid prosecution.

But the case against Allen remains active. Moore said she has met several times in Anchorage with the Washington-based trial attorney in the Justice Department's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section, which specializes in sex crimes involving minors.

Last month, Allen was sentenced to three years in prison on his bribery plea, though he remains free while the U.S. Bureau of Prisons determines where he will go.

With Allen headed to prison, Moore said she is more comfortable talking about him than before.

ALASKA POWERHOUSE

FBI - Stevens-2598

In March 1997, the Anchorage Chamber of Commerce hailed Allen as one of the five most powerful individuals in Alaska. Allen was the only person on that list not holding elective office (the other four were Stevens, Sen. Frank Murkowski, Gov. Tony Knowles and Anchorage Mayor Rick Mystrom).

Allen regularly socialized with the state's top political and business leaders. He was the oil industry's most visible advocate, a power broker in Juneau and a major fundraiser for state and national Republicans. The chamber took note of the help he provided presidential aspirant Sen. Bob Dole and said his role as publisher of the Voice of the Times, his opinion section in the Daily News, "enhanced his credibility in Alaska."

A picture dated 1999 shows Allen with Rita Ivanova, a Russian woman he dated, at Murkowski's annual fishing event in Ketchikan. Allen is at the center of the picture, his arm draped around Ivanova, and on either side are Sens. Thad Cochran, R-Miss., Rep. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., Murkowski, Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, Sen. Kit Bond, R-Mo., and Sen. Don Nickles, R-Okla.

Allen's power and access continued to grow. He and Stevens, the most senior Republican in the Senate, would rendezvous at a desert resort in Arizona for annual "boot camps" where they would forswear whiskey and beer, eat healthy and take long walks to shed extra pounds.

In 2000, Allen began renovating Stevens' Girdwood home, a multi-year project that cost him and Veco about $250,000 -- and which Stevens, limited by Senate rules to accepting no more than about $300 a year in gifts, failed to disclose.

As active as his public life was, Allen's private life, by Moore's description, looked like a low-rent imitation of Playboy's Hugh Hefner.

Moore said she met Allen in September or October, 1996. Her roommate worked for a 24-hour escort service called Silk Stockings, and Allen, who was divorced, was a client, Moore said. She remembers the timing because it happened shortly after her own arrest for prostitution on Sept. 5, 1996. (Moore pleaded guilty and paid a $250 fine.)

The roommate called from Allen's house and asked Moore to pick her up.

"She said, 'You got to come in and see this guy's house,' " Moore recalled. "I was like, 'No, no, no,' and she was like, 'Just come on.' So I went in, met him, and he was like, 'Oh, I would just love to date you.' "

Moore said she wasn't interested in working as a prostitute after her arrest, and she told Allen no. But she said Allen kept calling her roommate.

"Just go out to eat with him," the roommate said. "He's the owner of Veco -- he's loaded."

FBI - Stevens-2599

Moore accepted a dinner date.

"What is it going to take to get you in bed?" Allen asked at the meal, Moore recalled.

"A lot," Moore said she responded.

"What's your motivation in life?" Allen asked.

"My whole goal in life right now is to get my own apartment, get a good job and get my daughter back," replied Moore, whose 3-year-old was living with her parents.

"By the next day, he had me in an apartment," Moore said. It was at the Castle Apartments on West 27th Avenue, a block and a half from Veco's then-headquarters on West Northern Lights Boulevard. The proximity allowed Allen to visit over lunch, she said.

Moore said Allen insisted she be monogamous with him and he promised the same with her. But that arrangement didn't last long, she said.

'TYREE MEETS ALLEN'

When she was 15, Moore was ordered to McLaughlin Youth Center after she stole her mother's credit card and used it to rent a limousine for the evening. One of the smartest, most streetwise girls at the juvenile hall was someone three years her junior, Bambi Tyree, Moore said. Tyree was especially adept at manipulating counselors, saying precisely what they wanted to hear at group sessions so she could do as she pleased at other times, Moore said. The girls became friends and continued the relationship after they got out.

When Moore moved into the Castle Apartments in 1996, Tyree, then 15, was struggling with a crack cocaine addiction and spending time at the home of Josef Boehm, the owner of Alaska Industrial Hardware, himself a cocaine addict, Moore said. Boehm, now 65 and in federal prison in Texas, was known to Tyree and other addicted girls as "Joe Millionaire" for the crack he traded for sex.

Moore said Allen was no friend of Boehm and strongly opposed illegal drug use. She thought Allen could help her friend Tyree by paying for her rehabilitation. Around October or November 1996, Moore introduced Allen to Tyree. A few days later, when she went to Allen's home on a "date," she brought Tyree, who wouldn't turn 16, the age of consent, until Dec. 17. The three had sex in Allen's hot tub, she said. Tyree stayed with her at the Castle Apartments, and would be there when Allen came over. There were times when Moore, Tyree and two other friends would join Allen in bed. Another time, Moore said, she witnessed a different friend who was 15 have oral sex with Allen in Allen's car.

Whenever Allen had sex with one of her friends, Moore said, he gave the friend $100 and Moore $500.

Allen knew Tyree was 15 because he helped her celebrate her 16th birthday, Moore said. Among the birthday and Christmas presents he handed Moore and Tyree were rings worth about $5,000 each, Moore said.

Moore's relationship with Allen began to sour in the spring of 1997. Tyree had moved out, and Moore found out Allen was still seeing Tyree behind her back.

"As long as I was there, or I knew about it, it wasn't that big of an issue," Moore said. But now it felt like Allen wasn't upholding his end of the bargain.

"The day I broke up with him, I was like, 'I don't want to see you any more, I'm done with you, you're a pervert!' is what I told him. The next day, there was an eviction notice on the door, my phone was already off and my cable -- and I'm like, why would you do that? You say you love me, you want to take care of me for the rest of my life, just because I get mad and break up with you because you're sleeping with a 15-year-old and all my other friends -- he slept with all of my friends, all of them."

'WHAT IF YOU GUYS LEFT THE STATE?'

Moore, still 19, began dating a man her own age, Aaron Pinsly. But then she learned that a different 15-year-old girl -- a runaway -- was staying at Pinsly's house and having sex with him. Moore called the cops. The girl was taken into custody at Pinsly's house.

A few weeks later, Anchorage police Det. Lorraine Shore persuaded the 15-year-old girl to call Pinsly to see if he would admit having had a sexual relationship with her. He did.

Pinsly was arrested July 31, 1997, for sexual abuse of a minor.

While Pinsly awaited trial, Moore said, she got a call from Shore looking for an address to serve her with a subpoena. Moore also got a call from Pinsly in jail.

"He was mad because he knew I was the one that called in -- I never hid that fact," Moore said. "He was like, 'If you go through with this and you testify against me, then I'm going to bring up everything that happened between you and Bill and I'll make a deal with them to testify against him.' "

Moore figured that Pinsly was trying to prevent her from testifying, a goal Allen seemed to share when she told him about Pinsly's threat, she said.

"What if you guys left the state?" Allen suggested, according to Moore. As he thought about it, he recommended she involve her brother Jeremy, who had a spotless criminal record and could pass a drug test for a new job. Jeremy could get the tickets, rent the hideout apartment, and provide support with a job.

"It was obstructing justice if you're avoiding a subpoena, so he put everything in my brother's name and we left the next day," Moore said.

"(Allen) told me I was the key to the whole thing," Jeremy Moore said in an interview.

Lisa Moore, by then 20, had an 18-year-old boyfriend, a man she would eventually marry. He went along as well. Jeremy Moore was 21.

Their destination would be Bakersfield, Calif., an oil town in the desert north of Los Angeles. As the payment for uprooting their lives, Allen promised them an apartment, a car and jobs on a drilling rig run by his brother, Roger Allen, Jeremy Moore said. Jeremy Moore quit his job at Walmart in Alaska, believing Allen that he'd be making $3,000 a month on the rig.

Jeremy Moore said Veco paid to fly them to Seattle; he said Allen identified them as Veco employees on expense documents. To reduce the chances of their destination being traced, he said, Allen gave them cash for bus tickets from there to Bakersfield. Allen was in Seattle when they got there, and met them in Bakersfield, he said.

Allen told them to not call any friends back in Alaska. He bought pagers for them to communicate with their mother in Anchorage.

Allen wasn't only concerned about legal issues, but also his reputation, Jeremy Moore said. "He even told me he'd be mortified if this ever got out into the papers," Jeremy Moore said.

But Roger Allen didn't have a job for him or Moore's fiance. And there was no car, only two mountain bikes. The house he got them was roach infested, Jeremy and Lisa said.

Instead of the rig, Jeremy Moore said, Allen got him work packing drilling mud at a Bakersfield company called GEO Drilling, a dusty, dirty job. Two weeks later, when his first paycheck showed he was making $8 an hour, less than he was making at Walmart, he quit, withdrew the money from the bank account Allen opened in his name, and flew home.

"Bill was really mad that I came back," Jeremy Moore said. His sister and her fiance abandoned the hideout after another month or two. They sold everything that Allen had bought them, bought train tickets to Seattle and flew from there to Anchorage.

When she ran into Allen a few days later, he was shocked they had returned, she said. "What the hell are you doing here?" he said, according to Lisa Moore.

Pinsly ended up not going to trial. Offered a plea bargain by the Anchorage district attorney's office, he pleaded guilty to a reduced charge of coercion and served about a year in prison, then moved to Las Vegas, where his mother and father live. He didn't respond to letters sent to him and his father by the Daily News.

Pinsly's 15-year-old victim is now married and living in the South. In a telephone interview, she said she knew that Moore had been Pinsly's girlfriend but didn't know Moore had turned her in and knew nothing about a threat from Pinsly to expose Allen. She also remembered Tyree from McLaughlin, but didn't know that Tyree was connected to the Pinsly case.

Shore, the detective, is retired and living in Washington state. She recalled Pinsly's case but said she investigated too many crimes to remember many of the details.

In their Sept. 9, 2008, pretrial disclosure letter to Sen. Stevens' lawyers, the Justice Department prosecutors characterized the 1997 Bakersfield trip this way:

"The adult female (Lisa Moore) also alleged that Allen provided her with a trip outside Alaska for the purpose of preventing the adult female to testify in an unspecified proceeding." When asked about the matter, the prosecutors continued, Allen "denied ever causing anyone to leave the state of Alaska to prevent testimony in any type of proceeding."

Two years after Bakersfield, Allen again tried to move Moore and her family out of state, this time paying $10,000 to get them all to Kennewick, Wash., Moore and her brother said. But that also didn't go well, and the family struggled to make ends meet. Moore's mother, Maryann Bright, said Allen had promised to buy the family a house but didn't. Lisa Moore and her mother returned to Alaska in June 1999 to ask Allen for more money.

"This man's up here, has all this money, living lavish, and we're down there like struggling our butts off to make it and we're there because he wants us there," Moore said. But Allen wouldn't give them anything and told them to talk to his attorney, she said.

Moore and Bright said the attorney offered them $5,000 if Moore would sign a sworn statement that Allen never had a sexual relationship with Tyree or any other underage girl.

Lisa Moore said she refused to sign. The money wasn't enough to buy her silence and conspire in perjury, nor would it pay their bills in Kennewick, she said. That same month, Tyree signed such a statement, according to an interview she gave to an FBI agent and an assistant U.S. Attorney in 2004.

In that interview, according to an FBI record given to Kott's lawyer and filed in his case, Tyree acknowledged having had sex with Allen when she was 15. (Tyree's name was blacked out in the filed document, though her identity was unmistakable.)

"(Tyree) previously signed a sworn affidavit claiming she did not have sex with Allen," according to the FBI agent's report of the 2004 interview, as filed in Kott's case. "(Tyree) was given the affidavit by Allen's attorney, and she signed it at Allen's request. (Tyree) provided false information on the affidavit because she cared for Allen and did not want him to get into trouble with the law."

THE BOEHM CASE

The matter lay dormant until early 2004, when details of a joint city-state investigation of Boehm, the cocaine-addicted hardware-store owner, emerged in a federal criminal case. Boehm, two cr ack dealers and Tyree, then 23, were charged with conspiracy to distribute cocaine to persons under 21 and multiple counts of sexual trafficking of children.

In media accounts of the case, Moore said, she thought Tyree was inappropriately characterized as a victim, not an active perpetrator. She called up one of Boehm's attorneys, Rex Butler, and left a message offering to provide information on Tyree.

Butler called back but said he didn't think he could use her information. A few days later, Moore said, she was visited by two FBI agents who asked her if she would cooperate in an investigation of Allen. She said she would.

On Feb. 10, 2004, they brought her to the FBI building, where she sat down with them and two Anchorage police detectives, including Det. Kevin Vandegriff, who also was involved in the Boehm case. Only Vandegriff's notes of the interview have emerged, filed last month in the Kott case. While all the names of witnesses and victims were blacked out in the report, Moore filled them in during an interview with the Daily News.

The report spans Moore's entire story, from how she met Tyree and Allen, her introduction of them to each other, the Bakersfield trip, and more. She said Vandegriff's report mischaracterized the affidavit she was asked to sign by Allen's lawyer. The report said she was asked to swear that she didn't have sex with Allen, while Allen's lawyer actually wanted her to say that she didn't observe an underage Tyree have sex with Allen, Moore said.

After that interview, she returned one more time to the FBI office, this time with her diary detailing her relationship with Allen, plane tickets and receipts for things he had bought her, photographs, and other evidence. Moore said she never got it back. In a later report, Vandegriff said it all disappeared.

The assistant U.S. attorney who attended the Moore interview and prosecuted the Boehm case, Frank Russo, has said he asked Vandegriff to suspend his investigation in 2004 to avoid being distracted in the complicated run-up to Boehm's trial. But in the end, there was no trial -- all the defendants pleaded guilty. No one has said why the Allen sex case continued to lay dormant even as he fell under suspicion, later in 2004, for the massive corruption of Alaska politics.

In September 2007, four months after Allen pleaded guilty to bribery, the Daily News began investigating his connection to Tyree. Around December, a little more than a month before the paper published its first story on the subject, Vandegriff reopened the Allen investigation. He left his card at every known residence where Moore had stayed. She found one of the cards and called him. On Jan. 2, 2008, she consented to a long videotaped interview with him, once again giving her whole story. A portion of that report was also filed in the Kott case last month.

In February 2008, Vandegriff and the FBI agent who had interviewed Moore in 2004, John Eckstein, searched through all the files from the Boehm case looking for Moore's diary and the other evidence, but came up empty, according to another report. Vandegriff also reported that an assistant U.S. attorney recalled seeing the material Moore brought in and thought it had been left for safekeeping with an FBI agent or police officer.

FBI - Stevens-2603

Months later, with the looming Stevens case hanging on Allen's credibility, the lead FBI agent, Mary Beth Kepner, held a Sunday interview session with her star witness. The notes of that Allen interview, as filed in the Kott case, show it was conducted Sept. 7, 2008, two weeks before Stevens' trial opened and more than two years after Allen agreed to cooperate in the corruption investigation.

Kepner asked Allen about Moore. He acknowledged having a sexual relationship with Moore, describing her as "an adult prostitute." No details of the relationship were reported. There was no indication Kepner asked him about Bakersfield. There's no way to know, using records that have been publicly filed, whether or when Kepner questioned Allen about Tyree.

EXTORTION?

But Allen offered a much harsher account of the 1999 request for additional financial support in Kennewick, Wash. He told Kepner that Moore and her mother were seeking $25,000 and termed it extortion. They threatened to expose his relationships with Moore and the underage Tyree, Allen said. Allen said he refused to pay and referred the matter to his attorney, Jim Gilmore.

Later, after Boehm was arrested, Allen said, Moore again tried to extort him. Tyree volunteered to handle it with Allen's lawyer, Allen said. That would be five years after Moore and Tyree initially reported being asked to sign affidavits.

Tyree, in her own interview with Kepner in 2007, said she came up with the idea to "sign a document to prevent further extortions." But the report of that interview, filed by prosecutors in the Kott case, was heavily redacted and its context unclear.

Allen told Kepner he didn't know what happened after he turned the matter over to his attorney, but he denied ever asking Tyree to make a false statement or offering money to anyone to lie under oath. He also denied he sent the Moore family to Washington state to hide them, but rather to help them "make a fresh start in a new area."

Gilmore, Allen's former attorney, now retired and living in Gig Harbor, Wash., didn't return messages left on his home message machine or with his wife. His former Anchorage partner, Brian Doherty, hung up on a Daily News reporter asking about the Moore matter.

In a letter to the U.S. Attorney's Office filed under seal in the Boehm case in 2004 but unsealed last month at the government's request, Gilmore acknowledged possessing a "recorded statement" taken from Tyree in his office on June 19, 1999. He refused to disclose the statement, saying it was covered by attorney-client privilege and the privacy afforded to attorney work product. The letter was signed by Doherty on behalf of Gilmore.

Tyree didn't respond to a request for an interview made through her attorney. After pleading guilty in the Boehm case and cooperating with federal authorities, she was sentenced to three years in prison and was released in 2006.

Moore denied trying to squeeze Allen, though she believes he owed her then and still owes her.

"I was his girlfriend," she said. "He promised to take care of me for the rest of my life. I never blackmailed him, though -- I never extorted him, never, nothing. I just walked away from it all."

Weyhrauch lawyers optimistic after high court hearing

QUESTIONS: Justices seem inclined to see law as inconsistent.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(12/08/09 21:46:07)

WASHINGTON - One of the attorneys urging the U.S. Supreme Court to strike down an anti-corruption statute told the justices on Tuesday that the law used in the case against a former Alaska lawmaker is "vague, amorphous," and "open-ended."

"Essentially," attorney Miguel Estrada said, it is "not very helpful."

The justices -- who heard two related honest services fraud cases Tuesday and will hear a third, similar case next year -- appeared to agree. Prosecutors are "all over the place" in their application of the law in corruption cases, said Justice Antonin Scalia.

"And if the Justice Department can't figure out what is embraced by this statute," he said, "I don't know how you can expect the average citizen to figure it out."

The Supreme Court is taking a look at three cases in which prosecutors made use of the 28-word "honest services fraud" statute adopted by Congress in 1988.

The first case, an appeal by the newspaper magnate Conrad Black, focused on the law's application in cases against executives who defraud shareholders. The other, the federal case against former Alaska Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, focused on how the law is used as a weapon against corrupt political figures. The court will take a look next year at how the law was applied in the case of Jeffrey Skilling, former CEO of the now-bankrupt energy giant Enron.

Prosecutors often use the honest services fraud law to go after public officials and executives when they can't prove they accepted bribes -- but where they have enough evidence to show that those officials deprived their constituents or stockholders of their "honest services" by accepting freebies or engaging in self-dealing that lined their own pockets while on someone else's payroll.

In Weyhrauch's case, the court is considering whether prosecutors need to prove the former Juneau Republican violated a state disclosure law to gain a conviction on federal mail-fraud statutes. Weyhrauch's case hasn't yet gone to trial.

The attorney for the government, Deputy Solicitor General Michael Dreeben, told the justices that in Weyhrauch's case, the government aims to prove that the residents of Alaska were entitled to the former lawmaker's honest services. Officeholders are well aware they live in a "dual system in which citizens are governed by and accountable both by their states and by the federal government," Dreeben said.

He acknowledged to the justices that in some cases, the "core understanding of what honest services is may have been strayed from," but added that it "doesn't mean that the statute is vague."

But Justice Samuel Alito posed the question: Don't lawmakers have to vote on "all sorts of things that have an impact on their own financial interests or the financial interests of their family or associates," such as tax codes?

"Don't you need some kind of a disclosure code to separate the things that have to be disclosed from the things that don't have to be disclosed, because they are just too common?" Alito asked.

Federal prosecutors allege Weyhrauch solicited legal work from the oil-field service company Veco Corp. at a time when Veco was pushing hard to win support for lower oil taxes in the state Legislature. Federal prosecutors said Weyhrauch should have disclosed his job search as a conflict of interest.

Weyhrauch's attorneys argued that state law didn't specifically require such disclosure and, as a result, the federal fraud statute couldn't be used to charge him with defrauding Alaskans of his "honest services."

A District Court judge in Alaska agreed with Weyhrauch, but the government appealed and won in the 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals. The appeals court sided with prosecutors, saying legislators had a duty to disclose such conflicts. The court reasoned that even if a state has weak ethics laws, it was no reason for its citizens to be deprived of the honest services of their public officials.

In court Tuesday, Weyhrauch's attorney, Don Ayer of Washington, D.C., argued to the justices that there was absolutely no duty for his client to disclose his job search under state law.

"He is a part-time legislator in a state that has a citizen legislature that has made a decision specifically not to have its disclosure rules be unduly burdensome," Ayer said. "That's their own specific language. They don't want them to be unduly burdensome. They have required certain disclosures. They have not required others."

Both of Weyhrauch's Alaska attorneys said they were pleased with the direction the case appeared to be headed on Tuesday, based on the questions asked by the justices. If the Supreme Court decides in their favor, his lawyers said, they expect the rest of the case against Weyhrauch to disintegrate quickly.

"There is no evidence," Ray Brown, one of Weyhrauch's lawyers, said in front of the Supreme Court Tuesday once the arguments had concluded.

"The evidence that we confronted the government with, over a couple of weeks before trial, was a videotape that they'd taken, where they allege that the deal was made," said Doug Pope, another of Weyhrauch's attorneys. "And once they produced it and we looked at it, there was no deal on the videotape. So tell me where they're going to get the evidence?"

Several cases in a wide-ranging federal corruption probe into Alaska politics began falling apart this year during the trial of former Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska. Stevens, who was convicted in late 2008 of filing false financial disclosure forms, saw his indictment dismissed after defense attorneys questioned the way that prosecutors and the FBI handled witnesses and evidence in Stevens' case and others.

In two related cases, former Alaska state lawmakers Pete Kott and Vic Kohring were freed from prison in June when the government acknowledged they may not have gotten fair trials because favorable evidence was withheld from them. But prosecutors now say the favorable evidence wasn't material to their cases and have argued that their convictions should stand. The matter is before a federal district judge in Anchorage.

In Stevens' case, the Justice Department acknowledged that it had failed to share with the former senator's lawyers notes from an interview with the prosecution's key witness. Those notes contradicted the witness's trial testimony and could have been favorable to Stevens at trial.

Pope said his true thoughts on Weyhrauch's case were unprintable, "because I would use some bad language."

"This case should never have been brought because they didn't have the evidence," he said. "It was brought because some very ambitious prosecutors -- who revealed their true side in the Stevens case -- thought that they had a theory that they could prevail on in trial. That's the reason we're here, right in front of the U.S. Supreme Court."

Based on questions the justices raised about the Skilling case, both Brown and Pope said they expect the court to rule on the Weyhrauch and Black cases after the Supreme Court hears the former Enron executive's case next year.

Element of Weyhrauch case goes to Supreme Court

FRAUD: Question involves "honest services" officials owe to citizens.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(12/06/09 22:57:12)

WASHINGTON -- A case with roots in the Alaska political corruption investigation has worked its way up to the U.S. Supreme Court, which this week will take a look at it and another case in which an anti-corruption statute is now in question.

The Supreme Court on Tuesday will be looking at a narrow piece of former Alaska Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch's pending criminal case: whether prosecutors need to prove that Weyhrauch violated a state disclosure law to gain a conviction on federal mail-fraud statutes. Weyhrauch's case has not yet gone to trial.

The high court will be looking at the use of the 28-word "honest services fraud" statute adopted by Congress in 1988. The law governing such fraud is often used in the cases of public officials where federal prosecutors can't prove they accepted bribes -- but where they have enough evidence to show that those officials took freebies such as tickets or jobs.

The statute is based on the idea that people are entitled to the honest services of elected officials and executives in charge of big companies. But it often has very liberal applications, said Shana Regon, director of white collar crime policy at the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, which filed a friend of the court brief in the case.

"The statute is 28 words, and no one knows what it means," Regon said.

Weyhrauch's case landed at the Supreme Court after the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled against him and his case came to the attention of several high-profile criminal defense attorneys concerned about abuse of the honest services statute. They contacted his attorney, Doug Pope of Anchorage, who began working with a team that includes a veteran of 17 Supreme Court arguments, Washington, D.C., attorney Don Ayer.

On Tuesday, Pope and attorney Ray Brown, also of Alaska, will sit at the counsel bench at the Supreme Court while Ayer argues the case.

"I feel good about getting the case there, that was the important thing," Pope said. "My view is that this case should never have been brought against Bruce."

Weyhrauch's case is one of three similar honest services fraud cases the justices have chosen to hear this year, as they take a look at how prosecutors have been interpreting the statute. Tuesday, they'll first hear the case of former newspaper magnate Conrad Black, whose 2007 conviction was based in part on the assertion he deprived his company of his honest services. Next year, they'll take a look at how the law was applied in the case of Jeffrey Skilling, former CEO of the now-bankrupt energy giant, Enron.

Weyhrauch's case involves much lower stakes, but also is probably more straightforward, Pope said.

"The law is the law, but you win and lose cases on the facts," Pope said. "And the facts are really good here."

Weyhrauch, a Juneau Republican, solicited legal work from the oil-field service company Veco Corp. at a time when Veco was pushing hard to win support for lower oil taxes in the state Legislature. Federal prosecutors said Weyhrauch should have disclosed his job search as a conflict of interest.

But Weyhrauch's attorneys argued that state law didn't specifically require such disclosure and as a result, the federal fraud statute couldn't be used to charge him with defrauding Alaskans of his "honest services."

A District Court judge in Alaska agreed with Weyhrauch, but the government appealed and won in the 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals. The appeals court sided with prosecutors, saying legislators had a duty to disclose such conflicts. The court reasoned that even if a state has weak ethics laws, it was no reason for its citizens to be deprived of the honest services of their public officials.

Other circuit courts, though, have made contradictory rulings, hence the Supreme Court's willingness to step in to clear up the confusion.

Even some former federal prosecutors question the use of honest services fraud in corruption cases. Often, they use honest services fraud because it reduces the burden of proof prosecutors must meet, said Richard Craig Smith, a former federal prosecutor who now heads up the white collar crime practice at Fulbright & Jaworski in Washington, D.C.

Speaking at a seminar on the matter held last week by the Washington Legal Foundation, Smith said that it is difficult for prosecutors to prove bribery.

"Who wants to prove a quid pro quo?" he said. "Who wants that burden of really proving corrupt intent when you can simply say, 'he had a duty, he breached your duty, therefore he should be guilty.'"

But Smith acknowledges that he is "kind of torn" on the subject. Prosecutors have used the law to prosecute people in places where state law is weak and there is clear evidence of wrongdoing on the part of people in power.

"When you have the inability or lack of political will by state and local officials to address a corruption problem in their community," he said, "this statute allows the government to get its hands around it."

LISA MOORE

Introduced to Bill Allen as a teenager in 1996 by her hooker roommate, says she traded sex with him for an apartment, jewelry and money. Broke off the relationship when Allen had sex behind her back with her friends. Says Allen tried to cover up his relationships, but she went to police in 2004 and is now a witness in the revised investigation of Allen.

JEREMY MOORE

Lisa Moore's brother. Because of his clean record, says that Allen put him charge when he wanted to get Lisa Moore out of state when Allen's sexual activities were threatened to be exposed in an Anchorage criminal case.

BAMBI TYREE

Lisa Moore says she introduced Allen to Tyree, a friend from McLaughlin Youth Center, when Tyree was 15. Moore said she hoped Allen would send Tyree to treatment for cocaine addiction, but they became sexual partners instead -- before Tyree turned 16. In 1999, Tyree said she signed a sworn statement denying the relationship with Allen at his request.

AARON PINSLY

Lisa Moore's boyfriend after Allen. When she found out Pinsly was sleeping with an underaged girl, she called the cops and Pinsly was arrested. Pinsly, who knew about Allen's sexual activities with prostitutes and minors, threatened to blow the whistle on Allen if Moore testified against him, she said, leading Allen to move her to California. Pinsly pleaded guilty to a lesser charge and there was no trial.

UNNAMED CHILD VICTIM

Another former prostitute who said she had sex with Allen when she was 15, and that after she moved to Seattle, Allen paid to fly her back to Alaska about five times. This victim, who has not been publicly identified by name, has given interviews to police, a federal prosecutor and reporters.

Once a leading member of Alaska's business community and chief executive of the oil-field service company Veco Corp., he's now awaiting assignment to a U.S. Bureau of investigation of political corruption, but prosecutors are now under fire for failing to tell defendants information helpful about their cases, including all they knew about Allen. He's currently under investigation by local and federal authorities over allegations that he had sex with at least two girls under 16, the minimum age of consent in Alaska.

JOSEF BOEHM

While not a friend of Bill Allen, the two had something in common: Bambi Tyree. When Boehm was charged in 2004 with conspiracy to provide cocaine to women under 21 and with sex trafficking, Tyree, a cocaine addict, was a co-defendant. When Tyree's lawyers portrayed her as a victim, Moore decided to come forward -- to set the record straight, she said. The Allen sexual misconduct case became a spinoff of the Boehm investigation.

ANCHORAGE POLICE SGT. KEVIN VANDEGRIFF

Now a patrol sergeant, he was one of the police detectives to investigate Boehm for trading cocaine to women and girls for sex. When Moore came forward, he opened an investigation of Allen, but was asked by federal prosecutors to suspend it so it wouldn't distract him from the complex prosecution of Boehm. Vandegriff reopened the case in 2008.

ASSISTANT U.S. ATTORNEY FRANK RUSSO

Lead prosecutor in the Boehm case, he was the one who asked Vandegriff to suspend his investigation of Allen. Russo was present at the 2004 interviews of Moore and of Tyree, when she admitted lying in the sworn statement Allen asked her to sign.

FORMER U.S. SEN. TED STEVENS

Found guilty in 2008 by a jury of failing to disclose thousands of dollars of gifts he received from Bill Allen, but his charges were dismissed in April when prosecutors admitted they failed to turn over favorable evidence to the defense. The judge brought in a special prosecutor to investigate whether the Justice Department attorneys should be charged with contempt.

FORMER REPS. PETE KOTT AND VIC KOHRING

Convicted of corruption charges in 2007 in part on the testimony of Allen, they were freed from prison in June to allow a judge to Kott's appeals lawyer from Seattle. She said Kott was

FBI SPECIAL AGENT MARY BETH KEPNER

Lead case agent in the corruption cases, she helped persuade Allen to cooperate with the investigation on the strength of the evidence against him. But another agent said in a formal complaint that she became too close to Allen.

This story just gets worse and worse. The term "Hatchet Job" on Sen. Ted Stevens does an injustice to all axmen. I'm still questioning the political motivation of the prosecutor and lead FBI agent. It needs to be investigated how often they were in contact with operatives for the Democrat party and Mark Begich's campaign. Did I get it right in this story. A detective was re-assigned as a patrolman after investigating BA's activities? Looks like BA's influence extended into the APD.

Alleged cover-up cuts into Allen credibility

CORRUPTION INVESTIGATION: Lawyer says juries should know if star witness tried to hide relationships with underage girls.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(12/13/09 22:24:35)

Anchorage resident Lisa Moore says she traded sex with then-Veco boss Bill Allen in 1996 for an apartment, money and jewelry. He was 59; she was 19.

She also says she introduced him to a 15-year-old girl who became his sex partner.

But the next year, an ex-boyfriend of Moore's got into legal trouble and threatened to blow the whistle on Allen's relationship with Moore and other teens, including the 15-year-old, Moore said, triggering a string of alleged cover-ups that now threaten to undermine the Alaska political corruption investigation.

Allen's conduct with that underage girl and at least one other has been the subject of an active Anchorage police investigation since 2008. That inquiry developed more urgency last spring when a prosecutor with the Justice Department's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section joined local detectives in the case and began traveling to Anchorage to interview witnesses, including a visit just last week.

But long before the authorities got involved, Allen reportedly went to great lengths to keep his sexual activities secret. When Moore told Allen she expected to be called as a witness at her ex-boyfriend's trial and forced to reveal Allen's seamy and possibly criminal private life, Allen immediately sent her, her brother and her fiance on the lam to California to prevent her from being subpoenaed, Moore told an Anchorage police detective and elaborated in recent interviews with the Daily News.

That trip, characterized as a "potential obstruction of justice" when first made public in a federal court filing last month, are among the issues cited by former state House Speaker Pete Kott in his effort to throw out his conviction on corruption charges. Allen was a key witness in Kott's case, but Kott's lawyers weren't told by prosecutors about the California trip, which could have undermined Allen's credibility under cross-examination by a defense attorney.

Kott's lawyer has also said Allen's credibility could have been challenged by other allegations that were known by the government at the time of Kott's trial but only recently revealed to the defense. Among them: new details about assertions by the underaged girl, Bambi Tyree, now 28, that she lied under oath about her relationship with Allen at Allen's request, and that Moore was asked by Allen's attorney to swear that Allen did not have sex with Tyree when she was 15, even though she said she observed it.

Allen has told FBI agents he never asked anyone to lie under oath or tried to hide witnesses to avoid subpoenas. Messages left with his attorney in Anchorage this week weren't returned.

DISCREDITING INFORMATION

FBI - Stevens-2622

Allen, after pleading guilty in 2007 to bribery and other corruption charges, was also the key witness in the trials of former state Rep. Vic Kohring and U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens. Stevens' charges were thrown out in April after his conviction. Kott and Kohring are saying they were likewise unfairly tried, and have been released from prison while their cases are sorted out. All said that prosecutors failed to provide them with discrediting information they knew about Allen and other witnesses as required by law.

For instance, in a letter to Stevens' defense team on the eve of his trial in 2008, prosecutors asserted "the government is aware of no evidence to support any suggestion that Allen asked the 'other female' (Tyree) to make a false statement under oath." But in 2004, Tyree told a federal prosecutor and an FBI agent from Alaska precisely that, and Allen's attorney admitted in a 2004 letter to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Anchorage that he had the statement in his files, though he refused to turn it over.

Defense attorneys in the corruption cases weren't allowed to raise the issue of Allen's sexual conduct. The judges in those cases agreed with prosecution arguments that even if Allen had a sexual relationship with a 15-year-old girl, a felony under state law, it was irrelevant to whether he gave bribes and illegal gifts to public officials. Just mentioning such a sensational allegation could inflame the jury against Allen and divert attention from the evidence, the judges ruled.

