NUNES: Well, the whole point of me calling this press availability was because I didn't want to have like we had the last week, where there were multiple press scrums so I just -- and I often had times to had to continue to repeat myself.

And then, you know, as I saw these stories roll out, I just looked at all this and said, well, this can't possibly true, because I was very open, very transparent with all of you. I was willing to go on the record right away about what had happened or not happened with the -- with "The New York Times" story, what I knew at the time.

And so I just wanted to make sure that what I am trying to do, to bring to this, is actually more transparency so that we can have a normal engagement with all of you that's regularly scheduled in advance for two reasons.

One, so it is all on the record so you all know that we are being transparent but, two, I don't like to have to repeat myself all week on the same thing.

QUESTION: Mr. Chairman, (inaudible) in the news lately is North Korea.

What is your assessment of how large threat in North Korea is to national security and how compared to Russia?NUNES: Well, the -- the North Korean regime is -- is completely unhinged, they've long been unhinged. And the closer they get to ability to not only detonate a nuclear weapon, but also deliver that nuclear weapon, we have to take that seriously because for a long time, this is not a regime that's -- that would, you know, by any stretch of the imagination, you can have actual negotiations with.

It also is, I think, one of the biggest travesties on the planet when people find out what's happening in North Korea, where you have probably 20 million people living like animals, I think that we should all be concerned about it. And somebody who is unhinged as the North Korean dictator, we should all be concerned about it, and so should the Chinese and the Russians and others.

QUESTION: And then how does it compare to Russia? What is your assessment (inaudible)?

NUNES: Well, the question would be with, you know, whether or not can there be a -- can there be a new relationship with the Russian government. This administration wants to attempt to try to that. I'm very skeptical of that. But to be fair to them, President Obama tried, President Bush tried and so did President Clinton right when Putin was put in office.

Other...

QUESTION: Has the Russian cyber activity continued since the election? And if so, what is the intensity? Are there any...

NUNES: My -- I think...

QUESTION: ... sanctions?

NUNES: I think the important thing to know about -- and as you know, the House Intelligence Committee for many years has been very active on cyber threats. And if you look at -- I think one thing you should assume is that the Russians and the Chinese are very, very good at their cyber activities, so most of the time, we're not gonna even know that they're there. And they continue to expand the capabilities, and we, of course -- there's -- there's all sorts of anti-virus companies out there and people who are watching this threat.

But look, everybody's communications are vulnerable, whether it's your e-mail, phone calls, the grid. Both the Chinese and the Russians are actively increasing their cyber attack capabilities and we're trying to respond to that.

QUESTION: At this point, do you think that you now know everything that the FBI knows at this point about (inaudible) intelligence gathering?

NUNES: Look, I always want to know more, but you know, I think they have been very up-front. They've been over to brief us. And hopefully, they'll continue to do that.

QUESTION: So you think it's possible they now (ph) know more than -- than they've shared with you at this point?

NUNES: Look, I would think that they've hit the high points with us, but you know, we'd like to drill into that a little bit more to see if there's anything there?

Any other questions?

QUESTION: Yeah. You said this was an expansion of a year-long investigation (inaudible). How would you categorize the expansion? What stage are you at of the expansion? Is (inaudible) beginning of (inaudible) part of the investigation?

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

NUNES: Yeah, well, I'm not gonna get into what we've -- what we -- I'd prefer for this never to have gotten out, that we were very concerned about Russian activities, OK? But it's out there now, and what we're doing is we're formalizing a process with my Democratic counterpart so that we have a nice scoping document on everything that we're gonna look at as it relates to the election, leaks and everything that's kind of happened say, post maybe preelection until now.

QUESTION: But (inaudible). Is this early days? You said we don't have any evidence. Is this early days and you might not have evidence yet that (ph) could well come in?

NUNES: Well, I think what I'm -- what I'm trying to be very careful of here is, and I want to -- I want to warn all of you, I have -- we can't have McCarthyism back in this place. We can't have the government, the U.S. government or the Congress, legislative branch of government chasing down American citizen, hauling them before the Congress as if there's some secret Russian agent.

And that's what I'm concerned about here, that we don't go on some witch hunt against American citizens just because they appear in a press story somewhere.

QUESTION: You said that you didn't want the initial investigation to become public. What do you see the end result (inaudible)? How public will your findings become?

NUNES: They'll be public. They'll be publicized. QUESTION: And beyond that...

NUNES: And look, and -- you know, we could just have a -- likely what will happen is we'll probably just have an interim report of some kind that we'll put out on what we have, and then, you know, like oftentimes occurs, you know, these investigations, I would like for the whole issue with the Russian investigations to have -- to stop. But I don't have, as you already know from the previous comments, I don't have any faith that Putin is going to be negotiate in good faith with us or become an ally or become part of the West at this point.

QUESTION: So how much has that aspect of it, the distrust of the Russian government, have you shared and expressed with the president, given the, as you said previous administrations sort of always start out wanting to reset that relationship? I mean, have you expressed your concerns...

NUNES: I've been -- I don't know if I've spoke to the president directly about it. I don't think I have. But I mean, clearly, all of the advisers around him I have.QUESTION: I'm confused. So, once again you say that you -- the FBI or the intelligence communities have given you the high points of evidence, but you're also saying that you're at the beginning stages of this expansion of an investigation...

NUNES: Because there's an investigation -- there's investigations that the executive branch of government does and then there's investigations that the legislative branch of government people do.

QUESTION: Yes. So you're confident in your assertion that there is no evidence that these three people talked to Russian agents even though you have not done your own investigation into yet?

NUNES: As of right now -- as of right now, we have no evidence but we will continue to ask for evidence and will continue to look for evidence not only on the three Americans that were named in that story, but also any other American that has any contact with Russian officials. All right, guys, well thank you -- one more.

QUESTION: Are you any closer to understanding, though, why the president is so praise worthy of Vladimir Putin or why he says, basically, what we do here in America is the same as what he's done in Russia?

NUNES: Look, I'm very perplexed by this just as I was perplexed by -- when George W. Bush looked into Putin's eyes. That was perplexing. If you look at when President Obama was caught in a hot mic saying that he was going to be -- have more flexibility after the election, I was perplexed by that and look, good presidents -- three presidents in a row have tried to work with the Russian government.

I think it's a novel concept, I just don't think it's going to work. But President Trump has been very clear with the American people that he's going to try to do that, which would make him no different than the last three presidents.

So, all right, guys. Thank you all very much.

All:

The Washington Post is prepared to write a story as early as this weekend that will discuss the so-called "Trump dossier" and how it was handled. The Washington Post has confirmed through a number of sources that a former MI-6 intelligence officer prepared the alleged dossier in 2016 that contained information about then-presidential candidate Trump, his associates and Russia. The story draws upon non-government sources in describing how the FBI and Christopher Steele, known to us for his work in the FIFA investigation, discussed payment for his services including the dossier. It will say that the money has never been paid. It will make clear he worked for opponents of President Trump and had provided credible information during the FIFA investigation. It will also discuss the intelligence community's ability to corroborate some aspects of the dossier but not others. It will include a quote from former DNI Clapper that was released at the time the IC briefed President-elect Trump in NYC.

Importantly, it will not include the FBI agent's name who received the dossier nor the location of the where agent is located or where the meeting took place. It will state that FBI declined to comment for the story.

A second story will detail an individual named Sergey Milian as a main source for some of the information included in the dossier. It will discuss his background and credibility. It will state that he was associated with an organization with ties to Russia that had been investigated by the FBI. The association with this organization will suggest that he did have connections to Russia. At the same time, it will quote associates and acquaintances of Milian that will raise doubts about his credibility.

Subject: Schiff

All we can find is his appearance Monday on MSNBC with Andrea Mitchell.

Rep. Adam Schiff (D) California is interviewed on MSNBC's "Andrea Mitchell Report"
Monday, February 27th, 2017

MITCHELL: Joining me now is California congressman Adam Schiff, who is the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee.

First of all, your reaction to the fact that the Senate and House chairs of Intelligence have been briefing reporters at the White House request.

SCHIFF: Well, I'm very concerned about it. On the positive side, we both agreed on a broad scope of investigation. But the fact that the intelligence agencies -- or officials in the intelligence agencies were trying to push back on "The New York Times" story, acting as a PR arm of the White House is totally inappropriate.

I also don't think that the chairs of either Intelligence Committee ought to be announcing the results of an investigation at the beginning of an investigation. The reality is we don't know whether there were contacts with Trump campaign officials. That's one of the core issues that we're going to investigate.

And having conversations with intelligence community leaders is not evidence. And the fact is, we haven't even begun to sit down with the FBI to talk about what have they looked at, who have they talked to, what leads have been pursued, what haven't. So it is, I think, way premature to be drawing any kind of conclusions about whether there was collusion. This is one of the most important aspects of our investigation.

MITCHELL: The president was again tweeting out that the Russia connection, the Russia investigation is fake news, the Democrats trying to distract from the loss of their election. Can you put that in context?

SCHIFF: Well, I don't know what he considers to be the fake news.

Is he still disputing the fact that Russia hacked Democratic institutions, released documents that hurt Secretary Clinton and helped him? Does he still dispute that?
Does he still think it's -- it may have been China or some 400-pound fat guy? Is this all make-believe? I don't understand exactly what the president is trying to say except to deflect from the poor way he's running his administration thus far.

But this is very real, it's very serious. One of the key conclusions of the intelligence community is the Russians will do this again. So we need to know what the Russians have done, not only to inoculate ourselves against Russian interference in the future but to protect our allies and also bring to justice if there were U.S. persons involved.

And, again, I want to underscore, we don't know whether there were U.S. persons involved but it is our responsibility to find out. And I don't think anyone on the committee or our chairs in the House or Senate ought to be stating a conclusion or deeming it their responsibility to push back on unfavorable press stories.
If we're going to be doing that, if we're going to be commenting on the evidence in the investigation every step of the way, every time we see a press story that we want to clarify, we are not going to have an investigation.

MITCHELL: What do you think of the fact that the deputy FBI director McCabe, reportedly was the first to raise this issue to try to reassure Sean Spicer that "The New York Times" story was not accurate in all of its details? Should he have made that approach?

SCHIFF: Absolutely not, absolutely not. If the FBI or the director of the CIA was making press calls, speaking on condition of anonymity or in any other way --

MITCHELL: But should they have been talking to the press -- the press secretary?

Should they have been -- should the FBI have been in communication with the White House?

SCHIFF: No, absolutely not, not on a pending investigation that potentially involves people within the administration, absolutely not. And they already have a serious credibility problem, given how they handled the Clinton investigation. This is making it that much worse.

MITCHELL: Should there be an independent prosecutor now?

Darrell Issa has called for one. He's the first member of the House Republicans who has broken ranks. If this gets to the point of a criminal referral by the Justice Department or to the Justice Department or to the Justice Department by the FBI, then, yes, I think there absolutely ought to be an independent prosecutor here.

But what we need, I think, more than anything else -- and I think what we have seen in the course of the early stages of this investigation -- is we need an independent commission.

I would love to say that we can fully do this investigation within the House Intelligence Committee and the Senate Intelligence Committee. In order to do that we're going to need strong bipartisan support, we're going to need to be dedicated to following the facts wherever they lead. We're going to need the full cooperation of the FBI. And that is a big question mark at this point. I would take more comfort in knowing that there was a fully independent body doing its work as we're doing our work in the Intelligence Committees.

I think that is the single most important step we could do to give the public confidence that this will be done in a completely nonpartisan fashion. We are still going to do our level best on the Intelligence Committee as Democrats to force an independent, thorough and objective investigation. And if we get to the point, Andrea, where we can't and we're running into roadblocks, we'll be very public about that.

But some of these early statements by the chairs of both committees concern me greatly. And the fact that the intelligence community leadership is talking to the press to try to do some PR for the White House is alarming. And none of this bodes well for a truly independent investigation.

MITCHELL: Well, Chairman Nunes just said there were no early indications of any collusion between the Russians and anyone in the White House.

SCHIFF: Well, we have no evidence yet at all, one way or the other, because we haven't been provided that by the FBI. All we have thus far, the chairman and myself, as members of the Gang of Eight, is conversations with intelligence leaders. That's not evidence.

MITCHELL: Has Director Comey briefed you? I know that he briefed the Senate side.

SCHIFF: You know, we have had briefings with the director as members of the Gang of Eight individually. But we have not had a full briefing in terms of what has the bureau been looking into; what kind of investigations are they doing.

And there's a big question, Andrea, as to whether the bureau will cooperate with us. They will provide some information but we're going to need them to tell us exactly what they've chased down, what they haven't, what work remains to be done in order for us to do our jobs. And at this point, I don't have the assurance of the director of the FBI that he will provide that information to us. And our committee cannot be the FBI. We cannot step into the shoes; we don't have those resources. We don't have the ability to fan out across the globe the way that the FBI can.

So we're going to need their full cooperation and, at this point, I don't know whether we'll get that.

MITCHELL: And, finally, what do you think of the White House efforts to track down its own leaks by asking for the telephones of the communication aides, private as well as public phones? What kind of atmosphere is that creating?

SCHIFF: Well, I think it's creating an atmosphere of utter turmoil within the national security apparatus in the White House and beyond. And obviously, the White House would much rather focus on leaks than their own malfeasance.

The issue for me with Mike Flynn wasn't about a leak that forced his resignation. The problem was that he had lied to the vice president and the vice president had misled the country.

But that seems of far less consequence to the president than the fact that it got leaked and he got embarrassed. That's what this is about. This is about stopping the embarrassment of the administration, not protecting the country. And it's time he lived up to his promise of putting America first instead of putting Donald Trump first.

MITCHELL: And one last question, do you have any concerns about reports that the new national security adviser does not have walk-in privileges to the President of the United States, to the Oval Office, as, I think, all of his predecessors have?

SCHIFF: Well, if that's the case, I would have grave concerns about it. I'm glad that he's there. He is an infinite improvement on his predecessor. I'm glad that he's already speaking out. I guess the question is, can he last in that kind of environment? Can he make an impact? Or is he going to reach the point where he feels he needs to step aside because he's not being permitted to do his job?

MITCHELL: Congressman Schiff, thank you very much.

SCHIFF: Thanks, Andrea.

Trump in Graham's cross hairs as Russia probe kicks off

The South Carolina senator vows 'to find out all things Russia.'

By Austin Wright and Seung Min Kim
| 03/15/17 05:07 AM EDT

Lindsey Graham lacks the resources and access that the House and Senate Intelligence Committees have to investigate Russia's meddling in the presidential election.

But his Senate Judiciary subcommittee has something the intelligence panels don't: a Republican chairman viewed not as a Donald Trump ally but as a fierce critic, who has no qualms with bucking party leaders to unravel the mystery of Russia's interference in the election.
Graham and his Democratic partner, Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse of Rhode Island, will seize the spotlight Wednesday during a public hearing on Russia's election interference, to be held by Graham's Judiciary Subcommittee on Crime and Terrorism, which has jurisdiction over the FBI.

Graham and Whitehouse plan to use their perch to help ensure the public gets a full accounting of Russia's intrusion and any possible ties between the Trump campaign and Moscow.

The bipartisan duo already has its first target: getting the FBI to clear up Trump's claim that former President Barack Obama wiretapped Trump Tower in the run-up to the 2016 election. They sent a letter last week to the Justice Department asking it to turn over information that would confirm or refute Trump's accusation — including warrant applications and court orders. The House Intelligence Committee is seeking the same information and so far neither has been unable to shake it loose.

Graham suggested Tuesday there would be consequences if the FBI continues stonewalling Congress — and said he plans to make an announcement at the start of the hearing on Wednesday warning the bureau to comply.

“If they don't honor this request and give us an answer, then I would say that we need a joint select committee because the regular order is not working,” Graham told reporters. “They're about to screw up big time if they keep running to the Intel Committee and not answer that letter.”

Whitehouse appears more optimistic that he and Graham will get answers. In an interview with POLITICO, he said the senators got some clarity on the FBI probe after meeting with Comey privately earlier this month — the same day Attorney General Jeff Sessions announced that he was recusing from any investigations involving Russia and the 2016 presidential campaign.

“We said look, we're going to go ahead with our hearing on the 15th, just let us know by then,” Whitehouse said, recalling the March 2 meeting with Comey. “I think he implicitly confirmed that they are looking at this and he said he'd get us a clearer explanation by [the Wednesday hearing]. That was satisfactory to both of us.”

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) indicated Tuesday he would not object if Graham's panel decides to issue subpoenas to force the FBI to turn over the requested information.

“Graham is involved in an investigation of this effort, and I would not try to direct him how to do that,” McConnell said. “The core of the investigation, as you know, and we've said repeatedly, is being done by the Intelligence Committee. I think they will pursue whatever angles they need to pursue to get to a conclusion.”

In an interview, Whitehouse said there are key advantages to his joint investigation with Graham, more limited though it may be. For one, their subcommittee can operate in public, freed from the constraints of dealing with classified information. And the scope of their investigation is broader than it may appear at first blush, considering the FBI's central role in federal probes looking into Russian connections.

“I do think it's important that there be a public effort so that people can understand that Congress is in fact doing its job, and there is a forum where an investigation or information that can be discussed publicly has its day,” Whitehouse said. “We have oversight over the FBI and the FBI is all over this. So wherever they can go, we can go.”

Graham, meanwhile, said the subcommittee investigation is “going to find out all things Russia,” noting that he and Whitehouse are both former prosecutors. “I couldn't have a better partner than Sen. Whitehouse," he said.

“We're trying to build a case,” Graham added. “So, this is what Russia's doing in other places. Then we're going to dig into what they did here.”

Graham said the probe would focus “on what laws may have been broken by the Russians and if we don't have laws to protect from this kind of stuff, we're going to need to create some.”

The South Carolina senator has emerged as one of Trump's top GOP critics on Capitol Hill, along with his close friend, Senate Armed Services Chairman John McCain (R-Ariz.).

Running against Trump for the Republican presidential nomination, Graham called the real estate mogul a “jackass.” Since then, he has criticized Trump's original travel ban executive order, blasted his overtures to Russia and slammed the administration's proposed cuts to the State Department. At the same time, Graham praised Trump after having lunch with him last week and has backed Trump's call for increased defense spending. Regardless, Graham is not up for reelection again until 2020, so he has no need to fear a primary challenge any time soon.

His willingness to buck Trump has also won him plaudits from Democrats, who view him as more independent than the chairmen of the House and Senate Intelligence Committees, Rep. Devin Nunes (R-Calif.) and Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.).

“I'm very fond of him,” Whitehouse said of Graham. “He's a very, very talented colleague and a very good lawyer and prosecutor. He knows how legal proceedings work and is very adept.”

The intelligence panels are conducting their own wide-ranging investigations into Russia's election meddling, and Graham acknowledged these committees have more resources and much greater access to classified information.

But the intelligence committee investigations are also viewed with suspicion by Democrats. Nunes and Burr were staunch Trump backers during the presidential campaign and agreed to White House requests last month to call reporters to rebut news reports alleging frequent contacts between Trump associates and Moscow.

"I'm more confident in Lindsey's approach," Illinois Sen. Dick Durbin, the second-ranking Senate Democrat, said in an interview. "I hope that Richard Burr proves me wrong, but Sen. Graham has been outspoken on many of these issues and I've worked with him closely so I have a lot of confidence in him."

For his part, McCain said he has a lot of trust in Graham and is glad Graham will have a role in investigating Russia's election meddling.

“I know that these kinds of — if the word is right, scandal — these kinds of investigations always lead to more information,” McCain said. “I just think there are more questions out there that haven't been answered.”

Hi Jim,

I know its last minute but I just saw this on Senator Shaheen's twitter page -- "Meeting w/ Director Comey shortly to discuss FBI budget. I'll work to ensure FBI has resources it needs for Trump/Russia investigation."

Not sure if it is something you want to give the Director a heads up about before he goes in with her.

House Permanent Select Intelligence Committee Holds Hearing on Russian Election Tampering

LIST OF PANEL MEMBERS AND WITNESSES

NUNES:
The committee will come to order.

I would like to welcome our witnesses, director of the FBI, Jim Comey and director of the National Security Agency, Admiral Rogers. Thank you both for being here today.

Before we begin, I would like to remind our members and witnesses that this is an open hearing. I recognize the challenge of discussing sensitive national security issues in public. However, as part of this committee's investigation into Russian active measures during the 2016 election, it is critical to ensure that the public has access to credible unclassified facts and to clear the air regarding unsubstantiated media reports.

To our guests in the audience, welcome. We appreciate you being here. I also expect that the proper decorum will be observed at all times today and that disruptions during today's proceedings will not be tolerated. I now recognize myself for five minutes for the purpose of an opening statement.

The Putin regime has a long history of aggressive actions against other countries, including the outright invasion of two of its neighbors in recent years, as well as its brutal military action in Syria to defend the Assad regime. But it's hostile acts take many forms, aside from direct military assaults.

For example, the Kremlin is waging an international disinformation campaign through the RT propaganda network which traffics in anti-American conspiracy theories that rivaled the extravagant untruths of Soviet era Pravda (ph). Russia also has a long history of meddling in other countries, election systems and launching cyber attacks on a wide range of countries and industries.

The Baltic's and other Russian neighbors have long decried these attacks. But their warnings went unheeded in far too many nations' capitals, including our own. The fact that the Russia -- that Russia hacked U.S. election-related databases comes as no shock to this committee. We have been closely monitoring Russia's aggression for years.

A year ago, I publicly stated that our inability to predict Putin's regime plans and intentions has been the biggest intelligence failure that we have seen since 9/11 and that remains my view today. However, while the indications of Russian measures targeting the U.S. presidential election are deeply troubling, one benefit is already clear. It has focused wide attention on the -- on the pressing threats posed by the Russian autocrat.

In recent years, committee members have issued repeated and forceful pleas for stronger action against Russian belligerents. But the Obama administration was committed to the notion against all evidence that we could reset relations with Putin. And it routinely ignored our warnings. I hope today's hearing will shed light on three important focus points of the committee's investigation on Russia active measures.

First, what actions did Russia undertake against the United States during the 2016 election campaign and did anyone from political campaign -- a political campaign conspire in these activities? Number two, were the communications of officials or associates of any campaign subject to any kind of improper surveillance? The intelligence community has -- has extremely strict procedures for handling information pertaining to any U.S. citizens who are subject even to incidental surveillance. And this committee wants to ensure all surveillance activities have followed all relevant laws, rules and regulations.

Let me be clear, I've been saying this for several weeks. We know there was not a physical wiretap of Trump Tower. However, it's still possible that other surveillance activities were used against President's Trump and his associates. Number three, who has leak classified information? Numerous current and former officials have leak purportedly classified information in connection to these questions. We aim to determine who has leaked or facilitated leaks of classified information so that these individuals can be brought to justice.

I hope that this committee's bipartisan investigation will result in a definitive report on the Russian actions taken during the election campaign. To that end, we encourage anyone who has information about these topics to come forward and speak to the House Intelligence Committee. I again think the witnesses for helping shed light on these issues.

And I will let recognize Ranking Member Schiff. He's asked for 15 minutes for his opening statement, so I will go ahead and give him 15 minutes for his opening statement.

Mr. Schiff?

SCHIFF:

Mr. Chairman, I thank you. And I also want to thank Director Comey and Admiral Rogers for appearing before us today as the committee holds its first open hearing into the interference campaign waged against our 2016 presidential election.

Last summer at the height of a bitterly contested and hugely consequential presidential campaign, a foreign adversarial power intervened in an effort to weaken our democracy and to influence the outcome for one candidate and against the other. That foreign adversary was of course Russia and it activated through its intelligence agencies and upon the direct instructions of its autocratic ruler Vladimir Putin, in order to help Donald J. Trump become the 45th president of the United States.

The Russian active measures campaign may have begun as early as 2015, when Russian intelligence services launched a series of spear fishing attacks designed to penetrate the computers of a broad array of Washington based Democratic and Republican party organizations, think tanks and other entities. This continued at least through the winter of 2016.

While at first the hacking may have been intended solely for the collection of foreign intelligence. In mid-2016 the Russians weapon eyes the stolen data and used platforms established by the Intel services, such as D.C. leaks in existing third-party channels like WikiLeaks to dump the documents. The stolen documents were almost uniformly damaging to the candidate Putin despised, Hillary Clinton. And by forcing her campaign to constantly respond to the daily drip of disclosures, the releases greatly benefited Donald Trump's campaign.

None of these facts is seriously in question. And they're reflected in the consensus conclusion of our intelligence agencies. We will never know whether the Russian intervention was determinative in such a close election. Indeed, it is unknowable in a campaign to which so many small changes could have dictated a different result. More importantly, and for the purposes of our investigation, it simply does not matter.

What does matter is this, the Russians successfully meddled in our democracy and our intelligence agencies have concluded they will do so again. Ours is not the first democracy to be attacked by the Russians in this way. Russian intelligence has been simile interfering in the internal and political affairs of our European and other allies for decades.

SCHIFF:

What is striking here is the degree to which the Russians were willing to undertake such an audacious and risky action against the most powerful nation on Earth. That ought to be a warning to us that if we thought that the Russians would not dare to so blatantly interfere in our affairs, we were wrong.

And if we do not do our very best to understand how the Russians accomplished this unprecedented attack on our democracy and what we need to do to protect ourselves in the future, we will only have ourselves to blame. We know a lot about the Russian operation, about the way they amplified the damage their hacking and dumping of stolen documents was causing through the use of slick propaganda like R.T., the Kremlin's media arm. But there is a lot we don't know.

Most important, we do not yet know whether the Russians have the help of U.S. citizens including people associated with the Trump campaign. Many of the Trump's campaign personnel, including the president himself, have ties to Russia and Russian interests. This is of course no crime. On the other hand, if the Trump campaign or anyone associated with it aided or abetted the Russians, it would not only be a serious crime, it would also represent one of the most shocking betrayals of democracy in history.

In Europe, where the Russians have a much longer history of political interference, they've used a variety of techniques to undermine democracy. They employed the hacking and dumping of documents and slick propaganda as they clearly did here. But they've also used bribery, blackmail, compromising material, and financial entanglement to secure needed cooperation from individual citizens of targeted countries.

The issue of U.S. person involvement is only one of the important matters that the chairman and I have agreed to investigate and which is memorialized in the detailed and bipartisan scope of investigation that we have signed. We'll also examine whether the intelligence community's assessment of the Russian operation is supported by the raw intelligence, whether the U.S. government responded properly or missed the opportunity to stop this Russian attack much earlier and whether the leak of information about Michael Flynn or others is indicative of a systemic problem.

We have also reviewed whether there is any evidence to support President Trump's claim that he was wiretapped by President Obama in Trump Tower and found no evidence whatsoever to support that slanderous accusation. And we hope that Director Comey can now put that matter permanently to rest.

Today, most of my Democratic colleagues will be exploring with the witnesses the potential involvement of U.S. persons in the Russian attack on our democracy. It is not that we feel the other issues are less important; they are very important, but rather because this issue is least understood by the public. We realize of course that the witnesses may not be able to answer many of the questions in open session.

They may or may not be willing to disclose even whether there is an investigation. But we hope to present to you directors and the public why we believe this is a matter of such gravity that it demands a thorough investigation not only by us as we intend to do but by the FBI as well.

Let me give you a short preview of what I expect you'll be asked by our members. Whether the Russian active measures campaign began as nothing more than an attempt to gather intelligence or was always intended to be more than that, we do not know and is one of the questions we hope to answer. But we do know this; the months of July and August 2016 appear to have been pivotal.

It was at this time the Russians began using the information they had stolen to help Donald Trump and harm Hillary Clinton. And so the question is, why? What was happening in July, August of last year and were U.S. persons involved? Here are some of the matters drawn from public sources alone since that is all we can discuss in this setting that concern us and we believe should concern all Americans.

In early July, Carter Page, someone candidate Trump identified as one of his national security advisors, travels to Moscow on a trip approved by the Trump campaign. While in Moscow, he gives a speech critical of the United States and other western countries for what he believes is a hypocritical focus on democratization and efforts to fight corruption.

According to Christopher Steele, a British -- a former British intelligence officer, who is reportedly held in high regard by US intelligence, Russian sources tell him that Page has also had a secret meeting with Igor Sechin, CEO of the Russian gas giant, Rosneft. Sechin is reported to be a former KGB agent and close friend of Putin's.

According to Steele's Russian sources, Page is offered brokerage fees by such an on a deal involving a 19 percent share of the company. According to Reuters, the sale of a 19.5 percent share of Rosneft later takes place with unknown purchasers and unknown brokerage fees. Also, according to Steele's Russian sources, the campaign has offered documents damaging to Hillary Clinton which the Russians would publish through an outlet that gives them deniability like WikiLeaks.

The hacked documents would be in exchange for a Trump administration policy that deemphasizes Russia's invasion of Ukraine and instead focuses on criticizing NATO countries for not paying their fair share. Policies which even as recently as the President's meeting last week with Angela Merkel have now presently come to pass.

In the middle of July, Paul Manafort, the -- the Trump campaign manager and someone who was a long on the payroll of Pro Russian- Ukrainian interests attends the Russian -- the Republican Party Convention. Carter Page, back from Moscow, also attends the convention. According to Steele, it was Manafort who chose Page to serve as a go-between for the Trump campaign and Russian interests.

Ambassador Kislyak, who presides over a Russian Embassy in which diplomatic personnel would later be expelled as likely spies, also attends the Republican Party Convention and meets with Carter Page, and additional Trump advisors J.D. Gordon and Walid Phares. It was J.D. Gordon who approved Page's trip to Moscow.

Ambassador Kislyac also meets with Trump national campaign chair, National Security Campaign Chair and now attorney general, Jeff Sessions. Sessions would later deny meeting with Russian officials during his Senate confirmation hearing. Just prior to the convention, the Republican Party platform is changed, removing a section that supports the provision of lethal defensive weapons to Ukraine, an action that would be contrary to Russian interests.

Manafort categorically denies involvement by the Trump campaign and altering the platform, but the Republican Party delegate who offered the language in support of providing defensive weapons to Ukraine states it was removed at the insistence of the Trump campaign. Later, J.D. Gordon admits opposing the inclusion of the provision of the time it was being debated and prior to its being removed.

Later in July and after the convention, the first stolen e-mails detrimental to Hillary Clinton appear on WikiLeaks. A hacker who goes by the moniker, Guccifer 2.0, claims responsibility for hacking the DNC and giving the documents to WikiLeaks. A leading private cyber security firms including Crowdstrike, Mandiant and ThreatConnect review the evidence of the hack and conclude with high certainty that it was the work of APT 28 and APT 29 who are known to be Russian intelligence services.

The U.S. intelligence committee also later confirms that the documents were in fact stolen by Russian intelligence and Guccifer 2.0 acted as a front. Also in late July, candidate Trump praises WikiLeaks, says he loves them and openly appeals to the Russians to hack his opponents e-mails telling them that they will be richly rewarded by the press.

On August 8th, Roger Stone, a long time Trump political advisor and self-proclaimed political dirty trickster, boasts in his speech that he has communicated with Assange and that more documents would be coming, including an October surprise. In the middle of August, he also communicates with the Russian cut out Guccifer 2.0 and authors a Breitbart piece denying Guccifer's links to Russian intelligence.

Then later, in August, Stone does something truly remarkable. When he predicts that John Podesta's personal e-mails will soon be published, trust me he says, it will soon be Podesta's time in the barrel, #crookedHillary. In the weeks that follow, Stone shows remarkable prescience. I have total confidence that WikiLeaks and my hero, Julian Assange will educate the American people soon, he says, #LockHerUp. Payload coming, he predicts and two days later it does.

WikiLeaks releases its first batch of Podesta e-mails. The release of John Podesta's e-mails would then continue on a daily basis, up until the election. On Election Day in November, Donald Trump wins. Donald Trump appoints one of his high-profile surrogates, Michael Flynn, to be his national security advisor. Michael Flynn has been paid by the Kremlin's propaganda outfit RT in the past, as well as another Russian entity.

In December, Michael Flynn has a secret conversation with Ambassador Kislyak, about sanctions imposed by President Obama on Russia over attacking designed to help the Trump campaign. Michael Flynn lies about the secret conversation. The vice president unknowingly then assures the country that no -- no such conversation ever happened. The president is informed that Flynn has lied and Pence has misled the country. The president does nothing.

Two weeks later, the press reveals that Flynn has lied and the president is forced to fire Mr. Flynn. The president then praises the man who lied, Mr. Flynn, and castigates the press for exposing the lie.

Now, is it possible that the removal of the Ukraine provision from the GOP platform was a coincidence? Is it a coincidence that Jeff Sessions failed to tell the Senate about his meetings with a Russian ambassador, not only at the convention, but a more private meeting in his office and at a time when the U.S. election was under attack by the Russians?

Is it a coincidence that Michael Flynn would lie about a conversation he had with the same Russian Ambassador Kislyak, about the most pressing issue facing both countries at the time they spoke, the U.S. imposition of sanctions over Russian hacking of our election designed to help Donald Trump? Is it a coincidence that the Russian gas company, Rosneft, sold a 19 percent share after former British intelligence officer Steele was told by Russian sources that Carter Page was offered fees on a deal of just that size?

Is it a coincidence that Steele's Russian sources also affirmed that Russian had stolen documents hurtful to Secretary Clinton that it would utilize in exchange for Pro Russian policies that would later come to pass? Is it a coincidence that Roger Stone predicted that John Podesta would be a victim of a Russian hack and have his private e-mails published and did so even before Mr. Podesta himself, was fully aware that his private e-mails would be exposed?

Is it possible that all of these events and reports are completely unrelated and nothing more than a entirely unhappy coincidence? Yes, it is possible. But it is also possible, maybe more than possible, that they are not coincidental, not disconnected and not unrelated and that the Russians use the same techniques to corrupt U.S. persons that they employed in Europe and elsewhere. We simply don't know, not yet. And we owe it to the country to find out.

Director Comey, what you see on the dais in front of you in the form of this small number of members and staff is all we have to commit to this investigation. This is it. We are not supported by hundreds or thousands of agents and investigators with offices around the world. It is just us and our Senate counterparts.

In addition to this investigation we still have our day job which involves overseeing some of the largest and most important agencies in the country. Agencies which by the way are trained to keep secrets. I point this out for two reasons and I'm -- I'm wrapping up Chairman. First because we cannot do this work alone and nor should we. We believe these issues are so important that the FBI must devote its resources to investigating each of them thoroughly, to do any less would be negligent in the protection of our country.

We also need your full cooperation with our investigation so that we may have the benefit of what you know and so that we may coordinate our efforts in the discharge of both our responsibilities. And second, I raise this because I believe that we would benefit from the work of an independent commission that can devote the staff resources to this investigation that we do not have. And it can be completely removed from any political considerations.

This should not be a substitute for the work that we, in the intelligence committee, should and must do. But as an important complement to our efforts, just as was the case after 9/11. The stakes are nothing less than the future of our democracy and liberal democracy. Because we're engaged in a new war of ideas, not communism versus capitalism, but authoritarianism versus democracy and representative government. And in the struggle, our adversary sees our political process as a legitimate field of battle.

Only by understanding what the Russians did can we inoculate ourselves from further Russian interference that we know is coming. Only then can we protect our European allies, who are as we speak, enduring similar Russian interference in their own elections.

And finally, I want to say a word about our own committee investigation. You will undoubtedly observe in the questions and comments that our members make during today's hearing that the members of both parties share a common concern over the Russian attack on our democracy. But bring a different perspective on the significance of certain issues or the quantum of evidence we have seen in the early -- earliest stages of this investigation. This is to be expected.

The question most people have is whether we can really conduct this investigation in the kind of thorough and nonpartisan manner that the seriousness of the issues merit or whether the enormous political consequences of our work will make that impossible.

The truth is, I don't know the answer, but I do know this, if this committee can do its work properly, if we can pursue the facts wherever they lead, unafraid to compel witnesses to testify, to hear what they have to say, to learn what we will. And after exhaustive work reach a common conclusion, it would be a tremendous public service and one that is very much in the national interest. So let us try.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman and I yield back.

NUNES:
Thank you. Gentleman yields back.

With that that, Admiral Rogers, you're recognized for five minutes.

ROGERS:
Thank you sir.

Chairman Nunes, Ranking Member Schiff and members of the committee. Thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today on behalf of the men and women of the National Security Agency.

I'm honored to appear besides my teammate Director Comey to discuss Russia's activities and intentions regarding the 2016 U.S. election. And want to assure the committee that my team is doing its best to fulfill the various requests of this committee to support your ongoing investigations into this subject.

ROGERS:
Over the past weeks, NSA has been working closely with the committee to provide you the information that you require for your investigation and I can assure you we will continue to do so. When we last met in January, we discussed the classified version of the January intelligence committee -- community's assessment on assessing Russian activities and intentions in the recent U.S. elections.

Today, more than two months after we issued this assessment, we stand by it as issued. There is no change in our confidence level on the assessment. Of course, the specifics of this assessment need to remain classified to protect sensitive sources and methods so today I will limit my discussion to information in the public domain, that of the publicly released intelligence community assessment.

I hope you will understand that there are some issues I cannot discuss in an open session, nor will I be able to provide specifics in some areas. As the committee fully knows, the intelligence community has a longstanding policy of not discussing surveillance targeting information, in particular cases, as to do so would invariably open the door to compel further disclosures and litigation or the release of classified information, all of which would be harmful to our national security.

Like the committee, we are also greatly concerned about leaks of classified information as they can reveal the sources and methods we employ to provide intelligence to American policymakers and warfighters and generate advantage for our nation while protecting its citizens and interest and their privacy. I also want to assure the committee that we take very seriously that obligation to protect U.S. persons' privacy. This applies to all stages of the production of foreign intelligence, but I'd like to emphasize one area in particular; the dissemination of U.S. person information.

We at NSA have strict procedures in place to make sure that our reporting and the contents of our reporting are disseminated only to those that have strict need-to- know for valid purposes which primarily means support of the development of foreign policy and to protect national security. I do want to specifically mention that among the collection and authorities that we have to target foreign actors in foreign spaces, FISA Section 702 and Executive Order 12333 have been instrumental in our ability to produce the intelligence made available to the committee and others in gathering the SIGINT facts of foreign activity in this election cycle.

It would be difficult to overstate the breadth and scale of malicious cyber activity occurring today. Our adversaries including nation states have not rested in trying to penetrate government systems, steal our private industries' intellectual property, and make even greater strides towards the development and achievement of cyber attack capabilities. We have a hardworking and dedicated team at NSA that works every day to generate insights on this activity and to thwart its effectiveness. But cyber defense is a team sport and one of NFA -- NSA's strongest partners in this effort is Director Comey's team at the FBI.

And I'm glad to be able to describe here today how we are working together to help protect the nation and our allies to include providing a better understanding of Russian intentions and capabilities. In light of the I.C. assessment and findings, I welcome your investigation into overall Russian activities targeting the previous U.S. elections. NSA continues to employ rigorous analytic standards, applying them in every aspect of our intelligence reporting.

Our analysts have consistently proven to be reliable and thorough in their technical and analytic efforts and providing our policymakers and warfighters with SIGINT ammunition to make informed decisions to protect our nation's freedom and ensure the safety of its citizens. They are diligently continuing to monitor for additional reflections of Russian targeting of U.S. systems and those of our friends and allies around the world to share that information with our I.C. colleagues and foreign counterparts and to share that information with our I.C. colleagues and foreign counterparts and to produce unbiased, unprejudiced and timely reporting of SIGINT facts in their entirety.

I look forward your questions. Thank you, sir.

NUNES:
Thank you, Admiral Rogers.

Director Comey, you're recognized for five minutes.

COMEY:
Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Schiff, members of the committee, thank you for including me in today's hearing. I'm honored to be here representing the people of the FBI.

I hope we have shown you through our actions and our words how much we at the FBI value your oversight of our work and how much we respect your responsibility to investigate those things are important to the American people. Thank you for showing that both are being taken very seriously.

As you know, our practice is not to confirm the existence of ongoing investigations, especially those investigations that involve classified matters, but in unusual circumstances where it is in the public interest, it may be appropriate to do so as Justice Department policies recognize. This is one of those circumstances.

I have been authorized by the Department of Justice to confirm that the FBI, as part of our counterintelligence mission, is investigating the Russian government's efforts to interfere in the 2016 presidential election and that includes investigating the nature of any links between individuals associated with the Trump campaign and the Russian government and whether there was any coordination between the campaign and Russia's efforts. As with any counterintelligence investigation, this will also include an assessment of whether any crimes were committed.

Because it is an open ongoing investigation and is classified, I cannot say more about what we are doing and whose conduct we are examining. At the request of congressional leaders, we have taken the extraordinary step in coordination with the Department of Justice of briefing this Congress' leaders, including the leaders of this committee, in a classified setting in detail about the investigation but I can't go into those details here. I know that is extremely frustrating to some folks. I hope you and the American people can understand. The FBI is very careful in how we handle information about our cases and about the people we are investigating.

We are also very careful about the way we handle information that may be of interest to our foreign adversaries. Both of those interests are at issue in a counterintelligence investigation. Please don't draw any conclusions from the fact that I may not be able to comment on certain topics. I know speculating is part of human nature, but it really isn't fair to draw conclusions simply because I say that I can't comment.

Some folks may want to make comparisons to past instances where the Department of Justice and the FBI have spoken about the details of some investigations, but please keep in mind that those involved the details of completed investigations. Our ability to share details with the Congress and the American people is limited when those investigations are still open, which I hope makes sense.

We need to protect people's privacy. We need to make sure we don't give other people clues as to where we're going. We need to make sure that we don't give information to our foreign adversaries about what we know or don't know. We just cannot do our work well or fairly if we start talking about it while we're doing it. So we will try very, very hard to avoid that, as we always do.

This work is very complex and there is no way for me to give you a timetable as to when it will be done. We approach this work in an open-minded, independent way and our expert investigators will conclude that work as quickly as they can but they will always do it well no matter how long that takes. I can promise you, we will follow the facts wherever they lead. And I wanna underscore something my friend Mike Rogers said, leaks of classified information are serious, serious federal crimes for a reason...

(AUDIO GAP)

COMEY:
... they should be investigated and where possible prosecuted in a way that reflects that seriousness so that people understand it simply cannot be tolerated.

And I look forward to taking your questions.

NUNES:
Thank you, Director Comey.

Admiral Rogers, first I wanna go to you. On January 6th, 2017, the intelligence community assessment assessing Russian activities and intentions in recent U.S. elections, stated that the types of systems Russian actors targeted or compromised were not involved in vote tallying.

So my question as of today, Admiral Rogers, do you have any evidence that Russia cyber actors changed vote tallies in the state of Michigan?

ROGERS:
No I do not, but I would highlight we are a foreign intelligence organization, not a domestic intelligence organization. So it would be fair to say, we are probably not the best organization to provide a more complete answer.

NUNES:
How about the state of Pennsylvania?

ROGERS:
No, sir.

NUNES:
The state of Wisconsin?

ROGERS:
No, sir.

NUNES:
State of Florida?

ROGERS:
No, sir.

NUNES:
The state of North Carolina?

ROGERS:
No, sir.

NUNES:
The state of Ohio?

ROGERS:
No, sir.

NUNES:
So -- so you have no intelligence that suggests, or evidence that suggests, any votes were changed?

ROGERS:
I have nothing generated by the national security industry, sir.

NUNES:
Director Comey, do you have any evidence at the FBI that any votes were changed in the states that I mentioned to Admiral Rogers?

COMEY:
No.

NUNES:
Thank you. Admiral Rogers, I know that there was a leak of information regarding Director Clapper and Former Secretary of Defense Carter, were looking at relieving you of your -- of your duty.

Are you aware of those stories?

ROGERS:
I'm aware of media reporting to that.

NUNES:
And those stories were leaked as soon as you had visited with President-elect Trump. Is that correct?

ROGERS:
Yes sir, I was asked if I would be prepared to interview with the Trump administration for a position, which I did.

NUNES:
Did the leak of that information at all -- at all impact your ability and your assessment that you did for the intelligence community's assessment on January 6th?

ROGERS:
No sir, if I spent time in this job worrying about un- sourced media reporting, I'd never get any work done.

NUNES:
Thank you, Admiral.

Director Comey, I remain extremely concerned about the widespread illegal leaks that you just referenced in your -- in your testimony. Just for the record though, I wanna get this on the record.

Does the unauthorized disclosure of classified information to the press violate 18 USC 793, a section of the Espionage Act that criminalizes improperly accessing handling or transmitting national defense information?

COMEY:
Yes.

NUNES:
Would an unauthorized disclosure of FISA-derived information to the press violate 18 USC 798, a section of the Espionage Act that criminalizes the disclosure of information concerning the communication and intelligence activities of the United States?

COMEY:
Yes, in addition to being a breach of our trust with the FISA Court that oversees our use of those authorities.

NUNES:
Thank you, Director.

At this time, I'm gonna yield to Mr. Rooney, who chairs our NSA cyber committee, for questions.

ROONEY:
Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I'd like to direct my questions, first and foremost, to Admiral Rogers to convey my thanks to the many men and women for their dedication at the NSA for keeping our country safe. As well as I want to talk about the recent media stories, it may have led to confusion in the public about what the NSA is and is not legally collecting in. And the safeguards the NSA has put into place to protect personal data.

So I'd like to clarify is the chairman of the subcommittee on the NSA, I recently got to meet your deputy admiral last week out at the NSA and we visited and spoke of some of these things. And what -- what we can talk about your today publicly, if you could go into, if you can't, you can't. But I think that this is important for the people in the room and -- and listening outside understand.

Is it true that the NSA would need a court order based on probable cause to conduct electronic surveillance on a U.S. person inside the United States?

ROGERS:
Yes sir.

ROONEY:
And just to be clear, the section of the FISA that is expiring later this year, that's 702, which will be talking about a little bit, cannot be used to target U.S. persons or persons in the United States, is that correct?

ROGERS:
Yes sir.

ROONEY:
Section 702 focuses on non-U.S. persons outside the United States, primarily correct?

ROGERS:
Yes sir.

ROONEY:
Do you believe that the section 702 is important and valuable for U.S. national security?

ROGERS:
Yes sir.

ROONEY:
So it's safe to say that without having this tool, it would be a threat to our national security?

ROGERS:
It would significantly impact my ability to generate the insights that I believe this nation needs.

ROONEY:
In the media, there's a lot of reporting about something called incidental collection. Can you talk about what incidental collection is?

ROGERS:
Yes sir. Incidental collection is when we are targeting a valid foreign target, for example, in the course of that targeting we either get a reference to a U.S. person or suddenly a U.S. person appears as part of the conversation. That's what we call incidental collecting.

ROONEY:

And -- and what you do when it went something like that happens, if there's a U.S. person part of an incidental collection, what kind of safeguards are put in place to make sure that...

ROGERS:
So it depends specifically on the legal authority that we're using to execute the collection in the first place. But in broad terms, realizing again, it varies little bit by the specific authority that we're using to conduct the collection. We step back and we ask ourselves first, are we dealing with a U.S. person here? Is there something that we didn't expect to encounter that we've now encountered?

We'll ask ourselves what leads us to believe that it is a U.S. person. If we come to the conclusion that it is a U.S. person and we ask ourselves are we -- are we listening to criminal activity, are we seeing something of imminent threat or danger, for example, or are we just receiving something that has nothing to do with any of our valid collection authority? Based on that, we'll then take a series of actions.

In some case, we will just purge the collect, make no reporting on it, not retain the data. It's incidental collection, it has no intelligence value and it wasn't the purpose of what we were doing. In some cases then if we believe that there is intelligence value, for example, whether it's a reference to a U.S. person, as an example in a scenario.

In our reporting then we will mask the identity of the individual. We use a phrase like U.S. person one or U.S. person two. And I would remind everyone that for our purposes, U.S. person is defined very broadly. That is not just a U.S. citizen, that is a U.S. corporation, that is a ship or aircraft that is registered in the United States, that is an internet protocol address, for example.

So it's not just a particular individual, if that makes sense. The term for us is much broader because designed to ensure our protections of U.S. persons.

ROONEY:
And this -- the procedures and protections you talked about are required and approved by the FISA court, is that correct?

ROGERS:
Yes sir, and the attorney general.

ROONEY:
And you mentioned in your opening statement that for that kind of information to be disseminated outside of your agency and the NSA that that dissemination would be strictly on a need-to-know basis, is that -- is that correct?

ROGERS:
We use two criteria; is there a need to know in the course of the person or group that is asking for the identification, is there a valid need to know in the course of the execution of their official duties?

ROONEY:
So like, who would that be?

ROGERS:
It could be another element with the intelligence community, it could be another element within NSA, it could be a military customer, for example, who's reading some of our reporting. It could be a policymaker.

I apologize, there was one other point I wanted to make, but I've lost the thread in my mind. I apologize if I jump in at a moment...

ROONEY:
I'm sorry, I cut you off.

ROGERS:
I'll try to make...

ROONEY:
Let's get back to masking briefly.

You spoke about masking and trying to keep a U.S. person's identity concealed. And when it is disseminated, you -- we often talk about in the intelligence community about the exceptions to how -- if somebody's masks, how you unmask them. What would the exceptions to that masking be before it's disseminated?

ROGERS:
So again, we use two criteria; the need to know on the person requesting us in the execution of their official duties and the second part was, is the identification necessary to truly understand the context of the intelligence value that the report is designed to generate? Those are the two criteria we use.

ROONEY:
Is that identity of a U.S. person communicating with a foreign target? Is that ordinarily disseminated in a masked or unmasked form?

ROGERS:
No. It is normally disseminated, if we -- if we make the decision that there's intelligence value and we're going to report on it, it is normally disseminated in a masked form. I would -- again, as I said, we use a reference, U.S. person one, U.S. person two...

ROONEY:
Right.

ROGERS:
I would highlight, if you look at the total breadth of our reporting, reporting involving U.S. persons at all is an incredibly small subset in my experience of our total reporting.

ROONEY:
Who normally in the NSA would make the decision to unmask?

ROGERS:
There are 20 individuals including myself who I have delegated this authority to approve unmask requests.

ROONEY:
And does the level of approval change depending on the reason for unmasking? If it was something or somebody, say, really important would that matter or could it be...

ROGERS:
Not -- it's not necessarily designated in writing that way, but certainly by custom and tradition, at times requests will be pushed up to my -- I'm the senior-most of the 20 individuals. Requests will be pushed to my level, say "hey, sir, we just want to make sure that you're comfortable with this."

ROONEY:
Right. So 20 people, that -- you know, what procedures or safeguards are put in place to make sure that those 20 people are not unmasking wrongly?

ROGERS:
So they retrieve specific training, there are specific controls put in place in terms of our ability to disseminate information out of the databases associated with U.S. persons.

ROONEY:
OK. Let's run through the exceptions quickly through a following hypothetical. If the NSA collects a communication where a target under surveillance is talking to a U.S. person, how would the NSA determine whether disseminating the U.S. person information is necessary to understanding the foreign intelligence or assess its importance?

ROGERS:
So first of all, try to understand the nature of the conversation. Is this truly something that involves intelligence or a national security implication for the United States or is this just very normal, reasonable conversations, in which case we have no desire to have any awareness of it, it's not applicable to our mission.

In that case, normally we'll purge the data. We'll ask ourselves, is there criminal activity involved, is there a threat, potential threat or harm to U.S. individuals being discussed in a conversation for example.

ROONEY:
If there was criminal activity involved, what would you do then?

ROGERS:
If when we disseminate -- if we decide we need -- if it's criminal activity, we'll disseminate the information and if the FBI or other criminal activities are on the reporting stream, in some cases I also will generate a signed letter under my signature in specific cases to Department of Justice highlighting that what we think we have is potential criminal activity, but because we are not a law enforcement or justice organization we're not in a place to make that determination.

ROONEY:
OK. Based on that, again, hypothetically, if the NSA obtained the communication of General Flynn while he was communicating with the surveillance target legally, would you please explain how General Flynn's identity could be unmasked based on the exceptions that we discussed?

ROGERS:
Sir, I'm not going to discuss even hypotheticals about individuals, I'm sorry.

ROONEY:
If I could make reference to a Washington Post article that I have here from February 9 which states -- do you -- let me say what it is and I'll ask if you've read it or -- or -- or if you've seen it. Which states national security under Michael Flynn privately discussed U.S. sanctions against Russia with the country's ambassador to the United States during the month before President Trump took office.

Contrary to public assertions by Trump officials current and -- and former U.S. officials said. The article goes on to say that nine current or former -- former officials who were in senior positions at multiple agencies at the time of the call spoke under the condition of anonymity to discuss intelligence matters. Did you read this article?

ROGERS:
I apologize, sir. It's not -- an article that references nine particular individual -- it doesn't necessarily ring a bell. I've certainly seen plenty of media reporting that but again, I'm not going to comment on specifics.

ROONEY:
Just basically under the breath of that article, when we when we hear that nine former, current -- or current officials had spoken to the press under the condition of anonymity, and we heard our director Comey and the Chairman speak of this is a potential crime -- a serious crime -- under the Espionage Act, assuming if this article is accurate, who would have the -- who would be in a position to request the unmasking of General Flynn's identity? Would that be you?

ROGERS:
I would have the authority to do that.

ROONEY:
Who else would?

ROGERS:
The 19 other individuals.

ROONEY:
Would that include director Comey?

ROGERS:
I'm talking about...

ROONEY:
In the NSA...

ROGERS:
... within the National Security Agency and we're talking about NSA reporting.

ROONEY:
But -- but would people like Director Comey also be able to request that?

ROGERS:
Yes.

ROONEY:
And the attorney general and Director Clapper, are those type of people also on this list?

ROGERS:
Again, I'm not going to -- in general, yes, they would be...

ROONEY:
Generally speaking, not with regard to...

ROGERS:
I'm not going to talk about...

ROONEY:
OK.

ROGERS:
... of an individual or hypothetical scenarios.

ROONEY:
Well, here's what I'm trying to get at. If -- if -- if what we're talking about is a serious crime as has -- as has been alleged, in your opinion, would leaking of an -- a U.S. person who has been unmasked and disseminated by intelligence community officials, would that leaking to the press hurt or help our ability to conduct national security matters?

ROGERS:
Hurt.

ROONEY:

OK. If -- if it hurts -- so this leak, which through the 702 tool, which we all agree is vital -- or you and I at least agree to that -- do you think that that leak actually threatens our national security? If it's a crime and if it's unveiling a masked person, and this tool is so important that it can potentially jeopardize this tool when we have to try to reauthorize it in a few months.

If this is used against the ability of us to reauthorize this tool and we can't get it done because whoever did this leak, or these nine people that did this leak, create such a stir, whether it be, you know, in our legislative process or whatever, that they don't feel confident that a U.S. person under the 702 program can be masked successfully and not leaked to the press, doesn't that hurt, that leak hurt our national security?

ROGERS:
Yes, sir.

ROONEY:
Can you think of any reason why somebody would -- would want to leak the identity of a mass person?

ROGERS:
No sir, I -- I mean I have raised this directly with my own workforce over the -- over the course of the last few months to remind everyone, part of the ethics of our profession, not just the legal requirement but the ethics of our profession as intelligence professionals is we do not engage in this activity.

And I've also reminded the men and women of the National Security Agency, if I become aware of any such conduct, there is no place for you on this team. It's unacceptable to the citizens of the nation that one would engage in this.

ROONEY:
Well, I think that, you know, as we move forward, obviously, you know, I think that what you're speaking of is this sacred trust that the intelligence community has with the American people and with the people that are representing them here on this dais.

And if we -- I think that it's vital that for those who break that sacred trust, if they are not held accountable whether it by the NSA internally or by the FBI through conviction or investigations/prosecution and conviction through the attorney general's office of that crime, it is very difficult for us to be able to keep that sacred trust to know that what we're doing is -- is -- is valid and what we're doing has no nefarious motivations. And -- and -- and to us to be able to keep America safe without violating the constitutional protections that we all enjoy.

Mr. Chairman, I'm not sure how much more time I have left. I just wanted to...

ROGERS:
Congressman, can I make one comment if I could, I apologize.

ROONEY:
Yes, sir.

ROGERS:

It comes to my mind based on your question, I just wanna remind everyone and in general. FISA collection on targets in the United States has nothing to do with 702, I just wanna make sure we're not confusing the two things, here, 702 is collection overseas against non-U.S. persons.

ROONEY:
Right and -- and what -- and what we're talking about here, is incidentally, if a U.S. person is talking to a foreign person that we're listening to, whether or not that person is unmasked...

ROGERS:
I just wanna make sure we all understand the context, that's all.

ROONEY:
Right, right, and -- and whether or not somebody in the intelligence community that we put the trust in, is going to leak that information to the press, for whatever reason. And I'm not even gonna get into the gratuitous, you know, what that reason may be.

But it's really gonna hurt the people on this committee and you all on the intelligence community, when we try to retain this tool this year. And try to convince some of our colleagues that this is really important for national security, when somebody in the intelligence community says you know what? The hell with it, I'm gonna release this person's name because I'm gonna get something out of it.

We're all gonna be hurt by that if we can't reauthorize this tool, do you agree with that?

ROGERS:
Yes, sir.

ROONEY:
Mr. Chairman, do I -- do I have enough time to talk about the letter the committee sent?

NUNES:
Sure.

ROONEY:
The committee sent to you on March 15th, a letter -- yeah, to Admiral Rogers and to Director Comey. Have you had a chance to look at this letter? I think that you've actually...

(CROSSTALK)

ROGERS:
Yes sir, I in fact have given you a reply on the 17th.

ROONEY:
Just real -- real quickly because I don't want to take up any more time. Can you give us a sense of how many unmasked U.S. persons identities were disseminated by the NSA from June 2016 to June 2017?

ROGERS:
No sir. As I have indicated where the process of compiling that information. I will provide it to the committee. But until that work is done, I am not gonna comment.

ROONEY:
Can you tell us whether any of those disseminations broadly were involved U.S. people relating to presidential candidates Donald J. Trump or Hillary Clinton, and their associates in 2016?

ROGERS:
I won't answer until I complete the research sir.

ROONEY:
Assuming that the NSA disseminated unmasked U.S. persons information relating to the Trump or Clinton campaigns, would that have been a reason for such unmasking?

ROGERS:
I apologize. I don't truly understand the question.

ROONEY:
Let me just move on to the next one.

Along those lines, if the NSA had wanted disseminate unmasked U.S persons information related to either the presidential campaign, who in the NSA would have approved such dissemination's?

ROGERS:
Again, it would've been one of the 20 and I provided that in my initial response to the committee. I have outlined the procedures, I've outlined the specific 20 individuals.

ROONEY:
Thank you, Admiral. I appreciate your -- your answers. I look forward to working with you on the subcommittee moving forward.

And Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

NUNES:
Gentleman yields back.

Mr. Gowdy is recognized.

GOWDY:
Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Director Comey, we will begin on this line of questioning, then we'll finish it the next round. FISA and other similar related counterterrorism programs have been described, even this morning, as vital, critical and indispensable to our national security. And many of us on both sides of the aisle believe FISA and similar counterterrorism programs prevent terrorist attacks and save American lives.

But FISA and other surveillance programs are intentionally designed to preserve the privacy of U.S. citizens. They are intentionally designed to ensure the information is collected and used only for legitimate national security and criminal investigative purposes.

There are statutory safeguards, there are warrants based on probable calls, there is a FISA court that is involved, there are audits on the backend and we think so highly of this material. It is a felony, punishable by up to 10 years in federal prison to unlawfully disseminate it. All of this was done to make sure this information gathered remains protected as it relates to U.S. citizens.

The way I view it, Director Comey, the American people have an agreement with their government. We are going to give you the tools to keep us safe, even if it infringes on our privacy Psalm (ph). We're going to give you the tools. And government in return promises to safeguard the privacy of U.S. citizens. And when that deal is broken, it jeopardizes American trust in the surveillance program.

So let me ask you, do you agree FISA is critical to our national security?

COMEY:
I do.

GOWDY:
Do you agree programs like FISA were intentionally designed to safeguard the identity of U.S. persons?

COMEY:
Yes, there are other -- other important elements of it but that's a primary goal, I believe.

GOWDY:
It wasn't an afterthought, it wasn't an accident. These are intentional safeguards that we put in place to protect U.S. citizens, is that correct?

COMEY:
Correct.

GOWDY:
Do you agree much of what is learned from these programs is classified or otherwise legally protected?

COMEY:
All FISA applications review by the court collection by us pursuant to our FISA authority is classified.

GOWDY:
The dissemination of which is a felony punishable by up to 10 years in prison?

COMEY:

Sure, dissemination -- unauthorized dissemination.

GOWDY:
Unauthorized dissemination of classified or otherwise legally protected material punishable by a felony up to 10 years in federal prison.

COMEY:
Yes. Yes, as it should be.

GOWDY:
All right.

In January of this year, the Washington Post reported, according to a senior U.S. government official, a named U.S. citizen -- and I will not use the name -- a named U.S. citizen phoned the Russian ambassador several times on December 29.

In February of this year, the Washington Post reported nine, nine current and former officials who were in senior positions at multiple agencies at the time of the call, spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss intelligence matters and that officials began pouring over intelligence reports, intercepted communications, and diplomatic cables.

In February of this year, the New York Times reported a U.S. citizen, whose name I will not use, discusses sanctions with the Russian ambassador in a phone call according to officials who have seen a transcript of the wiretapped conversation. And again in February of this year, the New York Times reported on a phone call involving a U.S. citizen including significant discussions of phone records, intercepted calls, intercepted communications, and reported the NSA captured calls and then asked the FBI to collect as much information as possible.

My time is up so I will say this for this round. I thought it was against the law to disseminate classified information. Is it?

COMEY:
Yes, sir. It's a serious crime. I'm not going to comment on those particular articles because I don't want to, in any circumstance, compound a criminal act by confirming that it was classified information but in general, yes, it's a serious crime and it should be for the reasons you said.

GOWDY:
We'll take it back up next round, Mr. Chairman.

NUNES:
Gentleman yields back.

I'll now yield 15 minutes to Mr. Schiff.

SCHIFF:

Director Comey, I want to begin by attempting to put to rest several claims made by the president about his predecessor, namely that President Obama wiretapped his phones. So that we can be precise, I want to refer you to exactly what the president said and ask you whether there is any truth to it.

First, the president claimed, quote, "Terrible. Just found out that Obama had my wires tapped in Trump Tower just before the victory. Nothing found. This is McCarthyism," unquote.

Director Comey, was the president's statement that Obama had his wires tapped in Trump Tower a true statement?

COMEY:
With respect to the president's tweets about alleged wiretapping directed at him by the prior administration, I have no information that supports those tweets and we have looked carefully inside the FBI. The Department of Justice has asked me to share with you that the answer is the same for the Department of Justice and all its components. The department has no information that supports those tweets.

SCHIFF:
The president accused Mr. Obama and presumably the FBI of engaging in McCarthyism. As you understand the term McCarthyism, do you think President Obama or the FBI was engaged in such conduct?

COMEY:
I'm not to try and characterize the tweets themselves. All I can tell you is we have no information that supports them.

SCHIFF:
Were you engaged in McCarthyism, Director Comey?

COMEY:
I try very hard not to engage in any isms of any kind, including -- including McCarthyism.

SCHIFF:
The president second stated quote "Is it legal for a sitting president to be wiretapping a race for president prior to an election? Turned down by a court earlier, a new low," unquote.

Director Comey, can you answer the president's question? Would it be legal for present Obama to have ordered a wiretap of Donald Trump?

COMEY:
I'm not going to characterize or respond to the tweets themselves.

I can tell you in general, as -- as Admiral Rogers and I were just saying, there is a statutory framework in the United States under which courts grant permission for electronic surveillance either in a criminal case or a national security case based on a showing of probable cause, carefully overseen. It's a rigorous, rigorous process that involves all three branches of government, and it's one we've lived with since the late 1970s. That's how it works.

So no individual in the United States can direct electronic surveillance of anyone, it has to go through an application process, ask a judge, the judge can I make the order.

SCHIFF:
So President Obama could not unilaterally order a wiretap of anyone?

COMEY:
No president could.

SCHIFF:
Mr. Trump also asserted in that tweet that he was -- that the application -- or the president's order was turned down by a court. Was there any request made by the FBI or Justice Department to wiretap Donald Trump turned down by a court?

COMEY:
That's one of those subjects I can't comment on one way or another. Please don't interpret that in any way other than I just can't talk about anything that relates to the Pfizer process in an open setting.

SCHIFF:
Third, the president stated, I bet a good lawyer could make a great case out of the fact that President Obama was tapping my phones in October just prior to the election.

Director Comey, you're a good lawyer. Can you make out a great case that president Obama wiretapped Mr. Trump's phones just prior to the election in light of the fact you've said there is no evidence of that?

COMEY:
All I can say is what I said before, that we don't have any information that supports those tweets.

SCHIFF:
Well, in my view then, you would not be a great, but very unethical lawyer to make up such a case. And finally, the president made the following accusation. How low has president Obama gone to tap my phones during the very sacred election process? This is Nixon-Watergate. Bad or sick guy.

Director Comey, the president has compared Mr. Obama to Nixon and purported wiretap of Trump phones as another Watergate. What was the gravamen of the offense by Nixon and his operatives during Watergate? A lot of people who may be watching may be too young.

SCHIFF:
To understand what Watergate was about, what was the gravament of that offense?

COMEY:
Well, as I recall it then, I was a kid, but I've studied it quite a bit in school. The gravament of it was an abuse of power including break-ins, unlawful wire taps, obstruction of justice, sort of the cycle of criminal conduct.

SCHIFF:
There was a break-in of the democratic headquarters by operatives of the president, was it not?

COMEY:
That's my understanding is that's how it began -- the investigation began.

SCHIFF:
It also involve the cover up by the president.

COMEY:
Yes, as I said.

SCHIFF:
Now here, I think you've said there's been no evidence of an illegal wiretap by president Obama, is that right?

COMEY:
I've said the FBI and the Department of Justice have no information to support those tweets.

SCHIFF:
But there is evidence, is there not, of a break in of the democratic headquarters by a foreign power using cyber means?

COMEY:
Yes there was, as the -- as the intelligence community report, the un-class report, said in January, the Russian intelligence services hacked into a number of enterprises in the United States, including the Democratic National Committee.

SCHIFF:
And there was an effort by the Russians to cover up their break-in of the Democratic Party headquarters, by using cutouts like WikiLeaks to publish the stolen material, isn't that right?

COMEY:
Certainly to cover up their -- that they were the ones releasing it.

SCHIFF:
Director Rogers, in an effort to explain why there was no evidence supporting the president's claim that Obama had wiretapped him, the president and his spokesman, Sean Spicer, have suggested that British intelligence through its NSA or GCHQ wiretapped Mr. Trump on President Obama's behalf.

Did you ever request that your counterparts in GCHQ should wiretap Mr. Trump on behalf of President Obama?

ROGERS:
No sir, nor would I, that would be expressly against the construct of the Five Eyes agreement that's been in place for decades.

SCHIFF:
And the Five Eyes are some of our closest intelligence partners and Britain -- Britain is one of them?

ROGERS:
Yes, sir.

SCHIFF:
Have you seen any evidence that anyone else in the Obama administration made such a request?

ROGERS:
No sir, and again, my view is the same as Director Comey, I've seen nothing on the NSA side that we engaged in any such activity, nor that anyone ever asked us to engage in such activity.

SCHIFF:
And if you were to ask the British to spy on America, that would be a violation of U.S. law, would it not?

ROGERS:
Yes, sir.

SCHIFF:
Our relationship with British intelligence is one of the closest we have with any foreign services, isn't that true?

ROGERS:
Yes, sir.

SCHIFF:
Now, the British allies -- our British allies have called the president's suggestion that they wiretapped him for Obama nonsense and utterly ridiculous. Would you agree?

ROGERS:
Yes, sir.

SCHIFF:
Does it do damage to our relationship with one of our closest intelligence partners for the president to make a baseless claim that the British participated in a conspiracy against him?

ROGERS:
I think it clearly frustrates a key ally of ours.

SCHIFF:
Certainly wouldn't endear the British intelligence services to continue working with us, would it?

ROGERS:
I believe that the relationship is strong enough, this is something we'll be able to deal with.

SCHIFF:
But it's not helpful...

ROGERS:
Yes, sir...

SCHIFF:
... you would agree?

ROGERS:
... that -- that...

SCHIFF:
Director Rogers, President Trump recently met with German Chancellor Angela Merkel during a joint press conference, the president suggested that they both had something in common, that they had both been wiretapped by President Obama.

Director Comey has just demonstrated why the claims by the president about his being wiretapped by Obama were unsupported by any evidence. But the claim he made about wiretapping directed at Merkel referred to something that came up in the context of the Snowden disclosures.

I'm not going to ask you to comment on whether the Chancellor was the subject of any eavesdropping. But I would like to ask you whether the Snowden disclosures did damage to our relationship with our German ally and whether the Chancellor herself expressed her concern at the time.

ROGERS:
Yes, sir.

SCHIFF:
In light of this, is it helpful to our relationship with the Chancellor or our relationship with German intelligence, to bring this up again in a public forum?

ROGERS:

It certainly complicates things. But again, I'd like to think that our relationship is such we're gonna be able to deal and keep moving forward.

SCHIFF:
So our relationships with the British and the Germans, you hope, are strong enough to withstand any damage done by these comments?

ROGERS:
By anything in general, sir. We have foundational interest with each other, we need to keep working together.

SCHIFF:
This time, Director Comey, let me ask you a few questions you may or may not be able to answer. Do you know who Roger Stone is?

COMEY:
Generally, yes.

SCHIFF:
Are you aware that he was a partner of Paul Manafort?

COMEY:
Mr. Schiff, I'm worried we're going to a place I don't want to go, which is commenting on any particular person. And so I -- I don't think I should comment. I'm aware of public accounts but I don't want to talk more than that.

SCHIFF:
Are you aware that he has publicly acknowledged having directly communicated with (inaudible), someone that the intelligence community has assessed was a person of Russian intelligence?

COMEY:
I've read media accounts to that effect. I don't wanna hurt anybody's feeling in the media. I don't know whether that's accurate or not.

SCHIFF:
If Mr. Stone acknowledged Mr. Podesta's time in the barrel was coming in August 2016, would that have been prior to the public release of stolen e-mails of Mr. Podesta's?

COMEY:
I believe that's the correct chronology.

SCHIFF:
Do you know how Mr. Stone would've known that Mr. Podesta's e-mails were going to be released?

COMEY:
That's not something I can comment on.

SCHIFF:
Do you know that Mr. Podesta has said that at the time he was not even aware whether his e-mails had been stolen would be published?

COMEY:
That's nothing something I comment on.

SCHIFF:
At this point Mr. Chairman, I'm going to yield to Mr. Himes.

HIMES:
Thank you to the ranking member. And gentlemen, thank you for being with us today.

Let me -- when I get my own time I'll -- I'll -- I'll have some follow-up questions. But let me start with a point that the chairman brought out I think very specifically which is that there's no evidence that votes were technically changed in any of the jurisdictions that he named.

Admiral Rogers, thanks for confirming that, but am I correct, that the -- when we say Russian hacking what we are referring to is the fact that the intelligence community believes that the Russians penetrated the networks of the DNC, of John Podesta, and other individuals, stole information and then disseminated that information. Is that a fair characterization of the -- of the conclusions of the intelligence community?

ROGERS:
Yes sir.

HIMES:
And did the intelligence community ever do an analysis as to whether the dissemination of that adverse information in a closely fought election had any effect on the American electorate?

ROGERS:
No sir. The U.S. intelligence community does not do assessments ...

HIMES:
Of course not.

(CROSSTALK)

ROGERS:
... U.S. opinion.

HIMES:
That's -- that's -- that's not your job.

ROGERS:
No sir.

HIMES:
The fact is, those of us who go through campaigns know that's actually something we probably have a little bit more understanding of. Let me just ask this question then. Was there any equivalent dissemination of adverse information stolen from the RNC or individuals associated with the Trump campaign?

COMEY:
No.

HIMES:
Thank you.

Director Comey, in -- in the remaining minutes here. I appreciate your frankness on the topic of an ongoing investigation and appreciate your inability to go too much further than you went. But I do want to ask you a question to try to clear up some confusion.

This committee, of course, is engaged in investigation about links, as you said, between the Trump campaign and the Russians, should there be any possible collusion. We've had a number of statements very early in the investigation that there was no evidence of collusion. This is still very early in our investigation, is it fair to say that you're still relatively early in your investigation?

COMEY:
It's hard to say because I don't how much longer it will take. But we've been doing this -- this investigation began in late July, so for counterintelligence investigation that's a fairly short period of time.

HIMES:
So, you used the word coordination which to me suggests that you are in fact investigating whether there was coordination between U.S. persons and the Russians. Is it fair for me to assume that we shouldn't simply dismiss the possibility that there was coordination or collusion between the Russian efforts and U.S. persons as an investigatory body?

COMEY:
Well all I can tell you is what we're investigating which includes whether there was any coordination between people associated with the Trump campaign and the Russians.

HIMES:
OK. Thank you, I'll yield the remaining time to the ranking member.

SCHIFF:

I will yield the remaining time this period to Representative Sewell.

SEWELL:
Thank you.

So, with respect to the coordination, Director Comey, I just wanted to continue this line of questioning, can you say with any specificity what kinds of coordination or contacts you're looking at in your investigation generally when confronted with something like this?