But the new material raises questions about how far Allen would go to protect himself. If Allen schemed to prevent a witness from testifying about his sexual conduct or tried to get two witnesses to lie under oath, that could give defense attorneys new ammunition to attack his credibility.

Kott's attorney is already making those arguments after reviewing the new material.

"It showed prior acts of criminality, and it showed Bill Allen's desperate attempts to convince his victims to lie to protect him," Sheryl Gordon McCloud said in her motion to dismiss the charges or at least get a new trial. "Its newly released documents contain allegations and evidence that Bill Allen committed a multitude of primarily sex crimes against children, and that he sought to have them swear that he never committed such acts."

The six prosecutors in the Stevens case, including the four who tried Kott and Kohring, are under investigation for criminal contempt by a special prosecutor appointed by Stevens' trial judge. The Washington Post reported Dec. 3 that the special prosecutor will wrap up his investigation over the next two months with interviews of the prosecutors.

Moore, now 32, originally told her story in 2004 to Anchorage police, the FBI and prosecutors in the Anchorage U.S. Attorney's office. She and her mother said they were led to believe that Allen would be prosecuted for sexual abuse of a minor or federal child exploitation violations. When nothing happened, Moore said in the interview, she figured Allen was so powerful he could avoid prosecution.

But the case against Allen remains active. Moore said she has met several times in Anchorage with the Washington-based trial attorney in the Justice Department's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section, which specializes in sex crimes involving minors.

Last month, Allen was sentenced to three years in prison on his bribery plea, though he remains free while the U.S. Bureau of Prisons determines where he will go.

With Allen headed to prison, Moore said she is more comfortable talking about him than before.

ALASKA POWERHOUSE

FBI - Stevens-2623

In March 1997, the Anchorage Chamber of Commerce hailed Allen as one of the five most powerful individuals in Alaska. Allen was the only person on that list not holding elective office (the other four were Stevens, Sen. Frank Murkowski, Gov. Tony Knowles and Anchorage Mayor Rick Mystrom).

Allen regularly socialized with the state's top political and business leaders. He was the oil industry's most visible advocate, a power broker in Juneau and a major fundraiser for state and national Republicans. The chamber took note of the help he provided presidential aspirant Sen. Bob Dole and said his role as publisher of the Voice of the Times, his opinion section in the Daily News, "enhanced his credibility in Alaska."

A picture dated 1999 shows Allen with Rita Ivanova, a Russian woman he dated, at Murkowski's annual fishing event in Ketchikan. Allen is at the center of the picture, his arm draped around Ivanova, and on either side are Sens. Thad Cochran, R-Miss., Rep. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., Murkowski, Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, Sen. Kit Bond, R-Mo., and Sen. Don Nickles, R-Okla.

Allen's power and access continued to grow. He and Stevens, the most senior Republican in the Senate, would rendezvous at a desert resort in Arizona for annual "boot camps" where they would forswear whiskey and beer, eat healthy and take long walks to shed extra pounds.

In 2000, Allen began renovating Stevens' Girdwood home, a multi-year project that cost him and Veco about $250,000 -- and which Stevens, limited by Senate rules to accepting no more than about $300 a year in gifts, failed to disclose.

As active as his public life was, Allen's private life, by Moore's description, looked like a low-rent imitation of Playboy's Hugh Hefner.

Moore said she met Allen in September or October, 1996. Her roommate worked for a 24-hour escort service called Silk Stockings, and Allen, who was divorced, was a client, Moore said. She remembers the timing because it happened shortly after her own arrest for prostitution on Sept. 5, 1996. (Moore pleaded guilty and paid a $250 fine.)

The roommate called from Allen's house and asked Moore to pick her up.

"She said, 'You got to come in and see this guy's house,' " Moore recalled. "I was like, 'No, no, no,' and she was like, 'Just come on.' So I went in, met him, and he was like, 'Oh, I would just love to date you.' "

Moore said she wasn't interested in working as a prostitute after her arrest, and she told Allen no. But she said Allen kept calling her roommate.

"Just go out to eat with him," the roommate said. "He's the owner of Veco -- he's loaded."

FBI - Stevens-2624

Moore accepted a dinner date.

"What is it going to take to get you in bed?" Allen asked at the meal, Moore recalled.

"A lot," Moore said she responded.

"What's your motivation in life?" Allen asked.

"My whole goal in life right now is to get my own apartment, get a good job and get my daughter back," replied Moore, whose 3-year-old was living with her parents.

"By the next day, he had me in an apartment," Moore said. It was at the Castle Apartments on West 27th Avenue, a block and a half from Veco's then-headquarters on West Northern Lights Boulevard. The proximity allowed Allen to visit over lunch, she said.

Moore said Allen insisted she be monogamous with him and he promised the same with her. But that arrangement didn't last long, she said.

'TYREE MEETS ALLEN'

When she was 15, Moore was ordered to McLaughlin Youth Center after she stole her mother's credit card and used it to rent a limousine for the evening. One of the smartest, most streetwise girls at the juvenile hall was someone three years her junior, Bambi Tyree, Moore said. Tyree was especially adept at manipulating counselors, saying precisely what they wanted to hear at group sessions so she could do as she pleased at other times, Moore said. The girls became friends and continued the relationship after they got out.

When Moore moved into the Castle Apartments in 1996, Tyree, then 15, was struggling with a crack cocaine addiction and spending time at the home of Josef Boehm, the owner of Alaska Industrial Hardware, himself a cocaine addict, Moore said. Boehm, now 65 and in federal prison in Texas, was known to Tyree and other addicted girls as "Joe Millionaire" for the crack he traded for sex.

Moore said Allen was no friend of Boehm and strongly opposed illegal drug use. She thought Allen could help her friend Tyree by paying for her rehabilitation. Around October or November 1996, Moore introduced Allen to Tyree. A few days later, when she went to Allen's home on a "date," she brought Tyree, who wouldn't turn 16, the age of consent, until Dec. 17. The three had sex in Allen's hot tub, she said. Tyree stayed with her at the Castle Apartments, and would be there when Allen came over. There were times when Moore, Tyree and two other friends would join Allen in bed. Another time, Moore said, she witnessed a different friend who was 15 have oral sex with Allen in Allen's car.

Whenever Allen had sex with one of her friends, Moore said, he gave the friend $100 and Moore $500.

Allen knew Tyree was 15 because he helped her celebrate her 16th birthday, Moore said. Among the birthday and Christmas presents he handed Moore and Tyree were rings worth about $5,000 each, Moore said.

Moore's relationship with Allen began to sour in the spring of 1997. Tyree had moved out, and Moore found out Allen was still seeing Tyree behind her back.

"As long as I was there, or I knew about it, it wasn't that big of an issue," Moore said. But now it felt like Allen wasn't upholding his end of the bargain.

"The day I broke up with him, I was like, 'I don't want to see you any more, I'm done with you, you're a pervert!' is what I told him. The next day, there was an eviction notice on the door, my phone was already off and my cable -- and I'm like, why would you do that? You say you love me, you want to take care of me for the rest of my life, just because I get mad and break up with you because you're sleeping with a 15-year-old and all my other friends -- he slept with all of my friends, all of them."

FBI - Stevens-2625

'WHAT IF YOU GUYS LEFT THE STATE?'

Moore, still 19, began dating a man her own age, Aaron Pinsly. But then she learned that a different 15-year-old girl -- a runaway -- was staying at Pinsly's house and having sex with him. Moore called the cops. The girl was taken into custody at Pinsly's house.

A few weeks later, Anchorage police Det. Lorraine Shore persuaded the 15-year-old girl to call Pinsly to see if he would admit having had a sexual relationship with her. He did.

Pinsly was arrested July 31, 1997, for sexual abuse of a minor.

While Pinsly awaited trial, Moore said, she got a call from Shore looking for an address to serve her with a subpoena. Moore also got a call from Pinsly in jail.

"He was mad because he knew I was the one that called in -- I never hid that fact," Moore said. "He was like, 'If you go through with this and you testify against me, then I'm going to bring up everything that happened between you and Bill and I'll make a deal with them to testify against him.' "

Moore figured that Pinsly was trying to prevent her from testifying, a goal Allen seemed to share when she told him about Pinsly's threat, she said.

"What if you guys left the state?" Allen suggested, according to Moore. As he thought about it, he recommended she involve her brother Jeremy, who had a spotless criminal record and could pass a drug test for a new job. Jeremy could get the tickets, rent the hideout apartment, and provide support with a job.

"It was obstructing justice if you're avoiding a subpoena, so he put everything in my brother's name and we left the next day," Moore said.

"(Allen) told me I was the key to the whole thing," Jeremy Moore said in an interview.

Lisa Moore, by then 20, had an 18-year-old boyfriend, a man she would eventually marry. He went along as well. Jeremy Moore was 21.

Their destination would be Bakersfield, Calif., an oil town in the desert north of Los Angeles. As the payment for uprooting their lives, Allen promised them an apartment, a car and jobs on a drilling rig run by his brother, Roger Allen, Jeremy Moore said. Jeremy Moore quit his job at Walmart in Alaska, believing Allen that he'd be making $3,000 a month on the rig.

Jeremy Moore said Veco paid to fly them to Seattle; he said Allen identified them as Veco employees on expense documents. To reduce the chances of their destination being traced, he said, Allen gave them cash for bus tickets from there to Bakersfield. Allen was in Seattle when they got there, and met them in Bakersfield, he said.

Allen told them to not call any friends back in Alaska. He bought pagers for them to communicate with their mother in Anchorage.

Allen wasn't only concerned about legal issues, but also his reputation, Jeremy Moore said. "He even told me he'd be mortified if this ever got out into the papers," Jeremy Moore said.

But Roger Allen didn't have a job for him or Moore's fiance. And there was no car, only two mountain bikes. The house he got them was roach infested, Jeremy and Lisa said.

Instead of the rig, Jeremy Moore said, Allen got him work packing drilling mud at a Bakersfield company called GEO Drilling, a dusty, dirty job. Two weeks later, when his first paycheck showed he was making $8 an hour, less than he was making at Walmart, he quit, withdrew the money from the bank account Allen opened in his name, and flew home.

"Bill was really mad that I came back," Jeremy Moore said. His sister and her fiance abandoned the hideout after another month or two. They sold everything that Allen had bought them, bought train tickets to Seattle and flew from there to Anchorage.

When she ran into Allen a few days later, he was shocked they had returned, she said. "What the hell are you doing here?" he said, according to Lisa Moore.

Pinsly ended up not going to trial. Offered a plea bargain by the Anchorage district attorney's office, he pleaded guilty to a reduced charge of coercion and served about a year in prison, then moved to Las Vegas, where his mother and father live. He didn't respond to letters sent to him and his father by the Daily News.

Pinsly's 15-year-old victim is now married and living in the South. In a telephone interview, she said she knew that Moore had been Pinsly's girlfriend but didn't know Moore had turned her in and knew nothing about a threat from Pinsly to expose Allen. She also remembered Tyree from McLaughlin, but didn't know that Tyree was connected to the Pinsly case.

Shore, the detective, is retired and living in Washington state. She recalled Pinsly's case but said she investigated too many crimes to remember many of the details.

In their Sept. 9, 2008, pretrial disclosure letter to Sen. Stevens' lawyers, the Justice Department prosecutors characterized the 1997 Bakersfield trip this way:

"The adult female (Lisa Moore) also alleged that Allen provided her with a trip outside Alaska for the purpose of preventing the adult female to testify in an unspecified proceeding." When asked about the matter, the prosecutors continued, Allen "denied ever causing anyone to leave the state of Alaska to prevent testimony in any type of proceeding."

Two years after Bakersfield, Allen again tried to move Moore and her family out of state, this time paying $10,000 to get them all to Kennewick, Wash., Moore and her brother said. But that also didn't go well, and the family struggled to make ends meet. Moore's mother, Maryann Bright, said Allen had promised to buy the family a house but didn't. Lisa Moore and her mother returned to Alaska in June 1999 to ask Allen for more money.

"This man's up here, has all this money, living lavish, and we're down there like struggling our butts off to make it and we're there because he wants us there," Moore said. But Allen wouldn't give them anything and told them to talk to his attorney, she said.

Moore and Bright said the attorney offered them $5,000 if Moore would sign a sworn statement that Allen never had a sexual relationship with Tyree or any other underage girl.

Lisa Moore said she refused to sign. The money wasn't enough to buy her silence and conspire in perjury, nor would it pay their bills in Kennewick, she said. That same month, Tyree signed such a statement, according to an interview she gave to an FBI agent and an assistant U.S. Attorney in 2004.

In that interview, according to an FBI record given to Kott's lawyer and filed in his case, Tyree acknowledged having had sex with Allen when she was 15. (Tyree's name was blacked out in the filed document, though her identity was unmistakable.)

"(Tyree) previously signed a sworn affidavit claiming she did not have sex with Allen," according to the FBI agent's report of the 2004 interview, as filed in Kott's case. "(Tyree) was given the affidavit by Allen's attorney, and she signed it at Allen's request. (Tyree) provided false information on the affidavit because she cared for Allen and did not want him to get into trouble with the law."

THE BOEHM CASE

The matter lay dormant until early 2004, when details of a joint city-state investigation of Boehm, the cocaine-addicted hardware-store owner, emerged in a federal criminal case. Boehm, two cr ack dealers and Tyree, then 23, were charged with conspiracy to distribute cocaine to persons under 21 and multiple counts of sexual trafficking of children.

In media accounts of the case, Moore said, she thought Tyree was inappropriately characterized as a victim, not an active perpetrator. She called up one of Boehm's attorneys, Rex Butler, and left a message offering to provide information on Tyree.

Butler called back but said he didn't think he could use her information. A few days later, Moore said, she was visited by two FBI agents who asked her if she would cooperate in an investigation of Allen. She said she would.

On Feb. 10, 2004, they brought her to the FBI building, where she sat down with them and two Anchorage police detectives, including Det. Kevin Vandegriff, who also was involved in the Boehm case. Only Vandegriff's notes of the interview have emerged, filed last month in the Kott case. While all the names of witnesses and victims were blacked out in the report, Moore filled them in during an interview with the Daily News.

The report spans Moore's entire story, from how she met Tyree and Allen, her introduction of them to each other, the Bakersfield trip, and more. She said Vandegriff's report mischaracterized the affidavit she was asked to sign by Allen's lawyer. The report said she was asked to swear that she didn't have sex with Allen, while Allen's lawyer actually wanted her to say that she didn't observe an underage Tyree have sex with Allen, Moore said.

After that interview, she returned one more time to the FBI office, this time with her diary detailing her relationship with Allen, plane tickets and receipts for things he had bought her, photographs, and other evidence. Moore said she never got it back. In a later report, Vandegriff said it all disappeared.

The assistant U.S. attorney who attended the Moore interview and prosecuted the Boehm case, Frank Russo, has said he asked Vandegriff to suspend his investigation in 2004 to avoid being distracted in the complicated run-up to Boehm's trial. But in the end, there was no trial -- all the defendants pleaded guilty. No one has said why the Allen sex case continued to lay dormant even as he fell under suspicion, later in 2004, for the massive corruption of Alaska politics.

In September 2007, four months after Allen pleaded guilty to bribery, the Daily News began investigating his connection to Tyree. Around December, a little more than a month before the paper published its first story on the subject, Vandegriff reopened the Allen investigation. He left his card at every known residence where Moore had stayed. She found one of the cards and called him. On Jan. 2, 2008, she consented to a long videotaped interview with him, once again giving her whole story. A portion of that report was also filed in the Kott case last month.

In February 2008, Vandegriff and the FBI agent who had interviewed Moore in 2004, John Eckstein, searched through all the files from the Boehm case looking for Moore's diary and the other evidence, but came up empty, according to another report. Vandegriff also reported that an assistant U.S. attorney recalled seeing the material Moore brought in and thought it had been left for safekeeping with an FBI agent or police officer.

FBI - Stevens-2628

Months later, with the looming Stevens case hanging on Allen's credibility, the lead FBI agent, Mary Beth Kepner, held a Sunday interview session with her star witness. The notes of that Allen interview, as filed in the Kott case, show it was conducted Sept. 7, 2008, two weeks before Stevens' trial opened and more than two years after Allen agreed to cooperate in the corruption investigation.

Kepner asked Allen about Moore. He acknowledged having a sexual relationship with Moore, describing her as "an adult prostitute." No details of the relationship were reported. There was no indication Kepner asked him about Bakersfield. There's no way to know, using records that have been publicly filed, whether or when Kepner questioned Allen about Tyree.

EXTORTION?

But Allen offered a much harsher account of the 1999 request for additional financial support in Kennewick, Wash. He told Kepner that Moore and her mother were seeking $25,000 and termed it extortion. They threatened to expose his relationships with Moore and the underage Tyree, Allen said. Allen said he refused to pay and referred the matter to his attorney, Jim Gilmore.

Later, after Boehm was arrested, Allen said, Moore again tried to extort him. Tyree volunteered to handle it with Allen's lawyer, Allen said. That would be five years after Moore and Tyree initially reported being asked to sign affidavits.

Tyree, in her own interview with Kepner in 2007, said she came up with the idea to "sign a document to prevent further extortions." But the report of that interview, filed by prosecutors in the Kott case, was heavily redacted and its context unclear.

Allen told Kepner he didn't know what happened after he turned the matter over to his attorney, but he denied ever asking Tyree to make a false statement or offering money to anyone to lie under oath. He also denied he sent the Moore family to Washington state to hide them, but rather to help them "make a fresh start in a new area."

Gilmore, Allen's former attorney, now retired and living in Gig Harbor, Wash., didn't return messages left on his home message machine or with his wife. His former Anchorage partner, Brian Doherty, hung up on a Daily News reporter asking about the Moore matter.

In a letter to the U.S. Attorney's Office filed under seal in the Boehm case in 2004 but unsealed last month at the government's request, Gilmore acknowledged possessing a "recorded statement" taken from Tyree in his office on June 19, 1999. He refused to disclose the statement, saying it was covered by attorney-client privilege and the privacy afforded to attorney work product. The letter was signed by Doherty on behalf of Gilmore.

Tyree didn't respond to a request for an interview made through her attorney. After pleading guilty in the Boehm case and cooperating with federal authorities, she was sentenced to three years in prison and was released in 2006.

Moore denied trying to squeeze Allen, though she believes he owed her then and still owes her.

"I was his girlfriend," she said. "He promised to take care of me for the rest of my life. I never blackmailed him, though -- I never extorted him, never, nothing. I just walked away from it all."

Allen, Smith begin federal prison terms

CALIFORNIA: Meanwhile, his former Veco VP reports to a federal facility in Oregon.

By LISA DEMER

(01/13/10 07:44:43)

Bill Allen, the central player in Alaska's long-running political corruption scandal, reported to a federal prison in California on Tuesday morning, according to a Bureau of Prisons spokesman.

Allen, former chief executive of oil field services company Veco Corp., pleaded guilty in 2007 to conspiracy, bribery and tax violations.

Also on Tuesday, former Veco vice president Rick Smith reported to federal prison in Sheridan, Ore. Smith, 64, who pleaded guilty to the same charges as Allen, was sentenced to serve 21 months. He's been assigned to serve his time in Sheridan's minimum security work camp, according to Sheridan spokesman John McCafferty.

Two more Alaskans, both former legislators, are in prison on federal corruption charges. Two others were sent to prison after convictions for corrupt acts involving oil tax legislation, but they are out while a judge evaluates whether they got a fair trial.

Allen, 72, has begun serving his three-year sentence at the Terminal Island federal correctional institution. Allen surrendered at the prison at about 10 a.m. Pacific time, said Edmond Ross, a Bureau of Prisons spokesman in Washington, D.C.

Terminal Island is a low-security facility for men located between Long Beach and San Pedro, at the entrance to the Los Angeles Harbor. It's not one of the federal system's three designated medical facilities, but it does offer specialized and long-term health care short of hospitalization, Ross said.

The prison is in an industrial area on a man-made rectangle of land near shipyards and rail yards, canneries and the old Long Beach Naval Complex.

Inmates can glimpse the sea and watch ships go past. When cruise ships go by, "it's a special treat for the inmates," Ross said.

"It's not beachfront property," he said. But "it's a beautiful location, as prisons go."

The Terminal Island prison has been home to famous criminals and characters over the years: Al Capone and Charles Manson, Timothy Leary and G. Gordon Liddy.

Allen may not have to serve all three years. Under federal law, inmates get 54 days a year off their sentence for good behavior, provided they have a high school diploma or GED, or are working toward it. They get less credit for good behavior if they don't have that minimal education. Allen is a high school dropout.

Certain inmates also can get a year off their sentence if they complete residential drug or alcohol treatment, though there's a long waiting list for that program, according to Allen's federal probation officer, Karen Brewer.

Right after the FBI confronted Allen on Aug. 30, 2006, he agreed to cooperate and eventually testified against state lawmakers and then-U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens. But the Stevens case became a tangle and the conviction was thrown out last year.

Allen's sentencing was delayed until October 2009, when he also was ordered to pay a $750,000 fine, the biggest the judge could assess. He was allowed to remain out of custody until his report date.

Allen is an avid car collector and on Oct. 9, less than three weeks before he was sentenced, he was at a Las Vegas auction with daughter Tammy Allen as she bid on a limited-edition Mustang, according to a video of the event on an Iacocca Web site, www.ilegacy.com. Her winning bid was $320,000, which, counting a 10 percent fee, put the total price for the No. 5 Iacocca Silver 45th Anniversary Edition Mustang at $352,000. In the video, Allen and Tammy can be seen huddling in the front row during the bidding. Information on the Web site says the buyer was from Colorado, where Tammy lives.

Also in federal prison on corruption charges are:

• Tom Anderson, 42, a former legislator from Muldoon who is serving a five-year sentence at the Sheridan work camp. His tentative release date is April 9, 2012, according to the Bureau of Prisons' inmate locator.

• Bev Masek, 46, a former legislator from Willow who is serving a six-month sentence at a minimum security work camp for women in Victorville, Calif. Her tentative release date is May 8.

New Kott court filing for dismissal cites federal cases

CORRUPTION: He uses them to show how his case should end.

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com
(01/13/10 07:46:24)

Pete Kott, the former state House speaker awaiting a court decision in the federal corruption case against him, has made a new filing to support his request to get the charges tossed or a new trial.

In a court filing Monday, Kott cites recent dismissals of two federal cases -- including that against Blackwater guards accused of killing unarmed civilians in Baghdad -- as examples of how his case should turn out.

Kott also points to a Jan. 4 directive from the U.S. attorney general's office detailing what materials prosecutors nationwide must give to the defense to ensure a fair trial.

"... It includes not just material from the U.S. Attorney's files but from all those associated with the prosecution team, and it includes not just information memorialized in written statements but also evidence favorable to the accused that is transmitted in a 'conversation,' " Sheryl Gordon McCloud, Kott's lawyer, wrote.

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick is considering whether Kott, an Eagle River Republican, should be retried, have his charges dismissed or be sent back to prison.

In 2007, Kott was convicted of bribery, extortion and conspiracy and went to prison the next year. But after the collapse of the corruption case against former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens last year, prosecutors took another look at the cases of Kott and former Rep. Vic Kohring. Last summer, both were released from prison while issues of a fair trial are hashed out in court.

Kott's appeals lawyer has argued that prosecutors failed to turn over contradictory statements by Bill Allen, star witness in the oil-tax corruption case. Prosecutors say Kott got a fair trial even if the defense didn't have access to everything and that the evidence of corruption was overwhelming, including dozens of secretly recorded conservations.

Kott's new filing refers to fresh developments in other cases and the week-old Justice Department memorandum.

In the Blackwater case, a federal judge in Washington, D.C., on Dec. 31 dismissed the indictment of Blackwater guards on the grounds that prosecutors improperly relied on what the guards told State Department investigators after the killings, a violation of their rights against self-incrimination.

In the other case, a federal judge in California earlier in December dismissed securities-fraud charges against executives of chipmaker Broadcom Corp. after finding that the prosecutor had intimidated witnesses.

As to the Jan. 4 guidance for federal prosecutors, it says they should document all witness interviews and save their rough notes, McCloud says.

But prosecutors in Kott's case have yet to provide rough notes, finished notes, FBI reports or other materials from the initial Aug. 30, 2006, interview with Allen that would explain why he so cooperated so quickly, according to McCloud.

Judge rules Kott received a fair trial

STILL OUT OF PRISON: Ex-lawmaker says prosecutors withheld key information.

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com

(01/13/10 22:35:02)

A federal judge ruled late Wednesday that former Alaska House Speaker Pete Kott received a fair trial in 2007 on corruption charges and that the "court has not found a sufficient basis" to order a new trial or dismiss the case.

Kott is trying to get his conviction thrown out on the grounds that prosecutors failed to turn over critical information to the defense before the trial -- the same basis upon which another federal judge threw out the case against former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

A federal jury found Kott guilty of conspiracy, extortion and bribery in a trial that relied heavily on secretly recorded conversations. He was sentenced to six years in federal prison and had served about a year and half of that when he was freed while questions over whether he received a fair trial are sorted out.

Until the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals considers the matter, Kott will continue to remain out of prison, under Wednesday's ruling by U.S. District Judge John Sedwick.

Sedwick agreed with the defense that prosecutors did in fact wrongly withhold evidence that Kott should have received. But, he said in the 20-page order, the mistakes likely would not have changed the trial's outcome in light of what he at one point called "very damning evidence from the audio/video recordings." Sedwick presided over Kott's trial.

The order still is a setback to Kott's effort to throw out the corruption case -- a case that grew out of maneuvering around oil tax legislation in 2006. Unlike in the Stevens case, prosecutors have argued that Kott's conviction should stand.

The key prosecution witness against Kott was former Veco Corp. chief executive Bill Allen, who pleaded guilty in 2007 to bribery, conspiracy and tax charges. Allen, who reported to a federal prison in California on Tuesday, was also the chief witness in the trials of former state Rep. Vic Kohring and Stevens.

Kott contends prosecutors failed to provide him with discrediting information they knew about Allen and other witnesses, including former Veco vice president Rick Smith, who was suicidal as Kott's trial date approached and later admitted to memory problems.

"That is what we have been saying all along -- that the government knew about information favorable to Pete, and suppressed it," Kott's lawyer, Sheryl Gordon McCloud, said in an e-mail Wednesday night.

"I am glad that the judge recognized that the government attorneys who prosecuted Pete violated the constitution and suppressed evidence that was favorable to him," McCloud wrote. "I am disappointed -- and, following the questions at oral argument, surprised -- that the judge did not follow that finding through to its logical conclusion. The logical conclusion would have been to throw the guilty verdict out because it's not trustworthy."

In his order, Sedwick wrote that Allen's testimony played an important role in the prosecution. Many of the withheld materials related to an Anchorage police investigation into allegations that Allen was sexually exploiting minors, the judge wrote. Kott contends he should have had access to that information, which he could have used to discredit Allen's testimony.

FBI - Stevens-2635

-1054

194A- AN-13620-M

Sedwick said that even though Kott's trial team knew that Allen made a deal with prosecutors in the corruption case, the defense didn't know that Allen might also have been cooperating because of the sex crimes investigation.

"While there is no direct evidence that Allen's cooperation with the government in the corruption trials was motivated by his desire to avoid charges for his alleged sexual crimes, Kott was deprived of knowledge of the potential additional benefit Allen may have hoped to receive in exchange for his cooperation," the judge said in his order.

But even with that, Sedwick wrote that he would have not allowed jurors to hear about such "sordid and reprehensible acts" because such evidence "creates a serious danger of confusing the issues which the jury actually needs to decide -- whether Kott is guilty of the crimes charged, not whether Allen is guilty of sex crimes."

Kott didn't need that evidence, Sedwick wrote, because the defense showed "Allen's bias based on the substantial value of Allen's co-operation concerning punishment for the public corruption crimes to which he had pled guilty."

As to Kohring, he also was convicted at a 2007 trial and imprisoned. He was released from last year along with Kott.

Kohring also is trying to get his case thrown out because of prosecutorial missteps but he sued his trial lawyer over a car crash. His new lawyer hasn't yet filed a request for a new trial or dismissal of the charges. Kohring has until late March to do so.

Legislative roundup

The Associated Press
(02/15/10 21:32:56)

Senator speaks to recognize state corruption fighter who died in '09

JUNEAU -- State Sen. Johnny Ellis took to the Senate floor Monday morning to recognize the behind-the-scenes work of a former state legislative aide who died last year.

Dee Hubbard became a confidential source to the FBI back in 2003 as it began to investigate influence peddling in the state Legislature. Most people think of the federal corruption investigation in Alaska as a probe of bribery associated with oil taxes, but it began as "Operation Polar Pen" -- a private prison investigation. And Hubbard was a crusader against private prisons.

"She is the person who very quietly with no fanfare remained anonymous throughout the FBI investigation, the Veco scandal, the private prison scandal," said Ellis, an Anchorage Democrat. She explained how the legislative process worked to FBI agents and told them "who's who," Ellis said.

"She was just a person there who was interested in, as she always said, 'cleaning up Alaska politics,'" Ellis said. "She was motivated by the right kinds of factors."

If prosecutors later made mistakes in pursuing cases, "it wasn't because of Dee," Ellis said. She gave impeccable advice, he said.

Hubbard was diagnosed with liver and kidney failure in March and died in August. Her husband, Charlie, and two grown sons are still struggling to cope with her death, Ellis said.

Her contributions may not be fully revealed for years, the senator said.

Lawmaker to propose legislation on personnel board changes

JUNEAU -- An Alaska lawmaker plans to file legislation that would change how members of the state personnel board are chosen.

The board looks into ethics complaints against executive branch employees. Governors appoint the members. But Rep. Bob Lynn, R-Anchorage, said that leaves the board open to criticism that it's too much a creature of the governor.

He wants a governor choose from nominees submitted by the chief justice of the state Supreme Court.

He also wants to increase the number of board members from three to five and have the governor

Bunde won't run for re-election

From Richard Mauer in Juneau --

After 18 years in the Alaska Legislature representing South Anchorage and the Hillside and more recently as the Senate's minority leader, Sen. Con Bunde announced his retirement this morning.

A retired educator, Bunde, a Republican, said he's been frustrated by his status in the Senate's four member minority caucus and by the policies of the ruling Senate bipartisan coalition with its majority of Democrats. He also cited unspecified medical problems in his family.

Sen. Con Bunde to leave Senate: [illegible] announced his retirement after 18 years at the Alaska Legislature at a news conference of the Senate minority on Thursday March 11. Photo by Richard Mauer Bunde made his announcement at the end of a news conference by his caucus. Bunde is the Senate's minority leader.

He earlier expressed his concern that the state isn't doing enough to prepare for the day when the oil runs out and the trans-Alaska pipeline and must be dismantled. At the current rate of state spending, each Alaskan would have to pay $13,000 in state taxes to make up for a complete cut off of oil revenue, he said.

Bunde has indicated for months that he might not run this year, and that's attracted a lot of interest the seat. Cathy Giessel, a nurse practitioner and Republican Party activist who was field coordinator for Sean Parnell's 2008 run for Congress, has filed with the division of elections to run.

Mark Moronell, a cardiologist and partner at Alaska Heart Institute, has also announced plans to run in the August Republican primary. Janet Reiser, a member of the Chugach Electric Association Board of Directors and the former president of NANA Pacific, is running for the seat as a Democrat.

Senate District P includes the Hiland Road area of Eagle River and the Anchorage Hillside, then runs south along Turnagain Arm through Indian, Girdwood, Whittier and Hope.

Judge denies Kott second chance for a new trial

NO NEW TRIAL: Information that came to light "insignificant."

Former Rep. Pete Kott won't get a second chance to ask for a new trial on corruption charges, a federal judge ruled this week.

Pete Kott

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick on Monday told Kott he won't reconsider his Jan. 13 ruling denying Kott a new trial or dismissal of charges. New information that surfaced the day after his January ruling was insignificant and won't change his mind, Sedwick said in a one-page, unsigned order from chambers.

Kott has been arguing for months that federal prosecutors improperly withheld information that he could have used in his defense. But in his Jan. 13 ruling, Sedwick said the withheld evidence wouldn't have made a difference in Kott's 2007 conviction. And he told Kott his decision was final: "This court will not entertain any motion for reconsideration," Sedwick said.

But then came a surprise: Prosecutors came into possession of 105 pages of handwritten notes by the attorney who represented Bill Allen, the former oil-services company chief who admitted bribing Kott and others. Allen was the government's chief witness. The notes were made by Anchorage attorney Bob Bundy as he sat through several debriefings of Allen by the FBI and Justice Department lawyers.

The notes were provided by Allen and his attorney in December to the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility, which is investigating the six prosecutors who brought former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens to trial for failing to disclose house renovations and other gifts from Allen. Stevens was found guilty, but charges were dismissed when the Justice Department admitted it failed to provide favorable information in its files to Stevens -- the same claim that Kott and another convicted ex-legislator, Vic Kohring, have made.

Four of the Stevens prosecutors under investigation also conducted the Kott and Kohring trials.

According to a Justice Department brief, the government's Public Integrity Section, which has been managing the Alaska corruption cases, received Bundy's notes Jan. 6, and provided them to Kott's lawyer Jan. 14, the day after Sedwick denied Kott a new trial. Two weeks later, Kott asked Sedwick to reconsider his Jan. 13 order.

Sedwick said at least some of the notes "are not particularly helpful to Kott" and that none "are material in the context of all the evidence." In any event, the government had no duty to disclose them to Kott before the trial because prosecutors didn't possess them, Sedwick said.

Kott remains free while he appeals his case to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Kohring is free while his attorneys prepare a motion for a new trial due in March.

FBI paid Prewitt $200,000 during corruption probe

UNDERCOVER: He didn't think Kohring was dirty, lawyers say.

Frank Prewitt, Alaska's former corrections commissioner and a key undercover source for the federal government as it investigated political corruption in Alaska, was paid $200,000 by the FBI for his assistance, a new court filing asserts.

Prewitt, who become a private prison consultant after his stint as commissioner in the Hickel administration ended in 1994, began working undercover for the FBI in 2004 and testified in federal trials of two Alaska lawmakers in 2007.

On Tuesday, lawyers for former state Rep. Vic Kohring, a Republican from Wasilla, filed a 72-page motion in federal court seeking to dismiss the case against Kohring or win a new trial for him.