COMEY:
I can't.

SEWELL:
Can you discuss whether or not there was any knowledge by any Trump- related person and the Russians?

COMEY:
I can't.

SEWELL:
So with respect to any ongoing investigation, whether the specificity of the person, U.S. person or otherwise, you can't comment on any of that.

COMEY:
Correct.

SEWELL:
OK. Can you characterize what the nature of your investigation generally, wouldn't -- when you do an investigation of this sort, can you talk a little bit about the process, generally?

COMEY:
Not a whole lot. I can tell you we use our great, great people, we coordinate with our brothers and sisters in other parts of the intelligence community to see what they may know from around the world that might be useful to us and we use all the different tools and techniques that we use in all of our investigations. That's probably the most -- I'm not sure that's useful to you, but that's the most I can say.

SEWELL:
How long does a counterintelligence investigation like this usually take? You said that it started in July.

COMEY:
There is no usually. It's hard -- it's impossible to say, frankly.

SEWELL:
I yield back my time.

NUNES:
Thank you, Ms. Sewell. We'll go back to -- I'll yield myself 15 minutes and we'll go back to Mr. Gowdy.

GOWDY:
Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Director Comey, you and I were discussing the felonious dissemination of classified material during the last round. Is there an exception in the law for current or former U.S. officials who request anonymity?

COMEY:
To release classified information?

GOWDY:
Yes sir.

COMEY:
No.

GOWDY:
Is there an exception in the law for reporters who want to break a story?

COMEY:
Well that's a harder question as to whether a reporter incurs criminal liability by publishing classified information and one probably beyond my ken. I'm not as good a lawyer as Mr. Schiff said I used to be.

GOWDY:
Well, I don't know about that but the statute does use the word published, doesn't it?

COMEY:
It does, but that's a question I know the Department of Justice has struggled with through administration after administration.

GOWDY:
I know the department struggled with it, the 4th Circuit struggled with it, lots of people have struggled with it but you're not aware of an exception in the current dissemination of classified information statute that carves out an exception for reporters.

COMEY:
No, I'm not aware of anything carved out in the statute. I don't think a reporter's been prosecuted certainly in my lifetime though.

GOWDY:

Well, there've been a lot of statutes that bore on this investigation for which no one's ever been prosecuted or convicted and that does not keep people from discussing those statutes, namely the Logan Act. In theory, how would reporters know a U.S. citizen made a telephone call to an agent of a foreign power?

COMEY:
How would they know legally?

GOWDY:
Yes.

COMEY:
If it was declassified and then discussed in a judicial proceeding or congressional hearing. Something like that.

GOWDY:
And assume none of those facts are at play, how would they know?

COMEY:
Someone told them who shouldn't have told them.

GOWDY:
How would a reporter know about the existence of intercepted phone calls?

COMEY:
Same thing. In a -- in a legitimate way, through a appropriate proceeding where there's been declassification. In any other way, in an illegitimate way.

GOWDY:
How would reporters know if a transcript existed of an intercepted communication?

COMEY:
Same answer. It -- it -- the only legitimate way would be through a proceeding -- appropriate proceeding, the illegitimate way would be somebody told him who shouldn't have told them.

GOWDY:
What does the term mask mean in the concept of FISA and other surveillance programs?

COMEY:
As Director Rogers explained, it's our practice, approved by the FISA court, of removing the names of U.S. persons to protect their privacy and their identity unless it hits certain exceptions. So masking means, as Mike Rogers said -- I'll often see a intelligence report from NSA that will say U.S. person number one, U.S. person number two, U.S. person number three and there's no further identification on the document.

GOWDY:
Admiral Rogers said there are 20 people within the NSA that are part of the unmasking process. How many people within the FBI are part of the unmasking process?

COMEY:
I don't know for sure. As I sit here, surely more, given the nature the FBI's work. We come into contact with U.S. persons a whole lot more than the NSA does because we may be conducting -- we only conduct our operations in the United States to collect electronic surveillance -- to conduct electronic surveillance, so I don't -- I can find out the exact number, I don't know it as I sit here.

GOWDY:
Well, I think, Director Comey, given the fact that you and I agree this is critical, vital, indispensable, a similar program is coming up for reauthorization this fall with a pretty strong head wind right now. It would be nice to know the universe of people who have the power to unmask a U.S. citizen's name. Because that might provide something of a roadmap to investigate who might've actually disseminated a masked U.S. citizen's name.

COMEY:
Sure. The number is relevant but what I hope the U.S. -- the American people realize is the number's important, but the culture behind it is in fact even more important. The training, the rigor, the discipline. We are obsessive about FISA in the FBI for reasons I hope make sense to this committee but we are -- everything that's FISA has to be labeled in such a way to warn people this is FISA, we treat this in a special way.

So we can get you the number, but I want to assure you the culture of the FBI and the NSA around how we treat U.S. person information is obsessive and I mean that in a good way.

GOWDY:
Director Comey, I am not arguing with you and I do agree that culture is important, but if there are 100 people who have the ability to unmask and the knowledge of a previously masked name, then that's 100 different potential sources of investigation and the smaller the number is, the easier your investigation is.

So the number is relevant. I can see the culture is relevant. NSA, FBI, what other U.S. government agencies have the authority to unmask a U.S. citizen's name?

COMEY:
I think all agencies that collect information pursuant to FISA have what are called standard minimization procedures, which are approved by the FISA court that govern how they will treat U.S. person information. So I know the NSA does, I know the CIA does, obviously the FBI does. I don't know for sure beyond that.

GOWDY:
How about the department of -- how about Main Justice?

COMEY:
Main Justice, I think does have standard minimization procedures.

GOWDY:

All right, so that's four. The NSA, FBI, CIA, Main Justice. Does the White House have the authority to unmask a U.S. citizen's name?

COMEY:
I think other elements of the government that are consumers of our products can ask the collectors to unmask. The unmasking resides with those who collected the information.

And so if Mike Rogers's folks collected something and they sent it to me in a report and it says U.S. person number one and it's important for the FBI to know who that is, our request will go back to them. The White House can make similar requests of the FBI or of NSA but they can't on their -- they don't own their own collect and so they can't on their own unmask. I got that about right?

ROGERS:
No, that's correct.

COMEY:
Yeah.

GOWDY:
I guess what I'm getting at, Director Comey, is you say it's vital, you say it's critical, you say it's indispensable. We both know it's a threat to the reauthorization of 702 later on this fall. And by the way, it's also a felony punishable by up to 10 years.

So how would you begin your investigation, assuming for the sake of argument that a U.S. citizen's name appeared in the Washington Post and the New York Times unlawfully. Where would you begin that investigation?

COMEY:
Well, I'm not gonna talk about any particular investigation...

GOWDY:
That's why I said in theory.

COMEY:
You would start by figuring out, so who are the suspects? Who touched the information that you've concluded ended up unlawfully in the newspaper and start with that universe and then use investigative tools and techniques to see if you can eliminate people, or include people as more serious suspects.

GOWDY:
Do you know whether Director Clapper knew the name of the U.S. citizen that appeared in the New York Times and Washington Post?

COMEY:
I can't say in this forum because again, I don't wanna confirm that there was classified information in the newspaper.

GOWDY:
Would he have access to an unmasked name?

COMEY:
In -- in some circumstances, sure, he was the director of national intelligence. But I'm not talking about the particular.

GOWDY:
Would Director Brennan have access to an unmasked U.S. citizen's name?

COMEY:
In some circumstances, yes.

GOWDY:
Would National Security Adviser Susan Rice have access to an unmasked U.S. citizen's name?

COMEY:
I think any -- yes, in general, and any other national security adviser would, I think, as a matter of their ordinary course of their business.

GOWDY:
Would former White House Advisor Ben Rhodes have access to an unmasked U.S. citizen's name?

COMEY:
I don't know the answer to that.

GOWDY:
Would former Attorney General Loretta Lynch have access to an unmasked U.S. citizen's name?

COMEY:
In general, yes, as would any attorney general.

GOWDY:
So that would also include Acting AG Sally Yates?

COMEY:
Same answer.

GOWDY:
Did you brief President Obama on -- well, I'll just ask you. Did you brief President Obama on any calls involving Michael Flynn?

COMEY:
I'm not gonna get into either that particular case that matter, or any conversations I had with the president. So I can't answer that.

GOWDY:
Well, Director Comey, there's been some speculation this morning on motive. I'm not all that interested in motive -- first of all, its really hard to prove.

Secondarily, you never have to prove it. But I get that people wanna know, I get the jury all wants -- always wants to know why. I think you and I can agree there are a couple of reasons that you would not have to unlawfully, feloniously, disseminate classified material. It certainly wasn't done to help an ongoing criminal investigation, because you already had the information, didn't you?

COMEY:
Again, I can't answer in the context of this particular matter.

GOWDY:
How about in theory? Is -- is -- is there something a reporter would have access to that the head of the FBI would not?

COMEY:
It's hard for me to answer, I would hope not when it relates to the FBI...

GOWDY:
I would hope not too, since its part of our surveillance programs. I would hope that you had access to everything as the head of the world's premier law-enforcement agency. I would hope that you had it all. So if you had it all, the motive couldn't have been to help you, because you already had it. And Admiral Rogers, the motive couldn't have been to help you, because you already had it.

So in the universe of possible motives for the felonious dissemination of classified material, we could rule out wanting to help the intelligence and the law enforcement communities. Those are two motives are gone now. That leaves some more nefarious motives. Is the investigation into the leak of classified information -- has it begun yet?

COMEY:
I can't say because I don't want to confirm that that was classified information.

GOWDY:
Well, I'm -- I don't want to quarrel with you Director Comey and I -- I do understand that you cannot ordinarily confirm or deny the existence of an investigation. But you did it this morning, citing DOJ policy given the gravity of the fact pattern.

Would you not agree that surveillance programs that are critical, indispensable, vital to our national security, some of which are awful reauthorization this fall, that save American lives and prevent terrorist attacks also rises to the level of important?

COMEY:
I think those programs are vital and leaks of information collected pursuant to court order under those programs are terrible. And as I said in my opening statement should be taken very, very seriously.

What I don't ever want to do is compound what bad people have done and confirm something that's in the newspaper. Because sometimes newspaper get it right, there's a whole lotta wrong information about -- allegedly about classified activities that's in the newspaper. We don't call them and correct them either. That's another big challenge but we just don't go anywhere near it because we don't want to help and compound the offense that was committed.

GOWDY:
I understand that Director Comey. And I'm trying really hard not to get you to discuss the facts at bar (ph). But some of the words that appeared in this public reporting, include the word transcript which has a very unique use in the matters that you and I are discussing this morning. That is a very unique use of that word, wiretap has a very specific meaning. The name of a U.S. citizen that was supposed to statutorily be protected, is no longer protected.

So some of this reporting -- let's assume 90 percent of it is inaccurate, that other 10 percent is still really, really important. And to the extent that you can rely on the dates in either the Washington Post or the New York Times, we are talking about February of this year is when the reporting first took place. So we are -- we're a month and a half or two months into something that you and I agree, is incredibly important and also happens the felony.

So I'm just simply asking you to assure the American people, you've already assured them you take it really seriously. Can you assure them that it is going to be investigated?

COMEY:
I can't but I hope -- I hope people watching know how seriously we take leaks of classified information. But I don't want to confirm it by saying that were investigating it. And I'm sorry I have to draw the line, I just think that's the right way to be.

GOWDY:
Well I'm not argue with you Director Comey but it is -- we're going to discuss a lot of important things today. Whether Russia attempted to influence our democratic process is incredibly important. Whether they sought to influence it as a separate analysis, incredibly important.

The motive behind that interference and influence, incredibly important. Our U.S. response, incredibly important. Some of that may rise to the level of the crime, some of it does not rise to level of a crime. One thing you and I agree on is the felonious dissemination of class -- classified material most definitely is a crime.

So I would ask you and I understand some of the procedures that you are up against. I would -- I would humbly ask you to -- to seek authority from whomever you need to seek authority from. Because I'm going to finish the same way I started. This is an agreement between the American people and its government. We are going to -- we the American people give certain powers to government to keep us safe.

And when those powers are misused and the motive is not criminal investigations or national security, then I'll bet you my fellow citizens are rethinking their side of the equation. Because that U.S. citizen could be them next time. It could be you. It could be me. It could be anyone until we start seriously investigating and prosecuting what Congress thought was serious enough to attach a 10- year felony to.

With that, I would yield back, Mr. Chairman.

COMEY:
Can I -- can I just add a response to what you said? I agree with you, Mr. Gowdy. Two things folks at home should know; first, an unauthorized disclosure of FISA is an extraordinarily unusual event so be assured we're going to take it very seriously because our trust, the American people, and the federal judges that oversee our work, is vital.

And second, that this conversation has nothing to do with 702. Folks often mix them together. 702 is about targeting non-U.S. persons overseas. Pursuant to the FISA statute, the FBI can apply to collect electronic surveillance in the United States but it's a different thing from 702. The conversation you and I are just having is about this which is vital and important, but I just didn't want to leave folks confused.

GOWDY:
Director Comey, you are 100 percent correct and I am 100 percent correct in saying that that is a distinction that doesn't make a difference to most of the people watching television. You are exactly correct. What we are reauthorizing this fall has nothing to do with what we are discussing other than it is another government program where the people consent to allow government to pursue certain things with the explicit promise it will be protected.

So you're right, they're different but in the eyes of people watching, it is the U.S. government officials' leaking the name of a U.S. citizen and if it can happen here, it may happen there. Trust me, you and I both want to see it reauthorized. It is in jeopardy if we don't get this resolved.

NUNES:
Our time is expired, I'll yield 15 minutes to Mr. Schiff.

SCHIFF:
Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I just want to follow up with a few questions about Roger Stone that I had started with earlier before I passed it to my colleagues. Director Comey, are you aware that Roger Stone played a role in the Trump campaign?

COMEY:
I'm not going to talk about any particular person here today, Mr. Schiff.

SCHIFF:
I'm going to continue to ask these questions because among other things, I want to make sure you are aware of these facts whether you're able to comment on them political dirty tricks?

COMEY:
I'll give you the same answer, sir.

SCHIFF:
I mentioned before that Mr. Stone was in direct communication with a creature of Russian GRU, Guccifer 2.0 and that's something the intelligence assessment talked about, the role of Guccifer 2.0.

Mr. Stone on August 17, are you aware, received communication from Guccifer 2.0 that said, quote "I'm pleased to say that you are great. Please tell me if I can help you any how. It would be a great pleasure to me." Are you aware of that communication from essentially Russian GRU through Guccifer to Mr. Stone?

COMEY:
I have to give you the same answer.

SCHIFF:
Are you aware that Mr. Stone also stated publicly that he was in direct communication with Julian Assange and WikiLeaks?

COMEY:
Same answer.

SCHIFF:
Are you aware that Mr. Stone also claimed that he was in touch with an intermediary of Mr. Assange?

COMEY:
Same answer.

SCHIFF:
This is a question I think you can answer. Do you know whether the Russian intelligence service has dealt directly with WikiLeaks or whether they too used an intermediary?

COMEY:
We assessed they used some kind of cutout. They didn't deal directly with WikiLeaks. In contrast to D.C. Leaks and Guccifer 2.0.

SCHIFF:
In early October, are you aware that Mr. Stone tweeted I have total confidence that my hero, Julian Assange will educate the American people soon. Are you aware of that tweet?

COMEY:
I'm back to my original same answer.

SCHIFF:
And are you aware that it was only days later that WikiLeaks released the Podesta e-mails?

COMEY:
Same answer.

SCHIFF:

I'm going to yield now to Mr. Himes.

HIMES:
Thank you, Mr. Schiff.

I know that we're going through the 90 minute mark in this hearing so let me step back a second and just review the topics because there's a lot on the table and I think my friends on the Republican side will get no argument from this side on the importance of investigating, prosecuting leaks.

Leaks are a threat to our national security whether they're perpetrated by Edward Snowden, whether they're perpetrated by people outside the White House or perhaps as we have seen in the last 60 days, maybe from people inside the White House.

But Mr. Comey, if I can use your phrase, intense public interest. There is intense public interest in the fact that our new president will attack anyone and everyone. He will attack the cast of Hamilton, he will attack Chuck Schumer, he will attack our allies, Mexico, Australia, Germany, he will attack the intelligence community, which you lead. Associating you with McCarthyism and Nazism.

But there's one person in one country which is immune, which is inoculated from any form of presidential attack no matter what the behavior. No matter if there's a violation of the INF nuclear treaty, no matter if Vladimir Putin kills political opponents, the new president defends, obfuscates, does not attack. And the people around the president, Michael Flynn, Jeff Sessions, Carter Page, Paul Manafort, have an odd connection to Russia. A series of odd connections. We all campaigned.

I don't think any of our campaign people have connections with a foreign power, much less one that is an adversary of the United States. And further, apart from these weird links, without exception, the individuals I've quoted have dissembled or misled, maybe even lied about the nature of those -- those connections until the political pressure has gotten to a point where they have been fired or recused, in the case of the Attorney General.

So I want to look briefly at one of these individuals -- and Director Comey, I understand your constraints but -- but let me ask a couple of questions regardless. Paul Manafort, who is Roger Stone's business partner and former -- and Trump's former campaign manager, I want to ask you a few questions about him.

First, Director Comey, can you tell me what the Foreign Agents Registration Act is?

COMEY:
Sure. Not in an expert way, but it's a statute that requires people who are acting as agents of a non-U.S. government to register with the United States.

HIMES:
Right. So the National Security Division of the Department of Justice writes -- this is their manual. The purpose of FARA, as it is known, is to ensure that the U.S. government and the people of the United States are informed of the source of information and the identity of persons attempting to influence U.S. public opinion, policy, and laws. Unquote.

Would you agree that guarding against foreign espionage or foreign influence measures falls under this heading?

COMEY:

Yes.

HIMES:
In general, is willful violation or failure to register pursuant to this law in some circumstances a crime?

COMEY:
I believe it is. I'm not an expert on FARA, but I believe it is.

HIMES:
And it could lead, certainly, to counterintelligence concerns, right?

COMEY:
Yes.

HIMES:
Now, Paul Manafort, as reported in the New York Times and other outlets and his deputy, Rick Gates ran a campaign in Washington to lobby government officials and push positive press coverage of pro Russian-Ukrainian officials. Paul Manafort began officially working for former Ukrainian President Yanukovych at least as far back as 2007, according to the Washington Post.

The lobbying was only discovered by Ukraine's new National Anti- Corruption Bureau, which found secret ledgers in Kiev, indicating almost $13 million in undisclosed cash payments from Ukrainian government coffers (ph), to Paul Manafort for lobbying done between 2007 and 2012, for Mr. Yanukovych -- Yanukovych.

Director Comey, did Paul Manafort ever register as a foreign agent under FARA?

COMEY:
That's not something I can comment on.

HIMES:
Whether he registered or not is not something that you can comment on?

COMEY:
No.

HIMES:
OK. Paul Manafort was, however, Donald Trump's campaign manager in July of 2016, correct?

COMEY:
Mr. Himes, I really don't wanna get into answering questions about any individual U.S. person.

HIMES:
OK...

COMEY:
Look, I'm -- it's obvious from the public record. But I don't wanna start down the road of answering questions about somebody.

HIMES:
OK. Well, I think the facts would show that he never did register. But as the ranking member pointed out, it perhaps should come as no surprise that the Republican platform, which was drafted at the Republican Convention in July of 2016, underwent a pretty significant change with respect to the American response to Russia's illegal invasion of Ukraine and their aggression in that country.

It appears, from our standpoint, that we had -- we had perhaps somebody who should've registered under FARA pulling the strings, there. There's more though and I don't know how much you'll be able to comment on this. But I wanna just explore for a second, the nature of the Russian government, because oftentimes the question becomes, was there contact with Russian officials.

And I want to read you a brief quote from a book on Putin's government. This is by Professor Karen Dawisha who wrote, "Instead of seeing Russian politics as an inchoate democratic system being pulled down by history, accidental autocrats, popular inertia, bureaucratic incompetence, or poor Western advice, I conclude that from the beginning Putin and his circle sought to create an authoritarian regime ruled by a close-knit cabal -- who used democracy for decoration rather than direction."

Mr. Comey, is it fair to say that the line that exists in the United States between government officers and government officials, is blurred in Russia? That there may be oligarchs or other individuals who on the surface appear to be private citizens, but who have connections to this close-knit cabal who might be agents of influence or might be doing the Kremlin's bidding in contact with others?

COMEY:
That's fair to say and one of our counterintelligence missions is to try to understand who are those people and are they acting on behalf of the Russian government, those Russian citizens.

HIMES:
Is it generally true that there is a category of Russian oligarchs that are likely part of this close-knit cabal?

COMEY:
In a general sense.

HIMES:
And if they go way back with Vladimir Putin, do the chances increase that they might be connected with the KGB, as is asserted by Professor Dawisha?

COMEY:
The longevity of the association can be a consideration.

HIMES:
And the KGB was the Russian intelligence service under the Soviet Union, right?

COMEY:
Correct, former...

HIMES:
And the Ukraine was part of the Soviet Union?

COMEY:
Correct.

HIMES:
Right. I'll just observe, Renault Akhmetov, a steel and iron (ph) or a magnate or oligarch, is the richest man in Ukraine and a strong Putin ally. He was the one who reportedly recommended Paul Manafort to Yanukovych.

Mr. Comey, last set of questions from me, I have a report that appeared in CNN yesterday. The headline is, "Former Trump Campaign Chief Paul Manafort Wanted for Questioning in Ukraine Corruption Case." And I -- I raise this with you because the story is told of Paul Manafort acting on behalf of Ukraine's former justice miniature -- minister Oleksandr Lavrynovych, which who was the justice minister under the previous pro-Russian regime who -- and I'll just read a segment from the story here.

Who was involved in jailing the former Prime Minister Tymoshenko who was the main political rival of the Kremlin backed President Viktor Yanukovych who Manafort advised until he was deposed in 2014. Tymoshenko was released from jail at the same time that Yanukovych was ousted. Many saw her sentencing as politically motivated by the pro- Russian government.

In response to the deterioration international climate, Ukrainian prosecutors say Manafort drafted a public relations strategy that included hiring Skadden Arps, an American law firm, to review the Tymoshenko case. And show the conviction had a sound legal basis. The story goes on to talk about the transfer of over $1 million, potentially, illegally from Ukrainian coffers (ph) to Skadden Arps.

And the reason I bring all this up with you is because the story also says and it appears to have been confirmed by the Department of Justice that the current Ukraine regime, hardly a friend of the Russians. And very much targeted by the Russians has made seven requests to the United States government's -- the United States government for assistance under the MLA treaty in securing the assistance of Paul Manafort as part of this on anti-corruption case. And in fact, the story says that you were presented personally with a letter asking for that assistance.

So my question Director Comey is, is that all true? Have you been asked to provide assistance to the current Ukrainian government with respect to Paul Manafort? And how do you intend to respond to that request?

COMEY:
It's not something I can comment on. I can say generally, we have a very strong relationship and cooperation in the criminal and national security areas with our Ukrainian partners, but I can't talk about the particular matter.

HIMES:
The story says that the DOJ confirmed that there have been requests for assistance on this matter. You can't go as far as -- as confirming that in fact there have been these requests made?

COMEY:
If they've done that, I would need them to do it again. I -- I can't comment on it.

HIMES:
OK. Well, I appreciate that and with that I will yield back the remainder of my time to the ranking member.

SCHIFF:
And I yield to Terri Sewell.

SEWELL:
Thank you Mr. Ranking Member.

My questions this morning really revolve around the resignation of the former national security adviser Michael Flynn.

Director Comey, much as been made about Russia's historical interference with political elections around the world meant to cause discord and -- and -- and disunity especially in Western alliance's. Does the FBI generally assume that Russian ambassadors to the United States like Ambassador Kislyak, are at least overtly, collecting intelligence on influential Americans, especially political leaders.

COMEY:
Ms. Sewell, that's not something I can answer in an open setting.

SEWELL:
Am I right that in the -- that in the Russian playbook -- that it's in the Russian playbook to use diplomats and business people and Russian intelligence officers, whether declared or not to, collect intelligence on influential Americans for the purpose of affecting U.S. policy?

COMEY:
I can answer as a general matter. Nation states that are adversaries of United States use traditional intelligence officers, sometimes used intelligence officers operating under diplomatic cover, use people we call co-opties (ph), maybe a private citizens, students, academics, business people, all manner of human beings can be used in a -- in an intelligence collection operation. But I'm not gonna talk about the particular.

SEWELL:
Would someone like Ambassador Kislyak Play that type of role for Russia?

COMEY:
I can't say here.

SEWELL:
The declassified January intelligence community assessment report that your agency helped to draft, the report that's entitled assessing Russian activities and intentions in the recent U.S. elections specifically states that, quote, "Since the Cold War, Russian intelligence efforts related to the United States elections have primarily focused on foreign intelligence collections that could help Russian leaders understand a new U.S. administration's plans and priorities," end quote.

So knowing what we know about Russia's efforts and the role of the Russian ambassador, Director Comey, would you be concerned if any one of your agents had a private meeting with the Russian ambassador?

COMEY:
If an FBI agent had a private meeting with a Russian government employee of any kind, it would be concerning and I assume by private, one that's not disclosed or part of their operational activity, yes.

SEWELL:
That's right. And would you expect that agent to report that meeting?

COMEY:
Yes.

SEWELL:
Admiral Rogers, similar question. If -- would you be concerned if one of your intelligence officers had a private meeting with the Russian ambassador? And would you expect that intelligence officer to report that meeting?

ROGERS:
Disclosures of interactions with foreign governments is a requirement for all our employees to include myself, for example.

SEWELL:
I ask these questions because on at least four occasions that I can count, Mr. Flynn, a three-star general and a former intelligence officer, someone with influence over the U.S. policy and someone with knowledge of state secrets and the incoming national security advisor, communicated with and met with the Russian ambassador and failed to disclose it.

So I ask you directors, if you wouldn't stand for your own staff to do this, why should we, the American people accept Michael Flynn doing it?

COMEY:
Ms. Sewell, I'll let Mike Rogers take it next but I -- I don't -- I can't speak to what the disclosure obligations are for other people in the government so it's hard for me to answer that. I can answer and I answered, I hope accurately with respect to one of the FBI special agents.

ROGERS:
And I likewise would answer the same way in terms of the NSA.

SEWELL:
I yield back...

NUNES:
... gentleman's time -- gentleman's time has expired. I'll yield myself 15 minutes.

Director Comey, you announced this morning that there'll be an investigation into Trump associates possible and President Trump and anyone around the campaign and any association with the Russian government.

If this committee or anyone else for that matter, someone from the public, comes with information to you about the Hillary Clinton campaign or their associates or someone from the Clinton Foundation, will you add that to your investigation? They have ties to Russian intelligence services, Russian agents, would that be something of interest to you?

COMEY:
People bring us information about what they think is improper unlawful activity of any kind, we will evaluate it. Not just in -- not just in this context. Folks send us stuff all the time. They should keep going that.

NUNES:
Do you think it's possible that the Russians would not be trying to infiltrate Hillary Clinton's campaign, get information on Hillary Clinton and try to get to people that are around that campaign or the Clinton Foundation?

COMEY:
I'm not prepared to comment about the particular campaigns but the Russians in general are always trying to understand who the future leaders might be and what levers of influence there might be on them.

NUNES:
I just hope that if -- if information does surface about the other campaigns, not even just Hillary Clinton's but any other campaigns, that you would take that serious also if the Russians were trying to infiltrate those campaigns around them.

COMEY:
Of course we would.

NUNES:
OK. I yield to Mr. Conaway.

CONAWAY:
Thanks, Chairman. Gentlemen, thanks for being here.

Admiral Rogers, you'd mentioned analytic standards earlier in the conversation. Are those standards the same for all intelligence analysts across the various agencies?

ROGERS:

There's a broad set of intelligence community promulgated standards for all of us and then there are specific issues associated, for example, with a particular authority that you're using to collect the information in the first place.

CONAWAY:
So, gentleman, same thing your -- your agency -- your analysts would have I think similar type standards?

COMEY:
Correct. That's one of the really good things that's happened since 9/11, especially since 2004 is the adoption of a common set of tradecraft provisions.

CONAWAY:
So, on a CPA and we have generally astounded -- generally accepted accounting standards which are promulgated across a variety of things. Are those same standards publicly promulgated as -- but generally disseminated through all of your analysts, I would assume would have some sort of a test that they know those standards?

ROGERS:
I think the specifics of the IC promulgated standards are classified but I could take that one for the record.

CONAWAY:
When the IC attributes a hacking to a particular actor, you do that through generally forensic evidence. But when it comes to try to determine intent foreign leaders, can you walk us through how the NSA does that or the FBI does that?

ROGERS:
We assess the range of information that we've collect -- collected in an attempt to generate understanding as to not only what has occurred, but part of the intelligence professional -- profession is also trying to understand why, what was the intent. We'll use the range of information we have available to us, while we're primarily a single source organization.

It's one reason why organizations like CIA, the Defense Intelligence Agency, which take multiple sources try to put together a complete picture. So we're just one component of a broader effort.

CONAWAY:
Director Comey, anything different than that?

COMEY:
No, it's about putting together a puzzle. Sometimes from forensics alone, you can get a pretty good indication as to what they must be intending to accomplish, other times requires human sources and additional a signals intelligence to give you that sense.

CONAWAY:
So both you agree, though, it's rarely a precise art -- or a precise science of determining intent of any foreign leader.

ROGERS:
That's correct.

COMEY:
All of intelligence work requires judgment. That's at the at the center of it.

ROGERS:
But I will say in some cases, it's a much clearer case than in others. There are some...

(CROSSTALK)

CONAWAY:
It depends on the sources you have inside a particular foreign leader's shop.

ROGERS:
I'm not going to get into specifics.

CONAWAY:
Just in general. If you have somebody whose next door neighbor -- never mind. Pivoting to the January 7 -- January 6 intelligence community assessment, both your agencies agree with the assessment that the Russian's goal was to undermine the public faith in U.S. democratic process. Is that still your assessments?

COMEY:
Yes.

ROGERS:
Yes.

CONAWAY:
Same assessment said that the Russian's goal was to -- wanted to denigrate Secretary Clinton and harm her electability and potential presidency and that Putin wanted to discredit Secretary Clinton because he publicly blamed her since 2011 for insighting mass protests against his regime in late 2011, early 2012. You both still agree with that assessment?

COMEY:
Yes.

ROGERS:
Yes.

CONAWAY:

And then finally, Admiral Rogers, that assessment went on to say that president Putin and the Russian government aspired to help president -- I guess he would have been candidate Trump at the time -- but president-elect Trump's election chances when possible by discrediting Secretary Clinton. You had a lower...

ROGERS:
Confidence level.

CONAWAY:
... confidence level. Is that still the case?

ROGERS:
Yes, sir.

CONAWAY:
Can you tell the group why you were...

ROGERS:
I'm not going to get into specifics in an unclassified forum but for me, it boiled down to the level and nature of the sourcing on that one particular judgment was slightly different to me than the others.

COMEY:
To be clear, Mr. Conaway, we all agreed with that judgment.

ROGERS:
We all agreed with the judgment.

CONAWAY:
Right, right, right. But you really agreed and he almost really agreed.

COMEY:
Not term out folks use, but I...

(CROSSTALK)

CONAWAY:
Director Comey, in terms of laying out those three assessment and whether or not the IC was consistent in its view of those three assessments across the entire campaign. And we walked through kind of the FBI's walk down that path.

Did -- as of early December of '16, did the FBI assess that the active measures were to undermine -- by the Russians were to undermine the faith in U.S. Democratic process as you come to that conclusion by early December?

COMEY:
I think that's right, December of last year.

CONAWAY:
Sixteen, yes sir.

COMEY:
I think we're at that point, yes.

CONAWAY:
And then active measures conducted against Secretary Clinton, to denigrate her, hurt her campaign and also undermined her presidency?

COMEY:
Correct.

CONAWAY:
All right. And then, the conclusion that active measures were taken specifically to help President Trump's campaign, you had that -- by early December, you already had that conclusion?

COMEY:
Correct, that they wanted to hurt our democracy, hurt her, help him. I think all three we were confident in, at least as early as December.

CONAWAY:
OK. The -- the paragraph that gives me a little concern there, in terms of just the timing of when all of that occurred because I'm not sure if we went back and got that exact same January assessment six months earlier, it would've looked the same. Because, you say, when we further assessed Putin and the Russian government developed a clear preference for President-elect Trump.

Any idea when that clear preference in the analysis, when did that get into the lexicon of whether you talk back and forth among yourselves on a -- on a classified basis?

COMEY:
I don't know for sure, but I think that was a fairly easy judgment for the community. He -- Putin hated Secretary Clinton so much, that the flipside of that coin was he had a clear preference for the person running against the person he hated so much.

CONAWAY:
Yeah and that and that my work on Saturday afternoon when the -- my wife's Red Raiders are playing the Texas Longhorns. She really likes the Red Raiders. But all the rest of the time, I mean the logic is that because he really didn't like president -- the Candidate Clinton, that he automatically liked Trump. That assessment's based on what?

COMEY:
Well, it's based on more than that. But part of it is and we're not getting into the details of it here, but part of it is the logic. Whoever the Red Raiders are playing, you want the Red Raiders to win, by definition, you want their opponent to lose.

CONAWAY:
I know, but this says that -- that you wanted both of them -- you wanted her to lose and wanted him to win. Is that what you were saying?

COMEY:
Right, they're inseparable -- right, it's a two -- it's a two person...

CONAWAY:
Right, right.

COMEY:
... event.

CONAWAY:
I got you. So I'm just wondering when you decided you wanted him to win?

COMEY:
Well, logically when he wanted her to lose, wanted...

CONAWAY:
No, no, no, I'm not talking about him, Putin, I got that. I got that. But the question is, we're on this clear -- well let me finish up then.

So we go through that sentence about the clear preference for Donald Trump. And we don't know exactly when you guys decided that was the case. Then it says, when it appeared to Moscow that Secretary Clinton was likely to win the election, the Russian influence campaign then focused on undermining her expected presidency.

So -- and then election then says, the government -- the Russian government aspired to help President-elect Trump election chances. So when did they not think she was going to win?

COMEY:
Well, the assessment of the Intelligence Committee was, as the summer went on and the polls appeared to show that Secretary Clinton was gonna win, the Russians sort of gave up and simply focused on trying to undermine her, it's your Red Raiders, you know they're not going to win.

COMEY:

So you kind of hope key people on the other team get hurt so they're not such a tough opponent down the road. And so there was at some point...

(CROSSTALK)

CONAWAY:
Sir, do you believe that the FBI was consistent through early December and on that that was the case. That they -- they assessed that they really wanted Trump to win it and were working to help him win and her lose.

COMEY:
Yes, our analysts had a view that I don't believe changed, from late fall through to the report on January 6 that it had those three elements.

CONAWAY:
All right. So then on December the 9th, well in advance of the January 6th deal, the -- the Washington Post, put out an article. Their least sentence was that this -- and again, CIA, they're not here today but we'll hopefully have them next week, concluded in a secret assessment that Russia intervened in the '16 election to help Donald Trump win the presidency rather than to undermine the confidence in the electoral system. Rather than just undermine it, they don't mention Mrs. Clinton at all.

And then it says to help Trump elected, the U.S. senior briefed on the intelligence position -- that the U.S. -- that U.S. official briefed by -- briefed on intelligence presentation to U.S. Senators said that's the consensus view. How much did it -- this is written by name Adam Intas Elaine (ph) something and Greg Miller. Do they have drafted you last -- the January 6th document for the Intel Committee.

COMEY:
I'm sorry.

CONAWAY:
Did those writers from the Washington Post help you write the January 6 assessment?

COMEY:
No, they did not.

CONAWAY:
I wonder how they got almost the exact language on December the 9th.

COMEY:
It hadn't been written yet. I don't know. This is the peril of trying to comment on newspaper articles that report to report classified information. I can't say much about them, they're often wrong.

CONAWAY:
You mentioned earlier in one of our hearings that when anybody uses -- the I can't talk because I'm bound by position anonymity or whatever, that really is code for breaking the law generally, right?

When somebody says I'm talking to a reporter, I'm declassifying secret information, you can't tell -- the reporter can't tell who it is because, as Mr. Gowdy was saying earlier, speaking on condition of anonymity. That really should be interpreted because I'm breaking the law and I don't want to be ousted. It that a fair statement?

COMEY:
Sometimes. I think there are other motives behind people requesting anonymity but that can be one of them.

CONAWAY:
So it's you're statement to us then that the FBI was consistent in it's assessment that they integrate the U.S. electoral process, hurt Hillary and her potential and current across all of that across all of that, that they intended to help Trump, that's your testimony this morning?

COMEY:
Correct.

CONAWAY:
Thank you. I yield back.

NUNES:
Mr. King?

KING:
Thank you Mr. Chairman.

If you could yield me a few minutes into the next round -- I'll just start with this -- make the comment.

First of all, let me thank Director Comey and Admiral Rogers for being here today. And for what I believe it's been the cooperative you've always given this committee. So thank you very much for that, for your service.

Director Comey, I think we're in a predicament here today. I understand your situation where you can't comment on the investigation. And yet we've can have various scenarios laid out which can go on for months and months and months without anyone be able to disprove them until the investigation is completed.

I just like to use the example, for instance we could've said that in 2012 President Obama was overheard on microphone telling Medvedev that I'm reelected, tell Vladimir we can work out better arrangements. We know that he ridiculed candidate Romney in the 2012 election when Romney said that he thought Russia still a threat.

And then in 2013 we saw that basically President Obama invited the Russians into Syria when they've been pretty much removed from the Middle East 40 years before. And also as far as aid to Ukraine, far as I recall, the Obama administration always refuse to give the lethal aid to Ukraine and it can be argued that the Republican platform in 2016 was actually stronger than the Democratic platform on that.

So again if we -- if there was investigation going on with the Obama administration, we can lay out all these scenarios and say well that proves something or it might prove something. Until the investigation was completed, that type of almost possibly slanderous comments could be made.

So I would just, again, if -- I'm not asking you to hurry the investigation along, you have to do what you have to do. But I guess I could ask you just in the remaining moments I have in this round, I know that -- I guess it was just two weeks ago that Director Clapper said that as far as he knows, all the evidence he's seen, there's no evidence of any collusion at all between the Trump campaign and the Russians.

Now obviously a detailed, exhaustive report was put out talking about Russian influence in the campaign along with the intelligence apparatus had input into that. Do either you or Admiral Rogers have any reason to disagree with the conclusion of General Clapper that there's no evidence of collusion between the Russians and the Trump campaign.

COMEY:
Mr. King, it's not something I can comment on.

ROGERS:
Likewise, I'm not going to comment on an ongoing investigation's conclusions.

KING:
But again, you're not going to disagree with General Clapper, you're just not going to comment. And the reason I'm pointing that out is, that's sort of the situation, you know, the other way around that you can't comment on something, often there's inference out there that because a person's name is brought up, because he may have worked with somebody at a certain time, that there's a guilt implied in that so that's one problem.

I'm not in any way being critical of either of you, I'm just saying this is a situation I think can be damaging to the country and does advance the Russian interest of trying to destabilize democracy and cause a lack of confidence in our system.

And with that, I yield back, Mr. Chairman.

NUNES:
Gentleman yields back.

I recognize Mr. Schiff for 15 minutes.

SCHIFF:
Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I just have a couple of follow-up questions before I pass to Representative Sewell. It wasn't simply that the Russians had a negative preference against Secretary Clinton, they also had a positive preference for Donald Trump, isn't that correct?

COMEY:
Correct.

SCHIFF:
And I won't ask you to say whether this is an accurate characterization of Mr. Trump, I won't put you in that spot, but would it be logical for the Kremlin to prefer a candidate that disparaged NATO to be president of the United States?

COMEY:
You're not going to put me in that spot, you said?

SCHIFF:
Yes.

(LAUGHTER)

COMEY:
I'm happy with that. I'm happy with that.

SCHIFF:
I'm not going to put you in the spot of answering whether this is an accurate characterization of Mr. Trump's views, but it would be logical for the Kremlin to want someone who had a dim view of NATO. Is that right?

COMEY:
All kidding aside, I don't think that's something I should be answering. That's beyond my responsibilities.

SCHIFF:
Well, what is the Russian view of NATO. Do they like NATO? Do they want to see NATO strong?

COMEY:
Again, I'm sure you have already spoken to people who are greater experts than I but yes, they don't like NATO. They think NATO encircles them and threatens them.

SCHIFF:
And would they have a preference for a candidate that expressed an openness to repealing the sanctions over Ukraine?

COMEY:
Again, I don't want to get into business of commenting on that. I know...

SCHIFF:
Then let me ask you this way, Director. Would they like to see the sanctions on Ukraine go away?

COMEY:
Yes.

SCHIFF:
Would they have a preference for a candidate who expressed open admiration for Putin?

COMEY:
Can I help you reformulate the question? Mr. Putin would like people who like him.

SCHIFF:
Would they have a preference for a candidate who encouraged Brexit and other departures from Europe? Would they like to see more Brexits?

COMEY:
Yes.

SCHIFF:
And have the Russians in Europe demonstrated a preference for business people as political leaders with the hope that they can entangle them in financial interests or that they may allow their financial interests to take precedence over the interests of the countries in Europe they represent?

COMEY:
In our joint report, we recount that the Russians -- that President Putin has expressed a preference for business leaders in leading other governments and mentions Gerhard Schroder and -- I'm going to forget one. Berlusconi because he believes they're people that are more open to negotiation, easier to deal with.

SCHIFF:
At this point, let me yield to Representative Sewell.

SEWELL:
I'd like to continue my questioning -- the line of questioning on Michael Flynn.

I'm sure you can understand my concern that Mr. Flynn not only failed to disclose the contacts with the Russian ambassador, but he said he did not remember whether he discussed sanctions against Russia with that ambassador and I find that really hard to believe. And wouldn't you think that at the height of our concern about Russian hacking, that Mr. Flynn would have remembered meeting with the Russian ambassador and would have been --and would have told him to stop meddling in our affairs, but that didn't happen, did it?

COMEY:
Mrs. Sewell, that's not something I can answer.

SEWELL:
Not only did Mr. Flynn not remember talking to the Russian ambassador and not only did he not remember what they talked about, he also appeared to have lied to Vice President-elect Mike Pence all about it.

Now, Mr. Comey, do you think that Mr. Flynn's failure to disclose the communication and contact he had with the Russian ambassador and their topic of conversation along with a blatant lie to Vice President Pence meet the standard for an investigation by the FBI?

COMEY:

I have to give you the same answer, I'm not going to comment.

SEWELL:
Now, I know, Director Comey, that you probably can't comment on this as well but I think it's really important that we review a short timeline and -- that's based on press reportings because we need to get this for the public record, I think.

So on December 25, 2016, Mr. Flynn reportedly exchanged text messages with the Russian ambassador. On December 28, 2016, Mr. Flynn reportedly spoke on the phone with the Russian ambassador. By then, it was pretty clear that the Obama administration was going to take actions against Russia. On December 29, 2016, Mr. Flynn reportedly spoke on the phone with the Russian ambassador again.

That day, the Obama administration expelled 35 Russian operatives from the United States and announced new sanctions. We also know from press reportings that sometime in December, Mr. Flynn met in person with the Russian ambassador at Trump Tower and that Mr. Trump's son- in-law, Jared Kushner was also there. The purpose of the meeting was to quote "Establish a line of communication" end quote, with the Kremlin.

I should add that the White House and Mr. Flynn didn't disclose this December face-to-face meeting until this month. On January 20 -- January 12, sorry -- 2017, press reported that Mr. Flynn contacted the Russian ambassador again.

And on January 15, 2015 vice President-elect, Mike Pence stated on several Sunday morning shows regarding Mr. Flynn's conversation with ambassador quote, "What I can confirm, having spoken to him about it, is that those conversations that happened to occur around the time that the United States took action to expel diplomats had nothing whatsoever to do with those sanctions," end quote.

On January 26, the -- the acting Attorney General, Sally Yates reportedly told president Trump's White House counsel, who immediately told President Trump that Mr. Flynn was vulnerable to Russian blackmail because of discrepancies between Vice President-elect Pence's public statement and Mr. Flynn's actual discussions.

On February 10, President Trump denied knowledge of this, telling reporters on Air Force One, quote, "I don't know about that," end quote, in response to questions about Mr. Flynn's conduct. The White House also publicly denied that Mr. Flynn and the Russian ambassador discussed sanctions. And of course on February 13, 2017, Mr. Flynn resigned as national security advisor.

Now, Director Comey, all of these accounts are open source press reportings. Given Russian's long-standing desire to cultivate relations with influential U.S. persons, isn't the American public right to be concerned about Mr. -- Mr. Flynn's conduct, his failure to disclose that contact with the Russian ambassador, his attempts to cover it up and what looks like the White House's attempts to sweep this under the rug.

Don't we, as the American people, deserve the right to know and shouldn't our FBI investigate such claims?

COMEY:
I can't comment. I -- I understand people's curiosity about our work and intense interest in it, and as Mr. King said, oftentimes, speculation about it. But we can't do it well or fairly to the people we investigate if we talk about it. So I can't comment.

SEWELL:
I'd like to turn to another topic about Mr. Flynn, his failure to disclose until pressured last week, by my colleagues on the House Oversight and Government Relations Committee, Government Reforms Committee, payments he received from Russia for his 2015 trip to the 10th anniversary Gala of RT, the Russian owned propaganda media outlet.

According to the January 2017 declassified IC assessment report, RT's criticism of the United States was quote, "The last facet of its broader and long-standing anti-U.S. messaging likely aimed at undermining viewer's trust in the U.S. Democratic procedures," end quote. This January assessment points out that this was a strategy that Russia employed, going back to before, the 2012 elections, according to the IC assessment.

So Admiral Rogers, am I right that the RT is essentially owned by the Russian government? And how long has the intelligence community been looking at RT as an arm of the Russian government?

ROGERS:
So we're certainly aware and have been for some period of time of the direct connections between Russian government and RT individuals, we're aware of monetary flow and other things. We have been...

(CROSSTALK)

SEWELL:
And how long have you known about that, a few months, a few years, I mean how long has the United States...

(CROSSTALK)

ROGERS:
Some number of years, I apologize ma'am, I just don't know off the top of my head.

SEWELL:
Aren't I right to assume then, that the former Director of DIA, the Defense Intelligence Agency Mr. Flynn, would have been aware that RT's role as an anti-U.S. Russian propaganda outlet when he agreed to speak at their anniversary Gala in 2015. Isn't it reasonable to assume that he would know?

ROGERS:
I'm not in a position to comment on the knowledge of something else from another person, ma'am.

SEWELL:
Director Comey, would be unusual for a foreign government official to be -- to get paid by a foreign adversary to attend such an event? And would it be unusual and raise some questions at the FBI, if that person failed to disclose the payments received for that trip?

COMEY:
I don't know in general and as to the specific, I'm -- I'm just not gonna comment.

SEWELL:
Yes, sir. I understand that you can't comment. But I'd like to read an exchange between Mr. Flynn and a Yahoo news correspondent from July 2016 regarding his trip to Russia, during the RT event. The correspondent asked, "Were you paid for that event?" Then, there was back and forth for a bit. And then Mr. Flynn said, quote, "Yeah. I didn't take any money from Russia if that's what you're asking me," end quote.

So Director Comey, isn't it true that the House Oversight Committee last week, received information and released publicly that Mr. Flynn accepted nearly $35,000 in speaking fees and traveling fees from RT, this government -- Russian government owned media outlet.

COMEY:
I believe I've seen news accounts to that effect.

SEWELL:
Moreover, isn't it also true that according to the emoluments clause of the United States Constitution, a person holding any office of profit or trust cannot accept gifts or payments from a foreign -- from a foreign country.

And doesn't the DOD, the Department of Defense prohibit retired military officers from taking any consulting fees, gifts, traveling expenses, honorariums, a salary from a foreign government, including commercial enterprises owned by or controlled by a foreign government like RT?

COMEY:
That's not something I can comment on.

SEWELL:
Can you -- can you speak to whether or not the emoluments clause would apply to someone like Mr. Flynn, a retired three-star general?

COMEY:
I can't.

SEWELL:
So isn't is -- I just find be really hard to believe that given the emoluments clause does apply to retired officers like Mr. Flynn. I can't believe that Mr. Flynn, a retired military officer would take money from the Russian government in violation of the United State Constitution. And I believe that such violations worthy of a criminal investigation by the FBI.

What level of proof do we need in order for us to have a criminal investigation by the FBI of Mr. Flynn?

COMEY:
I can't comment on that.

SEWELL:
Shouldn't the American people be concerned what -- I think that it's really hard for us to fathom that he wouldn't know that he should've disclosed that he received $30,000 as a part of -- of a speaking engagement to RT, the Russian U.S. anti-propaganda outlet.

COMEY:
I can't comment on that Ms. Sewell.

SEWELL:
My final line of questioning is in regard to Mr. Flynn working as an agent of a foreign power.

Now Director Comey, following on Mr. Himes's line of questioning, am I correct that the Foreign Agents Registration Act requires that individuals who lobby on behalf of a foreign government must register with the United States government?

COMEY:
I believe that's correct. I know keep saying I'm not an expert. The reason I'm saying that is, I don't know exactly how they define things like lobbying in the statute. But as a general matter, if you're going to represent a foreign government here in the United States, touching our government, you should be registered.

SEWELL:
And isn't it true that just last November 2016, Mr. Flynn was working as a foreign agent doing work that principally benefited the government of Turkey and yet reported until just last week?

COMEY:
I can't comment on that.

SEWELL:
Isn't it true that Mr. Flynn was reportedly paid over half $1 million for this work?

COMEY:
Same answer.

SEWELL:
And isn't it true that the Trump White House, on at least two occasions, was asked by Mr. Flynn's lawyers whether he should report that work, the work that he was doing on behalf of the Turkish government. And yet the administration didn't give him any advice to the contrary.

Do you know anything about that?

COMEY:
I have to give you the same answer.

SEWELL:
So Director Comey, I know you I cannot discuss whether any investigations are ongoing with U.S. persons, and I respect that. I think it's important though that the American people understand the scope and breath of what, in public open source press reportings of Mr. Flynn's actions that led to his resignation.

And while we can't talk about whether there are an investigation, I believe that we here at HPSCI, at the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence must put those facts into the public domain. And they are one, that Mr. Flynn lied about his communication with the -- with the Russian ambassador.

Secondly, That Mr. Flynn lied about taking money from the Russian government and thirdly, that Mr. Flynn at a minimum did not disclose work as an agent of a foreign -- of a foreign power and that the White House did not help in this concern.

So gentlemen, it's clear to me that Mr. Flynn should be under criminal investigation. And I know you cannot comment but I believe it is my duty as a member of this committee to comment to the American people that this -- that his engagement of lying and failure to disclose really important information and contacts with a foreign ambassador do rise to the level of -- of disclosure and to me, criminal intent.

So I say this to say that the American people deserve to know the full extent of Mr. Flynn's involvement with the Russians and the extent to which it influenced the 2016 election. I believe our democracy requires it.

Thank you, I yield back to my ranking member.

NUNES:
Time's expired. Recognize myself for 15 minutes.

Mr. Comey and Mr. Rogers, you both said that the Russians had -- they favored Donald Trump, the selection. And you made that change, from the beginning of December it was not that they were trying to help Donald Trump, but that changed by early January. Mr. Conaway talked about that. Do -- do Russians...

COMEY:
I don't -- I don't agree with that. I want to make sure I didn't misspeak earlier. We didn't change our view from December to early January. We, the FBI -- and I don't know that anybody else did on the I.C. team.

ROGERS:
Me, from my perspective, we didn't have a fully formed view until the end of December...

NUNES:
At some point -- at some point, the assessment -- at some point, the assessment changed from -- from going from just trying to hurt Hillary Clinton to no, that they were actually trying to help Donald Trump get elected. That was early December as far as I know and then by January, you had all changed your mind on that.

COMEY:
Well that's not my recollection.

ROGERS:
That's not my recollection either, sir.

NUNES:
OK. So is it -- do Russians historically prefer Republicans to win over Democrats?

COMEY:
I don't know the answer to that. I don't know the answer to that.

NUNES:
Did the Russians prefer Mitt Romney over Barack Obama in 2012?

ROGERS:
I don't know that we ever did -- drew a formal analytic conclusion.

NUNES:
Did the Russians prefer John McCain in 2008 over Barack Obama?

ROGERS:
I never saw a U.S. intelligence community analytic position on that issue.

NUNES:
Don't you think it's ridiculous to say that -- for anyone to say that the Russians prefer Republicans over Democrats?

ROGERS:
I didn't think that that's what you just heard us say, I apologize, sir.

COMEY:
I hope you didn't hear us to say that. We don't know in those particular races and I'm not qualified enough...

NUNES:
I'm just asking a general question. Wouldn't it be a little preposterous to say that historically, going back to Ronald Reagan and all that we know about maybe who the Russians would prefer, that somehow the Russians prefer Republicans over Democrats?

COMEY:
There is -- I'm not going to discuss in an unclassed forum, in the classified segment of the reporting version that we did, there is some analysis that discusses this because remember this did come up in our assessment on the Russian piece. I'm not going to discuss this unclassified forum.

NUNES:
Mr. -- Mr. King.

KING:
Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I would just say on that because again, we're not going into the classified sections, that indicating that historically Russians have supported Republicans, and I know that language is there, to me puts somewhat of a cloud over the entire report. It seems to indicate the direction it was going in, but anyway, let me just say this for the record, and I know what your answer's going to be, but I have to get this statement on the record.

On March 15, former acting director of CIA, Mike Morell, who was the acting director under President Obama and put on the record I've had differences with Mike Morell in the past but he was asked about the question of the Trump campaign conspiring with the Russians and his answer was there's smoke but there is not fire at all. There's no little camp fire, there's no little candle, there's no spark.

COMEY:
I can't comment, Mr. King.

KING:
Admiral Rogers.

ROGERS:
I'm not going to comment on an ongoing investigation.

KING:
I understand that. That was my way of getting on the record, so I appreciate that. You were talking about the significance of leaks and how important it is we stop them. And to me -- and I've been here a while -- I've never seen such a sustained period of leaks.

Going back to December where, not the Intelligence Committee, but the Washington Post was told the conclusion of the report -- a similar one -- what it was going to be. We have situations in the New York Times where they talk of meetings, they talk about transcripts, they talk about conversations.

There was one in particular that spoke about Trump campaign individuals meeting with Russian intelligence agents and again, Director Comey, I don't know if you can comment on this, but the White House chief of staff, said against that day, on the next day that Mr. McCabe from your office you went to him at the White House and told him that that story was BS.

Is there any way you can comment on whether or not Mr. McCabe told that to Mr. Priebus?

COMEY:
I can't, Mr. King, but I can agree with your general premise. Leaks have always been a problem. I read over the weekend something from George Washington and Abraham Lincoln complaining about them. But I do think in the last six weeks, couple of months, there's been at least -- apparently a lot of conversation about classified matters that's ending up in the media.

Now, a lot of it is just dead wrong, which is one of the challenges because we don't correct it, but it does strike me there's been a lot of people talking or at least reporters saying people are talking to them in ways that have struck me as unusually active.

KING:
I fully understand the media's fascination with palace intrigue, with which faction of the White House is trying to outdo the other, that's all -- to me, that's all legitimate, that goes with the game. But if you're talking about leaking classified information, if you're talking about leaking investigations, I mean -- you've stated today that there is an FBI investigation going on.

So if the New York Times can be believed, I would think there would have to be somebody from the FBI who is telling them about these purported meetings, which Mr. McCabe said was BS, with the Russian intelligence agencies. Somebody who's familiar with that investigation spoke to the New York Times. And so I'll use that as an example and also, one where there's a small universe.

I think it was on January 6, when yourself, Admiral Rogers, Director Brennan, and General Clapper went to Trump tower to meet with President Trump. The media reports are that at the end of that meeting, Director Comey, you presented president-elect Trump with a copy of the now infamous or famous dossier. And I don't know how many people were in the room, but within hours, that was leaked to the media and that gave the media the excuse or the rationale to publish almost the entire dossier.

Do you -- does that violate any law? I mean you were at a classified briefing with the president-elect of the United States and it had to be a very, very small universe of people who knew that you handed them that dossier and it was leaked out within hours. Are you making any effort to find out who leaked it and do you believe that constitute a criminal violation?

COMEY:
I can't say, Mr. King except I can answer in general.

KING:
Yes.

COMEY:
Any unauthorized disclosure of classified conversations or documents is potentially a violation of law and a serious, serious problem. I've spent most of my career trying to figure out unauthorized disclosures and where they came from. It's very, very hard.

Often times, it doesn't come from the people who actually know the secrets. It comes from one hop out, people who heard about it or were told about it. And that's the reason so much information that reports to be accurate classified information is actually wrong in the media. Because the people who heard about it didn't hear about it right. But, it is an enormous problem whenever you find information that is actually classified in the media.

We don't talk about it because we don't wanna confirm it, but I do think it should be investigated aggressively and if possible, prosecuted so people take as a lesson, this is not OK. This behavior can be deterred and its deterred by locking some people up who have engaged in criminal activity.

KING:
Well, could you say it was -- obviously, Admiral Rogers was in the room, you were in the room, General Clapper was in the room and Director Brennan was in the room. Were there any other people in the room that could've leaked that out?

I mean this isn't a report that was circulated among 20 people. This is an unmasking of names where you may have 20 people in the NSA and a hundred people in the FBI, its not putting together a report or the intelligence agency. This is four people in a room with the president-elect of the United States. And I don't know who else was in that room and that was leaked out, it seemed within minutes or hours, of you handing him that dossier and it was so confidential, if you read the media reports that you actually handed it to him separately.

So believe me, I'm not saying it was you. I'm just saying, it's a small universe of people that would've known about that. And if it is a disclosure of classified information, if you're going to start with investigating the leaks, to me that would be one place where you could really start to narrow it down.

COMEY:
And again, Mr. King, I can't comment because I do not ever wanna confirm a classified conversation with a president or president-elect. I can tell you my general experience. It often turns out, there are more people who know about something you expected.

At first, both because there may be more people involved in the thing than you realized, not -- not this particular, but in general. And more people have been told about it or heard about it or staff have been briefed on it. And those echoes are in my experience, what most often ends up being shared with reporters.

KING:
Well, could you tell us who else was in the room that day?

COMEY:
I'm sorry?

KING:
Could you tell us who else was in the room with you that day?

COMEY:
No, because I'm not going to confirm that there was such a conversation because then, I might accidentally confirm something that was in the newspaper.

KING:
But could you tell us who was in the room, whether or not there was a conversation?

COMEY:
No, I'm not confirming there was a conversation. In a classified setting, I might be able to share more with you, but I'm not going to confirm any conversations with either President Obama or President Trump or when President Trump was the President-elect.

KING:
Well, not the conversation or even the fact that you gave it to him, but can you -- can you tell us who was in the room for that briefing that you gave?

COMEY:
That you're saying later ended up in the newspaper?

KING:
Yes.

COMEY:

So my talking about who was in the room would be a confirmation that was in the newspaper was classified information, I'm not going to do that. I'm not going to help people who did something that -- that is unauthorized.

KING:
Yeah, but we all know that the four of you went to Trump Tower for the briefing, I mean that's not classified, is it?

COMEY:
How do we all know that, though?

KING:
OK.

(LAUGHTER)

COMEY:
Yeah.

KING:
You know, you can -- you see the predicament we're in, here.

COMEY:
I get it. I get it. But we are duty-bound to protect classified information, both in the first when we get it, and then to make sure we don't accidentally jeopardize classified information by what we say about something that appears in the media.

KING:
Well, if they're listening, I would just advise that Director Clapper and Director Brennan, we'll be asking them the same questions last week -- next week and perhaps, they can give us some answers.

Mr. Chairman, I -- I yield back.

NUNES:
Gentleman yields back...

(CROSSTALK)

KING:
Thank you. Thank you for testifying.

NUNES:
Mr. Lobiondo is recognized.

LOBIONDO:
Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Director Comey, Admiral Rogers, thank you for your service and thank you for being here. Understanding that what both of you have been saying about the classified nature of the investigation, the classified nature of the topics we're talking about, can you give us any indication of when we, the committee, may in a classified setting know something from you. Would we have ongoing updates?

COMEY:
Mr. LoBiondo, I don't know how long the work will take. I can't commit to updates, as you know. I have briefed the committee as a whole on some aspects of our work and I've briefed in great detail the chair and the ranking.

I don't know -- I can't -- I can't predict or commit to updates. But as your work goes on, we're in constant touch with you and we'll do the best we can, but I can't commit to that as I sit here.

LOBIONDO:
So as the House Intelligence Committee and the Senate Intelligence Committee are conducting our bipartisan investigations and looking wherever it may lead with individuals or circumstances.

If you, through the FBI investigation, come across a circumstance with an individual or a situation would we be made aware of that under normal course of business?

COMEY:
Not necessarily, but it's possible.

LOBIONDO:
OK. So can you, either Director Comey or Admiral Rogers, tell us what we are doing or what we should be doing to protect against Russian interference in future elections or any meddling with our government or for that matter any state sponsor Iranians, North Koreans, Chinese, with any -- any meddling they may be doing?

ROGERS:
So first, I think a public discussion and acknowledgment of the activity is a good positive first step because it shines us a flashlight on this, if you will. It illuminates a significant issue that I think we all have to -- have to deal with. There's a variety ongoing efforts both within the government, as well, in the private sector.

In terms of how we harden our defenses, I think we also need to have a discussion about just what for example, does critical infrastructure meeting in the 21st-century. I don't think we traditionally would have thought of an election infrastructure as critical. We traditionally viewed critical infrastructure as something that generated an industrial output, aviation, electricity, finance, I don't think we've traditionally thought about it and informational kind of dynamic.

I think that's a challenge for us coming ahead and then continued partnership between the elements within the government, as well is in the private sector, that's the key to the future to me.

LOBIONDO:

So just for the record, I also had a whole list of specific questions about individuals and/or circumstances that don't want to be repetitive and have you say, I can't comment on them. But I would anticipate when we move to classified session that this committee will be able to explore some of those -- some of the situations in a little more depth.

I have a couple of other questions about the -- about the -- the Russian intervention. But I don't have enough time to get into it right now.

Mr. Chairman, if you could give me a couple minutes when we get to the next round.

NUNES:
(OFF-MIKE)

LOBIONDO:
OK. So very briefly the -- if you can describe the elements of the Russia's active measures in the campaign in the 2016 election. We've only got 35 seconds, but that's the first thing I want to get into about exactly what they were doing if you can tell us anything about that.

ROGERS:
So we saw cyber used, we saw the use of external media, we saw the use of disinformation, we saw the use of leaking of information, much of which was not altered.

I mean, we saw several, if you will, common traits that we have both seen over time as well as I would argue that the difference this time was that the -- the cyber dimension and the fact that the release of so much information that they had extracted via cyber is a primary tool to try to drive an outcome.

LOBIONDO:
So in this setting, can you talk to us at all about what tools they used?

ROGERS:
I'm not going to go into the specifics of how they executed the hacks. I apologize, no sir.

LOBIONDO:
We'll try to get into that in classified. I'll hold off for now, thank you.

NUNES:
Gentleman yields back.

Mr. Schiff's recognized for 15 minutes.

SCHIFF:
Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I just had a couple follow-up questions.

Director Comey, can you tell me what an SF86 is?

COMEY:
SF86?

SCHIFF:
Yes.

COMEY:
It's the standard background clearance form that all of us who are hired by the federal government and want to have access to classified information fill out.

SCHIFF:
Would someone who is an incoming national security advisor have to fill out an SF86?

COMEY:
Yes, I think so.

SCHIFF:
Would that SF86 require that the applicant disclose any payments received from a foreign power?

COMEY:
I think so. I mean, the form is the form. I think so and foreign travel as well.

SCHIFF:
I'd make a request through you to the Justice Department or whatever IC component would have custody of Mr. Flynn's SF86, I'd make a request that that be provided to the committee.

And I yield now to Mr. Carson.

CARSON:
Thank you, Ranking Member.

I'd like to focus my line of questioning on Russia's views toward Ukraine. In March 2014, Russia illegally annexed the Ukrainian territory of Crimea beginning a conflict which has effectively yet to be resolved.

Admiral Rogers, can you please briefly describe, as you understand it, sir, how Russia took Crimea?

ROGERS:
I would argue the insertion of military force. They occupied it and physically removed it from Ukrainian control.

CARSON:
Sir, we've heard terms like little green men and hybrid warfare. Can you please explain how these relate to Russia and Ukraine?

ROGERS:
So on the Ukraine side, what we saw was over time, rather than the kind of overt kind of activity we saw to such a degree on the Crimea side, what we saw was a much bigger effort on the influence and attempts to distance Russian actions from any potential blowback to the Russian state, if you will, and hence the use of the little green men surrogates in military -- unmarked military uniforms, the flow of information, the provision of resources to support forcible separation of the Ukraine.

CARSON:
Admiral, has Russia returned Crimea back to Ukraine, sir?

ROGERS:
No.

CARSON:
Do they have intentions to?

ROGERS:
They publicly indicated that they will not.

CARSON:
Admiral, why does Russia even care about Ukraine?

ROGERS:
I'm sure in their view they view this is a primary national interest for them. It's on the immediate periphery of the Russian state.

CARSON:
Am I right, sir, that they see it as a part of their broader objective to influence and impact Russia's -- Ukraine's desire for self-determination?

ROGERS:
Yes. I think that's part of it.

CARSON:
Sir, as Russia tried to claim stolen territory in Ukraine, the U.S. and the rest of the world saw the annexation for what it was; a crime. Shortly after Russia invaded, the United Nations essentially declared it a crime in a nonbinding resolution. In our own government, recognizing the seriousness of the event instituted new sanctions against Russia, is that right sir?

ROGERS:
Yes sir.

CARSON:
Now this was a time where much of the world was united but Russia invaded another country and illegally annexed it's territory as we all stood shoulder-to-shoulder with Ukraine. Now one person who didn't see it that way, however, was president Donald Trump.

On July 30, in an interview with ABC News, Mr. Trump said of Putin, and I quote, "He's not going into Ukraine, OK? Just so you understand, he's not going into Ukraine, all right?" end quote.

Now, Admiral, hadn't Putin already gone into Ukraine two years before and hadn't left?

ROGERS:
We're talking about the Crimea and influence on the Ukraine generally, yes, sir.

CARSON:
And he still hasn't left, correct, sir?

ROGERS:
Now we're starting to get into some very technical questions about are the Russians physically in the Ukraine, is it surrogates that the Crimea is a very example of to me. They outright invaded with armed military force and have annexed it.

CARSON:
But are they effectively still in Ukraine?

ROGERS:
They're certainly supporting the ongoing effort in the Ukraine to split that country.

CARSON:
We'll get back to Mr. Trump in a minute. First, tell me sir, what would it mean to Russia and to Putin to have sanctions lifted?

ROGERS:
Clearly, even easing of economic impact, greater flexibility, more resources.

CARSON:
Now according to NATO analysis, the Russian economy shrunk by as much as 3.5 percent in 2015 and had no growth in 2016 in big part because of western sanctions, especially those against the oil and gas industry.

Now, we're talking about a loss of over $135 billion just in the first year of sanctions. That's a huge sum of money and sanctions aren't meant to push their economy over a cliff, but to put long-term pressure on Putin to change his behavior. Putin, himself, said in 2016 that sanctions are severely harming Russia. So we know they've had success in putting pressure on the Kremlin.

Admiral, what would it mean geopolitically? Would it help legitimate Russia's illegal land grab?

ROGERS:
Sir, I'm not -- I'm not in a position to talk broadly about the geopolitical implications. I mean we have stated previously, from an intelligence perspective, we tried to -- we have tried to outline to policy makers the specifics of the Russian invasion on Crimea, the specifics of the continued Russian support to separatists in the Ukraine that Russians continue to -- to pressure and the keep the Ukraine weak.

CARSON:
Would it help cleave the United States from her allies?

ROGERS:
If we remove the sanctions?

CARSON:
There's a lot of steak -- there's a lot at stake here for Russia. This is big money, big strategic implications. If they can legitimate their annexation of Crimea, what's next? Are we looking at a new iron curtain descending across Eastern Europe? You know, most in our country recognize what is at stake in how the United States, as the leader of the free world, is the only check on Russian expansion.

So back to Mr. Trump and his cohort. At the republican convention in July, Paul Manafort, Carter Page, and Trump himself changed the republican party platform to no longer arm Ukraine. So the same month that Trump denied Putin's role in Ukraine, his team weakened the party platform on Ukraine and as we have and will continue to hear, this was the same month that several individuals in the Trump orbit held secret meetings with Russian officials, some of which may have been on the topic of sanctions against Russia or their intervention in Ukraine.

Now this is no coincidence in my opinion. In fact, the dossier written by former MI6 agent, Christopher Steele alleges that Trump agreed to sideline Russian intervention in Ukraine as a campaign issue, which is effectively a priority for Vladimir Putin. There's a lot in the dossier that is yet to be proven, but increasingly as we'll hear throughout the day, allegations are checking out. And this one seems to be as accurate as they come.

In fact, there is also one pattern I wanna point out before yielding back, Manafort, fired, Page, fired, Flynn, fired. Why? They were hired because of their Russian connections, they were fired. However, because their connections became public, they were effectively culpable. But they were also the fall guys. So I think after we hear Mr. Quigley's line of questioning, we might guess who could be next.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Ranking Member, I yield back.

SCHIFF:
I yield the balance to Representative Speier.

SPEIER:
Thank you, Ranking Member. Thank you gentlemen for your service to our country.

You know, I think it's really important as we sit here that we explain this to the American people in a way that they can understand it. Why are we talking about all of this? So my first question to each of you is, is Russia our adversary? Mr. Comey?

COMEY:
Yes.

SPEIER:
Mr. Rogers?

ROGERS:
Yes.

SPEIER:
Is -- do they intend to do us harm?

ROGERS:
They intend to ensure, I believe, that they gain advantage at our expense.

SPEIER:
Director Comey?

COMEY:
Yes, I wanna be -- harm can have many meetings. They're an adversary and so they wanna resist us, oppose us, undermine us, in lots of different ways.

SPEIER:
So one of the terms that we hear often is hybrid warfare. And I'd like to just stand give a short definition of what it is. It blends conventional warfare, irregular warfare and cyber warfare. The aggressor intends to avoid attribution or retribution.

So would you say that Russia engaged in hybrid warfare in its effort to undermine our Democratic process and engage in our electoral process? Director Comey?

COMEY:
I don't think I would use the term warfare. I think you'd -- you'd wanna ask experts in the definition of war. They engaged in a multifaceted campaign of active measures to undermine our democracy and hurt one of the candidates and -- and hope to help one of the other candidates.

ROGERS:
I'd agree with the director.

SPEIER:
All right, well, thank you both.

I actually think that their engagement was an act of war, an act of hybrid warfare and I think that's why the American people should be concerned about it.

Now, in -- in terms of trying to understand this, I -- I think of a spider web, with a tarantula in the middle. And the tarantula, in my view, is Vladimir Putin, who is entrapping many people to do his bidding and to engage with him. And I would include those like Roger Stone and Carter Page and Michael Caputo and Wilbur Ross and Paul Manafort and Rex Tillerson.

I'd like to focus first on Rex Tillerson in the three minutes I have, here. He was the CEO of Exxon Mobil. In 2008, he said that the likelihood of U.S./Russia businesses was, in fact, a poor investment, that Russia was a poor investment climate, that was in 2008. In 2011 he closed the $500 billion deal with Rosneft Oil. The CEO of Rosneft is Igor Sechin, who is a confident of President Putin, second most powerful man in Russia and probably a former KGB agent.

The deal gives Exxon access to the Black Sea and the Kara Seas and Siberia for oil development. Rosneft gets minority interest in Exxon in Texas and the Gulf. Rex Tillerson calls Sechin a good friend. In 2012, Mr. Tillerson and Mr. Sechin go on a road show here in the United States to talk about this great deal that they had just consummated.

Also in 2012 there's a video of President Putin and Mr. Tillerson toasting champagne at the deal. And in 2013, Mr. Tillerson receives the Russian Order of Friendship and he sits right next to President Putin at the event.

So my question to you Director Comey is, is it of value to President Putin knowing what you know of him and that his interest in doing harm to us, is it of benefit to Mr. Putin to have Rex Tillerson as the Secretary of State?

COMEY:
I can't answer that question.

SPEIER:
Admiral Rogers?

ROGERS:
Ma'am I'm not -- I'm not in the position answer that question.

SPEIER:
All right. So in 2014 at Igor Sechin is sanctioned and he laments that he no longer will be able to come to the United States to motorcycle ride with Mr. Tillerson. Could you give me an understanding of what are some of the reasons that we impose sanctions, Direct Comey?

COMEY:
On Sechin?

SPEIER:
Well, just in general.

COMEY:
Again, you'd have to ask an expert, but from my general knowledge it's to punish activities that are criminal in nature, that involve war crimes, that involve violations of U.N. resolutions or United States law in some other way, it's to communicate and enforce foreign policy interests and values of United States of America. That's my general sense, but an expert might describe it much better.

SPEIER:
Admiral Rogers?