The defense cited a variety of reasons, including allegations that the government failed to turn over damaging information about another key witness, former Veco Corp. chairman Bill Allen, accused of having sexual relations with underage girls. Kohring's defense also contends that the government intentionally hid information about Allen's poor memory.

The case against Kohring was marginal, weaker than the case against former House Speaker Pete Kott, Kohring's defense asserted.

For starters, Prewitt, whom prosecutors considered a valuable and credible witness, "did not think Mr. Kohring was dirty or corrupt, and ... had the overall impression that if Mr. Kohring were corrupt he may not realize it," according to Tuesday's court filing by Michael Filipovic, a Seattle-based assistant federal public defender.

Jurors never heard that characterization.

The defense suggests that Prewitt could have been a character witness for Kohring.

But Prewitt in an interview Tuesday indicated that would have backfired. Regarding the defense contention that he didn't believe Kohring was corrupt, Prewitt said that "I would call that a mischaracterization."

That assessment came after a dinner with Kohring in February 2005 that Prewitt secretly recorded. But later, surreptitious FBI recordings from 2006 showed Kohring accepting cash in a hotel room from Allen and audio tapes documented Allen talking about providing Kohring cash at other times.

Prewitt said he thought Kohring had been justly convicted: "I think the evidence that was presented in court speaks for itself, particularly the video and tapes."

The U.S. Justice Department has admitted that it failed to provide Kott's and Kohring's defense teams with favorable evidence before their trials. Both were convicted of bribery, conspiracy and other charges. Prosecutors contended they sold their offices to oil field services contractor Veco. Both were sent to prison.

Then, in June, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals directed they be released while questions related to the evidence are sorted out. Prosecutors have since turned over thousands of pages of additional documents.

Both Prewitt and FBI spokesman Eric Gonzalez said they could not confirm he received a reward.

"I voluntarily assisted the Department of Justice with no expectation or promise of compensation, and neither occurred during the entirety of my service and personal sacrifice during these unfortunate affairs," Prewitt said in an e-mail.

Speaking generally, Gonzalez said, the FBI does "pay sources for their services." And the amount could be a couple of hundred thousand, he said.

"Certainly it can reach that high. It depends on the case," Gonzalez said. "There are a lot of factors that go into weighing something like that, (such as) the significance of the investigation."

During the trial, Kohring's then-defense lawyer John Henry Browne of Seattle questioned Prewitt about whether he had asked the FBI to pay him. Prewitt said about a year and a half into his undercover work, he made such a request.

Browne: "Have you reached any agreement with the government to pay you in exchange for your work?"

Prewitt: "No, the government said that they couldn't make any commitments to that whatsoever, and I agreed to continue working."

Prewitt wasn't paid until after his testimony in the Kohring trial, according to the new court filing.

Among the other issues asserted in the new court filing:

• Eleven days before Kohring's trial, prosecutor Joe Bottini and lead FBI case agent Mary Beth Kepner interviewed Bambi Tyree. Allen has been accused of having a sexual relationship with her when she was 14 or 15 and providing her family with expensive gifts. Allen has denied that. The new document did not name Tyree but she previously has been publicly identified.

The defense asserts that Allen's testimony was tainted by his desire to keep information about sexual relations with underage girls secret. The seriousness of the issue is illustrated by the timing of that interview with Tyree on, as the defense called it, "the eve of the Kohring trial."

Jurors should have heard from Allen that he knew he was under investigation for alleged sex crimes and also under investigation for getting Tyree to lie under oath about their relationship, the defense said.

• Allen was the main witness against Kohring but his memory was faulty. Jurors heard he had suffered a brain injury in a motorcycle crash but were told his memory was fine. For example, Allen didn't remember how much money he had given Kohring at various times, the court filing says. Once, Smith recalled that he gave Allen $100 to give to Kohring so that he could stuff it into a plastic Easter egg for his stepdaughter. But Allen testified that he gave Kohring hundreds of dollars during that same episode.

Probe could permanently alter Alaska politics

Wednesday, August 1, 2007

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- The FBI's public corruption probe, which expanded Monday to include a search of Sen. Ted Stevens' home, appears to have the potential to go on for years.

So what will Alaska's political culture look like at the end of it? Is the state already changing because of it?

As a group, Alaska politicians have never been under so much national scrutiny. While state residents once didn't care how they Alaska politicians did it Outside, it seems as though the time has come to start caring.

The investigation revolving largely around ties to oil services company VECO Corp. shows no signs of slowing down. A new Alaska might be forged in the fire of the federal investigation.

"I don't know if things are changing in Alaska; I hope they are. But it's apparent to me that somebody else is doing our work for us, for the most part, if they are changing," Haycox said.

Haycox noted it took a federal investigation to bring to light numerous questions about the ethical behavior of state lawmakers and members of Alaska's congressional delegation.

Alaska is a small state, with many overlapping connections among the key players.

"Anchorage Edition" host Michael Carey said that Alaskans might have suspected unethical or illegal actions by government officials.

"For Alaskans, it is very troubling, because they don't like it. They know there are abuses of the system, but I think, this has been my experience, people don't want to have their faces rubbed in it," Carey said.

FBI - Stevens-2644

He said Alaskans now have no choice but to pay attention.

"It seems to me the federal government's message is clear: 'We're here to put Ted Stevens in jail.' I don't think you can read any of this any other way. There's not going to be some apology if they get this wrong. I mean, this is a very serious matter. It's as serious as it gets," Carey said.

Carey and Haycox agree that the billions of dollars in federal funding that Stevens represents is causing Alaskans turmoil as they ponder the future of the state.

felony counts in connection with a public corruption investigation. (KTUU-TV)

Last night in a KTUU.com poll question, 65 percent of respondents said Sen. Stevens should step down from his committee seats. (NBC NEWS)

Channel 2 News sampled public opinion today at the Midtown post office, where there were mixed feelings about the expansion of the FBI investigation to Stevens' home.

Mark Pipkin said Stevens should stay put for now.

"I don't think he should resign from his post on the appropriations committee or anything like that. It's interesting. It'd be interesting to know who the FBI and the IRS are investigating -- him, or somebody else?" Pipkin said.

Ernest Thomas said he thinks more scandals are forthcoming.

"I'm terribly embarrassed over the actions of our congressional delegation in Washington, with some of their past antics, and I think the tip of the iceberg is starting to be exposed. I'd like to see it all resolved and the image of the state of Alaska restored," Thomas said.

Jessica Sanchez said people should not rush to judgments.

"I think it's unfortunate; I think people are innocent until proven guilty. And I think he's (Stevens) guilty by association, unfortunately, right now ... his association with VECO," Sanchez said.

Despite the recent investigations, indictments, raids and the conviction of former state legislator Tom Anderson, Haycox said there is some good news for Alaska, notably Gov. Sarah Palin.

"Certainly her election and the way that she's conducted herself as governor have shown Alaskans that there is another way. That perhaps by appealing to their better natures, they can have their cake and eat it too. They can have good government and ethical government and effective government," Haycox said.

Carey said serious change is inevitable.

"I think we have to be a different place," Carey said.

He said in addition to Anderson, he's convinced other Alaskans are going to jail. But assuming that Alaskans are no more inherently corrupt than other Americans, what circumstances might have led to the multiple investigations of Alaska politicians?

Carey and Haycox agree that the state's serious reliance on federal funds and the oil industry, combined with our low population, created a concentration of influence and power that in other states would be countered by other political forces.

Last night in a KTUU.com poll question, we asked if Sen. Stevens should heed the call by outside groups to step down from committees in the Senate.

FBI - Stevens-2645

We had 883 people respond and nearly 2 out of 3 said yes, Stevens should surrender his committee assignments. The poll is unscientific, but it could be that Alaskans are viewing events differently than they would have a few years ago.

Longtime pollster Dave Dittman said he's skeptical of the results, he still thinks Alaskans want Stevens in a powerful position.

But as to whether there has been change, Haycox said it's possible, given Alaska's unusually high rate of in-migration, potentially bringing with it different attitudes about ethics in government.

Begich said his election in 2003 and Palin's last year are beginning a generational shift in political leadership that is also giving rise to a new outlook.

Stevens asked to step down from committees - RESPONSE: Colleagues on both sides say request is premature.

A day following the federal raid on his Girdwood home, two nonpartisan watchdog groups called on U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens to step down from any Senate committees where he oversees appropriations.

Both Taxpayers for Common Sense and Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington asked Republican leaders on Tuesday to request that Stevens at least temporarily step down until the FBI investigation is resolved.

Stevens is "entitled to due process and remains innocent until proven otherwise," wrote Ryan Alexander, president of Taxpayers for Common Sense. "But the standard for holding a powerful committee position should not hinge on the absence of a criminal conviction. Even the appearance of using public office for personal profit undermines public confidence in Congress."

Yet both Democratic and Republican Senate leaders stuck by Stevens on Tuesday.

"My personal feeling is that we have to be very careful about punishing people during an investigation," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nevada. "Many investigations go nowhere. I don't know anything about the Stevens investigation, but I'm not going to be in the position where just because someone's under investigation, that they're punished here in the Senate."

The Senate's Republican leader, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, said he also had no intention of acting while an investigation was in progress. The leaders of both parties decide committee assignments.

"He is, as we all know, the longest-serving Republican senator in history," McConnell said of the 83-year-old Stevens. "I'll certainly be discussing the matter with my conference, but I don't have any announcements today to make with regard to that."

Stevens is the only sitting U.S. senator known to be under active federal investigation. He sits on the powerful Appropriations Committee, as well as Commerce, Homeland Security and other committees.

Stevens received dozens of phone calls from friends and colleagues offering their support. Fellow Alaskan Sen. Lisa Murkowski and his longtime colleague Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., stepped out early.

FBI - Stevens-2647

"How far does this go?" Lott said. "If you're accused in a newspaper article that maybe you're doing some wrongdoing, maybe do you step down at that point? Where are we? At least I thought in the past that at least those considerations didn't come into play until at least you were indicted. Let the investigation run itself out."

For most of the day, Stevens was Washington's most sought-after senator.

In the morning, reporters lingered outside a subcommittee meeting where former Vice Adm.

194A-AN-13620-M;

Thomas Barrett awaited a confirmation vote for a key spot in the Department of Transportation overseeing pipelines. Stevens, a committee member, did not attend.

Dozens of reporters shifted to Stevens' Senate office and tracked his movements in hope he would say something -- anything -- about Monday's raid on his house. Stevens did not emerge to make a statement.

Many reporters also waited for him to exit a meeting with other Senate Republicans, who meet on Tuesdays to outline their policy goals.

About a half-dozen reporters chased Stevens as he left the meeting and strode quickly with his press aide toward his small office in the Capitol, known as a hideaway. He refused to respond to questions in any way.

Stevens finally stopped at a "no admittance" sign. Still silent and with pursed lips, he turned to the reporters. He motioned abruptly to the sign as though wordlessly ordering a car to stop, then he resumed walking down the private hallway.

A few minutes later, though, he had a few choice words for a CNN reporter who followed him down a stairway in the Capitol. "I put out a statement and I'm not saying anything to anybody beyond that statement," he told reporter Dana Bash.

When Bash asked what federal agents were looking for in the raid, Stevens responded:

"Can you understand English? That's the only statement I'm going to make."

Stevens scrutiny mounts - Interior Department investigates SeaLife Center appropriation

An ever-widening federal corruption probe into Alaska politics has zeroed in on a land sale involving the SeaLife Center in Seward and a former aide to U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

Federal investigators are looking into earmarks that the state's senior senator steered to the research and tourist attraction near Seward's waterfront.

They are specifically focusing on a $1.6 million Stevens-driven allocation to the SeaLife Center, which spent $558,000 of the money to buy a lot owned by lobbyist and former Stevens aide Trevor McCabe last year.

Investigators with the Inspector General's office of the U.S. Interior Department have spoken to National Park Service employees in Alaska about the purchase, said Marcia Blaszak, the Alaska regional director for the Park Service. Originally, parks officials wanted McCabe's lot for a visitor center, but balked at his asking price.

Blaszak said it's "an ongoing investigation and I'm not discussing the particulars" of what investigators were in search of. But she did say it was connected to the SeaLife Center purchase, and that local Park Service employees were cooperating with the investigation.

McCabe, who worked for Stevens from 1991 to 1999, did not return a phone message left at his Anchorage law office. His lawyer also did not return a message left with his assistant.

Stevens has long been a benefactor of the SeaLife Center, sending more than $50 million in federal money to the private nonprofit since it opened in 1998.

BROAD INVESTIGATION

The investigation adds to the list of federal inquiries that involve specific actions Stevens may have taken in Congress. Last summer, the FBI raided the offices of Stevens' son, former state Senate President Ben Stevens. In their raid, FBI agents seized documents involving the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board, which was created in 2003 in legislation by the elder Stevens to provide federal grants to companies to promote Alaska seafood.

Monday, federal law enforcement agents raided Stevens' home in Girdwood, hauling off undisclosed items from inside and taking extensive pictures and video inside and out.

FBI - Stevens-2649

Federal investigators and grand juries in Anchorage and Washington, D.C., have been seeking information about a 7-year-old remodeling project at the house. The project more than doubled the size of the house and was overseen by Veco Corp. CEO Bill Allen. In May, Allen pleaded guilty to bribing state lawmakers and agreed to cooperate with authorities in further corruption probes. Veco vice president Richard Smith has also pleaded guilty to identical charges. Allen and Smith resigned from Veco.

It's not clear whether the FBI's investigation into Veco is connected to the investigation into the Seward land transaction. The Washington Post reported that the FBI is working with the Interior Department on the SeaLife Center deal.

But the land deal first piqued the interest of federal investigators after an April 2006 article in the Daily News detailed the transaction and the resulting community uproar.

LAND DEAL IN SEWARD

McCabe, a Seward native who is now a high-profile fishing lobbyist, was looking for a buyer for the Arcade Building, a rundown waterfront property that had housed a pawn shop. McCabe bought the Arcade in 2003, when the National Park Service was looking for downtown land to build a new $20 million visitor center. Kenai Fjords National Park is nearby.

The federal government eventually bought several other parcels, including a second one McCabe owned. But negotiations reached a dead end in July 2005 after the government balked at McCabe's asking price.

A month later, Stevens used his power over congressional appropriations to transfer all $1.6 million left in the visitor center's land-purchase fund to the SeaLife Center. The move surprised officials with the city of Seward, which had been slated to receive the money.

The SeaLife Center then agreed to spend $558,000 of the federal windfall to buy the Arcade building from McCabe and his partner, Dale Lindsey, a Seward businessman.

At the time, Stevens' office and the SeaLife Center said the money was diverted and spent to help the marine facility as well as to revitalize downtown Seward. They said it was not to bail out McCabe.

But the transaction opened a rift between the SeaLife Center and city administrators. City officials did not return calls Tuesday.

At the time, the city manager wrote the SeaLife Center, saying city approval of such purchases was necessary "to avoid future problems and possible allegations of impropriety." He never said publicly what he meant by "impropriety" and refused to be interviewed at the time of the original Daily News report.

MIDTOWN ANCHORAGE LAND

Meanwhile, Roll Call also reported that a Senate subcommittee has asked questions about a Stevens earmark for a National Archives Building in Anchorage. A subcommittee of the Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee met with National Archives staffers Friday for an explanation of how the federal agency bought land for a new regional archives building.

"My understanding was that they just went over the whole timeline of the purchase of the land, and it's really quite straightforward," said Susan Cooper, a Washington-based spokeswoman for the archives.

The Midtown Anchorage land for the archives was sold to the government by Anchorage developers John Rubini and Leonard Hyde.

FBI - Stevens-2650

Stevens had a lucrative investment with Rubini and Hyde but gave it up in 2004, saying media scrutiny of the arrangement made it too difficult to hold on to. He put about $1 million in profit from his investment into a blind trust.

STEVENS' TIES

These three projects tied to Sen. Ted Stevens have come under question:

Alaska SeaLife Center

Trevor McCabe, a former aide to Sen. Ted Stevens and a business partner of Stevens' son Ben, was able to sell the derelict Arcade building to the federally funded SeaLife Center when Ted Stevens earmarked a special appropriation to the science center and aquarium in 2005. The matter is now under investigation by the Interior Department's inspector general.

Stevens' Girdwood home

In 2000, Stevens more than doubled the size of his official residence. The main contractor said the oil field service company Veco reviewed more than $100,000 in invoices prior to Stevens paying them. On Monday, the FBI and IRS spent 12 hours inside the home under a search warrant as part of an investigation into whether Stevens paid for the entire project.

National Archives site

A Senate subcommittee is asking questions about the National Archives' purchase in 2004 of an Anchorage lot for $3.5 million, according to Capitol Hill publication Roll Call. The sellers, Leonard Hyde and Jonathan Rubini, two former business partners of Sen. Ted Stevens, more than doubled their investment in a year. Stevens earmarked the appropriation to purchase the site, though there was no indication he personally benefited.

Official ties with Big Oil now bind in uncomfortable ways - Line between industry, Alaska politics blurred

One former state representative is guilty of bribery. Three more await trial on similar charges. The state's lone congressman is under federal investigation for corruption. A U.S. senator just had his home searched by the FBI.

This is not what Vic Fischer envisioned when he and about 50 others drafted the state's constitution 50 years ago.

Now in the wake of the most recent development -- Sen. Ted Stevens' Girdwood home being searched by the feds -- Fischer, current lawmakers and political analysts say the state is reaping what it sowed from years of lax oversight and a cozy relationship with the oil industry.

"Greed is rampant," said Fischer, who helped draft the state's constitution in 1956. "The character of the politicians has changed a lot.

"I'm very disgusted. It's not so much a matter of betrayal. It's more a matter of sadness and concern, but most of all disgust."

The common denominator in all but one case is former oil field services executive Bill Allen, who recently pleaded guilty to bribing lawmakers who were considering an oil tax bill. He remains at the center of emerging corruption probes.

Allen's company, Anchorage-based Veco Corp., has long been a heavy-hitting player in North Slope oil and gas operations. But Allen and former company vice president Rick Smith, who pleaded guilty with Allen, became political activists as well.

Allen was once a fixture in the state's capital. His presence was so strong he was credited as the driver behind a legal change in the definition of a lobbyist. It went from someone who does four hours of dedicated lobbying a month to 40 hours a month. The change essentially meant Allen no longer had to register as a lobbyist.

BLURRING LINES

But Allen was still pushing his agenda with meetings in the Baranof Hotel and in the Capitol, lawmakers and court records say. He was even spotted improperly passing notes to lawmakers over a railing during a House floor session last year.

FBI - Stevens-2652

Eventually, the lines between the industry and politics became blurred, said former House minority leader Ethan Berkowitz. He said the state's checks-and-balances system eroded into something that is now broken.

"We've been a one-party state and a one-industry state for too long," he said. "The economic and political power has consolidated into just a few hands and that breeds contempt. That kind of concentration of power gives rise to fascist tendencies."

Berkowitz is fast becoming known for a sound bite captured during a May 2006 floor session questioning the lobbyist-lawmaker relationship.

"This is our floor. Our floor," Berkowitz said, addressing House Speaker John Harris. "No telephone call's supposed to change what we're doing.

"No lobbyist is supposed to peer over the railing and tell us to change our mind. Never should happen."

It was ultimately a precursor of things to come a few months later when the FBI raided the offices of several state lawmakers, including Stevens' son, former Senate President Ben Stevens.

The probe has widened to include two of Washington, D.C.'s most senior and outspoken lawmakers who have directed billions in federal funding to Alaska: Stevens and Don Young.

It's brought national attention to a state that touts its beauty and rugged landscapes, wild salmon and spectacular Northern Lights. But if things progress, its reputation for political corruption could become akin to that of New Jersey or Louisiana, some political analysts said.

"I don't think anybody is going to cancel a summer cruise because of Ted Stevens," said John Pitney, political science professor at Claremont McKenna College in Southern California. "But it does hurt the brand.

"It's difficult to quantify, but that tarnish probably carries a price. It makes it more difficult to press the state's rights or needs when arguing with the federal officials and general public."

This potential predicament is not lost on Republican Gov. Sarah Palin, who last year ran her campaign on ethics reform and recently signed into law a 43-page ethics reform bill, a document originally introduced as an eight-page offering in January.

PALIN PUSHES

In 2004, as chairwoman of the Alaska Oil and Gas Conservation Commission, she exposed Alaska Republican party chairman Randy Ruedrich for ethical violations when he was a fellow commissioner.

He was fined $12,000, the largest civil fine in a state ethics case, for conducting partisan political activity from his state office and leaking a confidential memo to an energy company lobbyist.

Now Palin is trying to convince federal officials that Alaska can foster the right development for a multibillion-dollar pipeline she hopes will ship trillions of cubic feet of natural gas from the North Slope to market.

"We should be a leader in energy policy," she said "The only way we can lead is if the rest of the nation is confident our leaders are willing to serve for the right reasons."

FBI - Stevens-2653

Monday's raid on Stevens' home comes as he and Young ramp up for another election in 15 months; meanwhile, former state lawmakers Bruce Weyhrauch and Pete Kott prepare for a September trial, and Vic Kohring braces for an October trial on bribery charges.

At 48 years, Alaska may be a young state -- young enough for some constitution framers to still be around -- but it's also old enough to know better.

How the state responds, only time will tell.

"It's a wake-up call for Alaska to demand better from its elected and appointed officials," Palin said. "It's a wake-up call that we cannot continue to go down the path that we're on.

"My concerns -- and I don't hear enough of talk about this -- are that any culture of corruption that exists, what does this do to our kids?

"I'm worried about what it's doing to our next generation of leaders who will be voting soon. What will they think?"

The change starts with that next generation, says Fischer, who is among four remaining constitutional drafters alive and still touting the state's virtues.

"I hope people or Alaska respond and don't just start voting, but think about whom they are voting for and not just the people who will bring home the bacon," he said.

"The presumption was that elected officials and public servants will be ethical. There was no fear of that not happening. Sadly, that's not the case right now."

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- There was no hype for the debate that unfolded this morning on KWHL 106.5 fm radio. In fact, listeners might call it spontaneous combustion, as Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich and Ray Metcalfe found themselves lobbing verbal bombs at each other.

Metcalfe has raised allegations that Begich acted improperly in his actions to support the rezoning of a property in 2004.

Begich hit back this morning.

It was a busy day for the mayor, who was making the rounds and scoring airtime on just about every radio talk show in the city, defending his actions from the 2004 rezoning vote.

Begich advocated rezoning the property at the corner of Denali and 40th Streets from residential to commercial just before the National Archives Administration bought it from local real estate developers John Rubini and Leonard Hyde, who more than doubled their money on the property after owning it for just one year.

At the time, Begich was an investment partner with the pair in a separate property, the Calais buildings in midtown.

Metcalfe, who has spent years criticizing Sen. Ted Stevens and his son, former State Senate President Ben Stevens, now claims Begich too worked to help his business partners.

Metcalfe called into k-whale's "Bob and Mark Show" to continue the public dialogue on Begich's real estate investments.

Begich immediately called in as well, and the debate was on.

"Your facts don't fly ... Mark this is not a debate ... Yes it is because you questioned my character and I don't appreciate it Ray, when you're not telling the truth."

FBI - Stevens-2655

"He was opposed to it when the former owners owned it. He became an advocate of it when his business partner owned it."

"Somehow you infer that I manipulated the process (and) suddenly got the Spenard Community Council, got the Assembly, got the Planning and Zoning Commission, got everybody, including the park advocates to support this rezoning, one that's false."

Anchorage Mayor Mark Begich and Ray Metcalfe squared off on a morning radio talk show. (Scott Jensen/KTUU-TV)

Bob and Mark sat back and let the sparks fly.

"It's great radio, absolutely. The great thing about it is they talked for a good 20 minutes and I think mark and I probably interjected twice, we just let them go at it," Bob Lester said.

Ultimately, Begich theorized why Metcalfe was bringing up the allegations.

"Your real agenda here Ray, and be frank you should answer it to Bob and Mark, the real agenda is here that you are considering a run for U.S. Senate against Ted Stevens and you think I might be in that race and all you're doing is shooting. The difference is I don't hide behind lawyers, I don't hide behind fancy spokespeople, I'm direct," Begich said.

If accurate, Begich's assumption could mean Anchorage will be hearing a lot more exchanges between these two.

Metcalfe said he has not decided whether or not to run for Stevens' seat, but did say, "From the reaction I've gotten from the public, I'd be crazy not to."

Keller sworn in to replace Kohring in House - 'INTEGRITY AND HONOR': New lawmaker says he'll spend the rest of the summer getting up to speed.

Lt. Gov. Sean Parnell administered the oath of office July 27 to Wes Keller of Wasilla, the man chosen by Gov. Sarah Palin to fill the legislative seat vacated by Vic Kohring.

"I have known him to live a life of integrity and honor in Juneau," Parnell said.

Palin pinned the state seal on Keller's tan lapel after the official documents were signed. While Mat-Su Republicans were choosing a candidate to replace Kohring after he resigned his District 14 House seat in July, Palin said she wanted a candidate with integrity, someone who could help shed the image of "politics as usual" in the state.

The legislative majority affirmed Keller last week to serve out the remainder of Kohring's term. Kohring resigned after being arrested and charged with federal bribery and corruption charges for taking money from oil field services company Veco in return for support on oil issues. Kohring has said he is innocent and resigned to focus his efforts on his defense.

Keller, a legislative aide to state Sen. Fred Dyson since 1999, said he'd use the summer to get up to speed on Valley issues.

"We're right down to it," Keller said. "I'm hiring staff and getting the office in order. It's going to be a busy fall."

Keller's swearing-in came at the tail end of a military appreciation service at the governor's picnic held July 27 in Wasilla. At the event, 46 people, 42 from the Valley, lined up to get a Blue Star banner signifying that they had a family member on active duty.

Bert Hall, who coordinated the Blue Star banner distribution, said his research showed that the tradition of hanging a blue star in the windows of homes with a soldier serving in war began during World War I.

"It's representative of our way to show recognition to those who are serving," Hall said.

Blue Star banners can be obtained at the Wasilla Chamber of Commerce at 415 E. Railroad Ave. Chamber offices are open from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., or military family members can contact executive director Cheryl Metiva by e-mail at cherylm@wasillachamber.org.

Divisive Pebble mine project gets a new big-bucks backer - INVESTMENT: London-based mining giant now on board.

One of the world's largest mining companies said Tuesday it will pump up to $1.425 billion into Alaska's massive and controversial Pebble prospect.

Under a new 50-50 joint venture, the Pebble copper-and-gold project near Iliamna in Southwest Alaska will have new leadership, composed of executives from London-based mining giant Anglo American and Northern Dynasty Minerals Ltd., the company that owns the deposit.

Anglo and Northern Dynasty said their agreement will not change the ownership of Pebble, though the companies will have equal rights in developing the deposit.

If it is developed, Pebble could become one of the world's largest mines. The controversy stems from Pebble's location in the headwaters of two rivers that feed Bristol Bay, one of the world's biggest salmon fisheries. The project faces intense opposition from environmental groups, fishermen and some villages in the Bristol Bay region.

"There's going to be a mine," Bruce Jenkins, Northern Dynasty's chief operating officer, said Tuesday. The companies will prove it can be done responsibly, without harming fish, he said.

Though Northern Dynasty is still drilling to determine the full extent of Pebble's riches, its executives said this year that they believe Pebble could be the largest mineral deposit of its kind in the world. It could be developed with underground and/or open-pit mining methods.

The companies said Tuesday their targeted production start date at Pebble is 2015, though they will have to acquire state and federal permits.

Pebble's opponents said they are hopeful that Pebble will be stopped. "The strength of the opposition in the (Bristol Bay) region is growing. If we band and work together, there's probably a way, I'm hoping, to prevent it from happening," said Bobby Andrew, a Dillingham resident and president of Aleknagik Natives Ltd.

COMPANY HAS WORLDWIDE REACH

Anglo chief executive Cynthia Carroll said in a press release that Anglo is looking forward to working closely with Alaskans, specifically the communities of the Bristol Bay area and the Kenai Peninsula. Pebble has a potential to be a "world-class operation," she said.

FBI - Stevens-2658

Anglo, based in London, was formed in South Africa. Last year it earned $6.4 billion in profit on $33 billion in revenue. It has operations in 45 countries, spanning Europe, Africa, Australia, North and South America and Asia. In North America, Anglo owns two Canadian diamond mines and the Cripple Creek and Victor Gold Mine in Colorado.

Anglo is involved in two large copper mines and is developing others as well, Jenkins said.

Anglo and Northern Dynasty said they will create a new company to explore and develop Pebble. Jenkins said the company will be based in Anchorage and its chief executive will live here.

The companies signed their agreement Tuesday after notifying regulators. Northern Dynasty said it stopped trading of its stock on the Canadian and U.S. stock exchanges at midafternoon in anticipation of signing the deal.

ANGLO MAKES A COMMITMENT

The deal was reached after the Vancouver, British Columbia-based junior mining company negotiated for more than a year with roughly 15 other large mining companies, Jenkins said.

Many observers had anticipated that Northern Dynasty would partner with Rio Tinto, another London-based mining giant, which already owns nearly 20 percent of Northern Dynasty.

It remained unclear Tuesday whether the new agreement will have direct consequences for Rio Tinto's involvement. The stock ownership in Northern Dynasty will not change, and there will be no dilution of shareholder stock, Jenkins said.

In the past, Northern Dynasty had publicly discussed forming a consortium -- comprising a number of companies or other investors -- to develop and run Pebble. That idea could be re-evaluated in the future, Jenkins said.

Anglo is committing to spending $125 million to finish a pre-feasibility study for the mine, targeted for the end of next year.

To retain its 50 percent partnership, Anglo will then have to commit $325 million for a feasibility study, targeted for 2011. If a decision then is made to develop a mine, Anglo must commit $975 million to build it.

ANGLO'S TRACK RECORD

Though its critics are running an ad campaign against Pebble, warning of environmental disaster and pollution, Northern Dynasty says it would build a sound mine, with no net loss to the region's fisheries.

Some local business leaders said Tuesday they were pleased to hear about the new joint venture at Pebble. "It's important to send the proper message to companies contemplating investment in Alaska -- that we are open for business," said Jason Brune, executive director of the Anchorage-based Resource Development Council, a business booster group.

He said Anglo appears to have a track record of doing responsible development around the world.

Like many other global mining companies, Anglo has encountered sharp criticism from environmental and human rights groups. In 2005, for example, the international group Human Rights Watch complained about Anglo's activities in Africa's Democratic Republic of Congo. The same year, Anglo said it was ramping up its human rights activities around the world, with a special focus on conflict zones.

Feds: error didn't affect Kohring's conviction

The Associated Press

ANCHORAGE, Alaska - Federal prosecutors say in court papers that the government erred in failing to turn over evidence favorable to former Rep. Vic Kohring before his corruption trial but the mistake didn't affect his conviction.

Kohring was convicted of accepting bribes in 2007. He was released on bail last year in the middle of his 3 1/2-year prison sentence while he pursued an appeal.

The Anchorage Daily News reports a new team of prosecutors made in a filing Friday in U.S. District Court in Anchorage. In papers, they say mistakes in handling discovery before the trial were "regrettable" but Kohring received a fair trial.

Feds say error did not affect Kohring verdict

Federal prosecutors admitted Friday the government erred in failing to turn over favorable evidence to former Rep. Vic Kohring before his 2007 corruption trial, but asserted the mistakes made no difference in the outcome of the case: guilty verdicts on three of four felony counts.

Kohring, a Wasilla Republican, was released on bail last year in the middle of his 3 1/2-year prison sentence while he pursued an appeal. He argued that the charges should be dismissed because of prosecutorial misconduct, or at a minimum that he get a new trial.

But a new team of prosecutors said in a filing Friday evening in U.S. District Court in Anchorage that the jury correctly found that Kohring was a "corrupt public official who betrayed the public trust in exchange for cash handed to him by businessmen seeking to buy his official acts." While it was "regrettable" that the original trial team made mistakes in handling discovery, Kohring received a fair trial, they said.

Under court rules, Kohring will get the last word in the written arguments, then U.S. District Judge John Sedwick will rule on the motion for dismissal.

In a similar appeal in February, Sedwick ruled that former House Speaker Pete Kott, an Eagle River Republican, had received a fair trial in 2007 when he was convicted on three corruption charges. Kott remains free while he appeals his case to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF ALASKA

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. VICTOR H. KOHRING, Defendant.	Case No. 3:07-cr-00055-JWS

GOVERNMENT'S RESPONSE TO KOHRING'S MOTION TO DISMISS, OR IN THE ALTERATIVE, FOR AN ORDER GRANTING A NEW TRIAL

On June 10, 2009, the Ninth Circuit charged this Court with determining: "(1) whether the government breached its obligation of full disclosure under Brady [v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963),] and Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 150, 154 (1972); (2) if so, whether the defendant was prejudiced by the violation; and (3) if the defendant was prejudiced, what the remedy should be." United States v. Kohring, 9th Cir. No. 08-30170 (Doc. 41). Defendant Victor Kohring has now asked this Court to vacate his convictions and dismiss the indictment, or in the alternative, for an order granting a new trial. Doc. 269. For the reasons set forth below, however, Kohring has not established a constitutional discovery violation warranting a new trial, much less dismissal. This Court should therefore deny Kohring's motion.

I. INTRODUCTION

A jury convicted Kohring of three public corruption-related felony counts after being presented with several incriminating audio and video recordings, including one video capturing him approaching Bill Allen in the heart of the legislative session and asking for $17,000. In his motion, Kohring scarcely mentions this evidence, and instead asserts that he is entitled to a new trial or dismissal based on bits of information he has selectively picked from the prosecutors' files. As we explain below, in light of the incriminating recordings, none of the information produced post-trial about which Kohring now complains would have affected the jury's verdict. Furthermore, each item focused on by the defendant was either in fact disclosed to him, merely cumulative to other information known to him, inadmissible at trial, or so immaterial when considered in the full context of all the evidence against Kohring, that there is no reasonable probability that, had it been disclosed, it would have made a difference in the jury's verdict. As a result, there are no grounds under either Brady or Giglio to discard the jury's verdict and require a new trial.