ROGERS:
I would echo the Director's comments. It's also a tool that we use to attempt to drive and shake the choices and actions of others.

SPEIER:
So in the case of Igor's session, who was sanctioned by the United States, in part to draw attention to the fact that Russia had invaded Crimea. It's an effort to try and send a very strong message to Russia, is that not true?

COMEY:
I think that's right.

ROGERS:
Yes ma'am.

SPEIER:
With that, Mr. Chairman, I'll yield back for now.

NUNES:
Gentleman yields back.

I'm going to yield myself 15 minutes and now yield to the general lady from Florida Ms. Ros-Lehtinen.

ROS-LEHTINEN:
Thank you so much Mr. Chairman.

It's never acceptable, we can all agree, for any foreign power to interfere with our electoral process and this committee has long been focused on Russia's reprehensible conduct. And we will remain focused on the threat emanating from Moscow. And I agree with you Director Comey, when you say this investigation that is ongoing, we will follow the facts wherever they lead on a bipartisan level and there will be no sacred cows.

There are many important issues at stake, as you gentlemen have heard. There is bipartisan agreement on the danger of illegal leaks and our ability to reauthorize important programs upon which our intelligence community relies. But I want to assure the American people that there's also bipartisan agreement on getting to the bottom of Russian meddling in our election which must remain the focus of this investigation and yours.

So Admiral Rogers, I agree in what you said that a public acknowledgement of this foreign meddling to be a problem is important as we move forward. And following on Congressman LoBiondo's questions and based on this theme, I'd like to ask you gentlemen if you could describe what, if anything, Russia did in this election that to your knowledge they did or they didn't do in previous elections, how -- how it was -- were their actions different in this election than -- than in previous ones.

ROGERS:
I'd say the biggest difference from my perspective was both the use of cyber, the hacking as a vehicle to physically gain access to information to extract that information and then to make it widely, publicly available without any alteration or change.

COMEY:
The only thing I'd add is they were unusually loud in their intervention. It's almost as if they didn't care that we knew what they were doing or that they wanted us to see what they were doing. It was very noisy, their intrusions in different institutions.

ROS-LEHTINEN:
And what specifically based on this loudness did the FBI or the NSA do to prevent or counter this Russian active measure that we read about in the intelligence community assessment? As loud as they were, what did we do to counter that?

COMEY:
Well, among other things, we alerted people who had been victims of intrusions to permit them to tighten their systems to see if they couldn't kick the Russian actors out. We also, as a government, supplied information to all the states so they could equip themselves to make sure there was no successful effort to affect the vote and there was none, as we said earlier.

And then the government as a whole in October called it out. And I believe it was Director Clapper and then-secretary Jeh Johnson issued a statement saying this is what the Russians are doing, sort of an inoculation.

ROS-LEHTINEN:
And the loudness to which you refer, perhaps they were doing these kinds of actions previously in other elections but they were not doing it as loudly. What -- why do you think that they did not mind being loud and being found out?

COMEY:
I don't know the answer for sure. I think part -- their number one mission is to undermine the credibility of our entire democracy enterprise of this nation and so it might be that they wanted us to help them by telling people what they were doing.

Their loudness, in a way, would be counting on us to amplify it by telling the American people what we saw and freaking people out about how the Russians might be undermining our elections successfully. And so that might have been part of their plan, I don't know for sure.

ROGERS:
I've -- I agree with Director Comey. I mean, a big difference to me in the past was while there was cyber activity, we never saw in previous presidential elections information being published on such a massive scale that had been illegally removed both from private individuals as well as organizations associated with the democratic process both inside the government and outside the government.

ROS-LEHTINEN:

And this massive amount and this loudness, now that it's become public knowledge, now that we have perhaps satisfied their -- their -- their thirst that it has become such a huge deal, do you expect their interference to be amplified in future U.S. elections?

Do you see any evidence of that in European elections or do you think that this public acknowledgment would -- would tamper down the volatility?

COMEY:
I'll let my -- maybe I'll just say as initial matter they'll be back. And they'll be in 2020, they may be back in 2018 and one of the lessons they may draw from this is that they were successful because they introduced chaos and division and discord and sewed doubt about the nature of this amazing country of ours and our democratic process.

It's possible they're misreading that as it worked and so we'll come back and hit them again in 2020. I don't know but we have to assume they're coming back.

ROGERS:
I fully expect them to continue this -- this level of activity because I -- our sense is that they have come to the conclusion that it generated a positive outcome for them in the sense that calling into question the democratic process for example is one element of the strategy.

We're working closely, we -- our FBI teammates, others working closely with our European teammates to provide the insights that we have seen to try to assist them as they, themselves, France and Germany for example, about to undergo significant national leadership elections over the course of the next two months.

ROS-LEHTINEN:
And in terms of the European elections, what -- what have you seen or any information that you can share with us about the Russian interference in that process?

ROGERS:
So you see some of the same things that we saw in the U.S. in terms of disinformation, fake news, attempts to release of information to embarrass individuals, you're seeing that play out to some extent in European elections right now.

ROS-LEHTINEN:
I look forward to continuing with you.

Thank you so much, Mr. Chairman.

NUNES:
Gentlelady yields back.

Mr. Turner is recognized.

TURNER:
Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Comey, Admiral Rogers, thank you for being here today and for your -- what appears to be attempts at being forthcoming with the committee. I also want to thank the Chairman and the Ranking Member Schiff. This is a bipartisan effort.

I think as you've looked to what this committee is undertaking, everyone wants answers and everyone want answers to all of the questions that are being asked because this does go to such an important issue concerning our elections.

Admiral Rogers, I'm going to begin with a question to you concerning the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Now Admiral, as you know that the foreign service -- Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act provides the circumstances or the authority under which the intelligence community may collect or intercept the communication of a foreign person located outside of the United States, or as Mr. Comey's indicated a person who is covered under a FISA court order.

Now, with Mr. Rooney and Mr. Gowdy you discussed the minimization procedures under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and those minimization procedures are supposed to protect the privacy rights of U.S. citizens. Specifically, it's geared toward the communications of those who maybe inadvertently or incidentally collected as a result of the intelligence community's lawful collection of communications of others.

So Mr. Rogers, is the intelligence community required to cease collection or the interception of communications if the result of the collection or interception includes the communications of an incoming U.S. administration official, the president-elect or the president- elect's transition team.

ROGERS:
It depends under what authority work, as I said early on, there's a series of questions we go through, was there criminal associated activity, does the conversation deal about threats to U.S. persons, breaking of the law. So there's no simple yes or no, there's a series of processes we have in place.

TURNER:
Mr. Rogers, is there any provision of minimization that requires you to cease collection? Because that is my question, are you under any circumstances required to cease collection if the collection results in the either inadvertent or incidental collection of an incoming U.S. administration official, the president-elect or the president-elect's transition team?

ROGERS:
Purely on the basis of exposure, I wanna make sure I understand the question, is -- is...

(CROSSTALK)

TURNER:
Are you required to cease, if you are -- are undertaking lawful collection under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of a person or individual, either because they're a foreign person located outside the United States or the person that you're collecting against, is the subject of a FISA Court order.

If incidental to that collection or inadvertently, the collection results in the collection of communications of an incoming U.S. administration official, the president-elect or the president-elect's transition team, are you required under the minimization procedures, to cease collection?

ROGERS:
Not automatically.

TURNER:
Thank you. So the answer's no, correct?

Well, the reason why this is important is because intuitively, we would all know that incoming administration would have conversations with those that the intelligence community may be collecting against, either by making phone calls to them or receiving phone calls to them.

And so it's important for us to understand that the minimization procedures that are intended to collect the privacy rights of Americans, do not inherently include the -- a prohibition of the intelligence community incidentally or inadvertently, collecting the communications of an incoming administration.

ROGERS:
Yes, sir.

TURNER:
Yep.

Mr. Comey, are you aware whether or not the Director of National Intelligence Director Clapper, ever briefed the President of the United States, then President Obama, concerning the possible inadvertent or incidental collection or interception by the U.S. intelligence community of any communication of members of the incoming Trump administration?

COMEY:
That's not something I can comment on.

TURNER:
And then why not, Mr. Comey.

COMEY:
A couple of reasons, it might involve classified information, it might involve communications with the president of the United States. On both of those grounds, I can't talk about it here.

TURNER:
Mr. Comey, have you previously discussed your conversations with President Obama with this committee?

COMEY:
I don't remember. I may have with the chair and ranking, I don't remember with the full committee.

TURNER:
Well, we'll have to refresh your memory on those conversations, then.

Mr. Comey, did and am used to combing. I did President Obama ever acknowledge to you of having been briefed, concerning possibly inadvertent or incidental collection or interception by the intelligence community of any communications of members of the incoming Trump administration?

COMEY:
I have to give you the same answer, Mr. Turner.

TURNER:
Well, Mr. Comey, the first question related to whether or not Mr. Clapper had briefed the president of the United States and we'll certainly be following up with him. He is going to be appearing before us next week and we'll certainly be directing the question to him also.

So Mr. Comey, are you aware of any evidence that General Flynn prior to the inauguration, ever communicated to the Russian government or a Russian government official that the Trump administration in the future would release, resend, or reverse U.S. sanctions against Russia or ever made any offer of a quid pro quo for releasing resending or reversing U.S. sanctions against Russia. Are you aware of any evidence?

COMEY:
That's not something I can comment on, Mr. Turner.

TUNER:
And why's that?

COMEY:
I'm trying very hard not to talk about anything that relates to a U.S. person, or that might rule in or rule out things, might be investigating. I'm trying to be studiously vague here to protect the integrity of the investigation.

So please don't -- as I said in the beginning please don't interpret my no comment as meaning this or meaning that. I just can't comment.

TURNER:
Well, Mr. Comey, there are statutes, guidelines and procedures concerning the what does it take for the FBI to open up a counterintelligence investigation into a U.S. citizen.

It is not just subject to discretion. You can't just say well let's go look at somebody, you have to have a basis. You've now informed us that you've opened a counterintelligence investigation into the Trump campaign, members the Trump campaign, concerning Russia in July of 2006 (sic). Now we're trying to get a picture of what does it take to tip over for investigation?

Now previously people have said that there been individuals who attended a meeting with Russian officials, individuals who -- a member who was paid to attend a conference, a picture that was taken, traveled to a foreign place. There many people both in -- in all of our administrations and sometimes, you know, certainly members who have left Congress who would all qualify for that.

What -- what is the tipping point? I mean it can't just be that. Don't you need some action or some information besides just attending a meeting, having been paid to attend a conference, that a picture was taken, or that you traveled to a country before your open to investigation for counterintelligence by the FBI?

COMEY:
The standard is, I think there's a couple different at play. A credible allegation of wrongdoing or reasonable basis to believe that an American may be acting as an agent of a foreign power.

TURNER:
Well the reason why we're with this, Mr. Comey, is that we obviously have the statements of Mr. Clapper that there is no evidence of collusion with Russia and he just left the intelligence community. And as you are aware, we now sit because this is you said, Admiral Rogers, you know, the Russians wanted to put a cloud over our system.

And Mr. Comey, by your announcement today, I mean, there is now a cloud that undermines our system. There is a cloud that where we're sitting with Mr. Clapper who was obviously in a very important position to know, who stated to us that there is no evidence of conclusion, and you will not give us evidence or -- or -- or give us any -- any substantive evaluation of it.

We now sit with this cloud and it's important that -- Mr. Chairman I have a few additional questions if I might when we regain time.

NUNES:
We'll get back to Mr. Turner.

Mr. Schiff's recognized for 15 minutes.

SCHIFF:
Thank you Mr. Chairman.

I recognize representative Jackie Speier.

SPEIER:
Thank you Mr. Schiff.

Again, let's go back to this tarantula web. So Mr. Tillerson, in 2014, started to lobby the United States government asking them to shifter or lift the sanctions. Now in his -- his confirmation hearing he says he's -- as he said, I have never lobbied against sanctions, personally, to my knowledge, Exxon Mobil never directly lobbied against sanctions.

And yet there is lobbying reporting that shows that Exxon Mobil actually paid over $300,000 to lobbyists in 2014. And that Mr. Tillerson visited the White House five times in 2014 and treasury with Secretary Lew, seven times.

Is -- is there something disconcerting about a U.S. CEO attempting to undermine The sanctions imposed by our government against another country for acts that we find to be disadvantageous to the world order. Director Comey?

COMEY:
That's not a question I can answer. For a variety of reasons, I'm not qualified to answer and I shouldn't be answering questions like that.

SPEIER:
All right. OK. How about this then? Is it disconcerting to you as the director of the FBI that a U.S. CEO would say publicly that he is very close friends with President Putin and has had a 17-year relationship with him?

COMEY:
That's not a question I can answer.

SPEIER:
Would it raise any red flags?

COMEY:
That's not a question I can answer.

SPEIER:
Admiral Rogers?

ROGERS:
Ma'am, lots of American corporations do business in Russia. I have no knowledge of the specifics you're talking about, I am in no way qualified or knowledgeable enough to comment on this.

SPEIER:
All right, let's move on to someone else in that web. His name is Michael Caputo. He's a PR professional, conservative radio talk show host. In 1994, he moved to Russia and there he was working for the agency for international development. He was fired from that job because he refused to follow a State Department position.

He then opened a PR firm in Moscow and married a Russian woman. He subsequently divorced her and in 1999 his business failed. Roger Stone, a mentor to him, urged him to move to Florida and open his PR firm in Miami which is exactly what Mr. Caputo did. And then in 2000 he worked with Gazprom-Media to improve Putin's image in the United States.

Now, do we know who Gazprom-Media is? Do you know anything about Gazprom, Director?

COMEY:
I don't.

SPEIER:
Well, it's a -- it's an oil company. In 2007, he began consulting the Ukrainian parliamentary campaign. There he met his second wife.

So I guess my question is, what possible reason is there for the Trump campaign to hire Putin's image consultant? Any thoughts on that Director Comey?

COMEY:

No thoughts.

SPEIER:
Admiral Rogers?

ROGERS:
Likewise, ma'am.

SPEIER:
All right. Do either of you know what Michael Caputo is doing for the Trump effort today?

ROGERS:
I have no idea.

COMEY:
And I'm not going to talk about U.S. persons.

SPEIER:
All right, let's move on now to Carter Page.

Carter Page was the founder of Global Energy, it's an investment fund. He has only one partner and that partner is Sergei Yatsenko who's the former executive of a Russian state-owned Gazprom oil company. Before that, from 2004 to 2007, he worked for Merrill Lynch in Moscow.

In March of 2016, Then-Candidate Trump referred to Carter Page as his foreign policy advisor to the Washington Post. The next day, Page asserts that he's an advisor on Russia and energy. But then subsequently, Candidate Trump says he doesn't know him.

SPEIER:
On September 26, he takes a leave of absence from the campaign and then Page publicly supports a relationship with Russia, criticizes U.S. sanctions and NATO's approach to Russia, saying -- and then subsequently says he's divesting his stake in Gazprom in August. In 2014, he writes an article criticizing the U.S. sanctions, praising Sechin in an article and global policy and then rebuked the west for focusing on so-called annexation of Crimea.

In July of 2016, he gives a graduation speech at the new economic school, denies meeting with the prime minister, Christopher Steele, in his dossier, says he met with, again, Igor Sechin, offering a 19 percent interest in Rosneft. It becomes the biggest transfer of public property to private ownership.

Now, Carter Page is a national security adviser to Donald Trump. Do you believe that -- why do we -- I guess, again, here's another company that has had sanctions imposed upon it. Could you again clarify why we impose sanctions on companies?

COMEY:
Admiral Rogers did it better than I, so I'm going to (inaudible) him.

SPEIER:
OK.

ROGERS:
I apologize. I don't remember the specifics of my answer, but I'll stand by my answer...

COMEY:
Which was excellent.

SPEIER:
All right.

I think at that point, I will yield back, Mr. Chair.

SCHIFF:
I now yield to Mr. Quigley.

QUIGLEY:
Thank you, Mr. Ranking Member.

Gentlemen, thank you for your service. Thank you for being here. We've talked a little bit about the Russian playboook, right? Extortion, bribery, false news, disinformation, they all sound very familiar, correct? Well, as we talk, without thinking about anybody in the United States, just generally the Russian playbook and how it's worked in particularly Eastern Europe and Central Europe, a lot of it involves trying to influence individuals in that country, correct?

ROGERS:
Yes.

QUIGLEY:
So what we've talked about a little bit today seems so -- be sort of a black and white notion of whether there was collusion, but does a Russian active measure attempting to succeed at collusion -- does the person involved have to actually know? I mean, does it have to involve knowing collusion for there to be damage?

COMEY:
I can answer generally. In the world of intelligence, oftentimes there are people who are called co-optees, who are acting -- don't realize they're dealing with agents of a foreign power and so are doing things for someone they think is a friend or a business associate, not realizing it's for that -- the foreign government. So it can happen, it's actually quite a frequent technique.

QUIGLEY:
Is it beyond that sometimes to include things where the -- the actor doesn't necessarily know what they're doing is helping that other government?

COMEY:
Exactly.

QUIGLEY:
And what are instances, just examples of what that might include in a generic sense, in Europe and so forth?

COMEY:
Oftentimes, a researcher here in the United States may think they're dealing with a peer researcher in a foreign government and not knowing that that researcher is either knowingly or unwittingly passing information to a foreign adversary of the United States.

QUIGLEY:
And can you explain and elaborate how this sort of -- problems with defining what collusion is -- the differences that might be involved with explicit or implicit collusion?

COMEY:
Collusion is not a term, a legal term of art and it's one I haven't used here today, as we're investigating to see whether there was any coordination between people associated with the campaign...

QUIGLEY:
Explicit or implicit coordination?

COMEY:
I guess implicit, I -- I would think of it as knowing or unknowing. You can do things to help a foreign nation state, as I said, without realizing that you're dealing with. You think you're helping a buddy, who's a researcher at a university in China and what you're actually doing is passing information that ends up with the Chinese government. That's unwitting, I don't know whether it's same as your implicit.

Explicit would be, you know, I'm sending this stuff to this researcher in China and I'm doing it because I wanna help the Chinese government and I know he's hooked up with the Chinese government.

QUIGLEY:
Admiral Rogers, would you give other examples of what you witnessed in your career?

ROGERS:
Sometimes, U.S. individuals would be approached by other individuals connected with -- with foreign connections who will misrepresent what not just the researcher, they'll assume an identity if you will, hey I want you to think that I'm actually working for a business, exploring commercial interests, those kinds of things. Create a relationship and then it turns out, there really is no commercial interest, here they're acting as a direct extension of a foreign government...

(CROSSTALK)

COMEY:

And romance can be a feature. Somebody dating someone to create a close relationship and the U.S. government person thinks that they're in love with this person and -- and vice versa and the other person's actually an agent of a foreign power, that's sort of a classic example.

QUIGLEY:
You describe this as naive acquiescence?

COMEY:
I don't -- I'm not sure I know what that means, exactly (ph).

ROGERS:
I don't know what that really means (ph).

QUIGLEY:
You're -- you're going along with it and without really acknowledging, understanding in your mind or being naive about the issue.

COMEY:
Sure, that can happen.

ROGERS:
Yeah, you see that at times.

QUIGLEY:
OK.

Going on to things that you -- you probably can't comment upon which is of equal concern. We're all, at this point, very familiar with Mr. Sessions's testimony before the United States Senate in which he specifically said he had -- he wasn't one who had this contact with the Russians. And then there was the amended, I guess, testimony in which he acknowledged I believe two such testimonies. The first was in July during the convention and then later in September afterwards.

All the while, that the issues that we are talking about today, the hacking, the dumping of materials were taking placing and certainly, someone in the position of Mr. Senator Sessions would've been aware of this. Perhaps, would've remembered these conversations or might've mentioned or asked the Russian ambassador to knock it off. But apparently, none of those things happened or at least he didn't remember that they happened. Unfortunately, what we're reading now is that there was a third meeting as early as April of last year in Washington, D.C., a meeting which Candidate Trump was present and the Russian ambassador was present.

At some point in time, this goes well beyond an innocent, under the best of circumstances, oh I forgot sort of thing, or that doesn't count. When you correct your testimony in front of the United States Senate, you're still under oath and you're swearing to the American people that what you're saying is true. Well, the third time is well beyond that and is quite simply perjury.

So as we look at this as we go forward, gentlemen, I ask that you take that into consideration. This is far more than what we have talked about just in the general sense, did the Russians hack or not and the scope of this too, a concerted effort and plan to lie to the American public about what took place and what the motivations were beyond these -- this process. Again, I thank you for your service.

And I yield back to the ranking member.

SCHIFF:
I yield to Mr. Swalwell of California.

SWALWELL:
Thank you, Director Comey and Admiral Rogers.

Director Comey, you've served time in a courtroom as a prosecutor and I'm wondering if you remember the instruction that is read to juries every day that if you decide that a witness deliberately lied about something significant in this case, you should consider not believing anything that witness says.

COMEY:
Yes, that's familiar to me.

SWALWELL:
And your testimony at the beginning of this hearing was that President Trump's claims that former President Obama had wiretapped him is false.

COMEY:
I said we have no information that supports them.

SWALWELL:
Thank you.

With respect to Donald Trump, do you remember the other instruction relating to truthfulness of a witness or a defendant? If the defendant makes a false or misleading statement relating to the charged crime knowing the statement was false or intending to mislead that conduct may also show he or she were aware of their guilt.

COMEY:
Yes, familiar to me from my distant past.

SWALWELL:
I want talk about the Kremlin playbook and there are a number of ways that a foreign adversary can seek to influence a person, do you agree with that?

COMEY:
Yes.

SWALWELL: Financial?

COMEY:
Yes, that can be one.

SWALWELL:
Romance you said is another.

COMEY:
Yes.

SWALWELL: Compromise?

COMEY:
Correct.

SWALWELL:
Setting up a compromise?

COMEY:
Sure, to execute on a compromise, yes.

SWALWELL:
How about inadvertently capturing a compromise, meaning they have vast surveillance and you stumble into that surveillance and are caught in compromise?

COMEY:
And then they take that information, try and use it to coerce you? Yes, that's part of the playbook.

SWALWELL:
I'll yield back, Chair, and continue once I'm back with us. Thank you, Director.

NUNES:
Gentleman's time's expired.

We'll go back to Mr. Turner.

TURNER:
Thank you.

I want to go back to the issue of -- Admiral Rogers indicated that the goal of the Russians is to put a cloud on our system to undermine our system. And -- and I would think, certainly today, Mr. Comey, with your announcement of an investigation that the Russians would be very happy with that as an outcome because the cloud of their actions and activities continues and will continue to undermine and until your finished with whatever your investigation is currently in the scope of.

I want to go back to the issue of how does one open an investigation because again, I'm -- I'm a little confused by -- by some of the things that we hear as to the basis of an investigation. Now, Mr. Comey, if -- if an individual attends a meeting with a foreign leader is -- is that enough to open a counter intelligence investigation?

COMEY:
Without more that somebody met with somebody, no.

TUNER:
No. OK. Without more than if they had their picture taken with a foreign leader, is that enough?

COMEY:
It would depend upon where they were, who took the picture.

TURNER:
Well, assume that they're in would (ph) that -- the foreign country, and in that foreign leaders government offices or facilities, if they're having a picture taken with them, is that enough to open a counterintelligence investigation?

COMEY:
It would depend.

TURNER:
On -- on what? Because I'm saying if there's just a picture. Because I can tell you certainly there's lots of people who have had lots of pictures.

COMEY:
Yeah.

TURNER:
Is it enough that a person who has just had their picture taken with a foreign leader at the foreign leaders government official offices or place of residence?

COMEY:
The reason I said it depends is it would depend. Did the person sneak over to the foreign country and meet them clandestinely, did -- was the picture -- reveal something else about the relationship? It just hard to...

TUNER:
Well, let's say it's not clandestine. Let's say it's open, that the person has -- as -- has attended an event and has gone over to meet with the foreign person, foreign government official and is at their foreign government official facility or their official residence and has a picture taken and has no intention of covertly being present with the foreign person, is that picture enough to open a counterintelligence investigation?

COMEY:
Tricky to answer hypotheticals, but I think my reaction to that is that doesn't strike me as enough. And I know your next question's going to be deeper into hypos.

TURNER:
No, no, I'm not getting deep into hypos. These are pretty straightforward. So what if you're paid, you know, to attend a conference in a foreign -- in a foreign country and you're paid to attend that conference not directly by the foreign government, but nonetheless payment does occur for you to attend a conference? We know President Bill Clinton attended many such conferences and spoke and received payment.

Is receiving payment by attending to speak at a conference -- again, it's not covert, it's open. They're attending to speak at a conference, they receive payment for the purposes of speaking, is that enough to open a counterintelligence investigation?

COMEY:
I can't say as I sit here. It would depend upon a lot of different things.

TURNER:
If you had no other information or evidence other than the fact that they attended, is that enough for you, for the FBI to open a counterintelligence investigation of a private U.S. citizen?

COMEY:
I can't answer the hypothetical because it would depend upon a number of other things.

TURNER:
I limited it to where there would be no other things, Mr. Comey. I said only, if the only information that you had was that they had intended an event in which they were paid which was a conference and it was not covert, is that only sufficient information to open an investigation against a private U.S. citizen?

COMEY:
Who paid them? Did they disclose it? What did they discuss when they were there? Who else was sitting with them? There's lots and lots of other circumstances that make that -- even that simple-seeming hypo difficult to answer.

TURNER:
Well, let's say that they've traveled to a foreign country and they openly traveled, wasn't covert. Is traveling there enough?

COMEY:
Just traveling around the world, no.

TURNER:
OK, well I'm very concerned, Mr. Comey, about the issue of how an investigation is opened and -- and how we end up at this situation once again where Mr. Clapper, had (ph) the director of national intelligence, just said that when he left there was no evidence of collusion and yet, as Admiral Rogers said, we're sitting now where the Russians' goal is being achieved of causing a cloud or undermining our electoral process. So I certainly hope that you take an expeditious look at what you have undertaken because it affects the heart of our democracy.

Mr. Comey, I have a question against -- again concerning classified information. Now, I know that if I attend a classified briefing and I receive classified information and I go and tell someone that classified information, if I leak it, I release it, then I've committed a crime. But what if someone goes to a classified briefing, walks out of that briefing, and openly lies about the content of that briefing? Because it's unclear to me what happens then.

And it's important because, as you know, this committee and certainly both of you gentlemen have handled a lot of classified information and recently, more recently, the purported classified information is put out in the press, The Washington Post, The New York Times reports information. And you know and I know and we all know, having handled classified information, that some of that information is not true. Are the sources of that classified information, if they come out and lie about the content of classified information, have they committed a crime?

COMEY:
That's a really interesting question. I don't think so. If all they've done is lie to a reporter, that's not against the law. If they've done it, I don't wanna break anybody's hearts with that but that's not against the law. But it is not and the reason I'm hesitating is, I can imagine a circumstance where it's part of some broader conspiracy or something, but just that false statement to a reporter is not a crime.

TURNER:
And I just wanna underscore that for a -- just for a second, because I agree with you. I think it's no crime. And so every reporter out there that has someone standing in front of them and saying oh, I'm taking this great risk of sharing with you U.S. secrets, besides them purporting to be a traitor, are committing no crime if they lie to them. So all of these news articles that contain this information that we know is not -- not the case, are being done so at damage to the United States but without the risk of a crime.

And my next aspect of your question to Mr. Comey, is this. What is the obligation of the intelligence community to correct such falsehoods? Some of this information that we read in the Washington Post and the New York Times, is extremely false and extremely incendiary and extremely condemning of individuals and certainly, our whole system. What is your obligation, Mr. Comey, to be that source to say I can't release classified information, but I can tell you, it's not that?

COMEY:
Yeah, it's a great question, Mr. Turner, because there's a whole lot out there that is false. And I suppose some of it could be people lying to reporters. I think that probably happens. But more often than not, it's people who -- who act like they know when they really don't know. Because they're not the people who actually know the secrets, they're one or two hops out and they're passing along (ph) things they think they know.

There is -- we had not only have no obligation to correct that, we can't, because if we start calling reporters and saying hey, this thing you said about this new aircraft we've developed, that's inaccurate actually, it's got two engines. We just can't do that because we'll give information to our adversaries that way and it's very, very frustrating but we can't start down that road. Now, when it's unclassified information, if a reporter misreports the contents of a bill that's being debated in Congress or a policy, we can call him and say hey, you ought to read it more carefully. You missed this or missed that. We cannot do that with classified information.

It's very, very frustrating because I have read a whole lot of stuff, especially in the last two months, this is just wrong. But I can't say which is wrong and I can't say it to those reporters.

TURNER:
Mr. Comey, if you could help us on this issue, I would greatly appreciate it because what happens, is that you come into a classified briefing with us and you tell us, perhaps what something that is absolutely false, it really shouldn't be classified because you're telling us it's not true. But yet, we can't go tell it's not true because you told us in a classified setting. If there's a way that we can at least have some exchange as to what's not true so the American people don't listen to false stories in The Washington Post and The New York Times that we all know are not true, that would be helpful.

COMEY:
Yeah, I don't...

TURNER:
If you could think about how you could help us with that.

COMEY:
I'd love to invent that machine, but we can't because where do you stop that on that slope?

TURNER:
Well, false is false, Mr. Comey.

COMEY:
Because then, when I don't call The New York Times to say you got that one wrong, bingo, they got that one right. And so I -- it's just an enormously complicated endeavor for us. We have to stay clear of it entirely.

TURNER:
Thank you, Mr. Comey, one last question. So we all read in the press that Vice President Pence publicly denied that General Flynn discussed sanctions with Russia. And I'm assuming that you saw those news reports. Did the FBI take any action in response to the vice president statements?

COMEY:
I can't comment on that, Mr. Turner.

TURNER:
Mr. Comey, The New York Times reported on February 14th, 2017, that General Flynn was interviewed by FBI personnel. Is that correct?

COMEY:

I can't comment on that, Mr. Turner.

TURNER:
Mr. Comey, I do not have any additional questions, but I thank you both for your participation. And again, I thank for the -- the chairman and ranking member for the bipartisan aspect of this investigation.

NUNES:
Gentleman yields back.

Dr. Wenstrup is recognized.

WENSTRUP:
Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you gentlemen for being here, I appreciate your endurance in this effort today. One question, how long has Russia or the Soviet Union been interfering or attempting to interfere with our election process?

ROGERS:
In the report we've feebly (ph) talked about, we have seen this kind of behavior to some degree attempting to influence outcomes for decades.

(CROSSTALK)

WENSTRUP:
Going back to -- going back the Soviet Union...

ROGERS:
Right. Not to the same level necessary, but the basic trend has been there.

WENSTRUP:
So I'm curious also about what triggers a counterintelligence investigation of a government official. And in some ways, I'm asking for myself. For example, last week I spoke at an event on form policy with Atlantic Council. Unbeknownst to me, the Iraqi ambassador of the United States was there. He comes up to me afterwards, introduces himself and says he'd like to meet with me at some time. So this isn't a theoretical, this is real and this is what I'm asking is this.

Will be in trouble or under investigation if I meet with him?

COMEY:
This is the slope I tried to avoid going down with Mr. Turner. Dr. Wenstrup, I -- I don't think I should be answering hypotheticals. The question is...

WENSTRUP:
It's not hypothetical because I'm asking you in advance because I want to know if I can meet with him and be under investigation or not and I don't think that's an unrealistic question. This is real. This is right now.

COMEY:
I get that. The FBI does not give advisory opinions, and so if you're asking about your particular case, I just can't do that.

WENSTRUP:
So you'll tell me afterwards?

COMEY:
No, I'll -- I'll never tell you.

(LAUGHTER)

WENSTRUP:
Well, you might. Somebody might, somebody might tell the press, right? And that's where I'm going next because I want to know what -- what can I discuss? What am I allowed to discuss? And what -- what triggers the investigation is really what we're trying to get to in general. You know, maybe not with the Iraqi ambassador, but what about with the Russian ambassador? What are my obligations? What am I -- do I need to advise someone that I'm meeting with them? Do I have to discuss the agenda before I meet with them?

You know, just so we're clear. I mean, this is really what it's coming down to, is a lot about what we're talking about. You know, so I don't think it's unnecessary or ridiculous for me to ask that. And so in intelligence reporting, if the identity of a U.S. official is disseminated to those on an as needed basis -- or those that need to know basis. Does that generally lead to a counterintelligence investigation of that individual?

So in -- in general, if a U.S. official is -- is -- is in this report and it's disseminated, does that lead to an investigation of the individual?

COMEY:
No, not in general, not as a rule. No.

WENSTRUP:
OK. That answers...

(CROSSTALK)

COMEY:
It would depend on lots of the circumstances.

WENSTRUP:
Next, I want to go to the article from February 14 in The New York Times which I believe we're all familiar. And you may not be able to answer any of these, but the article sites four current and former American officials. Do you know -- know the identity of those four officials?

COMEY:
Not going to comment on an article.

WENSTRUP:
OK. Well, it's not necessarily on the article, but OK. Do you know for a fact that the four current and former American officials provided information for the story?

COMEY:
I have to give you the same answer.

WENSTRUP:
OK. With or without an investigation going on, has anyone told you that they know who leaked the information or who leaked any information on Russian involvement in the U.S. elections or Russian involvement with the Trump election team?

COMEY:
I'm not going to comment on that.

WENSTRUP:
Is it possible that The New York Times misrepresented its sourcing for this February 14 article? Possible.

COMEY:
I can't comment on that.

WENSTRUP:
Is it possible that The New York Times was misled by individuals claiming to be current or former American officials.

COMEY:
I'll give you the same answer, Dr. Wenstrup.

WENSTRUP:
Can I ask why you can't comment on that?

COMEY:
I think a number of reasons. I'm not confirming that the information in that article is accurate or inaccurate. I'm not going to get in the business of -- that we talked about earlier...

WENSTRUP:
OK. Is it -- then let me ask you this.

COMEY:
And there's other reasons.

WENSTRUP:
Sure.

COMEY:
That I'm also not going to confirm whether we're investigating things, and so if I start talking about what I know about a particular article, I run the risk of stepping on both of those landmines.

WENSTRUP:
I guess one more question before the time is up and we'll come back to me, but I am curious, is it possible -- and nothing to do with this article. Is it possible that a so-called source to a media outlet may actually be a Russian advocate? Nothing to do with this story per say, just is it possible that a Russian surrogate could actually be the source that a newspaper is relying on?

COMEY:
In general, sure, somebody could always be pretending to be something they're not.

WENSTRUP:
Thank you.

And I yield back at this time.

NUNES:
Gentleman yields back.

Mr. Schiff's recognized for 15 minutes.

SCHIFF:
Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Just a couple follow-up questions and then I'll pass it to Mr. Quigley for entering something into the record.

COMEY:
Mr. Chairman, can I ask you for an estimated time? I'm not made of steel, so I might need to take a quick break.

NUNES:
Would you like to do that now?

COMEY:
If you can, I didn't know how much longer you planned to go.

NUNES:
I think we want to keep going until the members have asked all their questions.

COMEY:
OK. Just a quick rest stop?

NUNES:
Yes. So we'll break for about 10 minutes.

COMEY:
That's plenty.

(CROSSTALK)

(RECESS)

NUNES:
I'm gonna call the hearing back into order after a brief recess. I wanna get on with questions. I'm gonna yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California, Mr. Schiff.

SCHIFF:
Director Comey, just a couple follow-up questions before I pass it to Mr. Quigley to enter something in the record. You've been asked a number of questions today about is it enough to open an investigation because someone travels or is enough because they have their photograph taken or enough because they attend a conference. I would imagine that you get so many leads, so many people writing to you with information that they're convinced shows (ph) a crime that if you investigated everything that people sent you, you would be squandering your investigative resources in a way you can't afford to do.

My understanding, and correct me if I'm wrong, is that in order for you to open an investigation, you need to see credible information or evidence that someone has either committed a federal crime or become an agent of a foreign power. Is that an accurate understanding?

COMEY:
Yeah, that's a fair statement. And as you said, Mr. Schiff, we have to also choose which -- we get a lot of referrals, which ones align with the threats that the FBI is trying to prioritize because we have limited resources.

SCHIFF:
Exactly. So even when those criteria are met, that enough may not be -- that in and of itself may not be enough because you have so many other cases you need to investigate and you have to prioritize.

COMEY:
Correct.

SCHIFF:
I also wanna ask you, you mentioned that it wouldn't be appropriate for you to be telling reporters that stories they're writing are accurate or inaccurate when they may involve an investigation. That's not an appropriate thing for you to do.

COMEY:
Correct, especially if the story involves classified information.

SCHIFF:
And that's because you would either be disclosing classified information potentially in what you're confirming, or by rebutting a story that was inaccurate, you may be suggesting other stories that contain classified information or then (ph) accurate?

COMEY:
Correct.

SCHIFF:
Now, it's inappropriate for you to be batting down inaccurate stories. Would you also agree it's -- if it's inappropriate for you to be batting down inaccurate stories, would you also agree it's inappropriate for the White House to be asking the FBI to be rebutting stories they don't like?

COMEY:
Yeah, that's when I don't wanna answer, Mr. Schiff, because I don't wanna talk about communications within the executive branch. I can speak for the FBI, that's not something the FBI can or should do.

SCHIFF:
And if you were appearing up before the Senate for confirmation and they asked you as director of the FBI, if you were asked by the White House to refute or acknowledge press stories that they liked or didn't like, what would you tell the Senate in your confirmation hearing? Would that be appropriate for your office?

COMEY:
I would figure out what was the right thing for the FBI to do and then do that thing.

SCHIFF:
And that right thing would be not to be in the business of confirming or denying stories about classified information?

COMEY:
Correct, that's what -- that's with the right thing is for the FBI.

SCHIFF:
Let me recognize Mr. Quigley for purposes of entering something in the record.

QUIGLEY:
Thank you, Mr. Ranking Member. As I do that, I'm reminded of what Hugo Black said, "Only a free and unrestrained press can effectively expose deception in government." I respectfully ask to enter a March 8th article entitled, "Jeff Sessions Likely Met Russian Ambassador a Third Time."

SCHIFF:
I now yield to Mr. Swalwell.

SWALWELL:
Thank you to our ranking member.

And thank you again to -- to our director and Admiral Rogers. Director, would you agree that the FBI, when it's considering the counterintelligence investigation, views contacts between U.S. persons and say Russia differently than it would view contacts between U.S. persons and the U.K. or France or Germans?

COMEY:
Yes, very much so.

SWALWELL:
And that's because they're a foreign adversary?

COMEY:
Correct.

SWALWELL:
And so to land on Russia's radar as somebody that they may want to recruit, would you agree that being a businessperson, a prominent business person is something that would be attractive to them?

COMEY:
Could be. Might depend upon what industry you're in.

SWALWELL:
Could it also -- could also being a politician be something that would be attractive to them?

COMEY:
Sure.

SWALWELL:
And how about somebody who does business with Russians, would that be attractive to them?

COMEY:
Could be. It would depend upon other things as well though.

SWALWELL:
And we were starting to discuss this, efforts to recruit include investing in a U.S. person, is that correct?

COMEY:
Efforts by Russia to invest typically?

SWALWELL:
Yes.

COMEY:
In their tradecraft, that can be one of the ways in which they cultivate a relationship, sure.

SWALWELL:
And if you are a U.S. person with a business, could it also include investing in your business or being a partner in some of your endeavors?

COMEY:
Lots of different ways someone could try and establish a relationship.

SWALWELL:
And going back to compromise, can we assume that any prominent U.S. person traveling to Russia would probably be covered by Russian surveillance?

COMEY:
Depend upon how you define prominent, but they have an extensive surveillance operation of foreign visitors. So no matter who you are, you ought to assume it, but whether that's true in reality is harder for me to answer.

Or do you want to answer that differently?

ROGERS:
No, I agree.

SWALWELL:
And Russia is attempting to recruit and persuade individuals that we've discussed before, just as other foreign adversaries are because they want to get something out of them, is that right?

COMEY:
Correct.

SWALWELL:
And in many cases, it could be if that person is ever in a position of power that they could be in a position to influence policy in the United States.

COMEY:
To influence policy or to supply them with information that's useful to them and maybe other purposes.

SWALWELL:
Now, with respect to your counterintelligence investigations, would be important for you if you were concerned that a U.S. person had financial entanglements with a foreign adversary to see that persons tax returns?

COMEY:
That's a hypothetical I really want to avoid answering, but the answer is it would depend really. It would depend upon a whole lot of circumstances.

SWALWELL:
That would be one of the pieces of evidence that you would consider looking?

COMEY:
Maybe, maybe. You -- you might be able to get the picture you need from other financial records that are more readily available.

SWALWELL:
And you're aware director that President Trump has refused, breaking with tradition of the past 40 years to show the American people his tax returns?

COMEY:
Not something I want to comment on. I'm aware of it from the media.

SWALWELL:
Now, Russia also in their efforts to recruit individuals and develop individuals, praying on or following someone's financial distress is also an avenue number may pursue, is that right?

COMEY:
Potentially, if it offers an avenue for leverage on someone.

SWALWELL:
And Director, would you consider six bankruptcies that an individual may have as been a point of leverage?

COMEY:
I can't say. I don't know.

SWALWELL:
And Director, you're aware that President Trump is at six prior bankruptcies?

COMEY:
That's not something I'm going to comment on.

SWALWELL:
And Director, when your agents are conducting a counterintelligence investigation with respect to a foreign adversary in their efforts to recruit or cooperate with a U.S. person, would you look at the U.S. person's travel to that country?

COMEY:
As part of evaluating whether there is an illicit relationship?

SWALWELL:
Yes.

COMEY:
Sure.

SWALWELL:
And are you familiar that President Trump has traveled at least three times to Russia?

COMEY:
That's not something I'm going to comment on.

SWALWELL:
Are you aware that his son, Donald Trump Jr., has traveled at least six times to Russia?

COMEY:
Same answer.

SWALWELL:
Donald Trump has said a number of times that he has had nothing to do with Russia and I want to ask you, Director, if you're familiar with Deutsche Bank and its $300 million loan to Donald Trump and his organization.

COMEY:
That's not something I'm going to comment on.

SWALWELL:
Director, are you aware that Deutsche Bank has been investigated and fined over $400 million by New York State for failing to stop the corrupt transfer of more than $10 billion out of Russia?

COMEY:
I think generally from press accounts.

SWALWELL:
So an individual's association with the bank that has had dealings with Russian money laundering, that would be something that would be a red flag for a counterintelligence investigation I would assume.

COMEY:
That's a hypo I don't want to answer.

SWALWELL:
Director, would a U.S. businessperson who is associated with a foreign adversary having tenants in their office building that do business with that foreign adversary, would that be a red flag that a counterintelligence agent would look at?

COMEY:
I can't answer that.

SWALWELL:
Are you aware that in Trump Tower were two tenants, Vadim Trincher and Anatoly Golubchik, who ran a high-stakes illegal gambling ring that was run out of Trump Tower?

COMEY:
Same answer.

SWALWELL:
And are you aware that the prosecutor in that case was U.S. attorney Preet Bharara?

COMEY:
Same answer.

SWALWELL:
Are you aware, Director, that that U.S. attorney was recently fired?

COMEY:
Yes.

SWALWELL:
By the president of the United States?

COMEY:
Well, I don't know who fired him. I know from press accounts that he was asked to leave.

SWALWELL:

Director, are you aware of Felix Sater, a former Soviet official and adviser to the Trump Organization?

COMEY:
I'm not going to comment on it.

SWALWELL:
And Director, outside of Mr. Sater's relationship with the Trump Organization, are you aware that the FBI knew of Mr. Sater because of a $40 million stock fraud case that was prosecuted by the federal government?

COMEY:
Same answer.

SWALWELL:
Director, would a U.S. person having multiple trademarks in addition to the other relationships that I just described be a red flag for a counterintelligence investigation if those trademarks were in Russia?

COMEY:
Multiple trademarks?

SWALWELL:
Yeah, registering trademarks in a foreign adversary's country.

COMEY:
I don't know what to make of that.

SWALWELL:
OK. Were you aware that Donald Trump had six trademarks in Russia?

COMEY:
Not going to comment on that.

SWALWELL:
Were you aware that Donald Trump tried to market his Trump Vodka brand in Russia?

COMEY:
Same answer.

SWALWELL:
Were you aware that Donald Trump ran Ms. Universe 2013 out of Moscow?

COMEY:

Same answer.

SWALWELL:
Are you aware that Donald Trump Jr. said on a number of occasions that Russian money is pouring into the Trump Organization and that there is a disproportionate cross-section of the company's revenue coming from Russian money?

COMEY:
Same answer, Mr. Swalwell.

SWALWELL:
So hypothetically speaking though, would a foreign adversary and its oligarchs having a disproportionate cross-section of a company's revenue coming from that country, would that be a red flag for a counterintelligence agent?

COMEY:
I'm not -- I'm trying to be helpful, but I'm not going to answer that hypo...

SWALWELL:
I understand. Thank you, Director. Director, are you familiar with a 2004 home purchase by President Trump in Palm Beach County for about $40 million?

COMEY:
Not going to comment on that.

SWALWELL:
Are you familiar with a 2008 sale of that same property for 129 percent increase at about $98 million?

COMEY:
Same answer.

SWALWELL:
Are you aware that the buyer in 2008 was a Russian businessman?

COMEY:
Same answer.

SWALWELL:
And under the earlier hypothetical, would a foreign adversary's oligarch purchasing a home in the United States for 129 percent more than the home was purchased four years before. Would that be a tool that a foreign adversary would use to try and recruit, develop or bring somebody onto their side?

COMEY:
Same answer as before.

SWALWELL:
You said that it's likely or somebody should assume they're being surveilled when they were in Russia. Would you assume that Donald Trump was being surveilled in 2013 when he was in Moscow?

COMEY:
I'm not gonna answer. I -- I was trying to confine my answer to prominent people should assume, not you know, students and all those people who might go there for a brief holiday, I don't think I'd ask them to assume that.

SWALWELL:
Right. Would it be safe to say that if Donald Trump was doing something he shouldn't have been doing while he was in Russia, the Russians probably saw it?

COMEY:
Same answer as before.

SWALWELL:
Would it be safe to assume that if a prominent person was doing something they shouldn't have been doing while they're in Russia, the Russians probably saw it?

COMEY:
Yeah, I would stick to what I said before about prominent people should assume.

SWALWELL:
Mr. Director, was Donald Trump under investigation during the campaign?

COMEY:
Same answer as before. I'm not gonna answer that.

SWALWELL:
Is he under investigation now?

COMEY:
I'm not gonna answer that. Please don't over interpret what I've said as -- as the chair and ranking know, we have briefed him in great detail on the subjects of the investigation and what we're doing, but I'm not gonna answer about anybody in this forum.

SWALWELL:

Director, from our perspective on the committee, the dots continue to connect. President Trump, his team, people in his orbit, to Russia. And the questions that we have, it's quite simple. Are these merely 100 different coincidences or is this a convergence where you're seeing deep personal, political and financial ties, meeting Russia's interference in our campaign?

So I'm wondering, Director, with your extensive counterintelligence expertise and in view of the Russian intelligence campaign to influence the election in which Donald Trump was candidate, do you consider this -- these number of connections between well-connected Russians and Donald Trump, the Trump Organization, the Trump family and the Trump campaign, to be a coincidence or a convergence?

COMEY:
I'm not gonna answer, Mr. Swalwell.

SWALWELL:
From your perspective, Director, have you ever seen in the history of American politics or at least since you've been alive, any political candidate have this many connections, personal, political and financial, to a foreign adversary?

COMEY:
Same answer.

SWALWELL:
Mr. Director and Admiral Rogers, this past election, our country was attacked. We were attacked by Russia. It was electronic. It was nearly invisible. Thanks to the hard work of the men and women who serve in our intelligence community, we know that the attack came from Russian. It was ordered by Vladimir Putin. He sought to help Donald Trump and to take down Hillary Clinton. The most disturbing finding for me and my fellow committee members is that Russia intends to do this again.

And I see this as an opportunity for everyone on this committee, Republicans and Democrats, to not look in the rearview window but to look forward and do everything we can to make sure that our country never again allows a foreign adversary to attack us. Because I think, Director, you and Admiral Rogers would agree that it's not only Russia that is sharpening the knives to go back at us or to go at our allies. It's also other countries who have similar capabilities. And so, I think the best thing we can do now is unite around this investigation, have also a parallel, independent commission to make sure we get to the bottom of what happened, why we were so vulnerable and to assure the American people we'll never let this happen again.

And I yield back.

NUNES:
Dr. Wenstrup?

WENSTRUP:
Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

If I can, gentlemen, go back to what we were talking about a little bit before with interference from the Russians possibly in through our media. Have Russians or Soviets historically attempted to spread this information through the U.S. media? As (ph) you -- you mentioned they've been there in over decades trying to interfere, they use media as a resource.

ROGERS:
We see them use media writ large as a resource to disseminate disinformation, false information.

WENSTRUP:
And is that -- been pretty much regardless of who's in the White House?

ROGERS:
It doesn't seem to tie to a particular political party, that tactic, if you will.

WENSTRUP:
Thank you.

Mr. Comey, have you ever formed -- this is going back to the article from February 14 in the New York Times, have you ever formed an articulated opinion about the article from February 14 in the New York Times?

COMEY:
Have I ever formed and articulated opinion?

WENSTRUP:
Formed an opinion or articulated an opinion on that article?

COMEY:
I don't want to say, Dr. Wenstrup.

WENSTRUP:
OK. Thank you. When I look at your jobs and thank you for being there and doing your jobs. And I mean that sincerely, your job, you -- you observe and you investigate and you assess and you try to predict and you sometimes have to act, would that be correct?

COMEY:
Sure.

WENSTRUP:
In what you do. My question is, as far as predictions and actions, Hillary Clinton won the 2016 election for the United States presidency. Which certainly most had predicted, I would conject (ph) that even the Russians predicted that she would win. What -- what were the Russians planning for November 9 and beyond that had she won. You mentioned before, and the reason I ask that -- you mentioned before you said they'll be back.

My question is have they left? Because I -- I would contend they haven't left. This isn't something they their turning on and off. This is a constant. So any -- any idea what -- what may have happened November 9 and beyond that had she won?

COMEY:
Hard to say.

WENSTRUP:
The pattern has been to interrupt us regardless of who is in the White House.

COMEY:
Yes. They want to mess with us and in a continuing and general way. It's hard to answer the counterfactual. I assume they would've continued their efforts to undermine President-Elect (sic) Clinton as they had begun doing during the summer, especially with European allies to create a divide there and probably lots of other things. What I meant by they'll be back is, they're not going away. But in the -- in the -- I mean that that in the sense of their next opportunity to mess with our election is two years from now and in four years. That's what I meant by back.

WENSTRUP:
Thank you. I think your job is -- is difficult because there's a lot of conjecture about any relationship with Russians in general and questions from me and others about, can I meet with the Russian ambassador? Does that get me investigated? Business ties here and there, you know, I mean currently we share a space station with Russians. We buy engines from the Russians for -- for our rockets and in the '90s we had joint military exercises with the Russians. It gets a little bit tough as -- for you guys decide what and -- and when do we investigate and I appreciate you taking the time with us today.

And I yield back.

NUNES:
Gentleman yields back.

Mr. Stewart?

STEWART:
Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And to the witnesses, thank you both. You know, I'm impressed. I was a B-1 pilot, when I took off one of the first certain (ph) thoughts I had was how long is it going to be until I get to go to bathroom? You guys went almost 4 hours. Our plan was to keep you here until you are in such pain that you would just answer all of our questions.

(LAUGHTER)

I have a list of questions here but I want to divert a little bit and -- and follow up on some of things that have been said here today. Mr. Comey, you confirmed that there's an investigation in the Trump campaign officials. The fact that there is an open investigation does not indicate guilt though, does it?

COMEY:
Certainly not.

STEWART:
And in fact many times in an investigation may find that there is no wrongdoing.

COMEY:
That's one of the reasons we don't talk about it, so we don't smear people who don't end up charged with anything.

STEWART:
I appreciate that and I would say that is especially likely to have, when I say especially talking about have the finding of no wrongdoing when there is a political motive. And if there's one thing that we've seen here today, I think, from some of the line of questions is clearly been a certain political motive in some of the questions that have been asked to you.

Mr. Clapper, the former DNI, and we all know who he is, this is someone who should know. I want to read what he said just a few weeks ago. Mr. Clapper then went on to say that to his knowledge there was no evidence of collusion between members of the Trump campaign and the Russians. We did not conclude any evidence in our report and when I say "our report," that is the NSA, FBI, and CIA with my office, the director of national intelligence said anything -- any reflection of collusion between the members of Trump campaign and the Russians, there was no evidence of that in our report.

Was Mr. Clapper wrong when he said that?

COMEY:
I think he's right about characterizing the report which you all have read.

STEWART:
Well, I want you to know I agree with Mr. Clapper. And at this point, everyone on this dais should agree with Mr. Clapper because we in the committee have seen no evidence, zero, that would indicate that there was collusion or criminal wrongdoing between any members of the previous administration or campaign and Russian officials.

And I'm going to comment very quickly on the leaks. You've said very clearly that it is a crime, both of you have said that, you've indicated it endangers national security which I certainly agree with. It makes it hard for us to reauthorize very important tools that we will need in order to protect our national security and many times, it's inaccurate.

And I would ask you then if someone in intelligence community has some concerns, if they feel like there's been an overreach or the government is doing something they shouldn't be doing, any government official, is there a process they can go to where they could make that known and express their concerns?

COMEY:
Yes. All of us, the intelligence community have robust whistleblower provisions that we educate our folks on and part of the whistleblower track is they can bring information to the appropriate committee of Congress.

STEWART:
That's exactly right and are both of your agencies capable of handling accusations agree with me on that. I'd like to shift quickly if I could to the integrity of the report which the previous DNI when he determined along with your acquiescence, I might add, both of you, that Russia developed a clear preference for Mr. Trump and this is a huge deal. I mean, think about this story the American people have been told and some believe that our president was elected maybe because of the influence of a foreign government.

And I love you guys, you know that, and I defend you and we respect what you do but I do need to make this point and that is the intelligence community is not perfect, is it?

COMEY:
Not perfect?

STEWART:
Yes.

COMEY:
Certainly not.

STEWART:
Certainly not. We...

COMEY:
I can speak for me, I don't -- he might be perfect.

(LAUGHTER)

STEWART:
Mr. Rogers, I'll allow you to answer the same question.

ROGERS:
I am not -- same as the Director.

STEWART:
And as has been indicated here, and look again, that's not a criticism, it's just the human endeavor. We sometimes make mistakes as do agencies sometimes make mistakes and all of us can think of examples of that including meaningful mistakes, by the way. Mistakes that had clear implications for our policy. And as has been indicated here as well, there's a difference in the level of confidence.

Now, Mr. Comey, you have a higher degree of confidence in this report than you do, don't you Mr. Rogers?

ROGERS:
To be specific, a different level of content on one specific assessment or judgment...

STEWART:
Understanding (ph)...

ROGERS:
But a concurrent overall, in that judgment.

STEWART:
But that one judgment, that one is in a very important part of this report. And if I could make just this last point and this is an important point, I think. And that is the difficulty of determining motive. I mean, we can go back, we can look at facts. We can look at what happened. We can often determine who did it, who they did it with, when they did it. But to determine motive, you've got to crawl inside someone's head. And that's much, much more difficult.

And in fact, quoting from the preamble in this report, talking about a leader's intentions. It says, this objective is difficult to achieve when seeking to understand complex issues in which foreign actors go to extraordinary lengths to hide and obfuscate their activities. Once again, we're trying to determine motive, which is very different -- difficult. Do you agree with that? The determining motive is one of the most difficult challenges when it comes to an intelligence analysis?

COMEY:
I -- I do Mr. Stewart. And I should -- I should emphasize something that Admiral Rogers said earlier, we made no judgment on whether the Russians were successful in any way and having an impact on the election, I just wanna be clear. That -- that's not in report because we didn't opine on it. We didn't -- that's not within our -- our...

STEWART:
I understand that, but we're looking at Russian activities. And we're making a conclusion of why they did that. In this case, that they preferred one -- one candidate over the other. I was in Moscow last August. I came home and I did some media interviews and talked to some folks. And I said, they're gonna mess with our elections. And that wasn't based on any intelligence analyst or specific information, this was just based on history, we knew that they would. And I was always asked, well, who do they want to win?

And I said then, I don't think they care. I don't think they A, could believe they could determine who would win and others (ph), as we've said here a number of times, they just want to break down the foundation, they just want to break the trust in our institutions. They want to take away that faith we have in our electoral process. And by the way, the intelligence community agreed with us, with me, on that analysis. For a long, long time, up until December. And then suddenly, they didn't.

And was when the president asked for this report and he asked for it to be concluded very quickly and then the analysis changed entirely. And -- and it went from no, no, no, they don't really care to no, no, they want Mr. Trump to win. And I think there's another plausible explanation, which is what I want to talk about in the few minutes that I have remaining. Let me begin by asking you, do you think that the Russians expected Secretary Clinton to win the election?

COMEY:
Yes, as of August certainly, August, September.

STEWART:
OK.

Mr. Rogers?

ROGERS:
Yes.

STEWART:
OK. Well, look, Mr. Comey you indicated as of August, September, do you believe they ever came to a conclusion that you know what? Mr. Trump's going to win.

COMEY:
No, our -- the assessment of the intelligence community was that early on, they thought he might have a shot. And so they wanted to mess with our election, hurt our country in general, that's always the baseline. They hated her, Secretary Clinton, wanted to harm her and thought they might have a chance to help Mr. Trump. And then later, concluded that Mr. Trump was hopeless and they would focus then on just trying to undermine Secretary Clinton, especially with the European allies.

STEWART:
Got that, so up -- up until summer and through the fall, they believe that Secretary Clinton would win, is that true?

COMEY:
I think the assessment was, late in the summer, they concluded based on the polling I think a lot of people were reading, that Mr. Trump didn't have a chance. And they shifted to just focusing on just trying to undermine her.

STEWART:
And I tell you, if you were to tell me and I know you didn't but I'm just saying, if anyone were to tell me that they concluded Mr. Trump is going to win. I'd just say they're nuts, because there was no one in the world who thought that. Every media organization, every political organization, every government organization that I'm familiar with last fall thought that Secretary Clinton would be the next President of the United States.

COMEY:
I think the Russians agreed.

STEWART:
I -- absolutely they did agree. Then this is the point and this is such a fine line, but it's such an important point, and that is how can you know for certain if the Russians were motivated by hurting the person they thought in fact, fully expected was going to be the next President of the United States and comparing that with a mode (ph) of this kind of a Hail Mary pass. You know what, maybe this guy's got a shot. Let's try and help him get elected because those motives would be -- and that's -- that' again coming back to my original point, determining motives is very difficult.

You have to either have very direct information or you have to be able to get inside someone's head and really figure out what it is that's driving them. And knowing the Russians expected Secretary Clinton to win, would you see that some of those things that they've done would be consistent with undermining her presidency, not necessarily because they thought Mr. Trump was going to win and they wanted help.

COMEY:

Again, I think it's too close related sides of the same coin. I mean, to put it in a homely metaphor, I hate the New England Patriots and no matter who they play, I'd like them to lose. And so I'm at the same time rooting against the Patriots and hoping their opponent beats them. Because only two teams on the field but what the intelligence community concluded was early on, the hatred for Mrs. Clinton was -- was all the way along.

When Mr. Trump became the nominee, there was some sense that it'd be great if he could win, be great if we could help him. But we need to hurt her to matter what and then it shifted to he has no chance so let's just focus on undermining her. That was the judgment of the intelligence community.

ROGERS:
Well, I'd also if I could highlight, I acknowledge the challenge at times about trying to understand intent, but the level -- we're not going to go in any specifics in an open unclassified forum. But the level of sourcing, the multiple sources we had, which were able to independently corroborate the judgment. And there's a reason why we were high confidence in everything, except just one issue.

STEWART:
Yeah.

ROGERS:
To include the intent.

STEWART:
I understand. I spent some time out at the CIA last week. I went -- was with the staff as best we could, through the 2000 some odd pages and by the way, not many people did. And some people are casting, you know, aspirations (ph) and not making the effort to go out there and actually look at that.

But I'm telling you that having done that, I think a reasonable person could say what I've said here today, that there is another -- another element to this. That there is another, as you said Mr. Comey, another side of the coin. And this is a very, very difficult to, in my opinion, thing to say with high levels of confidence. Which is why, once again the intelligence community isn't perfect sometimes. And we do make mistakes.

And Mr. Chairman, I yield back. I'd like to come back for just a few minutes if we could after.

NUNES:
Gentleman yields back.

Mr. Schiff's recognized.

SCHIFF:

Thank you. Just a couple of quick follow up questions by myself and Mr. Himes and then we'll go to Mr. Castro.

Director, you were asked about the Director Clapper's comments and I think your response indicated that they were correct as far as the unclassified intelligence assessment goes.

COMEY:
Yes. I understood the question to be about the report itself.

SCHIFF:
I want to make it clear to people though the intelligence assessment -- the unclassified intelligence assessment doesn't discuss the issue of U.S. person coordination with the Russians. And I assume that's because at the time of the report in January of this year that was under an investigation that you have now disclosed, is that right?

COMEY:
Correct. The counterintelligence investigation is the FBI's business. The IC report was about what the intelligence community had about what Russia had done. So there is nothing in the report about coordination writing like that. It's a separate responsibly the FBI to try and understand that, investigate it and -- and assess it.

SCHIFF:
So we shouldn't read Mr. Clapper's comments as suggesting that he takes a different view of whether you had sufficient -- sufficiently credible information and evidence to initiate a FBI counterintelligence investigation.

COMEY:
I don't know exactly what he meant. All I can say is what -- what the fact is which as we just laid out. There's the report and then there's our investigation.

SCHIFF:
And the report doesn't cover the investigation?

COMEY:
Correct.

SCHIFF:
Mr. Himes?

HIMES:
Thank you, Mr. Schiff.

Gentlemen, in my original questions to you, I asked you whether the intelligence community had undertaken any sort of study to determine whether Russian interference had had any influence on the electoral process and I think you told me the answer was -- was no.

COMEY:
Correct.

ROGERS:
Correct, we said the U.S. intelligence community does not do analysis or reporting on the U.S. political process or U.S. public opinion, that is not our...

(CROSSTALK)

HIMES:
OK. So thanks to the modern technology that's in front of me right here, I've got a tweet from the president an hour ago, saying the NSA and FBI tell Congress that Russia did not influence the electoral process so that's not quite accurate, that tweet?

COMEY:
I'm sorry, I haven't been following anybody on Twitter while I've been sitting here...

HIMES:
I can read it to you. It says the NSA and FBI tell Congress that Russia did not influence electoral -- the electoral process. This tweet has gone out to millions of Americans, 16.1 million to be exact. Is the tweet, as I read it to you, the NSA and FBI tell Congress that Russia did not influence the electoral process. Is that accurate?

COMEY:
Well, it's hard for me to react to that, let me just tell you what we understand the -- the state of what we've said is. We've offered no opinion, have no view, have no information on potential impact because it's never something that we looked at.

HIMES:
OK. So it's not too far of a logical leap to conclude that your -- that the assertion that you have told the Congress that there was no influence on the electoral process is not quite right?

COMEY:
Right, it wasn't -- it certainly wasn't our intention to say that today because we don't have any information on that subject. And that's not something that was looked at.

HIMES:
Right.

Admiral Rogers, before I -- before I yield back to the ranking member, there's another tweet that says NSA Director Rogers tells Congress unmasking individuals endangers national security. My understanding was, as a member of the committee, that there is a lengthy and very specific process for the unmasking but that it does not inherently in of itself endanger national security.

ROGERS:
I assume the comment is designed to address the leaking of such information, but again, I -- I have not read what you're saying to me so I'm not in a position to comment on it, sir.

HIMES:
Thank you, I'll yield back to the ranking member.

SCHIFF:
Mr. Castro?

CASTRO:
Thank you. And thank you gentlemen for your service to the nation and for your testimony today. I wanna take a moment to turn the Christopher Steele dossier, which was first mentioned in the media just before the election and published in full by media outlets in January. My focus today is to explore how many claims within Steele's dossier are looking more and more likely, as though they are accurate. First, let me ask you, can you describe who Christopher Steele is?

COMEY:
No, I'm not gonna comment on that.

CASTRO:
Are you investigating the claims made in the dossier?

COMEY:
I'm not gonna comment on that, Mr. Castro.

CASTRO:
OK. Well, the reputation of the author, Christopher Steele is a former accomplished British intelligence officer with a career built on following Russia is important. This is not someone who doesn't know how to run a source and not someone without contacts. The allegations it raises about President Trump's campaign aids connections to Russians, when overlaid with known established facts and timelines from the 2016 campaign are very revealing. So let's begin.

In general, as my colleagues have discussed before, is it true that a large number of oligarchs and wealthy businessman in Russia have profited from their continuing close relationships or cooperation with the Kremlin?

ROGERS:
Can you say that one more time sir...

CASTRO:
Sure.

ROGERS:
I want to make sure I understand.

CASTRO:
Have oligarchs and wealthy folks in Russia profited from their connection to the Kremlin?

ROGERS:
Yes.

CASTRO:
And, there are no free lunches in Russia. If you get wealthy under Putin, it's because you support Putin and are expected to support him. Is that fair to say?

ROGERS:
I would assume there's a perception of his banage (ph), but I would assume it also varies by the specifics and the particular...

CASTRO:
Sure.

ROGERS:
... individual and relationship we're talking about.

CASTRO:
OK. But Putin never distrusts, he verifies, right? As a former KGB man, he wants to keep tabs on his wealthiest citizens, especially those that could ever pose a challenge to him. Is that right?

ROGERS:
I assume he maintains knowledge of the situation around him to include particular centers of influence within Russia.

CASTRO:
Thank you. So, is it likely that the Kremlin would accept or actively trade favors or other valuable or sensitive information, intelligence from foreign figures about Russian oligarch or wealthy businessmen living abroad?

ROGERS:
Is it possible? Yes, but again, it depends on the particulars of the situation. I don't know that I would make a flat statement...

CASTRO:
But it's certainly a possibility.

ROGERS:
It's a possibility.

CASTRO:
OK. Well, the dossier definitely seems right on these points. A quid pro quo relationship seems to exist between the Trump campaign and Putin's Russia.

A July 19, 2016 entry for example asserts that Russians were receiving intel from Trump's team on Russian oligarch and their families in the United States. An entry from June 20, 2016 states quote, "Trump and his inner circle have accepted regular flow of intelligence from the Kremlin, including on his democratic and other political rivals," which is something for something.

A July 30 entry likewise states that a source close to the Trump campaign confirms a regular exchange with the Kremlin has existed for at least eight years, including intelligence being fed back to Russia on oligarch activities in the United States. Is it generally true that Moscow actively seeks and supports, whether through the oligarch, overt Russian officials or undeclared intelligence officers, sympathetic or cooperative foreign figures abroad, whether through business dealings or political backing or a combination of the two.

COMEY:
(OFF-MIKE)

ROGERS:
Generally, it's a tactic we have seen over time, but again, I would caution us -- we're talking about very specific cases theoretically here and I'm not prepared to get into any of the specifics.

CASTRO:
And I know that my colleagues have touched upon this, but I think it's important in the context of Christopher Steele's dossier to bring it up again. So, my question is, is it likely or plausible that the Russians might seek out Americans for Moscow's purposes.

COMEY:
It is one of the focuses of our counterintelligence mission to try to understand the ways in which they try to do that, that's at the core of their intelligence gathering, is trying to coop recruits -- Americans -- to give them information.

CASTRO:
So, the dossier states in an entry dated August 10, 2016, that a quote "Kremlin official involved in U.S. relations" suggested that Moscow might offer assistance to quote "sympathetic U.S. actors." Does this sound like a plausible tactic out of the Russian playbook?

COMEY:
I'm not going to comment on that, Mr. Castro.

CASTRO:
OK. Now, let's get even more specific. Among the U.S. actors, this Kremlin official mentions a Carter Page and Michael Flynn, whom my colleagues have already discussed at length and which the dossier describes as quote "examples of successes by the Kremlin official."

We know that Carter Page went to Moscow on July 7 to give a speech to the new economic school. We're in possession of the slide deck from his speech there. And we know Carter Page obtained approval from the Trump camp from Trump campaign manager at the time, Corey Lewandowski, as reported in Politico, citing national security campaign official, J.D. Gordon.

CASTRO:

Now, let me ask you another question with respect to somebody else. Is it correct that Igor Sechin, the president of Russian oil giant, Rosneft, is a former member of Russian intelligence and a long-time aide and confident of Vladimir Putin.

COMEY:
Not going to answer that, Mr. Castro.

CASTRO:
In an October 18, 2016, entry, the dossier states that, during Page's visit to Moscow, he met with Igor Senchin, offering, quote,"Page and Trump's associate, the brokerage of up to 19 percent stake in Rosneft," which Page conferring (ph) that, quote, "If Trump were elected U.S. President, sanctions on Russia would be lifted."

And although fortunately the White House hasn't been so naive as to (inaudible) unilaterally lift sanctions on Russia, it was widely reported that on January 27th of this year, Rosneft sold a 19.5 percent stake in Rosneft in what Reuters calls, quote,"one of its biggest privatizations since the 1990s." Furthermore, Reuters reported that, quote, "Public records show the ownership structure of the -- of the stake ultimately includes a Cayman Islands company whose beneficial owners cannot be traced." What a coincidence.

Is this the subject of your investigation? One of the subjects of your investigation?

COMEY:
Same answer.

CASTRO:
OK.

COMEY:
Meaning -- meaning I'm not going to comment.

CASTRO:
I understand.

So, let's move to WikiLeaks for a moment, who played such a prominent role in the 2016 election. As has established before and reestablished at this hearing, WikiLeaks was at a minimum an unwitting pawn and, at a maximum, an active co-conspirator of the Kremlin's in publishing stolen DNC and senior Democratic officials' e-mails. And so you agree this was done in order to offer Moscow some measure of separation as to mask its hand in having hacked and stolen the data in the first place, but so it could still have it publicly posted to inflict damage on the Clinton campaign?

COMEY:
Yes, I think that's fair.

ROGERS:
Yes.

CASTRO:
OK. An entry from July 19, 2016, in the dossier states that a Trump associate knew that the Kremlin was using WikiLeaks in order to maintain quote, "plausible deniability of its involvement." Three days after this entry, WikiLeaks carries out the Kremlin's wishes and publishes upwards of 20,000 stolen DNC e-mails, and 8,000 associated e-mail attachments, and the rest, as they say, is history.

Another entry dated August 17th has Carter Page and a Russian associate discussing WikiLeaks publishing e-mails in order to swing Sanders' supporters away from Clinton and to Trump. And again, from a September 14th entry in the dossier, quote, "Kremlin has further compromising material on Clinton in form of e-mails and considers disseminating after parliamentary elections in late September." And on October 7th, WikiLeaks publishes John Podesta's hacked e-mails. So the coincidences keep piling up.

Let's turn, in the few minutes that I have remaining, again to Paul Manafort, as a follow-up to Mr. Himes' questioning. Suffice it to say, Paul Manafort was a major part of the Trump campaign, including serving as its chairman, convention manager, and chief strategist, before departing the campaign in disgrace in August 2016. It's also established the fact that Paul Manafort was a long-time official adviser to pro-Russian Ukrainian political leadership.

Is Paul Manafort -- Manafort a subject in your investigation?

COMEY:
I'm not going to comment on that.

CASTRO:
All right. Director, can you describe to the American people the Russian concept of kompromat?

COMEY:
It's a technique that they use to gather information on people that may be embarrassing or humiliating, and using it to coerce cooperation.

CASTRO:
In your career, have you known instances where that has been successfully leveraged?

COMEY:
Yes, I believe our counter-intelligence division has encountered it a number of times.

CASTRO:
Does that include private places, including places such as hotels that are wired for audio and video?

COMEY:
I don't think I remember enough about the particulars to say, but in theory, sure.

CASTRO:
Thank you.

I yield back. I yield back to Ranking Member Schiff.

SCHIFF:
I recognize Mr. Heck.

HECK:
Admiral Rogers, before I get into my main body in my remarks, I want to go back to your earlier comment about that there is no evidence to indicate that there was a successful Russian hacking of voter results or tabulations. What I did not hear you say is whether or not there had been any attempts to hack into election systems of any kind.

ROGERS:
Yes.

COMEY:
I can answer that because the FBI's responsibility's in the United States. We saw no indication of that. We saw efforts to penetrate voter registration databases, state Boards of Elections, at that level. We saw no efforts aimed at the vote itself.

HECK:
But you did see efforts to penetrate registration roles?

COMEY:
Correct.

HECK:
Did you see efforts to penetrate any other portions of election systems, other than registrations? In this country it's a highly-decentralized system and, as a consequence, you will recall, then-Secretary of Homeland Security, Jeh Johnson, indicated that election systems should become a part of our critical infrastructure for cybersecurity purposes.

COMEY:
Their efforts were aimed at the voter registration systems in various states, and it takes different forms in various states. Sometimes there's a private vendor, sometimes it's state. But it -- that's where it was focused, and not on the -- the vote itself, vote machines, vote tabulation, vote transmission, that we've seen.

HECK:
Thank you. I yield back to the Ranking Member (inaudible).

SCHIFF:
Time's -- time's expired, but let me go quickly to Mr. Turner.

TURNER:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

There's been a lot of statements that have been made up here that is opposed to questions. And we don't certainly feel the need to clarify all of them, but there is one aspect that does need to be clarified because it's also involved both of your testimonies.

There's been discussion up here concerning the statements by James Clapper and, rather than do the conjecture as it has been made, I'm going to just read it. Chuck Todd said, "Let me ask you this. Does intelligence exist that can definitively answer the following question whether there were improper contacts between the Trump campaign and Russian officials?" James Clapper said, "We did not include any evidence in our report.

I say 'our,' that's NSA, FBI, and CIA, with my office and the Director of National Intelligence, that had anything, that had any reflection of collusion between members of the Trump campaign and the Russians. There was no evidence of that included in our report." Chuck Todd followed up. "I understand that, but does it exist?" James Clapper answered, "Not to my knowledge." So the text is not merely related to the report.

I yield back.

NUNES:
Mr. Crawford's recognized.

CRAWFORD:
Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, gentlemen, for being here today. I'll start with Director Comey. Despite your expressed disdain for the New England Patriots, I think that Tom Brady would probably like to express his gratitude for the FBI's assistance in recovering his stolen Super Bowl jersey, so I'll do that on his behalf now.

COMEY:
Thank you. By the way, I -- if I'm honest with myself, the reason I don't like the Patriots is they represent sustained excellence and, as a Giants' fan, that drives me crazy.

CRAWFORD:
Director Comey, are you familiar with an article, July 18, 2016, from The Washington Post entitled "Trump Campaign Guts GOP's Anti-Russia Stance on Ukraine"?

COMEY:
I'm not familiar with that article. I don't -- I don't remember it.

CRAWFORD:
I'd ask (you) now to consent to add this to the record, just for your edification, Director. There's an allegation contained in that article that at a National Security Committee platform meeting Trump staffers wrote an amendment to an amendment that stripped out platform's call -- call for providing, quote,"Lethal defensive weapons," and replace it with softer language, calling for, quote, "Appropriate assistance."

Are you familiar with a March 18, 2017, story in the Washington Examiner entitled "How Pundits Got Key Parts of the Trump Russia Story All Wrong"? Are you familiar with that?

COMEY:
I don't think I am.

CRAWFORD:
I'd ask you now to consent to add that to the record, and also for your edification I'll go to some of the -- the meat of that story. There -- are you aware of an allegation that Trump staffers gutted the Ukraine plank of the platform?

COMEY:
Am I aware of the article on that?

CRAWFORD:
Are you aware of any -- anything of that nature, the article or any -- any activity that -- that (inaudible)?

COMEY:
Do you want to talk about anything -- I'm willing to comment on whether I've seen different things in the media. I don't want to talk about anything beyond that.

CRAWFORD:
OK. So, then, say you're not aware of the final platform that retained all of the language from the original platform, plus the portion of the amendment offered by the platform committee member?

COMEY:
I don't want to comment.

CRAWFORD:
OK. Then I'll go through -- I know that you're limited on what you comment on. I'll go through some of the -- some of the -- as I said, the meat of this. Reading from the platform, it says, quote, "We will meet the return of Russian belligerence with the same resolve that led to the collapse of the Soviet Union. We will not accept any territorial change in Eastern Europe imposed by force in Ukraine or elsewhere, and we'll use all appropriate measures to bring to justice the practitioners of aggression and assassination," end quote.

Does that sound to you as a -- like a pro-Russian or a pro-Putin statement, in your assessment?

COMEY:
That's not for me to comment on.

CRAWFORD:
OK. Further, in the platform it says quote "We support maintaining and if warranted increasing sanctions together with our allies against Russia and less and until Ukraine's sovereignty and territorial integrity are fully restored. We also support providing appropriate assistance to the Armed Forces of Ukraine and greater coordination with NATO defense planning." And again, that sounds like fairly clear language in their relationship to Russia.

Would you agree?

COMEY:
Same answer Mr. Crawford.

CRAWFORD:
OK, thank you.

The final language I'll get to here in just a second -- there was -- there was an amendment but the final language regarding that plank of a platform with regard to national security relating to Russia. It says "we support maintaining and if warranted, increasing sanctions together with our allies against Russia and less and until Ukraine's sovereignty and territorial integrity are fully restored. We also support providing appropriate assistance to the Armed Forces of Ukraine and greater coordination with NATO defense planning."

And again, that -- to me that sounds fairly clear and straightforward that that is not conducive to a Putin administration. Would you agree?

COMEY:
Give you the same answer, Mr. Crawford.

CRAWFORD:
Thank you, sir.

It's also important to note that that platform was adopted in coordination with and in concert with the Trump administration as they met at the convention and they went through the platform process. The Trump campaign agreed to the platform condemning Kremlin belligerence, calling for continued and perhaps increased sanctions against Russia as I indicated in the text of that platform. For the full restoration of Ukrainian territory, for refusing to accept quote "any territorial change in Eastern Europe imposed by force, Ukraine or elsewhere and pledging to aid Ukraine's armed forces."

So I -- I bring that up just to -- just to highlight and note the fact that none of that appears to be pro-Putin or pro-Russian language.

NUNES:
Mr. Crawford, will you yield that to me?

CRAWFORD:
Yes.

NUNES:
So, Mr. Comey, I just want to make sure -- I know you're not going to comment on this, but I hope that you'll take this back to your investigators because there seems to be the -- the line out there that somehow the Republican Party watered down it's platform. And that's not true. That didn't happen, and in fact, what happened is -- is that the platform was actually increased. Increased its certainty against what the Russians were up to and it actually amended the platform to make it stronger than what it initially was.

So, you know, I know there's a lot of circumstantial evidence out there about all these supposed people that knew -- that knew the Russians, but the reality is and remains the case, Republican Party had a very strong platform that was against the Russians and it was increased in its -- its strength not decreased like has been reported. So I know that you won't comment, but I hope that at least you will -- we'll provide this to your investigative team so that we can at least get this off the table. Will you -- will you take this back?

COMEY:
Sure.

NUNES:
OK, we'll give it to you.

Sorry, Mr. Crawford. We'll go back.

CRAWFORD:
Not at all. Thank you, Mr. Comey, I appreciate that.

Admiral Rogers, would you like to make a comment about the New England Patriots before I move forward?

ROGERS:
I'm a Chicago Bears guy, born and (inaudible).

CRAWFORD:
Admiral, our employees -- you mentioned this before but I just want to go through this list. Are employees of intelligence community -- intelligence community agencies required to disclose visits with foreign nationals?

ROGERS:
Yes, broadly, although I'd be the first to admit not all foreign international interactions are the same. Interactions with the British, for example, are in a very different place than other countries for example.

CRAWFORD:
OK, appreciate that clarification. To your knowledge, are elected officials required to disclose contact with foreign nationals?

ROGERS:
I don't know what the specifics are across the federal government because clearly in many jobs, that's part -- interaction with foreign counterparts is part of your job. I'm the first to acknowledge that. I interact with foreign counterparts as does Director Comey, regularly, in the course of our duties.

CRAWFORD:
Are federal campaign employees required to disclose contacts with foreign nationals to your knowledge?

ROGERS:
I apologize, I just don't know.

CRAWFORD:
OK. Are private citizens required in any way to disclose or to report contact with foreign nationals? That you know of?

ROGERS:
I don't know.

CRAWFORD:
Is it customary for transition teams for a presidential campaign -- for transition team members to meet with foreign nationals to your knowledge? Is that customary?

ROGERS:
It's an area I just don't have any knowledge.

CRAWFORD:
Is that unusual?

ROGERS:
I don't have any -- I don't have any knowledge on it.

CRAWFORD:
Has it happened before?

ROGERS:
I've never been part of a transition team. I don't know.

CRAWFORD:
Are transition team members required by law to disclose contacts with foreign nationals?

ROGERS:
I apologize, I don't know the law there.

CRAWFORD:
Thank you.

I yield back to the Chairman.

NUNES:
Thank you Mr. Crawford.

Ms. Stefanik's recognized.

STEFANIK:
Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Director Comey and Admiral Rogers for your testimony today. My first set of questions are directed at Director Comey. Broadly, when the FBI has any open counter-intelligence investigation, what are the typical protocols or procedures for notifying the DNI, the White House, and senior Congressional leadership?

COMEY:
There is a practice of a quarterly briefing on sensitive cases to the chair and ranking of the House and Senate Intelligence Committees. And the reason I hesitate is, thanks to feedback we've gotten, we're trying to make it better. And that involves a briefing of the Department of Justice, I believe the DNI, and the -- some portion of the National Security Council at the White House...

STEFANIK:
So if that's quarterly...

COMEY:
... to brief them before Congress is briefed.

STEFANIK:
So it's quarterly for all three then, senior congressional leadership, the White House, and the DNI?

COMEY:
I think that's right. Now that's by practice not by rule or by written policy which is why, thanks to the chair and ranking giving us feedback, we're trying to tweak it in certain ways.

STEFANIK:
So since, in your opening statement, you confirmed that there is a counter-intelligence investigation currently open and you also referenced that it started in July. When did you notify the DNI, the White House, or senior congressional leadership?

COMEY:
It's a good question. Congressional leadership, some time recently. They were briefed on the nature of the investigation in some detail as I said. Obviously the Department of Justice has been aware of it all along. The DNI, I don't know what the DNI's knowledge of it was because we didn't have a DNI until Mr. Coats took office and I briefed him his first morning in office.

STEFANIK:
So just to drill down on this, if -- if the open investigation began in July and the briefing of congressional leadership only occurred recently, why was there no notification prior to the recent -- to the past month?

COMEY:
I think our decision was it was a matter of such sensitivity that we wouldn't include it in the quarterly briefings.

STEFANIK:
So when you state our decision is that your decision? Is that usually your decision what gets briefed in those quarterly updates?

COMEY:
No, it's usually the decision of the head of our counter- intelligence division.

STEFANIK:
And just again, to get the detailed -- on the record, why was the decision made not to brief senior congressional leadership until recently when the investigation had been open since July? A very serious investigation -- why was that decision to wait months?

COMEY:
Because of the sensitivity of the matter.

STEFANIK:
Stepping back more broadly, in the case of Russia, we know that cyber hacking is just one tactic that's typically part of a broader influence or information warfare campaign and we know the Russian government is ready and willing to employee hacking as but one of many tools in their toolkit to obtain information for use against the United States. Is there any evidence that Russia tried to hack other entities associated with the 2016 presidential campaign in addition to the DNC or the Clinton campaign operatives?

COMEY:
Yes, many others.

STEFANIK:
Can you specify those others? Did that include the RNC? Did that include any of the other campaigns of candidates in the primaries, either Democrats or Republicans?

COMEY:
I think what we can say in an unclassified setting is what we have in the report that there were efforts to penetrate organizations associated with the Republican party and that -- I think that is what we said in the report. And that there were not releases of material taken -- hacked from any Republican associated organizations.

STEFANIK:
But the hacking -- the use of cyber tools as part of their broader, whether you call it hybrid warfare or information warfare campaigns, it was done to both parties.

COMEY:
Correct.

STEFANIK:

Thank you. Taking a further step back of what's been in the news recently, and I'm referring to the Yahoo! hack, the Yahoo! data breech, last week the Department of Justice announced that it was charging hackers with ties to the FSB in the 2014 Yahoo! data breech. Was this hack done to your knowledge for intelligence purposes?

COMEY:
I can't say in this forum.

STEFANIK:
Press reporting indicates that Yahoo! hacked targeted journalists, dissidence and government officials. Do you know what the FSB did with the information they obtained?

COMEY:
Same answer.

STEFANIK:
OK, I understand that. How -- how did the administration determine who to sanction as part of the election hacking? How -- how familiar with that decision process and how is that determination made?

COMEY:
I don't know. I'm not familiar with the decision process. The FBI is a factual input but I don't recall and I don't have any personal knowledge of how the decisions are made about who to sanction.

STEFANIK:
Looking forward -- and this is for both of you -- what is the NSA and the FBI doing to keep Americans safe, to keep campaign entities -- to keep any entity associated with a major campaign, save from aggressive Russia cyber measures that were utilized in this past election?

ROGERS:
So, we continue to maximize the insights. We're generating about an activity -- for example, this started with the NSA initially gaining access, in the summer of '15, we became aware of that activity, shared it with our FBI teammates. That continues, we try to make sure that the insights we generate our shared with our law enforcement teammates, who then re-interact with the private sector.

We're trying to work broadly across the U.S. government to increase cybersecurity, as you heard discussed -- on-going discussions about what's the role of the voting infrastructure in the United States, in terms of critical infrastructure. Do we need to bring that within the critical infrastructure framework? I know that topic has been ongoing for some period of time.

STEFANIK:
Director Comey?

COMEY:

Yeah, I think that's right and just making sure that we are sharing information when we get it that someone's being hit, but more importantly we're showing people what we've learned from this cycle, so they can tighten up.

STEFANIK:
Thank you. It seems to me in my first line of questioning, the more serious a counterintelligence investigation is. That would seem to trigger a need to update not just the White House, the DNI, but also Senior Congressional Leadership. And you stated, it was due to the severity. I think moving forward, it seems that the most severe and serious investigations should be notified to the Senior Congressional Leadership.

And with that, thanks for the lenience, Chairman, I yield back.

(CROSSTALK)

COMEY:
That's good feedback, Ms. Stefanik. The challenge for us is sometimes we want to keep it tight within the executive branch, and if we're going to go brief congressional leaders, the practice has been, then we brief inside the executive branch. And so, we have to figure out how to navigate that in a good way.

NUNES:
We may have to update the law on that. Gentlelady (ph) yields back.

Mr. Schiff is recognized for 15 minutes and I think -- then we'll come back to our side for 15 and that should be it.

SCHIFF:
Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Just a couple of questions before I hand it back to Mr. Heck.

Do the Russians favor the United States provision of lethal, defensive weapons to Ukraine, Admiral?

ROGERS:
No.

SCHIFF:
They would strongly oppose such an idea, would they not?

ROGERS:
They've been opposed to it to date.

SCHIFF:
And I can tell you that the idea of providing lethal defensive weapons to Ukraine has bipartisan support here on the Hill, including Senator McCain, certainly myself, I would imagine many members of this committee.

There was an effort at the convention to strengthen the platform by including a provision that would provide lethal defensive weapons to Ukraine. That was defeated. The campaign manager for the Trump campaign at the time, Paul Manafort, denied the campaign was involved in defeating that amendment. But the delegate who offered the amendment later disclosed to the press that in fact it was dropped at the insistence of the Trump campaign.

J.D. Gordon, a national security adviser for the Trump campaign was forced later to admit that in fact, he had weighed in against the amendment that would have provided that the U.S. should give lethal defensive weapons to Ukraine.

So, I would join my chairman in asking you to look into this, particularly since we know that Ambassador Kislyak attended the convention and if there was any communication between the Russians and the Trump campaign, that had the effect any coordination that resulted in the defeat of an amendment that was against Russian interests, the committee would certainly like to know and we welcome that inquiry.

Mr. Heck?

HECK:
Thank you, Ranking Member.

There a lot of emotions kicking around in this room today. I perceive anger and outrage and subdued somberness, one I feel overwhelmingly is sadness. We've heard nothing but terribly disturbing evidence of what has happened to our country at the hands of arguably our greatest advisory.

And what's worse, the evidence we've heard so far all seems -- all seems to lead to the conclusion that they help from the inside. That this was, in part, an inside job from U.S. persons -- willing American accomplices or terribly naive ones, or probably both -- who helped the Russians attack our country and our democracy.

We're both still at the early stages of our investigation. We're not indicting anyone, merely laying out some of the evidence and the facts, dirty though they be, sleazy though they be. And no matter what, we can safely conclude at this point that never in the modern era has a President and his Administration had so many foreign entanglements.

Entanglements that continue to push American foreign policy away from its core roots -- beliefs, interests and alliances towards unprecedented positions that only Putin himself could approve of. How else can we explain the modification to the Republican Party platform in such a decidedly pro-Russian way.

Republicans who are always so strong against geopolitical foes like Russia, I know my colleagues on this committee take the Russia threat very seriously. Why wouldn't the people who inhabit the White House? How else can we explain an Administration that beats up our oldest allies, like Australia and Britain, and our strongest and most sacrosanct alliance, like NATO, but never, ever say a bad word about Putin. In fact, they say a lot of good words about Putin.

An administration that we have heard decisively makes up baseless wiretapping charges against a former United States President, equates our intelligence agencies to Nazi Germany, and argues moral equivalents between a repressive, authoritarian states with an abhorrent human rights record like Russia in our free and open democracy. And yet, this Administration never, ever utters any criticism of Russia.

Let's be clear though. This is not about party. It's not about relitigating the election. It's not as if anything we do here will put a President from a different political party in the Oval Office. So, I hope that it's clear that it's about something much more important. And no, it's not about political motivation, to my friend who said and suggested that earlier, this is about patriotism, about something way more important than party.

This is about country and the very heart of what this country is built on, which is open, free, fair, trusted elections. We don't take our investigation lightly and I know you don't. Indeed, you go through a process to even decide to do that, whether to extend the resources, to begin with credible allegations and reason to believe that there's something that warrants it. And I no doubt believe you've talked to lawyers in and out of the prosecution divisions about whether or not this warrants an investigation. I know you don't take this lightly.

What we have seen is damning evidence today of what Russia did. We've also seen damning evidence of how they did it. Russia has a history of using active measures, many of which we have heard about today. Let's recap them, we're getting near the end.

Hacking and dumping information to damage or embarrass their enemies. We heard about this, of course, with respect to WikiLeaks and Guccifer 2.0. Using third-party and cutouts, business people, oligarchs (ph) and other ostensibly private individuals to cultivate relationships.

We've discussed Ambassador Sergey Kislyak, CEO Igor Sechin, and of course, Vladimir Putin himself. We're also heard about Russia's use of companies like (inaudible), the Bank of Cyprus, (inaudible) and a confusing web of offshore shell companies used it would seem to hide or to launder money.

We've also heard how Russia released disinformation to spread rumors and confused the public and to sow distrust and the ability to even know truth objectively, using propaganda, media outlets, whether they're owned directly by Russia or not, to release such disinformation in order to claim plausible deniability of Russia's hands.

Here again, we see WikiLeaks and Guccifer 2.0, but we also see the use of propaganda outlets like RT. And of course, the use of U.S. persons of influence. Whether through active collision or coordination or naive acquiescence, we don't yet know the full extent to further Russia's attempts to undermine our elections and ultimately, weaken our democracy.

HECK:
On that last point, we've heard about quite a few individuals in the Trump orbit who feel somewhere on that spectrum from mere naivete, disturbing enough if this naivete is a feature of those who are supposed to be running our country and foreign policy, to unwitting Russian dupes, to willing blindness, to active coordination. This rogues galleries includes those already fired -- Roger Stone, adviser to Donald Trump; Paul Manafort, adviser to Donald Trump; Michael Flynn, national security adviser to Donald Trump; Carter Page, adviser to Donald Trump.

But the cloud of deep suspicion in Russian entanglements extends to those still in power. Rex Tillerson, Secretary of State to Donald Trump; Michael Caputo, adviser to Donald Trump; Jeff Sessions, Attorney General for Donald Trump; and members of the Trump family itself.

This matters. It's serious. Our battleships weren't sunk and our towers didn't collapse a la 2011 (sic). But make no mistake, 2016 is a year that we should mark on our calendars, and it's still going on. The attack didn't end on Election Day. And it will continue as you have suggested unless we, all of us in this room, stop it.

Admiral Rogers, you've proudly worn that uniform your entire career. I am proud of your service and grateful for it. But I would ask you, sir, not even with respect to this specific investigation, to use your own words as someone who no doubt has been in theater, who's lost brothers and sisters in combat, to explain to me, but more importantly to the American people -- don't assume they know the answer. Tell them in your words why we should care about Russia's active measures campaign aimed as destabilizing our democracy and that of our allies. In your words, sir, why should they care?

ROGERS:
I don't think it's best interests of our nation for any external entity to attempt to manipulate outcomes, to shape choices. That should be the inherent role of a democracy.

The investigation we're going through I think is a positive in the sense it will help illuminate to all of us, regardless of party, what are the implications here and what does it mean for us. Because I think our conclusion and that of the intelligence community broadly here is, this absent some change, this behavior is not likely to stop. Absent some change in the dynamic, this is not likely to be the last time we'll be having these discussions about that kind of activity. I don't think that's in anybody's best interest for us as a nation.

HECK:
Director Comey, parallel question. Again, in general terms, not with respect to the specific investigation you have revealed here today, not asking you to go into specifics on any individuals, but please, explain briefly to me, and more importantly to the American public, why we should care about Russia's use of U.S. persons of Americans helping Russia destabilize our democracy.

COMEY:
Well, like Admiral Rogers, I truly believe we are shining city on a hill, to quote a great American. And one of the things we radiate to the world is the importance of our wonderful, often messy, but free and fair Democratic system and the elections that undergird (ph) it. And so when there's something by a foreign nation state to mess with that, to destroy that, to corrupt that, it's very, very serious, threatens what is America.

And if any Americans are part of that effort, it's a very serious matter. And so you would expect the FBI to want to understand, is that so? And if so, who did what? But again, I want to be very careful to people who over0interpret my words, to preserve our ability to answer those questions, we're not talking about our work.

I'm not here voluntarily. Right? I would rather not be talking about this at all. But we thought it was important to share at least that much with the committee and the American people, and now we're going to close our mouths to do our work to see if we can answer those questions, because the answers matter.

HECK:
They do indeed. I thank you both for those answers. And I thank you both for your service to our country. I would like to think that we can turn this from a sad event into a positive one. This country has stood up and fought on behalf of its own health and welfare and that of its citizens and met any number of challenges throughout our nation's history. The worst thing we could do is underestimate the nature of this challenge before us today.

HECK:
With that, ranking member, I would appreciate it if I could yield to my friend from Texas, Mr. Castro, briefly.

SCHIFF:
Mr. Castro.

CASTRO:
I thank you. One more question with respect to Lee (ph) because I know that's been a big topic of the line of questioning and of course is a concern to all of us. Regardless of political party. But I want to ask you director, is it possible that some of those leaks could come from not the intelligence community, but from members of the White House staff for example?

COMEY:

Sure it could come from lots of different places. And it's often one of the things that is challenging as I said about a leak investigation. You think it's going to be a small circle, but it turns out a lot of people either knew about it, or heard echoes of it and it's stories to tell to journalists about it. So in my experience trying to figure these things out for decades, it's often coming from places you didn't anticipate.

CASTRO:
No and the reason I asked the question is because the President has berated the FBI and the intelligence community on the issue of leaks. And others have berated the intelligence community in the press because of these leaks. But I think it's worth considering that it's quite possible that there are folks who have a kind of political Munchausen by proxy syndrome, where they leak information because they want to be the savior once it blows up. You know they're all sorts of individual's that serve on political staff and I think that we ought to consider the possibility that perhaps it is somebody at the White House.

Thank you. I yield back.

NUNES:
(inaudible). The gentleman yields back.

The gentleman yields back to Mr. Hurd.

HURD:
Thank you, Chairman.

And gentlemen, thank you all for being here. And thank you for your continued service to your country. I've learned recently the value of sitting in one place for a long period of time and listening and today I'm has added to that understanding and I'm going to try to ask questions that y'all can answer in this format and are within your areas of expertise.

And Director Rogers, my first question to you -- the exploit that was used by the Russian's to penetrate the DNC, was it sophisticated? Was it a zero day exploit? A zero day being some type of -- for those that are watching, an exploit that has never been used before?

ROGERS:
In an open unclassified forum, I am not going to talk about Russian tactics, techniques or procedures about how they executed their hacks.

HURD:
If members of the DNC had not -- let me rephrase this, can we talk about spear fishing?

ROGERS:
Sure, in general terms, yes sir.

HURD:
Spear fishing is when somebody sends an email and they -- somebody clicks on something in that email...

ROGERS:

Right, the user of things (inaudible) they're receiving an email either of interest or from a legitimate user, they open it up and they'll often click if you will on a link -- an attachment.

HURD:
Was that type of tactic used in the...

ROGERS:
Again, I'm not in an unclassified forum just not going to be...

HURD:
Copy, I apologize. Director Comey, when was the first time the FBI notified the DNC of the hack? Roughly.

COMEY:
I think august of 2015.

HURD:
And was that prior to information being leaked to -- being sent on -- put on WikiLeaks?

COMEY:
Yes the -- the first Russian directed releases where middle of June of the next year by D.C. leaks and this Guccifer 2.0 persona and then that was followed by Wikileaks. So about a year. A little less than a year really.

HURD:
So there was about a year between the FBI's first notification of some potential problems with the DNC network and then that information getting on -- getting on Wikileaks.

COMEY:
Yes, sir.

HURD:
Have you been able to -- when did the DNC provide access for -- to the FBI for your technical folks to review what happened?

COMEY:
Well we never got direct access to the machines themselves. The DNC in the spring of 2016 hired a firm that ultimately shared with us their forensics from their review of the system.

HURD:
Director Rogers, did the NSA ever get access to the DNC hardware?

ROGERS:
The NSA didn't ask for access. That's not in our job...

HURD:
Good copy. So director FBI notified the DNC early, before any information was put on Wikileaks and when -- you have still been -- never been given access to any of the technical or the physical machines that were -- that were hacked by the Russians.

COMEY:
That's correct although we got the forensics from the pros that they hired which -- again, best practice is always to get access to the machines themselves, but this -- my folks tell me was an appropriate substitute.

HURD:
The -- at what point did the company and the DNC use -- share that forensic information to you?

COMEY:
I don't remember for sure. I think June. I could be wrong about that.

ROGERS:
The company went public in June of 16, with their conclusions. I would assume it was around that time.

COMEY:
I think it was about the time -- I think it was a little bit before the announcement, but I'll say approximately June.

HURD:
So -- so that was -- how long after the first notification of -- that the FBI did of the DNC?

COMEY:
Ten months.

HURD:
Ten months? So the FBI notified the DNC of the hack and it was not until 10 months later that you had any details about what was actually going on forensically on their network?

COMEY:
That's correct, assuming I have the dates about right. But it was -- it was some months later.

HURD:
Knowing what we know now, would the FBI have done anything different in trying to notify the DNC of what happened?

COMEY:
Oh Sure.

HURD:
What -- what -- what measures would you have done differently?

COMEY:
We'd have set up a much larger flare. Yeah we'd have just kept banging and banging on the door, knowing what I know now. We made extensive efforts to notify, we'd have -- I might have walked over there myself, knowing what I know now. But I think the efforts we made, that are agents made were reasonable at the time.

HURD:
Good copy. And do you have a ball park of the number of private sector entities that you have to notify of these types of breaches?

COMEY:
Hundreds and thousands. In this particular case we had to notify hundreds, I think maybe more than 1,000 entities that the Russians were hitting at the same time.

HURD:
Admiral Rogers, do you have anything to add to that?

ROGERS:
No, because as we pass the information to the FBI, what started all this was a pretty massive effort on the part of our Russian counterparts.

HURD:
I've said this many times. The outcome of grizzly staff (ph), what the intelligence community as the Russian hacking, has been the wedge, whether real or perceived between the executive branch, the intelligence community and the public.

And this is an asymmetrical tool, that the Russians are using to destabilize liberal democratic institutions. And I think it is important that we do everything we can to review this, which I fully believe federal law enforcement, is doing as y'all have talked to here. And I would like to end before yielding back to the chairman, that my colleague from California, the Ranking Member said in his opening statement, the question that most people have is whether we can really conduct this investigation, in the kind of thorough nonpartisan manner that the seriousness of the issues merit, or whether the enormous political consequences of our work will make that impossible.

And he adds, the truth is, I don't know the answer. I do. We must. The American people demand this. The future of our democratic institutions demand it and I'm glad we have two people like y'all involved in this. Mr. Chairman I yield back my time to you.

NUNES:
Gentleman yields back.

And Mr. Gowdy's got a follow up.

GOWDY:
Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And Mr. Chairman I want to thank you and Ranking Member Schiff for having this. Here Mr. Chairman you were talking about Russia far before it became -- long before it became fashionable to talk about Russia. If memory serves me correctly, you referred to Russia as possibly our greatest national security threat post 9/11. And as you know Chairman I come from a state with a fellow name Graham, who is also no fan of Russia.

So Director Comey, Admiral Rogers, people in your line of work are incredibly respected both your current line of work and the work that you came from and people in my line of work are not and there's a reason. The justice system is respected and the political process is not. So this is -- while this hearings important. What's really important is what you do after this hearing.

GOWDY:
And I want you to go find every single witness who may have information about interference, influence, motive, our response, collusion, coordination, whatever your jurisdiction is, wherever the facts may take you, though the heavens may fall, go do your jobs because nature abhors a vacuum. And right now you can't answer most of the questions, either by policy, by law, or because the investigation has not been complete. Therefore, a vacuum exists which people in my line of work are more than happy to fill. So I need you to fill. I need you to do it with all deliberate speed.

Director Comey, I think it's also important for my fellow citizens to take note of why the system that you come from, the one that I come from, is respected, and this system that I'm in now is not.

What is hearsay?

COMEY:
Information you don't know of your own personal knowledge but learn from someone else.

GOWDY:
It's an out of court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

COMEY:
I was trying to be a little less lawyerly.

GOWDY:
All right. Well, we'll go with your answer. And it is almost never admissible in court. How about anonymous sources? When you were in the southern district could you ever call on an anonymous source to testify in one of your proceedings?

COMEY:
No.

GOWDY:
You couldn't even use hearsay, unless there was some widely accepted exception. It would never -- a newspaper article would never, ever be admitted as evidence in a courtroom. So the system we respect would laugh you out of court if you came in armed with a newspaper article. But in the political process, that's enough.

Let me ask you this. Cross examination. Why are you able to cross examine witnesses in trial? Why do we have a right to confront witnesses?

COMEY:
Well, it's embedded in our Constitution, and the reason it makes great sense is, it's the crucible out of which you get truth.

GOWDY:
It is the single best way to elucidate the truth -- to test and to probe and to challenge, and to test someone's personal exposure to the facts. Cross examination's the best tool that we have. How do you cross examine an anonymous source? How do you cross examine hearsay? I hope that you go find every single witness that you need to talk to, and examine every single document.

People are counting on you two and your line of work to find the facts. And people are welcome to draw whatever conclusions they want from the facts. But when I hear the word evidence, as I've heard lots and lots this morning, let me ask you this, Director Comey, did you ever -- are you familiar with any trials where one witness may have said the light was red and one witness may have said the light was green?

Has that ever happened?

COMEY:
Yes, that's why you have a trial.

GOWDY:
Does it ever happen where one bank teller said the assailant was 5'10" and one said the assailant was 6'2"?

COMEY:
Sure.

GOWDY:
So that's evidence. You've got evidence he's 6'2" and evidence he's 5'11", he just can't be both. The light can't be red and green. So the word evidence, while fancy and legal, the reality is you find facts and then the finder of the fact can draw conclusions and inferences from those facts.

So I wish you luck as you begin this process. It is all important. The fact that someone may have had a line of questions about leaks does not mean that they're not interested in all aspects of Russia. And vice versa, the fact that they may not have asked questions about leaks doesn't mean they're not interested in them.

You have jurisdiction over all of it. So, God bless you as you go on this journey for the facts. And then people can draw whatever conclusions they want. I hope that you will fill (ph) the vacuum that is created when you all are not able to answer questions.

With that, I will yield back to the chairman.

NUNES:
The gentleman yields back.

Mr. Comey, this is my final list of questions here. I just want to make sure we get this on the record. Do you have any evidence that any current Trump White House or administration official coordinated with the Russian intelligence services?

COMEY:
Not a question I can answer.

NUNES:
I figured you were going to say that, but I just wanted to make sure we got it on the record. How about counselor to the president, Kellyanne Conway?

COMEY:
It's the same answer. And as I said earlier, I constantly want to ask people, don't over interpret the fact that I say I can't comment. I'm not going to comment on anybody.

NUNES:
Well, I think -- I understand that. But here's the challenge. Is that you've announced that you have this big investigation, but now you've got people that are involved in our government that are -- the Secretary of State, for example -- these are important players. And the longer this hangs out here, the bigger the cloud is.

And I know that you're not going to tell me whether or not you have any evidence, but I can tell you that we don't have any evidence. And we're conducting our own investigation here, and if you have some -- if you have evidence I'd -- especially as it relates to people in the White House that are working in the White House or the administration, I mean, that would be something that we really should know about and we should know about quickly.

And so if you can't give it to the entire committee, I hope you can at least give it myself and Mr. Schiff because you know, there is a big gray cloud that you have put over people who have very important work to do to lead this country. And so the faster you can get to the bottom of this, it's going to be better for all Americans.

COMEY:
I understand. Thank you.

NUNES:
All right. With that, I want to thank the members today and especially our witnesses. It was a long day, but I think a good discussion.

Attorney General Jeff Sessions Delivers Remarks on Efforts to Combat Violent Crime in St. Louis

St. Louis, MO,.
United States ~

Friday, March 31, 2017

Good morning, everyone. Thank you, Carrie [Costantin, Acting U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of Missouri], for the kind introduction. It's also good to have with us your outstanding new attorney general in Missouri, Josh Hawley and your new secretary of state, Jay Ashcroft.

I want to welcome the many law enforcement leaders from the St. Louis area who have joined us today. Thank you for everything you and your people do to protect your communities I look forward to meeting with you.

All of us who work in law enforcement want to keep people safe. Plain and simple. That is the heart of our jobs; it is what drives us every day. For many of you and your staffs, you take the extra step of putting your lives on line with every traffic stop, search warrant, and arrest. We are all disturbed to learn that violent crime is on the rise in American cities. We are even more discouraged to learn that this is happening amid an unprecedented epidemic of heroin and opioid abuse. In some places, like here in St. Louis, these two crises are closely connected.

That is what I want to talk about with you today.

First, we should remember some context. In the past four decades, our nation has won great victories against crime. Overall, crime rates remain near historic lows. Murder rates are half of what they were in 1980. We have driven the violent crime rate down to almost half of what it was at its peak. The good people of St. Louis have seen this progress firsthand: In 2013, the violent crime rate here was less than half of what it was at its highest point 20 years before.

But today, we see warning signs that this progress is now at risk.

The latest FBI data tell us that from 2014 to 2015, the violent crime rate in the U.S. increased by more than 3 percent - the largest one-year increase since 1991. The murder rate increased 10 percent - the largest increase since 1968.

If this was just a one-year spike, we might not worry too much. But the preliminary data for the first half of 2016 confirmed these trends. The number of violent crimes was more than 5 percent higher than the same period in 2015. The number of murders was also up 5 percent.

What's happening in St. Louis mirrors this trend. In 2015, violent crime here rose more than 8 percent, and the murder rate was the highest in two decades - almost 19 percent higher than the year before, and an astounding 67 percent higher than just three years before. And the preliminary data for 2016 show that violent crime continues to rise in St. Louis.

These numbers should trouble all of us. Behind all the data are real people whose safety and lives are at stake - like the good people whose stories I will hear later today. Each victim of this recent spike in violent crime is someone's parent, child or friend. And every loss of a life to guns or drugs is a tragedy we must work to prevent.

My fear is that this surge in violent crime in St. Louis, and throughout America, is not a “blip,” but the start of a dangerous new trend. This increase risks losing the hard-won gains that have made our country a safer and more prosperous place; gains that were made on the backs of the brave men and women in uniform.

While we can hope for the best, hope is not a strategy. When crime rates move in the wrong direction, they can move fast.

We know this, because some of us have lived it. In the early 1960s, crime rates began to rise in our country. By 1973, crime rates in almost every category had doubled over their levels just a decade before. As the '70s went on, levels of crime and violence that we once deemed unacceptably high became the “new normal” in America.

I lived through that dark time in our history. I dealt with its consequences every day as a prosecutor.

And I can assure you: We do not want to go back to those days. We must act decisively at all levels - federal, state and local - to reverse this rise in violent crime and ensure public safety.

Last month, President Trump gave us clear direction. He issued three executive orders directing the federal government to reduce crime and restore public safety. This is a high priority for him. This task is also a top priority of the Department of Justice, and we are excited and energized to tackle it. I'd like to talk briefly about how we are doing that.

First, we're making sure the federal government focuses our resources and efforts on this surge in violent crime.

Last month, I announced the formation of a Department of Justice Task Force on Crime Reduction and Public Safety. It includes crime reduction experts from throughout our Department, including the heads of the FBI, ATF, DEA and the U.S. Marshals Service.

The task force is evaluating everything we are doing at the federal level. It has a variety of subcommittees that are already hard at work. I have asked for their initial recommendations by July 27th, but I will continue to act on their recommendations as they become available.

Second: We need to use every lawful tool we have to get the most violent offenders off our streets.

Earlier this month, I sent a memo to all our federal prosecutors, urging them to work closely with their federal, state, and local law enforcement partners to target the most violent offenders in their districts. There are not that many people capable of murder. The more of them we put in jail, the fewer murders we will have.

It is only through collaborative efforts between federal, state and local law enforcement that we can effectively identify and remove the most dangerous criminals from the streets. The U.S. attorney's office here has given us a great example of this type of partnership. Over the past two years, Carrie and the team have doubled the number of federal prosecutions of gun cases.

Working together, we will determine which venue - federal or state - would best be suited to remove these criminals from our communities, and ensure they are held fully accountable for their crimes.

While the job of a prosecutor is to enforce the law, we also recognize that prevention efforts and re-entry programs for offenders play a key part in an effective strategy to reduce violent crime. The department's task force is also looking at how we can best support good local efforts on these fronts wherever possible.

Third: To turn back this rising tide of violent crime, we need to confront America's heroin and opioid crisis - and dismantle the transnational cartels that bring drugs and violence into our neighborhoods.

Our nation is in the throes of an epidemic of heroin and opioid abuse. According to the CDC, heroin-related overdose deaths have more than quadrupled since 2010. On average, about 140 Americans now die each day from a drug overdose. That means every three weeks, we lose as many American lives to overdoses as we lost in the 9/11 attacks.

Unfortunately, the people of St. Louis know this problem all too well. Last year, 256 people in this city died from an opioid overdose. That is almost double the total from the previous year - and more than the number of murders during that time.

What makes this crisis an epidemic is that it knows no zip code. Its victims are white and black and brown; they are in the city, the suburbs and the country; and they are rich, poor and everything in between.

And the victims aren't just addicts and users. Here in St. Louis and in other American cities, transnational drug cartels are working with street gangs to traffic heroin that is both cheaper and stronger than ever. As the market for this heroin expands, these gangs fight for territory and new customers - and innocent people are caught in the crossfire.

Those people include Clara Walker, a grandmother of eight who lived here in St. Louis. A little over three years ago, just after Christmas, she was in her home when she heard gunfire. She thought it was coming from a T.V. show. But outside her house, a gang enforcer was shooting to protect his gang's drug-dealing turf. Two of the bullets hit Mrs. Walker and killed her.

We know that drugs and crime go together. One factor in the fall of murder rates was a decline in drug use. To save lives and stop the new wave of violence connected with this heroin epidemic, we must fight the scourge of drugs in our country.

There are three main ways to do this: criminal enforcement, treatment programs and prevention.

We need criminal enforcement to stop the transnational cartels that smuggle drugs across our borders, and the thugs and gangs who use violence and extortion to move their product.

One of the President's executive orders directed the Justice Department to dismantle these organizations - and we will do just that.

Treatment programs are also vital. But treatment often comes too late to save people from addiction or death - especially with powerful drugs like heroin.

Let me share an example. Last month, the St. Louis newspaper ran a story on the heroin crisis here. It featured a young woman named Ashley. She has used heroin off and on for a decade - even though it has meant losing her three children to state custody. Ashley told the reporter that she wished she had never started using. She said: "I just wanted to try it." She called that decision, quote: the "dumbest thing ever."

If our nation was sending a stronger message never to use drugs, how different might Ashley's life be - or the lives of so many others like her? What if someone had told them that "trying it" just once is all it takes to start down the road of addiction?

My point is that while enforcement and treatment programs are crucial, they aren't enough. We need to focus on the third way we can fight drug use: preventing people like Ashley from ever trying drugs in the first place.

Educating people and telling them the terrible truth about drugs and addiction can result in better choices. We can reduce the use of drugs, save lives, and turn back the surge in crime that inevitably follows in the wake of increased drug abuse. It will not be easy; there is no quick cure, and this effort will take years. But we can and will do it.

Finally: The federal government alone cannot meet the challenge of violent crime and drugs - so we need to protect and support our brave men and women in state, local and tribal law enforcement. About 85 percent of all law enforcement officers in our nation are state and local. These are the men and women on the front lines.

Unfortunately, in recent years law enforcement as a whole has been unfairly maligned and blamed for the unacceptable deeds of a few bad actors. Amid this intense public scrutiny and criticism, morale has gone down, while the number of police officers killed in the line of duty has gone up.

This issue is especially sensitive here in the St. Louis area, after the events that took place in Ferguson nearly three years ago. Since then, Ferguson has become an emblem of the tense relationship between law enforcement and the communities we serve, especially minority communities.

We all have a lot of work to do to improve this situation - both law enforcement leaders and community leaders. And we must improve it; this is critical. St. Louis and its suburbs are one community, and they are in this together. Certainly, we must continue to address police misconduct. And we must improve it; this is critical. St. Louis and its suburbs are one community, and they are in this together.

But we also can't lose sight of two things. First, the vast majority of men and women in law enforcement are good people, who have chosen to do tremendously hard and dangerous jobs because they want to protect us all. Also, it is proactive, up-close policing - when officers get out of their squad cars and interact with everyone on their beat - that builds trust, prevents violent crime and saves lives.

Unfortunately, many law enforcement leaders say this kind of policing has become more difficult in an age of viral videos and targeted killings of police. In some cities, arrests have fallen even as murder rates have surged.

This is a terrible place to be, because you and I know that tough and professional law enforcement can make a real difference. It can reduce crime and save lives. We have seen it happen in our country over the past four decades.

To turn back rising crime, we must rely heavily on all of you in state and local law enforcement to lead the way - and you must be confident in our steadfast support. This Department of Justice will use our money, research, and expertise to help you figure out what is happening and determine the best ways to fight crime. We will strengthen partnerships between federal, state and local officers. We will encourage the proactive policing that keeps our neighborhoods safe. And we will have the back of all honest and honorable law enforcement officers and prosecutors.

The recent surge in violent crime is real. The epidemic of heroin and opioid abuse is also real. We can't wish these problems away, or hope that things will get better on their own. Instead, we must act to ensure justice and safety for all Americans.

Fortunately, we know what we need to do. We must enforce our laws and remove dangerous criminals from the street. We must fight the scourge of drug abuse. And we must support the brave men and women of law enforcement, as they work day and night to protect us.

In this great task, I am proud to call each of you partners. Thank you for having me here in St. Louis today. I look forward to talking with you all and learning from you.

Dear

The three of you may (or may not) recall that the Director was kind enough to host a group of Atlanta CEO's, including me, at FBI offices last year.

The idea of this upcoming symposium at the Newseum on April 12 was one that I suggested.

Nobody has been at the center of press attention more than the Director.

Would you route this through proper FBI channels to see if he would like to attend as my guest. He would NOT need to participate unless he wished to answer a question.

This probably is the last thing on the planet he wants to do because "the press" can at times be most critical.

However, I was so impressed by the integrity, honesty, openness, and overall character of Director Comey that I think he might want to attend this---to be on the other side in the audience rather than in a hot seat on stage.

Sincerely,

THE GLOBAL POLITICO

Did Obama Blow It on the Russian Hacking?

Top White House aide Lisa Monaco is one of the few officials to go on the record about how the Obama team handled the hacks.

By Susan B. Glasser
| April 03, 2017

It's a question that still rankles many a Clinton loyalist: Why didn't the Obama administration do more to sound the alarm over Russia's meddling in the 2016 presidential campaign?

Few former officials have explained it, but in a new interview for The Global POLITICO, Lisa Monaco, President Obama's top homeland security and counterterrorism adviser, describes a White House afraid of "doing the Russians' work for them." By going public before the election with evidence that the Kremlin was trying to help Donald Trump , the Obama team feared it would be accused of intervening to help Hillary Clinton. So it mostly kept quiet despite intense lobbying from fellow Democrats to say more before the voting.

That decision continues to be hotly debated months later now that the FBI has acknowledged it is investigating whether Trump or his team colluded with the Russians, and Monaco's comments amount to the most extensive on-the-record description yet about the Obama White House's internal thinking as it struggled to come up with a proper response to what it would eventually characterize as "unprecedented" foreign interference in a U.S. election.

"There has been this theory we didn't do anything, which I take issue with," Monaco says in the interview, describing a decision by the administration—despite the extraordinary nature of a series of cyberattacks targeting the American political process itself—to treat the Russian intervention using the same law enforcement-focused approach it had in previous major hacks by "malicious" state actors.

The comments by Monaco, a longtime Justice Department official who rose to become Republican-appointed director Robert Mueller's chief of staff at the FBI before moving into senior roles in the Obama administration, came in a wide-ranging interview that focused on the sharp policy shifts Trump has promised on the issues she helped oversee in the Obama White House, from the war against the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria to the vetting of refugees.

Obama came into office promising to roll back what Democrats saw as the excesses of the Bush years and put in place a more sustainable approach to fighting terrorism. And Monaco, who helped lead those efforts, acknowledges that Trump may well undo much of that Obama legacy. “In this area, so much of this is by executive order, so there is no constraint,” she says. “It can go with the stroke of a pen, as we're seeing.”

But as Russiagate has ballooned into a full-scale Washington scandal engulfing the Trump White House, with congressional and law-enforcement investigations and multiple emerging new plotlines, the conversation with Monaco, a cautious former prosecutor who refused to discuss any of the underlying evidence in the unfolding Russia case and retains a tone of lawyerly discretion even when describing the policy struggles of the Obama White House, is a reminder of just how much the Russia story has come to overshadow almost everything else.

When a trove of hacked Democratic National Committee emails came out in July 2016, the Obama administration reacted as it had to past cyberattacks—despite the extraordinary political nature of the intrusion.

“We treated it very much in the way that we have done other malicious activity by cyber actors,” Monaco says, choosing to turn the case over to the FBI and intelligence agencies to figure out how and when to “attribute” the attack publicly without giving away the evidence used to reach that conclusion. “We applied the same framework that we have in other contexts, whether it was China stealing intellectual property, whether it's Iran committing denial of service attacks on our financial institutions, whether it's North Korea in the Sony attack,” Monaco says. “We applied a framework and a playbook that we have done many times.”

But strong supporters of Clinton's campaign argued—some at the time, many more in the wake of the former secretary of state's shocking November election defeat—that the Obama team should have done more to publicize the hacking for what it was: a heavy-handed Kremlin intervention on behalf of one side in America's presidential election. Monaco pushed back against that, recalling that the heads of U.S. intelligence agencies issued a joint statement publicly blaming the Russians for the pre-election hack on Oct. 7. “That was an unprecedented statement,” she says, “a fact that sometimes gets lost in this discussion” given that it came on the same day as the revelation of the “Access Hollywood” tape showing Trump joking about sexually assaulting a woman.

But Monaco confirmed in the interview that top White House officials privately objected to a strong statement from Rep. Adam Schiff and Sen. Dianne Feinstein, the two top Democrats on the congressional intelligence committees, in September that said Russia was specifically targeting the U.S. elections; they did so, she said, because the statement was “not bipartisan.”

Monaco says that's because the Obama administration was at the time focused on seeking cooperation for a last-ditch effort by the Department of Homeland Security to avoid Russian tampering in the actual voting process. But the administration, she said, faced a backlash from state and local governments who viewed the DHS cybersecurity election push as “a big federal takeover” and were reluctant to cooperate. That was the case that she, FBI Director James Comey and DHS Secretary Jeh Johnson made in a secret briefing of top members of Congress in the fall, during a session at which Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) reportedly balked at their characterization of the evidence of Russian involvement in the hack.

“Our focus was really to make sure that the election process was not undermined, because here's the thing: Whatever else was a subject of debate about motive, we knew, and everyone agreed, that one of the goals that Russia had in all of this was to undermine confidence in our democratic process, to sow discord, to sow confusion,” she says. “And so, we were very conscious that we not do their work for them by creating a partisan discussion about this. So, the Schiff and Feinstein statement, I think, one of the concerns was that it was not bipartisan.”

Why, then, I asked her a couple of times, did Comey seem to take a less than bipartisan approach in communicating publicly about the probes of Clinton's private email server, which ended with no charges, while refusing even to acknowledge the ongoing investigation of Trump's campaign and its Russia ties? Had he tarnished the ability of U.S. law-enforcement agencies to act independently?

"I think that's regrettable," Monaco says, "because I don't think Comey is a partisan actor." Justice Department investigations, she adds, "should be completely walled off from partisan political considerations and White House interference." So, "to the extent that the events over the last year have tarnished that in any way, I think that's really regrettable."

As for Trump's recent tweet charging that Obama had "wire tapped" him amid the campaign and swirling Russia allegations, Monaco had a flat "no" for an answer. Comey and others, she says, have "debunked" it and testified to the "ludicrousness of that accusation."

As Obama's top homeland security adviser, Monaco was in charge of helping to drive many of the policies President Trump has said he will reverse or re-engineer, vowing, for example, a stepped-up war on what he calls "radical Islamic terrorism" and more "extreme vetting" of people from six majority-Muslim countries subject to a temporary ban on admission to the United States in his now-contested executive order.

Monaco, who says she was nicknamed "Dr. Doom" by the former president (because every time Obama "saw me coming he knew something bad had happened"), acknowledges that while Trump can undo many of Obama's counterterrorism policies "with the stroke of a pen," she hopes that much of the rules-based framework he tried to create for fighting terrorism will nonetheless survive.

On style as well as substance, Monaco describes a White House that couldn't have been more different from its drama-heavy successor. Life in the Obama White House as she describes it working in her windowless "cave" in the West Wing was process-intensive and at times even painstakingly deliberative, with a boss who did all the homework and cared deeply about even minor details she presented him in the Situation Room. Obama, she tells me, was "a voracious consumer of written information" who made showing up at the presidential daily brief "like appearing before a tough judge every day."

Monaco acknowledges, however, that Obama did not deliver on several key campaign pledges connected with the terrorism fight, such as closing the prison in Guantanamo Bay and trying in court those accused of a role in the 9/11 plot, and she called it "tremendously troubling and heartbreaking, I suspect, for many of the families of the 9/11 victims to not have seen justice done."

While she recounted many of the administration's internal agonizing debates over whether and how to take a more active approach in trying to stop the bloody, long-running civil war in Syria, she says it was the far less scrutinized administration debate over what to do about the current conflict in Yemen that remains one of her biggest regrets. In fact, if she could have one do-over, she says, it would be the approach to that "heartbreaking" Yemen conflict, suggesting in effect the United States prioritized working with its longtime ally Saudi Arabia there at the expense of doing more to stop the "humanitarian disaster" that now is putting millions at risk of starvation.

When I asked Monaco what kept her up at night after years of briefing the president about all manner of possible horrors, she lived up to her Dr. Doom nickname, reciting the usual litany of potential terrorism threats and worries about cyberwarfare. But her big fear, she told me, is what she calls "emerging infectious disease”—the kind of terrifying new threat like Ebola or Zika that comes from nature and spreads through the globalized world in a flash.

“You don't need to have a terrorist or a criminal actor trying to do something bad with a pathogen.”

All,
For your situational awareness,

On 4/11/17, AG Sessions mandated US Attorney offices to prioritize for prosecution the improper entry (8 U.S.C. § 1325) by an alien into the US as a criminal offense. OPE assesses that this may offer an avenue for some cities and police departments to comply with DHS requirements in the immigration context and therefore, remain eligible for federal funding.

Below are the AGs remarks from April 11, 2017 in AZ.

Please see attached the AGs Memo on the Renewed Commitment to Criminal Immigration Enforcement as well as the approved Talking Points on the FBI Role in Immigration Enforcement.

ATTORNEY GENERAL JEFF SESSIONS ANNOUNCES THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE'S RENEWED COMMITMENT TO CRIMINAL IMMIGRATION ENFORCEMENT

WASHINGTON – Attorney General Jeff Sessions today spoke to Customs and Border Protection personnel at the United States-Mexico border in Nogales, Arizona.

In his remarks, the Attorney General announced that he has issued the attached memo to United States Attorneys that mandates the prioritization of criminal immigration enforcement. The memo directs federal prosecutors to focus on particular offenses that, if aggressively charged and prosecuted, can help prevent and deter illegal immigration.

Additionally, the Attorney General revealed that the Department of Justice will add 50 more immigration judges to the bench this year and 75 next year. He also highlighted the Department's plan to streamline its hiring of judges, reflecting the dire need to reduce the backlogs in our immigration courts.

Please find below the full remarks from Attorney General Sessions.

REMARKS PREPARED FOR ATTORNEY GENERAL JEFF SESSIONS

Meeting with Customs and Border Protection Personnel and Immigration Policy Announcement

NOGALES, ARIZONA

Good morning, everyone. Let me start by thanking the brave men and women of Customs and Border Protection, who not only served as our gracious hosts today, but who put themselves in harm's way each day to secure our borders and protect us.

Here, along our nation's southwest border, is ground zero in this fight. Here, under the Arizona sun, ranchers work the land to make an honest living, and law-abiding citizens seek to provide for their families.

But it is also here, along this border, that transnational gangs like MS-13 and international cartels flood our country with drugs and leave death and violence in their wake. And it is here that criminal aliens and the coyotes and the document-forgers seek to overthrow our system of lawful immigration.

Let's stop here for a minute. When we talk about MS-13 and the cartels, what do we mean? We mean criminal organizations that turn cities and suburbs into warzones, that rape and kill innocent citizens and who profit by smuggling poison and other human beings across our borders. Depravity and violence are their calling cards, including brutal machete attacks and beheadings.

It is here, on this sliver of land, where we first take our stand against this filth.

In this fight, I am here to tell you, the brave men and women of Customs and Border Protection: we hear you and we have your back. Under the President's leadership and through his Executive Orders, we will secure this border and bring the full weight of both the immigration courts and federal criminal enforcement to combat this attack on our national security and sovereignty.

The President has made this a priority — and already we are seeing the results. From January to February of this year, illegal crossings dropped by 40 percent, which was unprecedented. Then, last month, we saw a 72 percent drop compared to the month before the President was inaugurated. That's the lowest monthly figure for at least 17 years.

This is no accident. This is what happens when you have a President who understands the threat, who is not afraid to publically identify the threat and stand up to it, and who makes clear to law enforcement that the leadership of their country finally has their back. Together, we will drastically reduce the danger posed by criminal aliens, gang members and cartel henchmen.

To that end, the President and I want to do our best to arm you, and the prosecutors who partner with you, with more tools in your fight against criminal aliens. So today, I am pleased to stand here with you and announce new guidance regarding our commitment to criminal immigration enforcement. As we speak, I am issuing a document to all federal prosecutors that mandates the prioritization of such enforcement.

Starting today, federal prosecutors are now required to consider for prosecution all of the following offenses:

- The transportation or harboring of aliens. As you know too well, this is a booming business down here. No more. We are going to shut down and jail those who have been profiting off this lawlessness — people smuggling gang members across the border, helping convicted criminals re-enter this country and preying on those who don't know how dangerous the journey can be.

- Further, where an alien has unlawfully entered the country, which is a misdemeanor, that alien will now be charged with a felony if they unlawfully enter or attempt enter a second time and certain aggravating circumstances are present.

- Also, aliens that illegally re-enter the country after prior removal will be referred for felony prosecution — and a priority will be given to such offenses, especially where indicators of gang affiliation, a risk to public safety or criminal history are present.

- Fourth: where possible, prosecutors are directed to charge criminal aliens with document fraud and aggravated identity theft — the latter carrying a two-year mandatory minimum sentence.

- Finally, and perhaps most importantly: I have directed that all 94 U.S. Attorneys Offices make the prosecution of assault on a federal law enforcement officer — that's all of you — a top priority. If someone dares to assault one of our folks in the line of duty, they will do federal time for it.

To ensure that these priorities are implemented, starting today, each U.S. Attorney's Office, whether on the border or interior, will designate an Assistant United States Attorney as the Border Security Coordinator for their District. It will be this experienced prosecutor's job to coordinate the criminal immigration enforcement response for their respective offices.

For those that continue to seek improper and illegal entry into this country, be forewarned: This is a new era. This is the Trump era. The lawlessness, the abdication of the duty to enforce our immigration laws and the catch and release practices of old are over.

In that vein, I am also pleased to announce a series of reforms regarding immigration judges to reduce the significant backlogs in our immigration courts.

Pursuant to the President's executive order, we will now be detaining all adults who are apprehended at the border. To support this mission, we have already surged 25 immigration judges to detention centers along the border. I want to thank personally the judges who answered the call to help us with this new initiative.

In addition, we will put 50 more immigration judges on the bench this year and 75 next year. We can no longer afford to wait 18 to 24 months to get these new judges on the bench. So today, I have implemented a new, streamlined hiring plan. It requires just as much vetting as before, but reduces the timeline, reflecting the dire need to reduce the backlogs in our immigration courts.

With the President's Executive Orders on Border Security, Transnational Criminal Organizations and Public Safety as our guideposts, we will execute a strategy that once again secures the border; apprehends and prosecutes those criminal aliens that threaten our public safety; takes the fight to gangs like MS-13 and Los Zetas; and makes dismantlement and destruction of the cartels a top priority. We will deploy a multifaceted approach in these efforts: we are going to interdict your drugs on the way in, your money on the way out, and investigate and prosecute your trafficking networks to the fullest extent of the law.

Why are we doing this? Because it is what the duly enacted laws of the United States require. I took an oath to protect this country from all enemies, foreign and domestic. How else can we look the parents and loved ones of Kate Steinle, Grant Ronnebeck and so many others in eye and say we are doing everything possible to prevent such tragedies from ever occurring again?

Let me finish where I started, by thanking you — the brave men and women in uniform who are at the front lines of this fight. I know we ask a tremendous amount from all of you, but know this: we have your back, and will do all we can to empower you and support you in your work.

God bless you and thank you.

MEMORANDUM FOR ALL FEDERAL PROSECUTORS

FROM: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

SUBJECT: Renewed Commitment to Criminal Immigration Enforcement

Charging Practices

It is a high priority of the Department of Justice to establish lawfulness in our immigration system. While dramatic progress has been made at the border in recent months, much remains to be done. It is critical that our work focus on criminal cases that will further reduce illegality. Consistent and vigorous enforcement of key laws will disrupt organizations and deter unlawful conduct. I ask that you increase your efforts in this area making the following immigration offenses higher priorities. Further guidance and support of executing this priority—including an updated memorandum on charging for all criminal cases—will be forthcoming.

8 U.S.C. §1324 ("[b]ringing in and harboring certain aliens") and related offenses: Each District shall consider for prosecution any case involving the unlawful transportation or harboring of aliens, or any other conduct proscribed pursuant to 8 U.S.C. § 1324. If a determination must be made regarding use of finite resources, a priority should be given to those who are bringing in three or more aliens into the United States and those who are transporting or harboring three or more aliens, as well as offenses where there are aggravating circumstances, such as those involving serious bodily injury, physical or sexual assault, or the death of any person. Priority should also be given to prosecuting any offenses under section1327 ("aiding or assisting criminal aliens to enter") and section 1328 ("importation of aliens for immoral purposes").

8 U.S.C. § 1325 ("[i]mproper entry by alien"): Each District shall consider for felony prosecution under 8 U.S.C. § 1325 any case where a defendant has two or more prior misdemeanor improper entry convictions or one or more prior misdemeanor improper entry convictions with aggravating circumstances, such as a felony criminal history, gang membership or affiliation, multiple prior voluntary returns, prior removal, deportation or exclusion, or other aggravating circumstances. Each District shall also consider for felony prosecution under 8 U.S.C. § 1325 any case where a defendant knowingly enters into a marriage for the purpose of evading any provision of the immigration laws.

Regarding misdemeanor violations of 8 U.S.C. § 1325, I ask that each U.S. Attorney's Office on the Southwest Border (i.e., District of Arizona, District of New Mexico, Southern District of California, Southern District of Texas, and Western District of Texas) work with the U.S. Department of Homeland Security and any other appropriate agency to develop a set of guidelines for prosecuting such violations. These guidelines should aim to accomplish the goal of deterring first-time improper entrants. Each District should submit its guidelines to the Office of the Deputy Attorney General by April 24, 2017.

8 U.S.C. § 1326 ("[r]eentry of removed aliens"): Each District shall consider prosecution of 8 U.S.C. § 1326 for each illegal reentrant. Priority, however, must be given to defendants who have been convicted of an aggravated felony, have any prior criminal history indicating the defendant poses a danger to public safety, have one or more administrative or criminal immigration violations, gang membership or affiliation, or where other aggravating circumstances are present.

18 U.S.C. § 1028A ("[a]ggravated identity theft") & 18 U.S.C. § 1546 ("[f]raud and misuse of visas, permits, and other documents"): Each District shall consider, to the extent practicable, prosecution of both aggravated identity theft under Section 1028A and document fraud under Section 1546 in relation to the immigration offenses listed above.

18 U.S.C. § 111 ("[a]ssaulting, resisting, or impeding" officers): Each District shall consider, to the extent practicable, prosecution of assault, resisting, or impeding officers under Section 111, while they are engaging in the performance of their official duties in the administrative and criminal immigration context. More information on this will follow.

Sentencing Practices

At the sentencing phase of each federal case, prosecutors should seek, to the extent practicable, judicial orders of removal and a term of supervised release that is consistent with the factors set forth in 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a). I know many of you are already seeking these measures from District Courts, and I ask that you continue this effort to achieve the results consistent with this guidance.

Border Security Coordinators

In furtherance of these objectives, I also direct every District to designate a Border Security Coordinator ("Coordinator") by close of business on April 18, 2017. These Coordinators will be responsible for:

- overseeing the investigation and prosecution of the offenses listed above;
- attending training programs with other Coordinators regarding these offenses;
- providing legal advice and training to AUSAs regarding these offenses; and
- maintaining and routinely reporting prosecution statistics related to these offenses.

Each Coordinator will be responsible for convening meetings with representatives from the Department of Homeland Security—including Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Homeland Security Investigations, U.S. Customs and Border Protection, and United States

Citizenship and Immigration Services as well as other law enforcement partners deemed necessary to accomplish this criminal immigration enforcement effort. The Coordinator will work with this group to (1) coordinate specific immigration enforcement initiatives, emphasizing those initiatives that will have the greatest impact on public safety; (2) initiate training programs; and (3) facilitate information sharing.

FBI's Role in Immigration Enforcement

Purpose: To arm SACs with information to respond to questions about the FBI's role in immigration enforcement raised due to the Executive Order on Protecting the Nation from Foreign Terrorist Entry into the United States.

What is the FBI's role in immigration enforcement?

- The Department of Homeland Security and its components are primarily responsible for immigration enforcement.

- The FBI does not have an investigative program specifically dedicated to pursuing immigration violations, but the FBI may use immigration violations to disrupt any FBI subject who lacks legal status to be in the United States.

    - For example, the FBI has used immigration violations to disrupt suspected terrorists, violent gangsters, and human rights offenders.

Has the FBI changed its role in immigration enforcement recently?

- The FBI's role in immigration enforcement has not changed. The FBI will continue to use immigration violations, as appropriate, to disrupt subjects who pose a threat to our communities.

What does the Executive Order say about the number of FBI refugee investigations?

- The Executive Order states the FBI is currently conducting more than 300 counterterrorism investigations of people who initially entered the United States as refugees.

- The FBI opens investigations of people who entered the United States as refugees using the same standards for opening investigations of all other types of people.

How do the 300 counterterrorism investigations of people who entered the country as refugees relate to the FBI's 1,000 HVE investigations?

- Director Comey has publicly acknowledged that the FBI has around 1,000 open Homegrown Violent Extremist (HVE) investigations, which is a subset of the total number of ongoing FBI counterterrorism investigations.

- In some cases, the 300 investigations of individuals who entered the United States as refugees may overlap with the 1,000 HVE investigations if the individuals who entered as refugees have been primarily based and operating in the United States for some time.

Does the FBI maintain statistics for the number of investigations of refugees?

- The FBI does not regularly maintain statistics for the number of investigations of individuals who entered the United States as refugees because the predication for these investigations may be unrelated to the subject's entry as a refugee.

How does the Executive Order impact the FBI?

- The Executive Order tasks a number of federal agencies, including the Department of Justice, to identify potential improvements to the security vetting process for immigrants to ensure that the security vetting process is as comprehensive as possible.

- This work is not new to us. The FBI has continually worked with its partners in the federal government to make improvements to the security vetting process.

Will White House policy changes regarding immigration make us safer?

- The FBI does not participate in the immigration policymaking process, so we would refer you to the White House on this question.

Do you expect the proposed immigration policy changes to alter the FBI's relationships with the communities it serves?

- No. The FBI has no desire to alter its mutually beneficial relationships with the communities it serves.

- The better we know our communities, the better we can protect them. The Community Relations Unit at FBI Headquarters and FBI community outreach specialists in field offices across the country will continue to create and strengthen relationships locally and nationally with minority groups, religious and civic organizations, schools, non-profits, and other entities.

Will the JTTF or other FBI-led task forces be used against Muslims/minorities?

- The FBI's mission, to include that of all task force members, is to protect the American people and uphold the Constitution. This includes protecting the Muslim community as much as it does any other community in our country. Adhering strictly to the US Constitution and FBI policy, the FBI does not initiate or investigate any matter based solely on activities protected by the First Amendment, or the race, ethnicity, or religious affiliation of any individual or organization.

What is the impact of losing task force officers from FBI-led task forces?

- In the wake of 9/11, it is clear that FBI-led task forces, where multiple agencies leverage their respective resources and authorities in a collaborative environment, are a very effective means to address priority threats like violent crime and terrorism.

- We rely heavily on our relationships with our state and local law enforcement partners in the communities we serve. Our state and local partners enhance our task forces with unique skills and strong ties to our local communities. The departure of state and local partners from the task forces would significantly diminish our ability to investigate threats to our communities, be they criminal or national security in nature.

Legal Background Information (not for external dissemination):

- Historically, the FBI has possessed broad authority to investigate federal criminal violations related to immigration offenses under both Title 18 and Title 8 of the United States Code and to arrest those who commit such violations.

- In 2002, Attorney General Ashcroft expanded the FBI's immigration authority to include the investigation and arrest of aliens who have committed or are committing non-criminal, i.e. civil, violations of the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA). This grant of authority has not been rescinded.

- Even with this grant of authority, the Department of Homeland Security retains primary jurisdiction over the enforcement of immigration statutes, including both criminal and civil violations of the INA.

Director: Thank you. My mike working okay?

Speaker 2: Yeah. It's great.

Director: So thank you for the introduction. Thanks for keeping it short, too. It's an honor and a thrill for me to get a chance to talk to you. What I want to do is share some thoughts and then shut up and take your questions, comments, feedback. We can talk about whatever you want. I'm hoping you don't want to talk about Hillary Clinton's emails, but if you do, let's go for it. That has been a source of endless pleasure for me as you might imagine.

So, it's great to be here with so many partners and friends. I hope you know this, but one of my priorities as Director of the FBI is to drive deeper and wider our partnerships with you because we depend upon those relationships to be effective. We need you and I hope we're useful to you as well. The commander's intent to every FBI field office is if your local partners need help with something, go. Offer our equipment. Offer our technology. Offer our help. It doesn't matter to me whether it's a federal matter. It matters to me that it's important to law enforcement. Go and help. And then we'll sort it out later.

And speaking of partnerships, let me start by saying a brief word about Cliff Greenwood who was killed, as you know, on April the third and was a thirty year law enforcement veteran. A good man. A year ago, I gave him his diploma at his graduation from the National Academy. And somebody described him as the epitome of a Texas gentleman. Now I'm a kid from the Northeast so I guess I don't speak about what that complement means with great authority, but I think it's about the highest compliment you can pay somebody. I wish we didn't live in a world where a family person, where a caring friend and partner, where someone who dedicated his life to doing good is taken from us in that way and I don't have anything useful to say except we are so, so sorry. And we will do everything we can to assist our partners in making sure that justice is brought for Cliff Greenwood's murder.

Let me start by talking about leadership in law enforcement, especially in tough times, something I know a little bit about over the last 3 1/2 years. I've had the good fortune to get to know a whole lot of chiefs and sheriffs around this country as I've traveled to all 50 states. And I have not walked in your shoes, but I've now talked to enough of you and heard enough of you tell me that this is the hardest time in your career in law enforcement. The challenges we face are extraordinary that I believe you. And I think, although unique is an overused word, I think we're in a uniquely challenging time. Enough of you have told me about your struggles with budget cuts, with pension reductions, with attrition and recruiting, which I'm going to talk about in a second, and with tense community relations.

Here's how I think about it. I think all of us in law enforcement, but especially in uniform law enforcement, are in the midst of dangerous riptides. Your people are being pulled in different directions. There is water rushing in and rushing out tearing them in different directions. They're being pulled by the expectations of the communities they serve. They're being pulled by the expectations of the media that covers us. They're being pulled by the expectations of leaders and community organizations. There is a real risk in the midst of those riptides of drowning. I think there's also a need in the midst of those riptides for people to be leaders and stand firmly in the midst of those rushing waters. Plant their feet, stand tall, speak the truth, and by doing that, calm the waters and reduce the risk that their folks are going to drown in those waters. Real leadership is needed.

I think you're got it, so this will sound familiar to you. The way I think about it is in four buckets. The first thing we need are leaders who know their people, who know that people sign up for this work because they want to do good for a living. They want to do work with moral content. They are people who sign up to serve because they want to help people and they don't care what the people look like.

I was in Orlando last June after the attack on the Pulse nightclub. I wanted to meet privately with all the first responders. No press. I just want to come down and thank them for what they've done. And we met in a big church and after I said thank you, I said I'd love to take questions or feedback and an officer stood up in uniform and he said, "My name is Menachim Green and I'm Jewish," which confused me at first. And then he went on. He said, "I was there that night. And I ran towards the sound of that gunfire and running next to me was a Muslim officer. We were Jew and Muslim and Christian. We were white, black and Latino and Asian. And we were rushing towards danger to help people we did not know. We didn't know what they looked like. We didn't know what they believed. We didn't know anything about them except they were people who needed us. And he said, "I wanted you to know that." He said, "I think the American people should know that." And then he sat down. And afterwards an officer came up lo me sheepishly and said, "I'm the Muslim guy. That's a true story." And I said, "I'm going to tell that story all over this country because I know that. The American people should know that."

The leaders we need in law enforcement are people who not only know that, they've made that part of their being. They know the kind of people who sign up for this work. That's the first. The second thing is the leaders we need know what good policing looks like. They know that good policing has always been the same. It's up close. It's respectful. It's firm. It's lawful and it's transparent. That's always been the law enforcement that works and our leaders know that. The leaders we need today know that a combination of kindness and toughness, of confidence and humility is what makes for effective policing and delivers the best results.

Third, the leaders that we need know their neighborhoods, especially the neighborhoods with the greatest need for police services. And they know the people who live there. In particular, the leaders we need know the history and the journey of black America which I think is uniquely at issue in the challenges we face today. They know the hopes, the dreams, the disappointments and the pain of that district. They also know the history of law enforcement's interaction with black Americans. And they know it because black people cannot forget it for reasons that make sense to me. They know that African-Americans, like all Americans, want good policing and need it to be able to raise families in a healthy, productive way. It's the only path to prosperity and to safety.

The fourth thing. The leaders we need understand that the challenges that we face are magnified by a narrative that's forming about American policing. It's a narrative that has formed honestly in the absence of good data, in the absence of actual information. But the narrative is this. Biased police are killing black men at epidemic rates. That's the narrative. It's a narrative driven by video images. It's a narrative driven by images of real misconduct, of possible misconduct and of perceived misconduct. It's a narrative pushed forward by empathy which is natural in human beings. It's a narrative also reinforced by the shock and surprise of civilians in how fast, how ambiguous law enforcement situations often are.

The leaders we need know that a whole lot of people of good will in this country believe that narrative. And they believe, these decent people, they believe with all their hearts that American law enforcement is using deadly force against minority communities, especially against black men at epidemic rates. The leaders we need know that good Americans believe that because those are the videos that they see over and over again. To those people, each video is confirmation of the existence of this epidemic of nationwide police brutality. People of good will protest because they believe it.

Now, what's the truth? However good their hearts and however good their intentions, Americans actually have no idea whether the number of black people or brown people or white people being shot by police is up, down or sideways. They have no idea whether black people or brown people are more likely to be shot through an encounter than white people are with law enforcement. A Harvard research study from last year focused on ten major departments, including Houston's, and reviewed over a thousand shootings. The research surprised the result the researchers because they found that lethal force was more likely to be used against white people. Non-lethal force was more likely to be used against black people. But we really don't know well enough on a national basis. That's ten departments.

We need actual data to tell us what's happening in this country because in the absence of it, every single conversation about our use of force is uninformed. We don't have the arrest data yet for 2016, but there were in 2015, over ten million arrests made in the United States. And you add to that many, many more encounters that don't result in an arrest between police and civilians. Tens of millions of encounters. So how many people were shot? What did they look like? What were the circumstances? Is deadly force trending up or down? Where was it worst and where is it best? Nobody knows. Nobody in this country has any idea because we have no idea. As a country, we have never collected the data to be able to force informed conversations, which is a very bad place to be.