The government does not dispute, however, that some of the information Kohring identifies was favorable to him, and that while it was not material — as this Court has already found in United States v. Kott, 3:07-cr-056, Doc. 429 — prudence dictates that it should have been provided to him before trial. Indeed, it is clear that there were regrettable missteps in this case with respect to discovery. Beyond the narrow confines of this case, the missteps here and in other cases have had a nation-wide effect. As a result, the Department of Justice has taken significant steps to improve training for all federal prosecutors, has mandated written discovery policies in each United States Attorney's Office and litigating Division, and has established discovery points of contact both at headquarters and in each Office, to help monitor and improve routine practices nationwide.

Nevertheless, as in Kott, the mistakes in this case do not warrant either a new trial or, more drastically, dismissal of the indictment. The focus of a materiality analysis under Brady is "whether[,] [in the absence of the undisclosed information, the defendant] received a fair trial, understood as a trial resulting in a verdict worthy of confidence." Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419, 434 (1995). Thus, while the government accepts responsibility and represents to this Court its regret and commitment to improvement, it nevertheless contends that under the law and the facts of this case, Kohring received a fair trial and the jury's verdict should stand. Cf. United States v. Lloyd, 71 F.3d 408, 410 (D.C. Cir. 1995) ("The purpose in Brady is not to punish a wrongdoing prosecutor, but rather to assure that the defendant was not convicted without due process of law.").

II. APPLICABLE LAW

In Brady v. Maryland, the Supreme Court held that "the suppression by the prosecution of evidence favorable to an accused upon request violates due process where the evidence is material either to guilt or punishment, irrespective of the good faith or bad faith of the prosecution." 373 U.S. at 87. In Giglio, the Supreme Court extended this principle to include evidence that impeaches a witness's credibility. 405 U.S. at 154; Silva v. Brown, 416 F.3d 980, 985, 988 (9th Cir. 2005). "[E]vidence is material only if there is a reasonable probability that, had the evidence been disclosed to the defense, the result of the proceeding would have been different." United States v. Bagley, 473 U.S. 667, 682 (1985). A "reasonable probability" is "a probability sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome." Id.; see also id. at 678 (conviction should be reversed "only if the evidence is material in the sense that its suppression undermines confidence in the outcome of the trial").

In cases decided since Brady, the Court has explained its limits, emphasizing repeatedly that the relevant focus is to be whether the nondisclosure of particular information resulted in the denial of a fair trial by undermining confidence in the reliability of the jury's finding of guilt. For example, in United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976), the Court emphasized as a "critical point" that "the prosecutor will not have violated his constitutional duty of disclosure unless his omission is of sufficient significance to result in the denial of the defendant's right to a fair trial." Id. at 108. The Court further explained that, because "[t]he proper standard of materiality must reflect our overriding concern with justice of the finding of guilt," a prosecutor's failure to disclose exculpatory evidence violates the Constitution only "if the omitted evidence creates a reasonable doubt that did not otherwise exist." Id. at 112. The Court emphasized that "there is, of course, no duty to provide defense counsel with unlimited discovery of everything known by the prosecutor." Id. at 106. The Agurs Court expressly rejected the notion that a trial court should set aside a conviction where "the error did not influence the jury, or had but very slight effect." Id. at 112.

The facts of Agurs make it clear that the Supreme Court meant what it said; in that case, the female defendant was charged with stabbing a male companion with whom she had enjoyed "a brief interlude," and her defense was that she had been attacked by the victim and acted in self-defense. Id. at 98-100. Agurs discovered after trial that the victim had two criminal convictions for assault involving knives. Id. at 100-01. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court agreed that the evidence was not material because after a "thorough and entirely reasonable" appraisal of the entire record, the district court "remained convinced of [Agur's] guilt beyond a reasonable doubt." Id. at 114.

Similarly, in Bagley, the Court considered and rejected the expansion of Brady to reach nonmaterial, inadmissible information. The Court explained that the purpose of the Brady rule "is not to displace the adversary system . . . but to ensure that a miscarriage of justice does not occur." 473 U.S. at 675. For that reason, "the prosecutor is not required to deliver his entire file to defense counsel, but only to disclose evidence favorable to the accused that, if suppressed, would deprive the defendant of a fair trial." Id. A rule that all information favorable to a defendant must be disclosed, regardless of its materiality or admissibility, "would impose an impossible burden on the prosecutor and would undermine the interest in the finality of judgments." Id. at 675 n.7. The Court then reiterated that "[c]onsistent with our overriding concern with the justice of the finding of guilt, a constitutional error occurs, and the conviction must be reversed, only if the evidence is material in the sense that its suppression undermines confidence in the outcome of the trial." Id. at 678 (citation and internal quotation marks omitted).

Again, the facts of Bagley are telling with respect to clarifying the Court's standard; Bagley was a Giglio case in which the government's agreement to pay two of its witnesses for their cooperation was not disclosed. Id. at 676. Even in such a case, the Court held, the information is not material unless there is a reasonable probability that had it been disclosed, the jury's verdict would have been affected.

Subsequently, in Kyles v. Whitley, the Court explained that "the Constitution is not violated every time the government fails or chooses not to disclose evidence that might prove helpful to the defense." 514 U.S. at 436-37. A constitutional violation occurs only "when the government's evidentiary suppression undermines confidence in the outcome of the trial." Id. at 434 (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). Thus, the fact that information might be "favorable" to the defense, or that the defense might be able to make some use of it in cross-examination is only the beginning of the analysis; the issue is whether the information is so significant that the fact the defense was unable to make use of it actually undermines confidence in the jury's verdict. As the Court observed in Strickler v. Greene, 527 U.S. 263 (1999), there is "never a real 'Brady violation' unless the nondisclosure was so serious that there is a reasonable probability that the suppressed evidence would have produced a different verdict." Id. at 281.

Because materiality is defined by measuring the degree to which suppressed evidence "undermine[s] confidence in the outcome," Bagley, 473 U.S. at 678, a materiality analysis typically demands that the probative value of the suppressed evidence be weighed against the government's evidence at trial, because the stronger the government's evidence is at trial the less probable it is that suppressed evidence favorable to the accused would have affected the jury's verdict. See Agurs, 427 U.S. at 112-13 ("[T]he omission must be evaluated in the context of the entire record. If there is no reasonable doubt about the guilt whether or not the additional evidence is considered, there is no justification for a new trial."). In cases where the Supreme Court or the Ninth Circuit have overturned a verdict based on a Brady violation, the Courts have attached considerable significance to the weakness of the government's evidence, which made the issue of guilt a close call at trial. See, e.g., Kyles, 514 U.S. at 454 ("This is not the 'massive' case envisioned by the dissent; it is a significantly weaker case than the one heard by the first jury, which could not even reach a verdict.") (citation omitted); United States v. Chapman, 524 F.3d 1073, 1080 (9th Cir. 2008) ("[T]he government's case to date had been quite weak . . . ."); id. at 1087 ("[T]he case as originally prosecuted appeared to the district court to have been faltering."); United States v. Kojayan, 8 F.3d 1315, 1322 (9th Cir. 1993) ("This case was close, and we find a 'reasonable probability' that, had this evidence been disclosed, the result would have been different; the evidence was therefore material."); see also id. at 1323 ("This was a close case: The jury deliberated for over two days after a one-and-a-half-day trial.").[1]

While a Brady analysis requires a court to view suppressed evidence "collectively," Hein v. Sullivan, 601 F.3d 897, 906 (9th Cir. 2010), and to evaluate it "in the context of the entire record," Agurs, 427 U.S. at 112-13, a Brady analysis nonetheless must proceed count by count. See e.g.,

[1] The overall strength of the evidence against Kohring will be detailed later, but it is worth noting that the jury had no difficulty reaching its verdict in this case; following an eight-day trial, it deliberated for just over a day before returning its verdict.

United States v. Johnson, 592 F.3d 164 171 (D.C. Cir. 2010) ("A Brady violation with respect to the defendant's conviction on one count does not necessarily affect his conviction on any other count."). For each count, then, a court must evaluate each of the three components of a Brady violation: "The evidence at issue must be favorable to the accused, either because it is exculpatory, or because it is impeaching; that evidence must have been suppressed by the State, either willfully or inadvertently; and prejudice must have ensued." Strickler, 527 U.S. at 281-82.

III. SUMMARY OF THE EVIDENCE AT TRIAL AND THE JURY'S VERDICT

The case against Kohring was based on evidence that Kohring had a corrupt relationship with Bill Allen, and included evidence that Kohring received cash payments and other financial benefits from Allen in exchange for official acts benefitting VECO, including working to pass the PPT. The government does not dispute that in this case, as this Court found in the Kott case, "Allen's testimony was a major part of the government's case." United States v. Kott, Doc. 429, at 12. However, as was the case in Kott, there was other ample evidence to support the convictions in addition to Allen's testimony, foremost being "the most significant evidence . . . [the] audio-visual recordings of activities in Suite 604 of the Baranof Hotel in Juneau, whence Allen and Smith orchestrated the effort to control the outcome of legislative action on the PPT." Id. at 2. Certainly, the most powerful evidence at trial was the March 30, 2006, video recording showing Kohring in Suite 604 asking Allen for $17,000, receiving cash in hand from Allen, and barely having finished stuffing the cash in his pocket before asking how he could help Allen to pass the PPT bill. In addition, Kohring's own admissions to the FBI corroborated much of Allen's testimony.

A. Background of Kohring's Relationship with Allen

In 2006, the Alaska legislature was considering legislative proposals to encourage development of a natural gas pipeline. Tr. 4:23-31, 5:114. The success of that venture held the promise of hundreds of millions of dollars of revenue for Allen's company, VECO. Tr. 4:116. As a result, Allen and Rick Smith spent the entire 2006 legislative session in Juneau, seeking to influence the passage of legislation affecting the pipeline. Tr. 4:31, 5:114. They targeted several key legislators to assist their efforts, including Kohring and Kott. Tr. 4:34-36, 6:58-59.

Kohring had been cultivated by Allen for several years. Tr. 4:50, 5:115-118, 123. Allen testified that starting in 2002, he had made a number of cash payments to Kohring to help him out when Kohring ran short of cash; Kohring was chronically short of money. Tr. 5:123-124; Tr. 6:62. The indictment charges that Allen made "several" such payments, between $500 and $1000 each time; Allen testified specifically about three separate occasions. Tr. 5:123-127. Smith likewise testified that he knew Allen was making payments to Kohring prior to 2006, and that they were intended to buy influence with him. Tr. 4:49-50. Although the rules of the legislature required disclosure of all gifts, Kohring never filed a gift disclosure form about any these payments. Tr. 12:64-66.

While lining Kohring's pockets, Allen asked Kohring for help and official action on a number of issues, ranging from firing an aide that had incurred Allen's displeasure, Tr. 5:132-135, to not running for a Senate seat against an Allen ally, id. at 131-132, to stalling a bill in Committee, id. at 128-130. The indictment did not charge and the government made no effort to prove that any specific payment was directly linked to any specific legislative act, and the pre-2006 events do not constitute substantive charges in the indictment of Kohring; rather, they are incorporated as part of the conspiracy charge, providing background about the development of the corrupt relationship among Kohring, Allen and Smith, leading up to the events of 2006.

B. The Events of 2006 and the Surreptitious Recordings

At trial, the jury heard testimony and listened to a number of surreptitious audio and video recordings demonstrating Kohring's corrupt relationship with Allen and Smith in 2006.

Kohring's legislative posture was strongly anti-tax. Tr. 4:57, 6:33. However, in 2006 the passage of legislation to facilitate the building of the gas pipeline required the passage of a tax bill, and Allen was worried that Kohring might balk. Tr. 5:118. Allen testified that a few days after the PPT bill was introduced, he and Smith were worried about Kohring, because Kohring did not want to support any tax and he was angry that the bill was not introduced through the House Oil and Gas Committee, of which Kohring was the chair. Id. at 5:118-122.

The government played a telephone conversation between Smith and Kohring, recorded on February 21, 2006, after the PPT tax bill had just been introduced in the Alaska legislature. See Gov't Exh. 2a. In the conversation, Kohring discussed how supporting the PPT would go against his anti-tax philosophy. Smith responded saying, "I know your philosophy[,]" and "[p]ersonally I agree 100 percent with you on those issues[,]" but he also told Kohring to "stay with the program" and warned Kohring, "don't you dare take this as an opportunity to go crazy.... To go wacko." Id. at 7. Kohring replied that he would "reluctantly go along," saying "I don't want to screw you guys over nothing, that's for sure, and hurt you guys." Id. at 8. During the conversation, they made plans to meet two nights later on February 23, 2006. Id. at 11-12.

1. The Island Pub Dinner and the Following Weeks

Two nights later, the scheduled meeting took place at the Island Pub restaurant. In a recording of a subsequent telephone conversation, on March 1, 2006, Kohring called Smith to thank him for "that nice dinner the other night." Gov't Exh 3a, at 6. Allen testified about what happened at the "nice" dinner. Tr. 5:118-121. He testified that Rick Smith "took off and had a cigarette or something" and that, during Smith's absence, Allen gave Kohring $1000. Id. at 121. Smith testified that he left the dinner table because he had "a feeling that [Allen] wanted to give Vic some cash," and he "didn't want Vic to know that [Smith] knew that . . . he might get some cash." Tr. 4:47.

This testimony was corroborated by the recording of Allen and Smith talking about the Island Pub dinner in Suite 604 of the Baranof Hotel on March 4, 2006. Both men had been drinking, and they were discussing that they had to "get dirty" and "kiss ass" "to produce" for their clients. Gov't Exh. 4a, at 2-3; see also id. at 4 (Allen saying, "I don't make a f[---] who you gotta kiss anybody's ass. Pete Kott, or who's ever ass, we gotta f[---]in' do it."). Allen offered Smith an "example" of getting dirty to produce — the Island Pub dinner a week earlier where he had given Kohring $1000:

> Allen: You know, just like ol' Vic the other night.
> Smith: S – who?
> Allen: Vic Kohring. Vic Kohring.
> Smith: I know.
> Allen: You know, you – take off and – I gave him a – a – a thousand.
> Smith: Well, you told me you, ah – that's why I left you.
> Allen: I know you did. I know you did. But that's what I – you know, that's what I gotta do.
> Smith: I know. That – that's the reason I left you guys alone!
> Allen: I know you did! I f[---]in' know that! I'm just givin' you an example. And he wo – he – he would kiss our ass. . . .

Id. at 5.

Also during dinner at the Island Pub, Kohring asked Smith about the possibility of a summer job for his nephew. Tr. 4:89-90. Smith told Kohring about VECO's internship program, and encouraged Kohring to have his nephew apply. Id. at 90-91. Smith testified that he mentioned the job to Kohring because "[Kohring] was important to us in Juneau and we were hoping that [he] would continue to support our – political issues as we saw them." Id. at 90.

Over the next month, Kohring was in constant contact with Smith, discussing the things he could do for Smith and Allen to advance the bill. Tr. 4:59-62. He offered to lobby other legislators on behalf of the bill, id. at 53, 59-62, he agreed to put in modifications to the legislation that might ease its passage, id. at 54, he agreed to raise points in caucus discussions, id. at 53, and he offered to pass on inside information about the legislature's deliberations, id. at 59. The confidence Allen and Smith had that Kohring would indeed "kiss their ass" is demonstrated by a recorded conversation on March 20 among Allen, Smith and Pete Kott, in which Kott expresses concern about Kohring's rigid anti-tax history, pointing out that he had not "voted for a tax bill since he was born." Gov't Exh. 6a, at 3. Smith reassured Kott that Kohring was on board, and would vote for the bill. Id.

Also during the following month, Kohring called Smith again about a job for his nephew. Tr. 4:90-92. Smith asked for a copy of the boy's résumé, and then forwarded it to VECO's headquarters, without even making an effort to hide the reason he wanted him hired: "He's Rep. Vic Kohring's nephew." Id. at 91-94. VECO hired Kohring's nephew, despite his youth and inexperience, and he went on to earn over $3000 for his summer's work. Id. at 95-98.

2. Kohring's $17,000 Solicitation (Count Three)

One of the strongest examples of Kohring's corruption, his solicitation of $17,000 from Allen and Smith, was captured entirely on videotape and provided the factual basis for Count Three ("Attempted Interference With Commerce By Extortion Induced Under Color of Official Right"). The day before the solicitation, Kohring explained to Smith in a recorded phone call that he was "very tired and getting kinda stressed" from his work as a legislator. Gov't Exh. 10a, at 1-2. Kohring then mentioned various VECO employees that he had recently met who lived in his legislative district. Id. at 3-4. Finally, he asked Smith whether he could drop by the next day to discuss with Allen and Smith "a relatively serious matter." Id. at 5.

The video recording of the meeting the next day in Suite 604, revealed to the jury that Kohring approached Allen — in the heart of the legislative session — and asked Allen for $17,000 to pay off his credit card debt. Gov't Exh. 11a. Kohring began the conversation by saying that he had a "situation . . . it's a financial matter" that he thought "potentially, could hurt [him] politically." Id. at 2. Kohring described the $17,000 credit card debt as "potentially . . . a court situation . . . gone to collections," and that he was "worried" "it could hurt [him] politically, it will be a public record, and [he did]n't want there to be any – any evidence of any public issue goin' on." Id.

Kohring then explained why he was coming to Allen and Smith:

> So what I wanted to do is ask you guys, ah, for your, um, recommendations as to how I can deal with this. And I wanted to suggest – a couple of, ah, things, with all due respect, and, please don't feel like I'm applying any pressure. I come to you guys 'cause you're friends. . . . and I was wondering if there'd be a possibility of perhaps, ah, doin' some kind of a project, ah, to – to make some money with you guys, or you can refer me to somebody that could help me with that. Or, as another option, maybe you could help me with, ah, some financing, like a modest loan, or something, so I can get this paid off and have it behind me, and then get it paid off to you folks, or to whoever you can help me with. . . .

Id. at 2-3.

Kohring further explained that with his "legislative salary," he was just "livin' paycheck-to-paycheck." Id. at 4. He also claimed that he was "not tryin' to come to the well": "I'm only – only here just to, ah, ask if you guys would, ah, consider helping me and suggest some options to me as to what could be done." Id. at 4. Smith, Allen, and Kohring then discussed a variety of options. Kohring acknowledged that he would have to be "discreet" because of the Alaska Public Offices Commission and the "criticism . . . because of [their] relationships, and all that." Id. at 4-5.

After Smith and Allen asked for a little time "to chew on it," Kohring claimed, "and, I – I wanna do everything, ah, completely above board, of course. . . I don't want anybody gettin' in any kind of hot water, or get criticized by . . . anybody. . . [A]nd, again, please don't feel like I'm abusing my relationship with you guys." Id. at 6. Kohring also later offered that he "would make sure that everything was, ah, done in accordance to law too":

> I would research that, as well, and I could present a hypothetical scenario to say that – ethics committee, and they give ya' a private confidential response. But, again, it would be completely hypothetical without any names mentioned, or anything, so. So nobody would . . . know who I'm associated with. But, ah, I would do that, just to make sure everything is done in accordance, ah, with law, so nobody gets, ah, embarrassed later down the road.

Id. at 11. Allen balked at the suggestion that Kohring would consult the legislative ethics advisor and remarked, "I don't know if that's real smart." In response, Kohring quickly withdrew the suggestion: "Yeah, it might be better for me to simply to, ah – to research the statute and just come to – draw to a conclusion of some kind. . . . No red flags are raised, right?" Id. at 12.

Kohring and Allen then discussed possible job opportunities with VECO that would allow Kohring to earn money to pay off his debt. Kohring stated that he was not after "any freebie" from Allen: "I would wanna make sure, Bill, that, ah, if you did have me do something for it, that it was, ah, something you truly can benefit from – from me. . . . I'd have to bust my butt." Id. at 14. Kohring said, "I want it to be above board, and. . . . I don't want anybody to ever criticize our relationship and imply that somehow you're givin' me some big benefit . . . that I don't deserve." Id. at 15.

3. The "Easter Egg" Payment

Immediately following the discussion about Kohring's $17,000 credit card debt, Allen and Kohring began discussing the upcoming Easter holiday. Kohring mentioned that it was the first Easter he would spend with his daughter, and when Allen suggested that Kohring get some Easter eggs for her, Kohring interjected, "With money in it?" Gov't Exh. 11a, at 18. Allen said, "yeah" and then turned to Smith and asked him whether he had any "hundreds." Id. Smith replied, "Yep." Id. Allen then handed several bills to Kohring.

Kohring next mentioned that he had just sent money to his daughter's mother to buy a Girl Scout uniform, along with a card and "20 bucks." Id. at 19. Allen replied, "All right. Well, then, let me – let me help you on – on that little, ah . . . on her little uniform." Id. Allen then handed more cash to Kohring. The video clearly depicts Allen twice handing several bills to Kohring, although the actual amount of money is not clear from the video.

Immediately after Allen gave Kohring the cash, Kohring stuffed the bills into his breast pocket and looked over his left shoulder before leaning in slightly and asking, "What can I do at this point to help you guys? Any – anything? . . . Just keep lobbying my colleagues for a governor's, ah, plan, right?" Gov't Exh. 11a, at 20. Allen, Kohring, and Smith then discussed whom Kohring should try to lobby about the PPT, how he should go about it, and how he would report back to Smith and Allen. Kohring then explained his plan: "My first effort will be to figure out where they're at, and then secondly, I'll politely and gently and carefully as I can, to influence them, ah, in a positive way to see that the governor's bill is the vehicle that they consider." Id. at 22. Kohring also explained that he would do this for Allen and Smith despite his anti-tax position. Id.

The following day, Kohring left Smith a voicemail updating him on what Kohring was doing to carry out the plan they had made in Suite 604 the previous day. See Gov't Exh. 12a, at 2 ("[A]s far as, uh, meeting with, uh, House Finance members that I mentioned I would, uh, do. I mentioned this to you and Bill yesterday. I have . . . scheduled appointments for me to meet individually with House Finance members to encourage, uh, them to consider . . . passage of [the bill] that's as close to the Governor's version as possible. So, anyway, just wanted to make those, uh, give you that report. . . ."). A few hours later, Kohring called Smith again, reaching him this time, to provide Smith another update. See Gov't Exh. 13a ("I just want you to, uh, let you know I'm, uh, doing what I can to help you guys out over here. I know you're concerned about the, uh, what's happenin' on the Senate side with that PPT thing and, uh, I will do the best I can as one legislator here to, uh, lobby, uh, for the Governor's bill.").

4. The McDonald's Payment

On June 8, 2006, the final day of the special legislative session for passing the PPT, the legislature was going to pass a tax rate at 22.8%, a result unacceptable to VECO. Tr. 4:98-99, 5:153. With only a few hours left before the final vote was set to occur, Allen, Smith and Kott met in the hotel suite to try to think of a way to stall the final vote. Tr. 4:99-100; Gov't Exh. 21a. Allen had come up with a plan to persuade Kohring to leave town so that he wouldn't be present, in an effort to stall the vote. Tr. 4:100. He called Kohring to arrange a meeting at the McDonald's in Juneau to "just take off." Gov't Exh. 21a, at 2.

Before Allen left to meet Kohring, though, Smith and Kott persuaded Allen that the plan wouldn't work. See, e.g., Gov't Exh. 21a ("KOTT: It'll just get Vic in trouble for dodgin' a vote."; "SMITH: And it'll be . . . Bill Allen and Vic drivin' away from McDonald's."). Allen went to fetch Kohring and bring him back to the hotel suite. Tr. 5:160. The two bought food at McDonald's and walked back to the hotel together. Id. Allen testified that on the walk back to Suite 604, he gave $600-$700 "to Vic right there by the liquor store." Id. at 160-61.

When they arrived back at the hotel, the men continued their discussion about the pending vote on videotape, which showed Allen and Kohring entering Room 604 on June 8, 2006, with food from McDonald's. Gov't Exh. 21a. After discussing with Kott and Allen how Kohring might have gotten in "trouble" for trying to stall and kill the bill, Kohring said to Allen: "But I want you to know, I – I would have done, ah, what you requested Bill. . . . I would have helped – I would have helped you out. Really." Id. at 6-7.

C. Other Evidence

1. Kohring's Statements to the FBI

At trial, the jury heard evidence that on August 31, 2006, Kohring's office was searched pursuant to search warrant, and Kohring agreed to be interviewed. Tr. 12:71-95. When federal agents asked Kohring if he had taken money or other things of value from VECO, Allen or Smith, Kohring conceded that he had done so. Id. at 74. He said that he had asked for and received money and other things, both for his own personal benefit and also for campaign contributions. Id. at 74-75. Pressed about what he meant when he said that he had asked for money for himself, he responded that he "preferred . . . to think about that question further." Id. at 75.

FBI - Stevens-2677

Later in the interview, Kohring acknowledged receiving what he called "personal gifts" from Allen, "in the range of maybe hundreds of dollars[,]" and that he "had not kept track" of the total amount. Tr. 12:75. He conceded that he had asked Allen for "some sort of strategy" to help him pay off his credit card debt of $17,000, and that he was afraid that if he went to a financial institution instead the publicity would "affect his political standing." Id. at 76. He also conceded that at the same time, Allen and Smith had given him "some money for his daughter," but claimed that it was only about $100. Id. at 77. In contrast to his earlier concession that he had received "gifts" totaling "maybe hundreds of dollars," Kohring then claimed that this gift for his daughter was the only time he had received cash from Allen or Smith. Id. He also claimed that it was his impression that these "gifts" were given to him out of friendship. Id. at 83.[2]

2. Alaska State Public Disclosure Requirements

The administrator for the Select Committee on Legislative Ethics testified that part of the job of the Committee staff was to give advice, both formal and informal, to legislators with questions. Tr. 12:51-54. She explained that while legislators may accept gifts that are related to their legislative status of up to $250 total within a calendar year, no gifts at all are permitted from lobbyists during the legislative session, with the limited exceptions of food or beverage for immediate consumption, and tickets to approved charity events. Id. at 60-62. If not related to the legislator's legislative status, the legislator may accept gifts cumulating over $250, but such gifts must be disclosed, with an explanation of why the gift was unrelated to the legislator's position. Id. at 62.

[2] Kohring also conceded that he had asked Allen for a job for his nephew, and that the job was a "great deal" for the boy because he was paid $16 an hour. Tr. 12:77-78.

She described Kohring as frequently seeking her informal advice on a variety of issues, including whether various gifts he had received required disclosure. Id. at 63-64. In fact, Kohring had filed gift disclosure forms detailing gifts of travel and hospitality. Id. at 65. However, she testified, he never sought any advice with respect to gifts or payments from VECO, Bill Allen, or Smith, and never submitted any gift disclosure forms with respect to anything received from them. Id. at 64-66.

3. Evidence from Kohring's Computer

The government also presented at trial evidence from Kohring's office computer. Tr. 12:96-106; Gov't Exh. 109. A search of that computer revealed a list of names entitled the "Red Carpet Club." Tr. 12:98. The list was divided into four categories: "Lobbyists," "Personal Friends," "Supporters," and "Other." Id. Bill Allen and Rick Smith were not listed as "personal friends." Id. Rather, they were listed as "supporters." Id. at 99.

D. The Jury Convicts Kohring of Counts One, Three and Four

Based on this evidence, the jury convicted Kohring of Count One, conspiracy to commit extortion and attempted extortion under color of official right and bribery, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 371; Count Three, attempted interference with commerce by extortion induced under color of official right, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1951(a); and Count Four, bribery concerning programs receiving federal funds, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 666(a)(1)(B). The jury acquitted Kohring of Count Two, interference with commerce by extortion induced under color of official right, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1951(a), which, as we explain below, was the only count that did not charge Kohring's $17,000 solicitation. See, e.g., Tr. 8:28-30.

IV. ANALYSIS

Kohring claims that information in the government's possession that was not disclosed to him before trial was favorable to him and that there is a reasonable probability that had this information been disclosed, the jury's verdict would have been different. He also argues that rather than grant a new trial, this Court should dismiss the indictment because of "egregious, calculated and intentional" discovery violations. Both of these claims are without merit and should be rejected.

A. The Undisclosed Information Was Not Material to Kohring's Convictions

Kohring contends that the government suppressed favorable information and that there is a reasonable probability that if he had this information at trial, the jury's verdict would have been different. Specifically, he complains throughout his motion about information relating to Allen's memory and inconsistent statements, as well as the following categories of information: Smith's previous statements about the amount of money exchanged in the Easter egg conversation (Mot. 22-23); Allen's relationship with Kohring, including Allen's motivation of friendship and sympathy towards him (Mot. 37-47); the fact that the FBI's surveillance of the Island Pub dinner did not reveal the "transfer" of "financial benefits" (Mot. 32-34); Smith's previous statements about Kohring's state of mind (Mot. 47-49); Smith's relationship with an FBI agent and her impressions about his state of mind (Mot. 49-52); Frank Prewitt's previous statements about whether he thought Kohring was corrupt (Mot. 52-56); and information about allegations of Allen engaging in criminal sexual misconduct (Mot. 56-63).

As we explain below, information concerning Bill Allen's memory was generally cumulative to information known to Kohring, on display at trial, or of minor additional relevance. Kohring's argument that Rick Smith had stated that the Easter egg payment was only $200 is based on a misreading of the email at issue, the facts on which Smith's speculation was based were known to the defense, and the entire exchange was on videotape for the jury. His contention that a prosecutor's impressions about his witnesses should have been disclosed is legally insupportable. Information that Bill Allen was motivated in part by friendship and sympathy for Kohring was disclosed to the defense, and Allen was thoroughly cross-examined on the issue. Furthermore, the notion that friendship and pity were the sole reasons for the payments is so implausible in light of the evidence that it could not have influenced the jury. The fact that the surveillance of the Island Pub dinner was unsuccessful was disclosed to the defense. Rick Smith's comments that he did not know Kohring's state of mind were not inconsistent with his testimony and were not exculpatory. Smith's relationship with the FBI agent and her subjective impressions about his state of mind were not appropriate impeachment information and were immaterial. Frank Prewitt's subjective view of whether or not Kohring was corrupt, expressed a year before the central events of this case and without any knowledge of Kohring's $17,000 solicitation, or the exchange of cash and favors between Kohring and Allen, was not relevant and could not have affected the jury's verdict. Finally, information about allegations of sexual misconduct by Bill Allen could not have affected the jury's verdict because, as this Court ruled in Kott, it would not have been admitted under the Rules of Federal Evidence, and hence was not material.

Thus, none of the information Kohring cites, whether considered individually or together, supports the argument that there is a reasonable probability that the jury's verdict would have been affected when it is considered in light of all the evidence at trial. That is, even if the information was favorable, it was not material to any of the counts of conviction.

Furthermore, none of this information could remotely impeach or call into question the jury's verdict on Count Three, the underlying facts of which were captured entirely on videotape. The government's strongest evidence against Kohring has always been the audio-visual recording of Kohring's meeting with Allen and Smith on March 30, 2006, in the Baranof Hotel. The majority of that 20-minute recording consisted of Kohring asking Allen and Smith for $17,000 to pay off his credit card debt. At the conclusion of that meeting, Kohring received cash in hand from Allen, after which Kohring immediately began discussing ways in which he could help Allen with the PPT bill. Indeed, that solicitation was the only act charged in Count Three, "Attempted Interference With Commerce By Extortion Induced Under Color of Official Right."

The elements of Count Three, from this Court's jury instructions, required the jury to find unanimously beyond a reasonable doubt that: (1) "during the period between on or about January 2006 and August 2006, [Kohring] attempted to obtain property which he knew he was not entitled to, with [the jury] agreeing on what that property was"; (2) Kohring "knew that the property would be given in return for his agreement or understanding, whether explicit or implicit, for taking some official action"; and, (4) Kohring "did something that was a substantial step toward committing the crime of extortion under color of official right, with [the jury] agreeing as to what constituted the substantial step." Tr. 8:88-8:89. As the government summarized for the jury in its closing argument, "[t]his [count] specifically relates to that $17,000 request, the payment that [Kohring] was seeking in suite 604." Tr. 8:30.

Again, the transaction underlying Count Three is entirely on videotape, and that tape speaks for itself. It does not depend on testimony from Bill Allen or Rick Smith. Allen's credibility as a witness, his memory, and his mixed motive for giving cash to Kohring over the years are immaterial with respect to this count; the only question for the jury was Kohring's corrupt motive in asking for the money, and that question could be answered by the numerous audio and visual recordings, as well as other uncontested evidence, such as Kohring's own statements to the FBI.

It is telling that in the 71 pages of Kohring's motion, one has to search for any mention of Count Three, much less any analysis of how the undisclosed information he complains of might have affected the verdict as to that Count. Instead, the motion seeks to deflect attention from the evidence in Count Three. Kohring points to several overt acts for Count One and things of value for Count Four, such as the Island Pub payment, the Easter egg payment, and the McDonald's payment, that he claims were the "the centerpieces" (Mot. 10) of the government's case. He then spends almost the entire motion focusing on those events. Strikingly, in a summary of the evidence that Kohring claims the government is "left with" without Bill Allen's testimony (Mot. 14), Kohring fails to mention the powerful videotaped evidence capturing his solicitation of thousands of dollars from Allen and Smith in a darkened hotel room during the heart of the legislative session, which is followed by Kohring's receipt of cash and then a discussion as to how Kohring could help Allen and Smith advance their legislative agenda.

The reason for Kohring's decision to ignore this evidence, as well as his refusal to analyze it, should be obvious. When weighed against the information about which he complains, it is clear that Kohring cannot show a reasonable probability that the jury's verdict would have been affected.

Kohring also cannot show a reasonable probability that the jury's verdict would have been affected on Counts One and Four. While we believe that the information about which Kohring now complains was either in fact disclosed to him, merely cumulative to other information known to him, inadmissible at trial, or so minor when considered in the full context of all the evidence against Kohring, we acknowledge that some of the information is relevant to acts included in Counts One and Four, such as the pre-2006 payments, the Island Pub payment, the Easter egg exchange, and the McDonald's payment. Nonetheless, those acts were, as we will demonstrate, corroborated by evidence other than Allen's and Smith's testimony, such as Kohring's own statements to the FBI, see Tr. 12:75 (admitting that he received "personal gifts" from Allen, "in the range of maybe hundreds of dollars"), and various surreptitious recordings, see, e.g., Gov't Exhs. 4a, 11a.