We have data on how many people saw a particular movie last weekend. We have data on how many books were sold. We have data on how many people showed up with the flu in every hospital in this country. We don't have data on our use of deadly force. And so in its absence, anecdotes drive the entire conversation. That is why we are passionate, and I hope you share my passion, that we are going to move this entire country not only towards NIBRS collection rich crime data collection, but also towards a national use of force data base that the FBI will be responsible for maintaining. Because in the absence of that data, an anti-cop use of force narrative continues. And the danger is obvious. One of the most obvious dangers that doesn't get much coverage in the media is that that narrative sometimes suggests that law enforcement is deserving of violence directed against us because we are in the midst of an epidemic of violence against civilians. That's a crazy place to be. We need better data to help us all make a judgment about what's actually happening and where we're falling short to improve.

I want to thank you for submitting NIBRS data to us this past year. It is going to make a huge difference. So, we need that better data because we'll make better decisions with it. We will resist the anecdotes that are driving us in an unhealthy direction. The leaders we know need know the danger in the narrative forming and taking hold. That narrative makes it harder for us to recruit good people. It makes it harder for us to interact, especially with the communities that need police services the most. We have to show America what is true.

Now, the narrative also has another effect. I believe it drives a chasm between uniformed law enforcement and the communities that need the most policing. That narrative can keep good officers in their cars and keep good people inside their homes and not talking to us. Police officers are human beings and they see the videos. They have families who they love deeply. Their families and they do not want to be in one of those videos. They do not want to get famous or get dead. They also saw Dallas and Baton Rouge and Palm Springs and they follow every end of watch notification as I do. They think not only about the videos a lot. They think all the time about that loss of life to law enforcement. They desperately do not want to leave their families behind. The leaders we need work with self-initiated police activity is dropping in some of our most violent cities.

Of course, police officers respond to calls. Of course, they do their jobs. Of course, they still risk their lives. Because they are good people who signed up for this work to help. But they're also people. And a good leader knows that. A good leader understands the impact that this narrative, and especially those videos images, can have on our good people. And our leaders that we need today also see that's only one side of the chasm. Because on the other side of that chasm are good people who saw something, who know something, who suspect something. When homicides are up and clearance rates are down, to my mind, good leaders think about the chasm. If people don't trust the police, they aren't going to talk to us. They aren't going to whisper to us as they so often do. They saw the gun get thrown behind the dumpster. They know or heard who was involved in the shooting. They know who just left 20 shell casings on a sidewalk in the middle of the day. But if they don't trust the police, if the narrative drives them to open up a chasm, they're going to stay on their own side of that divide.

Lots of police departments in this country, including in this great state, are working hard to change that narrative. To take a couple examples that have been in the media recently. In Camden, New Jersey, which is ... If there's a city that was a poster child for violence and disfunction and poverty, it was Camden, New Jersey for many years. Chief Scott Thomson has tried to shake things up and to change the narrative in Camden. His officers follow what a newspaper recently described as a Hippocratic oath for policing. Their mantra is minimizing harm and try to save lives. It was a policy shaped partly by violent videos like those of Michael Brown and other shooting, shot or wounded citizens lying on the street. As a result, Chief Thomson decided that they were going to adopt a new policy which was, he called it "scoop and go." To drive immediately gunshot wound victims to the hospital rather than waiting for an ambulance. He did that to show something to their community where a whole lot of people are shot.

They've also revised their use of force policy to try to, as often as possible, deescalate. They had an incident there on video, viral in 2015 in a good way. A disturbed guy with a big knife waving it in the air was surrounded by a circle of officers who moved with him and actually cleared traffic to keep the perimeter and moved him and moved him and moved him until he dropped the knife. It took several tense minutes, which is a lifetime in the middle of a situation like that. But that guy's life was saved. Chief Thomson said, "Twelve months earlier that guy would have been shot dead in the first few seconds of that encounter."

And then there were the viral video stories on Facebook that we have to make sure more people see, which are the narratives of us changing lives. There are a couple that are my favorites. There was one in Westland, Michigan that you may have seen. It's a cop does a traffic stop and he pulls the guy over and notices that there's a toddler not in a car seat. The driver's name was Lavante Dell. The officer stops him and says, "What's the deal here? Why is that child not in a car seat?" And Mr. Dell says that his family can't afford a car seat. So the police officer, whose name is Scaglione, says, "Follow me." And he leads him to a Walmart and out of his own pocket, that police officer buys a car seat. Mr. Dell told ... The driver told ABC News that he hoped people hearing this story quote learn to never judge a book by its cover and realize there's still good people out there going above and beyond.

Texas cops are changing that narrative too. In San Antonio, Neil Rocha is a police officer who became famous in viral videos for just stopping to shoot hoops with a twelve-year-old kid. You may remember the story. His mother didn't get the name of the officer so she put a video on Facebook trying to identify this officer and it went all over the place. An Austin higher enforcement unit officer named Jason Borne, spelled differently, not the Jason Bourne whose movies I will watch any time they come on to the incredible annoyance of my wife. She'll say, "What are you doing?" And I said, "The Bourne Supremacy's on." She says, "You've seen it eight times." "Yes I have.' So a different Jason Borne stopped to assist a stranded motorist and it was a kid on his way to high school. One of his tires had blown. The other three were bald. So Borne and his partner had the kid's car towed to a repair shop and those two officers split the cost of two new front tires for that kid. And then they started a GoFundMe page to raise money to fix the car's alignment. And they're raising more to try and take care of other damage to this kid's car.

There are a lot of good cops in this country and in Texas. In today's environment, where that dark narrative drives us, it's sometimes easy to forget that. People need to be reminded that for every bad video ... There's no doubt there are some videos that show misconduct. For every bad video, there are thousands, hundreds of thousands of encounters like the ones I just laid out. A good leader with a good police force can change the narrative of their own department, can change the narrative in this country. And it's not marketing. It's about real cops and real deputy sheriffs doing good work and then trying to make sure that people hear about it.

As leaders, I think it's our job to remind our people that good policing is up close and it's firm, but respectful, and that good policing is really, really hard. And sometimes bad things happen. But when those bad things happen, they're going to be met by the leaders showing transparency and thoughtful judgment. And good leaders in law enforcement insist that community leaders understand that they should support their officers because they are their officers. They're in those communities to save lives and to create healthy spaces. It's our job to talk to our troops and to make sure they know we love them, that we support them and we will hold them accountable. We will fight for the equipment and the training that they need. We will make clear what's expected and we will make clear that if they follow that training and they make reasonable judgments, we will be there to support them no matter what.

They look to us for guidance. They look to us to set a tone. If we're negative, the tone is negative. If we're forward leaning, they are forward leaning. All of you know this because you're leaders. What is a pain in the neck about being a leader is the pain in the neck about being a parent. They're always watching you. There's no time ... I have five children. There's no time when I'm able to say to my children, "I'm going to turn you off because my beloved New York football Giants are playing the hated Dallas Cowboys and I'm going to drink beer from a bottle and shout bad things at the television." There's no opportunity for me to turn children off. There's no opportunity for me to turn off the people who work for me. They're always watching as yours are. That's a pain. But it's an opportunity to shape them, to change an environment and to change a narrative because they see the way you stand. They see the way you speak. They see where you go and how you conduct yourselves.

We also need to make sure that our folks take care of themselves. Every great police officer, every great agent possesses a singular quality which is judgment. Judgment is very different from intelligence. Intelligence is the ability to nail a riddle, to master an equation, to solve some hard puzzle. Judgment is the ability to take that answer and circle it and see it through the eyes of others or move it in place and time and see it as it might be seen in a different environment. That is judgment. You cannot be an effective law enforcement officer without it. I'm not exactly sure where it comes from. I think it comes from the way you were raised and it comes from making mistakes and learning from them. Oh, that ticks people off. Okay, I got that. But it's protected in ways I know for sure. It's protected by stepping away from this work and maintaining fighting for some kind of balance in your life.

I give a speech to every new FBI employee and if I can't be there in person, they are forced to watch a video. And I tell them I expect them to fight to maintain balance in their lives because it's essential to protecting that judgment. Then I tell them two other things that seem weird. I say, "I direct you to sleep. Sleeping is not a moral failing. It is essential to you being effective. It's essential to you exercising sound judgment. And I joke with them. I say, "Look. This is not much to look at. But I do core, cardio. I lift weights. I stretch. And I sleep. Because I have to make sound decisions. I need judgment."

And then I tell them something else weird. "I expect you to love somebody. There are people in your lives called loved ones because you're supposed to love them. And in our work there is a disease called "get back-itis," which is the idea that I'm protecting people so I'll get back to these people that I'm supposed to love, whether it's children, parents, siblings, spouses, it doesn't matter. All of you know, there's no getting back. Bad things happen to good people and children grow up like that. SO I tell every new employee in the FBI, "I expect you to love them. It's good for you. It nurtures your judgment." And I also add, "Sometimes you can multitask by sleeping with people you love in appropriate circumstances and get both done at the same time. You're very busy so you put it together." This seems like a weird thing for a law enforcement leader to talk about. Maybe it is. But I need them healthy. This country needs them healthy. Body, mind and spirit. I need them to work out, but I need them to do more than that to maintain a sense of balance and health.

The term "police reform" is thrown around a lot these days and I think it gets a bad rap. As we work to change the narrative about policing in this country, we should never stop thinking about trying to reform ourselves, about trying to get better. I think that's what it means to be an effective leader. I'm always trying to figure out how I can do better. That can be institutional reform. That can be informal reform based on neighborhoods, based on your people. You know better than anyone in this country what your communities need. You know what works there. You know how to build effective relationships. Do what works for you. But do something. And work as hard as you can to make sure that images of that something get out there so the good people of this country and the good young people who might choose this work see it and we change the narrative.

I also mention my son Brian. I have five kids, two girls, a boy and two girls. My son Brian lives in my basement. He's got, give him about another 12 months. He is just finishing FTO. He's on his last month of field training as a police officer and he's a very talented kid like his mother. He went to great college. He was an economics and philosophy honors student. He was the captain of his college basketball team. That kid could have done anything. And as he was getting ready to graduate, he said, "Dad, I want to be a police officer because I want to help people and I think that's the way to help them when they need you the absolute most." And I said, "Brian, I completely agree. I support you a hundred percent. Your mother's a little nervous about that choice." But it is about a young person seeking service over self in the most meaningful way I can imagine. I couldn't be prouder of this young man.

My worry? Are other boys and girls ... Although he turned 23 yesterday, I still think of him as a boy. Are other boys and girls going to make a different choice because of the narrative that's emerged that we do something controversial. They'll still serve, but they'll become teachers or social workers or, heaven forbid, fire fighters. Will they instead avoid what we've chosen to do? This country will be deeply sorry if we allow that to happen. Maybe not even noticed for five years or ten years, but twenty years from now the people in a room like this would be very different if we allow the narrative to drive people like my son, your sons and daughters away from this work. We can't let that happen. So we must as often as possible speak about what we're like. Tell the story of the Menachim Greens of this country to inspire kids to choose this life.

So here's how I talk about it in the event it's of any use to you. I speak to a lot of young audiences about law enforcement. And I tell them this. "Look kids. Life is short. Bad things happen to good people." Then they're looking for the exits trying to get away from me. But I say, "Here's the problem with life. There's so much striving to do. To get good grades, to make the team, to get into a good college, to get a newer car. When you get married, to get an extra bedroom. To save money for college, to get recognized, to get plaques on the wall, to get promoted, all of which is important. All of us have done that. But the danger is, if that's all you do, just strive, just strive, just strive. What matters in life can be obscured by that smoke of seeking money or recognition or honor. And so I say, "Look, you gotta do something that seems weird, but please do it." I tell them, "Close your eyes and imagine yourself in your mind's eye old and gray. Your life is about to end. I hope you're old and gray at that point. Sit there at the end of your life and ask this question. Who do I want to have been? Who do I want to have been?"

And I tell high school kids and college kids, "Look, the reason I'm asking you to do that is from that vantage point, the smoke is cleared. Houses, cars, plaques on the wall. Who cares? Your life is ending. Who do you want to have been?" And I say, "Look. I hope some of you are people who want to have been somebody who did something for the people who needed you, the people who are frightened or bullied or picked on or victimized. You stood on a wall and protected them. I hope some of you want to have been that. And I promise you it will not lead to lots of extra bedrooms and lots of money and lots of human honor, but it will make you wealthy in ways all the rest of them who just strive for those things will never experience. It will leave you with a life of deep meaning. I hope some of you," I tell them in this audience, "decide that's who you will have been and decide to do this. It's incredibly hard. I dare you to live a life of meaning."

So why am I telling you this? I'm telling you this so in the event it's useful to you as to how I talk to young people about law enforcement. But there's another reason I'm telling you this. To remind you that's who you will have been at the end of this too short life and to thank you for making that choice. Thank you for pursuing a life of meaning for yourselves, for sure, but for the people you've protected and served in ways you will never get thanked enough for. So thank you for choosing to do that with your lives. It's an honor to be part of this community. I'm in this job another 6 1/2 years. I will use every moment of that to try to tell the people of the United States what law enforcement is really like. Thank you for representing it so well. I look forward to our conversation.

Ah, what can I tell you? Most of them, you don't want to ask about Russia, but you're welcome to. Yes, sir. Go ahead.

Speaker 3: [inaudible 00:30:46] And a lady jumped upand down. [inaudible 00:31:05] Police chief association operator 24 hours [inaudible 00:31:10]

Director: I'm so sorry for your loss. Is there a question over there in the back right?

Speaker 4: Director Comey, can you tell us a little bit more about the comment you made regarding collecting use of force data? Will that be a legislative mandate, regulatory, permissive, and will there be funding as far as that?

Director: Yep. Great question. What we've done is the Bureau has worked with chiefs associations, sheriffs associations around the country and it was interesting. The thing they asked us to ... Everybody said, "It's a good idea to create a national database on all of us, federal, state and local, our use of deadly force. But we want the FBI to maintain it." And so we're building ... It's not a ... We're part of the Justice Department, but it will be an FBI built and maintained data base. And we've agreed upon 19 data fields we're going to collect. And the information, the way we think it's going to work, is the states will supply us the information. It shouldn't ... Since every department's collecting information like this anyway, it shouldn't be hard to drive it but it's not mandated. It's just the FBI saying ... All of us saying, "We as American law enforcement need to be able to show people what's really going on." And I'll be honest. I have a suspicion that what's going on is there's no kind of epidemic of violence and ...

But it won't be mandated. I don't think any bill will come of it. I think the states will just have to send us the data and we'll give everybody access to it. It doesn't include any information about the officers' identify, for example, but we're going to collect information about time of day, weapon, weapon that the perpetrator used, all that sort of thing. And we put in the federal register already a notice that we are creating it. That period has now run and so we're going to start populating it this year. Again, not just you all, but federal, state and local law enforcement use of deadly force. So I hope that's useful. Yes, sir.

Speaker 5: Would you please talk a little bit more about your position on going dark? I know you've been pretty supportive of us on that.

Director: Yep. Yeah. Going dark is the name we use for the problem that all of us have in law enforcement, with armed with lawful process, not being able to access information we need in our investigations. Mostly that hits us on devices that can't be opened and this is a shadow that's falling across all of our work. I'm sure you felt it already. I've demonstrated it for the FBI. October, November, December, over 4,000 devices were presented to the FBI for examination by our agents and our partners around the country. 43% of them we could not open with any technique. Any technique. And so that means just about half of the devices we seize in gang cases, child exploitation cases, terrorism cases, we can't open. That is a huge problem. The answer is not clear, but here's what we can't allow to happen. We're drifting to a place of total darkness for us. And what makes this so hard is I love privacy. Love it. Don't get as much as I'd like, I suppose, but I love privacy. And my life is devoted to public safety. I care about both of those things. They're colliding with each other.

But here's the thing that I think the companies don't quite realize when they talk about selling their customers. I love Apple's devices. I'm trying to move the FBI to a place where we can use Apple devices. They're high quality devices. But Apple markets absolute privacy. It talks in those words and says, "You know what? Your stuff should always be private. And what I'm telling them is that's a change in the American way. This country has never had absolute privacy. Ever. Because the founders of this country struck a bargain which was your stuff is private unless the people of this country need to see it. And then with appropriate predication and oversight and process, they can see it. Your car trunk, your bank deposit box, your sock drawer. Even the contents of your mind. You can be compelled, as all of you know, to say what you saw, to say what you heard and witnessed.

If we're going to move to a place where large parts of American life are off limits to judges, where there's absolute privacy, that's a different way to live. That's a change in the compact of America and companies should not make that decision for us. We, the citizens of this country, have to make that decision. So it's not the Bureau's job to say what we should do. It's not the company's job. What I am determined to do is make sure the American people don't drift to a place where we've changed the bargain in this country. Because then they're all going to look at us and say, "How come you all didn't say something?" All of a sudden, our lives are on these devices. That's a cool thing. But judges can't access them any more? Wow. So, I'm trying to drive a conversation. And here's where we are. I tried to stay quiet on this last year because my judgment was in a presidential election year, a complicated conversation about balancing privacy and public safety, we couldn't have it in an election year. I think I was probably right.

So I used last year to gather stories from you about how it's affecting your work. We got a lot of stories. And then data that I just reviewed with you. And so we're going to bring it back up. And I've already talked to President Trump about this and Attorney General Sessions and they get it. What's interesting is after the problem you had at San Bernardino with Apple, Apple lost President Obama who came at ir from, I don't know whether the left or right even makes sense in the United States any more, but he came at it from a much more civil libertarian perspective. They lost him. Because his response to Apple was, "Wait a minute." Just what I said. We've never had absolute privacy in America. Judges need to be able to order access.

And so I'm hoping to take that momentum and President Trump's understanding of it and drive a conversation. I don't know where we're going to go because the companies have a lot of money. And it's a complicated topic. But I can imagine a world where Congress passes a law that says if you're going to sell devices in the United States of America, you need to be able to comply with court orders. You figure out how to do it. You figure out how to do it in the most secure way. But just like a telephone provider has to be able to comply with a court order, if you're going to sell a device to the American people, you need to figure out how to be able to comply with a court order. We're a long way from that.

But here's where I need your help. We cannot allow people to portray this as some sort of intelligence community issue or NSA issue because it's really not. It has some small implications for intelligence work but overwhelmingly affects state and local law enforcement. Overwhelmingly. Because you can't investigate anything in this country today, whether it's a drug case or a car accident, without needing data that's on a device. And if those devices are off limits to us, that will change our world. And so I hope you will continue to talk about it and ask about it and see if we can't educate the American people in a good way and drive to a sensible solution.

What else can I tell you? There's a question here in the front.

Speaker 6: Thank you for coming, sir. As a chief of a small [inaudible 00:39:07], I want to thank you for offering up your [inaudible 00:39:09] I haven't taken advantage of that. My question is thank you for standing out there as the sole voice in the night to support us. What is the new administration's ... What are we going to see from them in supporting us also?

Director: That's a great question.

Speaker 6: Tom Class.

Director: I can't believe you like me. He's a great man. Tom Class. He was the SAT in Dallas. The new administration ... I know best what Attorney General Sessions thinks about it and I have urged him ... He's very supportive of state and local law enforcement, understands I think from his years on the judiciary committee the challenges that we face in law enforcement, so I would expect his instincts would be to understand your challenges and to try to support you. What I have said to him is, "I've played a leadership role with state and local law enforcement that I really shouldn't be playing. But I did it because I felt like nobody else was speaking and so I did it." I have a ten year term. I mean I can be fired but what the heck. And so I said, "I hope that I'll be able to step back and you, as the Attorney General of the United States, will speak." I mean having state and local law enforcement, I think you're going to see him do that. And so it's not that I'll deny you or won't talk to you all, but I would expect the public role will be more the Attorney General. So that's what I think you're going to see.

Speaker 7: I have a question.

Director: Yes, sir.

Speaker 7: Well, first of all, thank you and thank the Bureau down in San [inaudible 00:40:45]. We work very closely with each other. But my question is do you believe that the American people think the Bureau has become politicized and if yes, what do you think that needs to be done to change that perception?

Director: That's a great question. The answer is ... The honest answer is I hope not. But I think there are a fair number of people ... Well, this is probably a complicated answer. As partisans, I can't really help. But I worry there's a fair swath of people who were confused by things that we did, that I had to do last year. And I think a lot of the confusion stems from the fact that most Americans see the world through sides, the lens of side. And I count it as when I go to Congress and I say to them I'm just trying to be transparent, they look at me and say, "What are you trying to pull?" And I say, "I'm just trying to tell you what's true," and they say, "Yeah, yeah. What are you trying to pull?" Everybody see the world through polarized glasses. You know who doesn't? The people in this room and the people at the FBI. We're not on anybody's side. We're not trying ... The reason people are confused is they try and figure out, so is he trying to help Hillary Clinton, hurt Hillary Clinton, help Hil- ... What's he trying to do? And the answer is, "I'm not trying to help or hurt anybody. I'm trying to do what I think is the right thing to do."

Very, very often ... The last year, if I may use a vernacular term, sucked for me. I know you've been there. Kept looking at the menu of options and there was only bad and worse and not good. And so at every turn, I'm actually very proud of the FBI. We did quality work and we tried to figure out so what's the right thing to do here. And it was very painful at times, but I'm proud of it. What I think I need to do ... I do think there are people who are confused by it and because they don't understand what we did and why we did it, it leads people to draw conclusions about us that were political. I hope you know this about the Bureau. We're about the farthest thing from political you can imagine. We do not give a rip.

Part of what confused people is they're just not familiar with that attitude at a federal level, with people who just don't care who is affected and in what way politically. I think I have tried to stay quiet. I haven't done a press event since last July. Try to stay quiet because my judgment was there was too much emotion right after the election. People needed to listen to me. At some point I'm going to reemerge and try and explain and see if people can't understand better what were the choices I faced and why did I make those choices. And I hope that will go some ways towards ... But those people who can be influenced, some of the partisan people, they won't be influenced at all. But for those people who are at minimum confused, it will move them in a healthier place because if you actually stand in my shoes and you listen to the challenges I faced, everybody I've talked to, their reaction is, "Oh, oh. You were screwed."

I had a chance actually to explain it to the full U.S. Senate. I was there to talk about Russia in a closed session and Senator Franken from Minnesota said something unpleasant to me and he said, "We should probably know what you did to Hillary Clinton." And I said, "Do you have time? I'd love to explain." And I said, "Let me tell you where I was. Let me tell you the challenges I faced. Let me tell you why I felt I had to do what I had to do." And when I was done, Senator Schumer from New York came over to me and grabbed my hand with both hands and said, "You were in an impossible position. You were in an impossible position." And he's darn right I was in an impossible position. So at some point I'll try to explain that a little bit better, but in the meantime, it's stuff you all know this but when you get in these situations, you try and think carefully. You talk to smart people and then you make your best judgment on what the right thing to do is. And then there's a certain peace in that, honestly.

The joy of my life is I don't want to be anything else. At this point I probably couldn't become anything else. I don't want to be anything else. I don't want to do anything else. I'm involve in something that's deeply meaningful to me. I'll do my best to have people understand this but, at the end of the day, all you can do is the right thing. All you can do is the right thing.

Speaker 8: I've been told one more. I'm not telling the Director what to do by any means. But his people told me to say one more question and I checked. You have 2,699 more days, sir.

Director: 2,699 more days. Outstanding. What else can I tell you? Yeah. GO ahead.

Speaker 9: I want to follow up on that. Do you think the press is going to allow you to say what you need to say about it?

Director: I'm not sure the press is going to allow me. So I'm trying to figure out what's the best way to do it.

Speaker 9: [inaudible 00:45:29]

Director: You're killing me. I'm on twitter. I have to wake up every morning to figure out what the President's saying about me. I don't know. That's the hard thing, breaking through and, you know, that's a ... not to end but on a depressing note, but twitter's a depressing place. I joke with people. It's every bar in America. The drunk guy at the end of the bar screaming at the television. Now you can hear him. He's on twitter. And 140 characters is for me to explain, for example, why on October 28th, I had to tell Congress we were re-starting the investigation. And I'll take a minute. I'll tell you the story a little bit.

My team comes to me late October. The investigation that I testified repeatedly is over and there's no there there, which everybody who worked on it agreed with. All the people in the Bureau agreed with. We're done. There's nothing there. They come to me and say, "Sir, there's this weird dude named Anthony Weiner." There's no press in this room, right? "There's this weird dude named Anthony Weiner. And federal agent's doing a child porn case in New York, seized his laptop, and it looks like on that laptop, for reasons we cannot explain, are thousands of Hillary Clinton's emails, including, it looks like emails from her first three months as Secretary of State" where we had never found any because she was using her Verizon blackberry at that point. They said, "We can see hundreds of Verizon blackberry emails, Clinton emails, and we think we gotta go get them." And I said, "Damn right, you gotta go get them." And so let's get a search warrant.

And then I had a choice to make. I've always believed the FBI should try if we can to avoid any action in the run up to an election, whether that's dog catcher or whether it's President of the United States. If you can find a way, you take no action. I kept looking for a door that said no action here. I only saw two doors and they were both actions. One said speak. The other said conceal. Because I just told Congress and the American people over and over again, "There's no there there. We're done." And now I got a team of agents saying not only are there thousands of emails there, we may have found the ones that reflect best on the Secretary's intent from the first three months as Secretary of State. To not speak would be part of an affirmative act of concealment was my judgment. And so speak or conceal. Speaking 11 days before an election would be really bad. Concealing would be catastrophic.

In my view, and you can disagree, would be catastrophic. Try to imagine if I had concealed that we were re-starting that investigation in a hugely important way. And so I chose speaking. And I said to my team, "Welcome to the world of really bad. This is going to be so ugly. I'm totally screwed." Because catastrophic would be a whole lot better for me personally. But you can't do that as a leader. Speak. And then work as hard as you can to see if you can get through thousands of emails. That's something the press hasn't focused on. They keep saying they found nothing. No. We found thousands of brand new work related emails. We found classified emails. We didn't find anything that changed our view of her intent. So they were able to, though some computer wizardry, come back to me the Saturday before the election and say, "We'll meet you Sunday morning. You think we're going to be done?" The team came in to see me and said, "We found thousands of new emails." As I said we found classified emails on Anthony Weiner's computer. But our view of her culpability is still the same. After going through all of this. Night after night they went through these things. I said, "Okay. Now I gotta tell Congress." And I poked them and said, "Are you sure? Are you sure?" And they said, "Yes. We're sure."

I told Congress. So what I say to people is, "You gotta come stand in my shoes on October 28th before you could still conclude I'm an idiot. I hope you'll conclude I'm an honest idiot, but stand in my shoes and say what do you do on October 28th when you're re-starting a criminal investigation in a very significant way. Do you speak or do you conceal? My view is I don't care whether you're a Democrat or a Republican, you speak. You speak. As hard as it is for people to go back in time, come back with me on October 28th. You would do what I did and you'd be totally screwed.So, at the end of the day, I'm incredibly proud of the work that was done. I don't know whether there's enough space to recollect in 140 character world for people to hear that story. It just took me four minutes to tell you. It doesn't fit in a tweet. Maybe it will never be known fully. But at some point I want to try to get as many people as possible to understand that so that people of good will who can open their minds will open them and understand better.

So thank you for listening to me. Sorry for talking so much.

McCain praises FBI director Comey: 'His integrity has never wavered'

By Kelsey Sutton

04/20/17 08:55 AM EDT

Arizona Sen. John McCain tipped his hat to FBI director James Comey in a glowing tribute for Time's 100 Most Influential People list, labeling the bureau director as principled, independent and honorable.

"Integrity is a word that doesn't get used a lot in Washington anymore," McCain wrote for the feature, which was published Thursday. "But that is the quality that has defined James Comey's service to our nation."

Comey, who made the controversial decision to announce that the FBI would continue looking into Hillary Clinton's use of a private email server 11 days before the election, and this year made waves with his testimony confirming that the FBI was probing the Trump campaign's ties to Russia, has been sharply criticized by those from both the left and right.

Many on the left have said that Comey's October announcement into the reopening of the Clinton email investigation turned the public against Clinton and gave now-President Donald Trump a last-minute boost to win the White House. But when the FBI director testified about the bureau's investigation into the Trump campaign, he was in turn slammed by Trump supporters for what they said was a politically motivated smear.

McCain, who has been vocal about his concern over Russia's influence in the election, has been an ardent supporter of Comey's actions, particularly surrounding the Trump-Russia probe. In the Time column, McCain wrote that the FBI director "followed the law, spoke the truth and did what he believed was right" no matter the circumstances.

"Shifting political winds have blown criticism James Comey's way from different partisan directions," McCain wrote. "But his independence has never faltered. His integrity has never wavered. And I know that in the pursuit of justice, it never will."

Follow up to a Q at the 4:45 session. Below from DOJ website -- a redacted indictment was released on 3/15

U.S. CHARGES RUSSIAN FSB OFFICERS AND THEIR CRIMINAL CONSPIRATORS FOR HACKING YAHOO AND MILLIONS OF EMAIL ACCOUNTS

FSB Officers Protected, Directed, Facilitated and Paid Criminal Hackers

A grand jury in the Northern District of California has indicted four defendants, including two officers of the Russian Federal Security Service (FSB), for computer hacking, economic espionage and other criminal offenses in connection with a conspiracy, beginning in January 2014, to access Yahoo's network and the contents of webmail accounts. The defendants are Dmitry Aleksandrovich Dokuchaev, 33, a Russian national and resident; Igor Anatolyevich Sushchin, 43, a Russian national and resident; Alexsey Alexseyevich Belan, aka "Magg," 29, a Russian national and resident; and Karim Baratov, aka "Kay," "Karim Taloverov" and "Karim Akehmet Tokbergenov," 22, a Canadian national and a resident of Canada.

The defendants used unauthorized access to Yahoo's systems to steal information from about at least 500 million Yahoo accounts and then used some of that stolen information to obtain unauthorized access to the contents of accounts at Yahoo, Google and other webmail providers, including accounts of Russian journalists, U.S. and Russian government officials and private-sector employees of financial, transportation and other companies. One of the defendants also exploited his access to Yahoo's network for his personal financial gain, by searching Yahoo user communications for credit card and gift card account numbers, redirecting a subset of Yahoo search engine web traffic so he could make commissions and enabling the theft of the contacts of at least 30 million Yahoo accounts to facilitate a spam campaign.

The charges were announced by Attorney General Jeff Sessions of the U.S. Department of Justice, Director James Comey of the FBI, Acting Assistant Attorney General for National Security Mary McCord, U.S. Attorney Brian Stretch for the Northern District of California and Executive Assistant Director Paul Abbate of the FBI's Criminal, Cyber, Response and Services Branch.

"Cyber crime poses a significant threat to our nation's security and prosperity, and this is one of the largest data breaches in history," said Attorney General Sessions. "But thanks to the tireless efforts of U.S. prosecutors and investigators, as well as our Canadian partners, today we have identified four individuals, including two Russian FSB officers, responsible for unauthorized access to millions of users' accounts. The United States will vigorously investigate and prosecute the people behind such attacks to the fullest extent of the law."

"Today we continue to pierce the veil of anonymity surrounding cyber crimes," said Director Comey. "We are shrinking the world to ensure that cyber criminals think twice before targeting U.S. persons and interests."

" The criminal conduct at issue, carried out and otherwise facilitated by officers from an FSB unit that serves as the FBI's point of contact in Moscow on cybercrime matters, is beyond the pale," said Acting Assistant Attorney General McCord. "Once again, the Department and the FBI have demonstrated that hackers around the world can and will be exposed and held accountable. State actors may be using common criminals to access the data they want, but the indictment shows that our companies do not have to stand alone against this threat. We commend Yahoo and Google for their sustained and invaluable cooperation in the investigation aimed at obtaining justice for, and protecting the privacy of their users."

"This is a highly complicated investigation of a very complex threat. It underscores the value of early, proactive engagement and cooperation between the private sector and the government," said Executive Assistant Director Abbate. "The FBI will continue to work relentlessly with our private sector and international partners to identify those who conduct cyber-attacks against our citizens and our nation, expose them and hold them accountable under the law, no matter where they attempt to hide."

"Silicon Valley's computer infrastructure provides the means by which people around the world communicate with each other in their business and personal lives. The privacy and security of those communications must be governed by the rule of law, not by the whim of criminal hackers and those who employ them. People rightly expect that their communications through Silicon Valley internet providers will remain private, unless lawful authority provides otherwise. We will not tolerate unauthorized and illegal intrusions into the Silicon Valley computer infrastructure upon which both private citizens and the global economy rely," said U.S. Attorney Stretch. "Working closely with Yahoo and Google, Department of Justice lawyers and the FBI were able to identify and expose the hackers responsible for the conduct described today, without unduly intruding into the privacy of the accounts that were stolen. We commend Yahoo and Google for providing exemplary cooperation while zealously protecting their users' privacy."

Summary of Allegations

According to the allegations of the Indictment:

The FSB officer defendants, Dmitry Dokuchaev and Igor Sushchin, protected, directed, facilitated and paid criminal hackers to collect information through computer intrusions in the U.S. and elsewhere. In the present case, they worked with co-defendants Alexsey Belan and Karim Baratov to obtain access to the email accounts of thousands of individuals.

Belan had been publicly indicted in September 2012 and June 2013 and was named one of FBI's Cyber Most Wanted criminals in November 2013. An Interpol Red Notice seeking his immediate detention has been lodged (including with Russia) since July 26, 2013. Belan was arrested in a European country on a request from the U.S. in June 2013, but he was able to escape to Russia before he could be extradited.

Instead of acting on the U.S. government's Red Notice and detaining Belan after his return, Dokuchaev and Sushchin subsequently used him to gain unauthorized access to Yahoo's network. In or around November and December 2014, Belan stole a copy of at least a portion of Yahoo's User Database (UDB), a Yahoo trade secret that contained, among other data, subscriber information including users' names, recovery email accounts, phone numbers and certain information required to manually create, or "mint," account authentication web browser "cookies" for more than 500 million Yahoo accounts.

Belan also obtained unauthorized access on behalf of the FSB conspirators to Yahoo's Account Management Tool (AMT), which was a proprietary means by which Yahoo made and logged changes to user accounts. Belan, Dokuchaev and Sushchin then used the stolen UDB copy and AMT access to locate Yahoo email accounts of interest and to mint cookies for those accounts, enabling the co-conspirators to access at least 6,500 such accounts without authorization.

Some victim accounts were of predictable interest to the FSB, a foreign intelligence and law enforcement service, such as personal accounts belonging to Russian journalists; Russian and U.S. government officials; employees of a prominent Russian cybersecurity company; and numerous employees of other providers whose networks the conspirators sought to exploit. However, other personal accounts belonged to employees of commercial entities, such as a Russian investment banking firm, a French transportation company, U.S. financial services and private equity firms, a Swiss bitcoin wallet and banking firm and a U.S. airline.

During the conspiracy, the FSB officers facilitated Belan's other criminal activities, by providing him with sensitive FSB law enforcement and intelligence information that would have helped him avoid detection by U.S. and other law enforcement agencies outside Russia, including information regarding FSB investigations of computer hacking and FSB techniques for identifying criminal hackers. Additionally, while working with his FSB conspirators to compromise Yahoo's network and its users, Belan used his access to steal financial information such as gift card and credit card numbers from webmail accounts; to gain access to more than 30 million accounts whose contacts were then stolen to facilitate a spam campaign; and to earn commissions from fraudulently redirecting a subset of Yahoo's search engine traffic.

When Dokuchaev and Sushchin learned that a target of interest had accounts at webmail providers other than Yahoo, including through information obtained as part of the Yahoo intrusion, they tasked their co-conspirator, Baratov, a resident of Canada, with obtaining unauthorized access to more than 80 accounts in exchange for commissions. On March 7, the Department of Justice submitted a provisional arrest warrant to Canadian law enforcement authorities, requesting Baratov's arrest. On March 14, Baratov was arrested in Canada and the matter is now pending with the Canadian authorities.

An indictment is merely an accusation, and a defendant is presumed innocent unless proven guilty in a court of law.

The FBI, led by the San Francisco Field Office, conducted the investigation that resulted in the charges announced today. The case is being prosecuted by the U.S. Department of Justice National Security Division's Counterintelligence and Export Control Section and the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Northern District of California, with support from the Justice Department's Office of International Affairs.

Defendants: At all times relevant to the charges, the Indictment alleges as follows:

- Dmitry Aleksandrovich Dokuchaev, 33, was an officer in the FSB Center for Information Security, aka "Center 18." Dokuchaev was a Russian national and resident.
- Igor Anatolyevich Sushchin, 43, was an FSB officer, a superior to Dokuchaev within the FSB, and a Russian national and resident. Sushchin was embedded as a purported employee and Head of Information Security at a Russian investment bank.
- Alexsey Alexseyevich Belan, aka "Magg," 29, was born in Latvia and is a Russian national and resident. U.S. Federal grand juries have indicted Belan twice before, in 2012 and 2013, for computer fraud and abuse, access device fraud and aggravated identity theft involving three U.S.-based e-commerce companies and the FBI placed Belan on its "Cyber Most Wanted" list. Belan is currently the subject of a pending "Red Notice" requesting that Interpol member nations (including Russia) arrest him pending extradition. Belan was also one of two criminal hackers named by President Barack Obama on Dec. 29, 2016, pursuant to Executive Order 13694, as a Specially Designated National subject to sanctions.
- Karim Baratov, aka "Kay," "Karim Taloverov" and "Karim Akehmet Tokbergenov," 22. He is a Canadian national and a resident of Canada.

Victims: Yahoo; more than 500 million Yahoo accounts for which account information about was stolen by the defendants; more than 30 million Yahoo accounts for which account contents were accessed without authorization to facilitate a spam campaign; and at least 18 additional users at other webmail providers whose accounts were accessed without authorization.

Time Period: As alleged in the Indictment, the conspiracy began at least as early as 2014 and, even though the conspirators lost their access to Yahoo's networks in September 2016, they continued to utilize information stolen from the intrusion up to and including at least December 2016.

Sen. Coons is on CNN talking about the hearing. The big theme he said he will ask you about is what "lessons" did the FBI learn from "the deviation from normal practices of not commenting on investigations."

Other questions to which he alluded:

- Securing future elections.
- Why did you choose not to comment on the investigation of candidate Trump while commenting on candidate Clinton?
- Do you think you were right in commenting as you did?

FBI PUBLIC AFFAIRS – DIRECTOR'S AM NEWS BRIEFING

MONDAY, APRIL 4, 2016 5:00 AM EDT

FBI Mulls Sharing Of iPhone Hacking Tool With State, Local Authorities. The Washington Post (4/1, Nakashima, Goldman, 8.98M), citing unidentified law-enforcement officials, reported that the FBI and the Justice Department are considering whether to share with state and local authorities "the hacking tool that helped the bureau unlock the iPhone" of one of the San Bernardino terror-attack shooters. Because the FBI has "classified the tool," making it available for use in prosecutions in other jurisdictions would require that the evidence gathered be disclosed to criminal defendants, the Post says. It quotes a senior official as saying the federal agencies have "a desire to be forward-leaning to help state and local law enforcement," but "no one knows quite what the answer is." Reuters (4/2, O'Brien) added that a letter from the FBI to US law enforcement agencies on Friday pledges to support their efforts by unlocking iPhones and other mobile devices involved in investigations, although there would be some limitations.

PC Magazine (4/3, Murphy, 2.33M) reports that in its letter, the FBI acknowledged its "longstanding policy" of sharing potentially useful tools with its law enforcement partners. "We know that the absence of lawful, critical investigative tools due to the 'Going Dark' problem is a substantial state and local law enforcement challenge that you face daily," the bureau said. "You have our commitment that we will maintain an open dialogue with you. We are in this together."

The Wall Street Journal (4/1, Barrett, Subscription Publication, 6.74M) reported that the FBI memorandum appears aimed at telling local law enforcement that whereas the bureau does not have an answer to their requests for help at this time, it with have more information in the future. According to the Journal, the FBI is currently testing to see if its hacking technique can be used on multiple versions of the iPhone.

Ron Claiborne reported on ABC World News Tonight (4/2, story 10, 1:45, Vega, 14.63M) that "Prosecutors in Arkansas say the FBI has already agreed to penetrate the iPhone and iPod belonging to 17-year-old Hunter Drexler charged with murdering Roger and Patricia Cogdell." Faulkner County officials say the phone likely holds relevant evidence prosecutors can use at trial. In the second half of the report, former FBI Special Agent Brad Garret said he thought the bureau's hacking technique would likely "remain classified."

The CBS Evening News (4/3, story 6, 2:15, Axelrod, 11.17M), Gizmodo (4/3, 1.38M), Ars Technica (4/2, 705K), Business Insider (4/2, 2.64M), The Guardian (UK) (4/1, Yadron, 3.71M), and the CBS News (4/2, Flores, 3.97M) website also report on this story.

Experts: iPhone Hacking Technique Not Likely To Stay Secret. Reuters (4/2, Menn) reported that according to several Apple engineers and other experts, the FBI's method for breaking into locked iPhones is unlikely to remain secret. When the secret is exposed, Apple, Reuters said, is likely to be able to patch the encryption flaw and is expected to announce the fix to customers.

SlashGear (4/3, Westlake, 39K) quotes independent forensics expert Jonathan Zdziarski saying, "The FBI would need to resign itself to the fact that such an exploit would only be viable for a few months, if released to other departments. ...It would be a temporary Vegas jackpot that would quickly get squandered on the case backlog." According to SlashGear, the FBI's technique is likely to be exposed to criminal defense attorneys in future cases in which the technique is used.

The Huffington Post (4/3, 518K) reports that the contractor who worked with the FBI on the San Bernardino iPhone could chose to sell the hacking technique to another agency or country. "The more widely it circulates, the more likely it will be leaked," the Post says. "Flaws of this nature have a pretty short life cycle," an unnamed Apple engineer said. "Most of these things do come to light." According to those with knowledge of "zero day" hacking techniques, governments often space payments for the tools out over several months in case the flaw is patched shortly after the sale.

FBI's iPhone Hack Reportedly Linked To Japanese Firm. The Denver Post (4/3, Yui, Gjorgievska, 881K) reports that the Israeli company rumored to have helped the FBI hack into the San Bernardino iPhone – Cellebrite Mobile Synchronization – is owned by Japanese pinball machine maker Sun Corp. "Sun — based in Konan, Aichi, a city of 100,000 and more than 200 miles southwest of Tokyo — has been building pinball-like game machines found in Japan's pachinko parlors since the 1970s but has often displayed bigger tech ambitions," the Post says. Sun Corp. acquired Cellebrite in 2007. "Neither Cellebrite nor the FBI have confirmed the link, and a Sun Corp. spokesman on Thursday said the company isn't able to comment on specific criminal cases," the Post reports.

Judge Orders DOJ To Respond To Request For Documents In New iPhone Case. The Boston Globe (4/1, Bray, 1.05M) reported that US District Judge Allison Burroughs has ordered the Justice Department to respond to an ACLU request for sealed documents that could reveal whether the government is attempting to force Apple to hack into the iPhone of an alleged Boston gang member. "The ACLU filed the motion as part of a nationwide campaign to reveal how often federal agents compel smartphone makers to bypass the security features on their phones, under the provisions of a law over two centuries old," the Globe says. The ACLU has previously said it had unearthed 63 instances since 2008 in which federal authorities have demanded assistance from Apple or Google based on the 1789 All Writs Act.

Comey To Speak At Kenyon College Conference. Mount Vernon (OH) News (4/2, 27K) reported that FBI Director Comey will speak at Ohio's Kenyon College on Wednesday. Comey will give the keynote address at the college's "The Expectation of Privacy: Encryption, Surveillance and Big Data" conference. The event is hosted by the Kenyon Center for the Study of American Democracy (CSAD). "For Kenyon it's a timely coincidence that the case of the FBI versus Apple developed around the same time as the conference. But, in another sense, this is just the latest in a long string of debates over privacy and surveillance," said CSAD Director Thomas Karako. The conference, which features several speakers and panel discussions, will run through Friday.

Obama Warns Against Threat Of "Madmen" Acquiring Nuclear Bomb, Materials. President Obama on Friday warned against the threat posed by terrorists and rogue nations seeking to acquire nuclear weapons or materials. While hosting the Nuclear Security Summit, Obama touted previous successes at securing nuclear materials, but said significant work remains. Media coverage placed great emphasis on the balance Obama struck between highlighting successes that have come over the past six years and "paint[ing] and apocalyptic picture" of a possible nuclear terrorist attack.

The AP (4/1, Lederman, Superville) reports world leaders attending the summit "declared progress Friday in safeguarding nuclear materials sought by terrorists and wayward nations, even as President Barack Obama acknowledged the task was far from finished." Obama, according to the AP, "warned of a persistent and harrowing threat: terrorists getting their hands on a nuclear bomb." The Washington Post (4/1, Nakamura, 8.98M) reports Obama "rallied world leaders...to confront the growing threat" of ISIL, saying the group is a "threat to us all." The President said, "Our people share common aspirations to live in security and peace and free from fear." Obama added, "We are confident we will prevail and destroy this violent organization. Compared to ISIL's vision of death and destruction, our nations together offer a hopeful vision based on what we build for our people."

AFP (4/1) reports Obama, in an effort "to galvanize action to prevent jihadists" from acquiring nuclear weapons or material for a dirty bomb, "painted an apocalyptic picture of the impact of a nuclear terror attack." Bloomberg Politics (4/1, Hutton, 289K) reports a source from the closed session said Obama told attendees to think about a scenario in which terrorists purchased isotopes on the dark Web. The terrorists, in Obama's example, were believed to be planning to use a drone to distribute the material. Obama asked if authorities would react in enough time to prevent the attack. Bloomberg says Obama's "aim was to push the men and women around the table to think about how their governments would respond."

The Los Angeles Times (4/1, Memoli, Wilkinson, 4.1M) reports, that in his public comments, Obama said over the last six years, "when it comes to nuclear security, we've embraced a new type of thinking – and a new type of action." Obama added, "This is a perfect example of a 21st century security challenge that no one nation can solve alone." Voice of America (4/1, Dockins, 60K) reports on its website that Obama said despite the "significant and meaningful" progress made in efforts to prevent terrorists and others from using nuclear weapons, the efforts were "by no means finished." Reuters (4/1, Zengerle) reports that Obama said despite progress, the world faces a persistent and changing threat of nuclear terrorism and "we cannot be complacent." Obama warned, "There is no doubt that if these madmen ever got their hands on a nuclear bomb or nuclear material, they would certainly use it to kill as many innocent people as possible." According to The Guardian (UK) (4/1, Smith, 3.71M), Obama said, "It would be a humanitarian, political, economic and environmental catastrophe with global ramifications for decades. It would change our world."

On NBC Nightly News (4/1, story 3, 1:50, Holt, 16.61M), Andrea Mitchell reported Obama issued a "stark warning of the frightening nuclear threat facing the world. ISIS or other terrorists going nuclear." On the CBS Evening News (4/1, story 7, 2:00, Pelley, 11.17M), Margaret Brennan similarly reported Obama "warned world leaders that groups like ISIS, which has already used chemical weapons, could have larger ambitions." The Globe and Mail (CAN) (4/1, Fife, Koring, 1.13M) reports Obama "said the greatest threat of the 21st century is the Islamic State or al-Qaeda obtaining highly radioactive material to make a dirty bomb." The article quotes Obama as explaining, "ISIL has already used chemical weapons, including mustard gas, in Syria and Iraq. There is no doubt if these madmen ever got their hands on a nuclear bomb or nuclear material, they would certainly use it to kill as many innocent people as possible." Obama added that al Qaeda "has long sought nuclear materials. Individuals involved in the attacks in Paris and Brussels videotaped a senior manager who works at a Belgium nuclear facility."

BBC News (UK) (4/1, 2.09M) reports Obama said, "The single most effective defense against nuclear terrorism is fully securing this material so it doesn't fall into the wrong hands in the first place." Obama highlighted previous progress during his comments following the summit, according to USA Today (4/1, Jackson, 5.45M), saying removing large quantities of highly enriched uranium has made it more difficult for terrorists to obtain the material. Obama said highly enriched uranium has been completely removed from "50 facilities in 30 countries," which is enough "to create 150 nuclear weapons." On its website, CNN (4/1, Browne, Labott, Koran, 3.96M) says Obama touted that non-proliferation efforts have resulted in large areas of the globe being nuclear free. Obama indicated the South American continent is one such area. If Poland and Indonesia meet current commitments this year, Obama added, Central Europe and Southeast Asia will also have that status. Obama said, "As terrorists and criminal gangs and arms merchants look around for deadly ingredients for a nuclear device, vast regions of the world are now off-limits, and that's a remarkable achievement."

The New York Times (4/1, Subscription Publication, 12.03M) editorializes Obama can "claim some success in leading the international community to curb the amount of nuclear materials that could fall into terrorists hands," but he "has not fulfilled his goal of securing all nuclear materials in four years." The Times says "some 1,800 metric tons of nuclear material remain stored in 24 countries, much of it vulnerable to theft." The Times says the nuclear security summits "have been a useful means of focusing attention on nuclear dangers and persuading countries to be more security conscious," but "it will be up to the next American president to continue this effort and work to prevent another nuclear arms race."

Obama Highlights "Substantial Success" Of Iran Nuclear Deal. The New York Times (4/1, Landler, Subscription Publication, 12.03M) reports Obama also used the summit to make the case the nuclear deal with Iran has "achieved a substantial success." Obama said the restrictions on Iran's program imposed by the deal makes it so Tehran would require a year to build a bomb, in the event of a breach, as opposed to as short as two months. The Washington Times (4/1, Boyer, 285K) reports Obama added, "This is a success of diplomacy that hopefully we'll be able to copy in the future."

The Wall Street Journal (4/1, Lee, Subscription Publication, 6.74M) reports that despite highlighting the deal's positives, Obama sought to reassure critics that relaxing sanctions on Tehran does not equate to the US overlooking current tensions between the countries. The President said, "I think it's important to note that this deal does not resolve all of our differences with Iran, including destabilizing activities in the region." Obama added, "Except for limited exceptions, the US trade embargo remains in place. We also continue to vigorously enforce sanctions pertaining to Iran's support for terrorism, human-rights abuses and ballistic-missile programs."

Reuters (4/1, Rampton) reports Obama, however, said the US will attempt to help foreign companies overcome fears about doing business in Iran, but Tehran bears the responsibility for reassuring the companies the country is a safe place to invest. Obama said foreign companies will have to become accustomed to conducting business in Iran following years of facing significant penalties if they chose to violate sanctions. Bloomberg Politics (4/1, Sink, 289K) reports Obama said the US is working on "providing clarity" to businesses seeking engagement with Iran. Obama said Iran has complied with "the letter" of the nuclear deal, adding, "So long as Iran is carrying out its end of the bargain we think it's important the world community to carry out our end of the bargain." However, responding to reports that the Treasury Department considering a plan that would allow Iranian financial institutions to conduct transactions in dollars, Obama "appeared to back away from that idea." Obama said, "That's not actually the approach that we're taking," adding, "It is not necessary that we take the approach of them going through dollar-denominated transactions. It is possible for them to work through European financial institutions as well. There's going to need to be continued clarification provided to business in order to, for deal flows to begin."

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (4/1, A12, Subscription Publication, 6.74M) criticizes the Administration's decision to ease banking sanctions on Iran. The Journal argues Iran's actions toward the US and continued funding of terrorist organizations in the Middle East should disqualify it from having the financial sanctions lifted.

Obama: Trump's Comments On South Korea, Japan Show Lack Of Understanding. The AP (4/2, Superville, Lederman) reports Obama "said Friday that suggestions from people like Donald Trump that nuclear weapons would help South Korea and Japan show a lack of understanding of the world." Obama said, according to Politico (4/1, Wheaton, 1.07M),"The person who made the statements doesn't know much about foreign policy or nuclear policy or the Korean peninsula or the world generally."

Bloomberg Politics (4/1, Sink, 289K) reports Obama said Trump's comments was a topic of conversation on the sidelines of the summit. Without specifically mentioning Trump, Obama said, "People pay attention to American elections. What we do is really important to the rest of the world." Obama added that foreign countries "want sobriety and clarity when it comes to US elections." Obama added, "Our alliance with Japan and the Republic of Korea is one of the foundations, one of the cornerstones of our presence in the Asia-Pacific region. We don't want someone in the Oval Office who doesn't recognize how important that is."

US, Japan Announce Agreement To Keep Nuclear Material Out Of "Wrong Hands." The Wall Street Journal (4/1, Hayashi, Subscription Publication, 6.74M) reports the US and Japan on Friday announced a plan to ship weapons-grade nuclear materials from Japanese research facilities to the US in an effort to prevent rogue countries and terrorists from gaining access to it. The Journal says the countries have already completed the removal of highly enriched uranium and separated plutonium fuel from one of two sites, and a shipment is on its way to the US. Reuters (4/1, Heavey, Brunnstromm) reports Energy Secretary Moniz said, "This is the largest single nuclear material removal in the history of this summit process." Moniz added, "This process will permanently remove any risk of this material falling into the wrong hands."

Top NYPD Cops Slam Obama Call To Cut Counter-Terror Funding, Cruz Plans. The New York Daily News (4/3, Sit, 3.7M) reports that NYPD chief Bill Bratton, in a radio interview yesterday, "renewed criticism over President Obama's 'mind boggling' proposal to slash federal counter-terror funding by 50%." Bratton made his comments on John Catsimatidis' "The Cats Roundtable" on AM 970.

NYPD's Deputy Commissioner for Intelligence and Counterterrorism, John Miller, meanwhile, appeared on CNN Fareed Zakaria GPS (4/3, Zakaria, 410K), where he criticized Sen. Ted Cruz's proposal for local police departments to patrol and secure Muslim neighborhoods against radicalization. Miller said, "First of all, the depth of that is less than an inch. It wouldn't work. Second of all, it shows fundamental misunderstanding of American neighborhoods, but also American policing. The federal government does not direct local police departments to invade local neighborhoods. … But the subtext or the code word there is not patrol and secure. The code word was to intimidate and that's just not the way it works in America."

King Calls For More "Intelligence On The Ground" At Home And Abroad To Combat ISIL. On Fox Sunday Morning Futures (4/3, Bartiromo), Rep. Peter King said, "We need more intelligence on the ground and that also means here in our own country and European countries to have more of an undercover police presence, to have informers, to have people on the ground, to be in the Muslim communities. That's where the threat is coming from. Ninety-eight percent, 99 percent of Muslims are good Americans, but the threat is coming from there. … Whether it was the Italian mob or the Irish gangsters, you went into those neighborhoods to find out where it's coming from. We have to put political correctness aside – do it in Europe, do it here in the United States – to get the intelligence before the attacks can be started."

Pentagon Targets Senior Al-Shabab Militant With Drone Strike. The Washington Post (4/1, Lamothe, 8.98M) reports the US military conducted a Thursday drone strike in Somalia that targeted a senior al-Shabab militant who has overseen attacks that killed at least three Americans. Pentagon spokesman Peter Cook said in a Friday statement that Hassan Ali Dhoore was part of al-Shabab's security and intelligence section and was involved in planning attacks against Americans in Mogadishu. Cook said the Pentagon is "still assessing the results of the operation," but "removing Dhoore from the battlefield would be a significant blow to al-Shabab's operational planning and ability to conduct attacks against the government of the Federal Republic of Somalia, its citizens, US partners in the region, and against Americans abroad."

General: Commandos Trained To Stop Terrorists With "Dirty Bombs." Bloomberg News (4/1, Capaccio, 2.92M) cites Gen. Raymond Thomas as telling members of Congress that units of the US Special Operations Command, which he oversees, have been trained in the seizure and disabling of nuclear or radioactive "dirty" bombs, providing what the article calls "a crucial last line of defense if terrorists get their hands on such weapons." The commando units have "sufficient 'render-safe' capacity to respond to the most likely" situations involving such weapons based on current threat analyses, Bloomberg reports, quoting Thomas. The story adds that although US officials have said there's no indication so far that ISIL has the capability of deploying a weapon of mass destruction, "the prospect was on Friday's agenda for the Nuclear Security Summit of world leaders" that President Obama hosted in Washington.

European Terror Probe Has Identified At Least 22 Suspects Still At Large. The Wall Street Journal (4/3, Dalton, Subscription Publication, 6.74M) reports on its front page on the investigation into a terror network linked to the attacks in Paris and Brussels. That investigation has identified 22 or more suspects at large with links to the network. Of those, many have been in earlier ISIL plots, and nearly all have spent time in Syria. Generally, they are described as having embraced Islam at underground mosques in Molenbeek, a neighborhood in Brussels. The group is thought to be helping to move veterans of battles in Syria to Europe. The article also offers some detailed descriptions of some important figures in Molenbeek and the investigation.

Mudd: Terrorism Threat Presents Problems Europe Can't Overcome. On CNN Fareed Zakaria GPS (4/3, Zakaria, 410K), former CIA and FBI counterterrorism official Philip Mudd said that "the Europeans themselves have a problem I don't think they can't overcome. If you want to combat this kind of threat that involves tactical sharing of information about your citizens, real time email, phone, travel and the first question can't be can I share information on my citizen with the neighboring state. It has to be soon as my target moves, I've got to hand it over. … They don't do that. ... The other problem we have is a bureaucratic reality. Until you sit together, virtual sharing in my experience as a former bureaucrat – I hate to say it – doesn't work. You have got to sit in the same place to feel the same reality of the threat. That combination of information sharing and sitting in the same place, those are two things I don't think will happen in Europe."

Brussels Airport Reopens. The CBS Evening News (4/3, story 6, 0:15, Glor, 11.17M) reported the Brussels airport reopened "under extremely tight security" on Sunday, 12 days after sustaining deadly terror attacks. Intercontinental flights "are expected to resume" on Monday. ABC World News Tonight (4/3, story 5, 0:20, Llamas, 14.63M) added that the first flight out of the airport was "bound for Portugal with heightened security." NBC Nightly News (4/3, story 3, 0:25, Snow, 16.61M) reported that an airport official described the first flights "as a symbolic relaunch after what she called 12 days of difficult moments and horror."

Brother: Abdeslam Refused To Blow Himself Up On Day Of Paris Attack. Reuters (4/2, Rosemain) reports the brother of Paris terrorist attack suspect Salah Abdeslam, who was arrested in Brussels last month, said the militant refused to blow himself up on the day of the attacks. Speaking to French news channel BFM TV, the brother quoted Abdeslam as saying, "There would have been more victims had I done it," adding, "Luckily, I couldn't go through with it."

Belgian Prosecutors Charge Third Brussels Bombing Suspect. The Washington Post (4/2, Mcauley, 8.98M) reports Belgian federal prosecutors announced that a third Brussels bombing suspect identified as "Y.A." has been charged with planning a French terrorist attack. The arrest resulted from the same investigation that led to the arrest of Reda Kriket, who was found in possession of the explosive TATP, assault rifles, and handguns. The New York Times (4/2, Breeden, Chan, Subscription Publication, 12.03M) reports Y.A., a 33-year-old Belgian citizen, "was preliminary charged with participation in the activities of a terrorist group."

Brussels Bomber Freely Traveled Despite Suspected Terrorist Link. The AP (4/2, Cook, Soguel) reports Brussels Airport suicide bomber Ibrahim El Bakraoui was allowed to fly last summer from Istanbul to the Netherlands despite being a known parole violater in Belgium and Turkey's suspicions that he was a "foreign terrorist fighter." Belgian Interior Ministry Jan Jambon questioned why Bakraoui's history did not interfere with his ability to leave Turkey in June, but the Turkish government asserted that information was submitted to Brussels and Belgian authorities never requested his extradition.

Brussels Protesters Demonstrate Against Islamophobia, Police Presence. ABC World News Tonight (4/2, story 8, 0:15, Vega, 14.63M) correspondent Cecilia Vega reported Brussels authorities arrested more than 100 protesters who were "staging a demonstration against Islamophobia," despite a ban on "rallies over concerns of violent clashes."

On the CBS Evening News (4/2, story 4, 2:10, Axelrod, 11.17M), correspondent Jonathan Vigliotti reported protesters also demonstrated against the increased police presence. The demonstrators, on Saturday afternoon, "clashed with authorities who they say were handed too much power," including the increased police presence planned for the Brussels Airport partial reopening on Sunday. Vigliotti reported the airport will incorporate new permanent security measures, temporary check-in tents, heightened baggage scanning, and police donning bulletproof vests. Only three flights are scheduled for the airport's reopening and officials estimate several more months before the Brussels Airport is fully operational.

ABC World News Tonight (4/2, story 9, 0:20, Vega, 14.63M) correspondent Cecilia Vega reported the Brussels Airport is expected to return to fully-operational status by June, although Delta Airlines confirmed they will not offer service to Atlanta until March next year. NBC Nightly News (4/2, story 5, 2:05, Diaz-Balart, 16.61M) correspondent Gabe Gutierrez reported Brussels Airport Company CEO Arnaud Feist called the Brussels Airport's partial reopening "a sign of hope."

Freed From Boko Haram Rape Camps, Victims Face Suspicion, Isolation. The Washington Post (4/3, Sieff, 8.98M) reports on the "thousands" of victims of Boko Haram, "as young as 8," kept prisoners by the group's "savage campaign of rape and sexual slavery." With many of them now rescued, there "have been few joyous family reunions for the victims," since "most of the surviving women no longer have homes." Instead, "the military has quietly deposited them in displacement camps or abandoned buildings, where they are monitored by armed men suspicious of their loyalties," and "they are still labeled 'Boko Haram wives.'" Moreover, they are encountering mistrust and suspicion, as "last year, 39 of 89 Boko Haram suicide bombings were carried out by women," and 22 "of those female attackers were under the age of 18, many of them girls apparently abducted from villages and cities and converted into assassins."

White House Undergoing Tech Upgrades. The New York Times (4/3, Shear, Subscription Publication, 12.03M) reports on tech upgrades at the White House, noting one of the President's legacies "will be the office information technology upgrade that his staff has finally begun." The Times highlights the efforts of Anita Decker Breckenridge, the deputy chief of staff for operations at the White House, David Recordon, "the information technology guy for the White House complex." Breckenridge, who "said the White House has not had to request any additional money for the new upgrades," expressed hope "that Mr. Obama will leave to his successor's staff a building that is more useful in the Facebook and Twitter era, or whatever comes next."

Afghan Taliban Launch Mobile App. Bloomberg News (4/2, Najafizada, 2.92M) reports US-based SITE Intel Group indicated on Friday the Afghan Taliban have launched an Android smartphone app, suggesting the group is increasing its digital campaign. Kabul-based security analyst Jawid Kohistani warned, "The app will help Taliban to further psychologically weaken Afghanistan by their propaganda reports."

Hack On Washington, DC's MedStar Shows Risks Inherent To EHR Systems. The Baltimore Sun (4/2, Duncan, McDaniels, 712K) says last week's hacking of MedStar Health hospitals in Maryland and Washington, DC reveal vulnerabilities in the electronic-records systems many healthcare providers have rolled out in recent years. "Ransomware" hacks, in which perpetrators – including those who attacked MedStar's systems – "deny access to data rather than stealing it," has emerged as a dual concern in the industry, alongside long-feared theft of private patient data. The Sun reports that MedStar, in a "page-long statement in response to detailed questions," said its patient care "continued throughout this situation" with "only a few exceptions, handled on a case-by-case basis." A local computer-security expert told the newspaper that many providers have an incomplete understanding of the hacking risks to which they're exposed.

Romanian Hacker Behind Bush, Clinton Breaches Appears In US Court. The Washington Post (4/1, Zapotosky, 8.98M) reports Marcel Lehel Lazar, the Romanian hacker also known by his alias "Guccifer," appeared in US court on Friday for the first time on charges of "cyber-stalking, aggravated identity theft and unauthorized access of a protected computer in a nine-count indictment." The Post explains Federal prosecutors allege Lazar "was responsible for a range of high-profile hacks," including "the email, Facebook account and other online accounts of a member of the Bush family, a former Cabinet member and a former member of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff," as well as discovering the private email account of Hillary Clinton. Lazar "then blasted messages with personal information from those accounts to media organizations or congressional staffers, according to the indictment." Reuters (4/1) also reports on this story.

NIST Releases Final Version Of Encryption Guidelines. FierceGovernmentIT (4/3, Donovan, 277) reports the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) "released the final version of a document outlining its process for developing encryption standards and guidelines." FierceGovernmentIT says "the document included nine principles to guide NIST's efforts in creating encryption standards, including transparency, openness, balance, technical merit and global acceptability."

Hackers See Opportunities As Healthcare Digitization Increases. In a nearly 1,700-word article, the Washington Post (4/1, Johnson, Zapotosky, 8.98M) reported security and healthcare experts say the recent cyberattack targeting MedStar Health is "a foreboding sign that an industry racing to digitize patient records and services faces a new kind of security threat that it is ill-prepared to handle." According to the Post, while "hospitals and the health care industry broadly have been focused on protecting patient data from falling into the hands of bad guys," the latest attacks "highlight an even more frightening downside of data breaches: as hospitals have become dependent on electronic systems to coordinate care, communicate critical health data and avoid medication errors, patients' well-being may also be at stake when hackers strike." Reuters (4/1, Finkle) reported that the nonprofit healthcare group HITRUST conducted a survey late last year and found that 52% of around 30 US hospitals surveyed said they had experienced some type of malware infection, with the most common type being ransomware.

Healthcare Professionals Weight Benefits, Risks Of Electronic Medical Records. The Baltimore Sun (4/2, Duncan, McDaniels, 712K) reports that electronic medical records have many benefits such as "help[ing] patients avoid unnecessary tests," and they can "help doctors tailor treatment even for patients they are meeting for the first time," but "the new systems can leave hospitals vulnerable." The Sun adds that hospitals were previously worried "that hackers could steal patients' information to enable identity theft," but the latest concern is ransomware where "hackers deny access to data rather than stealing it." NPR (4/1, N\, LaChance, 1.81M) reported that hacks leaving hospitals without electronic medical records has led to several mistakes in patient care, which required resorting to paper records, or diverting patients to other hospitals.

Malware Sending Philadelphia Residents Fake Speeding Tickets. Wired (4/2, 3.82M) reports citizens in Chester County, Pennsylvania "have been receiving emails that contain fake speeding citations—along with a malicious phishing link." Wired adds that Chester County Police say the "people receiving those emails really were speeding at the locations the citation claims," which means the "hacker may have compromised a GPS-enabled app to give their scam an added dose of veracity."

Chicago Sun-Times Board Critical Of IRS Response To Cyberattack Vulnerability Report. The Chicago Sun-Times (4/3, 764K) editorializes that "it is deeply unsettling to hundreds of millions of Americans that their most private tax return information may be at risk." The Board is critical of the IRS' response to a new GAO report that found the "IRS has not completely fixed some previously identified weaknesses." The Board says that the best solution "would be strongly bipartisan congressional hearings," which are held under public scrutiny to blame those responsible, and find a path forward in fixing any IRS security issues.

NASA's 'Gryphon X' Cybersecurity Facility Still In Early Planning Stages. The San Jose (CA) Mercury News (4/4, Baron, 648K) reports a NASA cybersecurity facility, called "Gryphon X," that would "protect space missions from potentially catastrophic hacking and...increase collaboration with Silicon Valley" is still in "proposal and formulation stage," according to NASA Ames Research Center CIO Jerry Davis. The Mercury News quotes Davis as saying "Gryphon X focuses on the reduction of cyber-based risks to NASA's missions and their highly connected systems and high-value hardware and software in the field," and NASA is currently "looking at the cost/benefit analysis and value proposition" of the program.

US, China Cybersecurity Relations Still Have Room For Improvement. Politico (4/1, Starks, 1.07M) reported that the meeting last week between President Obama and Chinese President Xi Jinping shows that "there's not complete harmony" when it comes to cyber relations. Politico added that the sides hope to come to an agreement on a binding deal, rather than an agreed set of principles.

NBC News Analysis: IoT Can Lead To Infrastructure Vulnerabilities. NBC News (4/3, Francescani, 3.58M) reports the newly released details of the Iranian hack on a New York dam shows that the Internet of Things (IoT) "has ushered in a new era of security vulnerabilities." NBC news says that hackers have the ability to "remotely seize control of a spectrum of critical public and private infrastructure," which was created and "designed before cybersecurity became crucial." According to NBC News, researchers are concerned because some of the infrastructure systems are protected by "just a default username and password", or "no password security at all."

Hackers Accessed New York Dam Through 'Google Dorking'. The Wall Street Journal (4/1, Zimmer, Subscription Publication, 6.74M) reported the Iranian hackers accessed a New York dam's network last year by a process called Google dorking, which allows hackers to use the search engine to find vulnerable security holes in networks.

UC Berkeley Updating Network Security After White Supremacist Printer Hack. The Daily Californian (4/1, Iscoe, 3K) reported UC Berkeley is "working to upgrade network security after campus printers were attacked by a hacker last week and distributed anti-Semitic, anti-LGBT and white supremacist flyers," according to an announcement by Chancellor Nicholas Dirks. The Daily Californian adds that the University's "department of electrical engineering and computer science prevented the anti-LGBT attacks Monday by setting up a firewall to block incoming web traffic."

Authorities Arrest Man In Connection With Massachusetts Incendiary Devices. The Boston Globe (4/2, Cummings-Grady, 1.05M) reported that authorities on Saturday arrested a man in connection with incendiary devices found hanging from power lines in Tyngsboro, Massachusetts on Wednesday. Danny M. Kelly was arrested by the FBI with assistance from the Massachusetts State Police, the Army National Guard Civil Support Team, and other authorities. "FBI special agent Harold H. Shaw said authorities found nothing to suggest the devices were installed as part of a terror plot. Shaw's statement did not suggest a motive," the Globe says.

Rival Salvadoran Gangs Agree To Cease-Fire. The Washington Post (4/3, Partlow, 8.98M) reports el Salvador's "dominant" gangs have called for a cease-fire, with an 18th Street gang spokesman saying that while two of its factions and the rival MS-13 gang are "not friends," they "are united in this effort to come together to stop the violence that's assaulting our country." In the first six days of the cease-fire, an average of 10 people have been slain, "less than half" the average in the first two months of the year. Still, many experts expect the halt to be temporary. President Salvador Sánchez Cerén has "remained defiant," vowing to move hundreds of jailed gang leaders to solitary confinement while "relentlessly" pursuing those not in prison. The gangs have said they lack faith to negotiate with the government and have asked "for the international community – the United Nations, the European Union, Pope Francis – to step in as a mediator."

A separate Washington (DC) Post (4/3, Partlow, Maslin, 8.98M) article includes interviews with spokesmen from both gangs. According to the 18th Street spokesman, the "peace agreement" is a reflection of "all of the injustice" in the country, where there have already been more than 2,000 murders this year. The MS-13 spokesman said the agreement is intended to show the government, the police, and the army are also killing people. He added that human-rights advocates have "been threatened so they're staying quiet. They don't investigate what's happening."

Fugitive Medicare Fraud Felon Deported To US After 20 Years In Latin America. The Miami Herald (4/2, Weaver, 803K) reports Robert Allen Lopez, who was designated a fugitive after fleeing to Latin America following a guilty plea for taking $4.2 million in a Medicare fraud scheme in 1996, was finally extradited to Miami on Saturday after a delay in his deportation from Nicaragua, where he was arrested in January. US Marshal Amos Rojas Jr. said, "Lopez's apprehension sends a strong message to criminals around the globe that it's not a matter if we find you, it's when."

Government-Sponsored Committee To Recommend Commercial Drone Standards. The AP (4/3, Lowy, Press) reports, "A government-sponsored committee is recommending standards that could clear the way for commercial drone flights over populated areas and help speed the introduction of package delivery drones and other uses not yet possible." The standards "call for creating four categories of small drones that commercial operators can fly over people, including crowds in some cases." In a "last-minute disagreement" that "nearly kept the committee from meeting the Friday deadline for the recommendations," the Air Line Pilots Association and certain trade associations "wanted to require that all commercial drone operators pass an aviation knowledge test administered in person by the FAA and receive a background check from the Transportation Security Administration." The disagreement "was resolved by the inclusion of a dissent by those in favor of the FAA test and TSA clearance."

Iraqi, Syrian Forces Take Back Additional Territory From ISIL. In another day with little media coverage of Administration initiatives, reports indicate ISIL is being dealt significant defeats in both Iraq and Syria. In Iraq, notes the AP (4/3), government forces "took the northern edge of the Islamic State-held town of Hit, west of Baghdad, on Sunday in an operation led by the country's elite counterterrorism forces." While "the operation...was relaunched last week...the troops' progress has been slowed by hundreds of roadside bombs and efforts to safeguard thousands of civilians trapped inside the town." USA Today (4/3, Bacon, 5.45M) reports, meanwhile, that the Syrian army "claimed victory over the Islamic State in the town of Qaryatain on Sunday, one week after driving the militant group out of historic Palmyra."

It was, says AFP (4/3), "a new blow" to ISIL. The AP (4/3) similarly speaks of "another setback to the ISIS extremists in Syria," one that is "strategically significant for the government side." According to a report by Voice of America (4/3, 60K), the Syrian forces achieved their victory backed up by Russian air power. Seizing Qaryatain, added Voice of America, "gives the government a strategic victory, securing oil and gas routes between the Damascus area and oilfields in eastern Syria." Reuters (4/3, Barrington) notes that the Syrian Observatory for Human Rights contradicted the government's claims, claiming the army controlled only half of the town.

The AP (4/3) reports that "activists said last summer that Qaryatain had a mixed population of around 40,000 Sunni Muslims and Christians, as well as thousands of internally displaced people who had fled from the nearby city of Homs." However, "many of the Christians fled the town after it came under ISIS attack," and "dozens...have been abducted by the extremists." The AP adds that "while the town was under ISIS control, some were released, others were made to sign pledges to pay a tax imposed on non-Muslims."

AFP (4/4), meanwhile, reports on "a mass grave containing the bodies of 42 people executed" by ISIL in Palmyra. According to an unnamed military source, "twenty-four of the bodies found were civilians, including three children." Russia's TASS (4/3) agency, also reporting on Palmyra, cites Anne-Marie Desctes, "a senior official at the French Foreign Ministry," as saying "a full-fledged start of restoration of monuments destroyed in Syria's Palmyra will only be possible after a comprehensive truce is established in the country."

In an editorial, the Christian Science Monitor (4/3, 442K) sees signs for optimism in Syria, based on the fact that the "two-month truce is largely holding," Russia "has pulled back its fighter jets" and ISIL "appears weaker." Moreover, "a third round of talks will be held soon in Geneva to find a compromise on forming a democratic, secular state."

In terror attacks, the Fumbling Bureau of Investigation?

FBI: Shooter had been investigated 02:42

Story highlights

Peter Bergen: Critics say FBI dropped ball after investigating Orlando shooter Omar Mateen in 2013 and 2014

He says FBI fumbled similarly in several other terror cases

Bergen: Key solution is preventing those we suspect of terrorism from getting easy access to lethal weapons

Peter Bergen is CNN's national security analyst, a vice president at New America and a professor of practice at Arizona State University. He is the author of the new book "United States of Jihad: Investigating America's Homegrown Terrorists."

(CNN) The news that the FBI had investigated the Orlando terrorist, Omar Mateen, in 2013 and 2014 after he made inflammatory comments to coworkers and because he had possible connection to fellow Floridian Moner Abu-Salha -- an al Qaeda recruit who later became the first known American suicide bomber in Syria -- has generated considerable criticism of the bureau. Critics charge that it should have done more to stop Mateen.

The Mateen case is, unfortunately, far from an exception. In a number of the lethal terrorist attacks in the United States since 9/11, the FBI has investigated the perpetrator before the attack, but closed the case because there wasn't sufficient evidence (what the law enforcement community calls "derogatory information") found to continue the investigation.

So is the FBI failing at its most important job? Not necessarily, as the FBI quite properly has to work within guidelines set by the U.S. attorney general about how long an inquiry can remain open in the absence of the kind of derogatory information that would lead to a full-blown investigation.

Indeed, the FBI is often critiqued, quite properly on occasion, not for its laxity but its overzealousness -- routinely using sting operations to ensnare would-be terrorists, for instance.

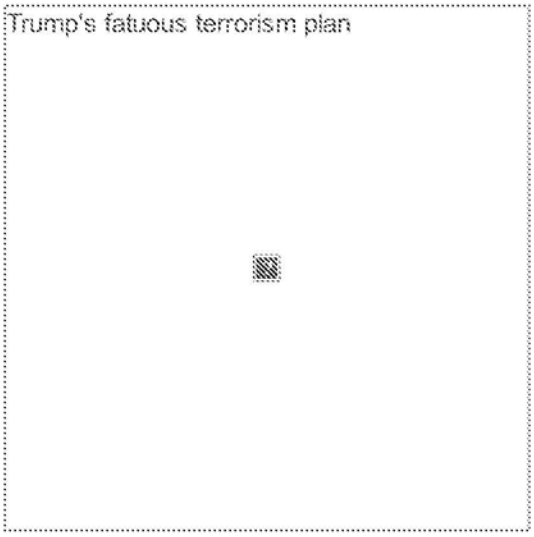
The solution is not to give the FBI greater leeway in terrorism investigations, but it is to look for other common threads linking together domestic terrorists who were previously known to the FBI -- namely, the fact that three of the most notorious among them were able to purchase legally and without restraint the kinds of lethal weapons that could maximize the violent impact of their murderous intentions.

Take Carlos Bledsoe, a convert to Islam from Memphis, Tennessee, who killed a U.S soldier at a military recruiting center in Little Rock, Arkansas, in 2009. Bledsoe first attracted the FBI's attention after Yemeni authorities arrested him in November 2008. When he was detained, Bledsoe had in his possession a fake Somali identification card and manuals about how to make bombs and gun silencers. His cell phone contained contacts for militants who were wanted in Saudi Arabia.



Donald Trump's fatuous terrorism plan (Opinion)

Some weeks into Bledsoe's imprisonment, an FBI special agent traveled to Yemen to interrogate him. The FBI had opened an "assessment" of Bledsoe, which, while not a full-scale investigation, showed that he was on its radar. Though Bledsoe insisted that he had gone to Yemen only to teach English and learn Arabic, the FBI agent informed him that he would be deported to the United States.

Following the FBI's instructions to report to them when he was back in Tennessee, Bledsoe met again with an FBI official, who tried to recruit him as an informant. When Bledsoe refused, the FBI stopped tracking him.

This decision is hard to reconcile with the information the FBI had at the time. Bledsoe had been arrested in Yemen with incriminating materials. Perhaps this information was not properly communicated to the FBI at the time by the Yemeni intelligence service, but even so, Bledsoe's arrest should have been enough to raise concern about what he might do next to keep him in their sights.

Michael Leiter, the then-director of the U.S. National Counterterrorism Center, believes that the FBI erred by not sharing their information about Bledsoe with the rest of the intelligence community. "There should have been broad dissemination on this," he later said.

Even Bledsoe expected that the Bureau would follow him after his interviews. To test whether he was under FBI surveillance, Bledsoe bought a semiautomatic rifle over-the-counter at a Wal-Mart. He figured if anyone was watching, they would have stopped him.

A few months after Bledsoe opened fire at the recruiting center in Little Rock -- killing Pvt. William Long and wounding Pvt. Quinton Ezeagwula -- U.S. Army Maj. Nidal Hasan killed 12 soldiers and a civilian at Fort Hood, Texas. Nidal, too, had been a subject of interest at the FBI.

Hasan sent Anwar Awlaki, an American cleric in Yemen who would take on an important leadership position in al Qaeda, a series of emails beginning in December 2008, asking his advice about "Muslims in the US military." In particular, he was interested in the question of whether an American Muslim soldier who turned his gun on fellow U.S. soldiers "in the name of Islam" would be fighting a "true jihad." And if he died in such an assault, would he be considered a shaheed, or a martyr for Islam?

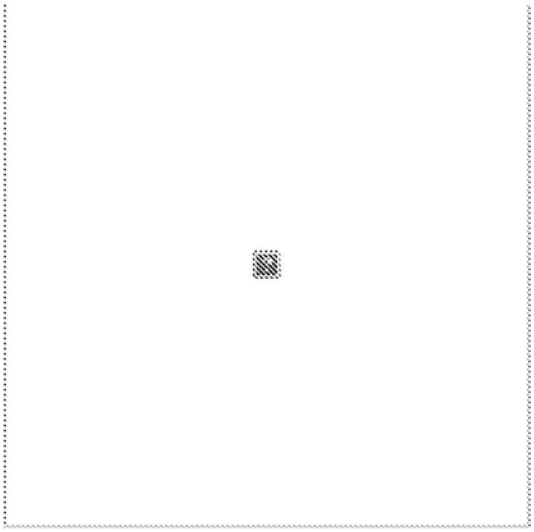
Search for motive in Fort Hood shooting

Search for motive in Fort Hood shooting 02:44

In one lengthy e-mail on May 31, 2009, Hasan suggested that suicide attacks might be "permissible" particularly in cases where the aim was "to kill enemy soldiers," even in instances where there was collateral damage to innocent bystanders.

Taken together, the 18 emails Hasan exchanged with Awlaki reveal a chillingly persistent line of inquiry: Hasan was seeking an Islamic justification for the killing of fellow American soldiers in a suicide mission that might also kill civilians.

Astonishingly, the FBI knew about the entire correspondence. After Hasan sent his first message to Awlaki in 2008, a member of the Joint Terrorism Task Force in the San Diego office of the FBI reviewed it and wrote to colleagues: "Here's another e-mail sent to Aulaqi by a guy who appears to be interested in the military. The header information suggests that his name is 'Nidal Hasan,' but that might not be true. The IP address resolves to Reston, VA. Can we check to see if this guy is a military member?"



The real terror threat in America is homegrown

After some digging around, the agent in San Diego found a Nidal Hasan assigned to the Walter Reed military hospital in Washington, D.C. Concerned by this discovery, in FBI parlance he "set a lead" to the FBI's Washington Field Office (WFO), which has handled many prominent terrorism cases. The WFO did its own investigation and responded, "Given the context of his military/medical research and the content of his, to date, unanswered messages, WFO does not currently assess Hasan to be involved in terrorist activities."

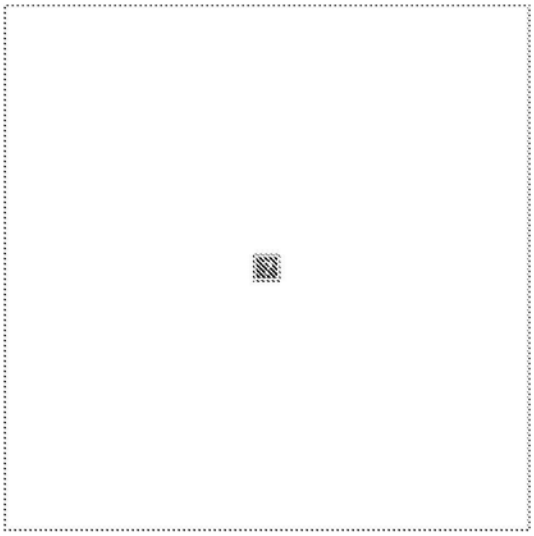
Did al-Awlaki inspire terror attacks?

Did al-Awlaki inspire terror attacks? 03:16

Agents in the FBI San Diego field office found the response puzzling. The Washington office had examined only Hasan's personnel files, which were completely innocuous. A far more useful approach would have been to talk to some of Hasan's superiors, or even to Hasan himself, which they did not do.

The San Diego agents, confused, emailed back, asking if perhaps Hasan was a "friend," or informant, for the WFO. They wrote: "The response looks a little slim, i.e. limited probing into this individual's background, no contact w/ command and no interview of Hasan. We were wondering if we were missing something, i.e. we need to read between the lines (Hasan is a friend of WFO)?"

The WFO wrote back that Hasan was not "'a friend of WFO.' If you have additional information regarding HASAN's links to terrorism or request any specific action, please share and we will re-assess."



Hillary Clinton, hawk or dove?

One of the San Diego agents called the FBI office in Washington to explore the issue further and was told, "This is not San Diego, it's DC and we don't go out and interview every Muslim guy who visits extremist websites. Besides, this guy has legitimate work-related reasons to be going to these sites and engaging these extremists in dialogue."

After this, the FBI dropped all investigation of Hasan. It was then and remains now an astonishing choice by the FBI Washington Field Office to dismiss Hasan as a serious threat. After all, a militant Islamist with constant access to U.S. military bases was in a position to do considerable damage. And there was no shortage of red flags in the e-mails themselves.

Hasan subsequently legally purchased the two guns that he used in his November 5, 2009, assault at Fort Hood that left 13 people dead and 32 others injured.

And of course, we all know by now about the bloody effects of Omar Mateen's legally-purchased AR-15.

Omar Mateen, Carlos Bledsoe and Nidal Hasan -- three of the most prominent domestic terrorists since 9/11 -- were FBI subjects of interest. Yet all legally purchased semi-automatic weapons as a prelude to their murderous rampages. In the future, such purchases of weapons must, at a minimum, be flagged to law enforcement or, even better, simply barred altogether.

So as we rightly ask questions about what the FBI knew or should have done to prevent the attack in Orlando, the FBI and other law enforcement entities must also put procedures in place going forward to prevent the subjects of terrorism inquiries from having easy access to the tools to create mass violence.

1. Emails were hacked from the Democratic National Committee and Hillary Clinton's campaign has suggested that Russian hackers were to blame. Some have taken that a step further to say that Vladimir Putin is trying to help Donald Trump get elected. Is the FBI willing to publicly blame Russia?

2. At the GOP convention last week, Donald Trump made safety and security a top priority. Is there anything the FBI and the federal government can do to make Americans more secure, and to address the rash of violence?

3. Police have been under attack in recent weeks. What can be done to better protect police? Is there a need to revise best practices for officers to avoid being ambushed? What are some thoughts about changes police can make immediately (working in pairs, mandatory body armor, limiting protest sites, etc.)?

Andy Banker (Local FOX) wants to ask about progress on things since Director Comey spoke with St. Louis reporters 2 years ago:

1. People from US, including St. Louis area, traveling to become trained and radicalized -- to bring terror back home.

2. Also, any concerns about Syrian refugees and level of confidence in our ability to flag potential terrorists who may be using refugee status as "cover".

3. I think we've looked at terrorist as ISIS only -- Dallas & Baton Rouge have reminded us there's more to worry about; is there any way to stop these attacks -- the Baton Rouge killer left quite a social media trail prior to his shooting spree.

4. Also, worldwide targets seem to be on a smaller scale: Nice, Munich. What does that say to people in St. Louis?

5. Any regrets on Clinton case? How does he respond to critics in Missouri and elsewhere that if it John or Suzy Q public involved in something like this -- they would have been indicted? In other words, Clinton wasn't indicted because she was a major party's nominee for president. Is he at all comfortable with how this all looked: her husband meeting Attorney General on an airport tarmac a few days before her interview with investigators -- the timing of the interview (on the 4th of July weekend) -- and then his announcement just a couple of days later?

Mike Bush (Local NBC)

1. It seems there is a mass shooting or a mass casualty event either here or abroad every week. Those are the ones that happen, but how many are stopped before they happen?

2. How have things changed over the last few years. Is it more difficult to stop these events. Are terrorists getting smarter?

3. We see these police shootings on home video and that leads to protests, here in St. Louis and around the country. In your opinion, do we have a use of force problem in this country?

4. It's highly unusual for the FBI to make public their findings when investigators have decided no charges should be brought but that's what you did in the Hillary Clinton email scandal. You were criticized for doing it in some circles. Why did you think it was appropriate?

5. GOP Lawmakers said the "Average Joe" would have been led off in handcuffs had they done what Hillary Clinton had done. To that you say?

6. Donald Trump has said that he will be the law and order President and he alone can fix our problems. I'm just curious as someone whose job is law and order, how you react to that?

Subject: President's Intelligence Advisory Board Meeting Request

Jim,

As discussed, the President's Intelligence Advisory Board (PIAB) has invited the Director to speak, for about an hour, on September 20th about "transition issues". They weren't able to provide additional details on the subject, but could send us a list of questions in advance. They requested the September 20th date specifically as it is their regularly scheduled board meeting and their full membership (or something close to it) would likely be present. Presently, any one-hour time period on the 20th, except for 11:30-12:30 (Dir. Clapper is scheduled for that slot) would be available to the Director.

Additional information on the PIAB, including its purpose and membership, is appended to the bottom of this message.

The Director is scheduled to be in Albany on the 20th, although I understand that he may return to Washington by late afternoon that day. Accordingly, we could:

(1) Send the Deputy Director, or another substitute, on the 20th, or

(2) Ask PIAB to reschedule a meeting with the Director, although I understand that this would likely be just with the co-Chairs, or some other subset of the organization, as the full board is not set to meet again until November 9th (after the election), or

(3) Attempt to coordinate the Director's Albany travel so that he is able to meet with the PIAB on the 20th.

Introduction

The President's Intelligence Advisory Board (PIAB), with its component Intelligence Oversight Board (IOB), is an independent element within the Executive Office of the President.

The President's Intelligence Advisory Board exists exclusively to assist the President by providing the President with an independent source of advice on the effectiveness with which the Intelligence Community is meeting the nation's intelligence needs, and the vigor and insight with which the community plans for the future. The Board has access to all information needed to perform its functions and has direct access to the President.

The Intelligence Oversight Board oversees the Intelligence Community's compliance with the Constitution and all applicable laws, Executive Orders, and Presidential Directives. It complements and supplements, rather than duplicates the oversight roles of the Director of National Intelligence, Department and Agency Inspectors General and General Counsels, and the Congressional Oversight Committees.

For more than five decades the PIAB has acted as a nonpartisan body, offering the President objective, expert advice on the conduct of U.S. intelligence.

About the PIAB

The Board consists of not more than 16 members appointed by the President from among individuals who are not employed by the Federal Government. Members are distinguished citizens selected from the national security, political, academic, and private sectors. The Board is a nonpartisan body, independent of the Intelligence Community, free from day-to-day management or operational responsibilities, and with full access to the complete range of intelligence-related information.

The President designates a Chair from among the members of the Board who convenes and presides at meetings of the Board, determines its agenda, and directs its work. The President also appoints an Executive Director, who reports to the Chairman and manages the professional staff which is selected and detailed from Intelligence Community agencies.

The Board reports its findings and recommendations on improving the performance of intelligence entities to the President as necessary, but not less than twice each year. On behalf of the President, the Board assesses issues pertaining to the:

- Quality, quantity, and adequacy of intelligence activities;
- Effectiveness of organizational structure, management, and personnel; and
- Performance of all agencies of the Federal Government engaged in the collection, evaluation, or production of intelligence or the execution of intelligence policy.

As a component element of the PIAB, the Intelligence Oversight Board's (IOB) mission is to oversee the Intelligence Community's compliance with the Constitution and all applicable laws, Executive Orders, and Presidential Directives. In reviewing the legality and propriety of intelligence activities, the Board advises the President on intelligence activities that the Board believes:

- May be unlawful or contrary to Executive Order or presidential directive;
- Are not being adequately addressed by the Attorney General, the Director of National Intelligence, or the head of the department or agency concerned; or

- Should be immediately brought to his attention.

In campaign appearances for Donald Trump, retired Lt. Gen. Michael Flynn has cast the presidential race as a continuation of the career he spent battling dangerous enemies in distant wars.

"The enemy camp in this case is Hillary Rodham Clinton," he said at a rally in Florida this month, pointing his thumbs down in disgust. "This is a person who does not know the difference between a lie and the truth. ... She is somebody who will leave Americans behind on the battlefield."

As chants of "Lock her up!" rose from the crowd, Flynn nodded with enthusiasm and said he was "so proud standing up here to be an American."

It was a jarring moment in a race full of them -- a retired three-star general comparing a presidential candidate to the al-Qaida militants he faced in Afghanistan and Iraq, calling for a former senator and secretary of state to be imprisoned.

The appearance was only the latest eyebrow-raising episode from Flynn, 56, who was one of the most respected military intelligence officers of his generation but who has spurned the decorum traditionally expected of retired U.S. flag officers and become the only national security figure of his rank and experience to publicly align himself with Trump.

The unruly 2016 campaign has drawn dozens of former senior national security officials into the fray, including 50 Republicans who this month signed a letter saying Trump "lacks the character, values and experience" to be president. Denunciations of Trump from retired Marine Gen. John Allen -- who spoke at the Democratic convention -- and former acting CIA director Michael Morell struck some as compromising their former institutions' apolitical role in American democracy.

But Flynn, who vaulted to public attention with his speech at the Republican National Convention last month, has rattled even some of his most long-standing colleagues, engaging in harsh, partisan rhetoric that, to his critics, seems to clash with the principles and values he spent a career defending.

He has called President Barack Obama a "liar," declared the U.S. justice system "corrupt" and insisted that he was pushed out of his assignment as director of the Defense Intelligence Agency because of his views on radical Islam. The claim has left former superiors seething, including Director of National Intelligence James Clapper, according to current and former officials who said Flynn was removed because of management problems.

Like Trump, Flynn has advocated forging closer ties with Russia. In interviews with The Washington Post, Flynn acknowledged being paid to give a speech and attend a lavish anniversary party for the Kremlin-controlled RT television network in Moscow last year, where he was seated next to the Russian leader.

"People went crazy," said retired Brig. Gen. Peter Zwack, the former U.S. military attache in Moscow. "They thought it was so out-of-bounds, so unusual." Zwack emphasized that he regards Flynn as a "patriot" who "would never sell out his country."

Flynn, who was no longer in government but got a DIA briefing on Russia before the trip, said the invitation and payment came through his speaker's bureau. He said he used the visit to press for collaboration in Syria, Iran and the Middle East and dismissed the ensuing controversy as "boring." Asked why he would want to be so closely associated with a Kremlin propaganda platform, Flynn said he sees no distinction between RT and other news outlets.

"What's CNN? What's MSNBC? Come on!" said Flynn, who has also occasionally appeared as an unpaid on-air analyst for RT and other foreign broadcasters.

Dismayed by Flynn's behavior since he left the military, former colleagues have contacted him to urge him to show more restraint. Among them are retired Gen. Stanley A. McChrystal, who relied heavily on Flynn in both Iraq and Afghanistan, and retired Adm. Michael Mullen, the former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. McChrystal declined to comment.

Mullen provided a written statement saying that "for retired senior officers to take leading and vocal roles as clearly partisan figures is a violation of the ethos and professionalism of apolitical military service." Officers are sworn to execute orders without regard for political positions, an oath to the Constitution that "is inviolable and presidents must never question it or doubt it," he said.

Flynn and Allen "have violated this principle and confused that clarity," Mullen said. "This is not about the right to speak out, it is about the disappointing lack of judgment in doing so for crass partisan purposes. This is made worse by using hyperbolic language all the while leveraging the respected title of 'general.' "

Allen noted that retired U.S. military officers have frequently taken public positions in presidential campaigns, including a number of recent chairmen, and that he did so out of concern with Trump's calls for resuming the use of torture, killing families of terrorism suspects and mass-bombing cities in Syria.

"Retired senior officers should not take lightly the impact of public commentary in a political environment," Allen said. "I chose to do so because I believe that Trump was proposing policies and orders to the U.S. military as a potential Commander in Chief, which I believed would create a civil-military crisis. This is a matter of conscience for me, because in moments of crisis such as these, credible voices must speak out."

In interviews, Flynn said he respects his former superiors but rejected their entreaties as attempts to silence him and impinge his free speech rights. "When someone says, 'You're a general, so you have to shut up,' " he said, "I say, 'Do I have to stop being an American?' "

Flynn dismisses his critics as closet Clinton supporters or misguided colleagues who have put their pursuit of corporate board seats and lucrative consulting contracts ahead of their concern for the country. Most retired generals "are afraid to speak out," he said, because they use their stars "for themselves, for their businesses."

Flynn said his foray into politics began last year when he volunteered to advise five Republican candidates. He said that he first met Trump 11 months ago and that he spoke with him by phone several times before being asked to deliver a speech at the Republican convention.

Trump is a "very serious guy. Good listener. Asked really good questions," Flynn said. His role in the campaign has yet to be defined. Flynn said he has never met with Trump's foreign policy adviser, Carter Page, and has not been promised any position if the real estate baron wins.

Flynn's credentials and vocal backing of Trump have fueled speculation that he could be in line for a high-level national security job if Trump is elected. He was briefly considered a potential Trump running mate before the candidate picked Mike Pence, the Republican governor of Indiana.

Rather than scaling back, Flynn, a registered Democrat, has become an avid campaigner for Trump whose views and impulses increasingly echo those of the Republican candidate.

He sees the nation as beset by darkness and corruption, with voters split between "centrist nationalists" and "socialists."

The divide has weakened the nation's ability to grasp what he regards as an existential threat from "a diseased component" of Islam. "There's something going on in the Muslim world," he said. "Why do we have heightened security at our airports? It's not because the Catholic Church is falling apart."

Flynn's sudden political prominence represents a departure from a 33-year military career spent largely in the shadowy realm of military intelligence and Special Operations missions. Former colleagues said they could not recall Flynn ever discussing politics while in uniform or voicing the views he has embraced since his career came to an abrupt end.

The son of a World War II and Korean War veteran, Flynn was one of nine children in a close-knit Irish family in Rhode Island. His brother Charlie is a two-star general in the U.S. Army.

Flynn's early years in uniform coincided with the end of the Cold War, but he made his mark after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks as an intense officer with a string of important intelligence assignments.

He has held senior positions in the 18th Airborne Corps, at the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the Pentagon and at U.S. Central Command, which runs U.S. military operations in the Middle East. Throughout his career, he was seen as a charismatic and unconventional officer with a talent for mapping terrorist networks -- qualities prized by superiors. But his hard-charging approach was at times seen as disruptive or undisciplined.

He is best known for his integral role in the lethal machine that McChrystal assembled in Iraq to eviscerate the al-Qaida affiliate there. Together, they perfected an approach known as "find, fix, finish" that relied on the elite Joint Special Operations Command to carry out raids and then used intelligence from captured militants and materials to identify new targets at a blistering tempo.

When McChrystal was put in charge of the war in Afghanistan, he tapped Flynn again to serve as his top intelligence officer. Flynn used that job to position himself as a gifted strategist, helping co-author a 26-page article, "Fixing Intel," that depicted the intelligence-gathering mission in Afghanistan as a failing endeavor -- too focused on finding targets rather than understanding cultural complexities. The article was praised by some in the military as insightful, but critics considered it grandstanding at the expense of his predecessors.

Some of Flynn's other moves angered superiors. Former U.S. officials said Flynn was scolded after traveling to Pakistan in 2009 or early 2010 and revealing to Pakistani officials sensitive U.S. intelligence on the militant Haqqani network accused of staging attacks on American forces. U.S. officials said the move was aimed at prodding Pakistan to crack down on the militant group, but that Flynn exposed U.S. intelligence capabilities that only helped Pakistan protect an organization it used as a proxy ally.

Flynn also came under investigation by the Pentagon over an allegation that he had inappropriately shared highly classified intelligence with Australian and British forces. "I'm proud of that one," Flynn said in an interview. "Accuse me of sharing intelligence in combat with our closest allies! Please!"

The probe delayed but did not derail Flynn's ascent through the ranks. Always pushing for a deeper understanding of terrorist networks, Flynn convinced Clapper in 2011 to let him form a team to reexamine the materials recovered from bin Laden's compound in Pakistan, searching for clues overlooked by the CIA. In 2012, he was tapped by Obama for one of the highest positions a military intelligence officer can attain, running the Defense Intelligence Agency.

Flynn arrived with a mandate for change. He began trying to reorganize the agency into regionally focused centers, station more analysts overseas and build a spying capability that could rival the CIA. In public remarks, he warned any employees who resisted his agenda that he would "move them or fire them."

Almost from the outset there were concerns at the Pentagon that Flynn was struggling to execute his reform plans and that the agency was beset by turmoil. A career staff officer, Flynn had little experience running a large organization, let alone a plodding institution like the DIA, with nearly 20,000 employees.

Former subordinates at the DIA said Flynn was so prone to dubious pronouncements that senior aides coined a term --"Flynn facts" -- for assertions that seemed questionable or inaccurate.

The DIA job is ordinarily a three-year assignment. But early in Flynn's second year, his bosses -- Clapper and then-Undersecretary of Defense for Intelligence Michael Vickers -- summoned Flynn to a meeting at the Pentagon to tell him that he was being removed.

As the search for a replacement stalled, Flynn attempted an end-run around his superiors, appealing directly to the vice chief of staff of the Army to extend his tenure. The move infuriated Clapper, according to former officials who said the DNI warned Flynn that if he made any other attempt to circumvent the outcome he would be fired on the spot. Clapper declined to comment for this story, but several current and former officials confirmed the account.

Flynn disputed the account as well as the claim that he had shared sensitive intelligence with Pakistan, saying in an email that the claims are "all false."

Flynn characterizes his ouster as a political purge orchestrated by an administration unwilling to heed the warnings he was sounding about militant Islam. Asked for evidence, he said, "I just know!" adding that Clapper had once told him that the issue behind Flynn's ouster was "not your leadership, or I would have removed you right away."

The decision to remove Flynn was "about turbulence and a destructive climate," said a former senior U.S. intelligence official. "I don't think anybody in the administration was even aware of his views" on radical Islam.

Flynn's views have become more strident since leaving DIA and are increasingly aimed at Obama. He said he is "sick and tired" of Obama taking credit for approving the 2011 mission that led to the death of Osama bin Laden. "This decision to kill bin Laden ... so what?!" he said. "What did it really do?"

Once firmly against waterboarding and other banned interrogation measures, Flynn now appears at least willing to consider supporting Trump's threat to reinstate those methods, saying he would be reluctant to take options off the table. Asked on Al Jazeera in May whether he would allow the military to carry out Trump's threat to kill any families of suspected terrorists, Flynn replied, "I would have to see the circumstances of that situation."

In February, Flynn posted a video about a Pakistani terrorist group on his Twitter account with the comment: "Fear of Muslims is RATIONAL."

His views are difficult to reconcile with some of the prescriptions for fighting terrorism that he outlines in a recent book, "The Field of Fight: How We Can Win the Global War Against Radical Islam and Its Allies," that he co-authored with neoconservative analyst Michael Ledeen.

In the book, Flynn argues that the United States needs new partnerships with Middle Eastern countries and a deeper understanding of radical ideology. He said Egypt, Jordan, Qatar and Saudi Arabia should shoulder more of the responsibility for ridding their nations of terrorists, accept more Syrian refugees and deploy soldiers in Syria.

Asked whether his comments about Islam or Trump's behavior -- threatening to ban Muslims from entering the United States, vilifying the parents of a fallen Muslim American soldier -- might alienate those potential Middle East partners, Flynn said, "I don't see it that way. I see a lot of Muslims who actually want this conversation. They want this point to be made."

THE 2016 POLITICO 50 UNVEILED TODAY

Ted Cruz and Bernie Sanders Top POLITICO's 3rd Annual List

"Do ideas still matter in the year of Donald Trump?" That's the question POLITICO Magazine grapples with in our third annual POLITICO 50 list of thinkers and doers changing American politics in 2016- and the answer we offer is a resounding yes.

In the midst of an often bizarre and sometimes downright depressing election, this list represents something altogether surprising: a collection of people who, no matter their widely divergent views, offer powerful examples of how and why ideas continue to make a difference in politics and policy. For our number one spot on this campaign-year edition of the list, we've chosen an unlikely pairing of ideological opposites: U.S. Senators Ted Cruz and Bernie Sanders, who most powerfully used the platform of a presidential race to remind America that actual ideas, shouted clearly, over and over, can build movements.

SEE THE FULL LIST:

http://politi.co/1KcgGfH

From U.S. Senators Ted Cruz and Bernie Sanders leading ideological movements- to Speaker Paul Ryan working to prove the GOP is still a party of ideas- to former Fox News host Gretchen Carlson holding TV news and her employer accountable- to DeRay Mckesson and Brittany Packnett leading the Black Lives Matter movement- to FBI Director James Comey being a straight shooter in a town that needs them - to Medium Founder and CEO Evan Williams cutting out the media middleman- to Hamilton composer, lyricist, and actor Lin-Manuel Miranda showing us how rap can rewrite history- the people on this year's POLITICO 50 list are transforming American politics.

Special Features from the POLITICO 50 Issue:

"Do Ideas Still Matter In the Year of Trump?"- Let's face the facts: 2016 has not been about ideas. Where will it leave the two parties when it comes to big ideas in politics? Michael Grunwald explores if ideas will ever shape our politics again. http://politi.co/2c979tO

What's Wrong With America's White People?- POLITICO's Susan B. Glasser and Glenn Thrush moderate an expert discussion on the question: Do poor white Americans suddenly feel more disgruntled than ever, or are the rest of us just now paying attention? Featuring POLITICO 50 members Carol Anderson, Anne Case, Angus Deaton, Nancy Isenberg and J.D. Vance. http://politi.co/2cawimQ

Trump Before Trump - If you're looking for an intellectual antecedent for Donald Trump, Pat Buchanan (No. 7 on our list) and his populist "America First" campaigns are a good place to start, says Jeff Greenfield. http://politi.co/2c8IFB3

Yes, Immigration Hurts American Workers- George Borjas (No. 17) says the problem with the current immigration debate is that neither side is revealing the whole picture. Trump overlooks that an influx of immigrants can potentially be a net good for the nation. Clinton ignores the hard truth that not everyone benefits when immigrants arrive. http://politi.co/2c9501e

How the Democrats Lost Touch on Trade - One of the most startling developments of this most peculiar campaign season has been the emergence of trade as an electrifying political issue. Author Thomas Frank (No. 15) explains how the American public grew furious over trade deals beloved by the political class. http://politi.co/2c94AYU

Conservatives Don't Own the GOP- To put it mildly, this election cycle has revealed serious fault lines and weaknesses on the right, and the Republican Party will be working to make sense of it all for years. Yuval Levin (No. 27) explores how conservatives lost Republican voters and how to win them back. http://politi.co/2cJ0Y3E

What's With Hillary Clinton's Woman Problem? - Does Hillary Clinton have a woman problem? With only a couple of months until a November election that could put the first woman in the White House, the answer, amazingly enough, is yes. Jill Filipovic explores why young female voters are wary of Clinton, and why feminists like Gloria Steinem, Madeleine Albright and Lena Dunham (No. 22) are still fighting for gender solidarity in the campaign. http://politi.co/2ca9ELh

Black Lives Matter Isn't Just a Hashtag Anymore - Activist Brittany Packnett (No. 3) writes about what happened when the Black Lives Matter movement met the cold realities of politics, and the challenge of bringing a spirit of protest to the realm of policy. http://politi.co/2c968SC

What Everyone Still Doesn't Get About the Islamic State - Journalist Rukmini Callimachi (No. 30) has become an indispensable guide to understanding the Islamic State, and cutting through the fog of misinformation from politicians. Reporter Graeme Wood talks with Callimachi about what it's like to try to penetrate one of the world's most dangerous and shadowy organizations-and what we're still getting wrong. http://politi.co/2caaMi8

American Growth Has Slowed Down. Get Used to It. - Growth has been our American mantra, but it might just prove to be an elusive slogan. Economist Robert J. Gordon (No. 16) says to beware of politicians bearing promises of a return to a vanished past. http://politi.co/2cmbNYR

U.S. intelligence officials are seeking to determine whether an American businessman identified by Donald Trump as one of his foreign policy advisers has opened up private communications with senior Russian officials — including talks about the possible lifting of economic sanctions if the Republican nominee becomes president, according to multiple sources who have been briefed on the issue.

The activities of Trump adviser Carter Page, who has extensive business interests in Russia, have been discussed with senior members of Congress during recent briefings about suspected efforts by Moscow to influence the presidential election, the sources said. After one of those briefings, Senate minority leader Harry Reid wrote FBI Director James Comey, citing reports of meetings between a Trump adviser (a reference to Page) and "high ranking sanctioned individuals" in Moscow over the summer as evidence of "significant and disturbing ties" between the Trump campaign and the Kremlin that needed to be investigated by the bureau.

Some of those briefed were "taken aback" when they learned about Page's contacts in Moscow, viewing them as a possible back channel to the Russians that could undercut U.S. foreign policy, said a congressional source familiar with the briefings but who asked for anonymity due to the sensitivity of the subject. The source added that U.S. officials in the briefings indicated that intelligence reports about the adviser's talks with senior Russian officials close to President Vladimir Putin were being "actively monitored and investigated."

A senior U.S. law enforcement official did not dispute that characterization when asked for comment by Yahoo News. "It's on our radar screen," said the official about Page's contacts with Russian officials. "It's being looked at."

Page is a former Merrill Lynch investment banker in Moscow who now runs a New York consulting firm, Global Energy Capital, located around the corner from Trump Tower, that specializes in oil and gas deals in Russia and other Central Asian countries. He declined repeated requests to comment for this story.

Trump first mentioned Page's name when asked to identify his "foreign policy team" during an interview with the Washington Post editorial team last March. Describing him then only as a "PhD," Trump named Page as among five advisers "that we are dealing with." But his precise role in the campaign remains unclear; Trump spokeswoman Hope Hicks last month called him an "informal foreign adviser" who "does not speak for Mr. Trump or the campaign." Asked this week by Yahoo News, Trump campaign spokesman Jason Miller said Page "has no role" and added: "We are not aware of any of his activities, past or present." Miller did not respond when asked why Trump had previously described Page as one of his advisers.

The questions about Page come amid mounting concerns within the U.S. intelligence community about Russian cyberattacks on the Democratic National Committee and state election databases in Arizona and Illinois. In a rare public talk this week, former undersecretary of defense for intelligence Mike Vickers said that the Russian cyberattacks constituted meddling in the U.S. election and were "beyond the pale." Also, this week, two senior Democrats — Sen. Dianne Feinstein, ranking minority member on the Senate Intelligence Committee, and Rep. Adam Schiff, ranking minority member on the House Intelligence Committee — released a joint statement that went further then what U.S. officials had publicly said about the matter.

"Based on briefings we have received, we have concluded that the Russian intelligence agencies are making a serious and concerted effort to influence the U.S. election," they said. "At the least, this effort is intended to sow doubt about the security of our election and may well be intended to influence the outcomes of the election." They added that "orders for the Russian intelligence agencies to conduct such actions could come only from very senior levels of the Russian government."

Page came to the attention of officials at the U.S. Embassy in Moscow several years ago when he showed up in the Russian capital during several business trips and made provocative public comments critical of U.S. policy and sympathetic to Putin. "He was pretty much a brazen apologist for anything Moscow did," said one U.S. official who served in Russia at the time.

He hasn't been shy about expressing those views in the U.S. as well. Last March, shorty after he was named by Trump as one of his advisers, Page told Bloomberg News he had been an adviser to, and investor in, Gazprom, the Russian state-owned gas company. He then blamed Obama administration sanctions — imposed as a response to the Russian annexation of Crimea — for driving down the company's stock. "So many people who I know and have worked with have been so adversely affected by the sanctions policy," Page said in the interview. "There's a lot of excitement in terms of the possibilities for creating a better situation."

Page showed up again in Moscow in early July, just two weeks before the Republican National Convention formally nominated Trump for president, and once again criticized U.S. policy. Speaking at a commencement address for the New Economic School, an institution funded in part by major Russian oligarchs close to Putin, Page asserted that "Washington and other West capitals" had impeded progress in Russia "through their often hypocritical focus on ideas such as democratization, inequality, corruption and regime change."

At the time, Page declined to say whether he was meeting with Russian officials during his trip, according to a Reuters report.

But U.S. officials have since received intelligence reports that during that same three-day trip, Page met with Igor Sechin, a longtime Putin associate and former Russian deputy prime minister who is now the executive chairman of Rosneft, Russian's leading oil company, a well-placed Western intelligence source tells Yahoo News. That meeting, if confirmed, is viewed as especially problematic by U.S. officials because the Treasury Department in August 2014 named Sechin to a list of Russian officials and businessmen sanctioned over Russia's "illegitimate and unlawful actions in the Ukraine." (The Treasury announcement described Sechin as "utterly loyal to Vladimir Putin — a key component to his current standing." At their alleged meeting, Sechin raised the issue of the lifting of sanctions with Page, the Western intelligence source said.

U.S. intelligence agencies have also received reports that Page met with another top Putin aide while in Moscow — Igor Diveykin. A former Russian security official, Diveykin now serves as deputy chief for internal policy and is believed by U.S. officials to have responsibility for intelligence collected by Russian agencies about the U.S. election, the Western intelligence source said

Not too many things to be briefed tonight other than below items:

1. Candidate Trump's team has requested a briefing on Cyber threats. We are awaiting further details/response from the DNI who actually controls the briefings. I will keep you updated as I know more.
2. Former Top Ten fugitive [redacted] will be extradited from Mexico City to Dallas on October 6th. [redacted] is the 19th FBI Top Tenner apprehended in Mexico. As you may recall, [redacted] is believed to be responsible for orchestrating a murder-for-hire plot of a prominent Dallas area dentist who was shot and killed next to her car in a basement parking garage. b6 b7C
3. The Baltimore takedown went well and you were correct, HRT did assist.....can't find "emogi" or you would get a smiley face. As of tonight, there were 46 subjects in custody. All total, the breakdown of individuals indicted were as follows: 18 correctional officers, 34 inmates, and 28 outside facilitators.

I asked [redacted] to stay behind tomorrow to quickly brief you on the Weiner matter which is growing more complicated, but it can wait until then.

That's it for tonight.

For Immediate Release
DHS Press Office

The U.S. Intelligence Community (USIC) is confident that the Russian Government directed the recent compromises of e-mails from US persons and institutions, including from US political organizations. The recent disclosures of alleged hacked e-mails on sites like DCLeaks.com and WikiLeaks and by the Guccifer 2.0 online persona are consistent with the methods and motivations of Russian-directed efforts. These thefts and disclosures are intended to interfere with the US election process. Such activity is not new to Moscow—the Russians have used similar tactics and techniques across Europe and Eurasia, for example, to influence public opinion there. We believe, based on the scope and sensitivity of these efforts, that only Russia's senior-most officials could have authorized these activities.

Some states have also recently seen scanning and probing of their election-related systems, which in most cases originated from servers operated by a Russian company. However, we are not now in a position to attribute this activity to the Russian Government. The USIC and the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) assess that it would be extremely difficult for someone, including a nation-state actor, to alter actual ballot counts or election results by cyber attack or intrusion. This assessment is based on the decentralized nature of our election system in this country and the number of protections state and local election officials have in place. States ensure that voting machines are not connected to the Internet, and there are numerous checks and balances as well as extensive oversight at multiple levels built into our election process.

Nevertheless, DHS continues to urge state and local election officials to be vigilant and seek cybersecurity assistance from DHS. A number of states have already done so. DHS is providing several services to state and local election officials to assist in their cybersecurity. These services include cyber "hygiene" scans of Internet-facing systems, risk and vulnerability assessments, information sharing about cyber incidents, and best practices for securing voter registration databases and addressing potential cyber threats. DHS has convened an Election Infrastructure Cybersecurity Working Group with experts across all levels of government to raise awareness of cybersecurity risks potentially affecting election infrastructure and the elections process. Secretary Johnson and DHS officials are working directly with the National Association of Secretaries of State to offer assistance, share information, and provide additional resources to state and local officials.

All, Please see tonight's news summary below. Coverage of the investigation is woven into many of the stories that focus on the Rich documents released today.

1) NY TIMES

a) NY Times (via AP): FBI Release of Clinton Archives Raises Timing Questions

Only days before the presidential election, the FBI released an archive of documents from a long-closed investigation into Bill Clinton's 2001 presidential pardon of a fugitive financier, prompting questions from Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign about its timing. The release comes amid the bureau's controversially timed review of emails from a Hillary Clinton aide. The 129 pages of heavily censored material about Bill Clinton's presidential pardon of Marc Rich were published Monday on the FBI's Freedom of Information Act webpage and noted by one of the bureau's Twitter accounts Tuesday. Earlier in October, the FBI unit published historical information relating to Trump's father, Fred Trump.

b) NY TImes: James Comey - the Do-the-right-thing-guy caught in the middle of Clinton Email Maelstrom

FBI Director James Comey once called it a crucial leadership test: Anticipating whether a decision makes sense "through the eyes of others." Now his own big decision has Democrats and even some Republicans wondering whether he failed his own test. The FBI director who prides himself on moral rectitude and a squeaky-clean reputation is being criticized from all sides for lobbing a stink bomb into the center of the presidential race. His disclosure that investigators have found more emails that may — or may not — relate to Democrat Hillary Clinton's use of a private email setup as secretary of state has jolted the race and generated far more questions than answers.

a) After Another Release of Documents, FBI Finds Itself in a Partisan Fray

The surprise tweet from a little-used FBI account came about 1 p.m. Tuesday, announcing that the agency had published on its website 129 pages of internal documents related to a years-old investigation into former president Bill Clinton's pardon of a fugitive Democratic donor. The seemingly random reminder of one of the darkest chapters of the Clinton presidency a week before the election drew an immediate rebuke from Hillary Clinton's campaign — with its spokesman tweeting that the FBI's move was "odd" and asking whether the agency planned to publish unflattering records about Republican candidate Donald Trump. "Will FBI be posting docs on Trump's housing discrimination in '70s?" asked Brian Fallon.

3) NBC NEWS: Attorney General Met With FBI Director Over Email Probe

Attorney General Loretta Lynch and FBI Director James Comey met Monday to discuss reviewing as swiftly as possible the newly discovered emails that could be related to their probe of Hillary Clinton's private server, officials told NBC News. Lynch and Comey spoke following their regular national security meeting at the Justice Department. During the meeting, which FBI and Justice Department officials described as cordial, Lynch expressed her continued confidence in Comey, one Justice Department official told NBC News.

4) WSJ Journal: FBI Releases Documents from 2001 Probe into Bill Clinton Pardon

The Federal Bureau of Investigation on Tuesday released files related to a years-old probe involving former President Bill Clinton, further stirring Democrats' anger over the agency's disclosure of newly discovered emails possibly related to Hillary Clinton. The heavily redacted case files released were part of a 2001 probe into Mr. Clinton's pardon of billionaire fugitive Marc Rich. FBI officials said the release wasn't intentionally done during the last days of the election campaign. The FBI posted the documents to "The Vault," its website for publishing responses to requests under the Freedom of Information Act, or FOIA. The bureau receives thousands of such requests a year but posts online only those that have at least three different requesters.

5) BLOOMBERG: FBI's Comey Still Has Confidence in FBI Director Comey

U.S. Attorney General Loretta Lynch continues to have confidence in FBI Director James Comey despite his controversial decision to renew a probe related to Hillary Clinton's use of a private e-mail system, an official said.

Comey and Lynch spoke briefly after a meeting in Washington on Monday, according to the official, who requested anonymity to discuss a private conversation. The FBI chief and the attorney general still have a good working relationship, the official said, even though they disagreed on his decision to disclose the probe so close to the Nov. 8 presidential election. In their conversation, Lynch stressed the seriousness of resolving the matter, the official said. However, it's not clear if there will be an update on the probe that could be provided to lawmakers and the public this week, according to the official, who added that no more announcements are currently planned.

6) Politico: FBI Never Asked Clinton Aides for All Their Devices

The FBI never asked Hillary Clinton's top aides to turn over all the computers and smartphones they used while Clinton was secretary of state, an omission that is now triggering questions from Republican lawmakers.

While the FBI made a concerted effort to obtain all the computers that were used as Clinton's private server and ultimately asked two of Clinton's lawyers for laptops used to review her email messages, investigators never requested or demanded all equipment her top staffers used for work purposes during her four years at State, a source familiar with the investigation told POLITICO. "No one was asked for devices by the FBI," said the source, who requested anonymity. The decision left the FBI at least partially dependent on the aides' attorneys' decisions about which messages were work-related and therefore might have contained classified information the agents were looking for. Those messages were turned over to State in response to its request last year.

The FBI has been conducting multiple investigations of alleged connections between Russia and Donald Trump, his presidential campaign or its backers. But none so far have yielded proof of criminal connections between the parties.
US law enforcement and intelligence officials investigating hacks of Democratic Party organizations view Russian spy agencies as trying to sow chaos and confusion in the US elections, but not necessarily trying to help a particular candidate. The US government has publicly accused senior levels of Russian government of being behind hacks on Democratic groups and the release of sensitive documents online. The accusations including meddling in the 2016 election.

Subject: Weekend coverage

All, Much of the news this weekend focused on Mrs. Clinton's comments yesterday on a call with donors. I have combed through the stories today to see how they differ from the major news outlets. I've included the first relevant paragraphs at the top of the story, then broken up the story (Story Break) with what I saw as relevant context in the story.

My summary is below:

1) NY Times: Hillary Clinton Blames FBI Director for Election Loss
http://www.nytimes.com/2016/11/13/us/politics/hillary-clinton-james-comey.html?_r=0
Hillary Clinton on Saturday cast blame for her surprise election loss on the announcement by the F.B.I. director, James B. Comey, days before the election that he had revived the inquiry into her use of a private email server. In her most extensive remarks since she conceded the race to Donald J. Trump early Wednesday, Mrs. Clinton told donors on a 30-minute conference call that Mr. Comey's decision to send a letter to Congress about the inquiry 11 days before Election Day had thrust the controversy back into the news and had prevented her from ending the campaign with an optimistic closing argument. "There are lots of reasons why an election like this is not successful," Mrs. Clinton said, according to a donor who relayed the remarks. But, she added, "our analysis is that Comey's letter raising doubts that were groundless, baseless, proven to be, stopped our momentum."....
(Story Break)
Presidential candidates have a long history of blaming forces outside their control for their losses. In 2004, John Kerry linked his defeat to a videotape of Osama bin Laden that appeared days before the election, stoking fears about terrorism. In 2012, Mitt Romney told donors he had lost because President Obama had vowed to bestow "gifts" on Democratic special interests groups, namely African-Americans, Hispanics and young people. Mrs. Clinton's contention appears to be more rooted in reality — and hard data. An internal campaign memo with polling data said that "there is no question that a week from Election Day, Secretary Clinton was poised for a historic win," but that, in the end, "late-breaking developments in the race proved one hurdle too many for us to overcome."
(Story Break)
Still, Mrs. Clinton's instinct to shun any personal responsibility angered some Democrats. Several donors on the call, while deeply bitter about Mr. Comey's actions, said they believed that Mrs. Clinton and her campaign had suffered avoidable missteps that handed the election to an unacceptable opponent. They pointed to the campaign's lack of a compelling message for white working-class voters and to decisions years ago by Mrs. Clinton to use a private email address at the State Department and to accept millions of dollars for speeches to Wall Street. "There is a special place in hell for Clinton staff, allegedly including Cheryl Mills, that okayed the email server setup," Jim Manley, a Democratic strategist and former senior aide to Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, wrote on Sidewire, a social media site, referring to a longtime aide and lawyer to Mrs. Clinton.

2) Washington Post: Hillary Clinton Blames One Comey Letter for Stopping Momentum and the Other For Turning Out Trump Voters https://www.washingtonpost.com/news/post-politics/wp/2016/11/12/hillary-clinton-blames-one-comey-letter-for-stopping-momentum-and-the-other-for-turning-out-trump-voters/
Hillary Clinton blamed the renewed FBI inquiry into her State Department email system for blunting her momentum in the presidential election and the closure of that inquiry two days before Election Day for energizing voters for Donald Trump. "There are lots of reasons why an election like this is not successful," Clinton told top donors on a farewell conference call Saturday. "But our analysis is that [FBI Director James B.] Comey's letter raising doubts that were groundless, baseless, proven to be, stopped our momentum," she said.
(Story Break)
Clinton did not accuse Comey of partisanship Saturday. But she did say that what should have been good news essentially backfired. Comey issued another letter to Congress on the Sunday before Election Day, concluding that the nine-day examination of newly discovered emails had turned up nothing to change his earlier conclusion that there had been no criminal conduct. "Just as we were back up on the upward trajectory, the second letter from Comey essentially doing what we knew it would — saying there was no there there — was a real motivator for Trump's voters," Clinton said.
(Story Break)
The Democrat focused on the outside events she said affected her campaign in the last three weeks of the election. She said nothing about other, larger forces at work — Trump's message of change in a restive time, his pledge to represent the aggrieved working class, the difficulty of any political party winning a third consecutive presidential term, her own limited attention to economic anxiety, or the sexism and discomfort that surrounded her attempt to become the first female president.

3) WSJ: Hillary Clinton Attributes FBI Letters as Factors in Election Loss http://www.wsj.com/articles/hillary-clinton-attributes-fbi-letters-as-factor-in-election-loss-1478994890
Hillary Clinton told supporters Saturday that letters about her email practices sent by the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation to Congress in the final days of the presidential race weighed heavily on her campaign and contributed to her defeat, according to a person who heard her remarks.
Mrs. Clinton, on a conference call with some of her top fundraisers four days after her stunning loss to Donald Trump, said FBI Director James Comey's decision to alert Congress about what he described as fresh developments in the email case motivated the Republican nominee's supporters and gave her rival a new argument to use against her on the trail, this person said.
(Story Break)
Other Clinton supporters say that Mr. Comey isn't solely to blame for Mrs. Clinton's defeat. They point to various strategic missteps made by her campaign, including spending time and money in North Carolina, Arizona and other states that weren't crucial to collecting the 270 electoral votes needed to win. The FBI declined to comment Saturday. Former Clinton campaign aides didn't immediately respond to a request for comment.

4) Politico: Clinton Blames Comey Letters for Defeat
http://www.politico.com/story/2016/11/hillary-clinton-comey-letters-defeat-231280
Hillary Clinton pinned the blame for her defeat on FBI Director James Comey's letters about her email arrangement in a conference call with her top campaign contributors on Saturday afternoon. Speaking with Democrats who raised over $100,000 for her failed bid for the presidency, the former secretary of state said Comey's second letter — just three days before the election — did more damage than the first, which landed just 11 days out, according to one individual on the call, who described her tone as clearly sad but hopeful. Clinton told participants that the campaign's data saw her numbers plunge after the first letter, then rebounded. But the second letter, she said, awakened Donald Trump's voters.
(The story was short with no other context)

5) NY Magazine: Hillary Clinton Blames FBI Director James Comey for Her Defeat
http://nymag.com/daily/intelligencer/2016/11/hillary-clinton-blames-fbi-director-james-comey-for-defeat.html
Hillary Clinton told her top campaign contributors on Saturday that F.B.I. Director James Comey was to blame for her loss to Donald Trump on Election Day, according to Politico. During a 30-minute conference call with donors who gave $100,000 or more to her campaign, Clinton cited the two letters Director Comey sent to members of Congress, regarding an ultimately inconsequential trove of newly discovered emails, as the main reason Donald Trump was able to pull off his shocking upset win on Tuesday. In particular, she claimed that the second letter Comey sent two days before the election, in which he cleared of her and her aides of wrongdoing yet again, did even more damage than the letter announcing the trove in the first place. According to Clinton, campaign data indicated that the first letter had indeed initially made her numbers collapse, but they later recovered. The second letter, however, drove a late push of Trump voters to the polls, as it damaged her standing with those who bought into Trump's rhetoric about Clinton benefitting from a "rigged system."
(Story break)
Clinton apparently conceded that there are "lots of reasons why an election like this is not successful," but that Comey's ultimately pointless announcements were what "stopped our momentum," and prevented the campaign from making the optimistic closing argument it wanted.

http://www.foxnews.com/politics/2016/11/12/clinton-purportedly-tells-fundraisers-fbi-comey-letters-damaging.html
Hillary Clinton has offered a couple of private but candid explanations about why she lost her White House bid, telling high-dollar fundraisers Saturday that FBI announcements about a second probe into her emails from her time as secretary of state were too damaging. Clinton said, "Our analysis is that Comey's letter raised doubts that were groundless and baseless..." and "stopped our momentum," a DNC fundraising source who was on the call told Fox News. Clinton made the remark on a roughly 30-minute conference call with Democrats who raised more than $100,000, according to Politico.
(Story Break)
Clinton on Thursday told her campaign staff that she had "stepped in it" by saying half of Trump's supporters were "deplorables," according to The New York Times. She and her campaign essentially defended the remark by saying she regretted saying "half" of the supporters were "racist, sexist, homophobic, xenophobic, Islamophobic" people.

Hillary Clinton blamed FBI director James Comey for her stunning defeat in Tuesday's presidential election in a conference call with her top campaign funders on Saturday, according to two participants who were on the call. Clinton was projected by nearly every national public opinion poll as the heavy favorite going into Tuesday's race. Instead, Republican Donald Trump won the election, shocking many throughout the nation and prompting widespread protests. Clinton told her supporters on Saturday that her team had drafted a memo that looked at the changing opinion polls leading up to the election and that the letter from Comey proved to be a turning point. She said Comey's decision to go public with the renewed examination of her email server had caused an erosion of support in the upper Midwest, according to three people familiar with the call.

8) Fortune: Hillary Clinton Blames FBI Director James Comey For Election Loss http://fortune.com/2016/11/12/hillary-clinton-james-comey-blame/
Hillary Clinton on Saturday blamed her stunning election loss on FBI Director James Comey, saying his late-October letter to Congress about her use of a private email server hurt her campaign's momentum. "There are lots of reasons why an election like this is not successful," Clinton said on a call with top donors Saturday, according to the Washington Post. "But our analysis is that Comey's letter raising doubts that were groundless, baseless, proven to be, stopped our momentum."

9)CBS News: Clinton -- FBI Director Comey's Letter Was Factor in Loss http://www.cbsnews.com/news/hillary-clinton-james-comey-fbi-director-loss-donor-call/
Hillary Clinton weighed in Saturday with her first comments on the stinging election defeat, giving donors on a conference call some insight into her thoughts on the failed presidential campaign.
(Story Break)
One Clinton supporter who was on the call, however, disputed the call's characterization in the Times and other media outlets, which said Clinton had laid much of the blame for her loss on Comey. The supporter told CBS News that the nominee said there were lots of reasons that still needed to be looked at and analyzed. Clinton herself, he felt, was not trying to analyze the election results during the call. She acknowledged that after her slight lead in battleground state polls, her levels of support "dropped, and we had to keep really pushing to regain our advantage, which going into last weekend we had," according to the Times.

The FBI's surprise decision to re-examine Hillary Clinton's use of a private email server before voters went to the polls cost her the election, the "heartbroken" Democratic nominee said Saturday, a source told NBC News. The letter about the email inquiry — sent from FBI Director James Comey to Congress 11 days before the vote — raised doubts that helped to stop the campaign's momentum at a critical time, Clinton said in a farewell conference call with donors. A source who was on the call, which was reported by The Washington Post and others, confirmed Clinton's remarks to NBC News. The source added that Clinton acknowledged that other factors contributed to her failed bid.

McConnell, Schumer elected to top spots in Senate ahead of battles with Trump

By Ted Barrett and Tom LoBianco, CNN

Updated 10:49 AM ET, Wed November 16, 2016

http://www.cnn.com/2016/11/16/politics/senate-republican-democratic-leaders/index.html

Washington (CNN)Republicans re-elected Mitch McConnell as Senate Majority Leader Wednesday while Democrats tapped Chuck Schumer as their leader as both sides prepare for critical battles with the incoming Trump administration.
McConnell was formally nominated by Sen. Marco Rubio and freshman Sen. Todd Young of Indiana -- a nod to his extensive efforts in both states which helped him keep their majority.

McConnell, the Kentucky Republican, led the successful effort to hold the Senate Republicans and was rewarded with an easy victory in a private meeting with his caucus.

Schumer's ascension was coordinated well before the election, but some veteran Democrats moved into new roles that will prove critical as Trump plies lawmakers next year. He will serve as Trump's chief antagonist in the new Congress.

Democrats also formally added Vermont independent Bernie Sanders to their ranks — a clear nod to his success in the campaign and the strains within the party moving forward.
"We are ready to go toe to toe with Republicans," Schumer told reporters, noting that Democrats "can't flinch and can't ignore" results of election.

Senate Democrats picked up two seats last week, but it was just shy of enough to win the majority.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a long-serving California Democrat, will take over her party's top seat on the Judiciary Committee -- putting her in place to lead the fight against any Trump nominee for the Supreme Court. Veteran Judiciary member Patrick Leahy, of Vermont, will head to the Senate Appropriations Committee.

These four were introduced by AAG Lee Lofthus during the 1pm Executive Officer/Transition meeting today at DOJ who indicated additional names (up to possibly 10 total) are anticipated.

The four met with the AG and DAG today and have space at DOJ. They are anticipated to begin by receiving high level DOJ overviews and budget briefings next week followed by requests to meet with indivudual components over the next few weeks.

The PETT will publish their schedule to DOJ of which agencies they want to meet with and on what issues. Agencies should be prepared but contact may not be for days or weeks.

However, I spoke with AAG Lofthus who indicated the FBI should be ready which may telegraph an interest to meet with FBI as one of the first

As we learn more about these individuals, get additional names and briefing/schedule requests we will advise.

FOR YOUR SITUATIONAL AWARENESS, USE, and PREPARATION

Sirs,

The DOJ has confirmed the initial meeting with President-Elect's Transition Team (PETT) members will occur on Tuesday, December 6 from 2:30pm – 4:30pm at FBIHQ.

Attending will be [redacted] and [redacted] (NOTE: At the bottom of this email is a quick reminder of their respective backgrounds). We will work with FBI Security Division to ensure they are greeted at the Visitor entrance b6 b7C and escorted to the Director's Office area for the meeting.

DOJ has advised the meeting is anticipated to be more of a give-and-take discussion and not a formal one-way presentation. The expectation is they will meet with the Director and the senior "front office" management team (i.e., DD, ADD, CFO or other budget person). Additional meetings are anticipated in the future with senior staff about specific programs and activities.

DOJ encouraged us to be prepared to discuss at minimum the following during the meeting:

1. A high level overview of the organizational structure, budget, and hiring outlook/key vacancies
2. A copy of the organizational chart
3. Cover the primary mission roles and responsibilities, and where most of management time is focused
4. Reminder that the organization is all career except for the Director
5. Provide a high level picture of the budget and any key budget stresses
6. Mention any major upcoming work the FBI is anticipating
7. Any significant issues or challenges the incoming Administration will encounter or need to be aware of when they assume office
8. Use this time to let the PETT know what major issues FBI leadership sees for the organization

To support and prepare, we have worked with DADD Castor, RPO and the Finance. The 11x17 "FBI: At a Glance" handout has been proposed for use during this meeting along with a new 11x17 front and back handout prepared by Finance/RPO which contains high level budget and staffing information and the top 8 challenges on the one side and a copy of the FBI organizational chart on the other. Hard copies have been delivered to DADD Castor. Soft copies of each are included below.

Enclosed are some points of consideration for your awareness and familiarization. These were taken from the various subject areas found within the transition materials. They are organized by programs and themes.

Below are the BIOS for the two PETT member attendees:

Trump: I don't believe Russia interfered with the election

By POLITICO Staff
| 12/07/16 09:01 AM EST

President-elect Donald Trump is freshly casting doubt on the idea that Russia was behind the election-related hacks into Democratic entities, and said the conclusion by U.S. agencies that the Kremlin paid a role was politically driven.

“I don’t believe it. I don’t believe they interfered,” Trump said in an interview with Time magazine, which named him person of the year.

Trump has steadfastly refused to say that Russian President Vladimir Putin or his agencies played any role in the hack of the Democratic National Committee and the private email account of John Podesta, Hillary Clinton’s campaign chairman.

When asked by Time if the conclusion reached by U.S. officials was motivated by politics, Trump responded, “I think so.”

While it’s unclear how much of an impact the intrusions had on the election outcome, the revelations proved embarrassing for the Democratic Party and cost DNC Chairwoman Debbie Wasserman Schultz her job at the top of the committee.

U.S. agencies in October formally accused Russia of hacking into American computers and meddling with the election process, but Putin pushed back against the notion and said discovering the actual culprit was “unimportant.”

Democrats are continuing to press for more information about the hacks. Party leaders are urging the Obama administration to provide a briefing on the matter, while Reps. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.) and Eric Swalwell (D-Calif.) plan to introduce legislation on Wednesday "to take action on evidence of foreign interference in the 2016 U.S. elections."

House panel approves FBI headquarters with focus on costs, Metro access

The FBI's effort to build a new 2.1 million-square-foot headquarters advanced Wednesday when members of the House approved the project, paving the way for Congress to fully fund it next year.

For more than a decade, the bureau has been pushing for a new campus in the Washington suburbs to replace the dilapidated J. Edgar Hoover Building in downtown D.C. Three sites are being considered, in Greenbelt, Springfield and Landover — with a decision expected in March.

A measure approved Wednesday by the House Transportation and Infrastructure Commmittee, chaired by Rep. Bill Shuster (R-Pa.), authorized $834 million for the project, part of $1.7 billion in appropriations requested by the Obama administration.

If approved by the full Congress, those dollars would add to $390 million that was previously appropriated.

The committee also reshaped the project with an eye on reducing costs and ensuring the project be accessible to public transit.

The committee capped appropriations for the project at $2.11 billion, not counting the costs of outfitting the new building or decommissioning the current one. The $2.11 billion also doesn't include the value of the Hoover Building, which the agency overseeing the project, the General Services Administration, has proposed trading to the company selected to build the project in an effort to offset the cost.

The GSA has not disclosed a list of approved bidders for the project, but officials and executives say four teams are finalists, including two associates of President-elect Donald Trump.

[The next FBI headquarters, a $2 billion project, could be built by a Trump associate]

The committee added two other stipulations to the funding measure. One requires that the administration consider the traffic impact of bringing the FBI's 11,000 headquarters employees from around the region to one location.

Transportation to the new headquarters became a top concern for locals after the GSA dramatically increased parking requirements and failed to prioritize Metro access, over the objections of federal planning officials at the National Capital Planning Commission. The measure specifically requires the GSA to consider NCPC's "recommendations on parking and proximity to Metro rail."

Another stipulation could dent the chances of the project moving to Springfield, where the site being considered is currently occupied by a secure CIA facility. Moving that would cost an estimated $210 million, and other site preparation to bring the FBI there would total $18 million, according to GSA estimates.

Under the resolution, the GSA would have to "consider the total costs to the government for relocations, site preparation and site acquisition" in making its selection.

Both changes were celebrated by Maryland officials, who chafed in particular at the possibility of Virginia gaining what they considered an unfair cost advantage for the Springfield site.

House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) said in a statement that the cost provision "requires GSA to consider the significant cost of relocation and site preparation of the Springfield site, which ought to be a serious concern for taxpayers."

"I advocated strongly for these provisions, and their inclusion ensures that the resolution is favorable for Maryland," he said.

No representative at the hearing raised Trump's potential conflict-of-interest in the project, given his closness with two of the bidders. But there remain concerns about whether the GSA ought to trade away the Hoover Building rather than sell it separately.

"I think pairing the two is stupid," said Rep. Peter A. DeFazio (D-Ore.) "It's certainly going to limit the number of people who are interested in constructing and bidding on the FBI headquarters. We will not get the full value for the downtown property."

Why law enforcement can't get ahead of 'Pizzagate' and other online conspiracy theories

By Matt Zapotosky

December 8 at 5:43 PM

The North Carolina man who took an assault rifle to a popular D.C. pizza joint to investigate a fictitious online rumor demonstrates a problem that has long vexed the FBI.

The Internet — a breeding ground for radical ideologies and bizarre conspiracy theories — can quickly move troubled souls to violence. And in an age when fake news is magnified by those with political and financial interests, the problem is getting harder to stop.

The bureau has in recent years made a priority of preventing Islamic State-inspired attacks, developing informants who can tip agents to plots before they happen and connecting the often Internet-radicalized plotters with people actually working for the FBI.

But the bizarre conspiracy theory that a child sex ring was operating underneath D.C.'s Comet Ping Pong restaurant — which spurred 28-year-old Edgar Maddison Welch to drive from North Carolina to launch his own violent investigation — would probably have registered as "barely a blip" on the bureau's radar, said Ron Hosko, a former FBI assistant director.

"There is so much to do that is tangible and real and fitting squarely within the bureau's jurisdiction and priorities," Hosko said. "There's not a lot of bandwidth for sort of these one-offs."

That is not to say online radicalization, in all its forms, is not a concern for federal law enforcement. Research has shown people who believe in conspiracy theories are more prone to violence. On Wednesday, for example, federal authorities in Florida announced they had indicted a Florida woman who they alleged threatened the parent of a child killed in the massacre at Sandy Hook Elementary School in Newtown, Conn.

The woman, 57-year-old Lucy Richards, was motivated to make her threats because she believed, incorrectly, "that the school shooting was a hoax and never happened," according to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Florida.

At an event earlier this year to mark the 10th anniversary of the Justice Department's National Security Division, FBI Director James B. Comey said agents were focused on a "much more disparate threat" that was "hard to see, unpredictable, motivated, and driven by people who are just disturbed and unpredictable even to those who would motivate them."

"Our daily job is finding needles in a haystack," he said. "As I like to say, it's harder than that even. It's finding pieces of hay that may become a needle."

The FBI declined to make an official available for an interview for this article.

The false theory that spurred Welch to action — that a child sex ring tied to Democratic presidential nominee Hillary Clinton and campaign chairman John Podesta was operating beneath Comet Ping Pong — spread through Twitter, 4chan and Reddit, and was magnified on Infowars by talk-show host Alex Jones. People came to refer to it by the hashtag "Pizzagate."

The FBI and D.C. police assessed the claims and determined them to be false, according to a D.C. police spokesman and a federal law enforcement official. But the rumor nonetheless prompted threats and harassment of tthe shop and neighboring businesses on Connecticut Avenue, and some business owners said they were frustrated by law enforcement's response. A D.C. police spokesman said he was unaware of any threats Welch made himself.

There are several well-known examples of conspiracy theorists carrying out acts of violence. Robert Dear, who allegedly killed three people and wounded nine others in an attack on a Planned Parenthood facility in Colorado, told a neighbor that he believed the government was "trying to kill everybody." A Twitter account linked to one of the Boston Marathon bombers seemed to espouse the view that the terrorist attack of Sept. 11, 2001, was an "inside job." In a more recent case, the FBI arrested a Milwaukee man, Samy Mohamed Hamzeh, who the agency alleged was plotting a mass shooting at a Masonic temple and believed Masons were "playing with the world like a game."

Joseph Uscinski, an associate professor at the University of Miami and a co-author of "American Conspiracy Theories," said research has shown "people who have a very conspiratorial mind-set tend to be more accepting of violence than people who don't have a conspiratorial mind-set, but it's not by much."

Fake news and conspiracy theories have other pernicious effects. The Russian government, for example, reportedly tried to spread false materials online to affect the election. At the National Security Division event earlier this year, Comey said he was concerned that Twitter in particular allowed people to reinforce their own views, irrespective of facts, and that this eroded trust in government institutions.

"It used to be that the person who's now on Twitter would be down at the end of the bar late at night shouting at the television, and the only people he could shout with would be the other people who were down at the end of the bar," Comey said. "Now he can shout with 600 other people who are at their own metaphorical bars, and it's a constant reinforcement of their view of the world."

The First Amendment prevents law enforcement agencies from policing free speech. Cass Sunstein, a Harvard professor and former White House official, proposed controversially in 2008 that the government engage in "cognitive infiltration of extremist groups," by enlisting government agents to enter chat rooms and raise doubts about conspiracy theorists' ideas. In one variant, he wrote, "government officials would participate anonymously or even with false identities."

The proposal was criticized by those on the right and the left, and even Sunstein and his co-author acknowledged that it came with the risk that the government might inadvertently legitimize bad information. Sunstein declined to be interviewed for this article.

Justice Department guidelines say that agents can surf the Internet in search of possible terror plots, though a former federal national security official said agents have little time to randomly browse the Web to generate leads. Generally, the former official said, the FBI foils plots because would-be plotters reveal their intentions to the bureau's informant network, or from concrete tips they run down.

"You can't monitor 330 million Twitter [users] and their traffic, nor would you want to do that," the former official said, speaking on the condition of anonymity to discuss FBI methods. "That's the beauty of living in a free society. You're allowed to be crazy."

Law enforcement has occasionally drawn criticism for taking an overly aggressive approach — particularly with surveillance of the Muslim community. The New York Police Department, for example, was sued over its surveillance of Muslims in a case in which settlement discussions are ongoing. The FBI was accused of going too far in using an informant to infiltrate a mosque in California.

Some Islamic State-inspired terrorists have slipped through the cracks — such as Omar Mateen, the 29-year-old who killed 49 people in an Orlando nightclub. The FBI had scrutinized Mateen for 10 months beginning in 2013, even using surveillance and recording his calls after he talked of dying as a martyr, though they ultimately closed the matter without charges.

The threshold to take action on even a threat, Hosko said, is fairly high. The matter is generally left to local authorities unless the threat comes from across state lines, and incendiary rhetoric usually cannot be investigated. Given the volume of such cases, Hosko said, agents generally assess even in real threat cases whether the person was willing and able to follow through.

"The question for the FBI is, 'Is there a case we can prosecute?' " Hosko said. "Is this serious enough? Do we devote the resources?"

Uscinski, the University of Miami professor, said conspiracy theories are generally directed at those in power, and he expected more in the coming years would come from the left, rather than the right. But Trump, he said, has in some ways flipped the normal logic, raising conspiracy theories about the powerless — such as Mexico sending its rapists over the border — that could lead to attacks on those with little ability to stop them.

"To see those sorts of conspiracy theories sort of worries me," Uscinski said, "because if Trump doesn't act, you could see someone sort of act on his behalf, against people who are unprotected."

FBI director under pressure to explain Clinton bombshell

Six weeks since Hillary Clinton's surprise loss in the presidential election, FBI Director James Comey is under pressure to justify the bombshell announcement that rocked the final days of the campaign.

Democrats, still smarting from the Nov. 8 loss, have lashed out at Comey as the architect of the Democratic nominee's defeat.

"James Comey cost her the election," former president Bill Clinton

Now, speculation has begun to swirl that Comey will publicly address the charges of partisanship.

Several former FBI officials told The Hill that they have heard Comey is now weighing a possible press appearance after Trump is inaugurated on Jan. 20 to tell his side of the story.

The FBI declined to comment for this report.