Even if the information about which Kohring now complains could have affected the jury's determination as to certain transactions — i.e., certain overt acts in Count One, or to certain things of value in Count Four — the jury's unanimous verdict as to the facts underlying Count Three demonstrates that the information would not have affected the jury's ultimate verdicts with respect to Counts One and Four.[3] That is because the $17,000 solicitation underlying Count Three also [3] Count One charged Kohring with "Conspiracy to Commit Extortion and Attempted Extortion Under Color of Official Right and Bribery." The government had to show that: (1) "there was an agreement between Bill Allen, Rick Smith and Victor Kohring to commit at least one crime as charged in the indictment"; (2) "the defendant became a member of the conspiracy knowing at least one of its objects and intending to help accomplish it"; and (3) "one of the members of the conspiracy performed at least one overt act for the purpose of carrying out the conspiracy with [the jury] agreeing on a particular overt act that you find was committed." Tr. 8:85. In closing, the government made it clear this charge "specifically relate[d] to that $17,000 request, the payment that [Kohring] was seeking in suite 604." Id. at 30.

Count Four charged Kohring with "Bribery Concerning Programs Receiving Federal Funds." For this count, the government had to prove that: (1) " the defendant corruptly solicited or demanded for the benefit of any person or accepted or agreed to accept from a person something of value, with [the jury] agreeing on what that thing was, intending to be influenced or rewarded in connection with a business transaction or series of transactions of the state of Alaska"; and (2) "the business transaction or series of transactions involved something with a value of $5,000 or more." Tr. 8:89-8:90. In closing, the government outlined the following evidence of "things of value" for this count: "the thousand at the Island Pub, the money outside the McDonald's, the money in suite 604 on March 30th, the $17,000 payment that he solicited in suite 604, and the $3,000 job for Aaron Kohring." Tr. 8:31.

constitutes an overt act and object of the conspiracy charged in Count One, and a thing of value in Count Four.[4] While the cash payments Kohring identifies as the "most significant" to the government's case are included in the indictment as part of the ongoing corrupt relationship between Allen and Kohring, none is charged as a standalone substantive offense like Kohring's $17,000 solicitation. Each cash payment contributed only a handful of overt acts out of dozens of acts involved in the conspiracy charge, and only a portion of the "things of value" referenced in Count Four. As a result, both Count One and Count Four are amply supported by the jury's verdict on Count Three even if the cash payments are disregarded entirely.

In other words, this is not a case where "there is no way to know which objects the jury relied on in its decision to convict [the defendant] of conspiracy." United States v. Manarite, 44 F.3d 1407, 1413 (9th Cir. 1995). Given the jury's unanimous verdict on Count Three, it is readily discernable that the jury agreed at least as to the $17,000 solicitation, and that there is an adequate basis for the conviction on Counts One and Four. See Hedgpeth v. Pulido, 129 S. Ct. 530, 532 (2008) (a conviction based on a general verdict supported by alternative theories of guilt, one of which is improper, is reviewed for harmless error); cf. Griffin v. United States, 502 U.S. 46, 49-50 (1991) (general verdict of guilty on count charging multiple-object conspiracy can be sustained even if evidence was insufficient to prove one object); United States v. Lopez, 803 F.2d 969, 976 (9th Cir. 1986) (judge's dismissal of one count does not undermine conspiracy verdict when jury convicted on other substantive counts constituting overt acts); see also Brennan v. United States, 867 F.2d 111, 115 (2d Cir. 1989) (convictions on substantive counts "operated like special verdicts" supporting [4] In contrast, the $17,000 solicitation was not included as part of the conduct charged in Count Two, the acquitted count. See, e.g., Tr. 8:28-30.

RICO conviction even though some predicate acts invalidated; court not left to speculate as to the grounds for the conviction); United States v. Zvi, 168 F.3d 49, 60 (2d Cir. 1999) (same); United States v. Angiula, 897 F.2d 1169, 1198-1200 (1st Cir. 1990) (same). Thus, even if Kohring could demonstrate that some of the information about which he now complains was material as to certain transactions forming part of Counts One and Four, given the jury's verdict on Count Three, it is clear that he cannot establish a "reasonable probability that the suppressed evidence would have produced a different verdict," on those two counts. Strickler, 527 U.S. at 281.

In any event, none of the information Kohring cites, whether considered individually or together, supports the argument that there is a reasonable probability that the jury's verdict would have been affected on any of the counts of conviction. We address Kohring's specific allegations seriatam.

1. Information Concerning Allen's Memory

Kohring complains that the documents the government has provided to him in post-trial discovery suggest that over the course of many months of cooperation, interviews and debriefing sessions, Allen's memory of the details of some events was at times poor, that he recalled additional details as time went on, and that he at times became confused about time frames. For example, Kohring highlights notes suggesting that, at times, Allen could not recall the specific reason for the $1000 payment he made to Kohring at the Island Pub dinner, and that he estimated varying amounts between $500 and $1000 in cash that he provided to Kohring during the March 30 "Easter egg" exchange. He places particular emphasis on Allen's attorney's notes taken during debriefings to suggest that the attorney thought Allen's memory of the McDonald's payment was "vague," and that at times Allen did not remember the context of certain meetings.[5]

Allen's memory issues were already on full display at trial, exploited by the defense and argued to the jury. This Court is of course well aware of Allen's demeanor at trial. Based on a reading of the transcript, however, Allen appears to have come across as what he was: a 70-year-old man with a significant communication obstacle as a result of his injury, and with little patience for details of dates or dollar amounts. Again, the government does not dispute that Allen was an important witness in this case and that he testified to certain key pieces of information about some of the transactions, but his memory issues came through clearly at trial.[6] Indeed, it was repeatedly necessary to refresh Allen's memory with documents in the course of both his direct and cross-examination. To the extent that inconsistencies and other failings in his memory were valuable for cross-examination, they were fully evident in the course of his direct testimony and readily available for that purpose. See, e.g., Tr. 5:154-55, 184-86. They were also highlighted by Kohring

[5] It is worth noting that much of the "information" to which Kohring refers is hardly that; rather, most of the documents upon which he relies are scattered rough notes, and do not purport to represent a verbatim exchange of questions and answers. Both the context and the meaning of the notes are ambiguous hearsay, with much of the context missing. In certain instances, the notes may simply reflect the author's mental impressions and thoughts about areas that he feels needs further exploration, but they do not necessarily accurately reflect what Allen was saying. The rough notes are not admissible evidence, and given the restrictions on use of extrinsic evidence for impeachment, likely would be of limited value for that purpose.

[6] As a result, much of Allen's testimony involved rough estimates. See, e.g., Tr. 5:123 ("I think three to four times"); id. ("usually six hundred to seven hundred"); Id. at 127 ("three or four is about as close as I can get"); Id. at 142 ("I think it was a couple of weeks after"); Id. at 147-148 ("So I give that and then I give him six to seven hundred – six hundred – seven hundred dollar bills – or not dollar bills but I think I had a – I think I had twenty – twenty-dollar bills"); Id. at 153 ("April, May. Might have been March.").

in closing argument.[7] Thus, additional information concerning his recall and memory would have been largely cumulative.

Moreover, even if the defense had been able to use the undisclosed information concerning Allen's memory for cross-examination, there is no reasonable probability that such cross-examination would have influenced the jury's verdict. Allen admitted that he was a corrupt businessman who gave cash to a number of legislators, including Kohring, see, e.g., Tr. 5:139; lapses of memory about the circumstances and purpose of some of the payments is not surprising or particularly impeaching. Indeed, courts have typically found little impeachment value in a witness's initial lack of recollection, even when it is in contradiction with the witness's later testimony (or vice versa). For example, in United States v. Collins, 551 F.3d 914 (9th Cir. 2009), there was an undisclosed taped conversation between a cooperating witness ("CW") and another person in which the CW was told about a threat against him. Id. at 917-18, 923. At trial, the CW testified that he did not recall knowing about any such threat. Id. at 924. The defense argued that the threat gave the CW a motivation to lie, and that the CW was lying about not recalling the threat. Id. at 923, 925. The Ninth Circuit found that the tape did little to impeach the CW's claimed lack of memory, and the theory that the tape established a motive for the CW to lie was "attenuated at best," especially in light of the fact that there was substantial evidence that the CW was receiving benefits from the government for his testimony; additional evidence of motive to lie and bias in favor of the government was cumulative. Id. at 925.

[7] In closing, Kohring's counsel argued: "Mr. Allen's demeanor on the stand was rather pathetic. Now, he has – and I don't mean to make fun of it – but he has memory problems, he has a brain injury. He obviously drinks too much. His demeanor on the stand – and remember his brain injury predated any of this that we're talking about here – but his demeanor on the stand was completely self-serving and pathetic." Tr 8:48; see also id. at 57 (highlighting that Allen's plea agreement did not mention payments to Kohring prior to 2006).

See also United States v. Amato, 540 F.3d 153, 163 (2d Cir. 2008) (finding that witness initially said in undisclosed interviews that he did not recall writing a fraudulent invoice but at trial testified affirmatively that he had nothing to do with the invoice was a "minor point" and not material); Johnson v. Mitchell, 585 F.3d 923, 933-34 (6th Cir. 2009) (while initial failure to recall observations later testified to at trial was potential impeachment, nondisclosure did not undermine reliability of jury verdict).

Conley v. United States, 415 F.3d 183 (1st Cir. 2005), provides as a useful contrast a case in which an initial failure to recall was material. In that case, a police officer was charged with perjury and obstruction of justice with respect to a police brutality investigation; a group of officers had mistaken an undercover policeman for a fleeing suspect and beat him brutally. Id. at 185. There were only three witnesses at trial; the officer victim, the man he had actually been chasing, and one other officer who testified about his observations at the scene. Id. at 186. However, an undisclosed FBI-302 of an earlier interview stated that when he was interviewed, the officer "could not say what happened and therefore convinced himself that he actually saw someone or something." Id. The officer went on to "suggest that perhaps if he was hypnoti[z]ed he might truly recall what was going on versus what he indicates was tunnel vision." Id. The First Circuit concluded that this information was "highly impeaching," and given the importance of the witness's memory of what he observed during the incident to the conviction, was material. Id. at 190-91. The differences between, on the one hand, the dramatic "failure to recall" in contrast with the officer's later crucial testimony at trial in Conley, and, on the other, Allen's memory issues noted in some of the notes and memoranda cited by Kohring, are stark.

FBI - Stevens-2689

This view from the courts is consistent with the reality of human memory; it is widely understood by layperson and expert alike that details of events are often recalled only after thinking or talking about them, or, in the common trial practice, having one's recollection refreshed. It would be a rare juror who would significantly discount a refreshed recollection that is consistent with other evidence in the case, and thus, typically evidence of an initial failure to recall does little to impeach. Such evidence is thus not material, in that there is no reasonable probability that its disclosure could have affected the jury's verdict.

For similar reasons, in Kott, addressing identical memory concerns about the same witness during the same time period, this Court had little trouble rejecting the claim that the information about Allen's poor recall was material:

> In the court's view, the government easily has the better of the argument regarding this evidence. Evaluated within the totality of the materials produced, taken in the context of an entire interview or document, considered in the proper time sequence, and compared to the very substantial evidence at trial from the surreptitious recordings, the newly disclosed evidence in this category is not material, because there is no reasonable probability that its timely production and use by the defense would have resulted in different verdicts.

Kott, Doc. 429, at 8-9. The result should be the same here.

In any event, at best, even if the defense had been able to use the undisclosed information concerning Allen's memory for cross-examination, there is no reasonable probability that such cross-examination would have influenced the jury's verdict on Count Three. Kohring has not even attempted to explain in his motion how it could have. Allen's memory had no relevance to the video of Kohring approaching Allen during the legislative session, as the PPT bill was being debated, and asking for $17,000 to settle a "financial matter" that Kohring thought "potentially, could hurt [him] politically." Gov't Exh. 11a.

2. Information about Allen's Videotaped Easter Egg Money Payment to Kohring on March 30, 2006

Kohring's complaint about the information concerning the March 30, 2006, "Easter egg" payment is a single e-mail sent by one of the prosecutors to his supervisors during trial preparation. Kohring argues (Mot. 22-23) that this e-mail contains Brady information because it suggests that the cash handed over to Kohring may have been only $200, rather than the $600 to $700 Allen testified to at trial, and thus arguably supports his "gift" defense. He also contends (Mot. 23) that it impeaches Allen's testimony generally about the sums of money he was paying to Kohring. More seriously, he argues (Mot. 3-5) that this e-mail demonstrates that the government first hid its "knowledge" of how little money was involved by "carefully" avoiding asking Smith the question, and then knowingly permitted false information to be presented to the Court by allowing the defense to introduce Smith's plea agreement. Kohring uses this traducement — which ignores what the e-mail actually says — to bolster an otherwise unsupported claim of willful misconduct. This argument is meritless.

First, the e-mail does not say that only $200 was paid by Allen in the course of the Easter egg exchange, or that Smith knew how much cash was involved. While the author of the e-mail indicates that Smith and Allen had "different recollections" as to the total amount of the exchange, and opines that Smith had a "somewhat better recall on the issue[,]" Bates No. 4672, in fact, the e-mail simultaneously establishes that Smith could not testify as to those facts because he had no knowledge of how much Allen handed to Kohring. The e-mail says that Smith's estimate of the amounts involved "speculati[on]" and "assump[tion.]" Id. Smith "believes" that he only gave Allen a single $100 bill. Id. He "speculat[es] to a certain degree" that Allen "may have asked him for money b[ecause Allen] didn't have any [$100 bills] on him." Id. Smith "assumes" Allen may only have had

"$20 bills if [Allen] did not have any hundreds with him." Id. The author of the e-mail then opines that "[i]f [Smith]'s assumptions are right," then Allen "may" only have paid Kohring $200. Id.

In fact, however, Smith's speculation and assumptions did not amount to knowledge of how much was paid, and Allen — the one who counted out the money and handed it over — was the only witness (apart from the tape itself) who could offer testimony on the point. This was made clear during Smith's testimony, when he was cross-examined by the defense about his knowledge of the amount of money involved during the Easter egg payment. Tr. 4:151. The obvious reason Smith was not asked about this by the government at Kohring's trial was not to obscure some conflict between Smith's recollection and Allen's recollection, but because, as the e-mail makes clear, Smith had no personal knowledge of how much Allen actually paid Kohring and could merely speculate.

The actual exchange on cross-examination between defense counsel and Smith about the plea agreement, which Kohring neglects to quote in his motion, makes this clear:

Q: [Reading from the plea agreement] "Two separate cash payments totaling as much as one thousand one hundred dollars was given by Allen and Smith to A in the hotel room."
Correct?
A: Correct.
Q: And that was the day when you were talking about Easter eggs and the loan, correct?
A: Correct.
Q: Okay. And we're – we're say – the reason you say approximately is – or do you know for a fact how much was given?
A: No, I do not.

FBI - Stevens-2692

Tr. 4:151 (emphasis added).[8] Thus, on cross-examination Kohring exploited Smith's lack of specific knowledge of the amount of money involved, seeking to emphasize that Allen provided the only evidence of how much money was actually involved on the videotaped exchange, which shows Smith counting off what are apparently $100 bills. There was nothing improper about the government permitting the defense to seek to make this point, and in doing so, the government did not violate Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264 (1959), as Kohring claims. Mot. 64-67.[9]

Furthermore, the facts upon which Smith's speculation was based were known to the defense and brought out at trial. Indeed, from the tape itself, the defense (and the jury) knew that Allen asked Smith if he had any "hundreds." Gov't Exh 11a, at 18. This is the information Smith relied on to "speculat[e] to a certain degree" that Allen may not have had any $100 bills. Bates No. 4672. Allen

[8] Allen had estimated that he paid Kohring as much as $1000, Smith acknowledged handing over an additional $100 bill, and that is what Smith's plea agreement reflected. Smith's plea agreement states as part of the factual basis that the government would be able to offer evidence that during the Easter egg exchange, Kohring was given payments "totaling as much as one thousand one hundred dollars." United States v. Smith, 3:07-cr-00058, Doc. 8, Attach. A, at 3.

[9] Kohring also claims (Mot. 64-67) that when the government permitted his attorney to offer Smith's plea agreement in evidence, it was a violation of Napue. In Napue, the Supreme Court set aside a verdict after the State's principal witness testified, in response to questioning by the prosecutor, that he had received no promise of consideration from the State in connection with his testimony, when in fact that same prosecutor had made such promises. The Court held that it is a violation of due process for the State to knowingly use false testimony to obtain a conviction. 360 U.S. at 269.

In this case, the government did not use, knowingly or otherwise, false testimony to obtain a conviction. Kohring's attorney used Smith's plea agreement in cross-examination to make it clear to the jury that Smith did not know how much money was involved in the Easter egg payments, and therefore could not corroborate Allen's testimony that it was "about $600 to $700." The plea agreement does not state a fixed sum and it does not identify the source of the estimated amount ("as much as $1100"). The government already made clear that the sum was an estimate when Allen testified. Thus, there is nothing false about the estimate in Smith's plea agreement.

testified at trial that this was probably the case. Tr. 5:147.[10] The more important point is that this entire exchange was on tape for the jury to consider. Whatever the amount of money involved, the corrupt nature of the exchange — the cash handed to a legislator by a lobbyist during a legislative session, ostensibly for his children, but never reported as gifts, followed by an immediate offer from the legislator to do whatever the lobbyist wanted — was up to the jury to assess.

Kohring also suggests (Mot. 22-23) that the prosecutor's impression articulated in this e-mail — that Smith had "somewhat better recall" about the Easter egg episode — was Giglio impeachment information that should have been turned over. But, a prosecutor's opinions and mental impressions about witnesses generally are not discoverable under Brady. Morris v. Ylst, 447 F.3d 735, 742-43 (9th Cir. 2006) (memorandum stating opinion that state's witness had perjured herself not Brady/Giglio); Williamson v. Moore, 221 F.3d 1177, 1182 (2d Cir. 2000) ("opinion work product enjoys almost absolute immunity" from discovery, and prosecutor's impressions in notes not discoverable under Brady). In any event, Smith's recall of the Easter egg incident, and how it compared to Allen's, was on full display for the jury, as each of them testified about the event.

Kohring's citation (Mot. 23) of United States v. Brumel-Alvarez, 991 F.2d 1452 (9th Cir. 1993), in support of the proposition that the prosecutor's impression should have been disclosed in fact only reveals the weakness of his argument; Brumel-Alvarez involved an undisclosed document covered by the Jencks Act (because it was written by an agent who was a witness at trial about the investigation underlying the case), and contained information that the confidential informant in the case had lied during the investigation, had seized control of the investigation from the government agents and was manipulating them, and had thwarted the agents from taking investigative steps that might have developed exculpatory evidence. 991 F.2d at 1461-62. This is a far cry from a prosecutor's e-mail reflecting his view that one witness had a somewhat better recall of a particular event than another witness.

[10] In contrast to Smith's "belie[f]" as recounted in the e-mail that he only passed Allen a $100, Bates No. 4672, Smith can be seen on the video counting out a number of bills, which he hands to Allen; Allen in turn hands the bills to Kohring.

More fundamentally, nothing about the information in the e-mail could have affected the jury's verdict with regard to Count Three, which is based on Kohring's solicitation of assistance with a $17,000 credit card debt preceding the Easter egg exchange. Indeed, Kohring does not claim otherwise. Nor could he. Given the videotape evidence, it would make little sense for Kohring to claim that if the amount of money involved in this videotaped transaction was $200 as opposed to $600, the jury would have somehow viewed the preceding request for $17,000 differently. Thus, there is no reasonable probability that information about Smith's speculation on the amount of cash exchanged on the videotape would have influenced the jury's verdict that Kohring's solicitation of $17,000 immediately preceding that exchange was a criminal act. The e-mail was therefore immaterial to Kohring's conviction on Count Three.

3. Information About Allen's Relationship with Kohring

Kohring complains (Mot. 37-47) that he did not receive rough notes suggesting that at times during the course of the investigation, Allen may have characterized the payments to Kohring as having been made out of friendship or pity. The jury, however, heard Allen describe on tape his power and control over Kohring in the crudest terms, Gov't Exh. 4a, at 5 ("he would kiss our ass"), and Allen specifically cited his corrupt payment to Kohring at the Island Pub as an "example" of "getting dirty" in order "to produce." Id. That evidence was corroborated by Kohring's $17,000 solicitation for a debt that could "hurt [him] politically" and Kohring's offer to "help you guys" after he stuffed cash into his pocket. There was no history of friendship or much socializing, other than Allen paying for Kohring's meals in Juneau, between the two men; if Kohring had ever been in Allen's home it was during fundraisers. Tr. 5:117. Allen had never been in Kohring's home and had never met his family, id., and when Kohring called Allen, it was at the office, id. at 118. Allen did not even know where Kohring lived. Id. Indeed, Kohring did not list Allen and Smith as "personal friends" on his own computer, he listed them as "supporters." Tr. 12:96-106; Gov't Exh. 109. Given such evidence, it is implausible to suggest that had the defense been in possession of ambiguous rough notes suggesting that at times in interviews Allen said he paid Kohring out of friendship and pity — statements he repeated in his testimony at trial — the jury's verdict would have been affected.[11]

In addition, as in Kott, the government provided a Brady letter before trial disclosing Allen's mixed motives for providing money to Kohring. See 10/12/2007 Letter from Edward P. Sullivan to John Henry Browne, Gov't App. at 2 ("Mr. Allen has advised the government that his motivation in providing these financial benefits to Mr. Kohring was partly because he felt sorry for Mr. Kohring regarding his personal financial situation and partly so that Mr. Kohring world take official acts on the part of VECO Corporation."). Kohring also made extensive use of Allen's pity and friendship for Kohring on cross-examination, Tr. 6:35, 39, 56-58, 61-64, and in closing, Tr. 8:56-57. Thus, although Kohring could arguably have used information in the 302s and notes to cross-examine Allen further, it is unlikely that it would have altered the outcome of the trial.

[11] Equally implausible is Kohring's complaint (Mot. 42-43) that information that his "signature sign off" was to offer others help and that he did so without expecting anything in return was suppressed material information. Besides the fact that this Court ruled this habit evidence inadmissible, the jury saw and heard an example of Kohring's "signature sign off" as he pocketed the Easter egg payment, before plotting with Allen and Smith on how he could best help them with the PPT. Gov't Exh. 11a, at 20 ("What can I do at this point to help you guys? Any – anything? . . . Just keep lobbying my colleagues for a governor's, ah, plan, right?").

Finally, this is another category of prior inconsistent statements that Kott raised and this Court rejected. Kott made the same argument based on similar — indeed, often the same — jottings in rough notes indicating that Allen made payments based on friendship. Essentially the same Brady disclosure letter was sent to Kott. Furthermore, there was a far stronger argument in Kott that the two men had a relationship that could plausibly be characterized as "friendship." As quoted above, supra at 29, this Court had no trouble disposing of this argument in Kott. Doc. 429, at 8-9. The result should be the same here. Indeed, the notion that Allen was handing cash to Kohring solely because he regarded him as a friend or out of pity, rather than at least in part because of his position as a legislator, is incredible and it is unpersuasive to argue that the jury would have changed its verdict based on these notes.

4. Information Regarding the FBI's Surveillance of the Island Pub Dinner

Kohring claims (Mot. 32-34) that the FBI's failure to observe the handover of cash while surveilling the Island Pub dinner on February 23, 2006, was favorable and material information that the government withheld. He is incorrect as a matter of law and fact.

Kohring concedes (Mot. 32) that he was provided information in the form of a Title III "re-up" affidavit for the monitoring device in the Baranof suite, and that the affidavit states that the surveillance of the Island Pub dinner "provided limited evidence to further the investigation." Mot. App. F. This in and of itself put Kohring on notice that the surveillance had not observed Allen hand Kohring cash (because obviously that would have "further[ed] the investigation"), and information known to the defense cannot be Brady. See, e.g., United States v. Jeffers, 570 F.3d 557, 573 (4th Cir.

2009) ("[W]here exculpatory information is not only available to the defendant but also lies in a source where a reasonable defendant would have looked, a defendant is not entitled to the benefit of the Brady doctrine. Additionally, there is no Brady violation if the defense is aware of the evidence in time to reasonably and effectively use it at trial.") (citations and internal quotation marks omitted); United States v. Gaggi, 811 F.2d 47, 59 (2d Cir. 1987) ("[N]o Brady violation occurs if the defendant knew or should have known the essential facts permitting him to take advantage of any exculpatory evidence.").

In fact, the government provided Kohring even more detailed information about the surveillance, which he fails to acknowledge to the Court. In the Title III "re-up" affidavit for the Baranof suite monitoring device, filed at the end of March 2006, and provided to Kohring before trial, paragraph 55 states:

> On February 23, 2006, the FBI surveilled a meeting between ALLEN, SMITH, and KOHRING at the Island Pub in Juneau, Alaska. Although the surveillance was able to confirm the existence of the meeting, based upon the location of the FBI personnel and the configuration of the establishment, the surveillance was unable to yield any information about the subject matter of the conversation.

App. at 7. Thus, contrary to his claim, Kohring was informed that the FBI surveilled the Island Pub dinner, and was unable to gather any significant evidence — such as the observation of a monetary exchange — to further the investigation.

In any event, the most powerful evidence of the payment is the surreptitiously videotaped conversation a week later between Allen and Smith in which Allen told Smith that after Smith left the table, Allen "gave him a 1000." Gov't Exh. 4a, at 5. The videotape also contains Smith's confirmation that he knew of Allen's payment, and that such knowledge was the reason he left the two men alone. Id. Kohring offers no reason why Allen would have lied to Smith about having made a payment to Kohring. And, indeed, the recording pre-dated any decision by Allen to cooperate with the government, so he would not have had any motive to fabricate any aspect of the conversation.

Finally, even if it could be argued that the FBI's unsuccessful surveillance of the Island Pub dinner on February 23, 2006, somehow calls into question the videotaped conversation a week later between Allen and Smith, it would not have influenced the jury's verdict on Count Three. The FBI's surveillance had no relevance to the video of Kohring brazenly approaching Allen during the legislative session, as the PPT bill was being debated, and asking for $17,000 to settle a "financial matter" that Kohring thought "potentially, could hurt [him] politically." Gov't Exh. 11a.

5. Information About Smith

Kohring claims (Mot. 47-52) that the government failed to disclose two categories of information about Smith that he argues would have been useful fodder for cross-examination. First, he points (Mot. 47-49) to rough notes indicating that Smith stated that he did not know what Kohring thought Allen's payments were for, and that Smith thought Kohring was beholden to Allen and VECO because of campaign contributions, not the cash gifts. Second, he focuses (Mot. 49-52) on the fact that Smith and the lead FBI agent in this case played golf together once, and that that agent indicated in a post-trial interview that she was spending time with Smith because she was concerned about his psychological state. These claims are without merit.

Smith testified that Allen's intent in making cash payments to Kohring was to "keep [him] on board on political issues that we were in favor of." Tr. 4:49-50. In contrast, the interview notes (which appear to be notes of a trial-prep session) indicate that Smith stated that he did not "know" what Kohring thought; the notes went on to state that he should not "speculate" about that, and that he should instead focus on his and Allen's intent. Bates No. 243. This is not, as Kohring claims, "inconsistent" with Smith's testimony. Mot. 48. The notes merely reflect that Smith did not have personal knowledge about Kohring's intent, that he therefore could not speculate about it when he testified, and that instead, he should focus on his own intent and that of Allen. Bates No. 243. Entirely consistent with the notes, and similar to his speculation regarding the Easter egg exchange, Smith never testified about his own speculation regarding what Kohring thought. And, he was not asked to do so; as the notes suggest, he testified about his own intent (and that of Allen) in making the payments. Tr. 4:49-50.

Nonetheless, information about what Smith believed Kohring thought about cash payments does not create a reasonable probability that the jury's verdict would have been different, and certainly not as to Count Three, where Smith's beliefs and speculation have no bearing on Kohring's videotaped request for $17,000. Nor does information that Smith once golfed with the lead FBI agent and her spouse, or that she was concerned about Smith's mental state bear on Kohring's convictions. Nothing in the notes even hints that Smith was unable to understand, observe or recall the events about which he testified. His testimony was coherent and straightforward, and it is implausible to suggest that the jury's verdict would have been affected had it been informed that in the months leading up to the trial, Smith was upset and depressed about the criminal case pending against him. The FBI agent's interview does not contain information — and the government is aware of none — that Smith was hospitalized, receiving treatment for a psychiatric condition involving hallucinations or inability to perceive reality, or even that he was in fact suicidal. The interview shows only that she was concerned about that possibility. In any event, while this Court has already held that the latter information should have been produced to the defense, the failure to do so was not material, in that it "does not undermine confidence in the jury verdict." Kott, Doc. 429, at 10-11.[12]

6. Information About Prewitt's Opinion of Kohring

Kohring contends (Mot. 52-56) that the government failed to disclose information that Frank Prewitt — an individual who was not involved in the investigation of this case — expressed his own subjective opinion that Kohring did not appear to be corrupt a year before the events that formed the centerpiece of this case even occurred, and that this failure amounted to a Brady violation. That claim is without merit.

Frank Prewitt, a former consultant for the prison industry, was not involved in the investigation of Kohring during 2006. Instead, Prewitt was cooperating with the government in a separate ongoing investigation over a year earlier into allegations that consulting contracts were being offered to legislators in exchange for official acts, primarily in relation to a private prison proposal. See Tr. 12:22-46. In the course of that investigation, Prewitt ate dinner with Kohring in February of 2005, in order to sound him out. During that dinner, the conversation turned to Bill Allen and VECO. See Gov't Exh. 27a. Kohring told Prewitt that they were "very aggressive," and that "when they need something, they really let me know loud and clear." Id. at 75. On tape, Kohring specifically described Allen's request that Kohring release a bill from his committee, which was one of the legislative favors Allen testified he had asked Kohring for during the pre-2006 period. Id. at 76.

[12] The government notes, with all due respect, that, unlike this case, the cases cited by the Court in Kott, and those that Kohring cites in his motion, involve information directly related to a witness's credibility or competency, rather than what are typical worries that prosecutors and investigators have about witnesses in their cases, whether they are victims of violent crimes, victims who are fearful of the defendant, or cooperating coconspirators who are concerned about their own criminal exposure. See United States v. Pryce, 938 F.2d 1343, 1345-46 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (witness having hallucinations); United States v. Smith, 77 F.3d 511, 516 (D.C. Cir. 1996) (witness hospitalized for year and a half for severe depression); United States v. Heath, 528 F.2d 191, 192-93 (9th Cir. 1975) (improper to restrict defense cross-examination as to competency of deaf-mute, allegedly mentally handicapped witness). Indeed, the government is aware of no previous decision holding that the government is required to disclose to the defendant the prosecution team's mental impressions about its witnesses, and there are extremely sensitive issues of personal privacy and dignity created by the notion that the prosecution team's impressions of stress, nervousness and anxiety must be reported to the defense. Cf. United States v. Butt, 955 F.2d 77, 82-83 (1st Cir. 1992) (finding no abuse of discretion to exclude cross-examination about depression and suicide attempt several years before, and stating "[W]e are aware of no court to have found relevant an informally diagnosed depression or personality defect. Rather, federal courts appear to have found mental instability relevant to credibility only where, during the time frame of the events testified to, the witness exhibited a pronounced disposition to lie or hallucinate, or suffered from a severe illness, such as schizophrenia, that dramatically impaired her ability to perceive and tell the truth."); United States v. Antone, 981 F.2d 1059, 1061 (9th Cir. 1992) (in absence of evidence of psychosis, mental defect or addiction, or serious mental condition at time of events about which witness testified, no error in non-disclosure of psychiatric records).

Although the government called Prewitt as a witness, and put on the surreptitious recording of his conversation with Kohring in order to corroborate Allen and Smith's testimony about asking Kohring to move a bill out of committee, Prewitt was not an important witness in this case. Indeed, Kohring concedes in his motion that he is "not entirely clear why the government called Mr. Prewitt as a witness." Mot. 53. Nevertheless, as part of the government's attempt to proceed in an abundance of caution following remand from the Ninth Circuit, it has provided broad disclosure of all information — even of, at times, tenuous relevance — to Kohring. This included the disclosure that after the dinner meeting in February 2005, Prewitt expressed the belief that Kohring was not dirty or corrupt, and that if he were corrupt, he may not realize it. Mot. App. D.

Kohring claims (Mot. 54) that this was "admissible exculpatory evidence" that would have been a "powerful element" in Kohring's defense had it been disclosed pretrial. It is unlikely that Prewitt's view would have been admissible because Rule 704(b) bars opinion testimony about "whether the defendant did or did not have the mental state or condition constituting an element of the crime charged or of a defense thereto. Such ultimate issues are matters for the trier of fact alone."

Even if it were admissible character evidence, however, there is no probability that the jury's verdict would have been affected. Prewitt's subjective belief about Kohring, expressed a year before the events that were the centerpiece of this indictment, and thus without any knowledge of Kohring's later solicitation of $17,000, is not relevant to Kohring's guilt, including on Count Three. See United States v. Fernandez, 559 F.3d 303, 319 (5th Cir. 2009) (subjective belief of IRS investigator who concluded after an earlier investigation of defendant that he was not engaged in money-laundering or tax evasion not relevant to guilt of defendant, and even if favorable, not material).

7. Information About Allegations of Allen Engaging in Sexual Misconduct

Kohring next argues (Mot. 56-63) that the fact that Allen was under investigation for sexual exploitation of minors, and that Allen procured an allegedly false affidavit from one of his minor victims, was favorable and material information. As Kohring acknowledges in his motion, this claim is a reprise of one already raised and rejected by this Court in Kott. It should be rejected here as well.

Allen's alleged sexual misconduct and the investigations related to it were explored in detail in this Court's opinion in Kott. This Court concluded that information about Allen's "impeachable past" should have been disclosed to Kott, because it was relevant to potential bias on Allen's part; if Allen had known of the investigation into his conduct with minors, he may have hoped that his cooperation with the government might be "beneficial in connection with that criminal exposure." Doc. 429 at 16. Nevertheless, the Court concluded that it would have excluded the evidence under Rule 403 because it created a serious risk of confusion of the issues:

> Thus, admission of the evidence creates a serious danger of confusing the issues which the jury actually needs to decide – whether Kott is guilty of the crimes charged, not whether Allen is guilty of sex crimes. It also risks misleading the jury by causing them to focus on Allen's escapades at the expense of their evaluation of all the other evidence.