Eleven days before the election, Comey shocked the political world with a letter informing Congress that investigators had discovered new emails that could be relevant to its probe, then considered completed, of Hillary Clinton's use of a private email server while she was secretary of State.

Comey for months defended the integrity of the probe — first against Republicans when he declined to recommend charges against Clinton in the first place, and more recently against Democrats and internal critics who said his eleventh-hour disclosure unfairly damaged Clinton.

The former prosecutor has made few media appearances over the course of his career — he did sit for a "60 Minutes" interview in 2014 — but he has been forced into the harsh glare of camera lights throughout the past year.

He was thrust into the spotlight after Attorney General Loretta Lynch sparked outrage by meeting with Bill Clinton before the conclusion of the investigation this summer — a meeting they described as social — forcing her to announce that she would abide by whatever recommendation Comey made in the case.

Comey was then open publicly with the FBI's reasoning in declining to recommend charges against Hillary Clinton, holding a detailed press conference announcing its conclusion and later appearing before Congress in an open setting multiple times.

But he has been notably silent since his Oct. 28 letter to Congress.

Democrats, appalled by the fallout from his letter to Congress, have argued that Comey's disclosure in the final days leading up to the election was a massive break from bureau policy that blunted Clinton's path to the White House. They say that although the FBI announced two days before the election that the new emails would not change its conclusion in Clinton's case, the damage was done.

Critics hammered Comey's vague letter for igniting a firestorm of speculation that the new emails contained a "smoking gun" — without providing any substantive information for voters to judge.

"Today's disclosure might be worst abuse yet. DOJ goes out of its way to avoid publicly discussing investigations close to election," former Department of Justice spokesman Matthew Miller said in a tweetstorm at the time. "This might be totally benign & not even involve Clinton. But no way for press or voters to know that. Easy for opponent to make hay over."

Trump did in fact run with Comey's announcement on the campaign trail, repeatedly telling supporters that the emails must contain something truly damning.

"I have a feeling those emails are going to be — whoa, there are going to be some beauties in there. Can you imagine? She's been deleting all the time, deleting," he said at a Florida rally shortly after the announcement.

Clinton herself has since told donors that she believes Comey's disclosure raised "doubts that were groundless, baseless, proven to be, stopped our momentum."

It's unclear how much of an effect the last-minute news had at the ballot box, but Trump's narrow win in a number of battleground states and Clinton's lead in the popular vote tally are giving fuel to those who say her loss could have been avoided.

One of Trump's pollsters, veteran political strategist Tony Fabrizio, said just five counties made the difference: four in Florida and one in Michigan.

And post-election analysis from data guru Nate Silver and others has suggested that some voters shifted to Trump in the final weeks of the election, though he notes that the analysis is not cause-and-effect.

Comey himself was aware of the risks associated with the late October missive. In an internal memo to FBI employees, he acknowledged that "there is significant risk of being misunderstood."

"We don't ordinarily tell Congress about ongoing investigations, but here I feel an obligation to do so given that I testified repeatedly in recent months that our investigation was completed," Comey wrote. "I also think it would be misleading to the American people were we not to supplement the record."

Comey has a reputation as an independent and principled lawman — which some critics say has led him to operate outside of important institutional norms.

Others say Comey had no choice but to inform Congress of the existence of the emails — when he chose to go public with the details of the investigation's findings over the summer, he pinned himself in a corner when the bureau realized it might have more work to do.

But throughout, Comey has been strident in his defense of the probe.

"You can call us wrong, but don't call us weasels. We are not weasels," Comey said during a House Judiciary Committee hearing during which Republicans suggested he had caved to political pressure from above.

"We are honest people and ... whether or not you agree with the result, this was done the way you want it to be done."

Pressure to speak out is mounting as more details emerge about the circumstances surrounding the discovery of the new emails.

The search warrant used to go through the emails, unsealed Tuesday, confirmed that Comey delivered his letter to Congress two days before the warrant was granted — meaning that investigators didn't yet know what was in them.

Investigators found emails they thought might be pertinent to Clinton's investigation when they sorted and scanned the header information of messages stored on a laptop seized as part of an investigation into former Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-N.Y.).

The former New York congressman was under investigation for allegedly sending sexually explicit messages to a minor. Weiner is married to longtime Clinton aide Huma Abedin, though the two are separated.

Some of the accounts used on the seized computer correlated with those used by Clinton and her aides during her tenure at Foggy Bottom — accounts that investigators previously concluded had been used inappropriately, the newly released documents show.

The FBI told a federal judge it believed that was sufficient to show there was probable cause that the computer contained classified information pertinent to the Clinton probe.

James Comey's year of unintended — and ruinous — consequences

By Dana Milbank Opinion writer
December 21 at 5:06 PM

What a year it has been for James Comey!

At the start of 2016, the FBI director enjoyed a reputation as a public servant of high integrity, earning bipartisan acclaim for his stewardship of the nation's preeminent law enforcement agency.

A year later, the FBI, after a series of blows to its credibility, seems increasingly partisan. Comey has shown himself to be an inconsistent leader. And an ugly conclusion is becoming difficult to escape: He singlehandedly caused Donald Trump to win the presidency.

Doubt on that last point should have been dispelled this week, after court documents were released Tuesday that showed the justification for Comey's decision — announced to the nation just 11 days before the election — that he was reopening his investigation into Hillary Clinton's emails. We now know Comey's bombshell was based on nothing: The FBI had no evidence of wrongdoing in the newly discovered emails, found on Huma Abedin's laptop, and no reason to suspect there was anything on the laptop that the FBI hadn't already dismissed as insufficient to mount a prosecution.

Yet that was the flimsy basis for Comey's letter to Congress reopening the Clinton probe. The new emails were irrelevant or redundant. But by the time Comey said, just two days before the election, that the FBI found nothing new, the damage to Clinton was done.

When an election is this close — Clinton, in the final tally, won the popular vote by 2.8 million votes — any number of factors could have shifted the outcome: Russia's hacking, Jill Stein's Green Party candidacy, Clinton's weaknesses as a candidate, her ill-advised message of continuity in times that demanded populist change.

But Comey's intervention is one thing that almost certainly changed the result. Nationwide, voters who decided in the last week — the time when Comey's announcement dominated the news — overwhelmingly went for Trump. Late-deciders went for Trump by 17 points in Florida and Pennsylvania, by 11 points in Michigan and 29 points in Wisconsin.

I doubt Comey meant to give the presidency to Trump. All along, I maintained that he was a man of integrity. But he demonstrated poor judgment. So protective was he of his above-the-fray reputation that his attempts to guard it caused a series of bad decisions.

Ironically, his attempts at preserving his reputation were what hurt him.

In June, before Comey's July statement on the Clinton email issue, 48 percent of Americans expressed confidence in the FBI and 16 percent lacked confidence, according to an NBC-Wall Street Journal poll. Now, six months later, 37 percent have confidence in the FBI, while 27 percent don't — and Republicans and Democrats are almost identical in their views.

Comey's trouble began with his announcement, on the eve of the national political conventions, that no reasonable prosecutor would bring charges against Clinton over the emails. His no-prosecution recommendation infuriated congressional Republicans. This criticism must have stung, since Comey, a former George W. Bush administration official, then took a series of actions that seemed designed to repair his reputation with Republicans.

First, he refused to join an administration statement on Oct. 7 naming Russia as the perpetrator of hacks of American political organizations. He reasoned that the FBI shouldn't be seen as injecting itself into politics so close to an election.

Comey made a mockery of such considerations when he delivered his October Surprise later that month, defying warnings from the Justice Department and ignoring long-standing guidelines by announcing that he was reopening the Clinton probe.

It probably wasn't done to torpedo Clinton, though that was the result. The most convincing explanation: Comey feared that already irate congressional Republicans, if they were to learn that he didn't disclose the new discovery of Clinton emails, would have trashed his integrity. And Republicans were certain to find out. The Trump campaign's Rudy Giuliani, the recipient of leaks apparently originating with anti-Clinton agents in the FBI's New York office, had already signaled that big news was about to break.

Since the election, Comey has continued to protect his reputation — at considerable cost. Earlier this month, news broke that the CIA had concluded Russia intervened in the election to help Trump. But FBI officials resisted joining the conclusion.

Perhaps Comey was again trying to keep his agency and himself above the fray, but the FBI's mush helped Trump dismiss the CIA's findings. The matter turned into a partisan fight rather than the national-security concern it should be. After several days, and the intervention of the director of national intelligence, Comey finally acknowledged the obvious: that the FBI, too, believes the Russians tried to help Trump.

Did Comey mean to become Trump's elector, and now his protector? Probably not. But in the end, motives count for less than outcomes. And Comey's have been ruinous.

Hey there--
I'm writing because a very strange document has crossed my desk that may--or may not--have implications for investigations you guys are conducting. Under normal circumstances, I would simply assume that the document is either a fraud or that you guys already know all about it. (Both may well be true, as it is.) The wrinkle here is that the document--which purports to be a series of reports/dispatches by a private British intel company on Trump and Russia and the hacking and contains a number of highly-detailed accounts stuff that would be explosive if alleged publicly--is being furiously investigated by, at a minimum, the Wall Street Journal (the document was given to me by [redacted]. What's more, it seems to already be in the hands of the SSCI. I wouldn't be surprised if it's also in the hands of other congressional committees.

I want to stress that I have NO idea if it is authentic, much less accurate. But I thought I would alert you to it in case, for some reason, it hasn't made its way to your people long ago. I'm happy to put you in touch with [redacted] if you're interested in hearing his account of what it is, or I can just forward a copy to you. b6 b7C

Hope you're doing well. It was great seeing you a couple of weeks ago.

Happy New Year.

President-elect works with advisers on restructuring Office of the Director of National Intelligence

WASHINGTON—President-elect Donald Trump, a harsh critic of U.S. intelligence agencies, is working with top advisers on a plan that would restructure and pare back the nation's top spy agency, people familiar with the planning said, prompted by a belief that the Office of the Director of National Intelligence has become bloated and politicized.

The planning comes as Mr. Trump has leveled a series of social media attacks in recent months and the past few days against U.S. intelligence agencies, dismissing and mocking their assessment that the Russian government hacked emails of Democratic groups and individuals and then leaked them last year to WikiLeaks and others in an effort to help Mr. Trump win the White House.

One of the people familiar with Mr. Trump's planning said advisers also are working on a plan to restructure the Central Intelligence Agency, cutting back on staffing at its Virginia headquarters and pushing more people out into field posts around the world. The CIA declined to comment on the plan.

"The view from the Trump team is the intelligence world [is] becoming completely politicized," said the individual, who is close to the Trump transition operation. "They all need to be slimmed down. The focus will be on restructuring the agencies and how they interact."

In one of his latest Twitter posts on Wednesday, Mr. Trump referenced an interview that WikiLeaks editor in chief Julian Assange gave to Fox News in which he denied Russia had been his source for the thousands of emails stolen from Democrats and Hillary Clinton advisers, including campaign manager John Podesta, that Mr. Assange published.

Mr. Trump tweeted: "Julian Assange said 'a 14 year old could have hacked Podesta'—why was DNC so careless? Also said Russians did not give him the info!"

Mr. Trump has drawn criticism from Democratic and Republican lawmakers and from intelligence and law-enforcement officials for praising Russian President Vladimir Putin, for attacking American intelligence agencies, and for embracing Mr. Assange, long viewed with disdain by government officials and lawmakers.

"We have two choices: some guy living in an embassy on the run from the law...who has a history of undermining American democracy and releasing classified information to put our troops at risk, or the 17 intelligence agencies sworn to defend us," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.). "I'm going with them."

But for Mr. Trump and some of his supporters, the accusations of Russian hacking and the criticism of WikiLeaks are seen as an effort to delegitimize the president-elect's victory.

Since his November election, Mr. Trump has published close to 250 Twitter posts. Of those, 11 have focused on Russia or the election-related cyberattacks. In each of those tweets, Mr. Trump either has flattered Russian President Vladimir Putin—last month calling him "very smart"— or disparaged the investigation into the hacks.

This stands in contrast to his posts on other issues and countries, such as North Korea or China, where his views on national security risks line up more squarely with U.S. spy agencies.

The Office of the Director of National Intelligence was established in 2004 in large part to boost coordination between intelligence agencies following the Sept. 11, 2001 terror attacks.

Many Republicans have proposed cutting the ODNI before, but this has proven hard to do in part because its mission centers are focused on core national security issues, such as counterterrorism, nuclear proliferation, and counterintelligence.

"The management and integration that DNI focuses on allows agencies like the CIA to better hone in on its own important work," said Rep. Adam Schiff (D., Calif.), the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, who believes dismantling the ODNI could lead to national security problems.

Mr. Trump's advisers say he has long been skeptical of the CIA's accuracy, and the president-elect often mentions faulty intelligence in 2002 and 2003 concerning Iraq's weapons programs. But he has focused his skepticism of the agencies squarely on their Russia assessments, which has jarred analysts who are accustomed to more cohesion with the White House.

Top officials at U.S. intelligence agencies, as well as Republican and Democratic leaders in Congress, have said Russia orchestrated the computer attacks that hacked and leaked Democratic Party emails last year. President Barack Obama ordered the intelligence agencies to produce a report on the hacking operation, and he is expected to presented with the findings on Thursday.

Russia has long denied any involvement in the hacking operation, though Mr. Putin has said releasing the stolen emails served a public service.

The heads of the CIA, Federal Bureau of Investigation, and Director of National Intelligence James Clapper are scheduled to brief Mr. Trump on the findings on Friday. Mr. Trump tweeted late Tuesday that this meeting had been delayed and suggested that the agencies still needed time to "build a case" against Russia.

White House officials said Mr. Trump will be briefed on the hacking report as soon as it is ready. White House officials have been increasingly frustrated by Mr. Trump's confrontations with intelligence officials.

"It's appalling," the official said. "No president has ever taken on the CIA and come out looking good."

Among those helping lead Mr. Trump's plan to restructure the intelligence agencies is his national security adviser, Lt. Gen. Michael Flynn, who had served as director of the Defense Intelligence Agency until he was pushed out by DNI James Clapper and others in 2013. Also involved in the planning is Rep. Mike Pompeo (R., Kan.), who Mr. Trump selected to be his CIA director.

Lt. Gen. Flynn didn't respond to a request for comment and Mr. Pompeo declined to comment.

Mr. Trump shares the view of Lt. Gen. Flynn and Mr. Pompeo that the intelligence community's position that Russians tried to help his campaign is an attempt to undermine his victory or say he didn't win, the official close to the transition said.

Mr. Flynn will lead the White House's National Security Council, giving him broad influence in military and intelligence decisions throughout the government. He is also a believer in rotating senior intelligence agencies into the field and reducing headquarters staff.

Current and former intelligence and law-enforcement officials have reacted with a mix of bafflement and outrage to Mr. Trump's continuing series of jabs at U.S. spies.

"They are furious about it," said one former senior intelligence official, adding that a retinue of senior officials who thought they would be staying on in a Hillary Clinton administration now are re-evaluating their plans following Mr. Trump's election.

Current and former officials said it was particularly striking to see Mr. Trump quote Mr. Assange in tweets.

"It's pretty horrifying to me that he's siding with Assange over the intelligence agencies,'' said one former law-enforcement official.

Paul Pillar, a 28-year veteran of the CIA who retired in 2005, said he was disturbed by Mr. Trump's tweets and feared much of the intelligence community's assessments could be filtered through Lt. Gen. Flynn, chosen by Mr. Trump as his national security adviser.

"I'm rather pessimistic," he said. "This is indeed disturbing that the president should come in with this negative view of the agencies coupled with his habits on how he absorbs information and so on that don't provide a lot of hope for change."

Addressing Email Controversy and Other Challenges, FBI Director Still Stands By Decisions

By Mike Levine

In his first publicly-revealed comments since Donald Trump was elected president of the United States, FBI Director James Comey said he stood by his controversial decisions in the midst of what he called a "contentious election cycle."

"I would be lying if I said the external criticism doesn't bother me at all, but the truth is, it doesn't bother me much because of the way we made the decision," Comey said in a New Year's message to FBI personnel this week. "At every turn last year, we were faced with choosing among bad options and making decisions we knew would bring a torrent of criticism."

Comey's lengthy message was intended to telegraph the agency's mission and "vision" for the coming year, noting the FBI's vast cyber-related work, its extensive criminal efforts fighting corruption and violence, and its unending counterterrorism operations, particularly related to what he called "the collapsing 'Islamic State.'" The message also described advances in hiring and technology, and the hardships facing FBI personnel.

2016 was, to put it mildly, a challenging year," Comey wrote, alluding to the deadly shooting of a militia member who helped take over a federal wildlife refuge in Oregon; the deadly terrorist attack inside a nightclub in Orlando, which was carried out by someone previously on the FBI's radar; and the heavily-scrutinized investigation into Hillary Clinton's private email server.

As it always is, our work was subject to a fair amount of second-guessing ... [but] I am very proud of the way we approached the work," Comey said in his message, echoing sentiments in previous notes to his workforce.

While Comey did not specifically cite his decision to publicly detail the FBI's conclusions in the Clinton email probe, or his decision to disclose new steps in the investigation just days before the election, he likely had those moves in mind when writing the message this week.

"People often ask me what we should do to respond to those who have questions or concerns about the FBI in the wake of a contentious election cycle. 'Do great work' is my answer," Comey told FBI personnel. "Actions speak so much louder than words ... Just stay at it and be your honest, competent, and independent selves."

"When you know you have made decisions thoughtfully and consistent with your values, it is freeing, in a way," Comey added.

Many Trump critics have accused Comey of throwing the election to Republicans. And just days after the election, Hillary Clinton said Comey's letter to Congress disclosing new steps and newly-discovered messages in the email investigation blunted her presidential campaign's growing momentum.

Even before the letter became public, Attorney General Loretta Lynch and other senior Justice Department officials implored Comey not to send the letter, telling FBI counterparts that doing so would violate long-standing tradition and could potentially influence the outcome of the election, sources familiar with the matter told ABC News at the time.

Comey later said he felt compelled to notify Congress because he had previously assured lawmakers and the public that the FBI investigation was "completed." Nevertheless, a review of the newly-discovered emails found most of them to be duplicates, and no charges were filed.

While "the media focused" on such matters, FBI agents worked "in so many other places and in so many other ways to protect America," Comey wrote in his message this week.

"[It's] hard to capture all the good we have done, both for innocent people and to make ourselves better as an organization," he added.

He also noted the tough environment facing law enforcement officers across the country.

"As we look back at our work, we should always remember our people are in harm's way," he said, noting that 19 FBI agents were "shot or severely injured in line of duty in 2016."

"We also lost far too many of our state and local partners in the line of duty," and "each incident serves as a reminder that our agent colleagues do very dangerous work," according to Comey.

In his message, Comey did not mention FBI work on election-related hacks that the FBI and others in the U.S. intelligence community have attributed to the Russian government.

Trump has questioned that conclusion, and Comey is expected to participate in a briefing tomorrow in New York laying out classified details of the U.S. government's findings pointing to Russia.

Comey ended his New Year's message with this: "Whatever challenges 2017 brings, we will be ready, protecting the American people and upholding the Constitution of this extraordinary country."

Comey, Trump, and the Puzzling Pattern of Crime in 2015 and Beyond

John J. Donohue[1]
January 5, 2017

What a difference a decade makes. In 2006, 45 percent of Americans were worried a great deal about crime. In 2016, the number jumped to 53 percent, the highest level since 9/11 which was the last time a majority of Americans had expressed that view. This increase in the level of fear buoyed Donald Trump to the Presidency on his promise to restore law and order. But since 2006, the murder rate had dropped 15.6 percent, violent crime had fallen 22.3 percent, and property crime had fallen 25.7 percent – according to the latest FBI data of 2015. If the US in 2015 had had the same murder rate as it had in 2006 (5.78 per 100,000), almost three thousand more murders would have taken place in 2015 than the 15,696 that did occur. How then did 2015 come to symbolize a nightmare of exploding violent crime that could aid the fortunes of the law and order candidate? Welcome to the uncertain and unpredictable world of crime in the U.S.

Through 2014, the broad statistical picture of crime during the term of President Obama was a largely congenial one. Despite some hiccups, every major crime category had been trending down in the first six years of his administration. Talk of evidence-based criminal justice reform was in the air, resort to the ineffectual death penalty was waning (with a number of states entirely jettisoning the costly and controversial punishment),[2] and sensible proposals to reduce mass incarceration in a way that did not create risks to the public were being debated.

Although the 2014 murder rate was the lowest such rate in the United States since 1957, in October of 2015, FBI Director Jame Comey delivered a controversial speech at the University of Chicago Law School, in which he highlighted the jump in murders that had begun earlier that year. Comey issued a dire prediction about a violent crime explosion, which he largely attributed to urban, black crime resulting from the impact on police caused by the Black Lives Matter movement, which he did not reference by name. What a decade earlier might have seemed a dream year in crime, 2015 was now painted as a crime nightmare. Comey's remarks were at once infuriating to both supporters of the movement as well as the police, but quickly embraced by Donald Trump, who made the need to re-establish law and order a centerpiece of his political campaign. Trump then proceeded to deliver the most outlandish set of falsehoods about crime during a Presidential election since the Republican effort in 1996 to persuade Americans that they should take no comfort from one of the greatest drops in crime in American history because of the (wholly fictitious) "coming generation of super-predators.[3]

[3] The calculated and dishonest scheme to spur fear of crime was launched in an effort to defeat Bill Clinton in his 1996 bid for re-election. With crime in virtual free-fall during the first term of the Clinton Administration, one might have thought that the Republicans would have shied away from this issue. Instead, they enlisted some misguided or dishonest academics and concocted a narrative of "a ticking crime bomb that was about to explode," unleashing a new generation of "super-predators" that would generate a crime increase so massive that "it would make 1995 look like the good old days." The shameful campaign of deception failed, since Clinton was re-elected, and – contrary to the loudly proclaimed fear-mongering -- crime continued to drop sharply throughout his Presidential term.

The lies unleashed in 1996 were about the future and therefore not easily subject to immediate refutation. What made Trump's deceptions so brazen was they were about factual matters that could easily be checked. Shortly after the Comey speech, Trump picked up on the race and crime theme by tweeting under a title "USA Crime Statistics – 2015" with a picture of a black man with a gun, a set of statistics stating that 81 percent of murdered whites were killed by blacks.[4] The number is ludicrous since murder is overwhelmingly intra-racial, but such claims encourage belief in the false narrative that the overwhelming threat to whites comes from black criminals. The graphic cited the "Crime Statistics Bureau," a non-existent organization, yet when confronted about this by Bill O'Reilly, Trump replied: "I retweeted somebody that was supposedly an expert. Am I gonna check every statistic?"[5] Indeed, since Trump was tweeting the nonsense only a few months after the deeply troubled white racist killer Dylann Roof was expressing similar nonsensical ideas about "black-on-white crime" in his manifesto justifying his killing of nine members of a black church in Charleston, South Carolina in June 2015, one might have thought he would have listened to the corrective news stories on this topic rather than the erroneous rantings of white supremacists.[6]

In the days leading up to the election, Trump repeatedly made egregiously incorrect claims about the murder rate in the United States. For example, at a campaign rally in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, Oct. 28, 2016, Trump announced: "You won't hear this from the media: We have the highest murder rate in this country in 45 years. You don't hear that from these people. They don't want to talk about it. The highest murder rate in the United States in 45 years."

Day after day on the campaign trail, Trump repeated the identical false assertion that the murder rate is the highest it has been in 45 years.[7] Amazingly, the press was not willing or able to effectively refute his wildly inaccurate claims. In fact, while the jump in the murder rate was the highest in many years, the murder rate in 2015 was around 50 percent lower than at its peak in 1991. Prior to Obama's Presidency the last time the U.S. murder rate was as low as it was in 2015 was in 1963 – 52 years ago! Is it possible to believe that the billionaire businessman did not understand the difference between the percentage change in the murder rate from 2014 to [6] The dangerous nonsense that Trump was tweeting captured one of Roof's core beliefs. Six weeks after his arrest for the murders, Roof wrote: "I would like to make it crystal clear I do not regret what I did. I am not sorry. I have not shed a tear for the innocent people I killed. I do feel sorry for the innocent white children forced to live in this sick country and I do feel sorry for the innocent white people that are killed daily at the hands of the lower race." [7] For further fact-checking of Donald Trump's claims on crime, see, e.g. Lori Robertson, "Dueling Claims on Crime Trend" The Wire, July 13, 2016, http://www.factcheck.org/2016/07/dueling-claims-on-crime-trend/ and Bump, Philip "Donald Trump's understanding of the historical nature of crime is upside down." The Washington Post, August 29, 2016.

2015 and the level of the murder rate in 2015? He was either lying or grossly incompetent. Was there no one in the Trump camp who knew the facts about crime? Was no one willing to tell him what he was saying was outrageously inaccurate? Did Trump care? This does not bode well for the next four years.[8]

On the night that the tape was released of Trump's highly controversial comments on the bus with Billy Bush, Trump parried by insisting that the focus must be on the serious problems that plagued the country, such as the fact that crime was higher now than when Barack Obama took office. This was Trump's go-to issue at a critical moment, but the claim was absolutely false. Under both UCR and NCVS crime measures, the country was better off in 2015 than before Obama's presidency: the murder rate decreased from 5.42 murders per 100,000 in 2008 to 4.88 murders per 100,000 in 2015, while UCR violent crime went from 458.6 per 100,000 to 383.2 per 100,000 and NCVS violent crime went from 19.3 to 18.6 per 1000 person age 12 or older over the same period. The property crime drops during the first seven years of the Obama administration were even larger.[9]

At the same time that Comey and Trump were making provocative comments on race and crime, with strong backing from the right-wing media, the Brennan Center was simultaneously downplaying the size and significance of the large jump in the murder rate. Police researcher Peter Moskos derided the comforting claims, saying "I expect better from the left-leaning but usually respectable Brennan Institute for Justice. This is like Heritage Foundation bullshit, but coming from the Left." Conservative columnist Heather MacDonald was writing of "The New Nationwide Crime Wave" resulting "as officers scale back on proactive policing under the onslaught of anti-cop rhetoric."[10] In response, Darrel Stephens, executive director of the Major Cities Chiefs Association and former police chief in Charlotte for nine years, spoke for many in law enforcement in stating that, "I personally don't really believe that police officers across America have pulled back from doing their job."[11]

A May 2016 New York Times editorial summarized some of the critical responses to Comey's remarks:

> Mr. Comey came under intense criticism [for his] speech last fall. He repeated the idea at a news briefing in Washington last week, when he said that speaking to police officials around the country had led him to believe that a "viral video effect" had made officers wary of confronting suspects and "could well be at the heart" of an increase in crime in some places.

---

[8] Trump's insistence in the days before the election on the guilt of the five boys who were exonerated by DNA evidence for the infamous Central Park rape was another troubling example of his lack of judgment and disregard for the truth. Sarah Burns, "Why Trump Doubled Down on the Central Park Five," The New York Times, October 17, 2016.http://www.nytimes.com/2016/10/18/opinion/why-trump-doubled-down-on-the-central-park-five.html

[9] Property crime dropped from 3214.6 per 100,000 in 2008 to 2487.0 per 100,000 in 2015 in the UCR and from 134.7 to 110.7 victimizations per 1,000 household in the NCVS over the same period.

[11] Max Ehrenfreund and Denise Lu, "More people were killed last year than in 2014, and no one's sure why,"The Washington Post, January 27, 2016.

> Law enforcement organizations are outraged. The National Fraternal Order of Police accused Mr. Comey of saying the police officers were afraid of doing their jobs. Law Enforcement Leaders to Reduce Crime and Incarceration, a group of more than 165 police chiefs and prosecutors, denounced the "viral video" comment as "unfounded, and frankly, damaging to the efforts of law enforcement."
> Intentionally or not, Mr. Comey's remark fed into the false notion that the country is entering a crime wave that is some how related to the public backlash against police brutality.[12]

But as Comey continued to support the Heather MacDonald view, the White House Press Secretary responded to Comey's de-policing thesis in May 2016: "there still is no evidence to substantiate the claim that the increase in violent crime is related to an unwillingness of police officers to do their job, [and] the President's point is that as we consider policy approaches to addressing those communities where we've seen an uptick in violent crime, we need to be making policy decisions that are based on facts and evidence, and not anecdotes."

Comey was essentially making three different points: 1) there was an explosion of murder and violent crime in the black community in 2015 that represented an abrupt change from 2014; 2) this change was caused by a widespread pattern of de-policing in cities across the nation because of the emergence of the Black Lives Matter movement; and 3) he wanted a careful examination of the data on violent crime and murder. While it might have been better if the careful examination of crime data had occurred prior to the publication of Comey's controversial remarks, this paper will try to provide the detailed analysis that Comey called for.

As we will see, there were many different crime measures that were available to the FBI director but he chose to focus only on the spike in murders, which generated the most negative message on crime. Comey was correct about the sharp jump in post-2014 murders but wrong about the explosion in violent crime, and he offered no evidence on the exclusive racial dimension of the murder rate jump, which was unlikely given the widespread nature of the murder hike. Moreover, Comey had no evidence for his causal de-policing claim, which is an implausible explanation for the pattern of crime observed in 2015. A comprehensive analysis of all federal crime data for the year reveals that the full picture of crime in 2015 was more complex than Comey's remarks suggested. In contrast to the terrible news on murders, the news about property crime in 2015 continued to be entirely positive and the news about violent crime overall was mixed and complicated, but again far more positive than Comey's apocalyptic claims would have suggested. What is it that most Americans should have known about crime going into this presidential election? What exactly is happening with crime right now, and can we assess at this early stage whether we are witnessing a reversal of a long-term downward trend in crime?

Section I discusses the major trends in crime over the last half-century and notes that, because of the enormous post-1993 crime drop, we are currently in a relatively good position in terms of crime, as long as the spike in murder does not persist. Nonethelsess, the implicit crime rate of today is quite a bit higher than the crime rate of, say, 1960 because we have suppressed crime through a massive increase in incarceration and large increases in the number of police. Section II takes a closer look at crime in 2015 and Section III distills the stylized facts that while the news for murder was quite bad and the news for property crime was quite good, there are conflicting signals about what really happened to violent crime in 2015. Nonetheless, we can say with confidence that Comey was incorrect in saying there was an overall violent crime explosion in 2015 (although one might speak in those terms for the jump in murders).

Having established the basic facts of crime in 2015, we then turn in Section IV to an examination of the major causal influences on crime in that year. Declining incarceration and police, and growing markets for illegal drugs were large stimulants to crime, particularly for murder, while a series of unique factors have led to lower property crime. Section V points out the imprecision in Comey's de-policing hypothesis and notes that it likely has little causal significance for the nationwide jump in homicides in 2015, even if some version of it can apply in selected cities at particular times. Section VI concludes, noting that Comey and Trump probably contributed to an increase in the public's apprehension of crime, which likely aided Trump's law and order candidacy.

I. The Major Trends in U.S. Crime Over the Last Half Century

In his initial October 2015 speech and his continuing subsequent commentary, FBI Director James Comey made a number of specific factual claims. After mentioning the large jump in crime that occurred in the late 1980s, fueled by the crack epidemic, Comey announced:

> "I fear we are facing another wave of violent crime and homicide, and our communities are once again in trouble.
> "In cities across the country, we are seeing an explosion of senseless violence.

Comey then stated in the section of his speech titled "Rising Violent Crime Rates:"

> "…something has changed in 2015. Far more people are being killed in America's cities this year than in many years. And let's be clear: far more people of color are being killed in America's cities this year. And it's not the cops doing the killing.
> "Police chiefs say the increase is almost entirely among young men of color, at crime scenes in bad neighborhoods where multiple guns are being recovered….
> "What could be driving an increase in murder in some cities across all regions of the country, all at the same time? What explains this map and this calendar? Why is it happening in all different places, all over and all of a sudden?"

I have put in bold Comey's major factual claims about the explosion in 2015 of violent crime and murder across the nation at a level worse than we have seen in many years and that we are once again in trouble as we were during the high-crime years of the crack epidemic of the late 1980s. To assess these claims, I will begin by looking at the long-run trends in violent crime and murder to determine how we are doing today compared to the pre-1993 crime situation, and then will look more closely at what is happening with violent crime in 2015 (and beyond to the limited extent the data allows). I will address causal stories, including Comey's de-policing explanation, but only after I have established the basic facts about murder and property crime and amassed the somewhat conflicting data on violent crime.

A. Trends in Murder After 1993

Figure 1 documents the path of the murder rate in the United States since 1976, and reveals that after astonishingly large drops in crime occurred during the Clinton years and a renewal of further drops through 2014 during the Obama Administration, the murder rate jumped up sharply in 2015. This final-year upward jump is the entire factual predicate for Comey's claims of an "explosion of violence" in 2015 (including its racial dimension). Note that after 1993, the murder rate dropped year after year at a brisk 9 percent per year before slowing to a trend rate drop of 1.6 percent per year. The fact that the post-2000 murder rate data fits so tightly on a downward linear trend – as reflected in the R-squared value of .95 for the entire time series – tells us that, as of 2015, even the dramatic one-year jump in the murder rate would not be enough to justify the conclusion that crime was suddenly on some sustained new upward trajectory.[13] Only time will tell if a long-time reversal in the murder rate has begun.

Figure 1 also enables us to evaluate Comey's factual claims that more people are being killed in America than in many years. The murder rate in the United States in 2015 was 4.88, and the first time it had dropped below 5 in decades was in 2010 when it fell to 4.8. While the increase in homicides in 2015 was alarming, the murder rate in 2015 stood out only in comparison to the exceptionally low murder rate of 4.5 of 2013 and 2014. The 4.88 murder rate in the U.S. that existed at the time Comey gave his University of Chicago speech was closer to the exceptionally low levels of the previous two years, then it was to the 5.4 per 100,000 rate in the final year of the Bush Administration. In the grand scheme of things, then, the comparatively low murder rate of 2015 performance looks rather good.

Nonetheless, the jump in the 2015 murder rate was unusually, indeed shockingly, large, representing roughly 1500 more murders than we would have had if the amazingly low (given American standards) 2014 rate could have been preserved. That would be a highly unfortunate development even if it were quickly reversed, but the U.S. is nowhere near the level of killing of the early 1990s, when the murder rate was roughly twice the level of 2015.

Since murder is the rarest and hence most volatile of major crimes, a one-year jump can quickly return to trend, as it often has over the last forty years. But, the still incomplete evidence from selected cities this year – with no federal data yet available to indicate the national murder rate -- suggests that 2016 will again have an increase in the murder rate. Part way through 2016, Jeff Asher at 538 aggregated murder data for 79 cities with populations over 250,000. For these cities, the estimated increase in murder count – not rate -- is around 10.5 percent (compared to 14.7 percent for the same group in 2015); although without Chicago and Orlando (primarily due to the Pulse nightclub shooting that killed 49), that percent increase drops to 6.3 percent.[14] On December 19, 2016, the Brennan Center, looking at a smaller set of 26 of the 30 largest cities in America, projected that the 2016 murder rate would be 14 percent higher than in 2015 for those cities (which included the bloated murder jump in Chicago, diluted by fewer other locales).[15] Since the murder hike will be larger in the major urban areas than in the rest of the country, the combined information from these two data sets suggests that the murder rate will rise again in 2016, although probably less than in 2015. But even a 5 percent increase following last year's 9.95 percent increase in the murder rate would be a source of substantial concern given the size of the added body count, particularly if this were to signal a structural break in crime rather than a temporary deviation around the previous benign trend.[16] Even though many aspects of Comey's October 2015 remarks were subject to criticism, he was correct and indeed prescient in heralding a substantial two-year increase in murder, even before the end of 2015.

B. U.S. Crime Data – the UCR and NCVS

The FBI's Uniform Crime Reports (UCR) compiles crime data from 110,000 agencies into an annual, official report for the seven major "Index crimes." While the UCR data on homicides is quite reliable, the data on other crimes have some significant limitations. First, because the program is not mandatory, some agencies fail to submit any information, forcing the FBI to estimate the missing data. Second, among agencies that do submit, some of the reported information may suffer from errors or even intentional police department deception.[17] Finally, the police themselves do not hear of all the crimes. For a variety of reasons, victims often choose not to report crimes, and this is especially true in areas with low trust of police.

Thankfully, a second governmental data source -- the National Criminal Victimization Survey (NCVS) – tries to address some of these shortcomings. The NCVS is a national survey on crime administered by the U.S. Census on behalf of the Department of Justice. It consists of responses by approximately 49,000 households, which are randomly selected from "tracts" of similar housing units in order to generate a representative sample. Participants answer questions about recent victimizations, as well as whether they reported the crime to the police. By collecting data from citizens themselves, the NCVS side-steps the limitations of UCR counts based only on crimes known to police. Because of the relatively small sample, however, it can provide reliable annual crime estimates only at the national level.

While the goal of the NCVS and UCR data is to provide an accurate picture of violent and property crime in America, one needs to be mindful that they cover distinct subsets of crime. The most notable distinction is for murder, which is the best measured crime in the UCR, but which does not show up in a victim survey for obvious reasons.[18] The NCVS, meanwhile, includes simple assault and sexual assault, while the UCR Index I crimes are limited to the more serious crimes of aggravated assault and rape. Importantly, since the NCVS captures a great deal of the unreported crime that is not reflected in the UCR, the NCVS counts of violent and property crime tend to be far higher than the UCR measures. Finally, since the NCVS is based on a [16] Executive Director of the Major Cities Chiefs Association said "I don't know if we've got the beginning of a longer term trend in the change in violent crime…I think it's too soon for anybody to really know that for sure. Gabriel Dance and Tom Meagher, "Crime in Context" Marshall Project, August 18, 2016.

[17] In the year after a UCR release, agencies can continue to submit updated, corrected data. These corrections are reflected in the national total when the following year's UCR is released (that is, the 2015 national tables of the UCR contain adjustments for 2014). At some point, the FBI will also update the disaggregated data for 2014, but until it does, there will often be a discrepancy between the national growth of crime and the aggregated growth rate from the disaggregated state data The adjustment to the 2014 murder that the FBI issued when it published 2015 numbers, lowered the 2014 murder rate from 4.47 per 100,000 people to 4.44, which had the effect of elevating the increase in the murder rate for 2015 from 9.2% to 9.95%. For an extended discussion of flaws in the UCR data, see, e.g., Michael Maltz (1999), "Bridging Gaps in Police Crime Data," Bureau of Justice Statistics Discussion Paper, NCJ 176365.

[18] In addition, the UCR includes crimes against children under 11, while the NCVS does not.

sample, it will have a predictable amount of sampling error, which leads the NCVS to calculate standard errors for its estimates.[19] This means that a listed NCVS change in crime of, say, a drop of 3 percent with a standard error of 2 should be thought of as evidence that the actual change in crime that year is roughly between a drop in crime of 7 percent and an increase in crime of 1 percent (at the 95 percent confidence level). The bottom line, then, is that unless one is looking at murder, the reliability of any single-year movement in a UCR or NCVS crime category needs to be evaluated.

C. Murder, Violent Crime, and Property Crime over Time

The country's remarkable post-1993 crime drop is reflected in both the UCR murder and violent crime measures, shown in Figures 2 and 3, as well as in the NCVS violent crime measures shown in Figure 4. According to the UCR, from 1993 to 2015, the US murder rate fell 49 percent, violent crime fell 49 percent, and property crime fell 45 percent.[20] According to the NCVS, meanwhile, the drops in violent and property crime (from 1993-2015) have been even more dramatic at 77 and 69 percent, respectively.[21]

As I wrote in 1998: "We would achieve an enormous public policy victory if we could engineer a return to the low crime rates of the 1950s and early 1960s."[22] Happily, the victory was achieved during the Obama Administration: in 2014, the murder rate at 4.4 per 100,000 had dropped to the lowest level seen in the United States since 1957! Even with the jump in the murder rate that came the following year, the last time the U.S. murder rate was as low as it was in 2015 prior to Obama's Presidency was in 1963 – 52 years ago! This was astonishingly good news for the country. Well over 100,000 lives were saved by the huge post-1993 drop in the murder rate, and millions avoided being victimized by violent and property crime.

---

[19] For example, the 2015 NCVS violent crime rate of 18.6 per 1000 individuals over 12 has a standard error of 1.2, which means that the 95 percent confidence interval for the most recent NCVS measure of violent crime is the uncomfortably large range between 16.2 and 21.0.

D. The Incomplete Success of the Great American Crime Drop

In one important respect, though, the success of the great American crime drop has not been as complete as the crime data would suggest. Whether we have returned to the murder rate of 1963 or 1957, the fact is that we have not yet achieved what I hoped for in 1998 – the level of underlying criminality of the late 1950s or early 1960s. The ostensible contradiction is explained by the fact that while the observed murder rate has fallen to the level of a half century ago, the implicit murder rate is substantially higher today. The U.S. responded to the massive crime increases of the late 1960s and 1970s by dramatically increasing our incarceration rate to the highest level the world has ever seen and by substantially increasing our public and private police forces and other anti-crime measures. With these suppressive forces at work, we have returned to an observed murder rate of an earlier time, but without these forces in play today, the murder rate would be substantially higher. Thus, the implicit murder rate of today – the murder rate that would exist if the criminal justice policy of, say, 1963 were currently in place -- is substantially higher than the actual murder rate of today (or of 1963).

This discussion highlights that at any one point in time, the observed crime rate reflects the operation of many suppressing and stimulating influences on crime. Evanescent influences, whether benign or malign may temporarily move the crime rate above or below any underlying time path but they will not disrupt the longer-term trend. On the other hand, more sustained influences can alter the course of crime more powerfully, for good or ill.

E. American Misperceptions About Changes in Crime

Rivalling the astonishing crime drop is the almost equally astonishing level of ignorance Americans have about this good news. Figure 5 documents the percentage of Americans each year reporting crime has gone up (in a Gallup poll), alongside the actual NCVS violent crime rate (reported as number of violent crimes per 1,000 people over 12 years old).[23] Despite the long-term decline in violent crime, since 9/11 a majority of 60-70 percent of Americans have consistently answered that crime has risen over the last year. Even with the broad crime drop experienced during the Obama Administration, 63 percent of Americans thought crime was higher in 2014 – the year properly extolled by director Comey for its low crime rate. The next year with the biggest jump in murders in years, the number with the same opinion of rising crime increased but only to 70 percent.

It is not surprising that Americans are woefully ignorant about the level and trends of crime in the United States. Unscrupulous politicians and their supporters, the gun industry (using fear of crime to help sell guns and elect Republicans), and parts of the media constantly seek to scare the public with alarmist crime stories, An uninformed electorate is more likely to be swayed by demagogues, and Trump clearly seized on Comey's remarks in his effort to unleash the power of race and crime for political gain.

In addition to the distorting factors mentioned previously, the public perception may have been influenced by the increase in one particular type of highly publicized, shocking crime. The long-term downward trend in crime has been accompanied by a concurrent upward trend in mass shootings, from an average of 2.7 events per year in the 1990's to an average of 4.5 events per year from 2010 to 2013.[24] While the total deaths in these mass shootings has been too small relative to the overall homicide rate to overcome the downward trend in murders, mass shootings are particularly high visibility events, are reported on endlessly by the cable news network, and are quite shocking to the public and unsettling to the sense of public safety.[25] Horrific mass shootings, such as by Dylan Roof (killing nine members of black church in Charleston in June 2015) and at Umpqua Community College (killing eight students and a professor in Oregon in October 2015) and attacks by ISIS sympathizers in San Bernadino (killing 14 in December 2015) and Orlando (killing 49 in June 2016), although small in number compared to the total number of homicides, generated widespread apprehension and rich material for the Trump campaign.

II. A Closer Look at Crime in 2015

Before we begin speculating about the cause of the striking and unwelcome 9.95 percent increase in the 2015 murder rate, it is useful to analyze crime far more deeply than simply noting a one or even two-year jump in murder has occurred. First, it is important to remember that past claims that a crime jump portends a significant and sustained reversal in the benign trend in crime have often proven to be wrong. For example, in 2006 a wave of pessimistic news articles appeared that decried the end of the great crime decline. USA TODAY wrote that "cities see crime surge as threat to their revival," while the Associated Press announced that "violent crime in the U.S. is on the rise, posting its biggest one-year increase since 1991."[26] Even a police advocacy group, the Police Executive Research Forum, contributed a report ominously titled "A Gathering Storm—Violent Crime in America."[27] In retrospect, we can see that those concerns of resurgent violent crime were unfounded. As Figures 2-4 show, the 2006 crime increase gave way to a continued decline in both murder and violent crime more generally. Comey was certainly very quick on the trigger to be speaking of a reversal of our enormous crime decline in October of 2015, although of course as a law enforcement officer, he was expected to be alert to jumps in murder, whether temporary or sustained. Assuming the 2016 preliminary murder numbers hold up when the UCR data is released, Comey will be seen as having been ahead of the curve in sounding the alarm on the murder rate increase.

Second, it is important to look at all crime data to fully understand both changes in crime and possible causal explanations for those changes. The three short red (darker) portions of Figure 2 demonstrate the three years since 1977 with comparable percent increases in the rate of murder.[28] Since the most recent was 1990, Comey was correct in noting that a substantial and unusually high jump in murders had occurred in 2015. But an important fact that Comey did not acknowledge was that in all three of those previous years of substantial murder hikes, the country also experienced double digit increases in UCR overall violent crime that were each greater in magnitude than the homicide changes.[29] In 2015 the UCR jump in violent crime was nowhere near that level at only 3.04 percent. Comey was imprecise in making broad claims about what is happening to violent crime while only looking at one component of violent crime -- murder.

[25] Notably, the average number of mass murders per person is twice as high among states with no background checks as it is for those with background checks (8.36 vs. 4.04 per 100 million person-years, averages across states between 2009 and July 2015). The striking disparity warrants further investigation to determine whether universal background checks would reduce the frequency of mass shootings.

[29] The UCR violent crime growth rate was 11.3% from 1978-79, 12.1% from 1985-86, and 10.2% from 1989-90.

A. Do Murder Rates and Violent Crime Rates Always Move in Sync?

Peter Moskos recognized that the UCR increase in violent crime of 3.04 percent was a far more modest increase than the 9.95 jump in the murder rate, but he dismissed its significance:

> Now reported violent crime isn't up as much as homicide. That is interesting. But violent crime and homicide are always correlated. So if homicide data says up and violence data says not-so-up, my good money is on the homicide data being more correct. (It's why my preference is to look just at homicide or shooting data when examining trends in violence, at least when the n is high enough, which it is in this case.) Perhaps homicide is up and violent crime is down. But if so, that would be the first time, ever.
> My guess is that the apparent disparity reflects less reporting of crime, particularly in cities where crime is going up. Bodies get counted. Bruises less so. Also, just as proactive police can prevent crime, it can simultaneously increase the reporting of crimes. Fewer arrests mean less crime. Not in reality, of course, but in terms of crimes being counted. Some crimes are only recorded because police took the initiative and made an arrest.[30]

The suggestion that big jumps in murder might lead to undercounting of violent crime did not appear to be the case in the three prior years of such jumps that we just noted in Figure 2, in which each measured violent crime increase exceeded that year's murder rate increase. Moreover, while Moskos' claims seems reasonable, we need not rely only on police-collected UCR violent crime data. NCVS data is collected to deal precisely with this issue, and it does not support the view that the homicide increase is a better measure of the violent crime movement than the far lower UCR figure. Indeed, the percentage drop in the NCVS violent crime data for 2015 is -7.5. If one can rely on this NCVS point estimate, the US in 2015 may well have experienced increasing murders and less overall violent crime. The US certainly experienced less property crime (as both UCR and NCVS confirmed). Even though the near double digit increase in the murder rate is a major concern, to ignore the major divergence in crime that emerged in 2015 between murder and all other crime is to miss the big picture. Something more complex than an overall expansion of crime is underway. There is not even a hint that the long-term national decline in property crime is abating.

B. The Link Between Changes in Murder and Other Crimes

Figure 6 provides a heat map to visually track the changes in the five major crime measures we have discussed: UCR murder, violent, and property crime rates and NCVS violent and property rates. Combined, these data sources again confirm that 2015 is a rather anomalous year from a historical perspective: 2015 was the first year in the history of the modern (post-1993) NCVS that (1) an increase in the national UCR violent crime rate has coincided with a decrease in the NCVS violent crime rate, and (2) the only year the jump in the murder rate even exceeded 5 percent (and it reached almost twice that level). Moreover, in 15 of the 22 years show in Figure 6, NCVS violent crime and UCR and NCVS all fell – as it did in 2015 – yet in none of those other 15 years did murder and UCR violent crime rise. Figure 7 also illustrates the strong continuing, downward trend in UCR property crime: since 1993, there has only been one year

---

[30] Peter Moskos, http://www.copinthehood.com/2016/04/who-you-gonna-believe.html

(2001) that UCR property crime did not fall (and only four such years for NCVS property crime).

So we have a puzzle. The UCR tells us that murder rates rose sharply in 2015 – the biggest increase in 24 years – yet the violent crime rate rose only modestly (up 3.04 percent) and the property crime rate fell (down 3.38 percent). Moreover, the NCVS tells us that violent crime and property crime both fell, by 7.5 percent and 6.3 percent, respectively, although at least with respect to the NCVS violent crime numbers some qualifications are needed, as we will discuss in Section D below. Since anomalous patterns tend to mean revert, it will be interesting to see whether the not-yet released 2016 UCR and NCVS violent crime figures will converge to each other, and also to the changes in the murder rate, or whether the diverging patterns will continue.

C. State Analysis Of UCR Data in 2015

Figure 7 mimics the earlier national heat map across time by examining the pattern of changes in the three UCR crime categories in 2015 for all 50 states and the District of Columbia (recall there is no state data released for the NCVS because the sample size is too small for statewide analysis). The figure reveals that many more states experienced murder rate increases (37) than decreases (9) in 2015 (with five states showing no change), and in 34 states and the District of Columbia the jump in the murder rate was at least 5 percent. On its face, this widespread pattern of murder rate increases on its face calls into question the Comey claim that the crime explosion was exclusively a black, urban phenomenon. Interestingly, only 20 states had a jump in the violent crime rate of that magnitude in 2015 (40 states had some drop), and only 3 had such a jump in property crime (11 had some drop).

In general, the murder rate jumps were considerably larger than murder rate drops: for example, Utah and Hawaii were the only states to experience drops in murder rates of over 20 percent (at 22 and 28 percent respectively). In contrast, 16 states had murder rate increases of that magnitude or more in 2015. Moreover, 7 states had at least a 40 percent jump in their murder rates, with South Dakota, the District of Columbia, and Minnesota leading the way with at least 50 percent increases in their murder rates in 2015. Wisconsin, Alaska, Kansas, and Maryland had the fourth through seventh highest murder rate increases.

If I had to select the state that had the overall worst deterioration in crime performance in 2015 according to the UCR data, it would be South Dakota with rates of murder up 61 percent, violent crime up 17 percent, and property crime up 4 percent. The state that looked best in that year was Florida, with drops in murder of 12 percent, violent crime of 15 percent, and property crime of 18 percent. Note that while Comey was pointing towards an explosion in black inner-city crime as the reason for the 2015 crime jump, South Dakota has little black urban crime (indeed only 1.27 percent of the state's population is black). Conversely, Florida has a large, urban black population and an overall black population of 15.9 percent, yet its crime experience in 2015 was uniformly positive in direction.

Indeed, five of the states with the largest increases in murder in 2015 had less than half the proportion of blacks of the nation as a whole, so the murder increase is likely not purely the black crime phenomenon that Comey described. It seems highly implausible that the anomalous jumps in murder in Alaska (43 percent increase in 2015), Iowa (21 percent), Kansas (42 percent), Minnesota (50 percent), Nebraska (14 percent), New Hampshire (22 percent), New Mexico (17 percent), Oregon (25 percent), South Dakota (61 percent), and Washington (16 percent) can simply be explained by unleashed black, urban crime because of police retrenchment in the wake of protests over the killing of unarmed blacks.[31] Any such de-policing story would seem much more likely to occur in, say, Florida than in South Dakota (the reverse of what we see in terms of crime movements).

The message thus far from the available national and state crime data is that a substantial and widespread jump in murder occurred at the same time that property crime continued to trend down, while the movement in the overall violent crime rate was uncertain with UCR evidence suggesting a modest but widespread nationwide increase and, as we will now discuss, NCVS data providing some evidence that violent crime actually fell in 2015.

[31] Similarly, eight of the twenty states experiencing greater than 5 percent jumps in violent crime were low-black-population states, including Alaska, Hawaii, Montana, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Vermont, and Wyoming. Comey's black, urban crime rise story undoubtedly plays out in a few cities but doesn't ring true for the nation as a whole.

D. A Closer Look at NCVS Violent Crime Data for 2015

1. NCVS Total Victimization Rates – Declines but Not Statistically Significant

Recalling that the NCVS captures simple assault while the UCR does not (counting only aggravated assaults), one might speculate that the conflicting movements in the NCVS and UCR violent crime rates for 2015 could be explained by the considerably more numerous simple assaults dropping even as the more serious aggravated assaults rose. Fortunately, the NCVS also provides breakdowns of its violent crime category and it shows that not only did both aggravated and simple assaults drop in 2015, but the percentage drop was greater for aggravated assaults. Indeed, the NCVS drop in the rate of aggravated assaults in 2015 was roughly 19 percent (while the drop in simple assault was about 9 percent).

We see the same basic story if we limit our focus to the following NCVS subcategories: 1) the serious violent crime rate fell almost 12 percent, 2) serious violent crime involving weapons fell almost 27 percent, and 3) serious violent crime involving injury fell almost 8 percent.[32] On the other hand, owing to the size of the standard errors on these NCVS figures, none of the NCVS violent crime drops I have referenced here are statistically significant at the .05 level.[33] Consequently, while the NCVS sample on its face suggests that all of these violent crime rates fell in 2015, the NCVS states that there was no "statistically significant" drop in violent crime in 2015. The true level of violent crime would be captured in a 95 percent confidence interval that would suggest anything from a modest rise in violent crime (but certainly nothing comparable to the jump in the murder rate) to a decline that is greater in absolute value than the murder rate

[33] Three NCVS violent crime drops were significant at the lower .10 level: rape/sexual assault, aggravated assault, and serious violent crime involving weapons.

increase. Note, however, that the NCVS property crime rate drops of 6.3 percent were statistically significant at the .05 level, and this evidence of a national drop in the rate of property crime is broadly consistent with the finding in the UCR of property crime drop of 3.4 percent in 2015.[34]

2. NCVS Prevalence Rates -- Statistically Significant Declines

Interestingly, the NCVS provides data not only on total victimizations but also on the proportion of the population that suffers any violent crime during the year (the latter number counting not how many times someone was victimized in the year but just whether they were victimized during the year).[35] The NCVS tells us that in 2015, 0.98 percent of all persons age 12 or older (roughly 2.7 million persons) experienced at least one violent victimization, which was a statistically significant drop from the level of 1.11 percent in 2014. Disaggregating this violent crime prevalence category, the drop in crime prevalence from 2014 to 2015 was also statistically significant at the .05 level for overall assault, and at the .10 level for aggravated assault, domestic violence, and stranger violence.

If we limit our focus to subcategories of what the NCVS counts as serious violent crime (rape or sexual assault, robbery, and aggravated assault), the drop in crime prevalence from 2014 to 2015 was statistically significant at the .05 level for serious stranger violence and serious violent crime involving weapons. The drop in prevalence of property crime was also statistically significant at the .05 level (from 7.99 to 7.6 percent of the population).

III. The Stylized Facts of Crime, 2015-2016

Our exploration of the full set of federal crime data from the UCR and NCVS for 2015, and the limited murder data from selected cities in 2016 underscores the fact that all of our knowledge about crime is probabilistic and that crime data can be uncertain and conflicting. This must impart a degree of humility to our pronouncement since if we don't even know what happened – for example, did violent crime rise by just a fraction of the rise in murders, or did it decline similarly to property crime? – we cannot be confident about any causal story. Peter Moskos seems to have endorsed the view, consistent with Comey's behavior, that as long as you know the murder data, you know all you need to know – or perhaps can know -- about trends in crime. Murder data is certainly privileged in the sense that it is the best measured crime data we have, and homicide is the most serious crime category. But if all crime moved in approximate lock-step with murder, there would be no need to maintain the rest of the UCR crime data or have any NCVS.

There are certainly reasons to be skeptical of the non-homicide UCR data. The most common components of UCR violent and property crime -- aggravated assault and larceny – can be, and [34] Since property thefts from businesses are included in the UCR but not in the NCVS, the different values may suggest that property crime fell more for individuals than for businesses.

---

[35] While the NCVS recorded 5,006,620 violent crimes in 2015, only 2,650,670 individuals were victimized, underscoring that many Americans experience multiple victimizations within the same year (in separate incidents). To provide context, the total number of violent crime victims in 2015 was roughly the population of the city of Chicago.

in fact have been, manipulated in certain cities.[36] Moreover, changes in reporting rates, as well as the aggressiveness of policing, may alter the count of crimes known to police (which is all that the UCR reports) even if crime itself doesn't change. Similarly, one must always ask if a survey such as that provided by the NCVS has gone astray in a single year or suffered from some alteration in the response rate in a way that could skew the results.[37]

While the NCVS has limitations – for example, it undersamples the homeless and its respondents do not report fully accurately, especially underreporting domestic violence and forgetting some events – Chris Jencks notes that the NCVS, to a greater extent than the UCR, "is conducted in the same way every year, so most of [its] biases are likely to be constant. So while the NCVS almost certainly underestimates the level of violence in America, it should be a quite reliable guide to trends in violence."[38] Consequently, it would be unwise to simply reject NCVS evidence of a continuing violent crime decline (or at most a minor increase) in estimating the true level of violent crime in 2015. Whatever pull towards a 10 percent increase is exerted by the Moskos "violent crime moves with homicide" equation is offset by the countervailing NCVS data. If the NCVS violent crime estimates are accurate, this would directly contradict the Comey claim of exploding violent crime. While I give considerable weight to the NCVS violent crime evidence, one's confidence would of course increase if additional years of data showed a similar pattern.

Figure 7 summarizes what we know about the percentage change in 2015 in the rates of murder, violent crime, and property crime, the last two of which we have estimates from both the UCR and the NCVS. Figure 8 underscores a noteworthy aspect about Comey's October 2015 speech and subsequent comments about the explosion in violent crime. Ask yourself if you were giving a major speech on crime and you saw the data in Figure 8, which would certainly have been available to the FBI director, would you comment only on the murder rate jump and not say anything about any other aspect of the data in that Figure? Would you say something about the anomaly of the murder rate figures or the apparent divergence in movements between murder and other crimes? Comey certainly did not.

[36] For example, the Los Angeles Police Department misclassified approximately 14,000 serious assaults as minor offenses from 2005 through 2012, which artificially lowered violent crime rates. http://www.latimes.com/local/cityhall/la-me-crime-stats-20151015-story.html

[37] If the decline in NCVS violent crime estimates for 2015 were caused by some differential nonresponse, it would have to mean that fewer individuals subject to violent crime were being interviewed in 2015 than had been interviewed in 2014. With murder and UCR violent crime both showing increases in 2015, it seems more likely that any error in the 2015 NCVS violent crime data would have led to an understatement in crime. Without this conflicting pattern, I might even have had concerns about NCVS overstatement of violent crime in 2015, given election-year exaggerations as reflected in the growing concerns the public was feeling about violent crime when respondents were being interviewed. This overstatement could result if the high salience of crime increased respondent recall about victimizations, regardless of whether they had occurred in the relevant time frame. The NCVS asks about victimizations over the last six months and respondents tend to report more such victimizations in the preceding three months, suggesting they are under-reporting the more distant (presumably less well-remembered) crimes.

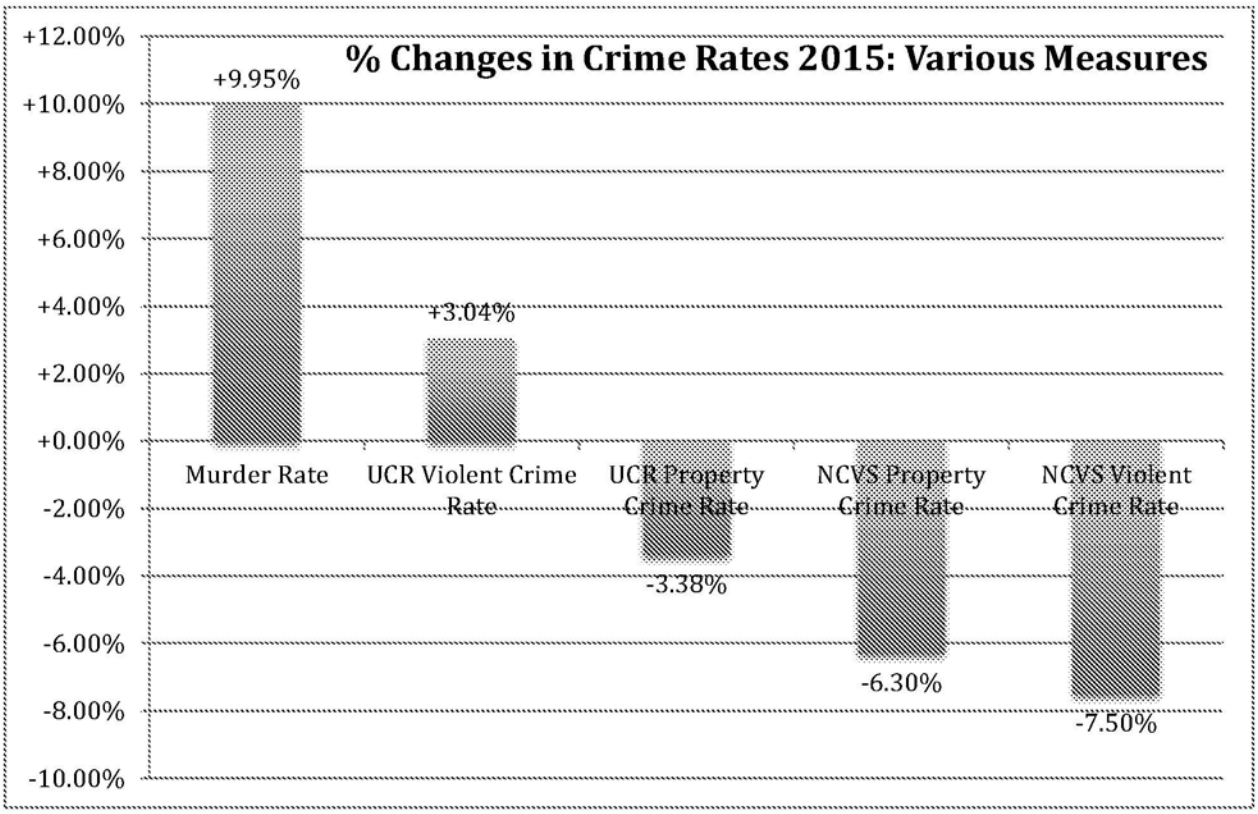
Figure 8



Given the evidence that we have amassed, it is useful to try to distill some stylized facts about crime in 2015 and 2016.

1) The murder rate rose sharply – almost 10 percent -- in 2015, and in 2016 likely will rise substantially again but not as much as in 2015 (perhaps in the 5-6 percent range).
2) The murder rate jump is fairly widespread throughout the country (Figure 7 above), and of course quite dramatic in individual cities, particularly Chicago in 2016 (as we will see in Figure 15).
3) Property crime fell in 2015, consistent with its long-term downward trend (as shown in both the UCR (3.38 percent drop) and the NCVS (a statistically significant drop of 6.3 percent drop).
4) While the findings of the divergent trends of a rising murder rate and a continuing decline in property crime are unmistakable, the evidence on violent crime is mixed and needs to be interpreted.
5) Moskos based his estimate of the change in the violent crime rate purely on the 9.95 percent jump in the murder rate, ignoring the far lower UCR violent crime rate estimate of a roughly 3 percent increase in 2015, as well as the NCVS estimate of a 7.5 percent drop. This approach will not be correct from a Bayesian perspective unless the weight to be assigned to the latter two numbers should be zero.
6) Despite the NCVS estimate of a 7.5 percent drop in the violent crime rate, this number turns out not to be statistically significantly different from zero. Hence, the NCVS report of 2015 notes the lower violent crime number in 2015 but states: "There was no statistically significant change in the rate of overall violent crime, defined as rape or sexual assault, robbery, aggravated assault, and simple assault, from 2014 (20.1 victimizations per 1,000 persons age 12 and older) to 2015 (18.6 per 1,000). However, the rate of violent crime in 2015 was lower than in 2013 (23.2 per 1,000)." With measured NCVS violent crime hitting an all-time low, Comey's claim that 2015 was a year of exploding violent crime is not supported by the data.

7) The NCVS evidence on the prevalence of violent crime suggests a statistically significant decline of 11.7 percent in this rate in 2015.
8) A plausible summary might be that if the crime prevalence rates in 2014 had persisted in 2015 (and we accept these two NCVS point estimates as correct) roughly 350,000 more individuals would have suffered violent victimizations, and 500,000 more would have suffered property crime victimization than was the case.[39] This impressive drop in the prevalence of violent and property crime was offset by the tragedy that roughly 1500 more were murdered in 2015 than in 2014. Another 750 will likely die in 2016 beyond the previous jump of 1500. This is a widespread worsening of homicide but a clear lessening of property crime, coupled with a mixed but in some ways favorable year with respect to violent crime.

Only after the preceding discussion of the facts about crime are we at the point that we can evaluate Comey's three primary factual claims: 1) there was an explosion of murder in 2015 that represented an abrupt change from 2014; 2) there was an explosion of violent crime in 2015; and 3) this crime explosion occurred throughout the nation, and overwhelmingly generated by black, urban men in bad neighborhoods.

The first claim is unequivocally true: in 2015, the murder rate rose by 9.95 percent, an unusually high national rate of increase. There was an explosion of homicidal violence leading to an almost 10 percent increase in the murder rate. The second Comey claim is not true: there was no nationwide explosion in violent crime in 2015. The only uncertainty for violent crime is whether violent crime rose but at a fraction of the amount of the homicide increase (as the UCR figure of a 3.04 percent increase suggested), stayed the same (as the finding of no statistically significant difference in NCVS violent crime might suggest), or fell given the -7.5 percent change NCVS violent crime point estimate. Indeed, the statistically significant NCVS prevalence data for 2015 suggests that there were hundreds of thousands of fewer violent and property crime victims. Unequivocally, property crime fell in 2015. In any event, the murder hike, coupled with diverging movements in other violent and property crime categories is a more complete description of crime in 2016.

Comey's third claim is also false: the nationwide murder explosion, which did occur, is not exclusively generated by black, urban men in bad neighborhoods. The large murder increases in New Hampshire, Alaska, Iowa, South Dakota, etc., undercut this thesis.

[39] Again, since these estimates come from an NCVS sample, one might think of a confidence interval around these point estimates. Since the NCVS prevalence numbers were statistically significant at the .05 level, the 95 percent confidence interval would still reflect a decline in the number of violent crime victims that was far higher than the increased number of killings.

The most parsimonious description of the stylized facts of crime in 2015 might be that the large and abrupt rise in the murder rate diverged sharply from the downward trend in property crime and perhaps not as sharply but noticeably from the change in violent crime. Although the evidence does not support Comey on two of his three factual claims, it is still possible that the de-policing causal story he told applies to the sharp jump in the murder rate in 2015. Since it is unlikely that a single factor could generate this large jump, we will discuss that theory only after we have considered other major factors that were likely operating on crime in 2015 to see how much scope is left for de-policing to be part of the story.

IV. Considering the Impact of Major Factors on Crime

The 1990s witnessed a confluence of many factors that combined to have a large dampening effect on crime. The result was the sharpest and most abrupt crime shift in American history – the dramatic and sustained drop in crime that began in 1993. An array of diverse phenomena, such as increasing rates of incarceration and police, improved quality of policing, shifts in illegal drug use and marketing, and arguably even abortion legalization and lead elimination in the 1970s, finally overwhelmed the forces that were stimulating crime. As I have previously written:

> With continuing crime reduction benefits coming in the 1990s from demographics, the economy, and incarceration along with a growing police presence, the USA was poised for a major improvement when it got two additional benign shocks – the abatement of the crime stimulant from the crack trade, and the sudden jolt of the crime-suppressing drop in unwanted births engineered via 1970s abortion legalization…. The lesson of the great American crime drop is that when six major factors press in one direction, crime moves.[40]

To fully understand the crime pattern of 2015 and reflect on where crime may be headed, one needs to consider this larger array of factors. By 2015, many of the most potent factors that had contributed to the post-1993 crime decline were no longer contributing to crime reductions or had even reversed and were now putting upward pressure on crime. Section A and B will discuss the factors currently operating to stimulate crime, but I will begin with four factors that could also plausibly explain the basic 2015 crime pattern of an increasing murder rate and divergence from other crimes. Section C will then discuss current factors tending to suppress crime. To the extent that the major influences that led to the post-1993 drop in crime have been reversed or have lapsed, there will be upward pressure on crime that will need to be confronted, either through restoration of past factors or initiation of new crime-suppressing approaches.

A. Factors That Differentially Promote Homicide and Hence Crime Divergence

1. Reduced Incarceration

A major contributing factor in the declining crime rates of the 1990s was the sustained, enormous increase in the country's rate of incarceration. As Figure 9 shows, however, the rate of incarceration has now peaked and has begun to fall. The 8.6 percent drop in the incarceration rate since a peak of 465 prisoners per 100,000 people in 2007 is now providing a stimulus to crime as more convicts -- who typically have high recidivism rates -- are returning to the streets than criminals are being taken off.[41] One could easily get an upward bump of 1.5 percent in the homicide rate from prison decreases of this magnitude.[42]

[40] John Donohue, "Understanding the 1990s Crime Drops in the U.S. and Canada," Canadian Journal of Criminology and Criminal Justice, Vol 49, No. 4, p. 552 (October 2007) at http://www.ccja-acjp.ca/en/cjcr200/cjcr278.html

Is there any evidence that would suggest that the declining level of incarceration might also contribute to the divergence in crime that we have found in 2015, with murder rising and other crime experiencing a far lower jump or even a decline? Interestingly, an earlier paper of mine with Steve Levitt estimated that the likely crime-stimulating effect of a decrease in incarceration would be greatest for murder and an order of magnitude less for violent crime. Thus, if the regression estimates from Donohue and Levitt were true today, the shrinking level of incarceration would elevate the murder rate in 2015 by 1.5 percent but would cause only a negligible upward push of .15 percent in violent crime. In other words, the decreasing incarceration rate is differentially stimulating increases in homicide and thereby increasing crime divergence (although still providing lesser stimulus to other violent and property crimes).

Of course, as with every aspect of crime, there is a debate on the magnitude of the impact of incarceration on crime. While I have used a consensus estimate for this elasticity, others believe the effect is far smaller or even negligible. A recent Brennan Center study argues that [41] Troublingly, states struggling with heavy budgetary burdens imposed by mass incarceration may face legal constraints that limit their ability to release older criminals who have been sent away with controversial programs such as three-strikes. It could well reduce the safety of the public if these constraints discourage the release of older criminals and promote the release of more criminally active younger criminals.

[42] Donohue and Levitt's Table 4 shows an elasticity of almost 25 percent for the impact of incarceration on homicide but roughly one-tenth of that value on overall violent crime. John Donohue and Steven Levitt, "The Impact of Legalized Abortion on Crime," Quarterly Journal of Economics (Vol. CXVI, Issue 2, May 2001), pp. 379-420. The impact on property crime is smaller than homicide and not statistically significant.

incarceration had a negligible impact on crime rates from the early 90's through 2013.[43] Table 1 shows the type of evidence that the Brennan Center report relies on to reach this conclusion, but it is unclear whether the statistically insignificant Table 1 estimates for the impact of incarceration on crime are reliable, or whether the Table only shows that given the endogeneity between incarceration rates and crime, one needs a stronger empirical tool than a panel data model to capture the true impact.

2. Declining Police Rates

Important papers by Levitt,[44] Klick and Tabarrok,[45] and most recently Chalfin and McCrary[46] have concluded that higher police employment has a dampening effect on crime—and, most strikingly, on murder. Chalfin and McCrary, for example, find elasticities of -.34 for violent crimes, -.17 for property crimes, and -.67 for murder. As Figure 10 shows graphically, police employment of sworn officers has declined over the past few years. Police officer rates have fallen from a peak of 254 officers per 100,000 people in 2008 by 7.1 percent.[47] Using Chalfin and McCrary's numbers, this drop would be associated with a 4.75 percent increase in murder but only a 2.41 percent increase in violent crime and.[48] Again, we see evidence that a major influence on crime would be differentially stimulating homicide and generating crime divergence.

Combining just the two factors of incarceration and police, one would expect the murder rate to be 6.3 percent and the violent crime rate to be 2.6 percent higher in 2015 (than they would have been without the recent declines in incarceration and police). These two factors alone explain two-thirds of the 2015 jump in murder and almost 85 percent of the UCR violent crime increase.