> Finally, it bears emphasis that Kott had ample opportunity to show, and at trial did show, Allen's bias based on the substantial value of Allen's co-operation concerning punishment for the public corruption crimes to which he had pled guilty. A difference of many years in prison turned on the value of Allen's cooperation, a consideration which made the jury well aware of the powerful incentive Allen had to shade his testimony in favor of the government. Thus, evidence regarding Allen's involvement with the minors has much less probative value than it would were it the only incentive for Allen to assist the government. Put another way, evidence of Allen's involvement with the minors may be described as needlessly cumulative on the question of Allen's incentive to help the prosecution. All things considered, it is this court's view that the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by the risks just discussed. The evidence would have been excluded under Rule 403.

Id. at 17. The same facts and analysis apply here, and the result should be the same.[13] Even if the information about the allegations had been disclosed, this Court would have barred its admission, and thus it could not have affected the jury's verdict.

Kohring seeks to distinguish the Court's holding in Kott by arguing that the case against Kott was stronger than the case against him. However, nothing in this Court's analysis of the admissibility of the child-sex information involving Allen hinged on the strength of the case; rather, the Court properly focused on the probative value of the evidence (minimal in light of the substantial bias information about Allen already available for cross-examination) against its potential for confusing

[13] An FBI-302 indicates that in 2004, the child victim initially alleged that she had signed a false affidavit at Allen's request saying that she had not had sex with him. Bates No. 4666. In 2007, shortly before Kohring's trial, she recanted that allegation, stating that the affidavit was her idea, in an effort to help Allen fight an extortion attempt by another woman. Bates No. 4668. Allen had also denied ever having asked anyone, including the child victim, to make a false statement under oath. Bates Nos. 974, 948.

Although Kohring refers to this information in his motion (Mot. 60-62), he does not develop the argument, and offers no rebuttal to this Court's conclusion in Kott that the information was not material because it could not be proven extrinsically. Kott, Doc. 429, at 18. Therefore, at most, Allen could have been asked about it in cross-examination, and he "surely would have repeated the denial." Id. As a result, this Court concluded that this line of inquiry would not have been of significant assistance to the defense, and therefore it was not material. Again, Kohring offers no reason why the result should not be the same here.

the issues and misleading the jury (substantial in light of its inflammatory nature). Here, the Court should reach the same result. Moreover, separate and apart from the Rule 403 analysis, Kohring's argument fails under a straightforward materiality analysis. "[E]vidence is material only if there is a reasonable probability that, had the evidence been disclosed to the defense, the result of the proceeding would have been different." Bagley, 473 U.S. at 682. Because the evidentiary significance of the child-sex information is minimal in light of the substantial impeachment information already available to Kohring on the issue of Allen's incentive to curry favor with the government, any failure to disclose such information was not "material" under Bagley.[14]

B. The Remedy for any Brady Violation Should Be a New Trial, Not Dismissal of the Indictment

Kohring argues (Mot. 64-70) that the indictment against him should be dismissed by this Court because of "egregious, calculated and intentional" discovery violations. Even assuming that Kohring could demonstrate that favorable and material evidence was suppressed in violation of Brady, which he cannot, such a showing would warrant only a new trial, not a dismissal of the indictment. In other words, Kohring's allegations about the government's conduct in this case, even if they were true, do not provide grounds for dismissing the indictment; he has not shown how he has been prejudiced, much less substantially prejudiced, and he has not explained how a new trial would not remedy any alleged Brady violation.

The "Brady right . . . is a trial right." United States v. Moussaoui, 591 F.3d 263, 285 (4th Cir. 2010) (emphasis original). It exists "to preserve the fairness of a trial verdict and to minimize the chance that an innocent person would be found guilty." Id.; Weatherford v. Bursey, 429 U.S. 545, 559 (1977) ("There is no general constitutional right to discovery in a criminal case and Brady did not create one."). The purpose of Brady, and the Supreme Court's later cases applying it, is to protect the fairness of the trial and to guard against the risk that an innocent person might be found guilty because the government withheld evidence. For that reason, when a "defendant's right to a fair trial has been prejudiced" by a Brady violation, the "remedy" is a new trial. Monroe v. Blackburn, 748 F.2d 958, 960 (5th Cir. 1984); Giglio, 405 U.S. at 153-54 (explaining when the suppression of material evidence or the solicitation of false testimony justifies a new trial).

In the Ninth Circuit, however, if a district court finds that a Brady violation is the result of willful, flagrant, or bad faith behavior on the part of the prosecution, Chapman, 524 F.3d at 1085, and when the defendant suffers "substantial prejudice," and where "no lesser remedial action is available," id. at 1087 (emphasis added; citations and quotations omitted), the court can exercise its supervisory powers to dismiss the indictment with prejudice. Id. at 1086 ("Brady violations are just like other constitutional violations. Although the appropriate remedy will usually be a new trial, a district court may dismiss the indictment in the Ninth Circuit when the prosecution's actions rise . . . to the level of flagrant prosecutorial misconduct."); see also United States v. Simpson, 927 F.2d 1088, 1091 (9th Cir. 1991) (explaining that dismissing an indictment with prejudice "encroaches on the prosecutor's charging authority," and therefore dismissal is only permitted "in cases of flagrant prosecutorial misconduct"); Kojayan, 8 F.3d at 1318 ("In determining the proper remedy, we must consider the government's willfulness in committing the misconduct and its willingness to own up to it."). "[A]ccidental or merely negligent governmental conduct," however, "is insufficient to establish flagrant misbehavior." Chapman, 524 F.3d at 1085.

Given that the due process right in Brady is a trial right, the violation of which is remedied by granting a new trial, Chapman's rationale for dismissing an indictment based on a Brady violation is questionable. Indeed, no other circuit has employed a similar rationale. Even assuming, as this Court must, that Chapman's rationale is sound, the case is clear that a court may dismiss an indictment under its supervisory powers only in extremely limited circumstances: (1) in a case involving "flagrant prosecutorial misconduct," and (2) when the defendant suffers "substantial prejudice," and, significantly, where "no lesser remedial action is available." Id. at 1087 (emphasis added) (citations and internal quotation marks omitted); cf. United States v. Welborn, 849 F.2d 980, 985 (5th Cir. 1988) ("The supervisory authority of the district court includes the power to impose the extreme sanction of dismissal with prejudice only in extraordinary situations and only where the government's misconduct has prejudiced the defendant.").

While Kohring asks this Court to dismiss the indictment essentially to punish the government for what he claims are "egregious, calculated and intentional" Brady violations, Kohring fails to offer any evidence to support his overheated rhetoric. Nowhere in all the thousands of pages of ordinarily privileged notes and emails that have been provided to him does he point to any evidence of any plot to violate his rights or deliberate decision to withhold known Brady information.[15] Nor does he explain anywhere in his 71-page motion why the normal remedy for a Brady violation, a new trial, [15] As in Kott, the government has given Kohring extraordinary access to the prosecutors' files since the time it moved to remand this case. The government provided Kohring not only materials that appeared at the time of the remand to be information that it may have been required to disclose before trial (thus prompting the government's motion to remand), but also a significant amount of additional material that lay beyond any obligation of disclosure. The government did so, given the unique circumstances of this case, in order to assure the defendant, the Court, and the public that the Department of Justice takes its discovery obligations seriously and to allow Kohring the fullest possible opportunity to evaluate the fairness of his trial.

is insufficient to cure any prejudice he suffered. Instead, he asserts only that the government acted in bad faith and that had the information about which he complains been available to him, it would have led the jury to a different verdict. Of course, a Brady violation, by definition, means that "there is a reasonable probability that, had the evidence been disclosed to the defense, the result of the proceeding would have been different," Bagley, 473 U.S. at 682. But, again, the remedy for such a violation is a new trial. See, e.g., Giglio, 405 U.S. at 153-54 (explaining when the suppression of material evidence or the solicitation of false testimony justifies a new trial). Were a "different result" the only prejudice required for the "extreme" step of dismissing an indictment, as Kohring suggests, every Brady violation would result in the dismissal of the indictment. That cannot be the case. See Welborn, 849 F.2d at 985 (district court "exceeds the proper bounds of its power to order dismissal of an indictment with prejudice when it fails to consider whether less extreme sanctions might maintain the integrity of the court without punishing the United States for a prosecutor's misconduct"); United States v. Hasting, 461 U.S. 499, 506 (1983) (remedies should be "narrowly tailored to deter objectionable prosecutorial conduct").[16]

Chapman, the only reported court of appeals case we have found upholding the dismissal of an indictment for a Brady violation, is clear on this point. Whatever the merits of Chapman's rationale, the Ninth Circuit in that case found that the defendant suffered "substantial prejudice," and a retrial would not remedy that prejudice because it would allow the government to "salvage" a "poorly conducted prosecution" with "myriad weaknesses" and which was "faltering." 524 F.3d at 1087. By contrast, here, the government presented a strong case against Kohring, based largely on videotaped evidence. Thus, a new trial would cure any prejudice Kohring suffered from the alleged Brady violations.

---

[16] Nor is it simply enough to establish "egregious, calculated and intentional" conduct by the government. See Cooper v. Brown, 510 F.3d 870, 924 (9th Cir. 2007) ("Under Brady, the prosecution's suppression of evidence favorable to an accused 'violates due process where the evidence is material either to guilt or to punishment irrespective of the good faith or bad faith of the prosecution.'" (emphasis added) (quoting Brady, 373 U.S. at 87) (emphasis added)); United States v. Reyes, 577 F.3d 1069, 1077-79 (9th Cir. 2009) (finding that the prosecutor committed "misconduct" by making "prejudicial" "deliberate false statements" to the jury in his closing argument, but concluding that the conduct was not so egregious as to warrant dismissal). Indeed, even in the face of the egregious misconduct in Napue, the Supreme Court did not order dismissal of the indictment, but simply reversed the conviction. 360 U.S. at 272.

United States v. Lyons, 352 F. Supp. 2d 1231 (M.D. Fla. 2004), which Kohring cites in his motion (Mot. 68), is instructive on this point. In that case, the district court found not only "a prosecution run amuck," id. at 1233, responsible for "numerous and flagrant Brady and Giglio violations," id. at 1243, but also that the government engaged in "unconscionable delay" in complying with the district court's post-trial orders to produce certain documents, which resulted in serious prejudice to the defendant who had "already served the maximum sentence the Government has called for. . . ," id. at 1251. The court underscored the importance of the prejudice the defendant suffered by the delay, acknowledging that "[i]f, within a reasonable period after trial, the Government had revealed its Brady and Giglio violations, a new trial order may have been an appropriate remedy." Id.

Kohring cites to a number of other inapposite outrageous government conduct cases, many of which uphold the denial of dismissal as a remedy and all of which involve facts strikingly different than those alleged here. See Mot. 67-69 (citing United States v. Linton, 502 F. Supp. 861, 865-66 (D. Nev. 1980) (denying motion to dismiss premised on alleged misconduct before the grand jury)); United States v. Boone, 437 F.3d 829, 841-42 (8th Cir. 2006) (upholding denial of motion to dismiss premised on alleged threatening and intimidating conduct by FBI agent); United States v. Voigt, 89

F.3d 1050, 1064-65 (3d Cir. 1996) (upholding denial of motion to dismiss premised on alleged deliberate intrusion into the attorney-client relationship); United States v. Wang, 1999 WL 138930, at *35-37 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 15, 1999) (dismissing indictment where government's actions resulted in unavailability of crucial defense witness at trial); Government of Virgin Islands v. Fahie, 419 F.3d 249, 258 (3d Cir. 2005) (reversing the district court's dismissal of the indictment for prejudice where the government failed to disclose a significant ATF report that it knew about three months before trial); United States v. Restrepo, 930 F.2d 705, 712 (9th Cir. 1991) (affirming district court's denial of motion to dismiss where a government cooperator engaged in sexual activity with the defendant and introduced her to cocaine and trafficking cocaine); United States v. Marshank, 777 F. Supp. 1507, 1529-30 (N.D. Cal. 1991) (upholding dismissal of indictment where government actively collaborated with cooperator's defense attorney in developing criminal case against one of defense attorney's other clients); Kojayan, 8 F.3d at 1325 (vacating convictions where the government asserted there was no agreement with its star witness, a co-conspirator whose testimony was critical to the defendants' convictions, when the government had in fact entered into a cooperation agreement with him)). If anything, these cases highlight that Kohring's case is easily distinguishable from cases where district courts have dismissed indictments based on the prosecution's discovery violations — those cases all involved more egregious conduct than that alleged, let alone proven, by Kohring in this case.

V. CONCLUSION

Kohring was a corrupt public official who betrayed the public trust in exchange for cash handed to him by businessmen seeking to buy his official acts, exchanges captured on tape for the jury. He received a fair trial that established his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. The government does not dispute that the trial team made mistakes in handling discovery in this case. There are many reasons for those errors, but the government does not seek to offer excuses here. In an effort to avoid these problems in the future, the Department has taken significant steps to establish clear guidelines and better training. We respectfully submit that in this case, despite any mistakes, Kohring received "a fair trial," Agurs, 426 U.S. at 108; that there is no "reasonable probability that the suppressed evidence would have produced a different verdict," Strickler, 527 U.S. at 281; and that "confidence in the outcome of the trial" remains. Bagley, 473 U.S. at 678.

Re: United States v. Victor H. Kohring
3:07-cr-00055-JWS

Dear Mr. Browne:

As previously discussed, we are making available to you today additional Jencks materials. We had also earlier indicated that we would disclose any Brady / Giglio material involving government witnesses at this time as well. The following information is provided to you in that regard.

JAMES FRANK PREWITT

Mr. Prewitt was acting as a cooperating individual at the direction of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) when he met with Mr. Kohring in late 2004 and early 2005. Mr. Prewitt had himself been the subject of an earlier criminal investigation by the FBI which started in 2003 and which related to possible public corruption issues involving the "private prison" initiative in Alaska pursued by Cornell Corrections. Prewitt was employed as a lobbyist by Cornell at this time.

During the course of that investigation, Prewitt interacted with a Deputy Commissioner of the State of Alaska Department of Corrections and made statements to him suggesting that the Commissioner might be able to secure future employment by Cornell. Prewitt, however, specifically declined to make a cash payment to the Commissioner when he was solicited to do so. That investigation also documented Prewitt's involvement in "conduit" campaign contributions.

The earlier investigation lead to Mr. Prewitt being contacted by the government in April of 2004. As a result of that contact, Mr. Prewitt agreed to cooperate in an ongoing investigation involving public corruption in Alaska. His cooperation understanding with the government is set out in the letters which are attached hereto as "Attachment 1" and "Attachment 2".

FBI - Stevens-2714

During the spring of 2005, Mr. Prewitt, through his attorney at the time, Michael R. Spaan, Esq., requested that the government reevaluate its agreement with him. Specifically, Mr. Prewitt requested that, based upon his assistance to the government up to that point, the government consider agreeing that he would not be charged with any criminal offense(s) stemming from the earlier investigation of his conduct. The government declined to modify the terms of the agreement with Mr. Prewitt.

Mr. Prewitt has also requested that, considering the time and effort he has expended as a cooperating individual in this investigation, the government consider whether some form of financial compensation to him is appropriate. In Mr. Prewitt's view - as communicated by his present attorney, Marc June, Esq. - he has sacrificed a great deal and has suffered and will continue to suffer financially as a result of his assistance to the government. No promises to Mr. Prewitt - other than that the government has taken his request into consideration - have been made in this regard. Nevertheless, we believe that his present mindset is such that he is expecting the FBI to advocate for some sort of financial reward for him due to his cooperation and assistance in the investigation.

In 1994, while Frank Prewitt was employed as Commissioner of the Department of Corrections for the State of Alaska, he accepted approximately $30,000 from William Weimar, a businessman involved in providing contractual services to the State of Alaska in the area of corrections. That matter was the subject of a criminal investigation which began in 1997. Prewitt was not charged with any criminal offense as a result of this investigation.

BILL J. ALLEN

As you are no doubt aware, Mr. Allen has advised the government that Mr. Kohring was provided a number of financial benefits between approximately January of 2002 through late 2006, including cash payments on a number of occasions. Mr. Allen has advised the government that his motivation in providing these financial benefits to Mr. Kohring was partly because he felt sorry for Mr. Kohring regarding his personal financial situation and partly so that Mr. Kohring world take official acts on the part of VECO Corporation.

Re: United States v. Victor H. Kohring, No. 3:07-cr-00055-01-JWS (D. Alaska)

Dear Mr. Browne:

As we mentioned to you during yesterday's conference call, we are enclosing copies of the applications, affidavits, and orders relating to the electronic surveillance conducted in this case. Please note that this material is being produced to you subject to the Court's May 18, 2007, protective orders, which authorized the limited disclosure of wire communications and oral and visual nonverbal communications that were lawfully intercepted by the government.

In your e-mail message dated July 22, 2007, you indicated that there are two items that may be missing from the discovery that we previously provided to you. Specifically, you have suggested that CD 0008 is missing "Item 4," while CD 009 is missing "Item 17." Our staff is looking into this issue, and we will provide you with a response as soon as we are able.

You have also requested "[t]he initial authorization – affidavit of probable cause and warrant application under the federal wiretapping statute – for sending the wired informant, Frank Prewitt, to meet with [Mr. Kohring]." Please note that, at the time that Mr. Prewitt recorded conversations with your client, Mr. Prewitt was cooperating with the government's investigation. The recordings are therefore consensual and, as such, the government did not have to submit an application to the Court.

For similar reasons, the government did not have to receive Court authorization for the consensual recordings made by Tom Anderson. At the time of these recordings, Mr. Anderson was cooperating with the government's investigation.

Your e-mail message also seeks "the affidavit of probable cause supporting the application for the search warrant for [Mr. Kohring's] legislative offices." As you may recall, Mr. Kohring consented to the search of his legislative offices, thereby negating any need to execute the warrant. Your client is therefore not entitled to any affidavits used to support our application to obtain the warrant.

Your final request seeks "any investigative report the government is willing to provide us notwithstanding the Jenks Act." Although this request is not altogether clear to us, we informed you during our conference call that Mr. Kohring is not entitled to receive copies of the FBI's interview or "302" reports relating to Messrs. Smith or Allen when those two individuals have not reviewed and adopted the reports as their own statements. In other words, the FBI "302" report is to be considered the notes of the Special Agent who conducted the interview and is not a statement adopted or prepared by the witness.

We will continue, of course, to provide you with any discovery material that we are obligated to disclose pursuant to Rule 16 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, the Court's Order dated May 4, 2007, and the discovery obligations of the United States under the Jencks Act, Brady, Giglio, and their progeny.

Very truly yours,

Court ruling on anti-corruption law affects Alaska cases

Less precise conflict-of-interest statute thrown out by justices.

By ERIKA BOLSTAD
ebolstad@adn.com

(06/25/10 18:51:01)

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. Supreme Court on Thursday scaled back an anti-corruption law used by federal prosecutors to bring to justice crooked politicians and executives, including some cases connected to the Alaska public corruption probe.

The decision threatens the prosecution of former Alaska state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch for his role in a wide-ranging federal investigation of the state's politics, and also raises questions about the high-profile convictions of former Enron CEO Jeffrey Skilling and newspaper magnate Conrad Black.

In a unanimous opinion on the Skilling case, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg wrote that it's clear Congress in 1988 intended to address bribes and kickbacks in 28-word honest-services statute, which is based on the idea that people are entitled to the honest services of their elected officials and the executives in charge of big companies.

But the statute covers only bribery and kickback schemes, the justices determined, and not the less precise conflict-of-interest cases that prosecutors also have brought against those same officials, including Weyhrauch.

Skilling's conduct "entailed no bribe or kickback," Ginsburg wrote. "Construing the honest-services statute to extend beyond that core meaning, we conclude, would encounter a vagueness shoal."

Three of the justices - Anthony Kennedy, Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas - said they would have found the honest services law unconstitutional and would have overturned it.

Criminal defense attorneys called the decision a "huge narrowing of a very broad statute," but it may mean a more difficult time for prosecutors pursuing white collar and corruption cases. The law was often used when federal prosecutors couldn't prove someone accepted bribes -- but where they had enough evidence to show they took freebies such as tickets or jobs.

"I feel vindicated on so many levels," said Weyhrauch's attorney, Doug Pope of Anchorage. "I used to be a prosecutor, and I understand the heavy power of the government. If you're going to have a statate that makes it a felony, ordinary people have to understand what it is, where the line is. The court drew this bright line."

FBI - Stevens-2721

Often, prosecutors had a "very abstract and indefinite standard" in honest services cases, particularly those where they sought to prove conflicts of interest, said Don Ayer, a Washington, D.C., lawyer who argued Weyhrauch's case in front of the Supreme Court.

"They can't continue to build on that kind of a theory, they've got to have something they can call a bribe or a kickback," Ayer said.

Federal prosecutors alleged Weyhrauch solicited legal work from the oil-field service company Veco

194A-AN-13620-M:1062

WA 4/2/12

Corp. at a time when Veco was pushing hard to win support for lower oil taxes in the state Legislature. Federal prosecutors said Weyhrauch should have disclosed his job search as a conflict of interest.

Weyhrauch's attorneys argued that state law didn't specifically require such disclosure and, as a result, the federal fraud statute couldn't be used to charge him with defrauding Alaskans of his honest services.

A federal judge in Alaska agreed with Weyhrauch, but the government appealed and won in the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. The appeals court sided with prosecutors, saying legislators had a duty to disclose such conflicts. The court reasoned that even if a state has weak ethics laws, that was no reason for its citizens to be deprived of the honest services of their public officials.

But on Thursday, the Supreme Court vacated the 9th Circuit's decision and sent the Weyhrauch case back for reconsideration in light of the Skilling decision. Weyhrauch has not yet gone to trial in Alaska. He still faces two other counts in the case, but neither apply the honest services statute.

Justice Department spokeswoman Tracy Schmaler said Thursday the government would continue to "vigorously defend" its successful prosecutions in the Skilling and Black cases as they return to a lower court for review. She wouldn't say how the government plans to proceed in the Weyhrauch case.

Anticipating the Supreme Court would curtail the use of the statute, one government watchdog group said Thursday it already has suggested legislation to make it more specific when it comes to conflicts of interest.

"Federal law currently prohibits executive branch employees from taking any official action that affects their personal financial interest, said Melanie Sloane of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. "This statute could easily be extended to cover members of Congress and state and local officials to ensure Americans are protected from government officials who sacrifice the public interest for their own private gain."

Schmaler said the Justice Department is disappointed the Supreme Court narrowed the honest services law, and is determining whether "the court's interpretation leaves us with all the tools we need to ferret out corruption."

"The American people are entitled to the honest services of both public servants and corporate executives, and the Department will continue to bring all appropriate cases in order to hold corrupt officials accountable for their actions," she said.

The head of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said the decision undermined congressional efforts to "protect Americans from abuses by powerful corporate and political interests."

"By issuing decisions benefitting corrupt officials who violate the peoples' trust, and corrupt business people who disregard fairness and risk, the court has once again undermined the government's ability to protect the interests of hardworking Americans," Leahy said.

But many criminal defense lawyers argue the decision could improve prosecutions by forcing attorneys for the government to be more precise in their indictments. Relying on the vague dishonest services statute has resulted in an "intellectual laziness" on the part of the Justice Department, said Cory Andrews of the Washington Legal Foundation.

"I think it's going to improve them and force them to sharpen their indictments, to sharpen their cases," Andrews said. "Part of the culture there, and even the mentality among the U.S. attorney's office, is that this very blunt instrument doesn't require them to have good aim."

A jury in 2006 convicted Skilling of 19 counts of conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors in his role at Enron. Black is serving a 6 1/2 year prison term for depriving shareholders of the Hollinger International media company of his honest services when he and other executives schemed to pay themselves a $5.5 million management fee.

Black's attorney, Miguel Estrada, said that they were confident lower courts "will quickly conclude that the errors that the Supreme Court has now conclusively found tainted every aspect of this case."

Supreme Court sides with former state lawmaker Bruce Weyhrauch

From Erika Bolstad in Washington D.C. --

The U.S. Supreme Court has thrown out a lower court ruling in the corruption case of a former Alaska state lawmaker, a small part of three decisions issued today that cover the wide use by federal prosecutors of an anti-corruption statute.

The decision, wrapped up in the fraud cases of former Enron CEO Jeffrey Skilling and newspaper magnate Conrad Black, means it's likely that at least a portion of federal case against former Alaska Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch will fall apart.

In the opinion on the Skilling case, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg wrote that Congress intended to address bribes and kickbacks in the 28-word honest-services statute, which is based on the idea that people are entitled to the honest services of elected officials and executives in charge of big companies.

But the statute covers only bribery and kickback schemes, not the less precise conflict-of-interest prosecution pursued in Weyhrauch's case, the justices wrote.

"Construing the honest-services statute to extend beyond that core meaning, we conclude, would encounter a vagueness shoal," Ginsburg wrote.

The decision was sought by criminal defense attorneys across the country, means prosecutors might have a difficult time pursuing corruption cases using the honest services statute. The law governing such fraud was often used in the cases of public officials where federal prosecutors can't prove they accepted bribes -- but where they have enough evidence to show that those officials took freebies such as tickets or jobs.

Federal prosecutors alleged Weyhrauch solicited legal work from the oil-field service company Veco Corp. at a time when Veco was pushing hard to win support for lower oil taxes in the state Legislature. Federal prosecutors said Weyhrauch should have disclosed his job search as a conflict of interest.

Weyhrauch's attorneys argued that state law didn't specifically require such disclosure and, as a result, the federal fraud statute couldn't be used to charge him with defrauding Alaskans of his honest services.

A federal judge in Alaska agreed with Weyhrauch, but the government appealed and won in the 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals. The appeals court sided with prosecutors, saying legislators had a duty to disclose such conflicts. The court reasoned that even if a state has weak ethics laws, it was no reason for its citizens to be deprived of the honest services of their public officials.

But on Thursday, the Supreme Court vacated the 9th Circuit's decision and sent the Weyhrauch case back for reconsideration, in light of the Skilling decision.

Prosecutors won't call Allen in former legislator's trial

WEYHRAUCH: Case went to high court, is now back for trial.

By RICHARD MAUER
rmauer@adn.com

(07/28/10 23:40:02)

Imprisoned Veco chief executive Bill Allen will not be a government witness in the trial of former Juneau state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, according to a court memorandum filed Wednesday by Weyhrauch's attorney.

In his 13-page filing in U.S. District Court in Anchorage, Doug Pope said he was told by federal prosecutors that they had no intention of calling Allen, whose credibility has suffered since he was the chief government witness in three prior federal corruption trials.

Allen's most prominent role was in the 2008 trial of former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, where Allen told how he renovated Stevens' Girdwood home and bought him numerous gifts, none of which were disclosed by Stevens. His testimony was also crucial in sending former state Reps. Pete Kott and Vic Kohring to prison in 2007.

But much has changed for both the government's corruption investigation and Allen since then.

After a jury found Stevens guilty, the case against him fell apart when the Justice Department admitted it failed to turn over significant evidence to Stevens' attorneys, including FBI reports showing Allen's statements evolving over time. Allen's statements to FBI agents generally became more damning of Stevens as Stevens' trial date approached, according to interview notes that became public.

As a result of the Stevens' debacle, six prosecutors are themselves under investigation for criminal contempt by a special prosecutor. They, and FBI agents involved in the Alaska corruption investigation, are also under internal Justice Department investigation. That status of both investigations is unknown, except they appear to still be underway.

Allen pleaded guilty to bribery and tax violations before he testified in any trial, but he wasn't sentenced until a year after the Stevens trial. He's now serving three years at a federal facility in California, with a projected release date of Aug. 22, 2012.

It's unclear how the government would prosecute Weyhrauch without Allen, but there are other Veco officials they could call. Chief among them is Rick Smith, Allen's lieutenant for political affairs. Smith also pleaded guilty to bribery and was sentenced the same day as Allen, but only to 21 months. He's due for release July 20, 2011.

The government also has eavesdropped recordings of Weyhrauch, which they could validate using FBI agents.

Weyhrauch, a Juneau attorney and two-term Republican member of the House, had initially been charged with bribery, extortion, fraud and conspiracy in the same indictment as Kott. Among Weyhrauch's alleged criminal acts was his failure to disclose that he had solicited legal work from

Veco before the end of the 2006 legislative session. Veco, a now defunct oil-field services company, was extremely active in that session, promoting petroleum tax changes beneficial to the industry.

Weyhrauch's case was separated from Kott's on the eve of trial when the government announced it would appeal a decision by the trial judge, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick, that Weyhrauch did not violate state law when he failed to disclose his solicitations of Veco.

The appeal went all the way to the Supreme Court. In June, the Supreme Court indirectly sided with Weyhrauch, making its final ruling in another case involving similar issues. It then sent the Weyhrauch case back to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to apply the related ruling, which is where that matter sits now.

The 9th Circuit told both sides to submit their briefs by Aug. 9.

Meanwhile, Weyhrauch's trial date of Sept. 13 has been pending in Sedwick's court. The judge scheduled a status conference for Friday so prosecutors and defense could argue whether the trial date should be vacated indefinitely.

Pope's filing was made in advance of the status conference. He argued for postponement until the 9th Circuit relinquishes jurisdiction. The government wants the case to proceed.

Pope said prosecutors told him about their decision to not call Allen in the course of discussions by way of e-mail, telephone and in person.

Pope also said he learned from prosecutors that they would not call the lead FBI agent in the corruption investigation, Mary Beth Kepner. Kepner hasn't testified in any of the other cases, but sat at the prosecution table during the trials. She has since been reassigned to other matters, the FBI says.

Pope said he might want to call both Allen and Kepner as defense witnesses. But he said in his memo to Sedwick that Kepner, still under investigation herself, might assert her 5th Amendment rights and refuse to testify.

Pope also said he has learned that after Weyhrauch's case was severed from Kott in 2007, the government continued to get grand jury testimony about Weyhrauch. Pope said he suspected prosecutors were unfairly trying to overcome issues they learned from evidence Weyhrauch's defense team shared with prosecutors when both sides believed they were going to trial with Kott.

While U.S. District Judge John Sedwick faulted prosecutors for withholding important information from Kohring's defense, "this court does not believe that even if all of it had all been disclosed there is a reasonable probability that the jury would have returned different verdicts in the context of the entire record."

Sedwick's order, issued at noon today, also allows Kohring to remain free on his recognizance as he continues his appeal to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Kohring had sought dismissal of his charges or at least a new trial because of the withheld information.

The Anchorage Daily News reports that Judge John Sedwick in Anchorage made the move during a brief hearing Friday morning while an appeals court decides what to do with one of the felony charges against Weyhrauch.

Sedwick set aside Weyhrauch's Sept. 13 trial date. The judge says the soonest the appellate court could be expected to rule would be around Sept. 20.

Weyhrauch was indicted in 2007 on conspiracy, attempted extortion, bribery and fraud over his relationship with the now-defunct oil-field services company Veco and its officials.

A decision in a similar case by the U.S. Supreme Court has put the fraud allegation in doubt. The high court's ruling narrowed the scope of "honest services" fraud, in which an official is accused of depriving others of honest service through hidden conflicts of interest and other self-serving behavior.

The Supreme Court directed the 9th Circuit to reconsider Weyhrauch's fraud charge in light of its decision.

Prosecutors say Weyhrauch failed to disclose that he was in job negotiations with Veco at the same time the state legislature was also considering an oil bill.

Former state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch's corruption trial has been put off indefinitely while an appeals court decides what to do with one of the felony charges against him.

In a brief hearing Friday morning, U.S. District Judge John Sedwick indicated he wanted nothing to do with a prosecution suggestion that he hear other issues in Weyhrauch's case that have nothing to do with the matter before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. It didn't make sense to spend time generating briefs and doing legal research when a ruling by the 9th Circuit could spill into other parts of the case, "rendering what we do incomplete or wrong," Sedwick said.

Sedwick set aside Weyhrauch's Sept. 13 trial date. With briefs due by both sides to the 9th Circuit on Aug. 9, the soonest the appellate court could be expected to rule would be around Sept. 20, the judge said.

Sedwick didn't say what he would do in a related matter -- the sentencing of former Gov. Frank Murkowski's chief of staff, Jim Clark, on a conspiracy charge. Clark pleaded guilty in 2008, but his sentencing has been delayed so he could get credit for cooperating, including testifying against Weyhrauch. Sedwick had originally scheduled Clark's sentencing for Oct. 15.

Both Weyhrauch and Clark are Juneau attorneys. Clark's license has been suspended because of his guilty plea, but Weyhrauch continues to practice. Just this week, Weyhrauch argued a commercial fishing appeal in Anchorage before a visiting panel of 9th Circuit judges on a case that originated before Sedwick.

Weyhrauch was indicted in 2007 on conspiracy, attempted extortion, bribery and fraud charges over his relationship with the now-defunct oil-field services company Veco and its officials. But the fraud count, which is also part of the conspiracy charge, was thrown in doubt by a U.S. Supreme Court decision in a similar case in June.

That ruling narrowed the scope of so-called "honest services" fraud, in which an official is accused of depriving others of honest service through hidden conflicts of interest and other self-serving behavior. The Supreme Court directed the 9th Circuit to reconsider Weyhrauch's fraud charge in light of its decision.

Rep. Young says he's been cleared by feds

Rep. Don Young's office has announced that the long-running criminal investigation of him by the FBI and the U.S. Justice Department's Public Integrity Section has concluded and that no charges will be filed. Meredith Kenny, the press secretary for Young, R-Alaska, said Young's attorneys in Washington received a call this morning that the Justice Department had decided against prosecuting Young.

A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment. The agency rarely announces publicly when it drops a case, though it will sometimes tell potential defendants and the victims of its decisions.

Young is in Kenai today. Kenny said he wouldn't comment until he's cleared to talk by his attorneys.

"I'm waiting for guidance from the legal team about what he can do and what he can say," Kenny said. "They were notified this morning and that is all we can say. This all happened in the last couple hours."

A statement e-mailed from Young's office this afternoon said:

"Congressman Young's legal team has been notified that after full cooperation from the Congressman, the Public Integrity Section of the Department of Justice has concluded their investigation and declined prosecution of Congressman Young."

Young's lead attorney, John Dowd, has not responded to telephone and e-mail messages.

Young has been under scrutiny since at least 2006 in the Alaska corruption investigation. In 2009, federal prosecutors disclosed that two former officials from the defunct oil field service company Veco admitted giving Young gifts that he did not disclose and giving his campaign illegal contributions for years.

In his confession, Bill Allen, Veco's ex-chief executive, said Veco sent between $130,000 and $195,000 in illegal corporate donations to Young by paying for his annual pig-roast fundraisers from 1993 to 2006. Rick Smith, another Veco official, confessed to using Allen's credit card to buy Young $1,000 in golf clubs as a gift. Young never reported the gift.

Young was also under investigation for the mysterious appearance of an earmark in the 2005 Transportation Bill for an interchange in South Florida sought by a developer who arranged a fundraiser for Young. The earmark was placed in the bill after it passed the House and Senate, a possible violation of the U.S. Constitution.

This is a developing story. Check back for updates.

Kohring ruling coming 'soon'

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick said Thursday he would rule "as soon as I can" on former Rep. Vic Kohring's request to have his corruption charges dismissed for alleged misconduct by prosecutors.

Sedwick spoke at the conclusion of a 45-minute hearing in which Kohring's attorney, Michael Filipovic, from the Seattle federal public defender's office, asserted that Kohring's trial was tainted by federal prosecutors. He alleged they manipulated the testimony of their lead witness, Bill Allen, the former chief executive of Veco Corp., and hid evidence from Kohring's defense.

Kevin Gingras, a Justice Department appellate attorney, acknowledged that federal prosecutors should have turned over more of their evidence to Kohring, but he rejected assertions that they acted in bad faith. He said the case against Kohring was overwhelming and that his 2007 trial and conviction was fair. A secretly recorded video, in which Kohring took money from Allen and then asked what he could do for him in the Legislature, was particularly damning, Gingras said.

Kohring was sentenced to 42 months in prison on his conviction by a federal jury of conspiracy, extortion and bribery. After serving about a year, he was freed in June 2009 while he appealed his case.

Sedwick declined to say precisely when he would rule. But in a similar appeal by another former legislator, Pete Kott, Sedwick delivered his ruling against Kott about two months after oral arguments.

GOP rival, ethics watchdog seek results of Young investigation

FISHER: Opponent points out no danger of criminal charges.

Republican congressional candidate Sheldon Fisher, says Rep. Don Young should publicly address the Department of Justice probe, which reported ended with no charges filed.

Republican congressional candidate Sheldon Fisher on Thursday called on the Justice Department to disclose the results of its investigation of Rep. Don Young's Coconut Road earmark because Congress itself took the unprecedented step of seeking the inquiry.

A day after Young announced that the Justice Department had dropped its corruption investigation of him, Fisher said he had no intention of easing off his pressure to get answers about the case.

Young, 77, has been Alaska's sole representative in the House since 1973. He's facing Fisher in the Aug. 24 Republican primary.

With Young no longer facing the possibility of criminal charges, Fisher said, the congressman has no reason to remain silent about the earmark or his ties to the defunct oil services company Veco Corp. and two of its executives now serving prison time for bribery and tax violations.

The Justice Department, as is typical in investigations that end without prosecution, has declined comment on Young's assertions. But Fisher said the Coconut Road matter is different because it was requested by a vote of Congress in 2008. With the earmark being inserted into the bill after it passed the House and Senate, it also represents a grave violation of the Constitution, he said.

Fisher also said in a press conference Thursday that he was filing a Freedom of Information Act request to the Justice Department seeking verification of Young's assertion that the investigation is over.

In Washington, the nonprofit watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington called on the House Ethics Committee to pick up where the Justice Department left off.

"There is strong evidence that Rep. Young received improper benefits through his relationship with Veco, and it is disappointing that he will not have to answer for them in a court of law," CREW's director, Melanie Sloan, said in a statement sent to reporters. "The fact that Rep. Young will not be criminally prosecuted does not mean he did nothing wrong."

Young's office issued a one-sentence statement Wednesday announcing the end of the federal investigation, under way for at least three years, but Young declined further comment.

"This is still a matter between the Congressman and his attorneys," his press secretary, Meredith Kenny, said in an e-mail message Thursday.

Young, avoiding specifics, said in an interview with KTVA on Thursday that he was disappointed with critics who "would mud-rake things."

"They should congratulate me, very frankly," Young said, "because I've always said that if I had anything to worry about, I would never run (for office). I'm confident in what I've been able to do and where I was from the beginning."

Congress asked the Justice Department to investigate the Coconut Road earmark when it appeared in Young's 2005 highways bill after passing the House and Senate. The earmark shifted $10 million to study an interchange in Florida sought by a developer who raised $40,000 for Young's campaign.

Former Veco chief executive Bill Allen and vice president Rick Smith admitted making more than $130,000 in illegal contributions to Young and to giving him gifts and cash.

Fisher, a practicing attorney before he became a telecommunications executive, said lawyers will typically advise their clients to not answer questions while an investigation is ongoing because their answers could be used against them.

"But now that Mr. Young has been told that there's no threat of prosecution, I think it's appropriate for him to stand up and start to answer some of these questions," Fisher said.

Fisher said Young might not have been helped in his re-election campaign by the Justice Department announcement because "it is reminding people of the facts of the scandal."

Prof. Larry Sabato, director of the University of Virginia's Center for Politics and a frequent media analyst, said it's logical that reporters and others should be grilling Young. "After all, he is your one elected member of the House and he clearly has had some ethical difficulties in the past," Sabato said. "Why shouldn't people know what he was investigated for?"

Yes loyd, Don is irascible. He always has been and that will not change as he "matures". :)

I don't necessarily disagree with your other points; but Don has worked very hard for Alaska for many years,. Because of that, he shouldn't be kicked into the dust bin with the trash. He doesn't deserve the "venal attacks" being perpetrated on him -- no one does! They speak to the character of the attacker(s) rather than the person being attacked . . and there are so many of "those black fly people" swarming everywhere. It is becoming more and more toxic.

As to the "ethical issues" -- the "horse-trading negotiations" and "power plays" that occur in any body of people working together is rife with odoriferous dealings. That is nothing new and taints politics and other aspects of lives everywhere. No politician in Washington or elsewhere is immune to that, and there is no inoculation against it. However, without these dealings, nothing would get done, and that is a fact too.

We have always been a country of "can do" people. However, the atmosphere we live in now is being fouled by these people whose mission in life appears to be "pull it down and assume a fetal position" rather than "stand up straight and build something worthwhile". That is pretty sad.

I hope someday a good replacement for Don will come along so he can retire and enjoy this Alaska he loves so much. However, I have not seen a promising candidate lately . . . have you?

@joelie10: To answer your question: all the time. Yes, the loudmouths on the fringes will always rant and rave, even after they've been proven wrong. But if you don't put the real facts out there, then the mainstream will actually listen to them, because nobody else is talking.
The way to deflate irresponsible speculation is to put the real facts out there. The nuts on the fringe will still holler, but once the facts are on the table, they'll mostly just be talking to themselves.

Again, unless the actual facts don't make you look any better than your enemies' speculation.

joelie10: Normally, I would agree with you. However, there are some serious ethical questions relating to Representative Young. And the way he treats people that he feels oppose him is way over the top. Remember comments like "I represent the people who voted for me...", not the whole Alaska? He has taken donations to his campaign to pay lawyers. He has missed more House votes than any other representative over the last few years. He was relieved of key committee chairmanships and memberships because of his actions. He seems to have little as far as interactions with other representatives.

Given the choices this election year, he'll probably be reelected. Fisher is no good, and we sure don't need another "yes man" to Obama like Crawford would be. Dismal, to say the least.

That's exactly why you put the actual facts out there. At least, you do if they make you look any better."

Excuse me hpabjc8, but when have facts ever gotten in the way of an "opinion" and a good rant? They do NOT. Facts are twisted to suit the bias of the person viewing them -- you already know that. The "muck-raking nit-pickers" of ALL persuasions are out in full force 24/7 and coming from all directions. "No comment." is entirely appropriate and a matter of self-preservation in this poisonous atmosphere. If Don Young is anything, he is NOT stupid and for that I am grateful. Why he still cares enough to represent and work for so many ungrateful Alaskans, especially after the loss of his beloved wife, is beyond me. I would not have his courage or perseverance in the face of all this animosity. I'm not sure many of us would.

Ted Stevens confirmed dead in plane crash

A plane carrying former Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens and eight others crashed Monday in remote Southwest Alaska, killing the longtime Republican lawmaker and four other people, authorities said this morning.

Ex-NASA chief Sean O'Keefe was also aboard, and the NASA Watch website is reporting that he and his son survived the crash.

Stevens' family has been notified that the 86-year-old was among those killed in the crash, family spokesman Mitch Rose said..

Rescuers arrived on helicopter early Tuesday and were giving medical care to survivors, Alaska National Guard spokesman Maj. Guy Hayes said.

Three survivors are being taken in two helicopters this morning to Dillingham, where a U.S. Coast Guard C-130 will fly them to Anchorage for treatment, said Alaska National Guard spokeswoman Kalei Brooks.

Brooks said she didn't know the identities of the three survivors or if anyone else survived the crash. She said the 11th Air Force Rescue Coordination Center could not confirm reports from the National Transportation Safety Board this morning that five people died in the accident.

Rescuers arrived on helicopter early Tuesday, Brooks said. "There's less than a quarter-mile visibility and less than 100 feet of ceiling ... between the clouds and the ground."

Alaska officials reported that nine people were aboard the aircraft and that "it appears that there are five fatalities," NTSB spokesman Ted Lopatkiewicz told The Associated Press in Washington.

Federal Aviation Administration spokesman Mike Fergus said the plane took off at 2 p.m. Monday from a GCI corporate site on Lake Nerka, heading to the Agulowak Lodge on Lake Aleknagik. He didn't know if that was the final destination or a refueling stop.

The GCI lodge is made of logs and sits on a lake, and photos show a stately main room with an imposing stone fireplace, a leather sofa and a mounted caribou head on the wall.

Fergus said the plane was flying by visual flight rules and was not required to file a flight plan.

Stevens and O'Keefe are fishing buddies, and the former senator had been planning a fishing trip near Dillingham, friend William Canfield said. The flights at Dillingham are often perilous through the mountains, even in good weather.

Hayes said the Guard was called to the area about 20 miles north of Dillingham around 7 p.m. Monday after a passing aircraft saw the downed plane. But severe weather has hampered search and rescue efforts.

The National Weather Service reported rain and fog, with low clouds and limited visibility early Tuesday. Conditions ranged from visibility of about 10 miles reported at Dillingham shortly before 7 p.m. Monday to 3 miles, with rain and fog later.

At least three crash victims were being airlifted to Anchorage, Guard spokeswoman Kalei Brooks Rupp said. She said volunteers hiked into the crash site Monday night and provided medical aid until rescuers arrived.

The White House said Obama administration officials were closely watching news out of Alaska.

Sen. Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, asked Alaskans to join her in prayer for all those aboard the aircraft and their families, as did Sen. Mark Begich, D-Alaska. He called the plane crash tragic. Begich's father, Nick Begich, who was Alaska's only congressman in 1972, was killed when his plane disappeared over the Gulf of Alaska with then-House Majority Leader Hale Boggs of Louisiana.

Stevens was one of two survivors in a 1978 plane crash at Anchorage International Airport that killed his wife, Ann, and several others. He remarried several years after the crash -- he and his second wife, Catherine, have a daughter, Lily.

Over the years, Stevens directed billions of dollars to Alaska.

But one of his projects -- infamously known as the "Bridge to Nowhere" -- became a symbol of pork-barrel spending in Congress and a target of taxpayer groups who challenged a $450 million appropriation for bridge construction in Ketchikan.

Stevens' standing in Alaska was toppled by corruption allegations and a federal trial in 2008. He was convicted of all seven counts -- and narrowly lost his Senate seat to Begich in the election the following week.

But five months after the election, Attorney General Eric Holder sought to dismiss the indictment against Stevens and not proceed with a new trial because of prosecutorial misconduct by federal prosecutors.

O'Keefe, 54, was NASA administrator for three tumultuous years. He was deputy director of the Office of Management and Budget when President George W. Bush asked him in late 2001 to head NASA and help bring soaring space station costs under control.

But budget-cutting became secondary when the shuttle Columbia broke apart during re-entry in 2003.

O'Keefe's most controversial action at NASA was when he decided to cancel one last repair mission by astronauts to the Hubble Space Telescope. He said the mission was too risky. His successor overturned the decision. The Hubble mission was carried out last year.

O'Keefe left NASA in 2005 to become chancellor of Louisiana State University. He is now the CEO of defense contractor EADS North America and oversees the bid for the hotly contested Air Force refueling jet contract.

The company said O'Keefe was a passenger on the plane. The company said it had no further information about O'Keefe's status.

The contract competition, which pits EADS against rival plane maker Boeing Co., is for a piece of what could eventually be $100 billion worth of work replacing the military's fleet of aging tankers.

Former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, a political icon who helped steer Alaska from its frontier territorial days to its modern present, was among five people killed in the crash of a lodge floatplane near Dillingham on Monday.

Four people survived the crash into a steep, remote hillside 17 miles north of Dillingham, and at least three were flown to an Anchorage hospital in a Coast Guard C-130 aircraft. The bodies of Stevens, 86, and the other victims were still at the site. Extrication tools were being flown there Tuesday afternoon.

Among the survivors was former NASA chief Sean O'Keefe and his son, Kevin.

Besides Stevens, Alaska State Troopers identified the victims as Dana Tindall, 48, of Anchorage, a senior vice president for the Alaska telecommunications company GCI; Tindall's daughter Corey, 16; Washington, D.C., lobbyist Bill Phillips, a former Stevens chief of staff; and the pilot, Terry Smith, 62, of Eagle River.

The other survivors were Phillips' son Willy, 13, and lobbyist Jim Morhard of Alexandria, Va.

The plane, a vintage, single-engine de Havilland Otter, was reported missing about 7 p.m. Monday, some five hours after it took off for a fishing site. The plane was owned by the Alaska telecommunications company GCI, which also owns a guest lodge near Lake Aleknagik on the Agulowak River in prime fishing country. Stevens and the other passengers were the guests of GCI.

Poor weather hampered rescue efforts. The wreckage was discovered about 7:30 p.m. by a local pilot searching for the Otter, but fog soon covered the area. Local residents flown to a nearby ledge by a commercial helicopter pilot got to the site in time to provide some aide and comfort to the victims and communicate the situation to state officials, but National Guard and Coast Guard air rescue crews sent to the area were unable to approach the crash site in helicopters and fixed-wing aircraft until about 7 a.m. today.

Alaska National Guard spokeswoman Kalei Brooks said the 11th Air Force Rescue Coordination Center reported that conditions were marginal when rescuers arrived by helicopter. "There's less than a quarter-mile visibility and less than 100 feet of ceiling ... between the clouds and the ground."

At a late-morning news conference in Anchorage, Maj. Gen. Tom Katkus, the Alaska National Guard commander, said the plane didn't send an automatic locator signal when it crashed, but he could not explain why. Katkus and other officials at the news conference said it was too early in the event to suggest a cause for the crash.

The wreckage was discovered on a 40-degree slope amid scree and brush. "There was no secondary fire," Katkus said. But he, Public Safety Commissioner Joe Masters and Gov. Sean Parnell said they had very little information about the events leading up to the crash or the rescue itself.

The National Transportation Safety Board was sending a high-level team to investigate, led by NTSB chairwoman Deborah Hersman. She was scheduled to brief reporters at Ted Stevens Anchorage International Airport in Anchorage at 4 p.m. today.

Most of the information about the crash was coming from witnesses and others in the Dillingham region. Robin Samuelsen, chief executive of the Bristol Bay Economic Development Corp., said Stevens and the others were headed to the Nushagak River to fish for silver salmon.

They apparently took off from the GCI lodge, on the headwaters of the Agulowak River. Before it became a corporate lodge for entertaining company officials, clients, friends and others, it was known as the Wood River Lodge and was open to the public, Samuelsen said.

John Bouker, owner of Bristol Bay Air Service in Dillingham, said he found the wreckage Monday night.

"I was in the air last night about 7:30 p.m., flying an air-taxi trip," Bouker said in a telephone interview. "Dillingham flight service station told me that GCI was concerned about the location of their Otter. They hadn't seen or heard from their Otter since 2 o'clock in the afternoon. So I got the information where they were going from and where they were going to and I backtracked their flight path."

Bouker he saw the wreckage just below the cloud line.

"The fog kind of cleared and I found the airplane in the side of the mountain," he said. He didn't know the mountain name, or even if it had one, but it was in the Muklung Hills, about a third of way to way to their destination.

The Otter had plowed into the hill, Bouker said. "He bounced up the mountain. He looked like he was in a full power climb. ... He looked like he was climbing when he hit."

Former governor's aide wants corruption case dismissed

RULING: Former governor's aide says he admitted guilt to what now isn't a crime.

By LISA DEMER
ldemer@adn.com

(09/16/10 12:00:48)

Jim Clark, former Gov. Frank Murkowski's chief of staff and one of the Alaskans caught up in the federal corruption investigation, says in new court papers that the criminal case against him should be dismissed based on a new U.S. Supreme Court ruling, even though he pleaded guilty more than two years ago.

Clark's motion filed Wednesday says a recent U.S. Supreme Court ruling scaled back an anti-corruption law to the point that it no longer applies to his case. The criminal case against Clark sprung out of what prosecutors said were his illegal efforts to get Murkowski re-elected.

Clark pleaded guilty in March 2008 to a charge of "conspiracy to commit honest services mail and wire fraud," a federal law that prosecutors used to target crooked politicians and business executives. At times prosecutors applied it broadly to situations in which officials essentially deprived others of their honest services through hidden conflicts of interest and self-serving behavior.

Clark admitted to conspiring with former officials of Veco Corp., the defunct oil-field services company, to secretly channel $68,550 from Veco into Murkowski's re-election effort. Prosecutors said the money for polls and a political consultant was illegal because it was both a corporate donation and excessive and also wasn't reported to the state.

In June the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in the case of former Enron Corp. chief executive Jeffrey Skilling that a charge of "honest services fraud" can only be brought in cases involving bribery and kickbacks, not those involving more abstract theories of deception. A jury had found Skilling guilty of 19 charges including conspiracy to commit honest services fraud and numerous counts of securities fraud for a scheme to mislead investors about Enron's true financial performance. The Supreme Court ruling sent his case to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to determine what convictions if any should stand.

Clark never admitted to receiving any bribes or kickbacks, and the charging document doesn't assert that he took any such payoffs, his attorney, Bruce Gagnon, said in the new court filing.

"Therefore, the (charging document) filed against Mr. Clark does not allege a crime and should be dismissed," the motion says.

U.S. Attorney Karen Loeffler said her office had just been notified of the new motion and she wasn't ready to say what position prosecutors would take.

FBI - Stevens-2741

"We're going to take a look at it," she said.

Clark is scheduled to be sentenced on Oct. 15, but his motion says that shouldn't happen because "he has pled guilty to a charge that is not a crime." Instead, the case should be dismissed, his motion argues.

Clark has been cooperating with prosecutors and is supposed to testify in the trial of former state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, but similar questions have arisen in Weyhrauch's case.

Weyhrauch was indicted in 2007 on charges of conspiracy, attempted extortion, bribery and fraud charges over his relationship with Veco and its officials. But the fraud count, which is also part of the conspiracy charge, was thrown in doubt as a result of the Skilling decision.

194A-AN-13620-M -1073

Weyhrauch's attorneys had challenged the honest services fraud statute before the U.S. Supreme Court, which sent Weyhrauch's case to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for a decision in light of the Skilling ruling. Lawyers on both sides have submitted new briefs to the appeals court, which hasn't yet ruled.

Memo labels Young 'rogue' after gas tax plans

FORMER AIDE: E-mail shows GOP leaders turning against U.S. representative.

A document filed in the corruption case of a former top aide to U.S. Rep. Don Young offers an inside glimpse into Young's fall from favor with fellow Republicans in 2003 over his push to nearly double the federal tax on gasoline.

The e-mailed memo was an "Intel" report from a transportation lobbyist to his client in Missouri. The memo quoted staff from the Republican House leadership describing Young as a "rogue member" even as he chaired a major committee. At the same time, the memo said, the Bush White House was trying to beat back the tax increase without publicly embarrassing Young but was growing increasingly upset "with the way he keeps pushing forward."

The memo was filed July 8 in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C. It dates back to the third year of Young's six-year reign over the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee. At the time, Young was preparing a colossal, pork-filled highways bill and believed he could pay for it by increasing the gas tax.

The memo was dated March 13, 2003, eight months before Young released the first, $375 billion version of his transportation bill.

A spokeswoman for Young, Meredith Kenny, said Young wouldn't comment on the memo. In 2003, he said the huge bill was necessary because the U.S. highway system was becoming outmoded and clogged. According to Kenny, Young was concerned that the means for paying for road construction, the Highway Trust Fund, was being depleted because cars were getting better gas mileage. For each mile driven, less tax -- Young called it a "user fee" -- was being collected.

"Rep. Young is in favor of providing long-term highway trust solvency (in) whichever manner is most efficient to accomplish that," Kenny said.

SURROUNDED BY SCANDAL

In 2003, Young was vocal in his belief that the particular manner was the gas tax -- so vocal that Republican Rep. Marilyn Musgrave, a conservative opponent from Colorado, said in June 2003 that he screamed in her face and jabbed her with his finger as she gathered signatures on the House floor for a letter opposing the increase.

The "Intel" e-mail was written by Todd Boulanger, a former Republican Senate aide who then was a "Team Abramoff" lobbyist for Greenberg Traurig, the Washington law firm that employed disgraced super lobbyist Jack Abramoff, now in federal prison.

Boulanger pleaded guilty in 2009 to lavishing congressional aides with meals and tickets in exchange for help with legislation sought by his clients. Boulanger sent the 2003 e-mail about Young to a new client, Jay Wunderlich, government affairs director for the Missouri Transportation Department.

Boulanger also sent a copy to Trevor Blackann, then a committee aide to U.S. Sen. Kit Bond, R-Missouri. Blackann pleaded guilty in 2008 to income tax violations for not reporting gifts from Abramoff's associates, including a trip to New York for the 2003 World Series.

Fraser Verrusio, Young's policy director on the Transportation Committee, is facing three felony charges for taking that same World Series trip and not reporting it.

Verrusio was the second senior committee aide on Young's committee charged in the Abramoff scandal. Mark Zachares, special counsel to Young, pleaded guilty to conspiracy in 2007. He is cooperating with prosecutors and the FBI and has not yet been sentenced.

Verrusio is fighting his charges. A trial date has not been set but is approaching as U.S. District Judge Richard Roberts hears a series of pretrial motions. Among them is a request by Verrusio to exclude more than a dozen proposed federal exhibits, including the 2003 Boulanger memo.

Nothing filed in the Zachares or Verrusio cases implicates Young with wrongdoing. He has been under scrutiny in the Alaska corruption investigations over alleged illegal campaign donations and gifts from Veco Corp. and its allies. Young says he has done nothing wrong, but also hasn't been told he has been cleared.

In his argument, Verrusio's attorney said the Boulanger "intel" memo is "impermissible character evidence" that makes Verrusio look bad because Boulanger describes him as a source about Young and the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee.

Speaking about the gas tax increase, Boulanger said: "In the past two days I've had discussions with both Fraser Verrusio (Political/Outreach) and Graham Hill (professional staffer) on the T&I Committee and they seemed determined to push this matter. When I asked if this is a proposal just to get the dialogue moving forward, they said no. While I still think Chairman Young is huffing and puffing, his heels are dug in for the moment."

'STUFFED LIKE A TURKEY'

In January 2003, the Associated Press first reported Young's idea to index the 18.4-cent-a-gallon tax to past and future inflation so that it would reach 33 cents by 2009. The AP quoted Young's spokesman as saying that White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card didn't take a position on the tax when he met with Young.

But in his memo, Boulanger said the White House was firmly opposed.

"I spoke with both White House Legislative Affairs and (Bush political adviser) Karl Rove's office the morning. They are 100% opposed to increasing taxes for funding, especially a regressive tax like the gas tax," Boulanger said. "Staff has been told by the White House CoS, Andrew Card, to play nice and not to embarrass the Chairman, however, they are upset with the way he keeps pushing forward. According to the Leg Affairs office, the Chairman has been warned, but he seems to be moving forward nonetheless. They suspect that if Chairman Young keeps insisting on the gas tax increase that the President will say something on the issue."

Republican leaders in the House, hearing complaints that they were promoting big spending, were even more upset, according to Boulanger.

Majority Leader Tom DeLay's deputy chief of staff, Brett Loper, told Boulanger he was confident that the leadership would turn back Young's tax increase.

The office of Majority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Missouri, was "more forthcoming with intel" than DeLay's staff, Boulanger said.

"They said that leadership is very upset with Chairman Young's proposal to raise gas prices for many reasons, but they were even more upset with his tactics -- i.e., using selective leaks to push his agenda. They also said they are viewing him as a rogue member right now."

Even some members of Young's committee, all of whom benefited by pork to their districts, were concerned, Boulanger wrote.

"I know conservatives on the T&I Committee don't feel that the letter they signed supporting the Chairman bound them to the gas tax," Boulanger said. "They are uneasy about the situation."

When Young finally presented the transportation bill in November 2003, he didn't include a method of paying for his $375 billion program. That would have been up to the tax committees, anyway. Young's bill would have spent $128 billion more than the highway proposal from the Bush administration.

Back in Anchorage a month later, Young boasted about the size of the bill in a news conference. "I stuffed it like a turkey," he said.

Young's bill got nowhere until 2005, when he scaled it back and got the House to pass a $284 billion version. The bill included Alaska's notorious "Bridges to Nowhere" and eventually, inserted after it passed both the House and Senate, the Coconut Road interchange in Florida that benefited a developer who raised $40,000 for Young.

FBI - Stevens-2745

From: Boulanger, Todd (Dir-DC-Gov)

Subject: TEA-3: Intel (Snapshot on Young Proposal)

House Leadership:
Majority Leader, Tom DeLay: I talked to Brett Loper (Deputy Chief of Staff) in Majority Leader DeLay's office regarding this proposal this morning. His exact quote was they are "confident we can win (beat) this fight."
Speaker, Denny Hastert: Waiting for feedback
Majority Whip, Roy Blunt: Pat Wilson from my office met with Majority Whip Blunt's office last night. They were more forthcoming with intel. They said that leadership is very upset with Chairman Young's proposal to raise gas prices for many reasons, but they are even more upset with his tactics....i.e. using selective leaks to push his agenda. They also said that they are viewing him as a rogue member right now.
Conference Chair, Deborah Pryce: Talked to the House Republican Conference staff about this and they said they haven't really been focused on it as a conference issue, but the Speaker's office has told them it is a non-starter. They also said that the Chamber of Commerce has decided to back the gas tax, which is highly unusual.

White House:
I spoke with both White House Legislative Affairs and Karl Rove's office this morning. They are 100% opposed to increasing taxes for funding, especially a regressive tax like the gas tax. Staff has been told by the White House CoS, Andrew Card, to play nice and not to embarrass the Chairman, however, they are upset with the way he keeps pushing forward. According to the Leg Affairs office, the Chairman has been warned, but he seems to be moving forward nonetheless. They suspect that if Chairman Young keeps insisting on the gas tax increase that they President will say something on the issue.

House T & I Committee:
In the past two days I've had discussions with both Fraser Verussio (Political/Outreach) and Graham Hill (Professional Staffer) on the T & I Committee and they seemed determined to push this matter. When I asked if this a proposal just to get the dialogue moving forward, they said no. While I still think Chairman Young is huffing and puffing, his heels are dug in for the moment... I assume until leadership gives him something he wants. I know conservatives on the T & I Committee don't feel that the letter they signed supporting the Chairman bound them to the gas tax. They are uneasy about the situation. Developing.
Budget:
Senator Nickles (Chairman of Senate Budget) will not have this in his blueprint. Nussle left room for a tax increase to fund highways, but not a gas tax.
Ways and Means:
My coworker Pat Wilson talked Manning Feraci with Rep. Hulshof (who is MO and on Ways and Means) and with Shahira Knight, Senior Budget Analyst for Chairman Thomas on the Ways and Means. She said the Chairman was not aware of the negotiations between leadership and Young and said the Chairman will be upset that he wasn't included and with the direction the leaks in the press have him pointing. This is interesting.
I also talked with several offices on the Ways and Means Committee (Rep. Camp and Hayworth) and they "just don't see how a gas tax will pass" because it will "severely split the caucus. They were concerned that the T & I Committee members were moving too aggressively with this proposal. I'm now checking to see if T & I is working to peel off some moderate R members to side with the D-side in Ways and Means. I haven't heard this as of yet.
Other:
House Republican Study Committee (formally CATs): The 50 or so House Republican Study Committee Member are not surprisingly, apoplectic.

Bruce Weyhrauch, a former Alaska state representative indicted on corruption charges in 2007, won a federal appeals court ruling preventing prosecutors from offering evidence at trial that he concealed a conflict of interest in seeking a job with an oil contractor.

The U.S. Court of Appeals in San Francisco upheld a judge's pre-trial order in Weyhrauch's criminal case, citing a U.S. Supreme Court ruling in June involving Jeffrey Skilling, Enron Corp.'s former chief executive officer, that limited some fraud prosecutions.

Under the Supreme Court's ruling in the Skilling case, "nondisclosure of a conflict of interest is no longer a basis for prosecution," the appeals court in San Francisco said today.

Weyhrauch, the former Republican state lawmaker, was indicted by a federal grand jury in May 2007 on bribery and conspiracy charges for allegedly seeking a job with Veco Corp., an oilfield-services company, in return for his support of oil tax legislation favored by the firm's former owner, Bill Allen.

Weyhrauch's attorney, Douglas Pope, said he was pleased with the appeals court ruling because the government had argued that court should allow the trial judge to decide the conflict of interest issue. Pope said in a telephone interview that he planned to seek dismissal of the case.

M. Kendall Day, an attorney at the Justice Department's public integrity section, didn't immediately return a voice-mail message seeking comment.

Weyhrauch's trial, which had been scheduled to start Sept. 13, was postponed, according to court filings.

The case is U.S. v. Weyhrauch, 07-30339, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit (San Francisco).

Judge lifts contempt penalty against Stevens prosecutors

By NEDRA PICKLER
The Associated Press
Published: October 12th, 2010 11:27 AM
Last Modified: October 12th, 2010 11:28 AM

WASHINGTON -- The prosecutors in the Ted Stevens case are not going to be penalized for failing to comply with a judge's order. U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan has lifted his contempt finding against three Justice Department attorneys.

Sullivan held them in contempt in February 2009 after they missed a deadline to give documents to Stevens' attorneys. On Tuesday, Sullivan ruled that the prosecutors will not be punished because they later turned over the documents.

A Republican, Stevens represented Alaska in the U.S. Senate for 40 years but lost the seat after his conviction on corruption charges. He died in a plane crash two months ago.

Sullivan later dismissed the conviction and ordered a criminal investigation into the prosecution's handling of the case.

US to drop Jim Clark corruption conviction

DISMISS: Court narrowed law to which official pleaded guilty.

The U.S. attorney's office said Friday that it will agree to toss the corruption conviction of Jim Clark, wiping out the criminal record of the man who was once the most powerful unelected official in Alaska.

Jim Clark

Clark, former chief of staff to Gov. Frank Murkowski and before that a Juneau lobbyist and attorney, last month sought to have his charge thrown out under a recent U.S. Supreme Court ruling that narrowed the law barring conflicts of interest under which he, and many other public and corporate officials around the country, have been convicted.

In his filing Friday in U.S. District Court in Anchorage, assistant U.S. attorney Kevin Feldis agreed that Clark's 2008 guilty plea was to a felony that no longer exists.

But Feldis said that prosecutors will hold Clark to his plea-bargain pledge to cooperate in any future corruption trials and investigations. If he fails to cooperate, it would void the plea bargain and it would subject him to other charges.

Jim Clark, former chief of staff to Gov. Frank Murkowski, pleaded guilty in 2008 to defrauding Alaska citizens of their right to honest services, but a recent Supreme Court decision weakened the law, and the U S attorney's office agreed to dismiss his conviction.

Reached in the Lower 48, where he is attending a wedding, Clark said he has no intention of wavering in that pledge.

"My obligation to cooperate with the government and everything else that was in the plea agreement stands," he said.

Clark is expected to be a witness in a possible future trial of former state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch on bribery, extortion and conspiracy charges. Weyhrauch, a Juneau Republican, is also challenging his charges.

Last month, Clark asked a federal judge to dismiss his case despite his guilty plea in 2008 to a single count of defrauding Alaska citizens of their right to his honest services as a public official. Clark admitted conspiring with former officials of the defunct oil-field services company Veco Corp. to channel $68,550 in illegal contributions to Murkowski's political campaign -- without Murkowski's knowledge, he said.

FBI - Stevens-2750

194A-AN-13620-M -1078

But last summer, in cases brought by former public and corporate officials, including Weyhrauch, the Supreme Court narrowed the scope of the honest services fraud statute. Where once it covered undisclosed conflicts of interest and self-dealing, the justices said it could only apply when bribery or kickbacks were involved. Neither was alleged in the Clark case, and both Clark and prosecutors agreed he was no longer in violation of the weakened law.

U.S. District Judge John Sedwick accepted Clark's guilty plea on March 4, 2008, and he will have to formally rule on the dismissal, which he almost certainly will agree to. He has not yet set a hearing date. Clark's law license was suspended after his plea. Alaska Bar counsel Steve Van Goor said that when he gets official notice that the charge is dismissed, he'll inform the Alaska Supreme Court, which will likely reinstate Clark's license.

Van Goor said Clark's license was suspended solely on the basis of his conviction. He said a new ethics complaint against Clark could still be brought by a citizen or the bar association itself based on the facts in the plea, which still stand.

The Justice Department has gone to Congress to restore the original breadth of honest services fraud, which assistant attorney general Lanny Breuer said has been an essential tool for decades in the prosecution of public corruption and corporate misdeeds.

"A public official who conceals his financial interest and then takes official action to advance those interests engages in behavior every bit as corrupt as if he accepts a clear bribe from a third party," Breuer said in testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee last month. Honest services fraud has been used by prosecutors "because corrupt individuals could be very creative, and the schemes that they devised included a wide range of dishonest conduct that was not always susceptible to definition as a bribe or extortion."

An official who steered public contracts to a company he or she secretly owned didn't engage in bribery or kickbacks, but still violated the public trust and should be prosecuted, Breuer told the senators.

Dismissal of the charge against Clark would be yet another blow to the Alaska corruption cases, which erupted in public view with massive searches of legislative offices and the offices of Veco on Aug. 31, 2006. At one point early in 2009, the government had won jury verdicts or guilty pleas in all 11 cases it had brought, including a seven-count guilty verdict against U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, with investigations still ongoing against Stevens' son Ben, a former state senator, and U.S. Rep. Don Young, among others.

But the massive case began to unravel with allegations of prosecutorial misconduct in Stevens' case, and those charges were eventually dismissed. Clark's would be the second dismissal, though there were no allegations of misconduct in his case.

Last month, one of the six prosecutors in the Alaska case committed suicide while he was being investigated by a special prosecutor for contempt, and earlier this year Young announced he had been told by the Justice Department that no charges would be brought against him.

Two of those convicted, former Reps. Pete Kott and Vic Kohring, are appealing their cases, citing similar misconduct as Stevens did, while Weyhrauch says his charges should be dismissed before he even goes to trial.

Date set in Weyhrauch corruption trial

Anchorage Daily News / adn.com
(11/03/10 20:59:10)

The long-delayed corruption trial for former state Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch inched forward Wednesday when a time was set for a jury to start hearing his case -- 9 a.m. on May 9, four years and six days after his indictment. But before the 10- to 15-day trial can begin, Weyhrauch's attorneys say they have plenty of issues left for U.S. District Judge John Sedwick to rule on. Among them are allegations that the investigation and indictment were so tainted by government misconduct that charges should be dismissed.

Weyhrauch, a Republican who last represented Juneau in the state House in 2006, was indicted the following year with former House Speaker Pete Kott over their roles in helping Veco Corp., an oil-field contractor, try to limit oil taxes. Initially facing four charges including conspiracy and bribery, Weyhrauch successfully appealed one count to the U.S. Supreme Court, joining other defendants nationwide in limiting the role of the federal fraud statute in corruption cases.

Kott was convicted and sentenced in 2007, though he is out of prison while he appeals.

In court Wednesday morning, Ray Brown, one of Weyhrauch's attorneys, said he hopes to prove government misconduct by compelling testimony from the FBI agent originally in charge of the Alaska corruption investigation, Mary Beth Kepner.

Kevin Driscoll, the latest in a list of 11 federal prosecutors to appear in the case -- most have been from the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section -- told Sedwick that he believed many of the pre-trial arguments he expects to be raised by Weyhrauch's defense are irrelevant to the charges.

Honorable Ted Stevens

Washington, D. C. 20510

My dear Senator:

I received your letter and the enclosed copy of Senate Concurrent Resolution 50 on March 12th.

With respect to your request, the FBI is certainly not opposed to the use of one uniform nationwide fire reporting telephone number and one uniform nationwide police reporting telephone number for local police or any other agency which desires to use it. However, this system requires that all calls be handled by a local dispatcher manually and in emergency situations where a large number of calls are received simultaneously, an insufficient number of operators or lines could make it difficult for a caller to secure an open line immediately. This could delay a critical call. For this reason, as well as the confidential nature of our work, this Bureau does not care to participate in this system but prefers to encourage the public to contact us directly. The telephone number of the nearest FBI office is usually located on the first page of telephone directories in cities throughout the country.

I trust that the above will be of some assistance to you in this matter.

NOTE: Senator Stevens was named to succeed the late Senator Bartlett and will serve until a special election in 1970 to fill remainder of term to 1972. While attending United State Attorneys Conference in 1954, he stated FBI declined to participate in investigation of case where a criminal broke out of jail in Fairbanks. It was determined it was not within our jurisdiction and was apparent Stevens had spoken out of turn. As a result, Anchorage Office was instructed to be discreet and circumspect in dealing with him. We have received inquiries in the past

Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. Hoover:

In the last session of Congress, Senator Ernest Gruening submitted S. Con. Res. 50. I am enclosing a copy of that resolution for your review.

It is my understanding that the Federal Bureau of Investigation supports steps which make it possible to centralize incoming emergency calls. I am considering the introduction of a similar resolution in this session of Congress. I would appreciate your opinion concerning this resolution.

With best wishes,

Cordially,

Ted Stevens

FBI NATIONAL ACADEMY GRADUATION

10-1

By memorandum dated 6/16/71, I furnished a list of Senators and Congressmen who had been invited to attend the National Academy graduation exercises 6/30/71. An invitation to attend the National Academy graduation exercises was extended to captioned individual by Chief of Police Lawrence E. Carley, Jr., Sitka, Alaska, a member of the graduating class. Senator Stevens did not advise that he would attend the exercises. Apparently, he decided this morning to attend the exercises and arrived at the lobby of the Departmental Auditorium at approximately 20 minutes to 11:00 a.m., while the Marine Corps band was playing "Ruffles and Flourishes," indicating the arrival of the President on the podium. Secret Service representatives had issued specific instructions that no one was to be admitted to the auditorium after the arrival of the President. This was explained to Senator Stevens, and he indicated that he understood perfectly.

He commented, however, that he felt the FBI had a responsibility to advise invited guests that the program would begin on time. He was advised that the invitations clearly set forth the starting time and that FBI functions always begin at the specified time. He was further advised that accommodations could be made for him after the President left, and he indicated that he did not want to wait.

EX-114 REC-36 94-64562-3

Bureau files reflect that Senator Stevens made remarks regarding the FBI which caused us to treat him circumspectly in 1954 (94-1-10873, Serial 794). Bureau Files further indicate he is a "drinker." (62-102128-2)

Dear John:

An increasing number of government officials are traveling to the Far East. I found it rather amazing that many of these people do not know that there is a route through Anchorage to Tokyo and then on to other points in the area.

This letter is sent to you for two reasons: First, I would like to encourage you to point out to your people that there is a route through Anchorage. Second, it would be quite helpful to me if I could know in advance if any of your people are going through my state so that I might alert the news media there. Our people in the news media get quite disturbed when they hear after the fact that an important government official has gone through our state without their having the opportunity to talk with him.

NOTE: Senator Stevens (R - Alaska) in letter dated 2/14/72, advised he received information that [redacted] when interviewed by the FBI, was allegedly informed that charges against him were not valid and the matter would be closed and he desires name of complainant. In affidavit Special Agent [redacted] Anchorage, categorically denies [redacted] was told at any time that "FBI charges against him not valid and matter would be closed". b6 b7C

Our investigation is based on information furnished in confidence on 1/21/72, by [redacted] Fort Wainwright, Alaska, that [redacted] furnished an acre of land to [redacted] Fort Wainwright, in return for promoting [redacted] in their civil service position at Fort Wainwright. Investigation verified [redacted] gave land to [redacted] and [redacted] in fact up-graded GS position of [redacted] Anchorage has submitted initial report dated 2/10/72, and has been instructed to complete remaining investigation by 3/1/72. b6 b7C

Senator Stevens, former U. S. Attorney, Fairbanks, Alaska, while attending a U. S. Attorney's Conference in 1954 was critical of FBI refusal to conduct investigation of a jail break not within our jurisdiction. As a result our Anchorage Office was instructed to be discreet and circumspect in dealing with Stevens. Our contacts with Stevens since becoming a U. S. Senator have been very limited and he is not on the special correspondence list.

[redacted] of the AFGE Local No. 1834 in Fairbanks, Alaska has written me in behalf of [redacted] who was recently called into the office of the CID at Fort Wainwright where he was questioned by the FBI.

Subsequent to questioning [redacted] the FBI informed him that the alleged charges against him were not valid and the matter would be closed.

[redacted] has since then initiated efforts to determine what allegations were made against him and by whom which would warrant an investigation by the FBI. He is of the opinion that the person who made the allegations should be identified and subject to legal action for defamation of character.

I would appreciate receiving your comments on this situation and advising me what recourse is available to [redacted].

Dear Senator Stevens:

Your January 24th letter regarding your contact with a constituent who has heard that the FBI is expanding its investigative files has been brought to my attention.

I believe your constituent's concern relates to "The New York Times" article concerning suggested enhancements of the National Crime Information Center (NCIC). The article was based on a report submitted to the NCIC Advisory Policy Board by a subcommittee of that Board tasked with soliciting suggested improvements of NCIC from its thousands of users. The Board is made up of individuals from state, county and local law enforcement, and the subcommittee, having canvassed NCIC users, came up with about 300 proposals, including adding new files on individuals such as drug traffickers, violent offenders, firearms offenders, foreign fugitives, persons on probation or parole, terrorists, foreign counterintelligence operatives and members of organized crime. Several of the proposals have already been rejected by the Advisory Policy Board.

The other proposals will be considered at the NCIC region level and by NCIC Staff and again presented to the Advisory Policy Board. Following those procedures, the Board will make recommendations to Judge Webster. He has neither evaluated nor approved any of the proposals as yet. Any proposals being considered would also require legal opinions

Dear Senator Stevens:

Your July 18th letter has been received and I appreciate the opportunity to address your concern and that of your constituent regarding the interview of people traveling to and from Nicaragua.

In accordance with the Attorney General's guidelines and in furtherance of our responsibilities as set forth in Executive Order 12333, we have conducted a small number of interviews of Americans who have traveled to foreign countries. The purposes of these interviews are to determine whether those interviewed can provide information relating to the capabilities, intentions and activities of foreign governments or organizations that may adversely affect the Government of the United States or its citizens, and to solicit their cooperation in assisting the FBI in meeting its investigative responsibilities. It is not our intent to discourage or interfere with anyone's right to travel to a foreign country, nor is it our intent to intimidate or otherwise influence those persons who may have a legitimate disagreement with U. S. foreign policy.

I would like to take this opportunity to extend to you an invitation to join the FBI in the dedication of our new dormitory and conference center at the FBI Academy, Quantico, Virginia, at 2 p.m. on February 19, 1989.

With continued congressional support, we have developed at Quantico a modern and sophisticated training facility which has earned an enviable reputation for its program excellence and commitment to enhancing the delivery of law enforcement services to the American citizenry. The addition of this new multipurpose building, which will be named Jefferson Dormitory, will allow us to further solidify joint Federal and local efforts to address our Nation's crime problems.

I recognize there are many demands on your time, but I hope that you and your family can join us for what I trust will be an enjoyable day at the Academy. Please advise Supervisory Special Agent [redacted] of our Congressional Affairs Office at telephone number [redacted] if you plan to join us.

No one reads this message according to your electronic response to my last message. That means I can tell you anything without fear of retaliation.

I was just one of the many shooters on that grassy knoll in Dallas November '63.

And you are the Senator who stated with pride that 75% of the time you voted against big government. To me that meant you voted for big government 25% of the time.

Heard that an audit was conducted which concluded that the U.S government could not account for billions of taxpayer's money. Gee, what a surprise!

I think we should have a grassy knoll in every U.S. town! And I have also come to this conclusion: Motorcades filled with politicians should go from grassy knoll to grassy knoll until we have none of you vermin left! But gee, were would we send our hard earned money if we didn't have a big government to squander it? Maybe I would be able to afford to have a family? Maybe afford to have a wife who could be with the children instead of working a second income family type job to pay taxes?

Golly Ted, if the children were supervised by some one who loved them, instead of child molestors in some day care, maybe drug use and other crime statistics would go down.

I could go on and on but what's the sense if no one will read this.

To set the record straight, I was attending a program in the school gymnasium as a second grade student in 1963 when Kennedy was assasinated. I still like the grassy knoll idea as a solution to big government!

Ted I just want to thankyou for this great way to vent frustrations with April 15 just around the corner. And Ted make sure you check out the grassy knolls in any town you might visit. It would be tragic to lose a senator who only votes for big government 25% of the time!

[redacted] was shown a copy of the e-mail to Senator STEVENS, dated April 1, 1998. After looking at the copy of the e-mail, he advised that he, in fact, had sent the e-mail to Senator STEVENS via his computer. When it was pointed out to [redacted] that the comments concerning the grassy knoll and the KENNEDY assassination could be construed as being threatening, he advised that the grassy knoll had nothing to do with the assassination of President KENNEDY and so there was no threat implied in that statement. He advised that he wanted to point out to Senator STEVENS that he had stated that he voted 75 percent of the time against big government, but that would mean that he votes for big government 25 percent of the time. [redacted] was advised that the purpose of the interview was not to discuss political philosophy, only to determine if he posed a threat to Senator STEVENS or to any other government official. He advised that he would be more than happy to cooperate and furnish any information.

Dear [redacted]

On March 27, 1987, [redacted] of Senator Stevens' office furnished the enclosed cassette tape which contains the contents of a telephone call to their office on March 13, 1987. The call was recorded on their after hours answering machine.

The tape was reviewed by Special Agent [redacted] of this office and, although there is no apparent violation over which the FBI has jurisdiction, the caller does appear irrational and hostile.

It is requested that you review the tape to determine if any similar calls have been referred to your office. It is also requested that you return the tape to [redacted] when it has been reviewed.

(U) THEODORE F. "TED" STEVENS, United States Senator, Alaska, Republican, was interviewed in 522 Hart Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C. Also present at the interview were Senate Appropriations Committee [redacted] Senate Counsel PATRICIA MACK BRYAN, and from the Department of Justice (DOJ), attorney [redacted] was present at the request of STEVENS, having previously [redacted] Advised of the identity of the interviewing Special Agents, the interviewee provided the following information:

(U) STEVENS was briefed into the Terrorist Surveillance Program (TSP) that was acknowledged publicly by the Administration in December 2005. STEVENS stated he was read in late in 2001. STEVENS was read in because he was the Chairman of the Defense subcommittee on the "black budget" – funding for the Intelligence Community. General MICHAEL HAYDEN, then Director of the National Security Agency (DIRNSA) invited STEVENS out to the NSA in Ft. Meade, Maryland. STEVENS thought that Senator DANIEL INOUYE, the ranking member on the subcommittee, also went to the briefing. No other staff or members of Congress were present. No documents were provided during the briefing. STEVENS did not ask about the number or persons covered by the program and it never came up. There was some discussion of operational success stories.

(U) STEVENS was familiar with the December 16, 2005, New York Times article written by JAMES RISEN and ERIC LICHTBLAU that disclosed the TSP. STEVENS was asked if he or his Senate office had any contact with RISEN or LICHTBLAU about the TSP. STEVENS replied, "Not that I can recall." STEVENS could not recall any one on one contact, but noted that reporters will often swarm senators "like piranhas" as they emerge from meetings and it is hard to know exactly what reporters are in the group. One such times that reporters wait for members was after Wednesday policy lunches on Capitol Hill. STEVENS stated that he was old, and as a veteran of Capitol Hill, "These guys don't screw around with me much." STEVENS stated that he had a straight forward policy with reporters: "Don't let them ask questions about classified [information]."

b7C

(U) STEVENS checked with [redacted] now at [redacted] and there is no indication that the New York Times tried to contact STEVENS about the TSP.

Investigation on 07/10/2006 at Washington, D.C.

File # 65T-HQ-1516536-302 Date dictated not dictated by SSA [redacted] SA [redacted] pmm

This document contains neither recommendations nor conclusions of the FBI. It is the property of the FBI and is loaned to your agency; it and its contents are not to be distributed outside your agency.

(U) STEVENS was asked if he had any information about a government official approaching a Congressional official about the TSP, as described on page 57 of RISEN's book State of War. STEVENS had no information on this passage.

(U) STEVENS stated that he had no information of any personnel from the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), DOJ, Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), Department of Defense (DOD) or National Security Agency (NSA), complaining to Congress about the TSP. STEVENS was unaware of any controversy within the DOJ over the legality of the program until he read about it in the newspaper.

(U) STEVENS was asked if he had any insight into the timing of the leak since Congress was engaged in November and December of 2005 in renewing and expanding parts of the Patriot Act, and the December 16, 2005, article was published in the midst of the debate. STEVENS stated he had no insight on the timing of the New York Times story.

(U) STEVENS was told that the New York Times had the story about the TSP by October 2004 and possibly sooner. STEVENS was asked if he knew anyone who left government in the fall or summer of 2004 that was disaffected in a manner that could have led them to seek out the media about the TSP. STEVENS did not know anyone who fit that description.

(U) STEVENS volunteered that he was always, "very supportive of the program." STEVENS stated that had to "push money at them," namely then Director of Central Intelligence (DCI) GEORGE TENET and General HAYDEN, as a reflection of his support for the capability of the TSP. STEVENS stated he fully funded the TSP and added money beyond what was requested.

(U) STEVENS was confident that there was no spillage about the program amongst his staff or Senate Appropriations Committee staff. STEVENS never discussed the TSP with staff. Likewise, STEVENS did not see any spillage among members of Congress. No senator came to STEVENS and asked him about the TSP before the story leaked. STEVENS was close to the Senators PAT ROBERTS (R.-Kansas) and JAY ROCKEFELLER (D.-West Virginia), the Chairman and Vice Chairman respectively of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence (SSCI), and he never had a discussion with them about the TSP.

(U) STEVENS was acquainted with the May 11, 2006, and June 30, 2006, USA Today articles reported by LESLIE CAULEY and JOHN DIAMOND claiming that several U.S. telephone companies were providing raw telephone call toll records to the NSA for analysis in counterterrorism efforts. Some days before June 30, 2006, STEVENS was approached by LESLIE CAULEY. STEVENS stated that USA Today, Wall Street Journal, and New York Times are just not relevant to his constituents so STEVENS has little incentive to deal with those newspapers. CAULEY asked STEVENS if the federal government had the right to intercept calls, for example family calls, within the United States. STEVENS stated that the response attributed to him in the June 30, 2006, USA Today article was correct and reflected his recollection of her question. STEVENS stated that he did not believe anything he said was classified. STEVENS searched his memory for the day CAULEY approached him, and concluded that it must have been the Tuesday (June 27, 2006) or Wednesday (June 28, 2006) before the article came out because. CAULEY approached him after a lunch on Capitol Hill and it must have been the party caucus lunch (Tuesday) or steering committee lunch (Wednesday). CAULEY asked no other questions, and did not characterize her sources in any manner.

(U) STEVENS knows LESLIE CAULEY primarily because he has jurisdiction over telecommunications as Chairman of the Commerce Committee. CAULEY writes on telecommunications issues. STEVENS was asked if anyone else on the Commerce Committee talked to CAULEY. STEVENS said that Senator INOUYE serves as "co-Chair" on the Commerce Committee may have had contact with CAULEY.

(U) STEVENS was asked if other New York Times reporters, or other media outlets, called him with questions about the TSP before the December 16, 2005 leak of the information. STEVENS stated that no reporters contacted him, and this was not surprising since he has not served on the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence (SSCI) since the 1980's and early 1990's.

(U) At the conclusion of the interview, STEVENS reviewed and voluntarily executed without hesitation a statement and waiver form regarding claims of reporter-source privilege provided by interviewing agents. Attorney BRYAN offered STEVENS to discuss the statement and waiver form apart from interviewing agents, but STEVENS said he was comfortable with the form. [Agent note: After departing the interview, late in the afternoon of July 10, 2006, [redacted] [redacted] faxed a two page document, including the cover page, that contained a transcribed exchange between STEVENS and USA Today reporter LESLIE CAULEY. The faxed document has been serialized to the file separately, and a copy of the faxed document is enclosed in a 1A envelope.]

When asked if [redacted] ever told the defense contractors that they were not meeting their milestones in a project being worked under contract funded by a Congressional earmark, [redacted] said his main example of when he tried to do that was with a Senator TED STEVENS earmark in 1996 or 1997. STEVENS had requested an earmark for a [redacted] launch facility on some deserted island in Alaska. [redacted] who used to work for U.S. Representative DON YOUNG, was also involved. [redacted] was told this money would come to SMDC to support this launch. [redacted] and some others went to see the location covered by this earmark and wanted to see if the [redacted] up there could support simulation work. When they visited the site they discovered that there was nothing there. [redacted] fought the earmark at first but their [redacted] military budget was cut $30 Million as a result, and the General was asked why [redacted] was "f---ing" with STEVENS' money. The General told [redacted] to sign off to get the earmark funds allocated. [redacted] refused to sign the MIPR (Military Inter-departmental Procurement Request) to the Alaska National Guard because all of the AK National Guard's money goes to the same pot. This would mean the contractor, through the AK National Guard, could use that money for whatever they wanted, and not just what it had been originally budgeted for. [redacted] ended up having to sign the MIPR because [redacted] would not do it.

VOL. XLV No. 24 JUNE 15, 1985 75 cents

Republican Senators Torpedo Don Devine

The decision of Dr. Donald J. Devine last week to withdraw from consideration for a second term as director of the U.S. Office of Personnel Management was understandable from a personal perspective. To have subjected himself, his wife, family and loyal aides any longer to the Star Chamber type of abuse dished out by the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee would have been more than should properly be expected of any man. For President Reagan, however, whom he served uncommonly well, and for the nation as a whole, Devine's withdrawal represents a profound loss.

At a time when the federal deficit is a pressing threat to the national economy, Devine can take credit for having reduced the size of the non-defense federal bureaucracy by 10 per cent. He turned a $440-million deficit in the federal employes health insurance program into a $2-billion surplus, ended what had been scandalous abuse of disability retirement in the federal workforce, and initiated a policy of pay and promotion for federal employes based on performance, and not merely the length of time in the job.

As a result of these and other reforms many believed impossible before he took office, Devine has already saved the taxpayers $6.4 billion administratively, and $2 billion more when you count reforms approved by Congress at his urging. Over the next five years, the savings directly attributable to changes wrought by Devine will total more than $20 billion. And a Devine proposal to reform the Civil Service retirement system would have cut the system's unfunded liability by $142 billion, while saving many billions more in future taxes.

Ironically, it was Devine's very success in carrying out the President's policies that made him an object of partisan political attack by congressional Democrats.

Senators Stevens (left) and Mathias (center) were instrumental in blocking the reconfirmation of Donald Devine (right) as director of the Office of Personnel Management.

But what is most outrageous—and should not be forgotten come future elections—is that Devine's withdrawal need never have happened save for the inexcusable failure of Republican committee members—with the notable exception of Mississippi's Thad Cochran—to defend the former University of Maryland professor against the absurd charge that he had clandestinely continued to run the OPM after his term as director expired March 25.

Under the law, as previously reported, OPM Deputy Director Loretta Cornelius became the interim acting director upon the expiration of Devine's term. Expecting that Devine would be confirmed within a few days, Devine and Cornelius sought to minimize the disruption at the agency by having Devine serve briefly as Cornelius' executive assistant.

Under an agreement between Cornelius and Devine, Devine, as executive assistant, was to have complete authority to perform all functions normally handled by the director, but his decisions were subject to approval by Cornelius.

After serving in the interim position for four weeks, Devine was asked to resign by Cornelius. She subsequently complained publicly that Devine, before leaving office, had delegated to himself far broader authority in the temporary post than she had been aware of when the position was created.

For Devine's Democratic foes on the senate committee, led by Senators Thomas F. Eagleton (Mo.) and Carl Levin (Mich.), Cornelius' charge was like manna from heaven. They quickly used it to claim that Devine had illegally sought, by deliberate subterfuge, to retain control of the agency.

But, as Devine, along with others,

Capital Briefs

★ Vice President George Bush holds a strong lead in the California Field Poll for the 1988 GOP presidential nomination. Bush is the first choice of 39 per cent of those surveyed, comfortably ahead of Sen. Bob Dole (14 per cent), former Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker (11), California Gov. George Deukmejian (10), Rep. Jack Kemp (9), and former U.N. Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick (6.).

★ California Democrats give Ted Kennedy an early lead over Gary Hart in the race for the Democratic nomination. Kennedy is the choice of 33 per cent of those surveyed with Hart second at 27 per cent and New York Gov. Mario Cuomo third at 21 per cent. Trailing are Chrysler boss Lee Iacocca (8 per cent), Sen. Bill Bradley (2) and Arizona Gov. Bruce Babbitt and Sen. Joe Biden (1 per cent each).

★ A Libyan diplomat to the U.N. was expelled by the State Department last week for activities "incompatible with his status and illegal." That was a polite way of saying that Farhat Tibar, an administrative attache at Libya's U.N. mission, was involved in a plot to assassinate anti-Communist Libyans in the United States. Libyan dictator Muammar Qaddafi has set up groups to go abroad to "chase traitors, fugitives and stray dogs wherever they are and liquidate them physically."

★ White House strategists were beaming last week after reading the results of the latest New York Times/CBS poll. The survey showed 60 per cent of adult Americans believe the Reagan tax plan is fair and the President's popularity has jumped three points to 59 per cent. Forty-five per cent of voters now identify themselves as Democrats, 44 per cent as Republicans. Among 18-to-29-year olds, the GOP holds a clear 51-to-42 edge. And by nearly 2-to-1, voters say the GOP is doing a better job than Democrats in reducing the deficits.

★ Department of media bias: James Wieghart, national political correspondent for the Scripps-Howard papers, recently told a Polish government official: "There's a movement in Washington to let Reagan be Reagan. We're [the press] doing all we can to prevent that." Asked by New York magazine to elaborate, Wieghart explained: "There are people like Pat Buchanan who would let Reagan be Reagan, and that's a scary thought."

★ Rep. James Scheuer (D.-N.Y.) is a co-sponsor of legislation to impose economic sanctions on South Africa. That didn't stop him from holding stock last year in that country's largest diamond mining company and 18 U.S. companies which do business there. Asked if there was a contradiction between his support of economic sanctions and his own holdings, Scheuer answered: "Sure it is. Life is full of contradictions."

★ Sen. Al D'Amato appears to be in good political shape as he revs up his re-election drive. A New York Daily News poll shows D'Amato leads Geraldine Ferraro by eight percentage points, Atty. Gen. Robert Abrams by 18, Brooklyn District Attorney Elizabeth Holtzman by 21 and former Gov. Hugh Carey by 37. D'Amato runs well among Irish-Catholics, Italians, Jews and independents and even carries New York City over Ferraro.

★ The Senate last week rejected four attempts to slash next year's $3-billion budget for the Strategic Defense Initiative (dubbed "Star Wars" by foes). First it voted 78-to-21 against an amendment introduced by Sen. John Kerry (D.-Mass.) to freeze the SDI budget at this year's level of $1.4 billion. By 57-to-38, it voted down an amendment offered by Sen. William Proxmire (D.-Wis.) to increase the SDI budget to only $1.8 billion. And by margins of 59-to-36, it rejected amendments by Senators Al Gore Jr. (D.-Tenn.) and John Glenn (D.-Ohio) to hold the SDI budget to $2.5 billion and $2.8 billion.

★ Only in New York (one hopes): Teen-age homosexuals can now attend their own public high school in Manhattan. Twenty students — 14 boys and six girls — are now enrolled in the school, which is named for the late San Francisco gay activist Harvey Milk. The New York City Board of Education is operating the school in conjunction with the Institute for the Protection of Gay and Lesbian Youth, a homosexual advocacy group financed in part by city and state taxpayers.

★ Charles M. Lichenstein, who was Jeane Kirkpatrick's deputy to the United Nations, said last week that U.S. taxpayers are paying the salaries of large numbers of Soviet intelligence agents. Lichenstein estimated that of the $200 million contributed each year by the United States to the U.N., between $5 and $10 million goes to pay Soviet employes whose primary task is espionage.

★ Rep. Jack Kemp (R.-N.Y.) is not the only lawmaker who wants to lower the 35 per cent maximum rate in the Administration's tax package. Sen. Bob Packwood (R.-Ore.), influential chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, last week told President Reagan he would like to see the top rate reduced to 25 per cent. Packwood said that could be done by changing exemptions and exceptions in "three or four places" in the tax code.

★ Interest rates show no sign of levelling off. "Rates will continue to decline through 1986," predicts Deborah Johnson of Prudential-Bache Securities, Inc. "By the third quarter of next year, 30-year Treasury bonds will be down to about 8.5 per cent [from the current 10 per cent]." Conventional 30-year mortgages are expected to drop to 11.5 per cent and bank auto loans to 8.8 per cent.

The Declaration of Independence begins: "When in the course of Human Events...." In reporting the news, Human Events is objective; it aims for accurate presentation of all the facts. But it is not impartial. It looks at events through eyes that are biased in favor of limited constitutional government, local self-government, private enterprise and individual freedom. These principles represented the bias of the Founding Fathers. We think the same bias will preserve freedom in America.

This will supplement the forthcoming Laboratory report wherein the submitted specimens, Q1 and Q2, are further described and their disposition set forth.

A forensic linguistic examination was conducted on photocopies of Q1 and Q2. It was concluded that there is insufficient material upon which to draw either demographic or psychological profiles or upon which to make a threat assessment. The specimens are, therefore, not being forwarded to [redacted] as requested. Photocopies of Q1 and Q2 are being retained for future comparisons in the event further extortion notes are received in this case. On 7/9/85, U.S. Capitol Police, Washington, D.C., turned over to the FBI a letter received on 7/8/85 at the Washington, D.C., Office of Senator MATHIS. The one-page letter was attached to a page from the newspaper "Human Events" dated 6/15/85. The front page from "Human Events" contained an article entitled "Republican Senators Torpedo Don Devine". The letter contained threats to both Senators STEVENS and MATHIS. The letter was postmarked Tucson, Arizona, dated 7/1/85.

U.S. Secret Service, Washington, D.C., was provided a copy of the letter.

On 7/15/85, captioned matter was coordinated with U.S. Secret Service, Pima County Sheriff's Office-Intelligence Division, Tucson Police Department-Special Investigations Unit, all at Tucson, without effecting the identity of any possible suspect who could have written the extortion letter.

[redacted], also known as (aka) [redacted] [redacted] Trenton, New Jersey, telephone # [redacted], was interviewed at his residence and furnished the following information: b6 b7C

He advised he is a Polish immigrant having come to the U.S. at age 15. He thereafter became a naturalized American citizen. He completed his high school education at Trenton, New Jersey, and attended college in the State of Maryland where he graduated with an Engineering Degree. He advised he is currently unemployed.

He advised that from March of 1959 to the present, individuals he refers to as "boolas" have been using psychosis against him which has changed his entire psychology "from being a very big man in everything to a big punk in everything." He advised that boolas are the tycoons and are the individuals who are the richest of the rich. He advised these boolas communicate to him through the media, such as television and the newspapers, and have changed him into someone who is always tired, disinterested, and incapable of thinking things out completely.

He commented that he considers himself to be a "small-timer," which he stated means anyone who has small success or a small business. He advised that small-timers are at the mercy of the boolas who are in control of everything in this country. He advised in this regard he has written numerous letters stating his views and beliefs to the Pentagon, Washington officials, the New York Times, and Mayor Koch of New York City.

He recalled recently writing two letters to the Mayor of Washington, D.C. In the first, he explained his personal philosophy as indicated above and also requested the mayor to have the small-timers in Washington dispose of his [redacted] congressman, Christopher H. Smith, by killing him. In the second letter, he described U.S. President Ronald Reagan as a criminal, who is no good to the country, and requested the mayor to have the Council of Churches hit the President and have him assassinated.

He advised, in his opinion, all of the U.S. Presidents are the tycoons' lackeys and that the justices of the U.S. Supreme Court are their covert lackeys. He advised, in his opinion, the President is not enforcing the laws of the U.S. of America and is, therefore, committing crimes against the people, and he should, therefore, be killed by him or someone else. He advised, however, at the present time he had no intention of assassinating the President in that he felt he could rectify the current political situation by writing letters to various officials, requesting their cooperation in changing things. In this regard, he is in the process of composing a letter to the U.S. Congress explaining his views which he plans on sending in the near future.

[redacted] stated he is not a communist or a socialist, but strongly felt that no one in the U.S. should be permitted to have personal wealth in excess of $10 million. He stated it was his aim to change the current situation in which a large amount of money is in the hands of a few and distribute it more equitably among the small-timers. b6 b7C

LABORATORY LINGUISTICS ANALYSIS

This is in reference to your airtel of 8/20/86 and will supplement the forthcoming Laboratory report wherein the submitted specimens are described and their disposition set forth.

A forensic linguistic examination was conducted on photocopies of Q1 and Q2 relative to this case. It was determined that Q1 and Q2 provide insufficient material, even when combined with the letters and envelopes in the Los Angeles case entitled, "UNSUB; SENATOR TED STEVENS - VICTIM; REPRESENTATIVE DON YOUNG - VICTIM; EXTORTION" (Bufile #9-68722), upon which to draw demographic and/or psychological profiles that might be helpful to the field offices. Accordingly, photocopies of these specimens are not being forwarded to the FBI's outside consultant for psycholinguistics examination.

Result of examination: 9-68722

Through a search of the Anonymous Letter File, specimens Q1 and Q2 were associated with previously submitted specimens Q1 through Q4 in FBI file #9-68722, submitted by the Washington Field Office (WFO file #9A-530) in January, 1985.

Due to variations in the absence of known writing and because all the questioned writings are not sufficiently comparable, a definite conclusion was not reached whether Q1 and Q2 and previously submitted Q1 through Q4 (FBI file #9-68722) were written by the same person. However, significant similarities in handwriting characteristics were observed between these writings indicating they were probably written by the same person.

The 22¢ postage stamp on Q1 was removed from a coil of stamps.

Limited indented writing of undetermined value was observed on Q2. A photocopy of this writing is enclosed.

No watermarks or other physical characteristics were observed on Q1 or Q2 which would further assist in determining their immediate origin.

The results of the requested psycholinguistics examination, the latent fingerprint examination and the disposition of the submitted evidence will be the subject of separate reports. Photographs are retained.

The anonymous letter was received at Congressman DINGELL's Capitol Hill office, 2221 Rayburn Office Building, Independence and South Capitol Street, S.W., Washington, D.C., telephone number (202) 225-4071.

For the information of the Bureau, on 11/7/86, the Office of Congressman ELDON RUDD, 2465 Rayburn House Office Building, was the recipient of an almost identical anoynomous letter, also postmarked MARINA DEL REY. This material is currently being forwarded to the FBI Laboratory.