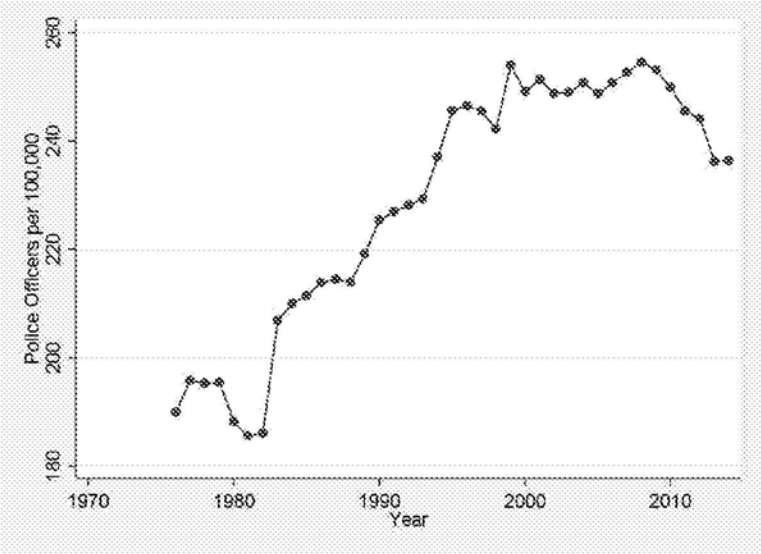
[47] The decline in overall police employment has been somewhat greater. Since a peak of 368 police staff per 100,000 people in 2007, there has been a fall of 7.9% (as of 2014).

[48] Using the numbers from Donohue and Levitt (Table 4) referenced in footnote 42, one would expect the decline in the police force to lead to a 2.1 percent increase in the murder rate and far smaller effects on violent and property crime (perhaps an order of magnitude less) – again suggesting differential effects consistent with the patterns we have identified for 2015.

Table 1 also presents estimates for the impact of police on crime that conflict with those used in the text, but they may be subject to the same infirmity we addressed concerning the Table 1 elasticity estimates for incarceration – they make no correction for endogeneity.



We are not only interested in having an appropriate number of police employees and sworn officers but we also want to make sure they are able to work effectively to reduce or restrain crime. The Brennan Center report on reasons for the long-term crime decline uses a regression analysis to argue that the introduction of CompStat led to a significant reduction of crime in adopting cities between 1994 and 2013. The authors contend that CompStat has enhanced police effectiveness by providing timely information and allowing police to deploy officers more effectively and rapidly and to follow-up in problematic areas.[49]

By 2015, more than 80 percent of the police departments in the nations's 50 largest cities had adopted CompStat, although the rate of new adoptions has slowed considerably in recent years.[50] If more cities continue to adopt this crime-fighting strategy or the police are able to increase their crime-fighting effectiveness as they work with this tool, then CompStat could continue to provide additional pressure reducing crime. Conversely, if no further expansion in the use of CompStat occurs and whatever benefits it confers have stabilized, this technology would be providing no additional stimulus to crime reduction (since the prior benefits would be baked into the current crime numbers).

3. Illegal Drugs – Stimulating Crime and Perhaps Divergence

The last major increase in crime was triggered by the growth of the illegal crack cocaine trade in the mid-1980s. A new nationwide increase in drug addiction and abuse is under way in the U.S., leading to an estimated 46,940 drug overdose deaths in 2014, a figure that dwarfs homicide deaths.[51] In the past few years, opioid demand, in particular, has risen sharply. Figure 11 depicts the rise in heroin-related overdose deaths in the U.S. since 2011.[52] Some cities, like Chicago, have been hit particularly hard, with drug use expanding to suburban areas. In October of 2015, 74 people with heroin overdoses flooded into Chicago hospitals within a 72-hour window.[53] According to the CDC, per capita deaths from drug overdoses have more than doubled since 2000. From 2014 to 2015, the total drug overdose death rate increased by 10 percent, and the heroin overdose death rate increased by 21 percent.[54] Figure 12 shows the uniform rise in overdose deaths in 2015 for a group of states and cities.[55] To the extent that the increase in drug overdoses is a reflection of an expansion in illegal drug markets, one would expect crime to be stimulated, as it was with the emergence of crack in the 1980s.

Increases in illegal drug use, particularly in newly emerging or growing illegal markets, can promote deadly gang turf wars, as well as robberies and burglaries as drug users try to support their habits. These changes would stimulate crime overall, but there is also a mechanism that would differentially stimulate murders but not other measured crimes. This results because the expansion of the illegal drug market provides opportunities for a booming business in robbing drug dealers or fighting over drug turf.[56] For obvious reasons, drug dealers do not report such crimes and are unlikely to speak about them to NCVS interviewers. Since these crimes are likely to involve armed participants on both sides, deaths are inevitable and only the presence of a body will ensure that the event is recorded in some federal crime statistic. This factor would perfectly mimic the observed crime pattern of increased murders and crime divergence (although in this scenario, it is only reported, not actual, violent crime that diverges).

4. Increasing Lethality of Assaultive Attacks

One possible explanation for an increase in murder but not in overall violent crime is that physical violence has increased in lethality. This could happen if attacks that in the past would have led only to a nonfatal injury (hence an aggravated assault) have now become deadly (hence the jump in murders). Conceivably, the increasing availability of more lethal weapons and bullets could be yet another factor pushing in the direction of more murders, while not stimulating overall violent crime – hence promoting crime divergence.

Of course, there are possible factors pushing in the opposite direction. Improving medical treatment of gun injuries would reduce rather than increase the lethality of violent crime, but any such recent trauma treatment improvements would push in the opposite direction to our observed spike in murders (by increasing measured violent crime as murders declined). I suspect both of these factors are operating, but their relatively small and competing effects could well offset each other, so I won't consider them further.

B. Factors Stimulating Crime or Whose Previous Dampening Effect Has Lapsed

1. Declining Abortion

Donohue and Levitt argued in 2001 that the reduction in unwanted children that resulted from the legalization of abortion had a significant dampening effect on crime as successive cohorts reached their high crime years beginning in late adolescence.[57] The abortion-crime hypothesis has been controversial, and not all have accepted this causal relationship.[58] Nonetheless, nearly two decades of additional U.S. data, coupled with confirmatory studies from abroad, have strengthened the link between abortion and crime, so there may be some re-thinking of this issue by past critics.[59]

Using an index designed to capture the potential impact of abortion on crime (based on the summation of each cohort's abortion rate times the proportion of arrests for that age), Figure 13 shows that the peak effective rates for murder (428) and violent crime (427) were reached in 2003, and property crime (426) in 2002. By 2015, these values had declined by roughly 15 percent: the effective abortion rates were down for murder (361), violent crime (358), and property crime (353).

The first three columns of Table 1 use this effective abortion rate to establish how powerfully increases in abortion are linked to decreases in the three crime categories (using a panel data analysis with state and year fixed effects for data from 1979-2014). Indeed, no other factor contained in the table even comes close to the enormous statistical significance of the abortion effect. Combining the information from Figure 13 and Table 1, the recent 15 percent reduction in the effective abortion rate would, mechanically applied, be associated with an increase in crime of almost two thirds the coefficient estimates in Table 1.

While this mechanical application would suggest that the abortion rate drops would lead to crime increases across all three categories of perhaps 10-12 percent that number may be exaggerated. The causal mechanism that led the increase in abortions in the 1970s – 1990s to reduce crime was through the reduction in unwanted children. Of course, reducing unwanted pregnancies reduces the number of unwanted children as well as the number of abortions. Some of the recent drops in abortion were not the product of limitations imposed by the state that resulted in increased births of unwanted children but rather were caused by reductions in unwanted pregnancies (in part resulting from earlier reductions in unwanted births).[60] If all of the abortion drop were caused by this benign trend, then the reduced level of abortion would not be currently stimulating more crime. Some of the abortion drop, though, may have been caused by state efforts to restrict access to abortions through various legal and policy changes.[61] Such restrictions would be crime-stimulative. If we knew the relative proportion of the observed drop in abortion that falls into this crime-stimulative category, we could adjust our mechanical estimated effect of the decline in abortion on crime. Without this percentage, it is hard to provide a solid estimate of the likely impact of the recent abortion decline on crime. At the very least, it is plausible that the crime-reducing benefit of diminishing the number of unwanted children by expanded access to abortion is no longer providing an added stimulus to crime declines, and might actually have reversed, leading to crime increases by 2015.

Of course, those who do not accept the described abortion-crime link would likely not want to include the effective abortion rate variable in the panel data regressions of Table 1. Accordingly, I eliminated that variable from columns 4-6 in the Table and otherwise re-ran the same crime regressions. This has the interesting effect of altering the estimated effects of laws allowing citizens to carry concealed handguns (RTC laws), suggesting that the continuing movement to allow more concealed carry is promoting violent and property crime, but not homicide. In this event, the growth of RTC laws would be stimulating crime in a manner that promotes crime divergence, but the opposite type of crime divergence that we observed in 2015, where increased homicides were dominant.

[61] States employ an array of measures to try to reduce the frequency of abortion. See, https://www.washingtonpost.com/news/the-fix/wp/2013/03/07/where-all-50-states-stand-on-abortion-in-two-charts/?utm_term=.636ee7ed9202

2. Out of Wedlock Births

Over time there has been tremendous growth in the number of children born out of wedlock. Specifically, as shown in Figure 14, the percentage of live births that occur to single women has grown from 4 percent in the early 1950s, to 25 percent in 1988 (a level that led Moynihan in the early 1960s to see the black family as in peril) and 33 percent in 1999. As of 2010, the figure was 41 percent for all US births and 72.8 percent for blacks. This increasing pattern of out of wedlock births increases the likelihood that the children will experience a number of factors that have been associated with higher risks of subsequent criminal involvement: growing up in poverty and unstable homes without the benefits of the presence of two parents.[62] While in the last five or six years, that number has flattened out, the number of children who grew up in these less favorable circumstances who are now entering the high-crime years of late adolescence and beyond will still be growing each year until all of the children growing up in these circumstances prior to 2009 have aged out of the high crime-age population. Thus, while I don't have a regression-based estimate for this effect, we have evidence that the past increases in out of wedlock births will put upward pressure on crime for perhaps the next ten years.

C. Factors Tending to Suppress Crime

The factors discussed above have all been putting upward pressure on crime in recent years. As we saw earlier, however, property crime continues to fall. This means that there are some potent factors at work putting downward pressure on crime – or at least on property crime – and these factors continue to dominate any stimulating influence on property crime.

1. Increasing Use of Technology that Raises the Cost of Crime

A number of technological innovations are operating to restrain crime. Jennifer Doleac has recently written of the success of the expanding use of DNA databases to reduce not only murder and violent crime, but property crime as well.[63] The continuing use and growth of these databases is one of the new factors restraining crime across the board.

[62] A remarkable recent study finds that criminality is substantially impact by certain types of sub-optimal family dynamics. See, Breining, Sanni, Doyle, Joseph J., Figlio, David N., Karbownik, Krzysztof and Jeffrey Roth. "Birth Order and Delinquency: Evidence from Denmark and Florida." Working Paper. December 2016 (finding second children have substantially higher rates of delinquency and criminality). Whatever disadvantages second children have relative to their older siblings, they are small relative to some of the family disadvantages that poor inner-city children in unstable families experience.

The widespread use and availability of cell phones and surveillance videos has also been curtailing criminal activity. Before cell phones were popular, burglars might have cut phone lines before going into houses. Obviously, they believed that their criminal designs could be compromised if an occupant were to hear them and phone the police. Cell phones have ended that option for burglars. They facilitate calls for help and their cameras allow license plates and other evidence to be gathered more easily, thereby elevating the burdens on criminals. Of course, new technology can also be employed by criminals to aid criminal enterprises, but the dampening effect on crime from the broadening use of technology has been the more dominant influence thus far.

2. The Economy

While the relationship between the economy and crime is often unclear, to the extent that an improving economy has any dampening effect, the strengthening economy will have recently been operating to reduce crime, and should continue to do so in the near future.

Note that 2015 was an unusually good year in every economic dimension that one might think would be relevant to crime. Not only did median household income rise by a robust 5.2 percent from 2014 (the first such increase since 2007), but the large job growth in 2015 enabled the number of individuals in poverty to decline by 3.5 million.[64] While poverty declined in every group, blacks and Hispanics experienced the largest improvement.[65] One would expect these developments to restrain crime, and perhaps they did for property crime and violent crime. Obviously, whatever restraining influence this substantial economic improvement was having on murders was overwhelmed in 2015 by the other factors that were stimulating murders. I note in passing that the nature of media reporting and perhaps voter attention in a presidential election year was such that many more people were aware of the claims about the enormous increase in murders in 2015 than in the enormous improvements in job growth and poverty reduction in the same year.

3. Factors Differentially Suppressing Property Crime

The two previous factors will tend to suppress all types of crime, which we know were outweighed in 2015 by factors that stimulated homicides. Three additional factors have been differentially suppressing property crime. The first two make traditional robbery and theft crimes less attractive: 1) the lesser carrying of cash with the ascendancy of credit cards, and 2) the lower cost of goods, which makes theft less attractive (a "Walmart" effect). Previously, criminals might hope to find cash in a burglarized home but the move towards credit cards has reduced the likelihood that significant amounts of cash will be found (except for the homes of drug dealers, as we noted above). In the past, television sets and other appliances were also attractive to burglars if they could be re-sold quickly for a reasonable price. But as the price of these appliance falls and their size increases, their attractiveness to potential burglars falls. Today, the most alluring targets for non-professional burglars are probably jewelry and guns.

The third factor is in part a response to the first two factors, and while it does not reduce crime, it changes the nature of property crime: criminals are shifting away from stealing goods to stealing via the internet. These losses are probably far less likely to be counted in federal crime statistics, in part because so many victims remain unaware of their losses. This internet effect suggests that some of the reported property crime decline is not real, simply reflecting a change in the technology of theft. Nonetheless, it is probably less socially costly to have a $100 credit card theft than having a burglar steal $100 from your home. The latter will engender more fear, and also carries the risk of escalation into violence.

The move to a cashless society – currently underway in some other societies – certainly merits close attention as a possible further step that can be taken to reduce crime (in addition to other social benefits).[66]

D. The Net Effect on Crime in 2015

When you consider all of the factors that were putting upward pressure on crime in 2015, it is not surprising to see a considerable spike in homicides that year. This conclusion follows from a simple exercise: use existing elasticity estimates and the percentage declines in police and prisoners to estimate the likely effect on murder and violent crime, and add in a plausible estimate for the impact of a growing illegal drug markets. These three factors alone can essentially explain the roughly 10 percent higher murder rate observed in 2015 and the far smaller jump in UCR violent crime. This suggests that murder and violent crime in 2015 would have been roughly at the level of 2014 had these three factors not been operating. The end of the crime suppression generated by the increased abortion rate and the continuing increase in out of wedlock births that has only recently stalled are other factors that are either still stimulating crime or whose previous suppressing effect has now been eliminated or reduced.

Of course, all sorts of complexities are imbedded in these numbers: Which elasticity estimates are the best for estimating the impact of the declines in police and incarceration? How should one account for changes that occurred over a number of years in assessing the impact on murder in 2015? If the increasing drug problem, fewer police and prisoners, and more out-of-wedlock births have pushed crime up and thereby cumulatively explain why murder and violent crime are where they are today, that still leaves the puzzle of why the jump in murder didn't start earlier. In other words, if over the last five years those four factors operated in combination to push up the murder rate by 2 percent per year, why did murder jump by 10 percent 2015? Shouldn't the murder rate have increased from 2014 to 2015 only be one-fifth as high as it was? Why then wasn't the murder rate rise in 2015 only 2 percent instead of 10 percent? Put differently, can continuous changes in causal factors ultimately lead to discontinuous impacts on crime?

It appears from the sharp reversal in crime that occurred in 1993 that this is exactly what happens. Conceivably, the initial decline in police in the years prior to 2015 had relatively little effect but, at some point, a larger cumulative effect was felt. As the police force shrinks, at first one loses the presumably least valuable police services so the upward pressure on crime is small. When the losses continue and 5 or 10 percent of the police force is gone, the department has started losing some muscle and bone. If this tipping point or threshold effect story is correct, then by the time the police force had fallen by 7.1 percent and the incarceration rate has fallen by 8.6 percent in 2015, that threshold had been met. At that point, the criminal population finally perceived a lower police threshold and/or the police force was stretched more thinly, thereby stimulating a rise in criminal behavior, which is less easily restrained. Similarly, lower incarceration levels meant more criminals for the increasingly short-handed police to grapple with, and the growing illegal drug markets imposed similar burdens.

The above discussion suggests that major crime shifts result more from the accumulation of a number of factors pushing in one direction that eventually overwhelm forces pushing in the opposite direction. There may be a catalytic event that stimulates the shift but the power of a crime shift derives from the accumulation of forces, perhaps over a number of years. This is true about the dramatic post-1993 crime drop and will be true if 2015 heralds a sustained murder rate increase. Accordingly, the factors putting upward pressure on crime over the last few years can in aggregate provide a potential causal underpinning of the dramatic and sudden rise in homicides that occurred in 2015 after a very good year in 2014 if they finally overwhelmed the countervailing forces in 2015. The implications of this claim for Comey's suggested de-policing theory as the reason for the 10 percent increase in murders in 2015 is not encouraging. Since the more fundamental factors that we have mentioned may explain the full increase in murder, there is little scope for the Comey thesis to have played a role in this nationwide increase in crime (unless the factors depressing homicide are so great that we need yet another element to again close the gap between the observed homicide rate and the rate that we can explain).

Note that our elasticity estimates for police and incarceration both showed that murder was most influenced by these factors, violent crime came next, and property crime was last. Hence we should not be surprised that this was the basic pattern seen for 2015 with a very large jump in murder but a large decline in property crime. The property crime decline must reflect the continuing power of the forces we mentioned that are putting particularly strong downward pressure on the theft of goods.

V. Further Thoughts on Policing

A. The De-Policing Hypothesis

1. Comey's October 2015 Speech

Given the enormous importance of the police in restraining crime, it was not implausible for Comey to speculate whether some of the developments in the wake of various highly publicized police killings might be responsible for the dramatic murder hike of 2015. Unfortunately, Comey's de-policing thesis was ill-defined, unsophisticated, and unsupported.

His story would only make sense if police are powerful crime suppressors, but presumably Comey would have known that the number of police was falling. Therefore, if one knows that police rates are down substantially, one must conclude that there will be upward pressure on crime. Comey ignored this factor. Indeed, Comey's entire explanation for the spike in murders in 2015 seems to be based on what he had "heard in conversations all over the country." Of course, the most arrant nonsense was heard in conversations all over the country in the course of the Presidential election, so this is not a promising beginning. Comey continued:

> Nobody says it on the record, nobody says it in public, but police and elected officials are quietly saying it to themselves. And they're saying it to me, and I'm going to say it to you. And it is the one explanation that does explain the calendar and the map and that makes the most sense to me.
> Maybe something in policing has changed.

> In today's YouTube world, are officers reluctant to get out of their cars and do the work that controls violent crime? Are officers answering 911 calls but avoiding the informal contact that keeps bad guys from standing around, especially with guns?
>
> I spoke to officers privately in one big city precinct who described being surrounded by young people with mobile phone cameras held high, taunting them the moment they get out of their cars. They told me, "We feel like we're under siege and we don't feel much like getting out of our cars."
>
> I've been told about a senior police leader who urged his force to remember that their political leadership has no tolerance for a viral video.
>
> So … the question that has been asked of me, is whether these kinds of things are changing police behavior all over the country.
> And the answer is, I don't know. I don't know whether this explains it entirely, but I do have a strong sense that some part of the explanation is a chill wind blowing through American law enforcement over the last year. And that wind is surely changing behavior.

Comey's statement was widely taken to mean that the FBI director had now concluded that the protest against perceived police misconduct spearheaded by the Black Lives Matters movement was to blame for the added 1500 deaths in the U.S. last year. Since Comey added that these deaths were not at the hands of the police and almost entirely among young men of color, the subtext of Comey's remarks were that even if Black Lives Matters had some legitimate complaints, their conduct had led to many more deaths of young black men than would be saved even if all the wrongful police shootings were eliminated. The "blame the victim" overtone of Comey's musings surely explained some of the angry response it elicited.

But the implicit criticism of the police was also striking. A chill wind blows and suddenly the police aren't doing their job, and as a result 1500 people die? The astonishingly tone deaf Comey seems not to have understood that his speculation reflected a powerful indictment of the police as well. It is highly imprudent for an FBI director to level such allegations against both the Black Lives Matters movement and the police without having solid empirical support for his position. Did Comey realize that his speculations could well inflame both fears of black crime and white resentment, and did he understand the possible implications of that incitement during a Presidential campaign (especially coming a few months after the Dylann Roof killings that were motivated by the mistaken belief that blacks were slaughtering whites)? As we alluded to at the beginning of this paper, the public got the message, and fear of crime jumped sharply in 2016 – to levels higher than it was when crime was far worse. The White House rebuke of his de-policing story as inappropriately based on anecdotes rather than facts and evidence was quite appropriate.

Where is the evidence that the 1500 additional deaths were "almost entirely among young men of color?" That information would be available to Comey, yet no such evidence has been forthcoming. Moreover, the substantial increases in murders in the very low black populations states that we documented above makes that seem rather unlikely. But even if it were true that all the added deaths were of black men of color that would not prove the Comey de-policing story. An alternative or complimentary hypothesis might be that when "the longstanding grievances and discontent with policing in African-American communities [were] activated by controversial incidents of police use of force, chronic discontent erupt[ed] into violence."[67] Comey seemed oblivious to this possibility, but riots in Baltimore in April 2015 following the death of Freddie Gray in police custody and in Ferguson, Missouri four months later on the one-year anniversary of the shooting of Michael Brown (with more cities to follow in 2016 following other police shootings) seemed to conform to that description. We know that this rage was spilling over into homicidal conduct in at least some cases because this was the explicit reason offered for some of the horrible police shootings of the last two years.

It might have been helpful if Comey had reflected on the following questions before he announced what he thought was the most plausible explanation for a large jump in homicides. How would one test for this de-policing hypothesis? What evidence could be gathered that would be supportive of this claim? What implications are there for other forms of criminal conduct if the de-policing story is true? While Comey gave the briefest consideration of other factors that might have been causing the jump in murders, he quickly rejected them saying the one that made most sense to him was the chill wind theory.

One would hope that Comey was aware of the literature we alluded to above showing the impact of police and incarceration on crime. Note that the two findings we stressed were that police and prisons reduced crime substantially, and the declines in these two factors (and perhaps the growth of illegal drug markets as well) would stimulate crime differentially – with murder growing the most and property crime rising the least, and violent crime somewhere in between. Since Comey did not recognize (or at least acknowledge) the crime divergence in 2015 we have highlighted, he would not have been able to attend to that nuance, but he could have at least considered the impact of the declining rates of police and incarceration on homicide. Moreover, the impact of growing illegal drug markets on homicide is relatively straightforward. Surely Comey should have recognized that his theory could not explain the murder hike, in his words, "entirely," because other significant factors were playing a role, thereby reducing the amount that needed to be, or could be, explained by his preferred thesis.

The de-policing hypothesis (perhaps supplemented by the "building frustration at police misconduct finally explodes" theory) is more plausible as an explanation for a short-term increase in crime in a specific city after an identifiable triggering factor than as an explanation for a widespread jump in murders across 37 states.[68] Some fivethirtyeight.com articles on the topic show striking time-series graphs of arrests falling as crime rises. Such studies from a small number of cities that have experienced a traumatic event provide some plausibility to the existence of a de-policing effect.[69] Causal attribution can be tricky even in these cases, however.

During the riots following the death of Freddie Gray in Baltimore in April 2015, one could imagine that crime could rise and arrests could fall if the police were scrambling to maintain order, especially given Baltimore's shrinking police force.[70] This may not be the product of the type of intentional de-policing that Comey described, but simply the consequence of a police response to a riot where police may be re-assigned from other tasks to confront a mob. Of course, a Comey effect could follow, but then the analyst would need to sort out that portion of the post-Freddie Gray crime increase caused by the riot from that caused by the Comey effect.

Pyrooz et al conducted an empirical test for any kind of national de-policing effect after the August 2014 shooting of Michael Brown – a so-called "Ferguson Effect." The authors concluded that except for robbery there was no evidence to support the claim.[71] The paper looked at monthly city crime data from 81 large cities for the period one year prior to the August 2014 shooting and the one year after and did not find a statistically significant break in the trend in crime for murder, violent crime, or property but did so for robbery. Of course, whether the full effect of de-policing occurred within one year of the Brown killing remains unclear, so a different statistical model or just a longer post-treatment evaluation period might produce different results.

Rushin and Edwards have an intriguing new paper that analyzes "all police departments that have been subject to federally mandated reform under 42 U.S.C. § 14141—the most invasive form of modern American police regulation."[72] Their major finding was that > "the introduction of external regulation to a police department via § 14141 was associated with a statistically significant increase in the frequency of several crime categories—particularly property crimes….We found that this apparent uptick in crimes was concentrated in the years immediately after the initiation of external regulation and diminished into statistical insignificance over time. This suggests that external regulation may come with growing pains."

The paper finds that the property crime rate elevation is substantial – a 25.4 percent increase.[73] This may suggest that as police departments are undergoing policy changes in response to federal regulation their crime fighting capacities are temporarily disrupted, particularly for property crimes. But of course since both the UCR and NCVS data showed property crime was declining in 2015, this effect seems not to have been operating very powerfully.[74]

None of these studies provide evidence of a contagion effect that could explain the rising crime in cities nationwide. In effect, Comey seems to have conflated geographically and temporally local effects with broad national trends. Even reports showing that the cities experiencing the largest murder rate jumps have relatively high black populations is not particularly corroborating.[75] These cities may also be experiencing disproportionate drops in incarceration, police, and abortion, while having larger growth in illegal drug markets and out-of-wedlock births – all factors that can and should have been explored before announcing a highly controversial theory.

2. Murders and Policing in NYC and Chicago

A very telling graph by Peter Moskos, shown in Figure 15, illustrates simultaneously how a major disruption in a police department can lead to a chillingly large jump in crime, while effective policing can substantially curtail murders in a large city. As one looks at the counts of murders for NYC and Chicago, the first thing to note is that Chicago – with only one-third the population of NYC – has had more murders than NYC since 2012 (and obviously a much higher murder rate for many years). The disastrous murder spike that has befallen Chicago in 2016 is tragic, and much like Baltimore, the product of some acute pathologies.

Figure 15 also displays the equally dramatic decline in murder that occurred in NYC from 2011 to 2013. As Figure 16 reveals, the impressive murder decline was also accompanied by a drastic reduction in police stops. When Donald Trump extols the benefits of stop and frisk policing strategies, someone should point out to him that by 2014, both the number of stops and murders in the city were at remarkable lows. The best evidence from an important study by MacDonald, Fagan and Geller shows that "crime reduction can be achieved with more focused investigative stops."[76] The good news on crime in NYC has persisted after 2013 under the liberal Mayor de Blasio, despite many loud and insistent predictions that crime would explode if stop and frisk were to end. Moreover, the post-2014 murder trend in NYC casts further doubt on the nationwide de-policing story that Comey advanced. Indeed, the NYC experience underscores that without a careful definition of the term, claims about "de-policing" can be both misleading and dangerous. The NYC murder drop of 2011-2013 was achieved contemporaneously with a massive reduction in stops and misdemeanor marijuana arrests. That is a type of "de-policing" we need more of.

Former Chicago Police Superintendent Garry McCarthy — who was fired amid controversy over the police shooting (with 16 bullets) of unarmed teen Laquan McDonald in October of 2014 — said criticism of policing methods by local officials there had left cops "hamstrung." Such claims need to be carefully examined because police often raise them whenever police misconduct is identified and criticized.

For example, an LAPD recruit contended that after the release of the 1992 Rodney King video massive de-policing occurred: "we make no arrests; we do not even try to… Officers are beyond paranoia when it comes to using force. Our police force has been effectively emasculated" (Dunn 1996). One must be highly skeptical of such claims in light of the actual experience of sharply dropping crime in Los Angeles after 1992. Specifically, the violent crime rate dropped in Los Angeles from 1992 to 1996 by 27 percent, and the murder rate declined by 32.8 percent. Crime declines of this magnitude are unlikely to occur if there really is emasculation of the police force. Any effect of "de-policing" in Los Angeles at that time was likely modest, short-lived, and outweighed by countervailing downward pressures on crime.

Another illustration of the need for greater precision in the use of the term "de-policing" comes from the recent troubles in Chicago. Chicago Police Department spokesman Anthony Guglielmi blamed the decline in proactive policing in Chicago on a new form that must be filled out after certain interactions with the public. The form was required under the terms of the city's August

2015 settlement with the American Civil Liberties Union over the department's "stop and frisk" program. The form, called an investigatory stop report (ISR), is longer than the previous contact cards it replaced and takes substantially longer to complete after some incidents. "The rules of the game changed on Jan. 1," Guglielmi said.[77]

But a review of arrest rates in Chicago concluded that these rates fell right after the release of the Laquan McDonald video (again, a riot-induced effect?) and actually rose after the ISR requirement went into effect:

> Although the ISR may be playing a minor role in curbing proactive policing, it doesn't appear to be the major reason behind the downward trend in arrests. The ISR was implemented on January 1, 38 days after the release of the Laquan McDonald video. In that five-week span, the overall arrest rate fell from 26 percent to 19 percent. Since Jan. 1, the overall arrest rate has risen slightly. The onset of the decline in arrests significantly predates the ISR, and arrests have actually increased since it was introduced, though they are occurring less frequently than they did in 2015.[78]

Making officers fill out forms could certainly have some negative consequences, but again it matters why this happens. Obviously, if the police spend 10 percent of their time filling out forms that would potentially cut the time they could be doing other police work by 10 percent. One always needs to consider the opportunity cost of any particular allocation of time. But if the forms are needed to effectuate lawful arrests or to prevent racially biased policing, then the costs of the forms have to be weighed against the benefits they provide. Moreover, the costs of filling out the forms could fall to some extent if a learning effect operates. It is a different matter, though, if the police simply dislike filling out the forms because they don't like to be monitored. The pure "opposition to monitoring" effect is supported by the cases in which police show their extreme unhappiness about being video-recorded, even if from a distance and unobtrusively.[79] This may be a human reaction, but it is not a legitimate basis for objection because it is essential that all government officials, especially those given great powers and accorded great discretion, are monitored effectively.

A sense of the severity of the problem in Chicago is conveyed by the fact that since 2004, the city has spent almost $642 million dollars dealing with police misconduct legal claims, with $102 million of that total from the last two years alone.[80] These settlements diverted government resources away from needed services that could improve high-crime communities. Chicago took out almost $100 million in bonds in 2014 to pay for police misconduct cases.[81] Indeed, the police have tried cover-up the nature of misconduct with certain settlements. For example, the Chicago police tried to suppress a video of the fatal police shooting of Laquan McDonald with a $5 million settlement, and destroyed video footage of a nearby store's security camera to hide the evidence of what happened.[82]

Chicago isn't alone, either. In the past four years, Baltimore has had 100 settlements or judgments based on police brutality or civil rights abuses. In many of these instances, police acted violently against bystanders after minimal provocation. For example, in one convenience store, police stopped Jerriel Lyles without any discernible reason, then hit him in the face when he objected. Lyles' case ended in a verdict against the officers and an award of $200,000. Starr Brown was trying to explain what she had witnessed to officers at the scene of a crime, when the situation escalated. Even after she declared she was pregnant, an officer threw her to the pavement: "I was tossed like a rag doll. He had his knee on my back and neck."[83] Brown settled her case for $125,000. The high-profile death of Freddie Gray, who sustained spinal injuries in the back of a police van, led to a $6.4 million settlement.[84]

According to a tally by the Wall Street Journal, payouts from police misconduct cases in the 10 cities with the largest police departments totaled $248.7 million in 2014, compared to $168.3 million in 2010.[85] The family of Eric Garner, a man who was killed by a police chokehold (and famously declared "I can't Breathe"), won a $5.9 million dollar settlement from the city of New York.[86] A 2016 case in Michigan, meanwhile, led to a strikingly large award of $37 million when a man arrested for drunk driving was severely beaten by police at the jailhouse.[87]

B. Policing in the Years Ahead

The relationship between the police and the community will never be without friction. Police are needed because not everyone obeys the laws and police must be the ones to arrest them or impede their misconduct, neither of which will endear them to the people they apprehend or those whose preferences they thwart. Moreover, given the nature of their tasks in a country brimming with weapons, the police will always be making some deadly errors, even with the best of intentions, since split second judgments at times have to made under situations of considerable stress. The police are also not given nearly enough credit in certain circles for their absolutely critical role in crime control, and improvements in policing have substantially reduced crime, as the New York City miracle attests.

But that said, the police also have to do better. The admittedly few officers who cause the most problems need to be ferreted out or quickly retrained, rather than protected by a tribal loyalty. No one should impede the police in the exercise of their legitimate authority, but the public should also be protected in its right to appropriately monitor the police without being threatened or physically accosted. Everyone will benefit if the relationship between the police and the community can be improved, but that will require steps from both sides that they have not been willing to take in the past.

An excellent example was set in October 2016, when the President of the International Association of Chiefs of Police Terrence M. Cunningham addressed his group's annual conference and received a standing ovation after his speech on the Law Enforcement Profession and Historical Injustices. Cunningham stated:

> While we obviously cannot change the past, it is clear that we must change the future. We must move forward together to build a shared understanding. We must forge a path that allows us to move beyond our history and identify common solutions to better protect our communities.
> For our part, the first step in this process is for law enforcement and the IACP to acknowledge and apologize for the actions of the past and the role that our profession has played in society's historical mistreatment of communities of color.
> At the same time, those who denounce the police must also acknowledge that today's officers are not to blame for the injustices of the past. If either side in this debate fails to acknowledge these fundamental truths, we will be unlikely to move past them.
> Overcoming this historic mistrust requires that we must move forward together in an atmosphere of mutual respect. All members of our society must realize that we have a mutual obligation to work together to ensure fairness, dignity, security, and justice.[88]

Certainly, Cunningham was setting the right tone, and hopefully more police chiefs will be able to suffuse these insights throughout their departments. Americans' confidence in the police was at a record high of 64 percent in 2004, but subsequently slipped to a low of 52 percent, reflecting some of the policing troubles of 2015 before rebounding modestly this year. At present, 25 percent of Americans have a great deal of confidence in the police, 31 percent quite a lot, 29 percent "some," 13 percent "very little" and 1 percent "none." The combined 14 percent with very little or no confidence in the police is down from 18 percent last year, which was the worst assessment in Gallup's history of rating the police.[89]

Improved national data collection on policing would enhance accountability, and the Department of Justice has taken some promising steps in this direction, by, for example, announcing the creation of a use of force database.[90] But relying on accountability systems that administer punishment after police misconduct has occurred may be less effective than taking pro-active measures to prevent police misconduct in the first place. The University of Chicago Crime Lab has joined with the Chicago Police Department and the city of Chicago to reduce adverse police-citizen encounters and improve police-community relations by strengthening support services for officers who display signs of elevated risk of future misconduct, using data-driven operational systems to identify and prioritize officers for available support.

Steps can only be taken to reduce tensions with the police by finding ways to further improve police safety. Police are always aware that they are in danger from guns and even though assaults (fatal and non-fatal) on the police have been trending down, they are still at a distressingly high level (about a tenth of the police force is assaulted every year).[91] The primary cause of death to police officers from intentional assaults is from guns. Efforts to improve officer safety through body armor and effective training can lessen the threat they feel and thereby reduce the number of "quick trigger" events.

One important study that merits further investigation found that states with high rates of civilian gun ownership are more dangerous for the police.[92] The study examined data on the number of

The White House has also taken recent steps to improve the quality and quantity of police data. In December 2014, President Obama signed an executive order creating the President's Task force on 21st Century Policing, a committee tasked with identifying best practices and making recommendations. In the Task Force's first report, it recommended that law enforcement "collect, maintain and report data . . . on all officer involved shootings, whether fatal or nonfatal, as well as any in-custody death" Action Item 2.1.1, Final Report of the President's Task Force on 21st Century Policing, May 2015. [91] The FBI does a good job of collecting information on the number of police that are killed in the line of duty, and this number in 2014 was at an all-time low of roughly 62 officers killed per year out of roughly 800,000 sworn officers (down steadily from about 101 annual police deaths during the Reagan years). The number of assaults per 100 police officers is down from 12.7 in 2000 to 9.0 in 2014. homicidal deaths of police in two groups of states with roughly equal number of police officers – the 8 states with the lowest levels of gun ownership and the 23 states with the highest rate of gun ownership. The study found that, over the period from 1996-2010, the rate of police homicide in the high-gun prevalence states was three times as high as the rate of police homicide in the low-gun prevalence states.[93] It might be worth studying whether gun control measures – universal background checks, reducing civilian firepower, banning armor-piercing bullets -- could enhance police safety.

VI. Conclusion

This paper has shown that after one leaves the comfort of noting that the murder rate rose sharply and property crime continued to fall in 2015, nothing else about crime is known with complete certainty. It is challenging, one year after the fact, to know exactly what happened with violent crime in 2015, even though we have two different data sources designed to measure this important social metric. Given the major discrepancies in UCR and NCVS violent crime data, it is unclear whether we should be applauding the news on violent crime or a bit concerned about a somewhat worsening performance. It is harder still to figure out why one might see big jumps in murder, large drops in property crime and an apparent substantial reduction in the prevalence of violent crime (even if more multiple victimizations). If there really were 300,000 fewer violent crime victims, 500,000 fewer property crime victims as well as 1500 more homicides in 2015 that would be an unusual crime picture – and one that is strikingly divergent from the picture that Comey painted.

Comey deserves credit for quickly identifying the rising murder rate, but much else in his University of Chicago speech and subsequent comments on crime was either slanted or oblivious (Comey made no reference to continuing crime improvements in property crime and the NCVS evidence of improving violent crime in 2015), incorrect (there was no explosion in overall violent crime in 2015 and we are not in trouble as we were prior to 1993), or unsupported and dangerously inflammatory (where is the evidence that nearly all of the increased murders were of blacks? The de-policing comments pounded the wedge between the Black Lives Matter movement and the police with little evidentiary basis). The perception that Comey was exaggerating the extent of the bad news on crime and emphasizing its racial dimension and his de-policing causal explanation without providing any empirical support raised eyebrows since fear mongering about the race-crime connection conforms to a frequent Republican presidential election playbook.[94] Donald Trump picked up the baton from Comey and ran with this issue, jettisoning even the smallest pretense of concern with the actual facts about crime.

For the first time since 9/11, a majority of Americans (53 percent) in 2016 said they were personally worried "a great deal" about crime and violence.[95] But note that nothing about the

[93] In exploring whether gun prevalence is the causal factor in the higher police death rate one would have to control for the fact that high crime rates could lead to both more guns and to more police deaths.

[94] A Bayesian might argue that Comey's subsequent unusual handling of the email controversy of candidate Hillary Clinton, including his astonishing and apparently influential "October surprise," buttresses the view that Republican Comey was acting out of partisan motivations in his October 2015 speech as well..

[95] Mark Berman, "Americans are more worried about crime than they have been since before 9/11," Washington Post, April 7, 2016.

present level of crime would have warranted more fear in 2016 than was seen during any year after 9/11 during the Bush Administration, when crime was clearly worse. The importance of that perceptual shift going into the Presidential election is hard to exaggerate, and Comey and Trump clearly stimulated that belief by elevating apprehension about crime. This heightened apprehension provided enough of a political boost to Trump to at least raise the question whether this development alone, in a razor-thin presidential election in three states, was enough to influence the outcome.[96]

Looking forward, what can we expect in the years ahead concerning crime? For now at least the downward trend in property crime has yet to be disrupted. The path of violent crime and murder will in part depend on what happens with the major factors that we have mentioned. Developments with the prison population and police as well as what happens in illegal drug markets will be most crucial, since it looks as though the factors of abortion and out of wedlock births have stabilized and therefore will be less likely to provide any added substantial push on crime in either direction.

If one wanted to immediately forestall any further bad news concerning the murder rate, a reasonable suggestion might be to return to Bill Clinton's 1992 plan of putting an extra 100,000 police on the streets. This would undo the crime increases that have followed from the declining police employment and even allow further decreases in incarceration. At the margin, greater spending on police and less on prisons seems to be a wise trade-off.[97] Perhaps if the economy continues to improve there will be resources for greater police hiring, but without federal support, almost certainly lacking in Congress at this point, police hiring will be difficult for financially strapped cities. Regardless of whether there are increases in the size of police forces, the steps we have alluded to about healing the police-community rifts are essential for promoting a sense of justice and will likely generate crime-reduction benefits as well. We are poised to see an historic adjustment in police-community relations, and some disruption in crime may occur until the process of adjustment has been complete. Hopefully, New York City has paved the way for understanding how effective use of police can reduce crime without resorting to unconstitutional stops that are not based on reasonable suspicion. Other jurisdictions should learn from that experience. At the end of the day, there is no reason that Chicago should have three times the murder rate of New York City.

Note that if incarceration continues to decline, it will free up some resources, at least some of which should be used to identify effective programs that can increase the likelihood that former convicts return to a crime-free life, which unfortunately is very hard in a world with large illegal drug markets. With a new Attorney General who joked while dealing with a horrible Ku Klux Klan lynching that he always thought the KKK was "ok, until he learned that they smoked marijuana,"[98] I doubt there will be much movement towards drug legalization in the new administration. While legalization would obviously increase harms from drug abuse and overdose, it would substantially reduce crime, as occurred in the wake of ending Prohibition in 1933.

Many steps, in addition to those mentioned in our discussion of the current influences on crime, can be taken to lower crime,[99] although some of the most promising and cost-beneficial interventions (beyond additional police hiring) involve spending on early childhood enrichment.[100] While the benefits of wisely administered expenditures of this kind would be great, the money needs to be spent now, while the crime-reduction payoff doesn't come for roughly 15 years. This is not an easy sell to an American politician (who are rarely enthusiastic about an approach entailing pay now and benefit later).

I end with the hope that FBI Director Comey, who inadvertently or intentionally may have helped secure the election of Donald Trump will take seriously his obligations to protect the nation from all enemies, domestic and foreign, and stand up to forces within the new Administration that may try to subvert the rule of law. Comey may well have a heroic role to play in the years ahead.

Another reason was the need to alert leadership but that was not only reason.

SUBJECT: Organization of the National Security Council and the Homeland Security Council

As President, my highest priority is to ensure the safety and security of the American people. In order to advise and assist me in executing this solemn responsibility, as well as to protect and advance the national interests of the United States at home and abroad, I hereby direct that my system for national security policy development and decision-making shall be organized as follows:

A. The National Security Council, the Homeland Security Council, and Supporting Staff

The National Security Act of 1947, as amended, established the National Security Council (NSC) to advise the President with respect to the integration of domestic, foreign, and military policies relating to the national security. There is also a Homeland Security Council (HSC) -- established through Executive Order 13228 of October 8, 2001, and subsequently codified in the Homeland Security Act of 2002 -- that has the purpose of advising the President on matters pertaining to homeland security. Each Council is also responsible for the effective coordination of the security-related activities and functions of the executive departments and agencies.

The security threats facing the United States in the 21st century transcend international boundaries. Accordingly, the United States Government's decision-making structures and processes to address these challenges must remain equally adaptive and transformative. Both Councils are statutory bodies that the President will continue to chair. Invitations to participate in specific Council meetings shall be extended to those heads of executive departments and agencies, and other senior officials, who are needed to address the issue or issues under consideration. When the President is absent from a meeting of either Council, the Vice President may preside at the President's direction.

The Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs (National Security Advisor) and the Assistant to the President for Homeland Security and Counterterrorism (Homeland Security Advisor) shall be responsible, as appropriate and at the President's direction, for determining the agenda for the NSC or HSC, respectively, ensuring that the necessary papers are prepared, and recording Council actions and Presidential decisions in a timely manner. When international economic issues are on the agenda of the NSC, the National Security Advisor and the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy shall perform these tasks in concert.

The NSC and HSC shall have as their regular attendees (both statutory and non-statutory) the President, the Vice President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Energy, the Secretary of Homeland Security, the National Security Advisor, the Homeland Security Advisor, and the Representative of the United States to the United Nations. When international economic issues are on the agenda of the NSC, the NSC's regular attendees will include the Secretary of Commerce, the United States Trade Representative, and the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy. The Director of National Intelligence and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as statutory advisers to the NSC, shall also attend NSC meetings. The Assistant to the President and Chief of Staff, the Assistant to the President and Chief Strategist, the Counsel to the President, the Deputy Counsel to the President for National Security Affairs, and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget are invited as attendees to any NSC meeting.

In addition to the NSC and HSC, there is also a single NSC staff within the Executive Office of the President that serves both the NSC and HSC. The staff is composed of regional, issue-focused, and functional directorates and headed by a single civilian Executive Secretary, pursuant to 50 U.S.C. 3021, who is also the Chief of Staff. All policy and staff activity decisions will be transmitted to the Executive Secretary for appropriate distribution and awareness. The purpose of the NSC staff is to advise me, the National Security Advisor, the Homeland Security Advisor, the NSC members, the HSC members, and others in the White House; to facilitate the implementation of Administration policy; and to help coordinate the national-security-related activities of the executive departments and agencies.

B. The Principals Committee

The Principals Committee (PC) shall continue to serve as the Cabinet-level senior interagency forum for considering policy issues that affect the national security interests of the United States. The PC shall be convened and chaired by the National Security Advisor or the Homeland Security Advisor, as appropriate, in consultation with the appropriate attendees of the PC. The Chair shall determine the agenda in consultation with the appropriate committee members, and the Executive Secretary shall ensure that necessary papers are prepared and that conclusions and decisions are communicated in a timely manner. Invitations to participate in or attend a specific PC shall be extended at the discretion of the National Security Advisor and the Homeland Security Advisor, and may include those Cabinet-level heads of executive departments and agencies, and other senior officials, who are needed to address the issue under consideration.

The PC shall have as its regular attendees the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Homeland Security, the Assistant to the President and Chief of Staff, the Assistant to the President and Chief Strategist, the National Security Advisor, and the Homeland Security Advisor. The Director of National Intelligence and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff shall attend where issues pertaining to their responsibilities and expertise are to be discussed. The Counsel to the President, the Deputy Counsel to the President for National Security Affairs, and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget may attend all PC meetings.

The Assistant to the President and Deputy National Security Advisor (Deputy National Security Advisor), the Deputy Assistant to the President and National Security Advisor to the Vice President, and the Executive Secretary (who shall serve as the Executive Secretary of the PC) shall attend all of the meetings of the PC, and the Representative of the United States to the United Nations and the Assistant to the President for Intragovernmental and Technology Initiatives may attend as appropriate.

When international economic issues are on the agenda of the PC, the Committee's regular attendees will include the Secretary of Commerce, the United States Trade Representative, and the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy (who shall serve as Chair for agenda items that principally pertain to international economics).

C. The Deputies Committee

The Deputies Committee (DC) shall continue to serve as the senior sub-Cabinet interagency forum for consideration of, and where appropriate, decision-making on, policy issues that affect the national security interests of the United States. The DC shall be convened and chaired by the Deputy National Security Advisor or the Deputy Assistant to the President and Deputy Homeland Security Advisor (Deputy Homeland Security Advisor), as appropriate. The Chair shall determine the agenda in consultation with the regular DC members, and the Executive Secretary shall ensure that necessary papers are prepared and that conclusions and decisions are communicated in a timely manner. Invitations to participate in or attend a specific DC meeting shall be extended by the Chair to those at the Deputy or Under Secretary level of executive departments and agencies, and to other senior officials, who are needed to address the issue under consideration.

The DC shall have as its regular members the Deputy Secretary of State, the Deputy Secretary of the Treasury, the Deputy Secretary of Defense, the Deputy Attorney General, the Deputy Secretary of Homeland Security, the Deputy Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Deputy Director of National Intelligence, the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Deputy Assistant to the President and National Security Advisor to the Vice President, the Deputy National Security Advisor, the Deputy Homeland Security Advisor, and the Administrator of the United States Agency for International Development.

The Executive Secretary shall attend the DC meetings. The Deputy Counsel to the President for National Security Affairs may attend all DC meetings. The relevant Deputy Assistant to the President for the specific regional and functional issue under consideration shall also be invited to attend. Likewise, when and where appropriate, the Deputy Assistant to the President for Strategic Planning, the Deputy Assistant to the President for Strategic Communication, the Deputy Assistant to the President for International Economic Affairs, the Deputy Assistant to the President for Transnational Issues, and the Deputy Representative of the United States to the United Nations, shall also be invited to attend. Other senior officials shall be invited where appropriate.

The DC shall review and monitor the work of the interagency national security process, including the interagency groups established pursuant to section D below. The DC shall help to ensure that issues brought before the NSC, HSC, and PC have been properly analyzed and prepared for decision. The DC shall also focus significant attention on monitoring the implementation of policies and decisions and shall conduct periodic reviews of the Administration's major national security and foreign policy initiatives. The DC is responsible for establishing Policy Coordination Committees (PCCs) and for providing objectives and clear guidance.

D. Policy Coordination Committees

Management of the development and implementation of national security policies by multiple executive departments and agencies typically shall be accomplished by the PCCs, with participation primarily occurring at the Assistant Secretary level. As the main day-to-day fora for interagency coordination of national security policies, the PCCs shall provide policy analysis for consideration by the more senior committees of the national security system and ensure timely responses to the President's decisions.

Regional and issue-related PCCs shall be established at the direction of the DC. Members of the NSC staff (or National Economic Council staff, as appropriate) will chair the PCCs; the DC, at its discretion, may add co-chairs to any PCC. The PCCs shall review and coordinate the implementation of Presidential decisions in their respective policy areas. The Chair of each PCC, in consultation with the Executive Secretary, shall invite representatives of other executive departments and agencies to attend meetings of the PCC where appropriate. The Chair of each PCC, with the agreement of the Executive Secretary, may establish subordinate working groups to assist that PCC in the performance of its duties.

An early meeting of the DC will be devoted to establishing the PCCs, determining their memberships, and providing them with mandates and strict guidance. Until the DC has established otherwise, the existing system of Interagency Policy Committees shall continue.

E. General

The President and the Vice President may attend any and all meetings of any entity established by or under this memorandum.

This document is part of a series of National Security Presidential Memoranda that shall replace both Presidential Policy Directives and Presidential Study Directives as the instrument for communicating relevant Presidential decisions. This memorandum shall supersede all other existing Presidential guidance on the organization or support of the NSC and the HSC. With regard to its application to economic matters, this document shall be interpreted in concert with any Executive Order governing the National Economic Council and with Presidential Memoranda signed hereafter that implement either this memorandum or that Executive Order.

The Secretary of Defense is hereby authorized and directed to publish this memorandum in the Federal Register.

The NSC reorganization memo is below. Hard to tell your status. [redacted] says that PPD-1 from 2009 didn't mention you either.

SUBJECT: Organization of the National Security Council and the Homeland Security Council

As President, my highest priority is to ensure the safety and security of the American people. In order to advise and assist me in executing this solemn responsibility, as well as to protect and advance the national interests of the United States at home and abroad, I hereby direct that my system for national security policy development and decision-making shall be organized as follows:

A. The National Security Council, the Homeland Security Council, and Supporting Staff

The National Security Act of 1947, as amended, established the National Security Council (NSC) to advise the President with respect to the integration of domestic, foreign, and military policies relating to the national security. There is also a Homeland Security Council (HSC) -- established through Executive Order 13228 of October 8, 2001, and subsequently codified in the Homeland Security Act of 2002 -- that has the purpose of advising the President on matters pertaining to homeland security. Each Council is also responsible for the effective coordination of the security-related activities and functions of the executive departments and agencies.

The security threats facing the United States in the 21st century transcend international boundaries. Accordingly, the United States Government's decision-making structures and processes to address these challenges must remain equally adaptive and transformative. Both Councils are statutory bodies that the President will continue to chair. Invitations to participate in specific Council meetings shall be extended to those heads of executive departments and agencies, and other senior officials, who are needed to address the issue or issues under consideration. When the President is absent from a meeting of either Council, the Vice President may preside at the President's direction.

The Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs (National Security Advisor) and the Assistant to the President for Homeland Security and Counterterrorism (Homeland Security Advisor) shall be responsible, as appropriate and at the President's direction, for determining the agenda for the NSC or HSC, respectively, ensuring that the necessary papers are prepared, and recording Council actions and Presidential decisions in a timely manner. When international economic issues are on the agenda of the NSC, the National Security Advisor and the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy shall perform these tasks in concert.

The NSC and HSC shall have as their regular attendees (both statutory and non-statutory) the President, the Vice President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Energy, the Secretary of Homeland Security, the National Security Advisor, the Homeland Security Advisor, and the Representative of the United States to the United Nations. When international economic issues are on the agenda of the NSC, the NSC's regular attendees will include the Secretary of Commerce, the United States Trade Representative, and the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy. The Director of National Intelligence and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as statutory advisers to the NSC, shall also attend NSC meetings. The Assistant to the President and Chief of Staff, the Assistant to the President and Chief Strategist, the Counsel to the President, the Deputy Counsel to the President for National Security Affairs, and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget are invited as attendees to any NSC meeting.

In addition to the NSC and HSC, there is also a single NSC staff within the Executive Office of the President that serves both the NSC and HSC. The staff is composed of regional, issue-focused, and functional directorates and headed by a single civilian Executive Secretary, pursuant to 50 U.S.C. 3021, who is also the Chief of Staff. All policy and staff activity decisions will be transmitted to the Executive Secretary for appropriate distribution and awareness. The purpose of the NSC staff is to advise me, the National Security Advisor, the Homeland Security Advisor, the NSC members, the HSC members, and others in the White House; to facilitate the implementation of Administration policy; and to help coordinate the national-security-related activities of the executive departments and agencies.

B. The Principals Committee

The Principals Committee (PC) shall continue to serve as the Cabinet-level senior interagency forum for considering policy issues that affect the national security interests of the United States. The PC shall be convened and chaired by the National Security Advisor or the Homeland Security Advisor, as appropriate, in consultation with the appropriate attendees of the PC. The Chair shall determine the agenda in consultation with the appropriate committee members, and the Executive Secretary shall ensure that necessary papers are prepared and that conclusions and decisions are communicated in a timely manner. Invitations to participate in or attend a specific PC shall be extended at the discretion of the National Security Advisor and the Homeland Security Advisor, and may include those Cabinet-level heads of executive departments and agencies, and other senior officials, who are needed to address the issue under consideration.

The PC shall have as its regular attendees the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Homeland Security, the Assistant to the President and Chief of Staff, the Assistant to the President and Chief Strategist, the National Security Advisor, and the Homeland Security Advisor. The Director of National Intelligence and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff shall attend where issues pertaining to their responsibilities and expertise are to be discussed. The Counsel to the President, the Deputy Counsel to the President for National Security Affairs, and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget may attend all PC meetings.

The Assistant to the President and Deputy National Security Advisor (Deputy National Security Advisor), the Deputy Assistant to the President and National Security Advisor to the Vice President, and the Executive Secretary (who shall serve as the Executive Secretary of the PC) shall attend all of the meetings of the PC, and the Representative of the United States to the United Nations and the Assistant to the President for Intragovernmental and Technology Initiatives may attend as appropriate.

When international economic issues are on the agenda of the PC, the Committee's regular attendees will include the Secretary of Commerce, the United States Trade Representative, and the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy (who shall serve as Chair for agenda items that principally pertain to international economics).

C. The Deputies Committee

The Deputies Committee (DC) shall continue to serve as the senior sub-Cabinet interagency forum for consideration of, and where appropriate, decision-making on, policy issues that affect the national security interests of the United States. The DC shall be convened and chaired by the Deputy National Security Advisor or the Deputy Assistant to the President and Deputy Homeland Security Advisor (Deputy Homeland Security Advisor), as appropriate. The Chair shall determine the agenda in consultation with the regular DC members, and the Executive Secretary shall ensure that necessary papers are prepared and that conclusions and decisions are communicated in a timely manner. Invitations to participate in or attend a specific DC meeting shall be extended by the Chair to those at the Deputy or Under Secretary level of executive departments and agencies, and to other senior officials, who are needed to address the issue under consideration.

The DC shall have as its regular members the Deputy Secretary of State, the Deputy Secretary of the Treasury, the Deputy Secretary of Defense, the Deputy Attorney General, the Deputy Secretary of Homeland Security, the Deputy Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Deputy Director of National Intelligence, the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Deputy Assistant to the President and National Security Advisor to the Vice President, the Deputy National Security Advisor, the Deputy Homeland Security Advisor, and the Administrator of the United States Agency for International Development.

The Executive Secretary shall attend the DC meetings. The Deputy Counsel to the President for National Security Affairs may attend all DC meetings. The relevant Deputy Assistant to the President for the specific regional and functional issue under consideration shall also be invited to attend. Likewise, when and where appropriate, the Deputy Assistant to the President for Strategic Planning, the Deputy Assistant to the President for Strategic Communication, the Deputy Assistant to the President for International Economic Affairs, the Deputy Assistant to the President for Transnational Issues, and the Deputy Representative of the United States to the United Nations, shall also be invited to attend. Other senior officials shall be invited where appropriate.

The DC shall review and monitor the work of the interagency national security process, including the interagency groups established pursuant to section D below. The DC shall help to ensure that issues brought before the NSC, HSC, and PC have been properly analyzed and prepared for decision. The DC shall also focus significant attention on monitoring the implementation of policies and decisions and shall conduct periodic reviews of the Administration's major national security and foreign policy initiatives. The DC is responsible for establishing Policy Coordination Committees (PCCs) and for providing objectives and clear guidance.

D. Policy Coordination Committees

Management of the development and implementation of national security policies by multiple executive departments and agencies typically shall be accomplished by the PCCs, with participation primarily occurring at the Assistant Secretary level. As the main day-to-day fora for interagency coordination of national security policies, the PCCs shall provide policy analysis for consideration by the more senior committees of the national security system and ensure timely responses to the President's decisions.

Regional and issue-related PCCs shall be established at the direction of the DC. Members of the NSC staff (or National Economic Council staff, as appropriate) will chair the PCCs; the DC, at its discretion, may add co-chairs to any PCC. The PCCs shall review and coordinate the implementation of Presidential decisions in their respective policy areas. The Chair of each PCC, in consultation with the Executive Secretary, shall invite representatives of other executive departments and agencies to attend meetings of the PCC where appropriate. The Chair of each PCC, with the agreement of the Executive Secretary, may establish subordinate working groups to assist that PCC in the performance of its duties.

An early meeting of the DC will be devoted to establishing the PCCs, determining their memberships, and providing them with mandates and strict guidance. Until the DC has established otherwise, the existing system of Interagency Policy Committees shall continue.

E. General

The President and the Vice President may attend any and all meetings of any entity established by or under this memorandum.

US Agencies Investigate Flynn's Contacts With Russian Diplomats.

Revelations regarding National Security Adviser Michael Flynn's contacts with Russia prior to President Trump taking office dominated coverage over the weekend, with widespread reporting from print and online media, as well as both network and cable news outlets. The Washington Post notably had seven articles dedicated to the matter. On Friday and Saturday, many outlets questioned Flynn's truthfulness in reports focused on how intelligence gathered by US agencies contradicted past claims by Flynn and other White House officials. Many outlets centered on reactions from leading Democratic lawmakers, some of whom called for Flynn to resign or have his security clearance revoked. Sunday's coverage included several stories suggesting that Flynn is on thin ice within Trump's inner circle following White House senior aid Stephen Miller's appearance on several Sunday talk shows in which he declined to defend Flynn or offer President Trump's position on the matter.

The CBS Evening News (2/10, story 2, 2:25, Pelley, 11.17M) reported the FBI and other intelligence agencies are investigating National Security Adviser Flynn to determine whether he discussed US sanctions against Russia in his December phone call with Russian ambassador Sergey Kislyak, as alleged by the Washington Post on Thursday. Correspondent Jeff Pegues said the agencies allegedly "gathered the information through ongoing electronic surveillance of Russian officials and suspected spies." Vice (2/12, Owen, 2.28M) says the fact "Flynn can't seem to get his story straight" is "raising concerns that Trump's trusted advisor may have unlawfully interfered in U.S. foreign policy interactions with Russia and then tried to cover it up."

The Hill (2/10, Seipel, 1.25M) reports in its "Blog Briefing Room" blog, "President Donald Trump on Friday told his press pool that he didn't know about reports that his national security adviser Michael Flynn discussed sanctions with Russia before he was sworn in." In video footage broadcast by the CBS Weekend News (2/11, story 2, 0:55, Ninan), President Trump was shown telling reporters, "I don't know about it. I haven't seen it. What report is that?" A spokesperson to Flynn "now says the national security adviser simply cannot remember whether he discussed sanctions. A switch from his earlier denials," ABC World News Tonight (2/10, story 2, 3:40, Muir, 14.63M) reported. White House press secretary Sean Spicer defended Flynn's conversation and previously described it as a precursor to a possible meeting between President Trump and Russian President Vladimir Putin. Vice President Pence claimed last month that Flynn's conversations "happened to occur around the time that the United States took action to expel diplomats had nothing whatsoever to do with those sanctions."

Bloomberg Politics (2/10, Sink, 201K) reported Pence claimed that his assertion was based on what Flynn told him, according to an Administration official. Bloomberg notes Flynn's spokesman told the Post that while Flynn "had no recollection of discussing sanctions, he couldn't be certain that the topic never came up." The Washington Post (2/10, Hohmann, 11.43M) says "one takeaway" from the revelations on Flynn is that, "Either the national security adviser misled the vice president, or the vice president knowingly misled the American people."

The Washington Post (2/10, Miller, 11.43M) says Flynn spoke privately with Pence on Friday "in an apparent attempt to contain the fallout." One senior Administration official "disputed that Flynn was in jeopardy" of losing his job. "He's in every meeting he's supposed to be doing, fulfilling his job as national security adviser. He's seeing the president constantly," the official said of Flynn.

Writing for the Washington Post (2/12, 11.43M), Chris Cillizza argues, "What's worse for Flynn is that not only did he get caught not telling the truth but that he apparently passed along that falsehood to Vice President Pence, too." In another piece for the Washington Post (2/10, 11.43M), Cillizza said, "It strains credulity that on Wednesday, Flynn could issue a flat denial about conversations he had with Kislyak, but on Thursday, suddenly his memory of those conversations changed." Cillizza adds that "it's hard to see how Flynn or Trump will be able to simply dismiss it as 'fake news' produced by a biased media given the depth and breadth of the sourcing on the Post story."

The Kremlin also denied that Flynn and Kislyak addressed the issue of sanctions before Trump's inauguration, the AP (2/10, Pace, Salama) reported. The AP writes, "It's not unusual for incoming administrations to have discussions with foreign governments before taking office," but the timing and frequency of the contacts elicited "questions about whether Trump's team discussed--or even helped shape--Russia's response." The AP explains "Putin unexpectedly did not retaliate against the U.S. for the expulsions, a decision Trump quickly praised."

NBC Nightly News' (2/10, story 2, 2:20, Holt, 16.61M) Andrea Mitchell reported, "The timing of Flynn's calls and texts with the Russian is critical: just as the Obama White House was expelling 35 Russian diplomats for the election year hacking." Mitchell clarified that "intelligence sources say no one has concluded that Flynn broke any laws."

Miller Declines To Defend Flynn As Questions About Contact With Russia Continue. The AP (2/12, Colvin) reports that "top White House aide" Stephen Miller "sidestepped repeated chances" to defend "embattled" NSA Flynn during appearances on several Sunday morning political talk shows. President Trump has yet to comment on reports that Flynn "engaged in conversations with a Russian diplomat about US sanctions before Trump's inauguration."

On ABC's This Week, Miller said, "I don't have any information to change anything that has previously already been said by the White House on this matter. Gen. Flynn has served this country admirably and with distinction." Host George Stephanopoulos repeatedly pressed Miller on the issue, asking why he was representing the White House on the show if he did not have anything substantive to say on the issue. On NBC's Meet The Press, Miller said, "Gen. Flynn has served this country admirably...and I look forward to having more discussions about this in the future." According to the Washington Post (2/12, O'Keefe, 11.43M), when Chuck Todd asked Miller if Trump still had confidence in Flynn, "Miller said he did not know. He said his colleagues at the White House 'did not give me anything to say.'"

The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Lauter, 4.52M) says Miller's "silence on Flynn was significant because the White House had booked him on several of the major Sunday television interview programs." Miller appears to have been "deliberately chosen...in part to avoid having to give a definitive answer about Flynn."

The Washington Post (2/12, A1, Rucker, Entous, O'Keefe, 11.43M) reports that Flynn "is under increasing political pressure and risks losing the confidence of some colleagues. ... 'The knives are out for Flynn,' said one administration official who, like others interviewed for this report, spoke on the condition of anonymity in order to speak candidly." The Wall Street Journal (2/12, A1, Borak, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) says in a headline that Flynn's position is growing "tenuous," and that Miller declined to say whether the President still has faith in Flynn. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Lauter, 4.52M) says that the "ominous silence" around Flynn "deepened" with Miller's appearances.

Reuters (2/12, Holland) headlines a summary of the Flynn controversy "Trump's National Security Adviser Flynn Trying To Survive Crisis."

NYTimes Analysis: NSC "Chaotic And Anxious." The New York Times (2/12, A1, Sanger, Schmitt, Baker, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that even beyond the Flynn situation, "these are chaotic and anxious days inside the National Security Council," where "staff members get up in the morning, read President Trump's Twitter posts and struggle to make policy to fit them. Most are kept in the dark about what Mr. Trump tells foreign leaders in his phone calls." Some now use "encrypted communications to talk with their colleagues, after hearing that Mr.

Trump's top advisers are considering an 'insider threat' program that could result in monitoring cellphones and emails for leaks." Deputy NSA K.T. McFarland "acknowledged that career officials were on edge." McFarland told the Times, "I think it would be a mistake if we didn't have consternation about the changes – most of the cabinet haven't even been in government before."

Democratic Lawmakers Call For Investigation Into Flynn. ABC World News Tonight (2/11, story 3, 1:10, Llamas, 14.63M) on Saturday reported that Democratic members of Congress have called for an investigation into National Security Adviser Michael Flynn and whether he discussed the possibility of loosening sanctions imposed under former President Obama with Russian diplomats.

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Wire, Lauter, 4.52M) reported, "Democrats on the House intelligence committee demanded Friday that President Trump address" the revelations about Flynn. House Intelligence Committee Ranking Member Adam Schiff said the allegations against Flynn raise "serious questions of legality and fitness for office." Another Los Angeles Times (2/10, 4.52M) article reported that Schiff said in a statement that if Flynn did speak to Russia about the sanctions, "and then he and other administration officials misled the American people, his conduct would be all the more pernicious, and he should no longer serve in this administration or any other." Meanwhile, Rep. Eric Swalwell, the ranking Democrat on the Intelligence Committee's CIA subcommittee, "said Flynn should be suspended until the allegations are investigated." Swalwell told the Daily Beast (2/10, 1.11M) that Flynn "was undermining the [Obama] administration's... policy, to punish Russia for interfering in our elections. ... Until we get to the bottom of it, I don't think he should have access to classified information." Democratic Rep. Mike Quigley, a member of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence Committee, told the Beast Flynn "needs to step down. The credibility of the White House with the American public and international community is at stake." Other senior Democrats echoed Quigley and Schiff, including Eliot Engel, the top Democrat on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, who said Flynn should resign if the allegations are true.

The Washington Examiner (2/10, Feldscher; Klimas, 400K) reported Sens. Ed Markey and Chris Murphy, both members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, released a joint statement expressing their concerns regarding Flynn. Markey specifically said Flynn may have to resign. He added, "I hope federal law enforcement professionals investigate this matter immediately. Any effort to undermine our nation's foreign policy – even during a transition period – may be illegal and must be taken seriously."

The Washington Times (2/12, Howell, 272K) reports that Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-MD), "the House's top Democratic investigator" as ranking member of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, says Flynn "needs to explain whether he discussed sanctions with Russia's ambassador." On ABC's This Week, Cummings said it would be "an appropriate action" to suspend Flynn's security clearance pending an investigation, adding, "There's something else that needs to be asked. That is, did the President instruct Gen. Flynn to talk to the Ambassador? And did he know about it? If he knew about this conversation, when did he know it?" Politico (2/12, Strauss, 2.46M) notes that Cummings' response came after host George Stephanopoulos asked him if he agreed with House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who believes "Flynn's security clearance should be revoked, pending the completion of an investigation into the matter."

The Hill (2/10, Greenwood, 1.25M) reported that Sen. Claire McCaskill, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, demanded an FBI briefing "as soon as possible" on communications between Flynn and Kisylak. In a letter Friday to FBI

Director Comey, McCaskill wrote, "Given the significant implications that any such communications may have had for the nation's homeland and national security, I request that you provide a closed briefing for the Committee as soon as possible regarding the scope and status of any current FBI investigation related to General Flynn's contacts with the Russian government."

On Fox News Sunday [redacted] (2/12, Wallace), Senate Foreign Relations Committee ranking Democrat Sen. Ben Cardin said, "We need to get to the bottom of this. ... The relationship between Russia and our elections is something that needs to be independently investigated. I would call for an independent investigation like we had a 9/11. We need to have an independent investigation, and Gen. Flynn's comments add to our concern about the relationship with Russia."

On CNN's State Of The Union [redacted], Sen. Al Franken agreed, saying, "Either he was lying about not having discussed that had or forgot. ... There's going to be have to be investigations...an independent investigation into the Trump campaign and the Trump Administration's relationship to Russia."

Meanwhile, The Guardian (UK) (2/10, Borger, 4.07M) mentioned that Republican Sen. Mike Rounds told CNN that if the country had been misled, "we would expect the president to take appropriate actions."

Christie: Flynn Needs To Have "Candid" Conversation With Trump, Pence. The Huffington Post (2/12, Wilkie, 237K) reports that New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie joined Miller in trying to "insulate the White House" from the revelations about Flynn. Appearing on CNN's "State of the Union," Christie argued that Flynn needs to give Trump and Pence a "candid conversation" to "make sure that everybody gets the accurate story on this matter and that it's cleared up."

Ignatius: To Reestablish Trust, Flynn Must Truthfully Disclose Contacts With Russia. In his column for the Washington Post (2/11, 11.43M), David Ignatius said the investigation into whether Flynn discussed sanctions with Russian Ambassador Sergey Kislyak should not focus on Flynn's possible violation of the "obscure and probably unenforceable" Logan Act, but on whether he "sought to hide" the nature of the discussion and whether he "was open about his conversations." Ignatius said, "A national security adviser's success depends on maintaining trust, especially with his White House colleagues," and Flynn can only fill his trust deficit "with a full accounting of what happened" that is consistent with US intelligence agencies' records of his calls.

Cartoon Shows Flynn As Soviet Soldier. Washington Post (2/12, 11.43M)cartoonist Ann Telnaes, in a piece titled, "Michael Flynn's Russian Connection," drew Flynn wearing a Ushanka hat featuring what appears to be the symbol for a Soviet soldier. A small man who looks like Putin is shown emerging from the top of the hat.

Pompeo Reportedly Refuses Clearance To Flynn Aide Townley. Politico (2/10, Nussbaum, Cheney, 2.46M) reported "a top deputy" to National Security Adviser Michael Flynn, senior director for Africa Robin Townley, was informed Friday "that the Central Intelligence Agency had rejected his request for an elite security clearance required for service on the NSC, according to two people with direct knowledge of the situation." The decision, which a source said was approved by CIA Director Mike Pompeo, "forced Townley...out of his NSC post" and "infuriated Flynn and his allies." The sources "said that the CIA did not offer much explanation for why Townley's request for so-called 'Sensitive Compartmented Information' clearance was rejected," but "said that Flynn and his allies believe it was motivated by Townley's skepticism of the intelligence community's techniques – sentiments shared by Flynn." The New York Daily News (2/11, Sommerfeldt, 4.45M) said one source told Politico that Flynn and his deputies "believe this is a hit job from inside the CIA on Flynn and the people close to him. .. Townley believes that the CIA doesn't run the world." A second source reportedly "said a number of Trump administration officials are critical of Flynn, and view him as actively waging a 'jihad against the intelligence community.'" That source claimed officials blame Flynn for Trump's "fraught relationship" with intelligence community leaders.

Putin Spokesman Comments On Leaked Allegations Of Trump-Putin Call. The Washington Post (2/10, Roth, 11.43M) reported details of President Trump's telephone conversation with Russian President Vladimir Putin were leaked on Thursday. According to the leaked details, Trump allegedly denounced the New START treaty, which limits both countries' nuclear weapons deployments to no more than 1,550, as favoring Russia. Trump also allegedly said "nuclear weapons should be way down and reduced very substantially, that's part of it," and that the sanctions against Russia are hurting the nation "very badly right now," but that "something can happen that a lot of people are going to benefit." Putin's spokesman, Dmitri Peskov, said he could not confirm the leaked information, and also denied that nuclear reduction negotiations were in any way tied to the loosening of sanctions.

COUNTER-TERRORISM

Questions Arise About Undercover FBI Agent Near Gunman Before Texas Terror Attack.

The AP (2/10, Billeaud) reported that questions have arisen as to how much more authorities could have done to stop two Arizona men from opening fire "outside a Prophet Muhammad cartoon contest in suburban Dallas in 2015." The AP said court documents show that an undercover FBI agent drove past the two men before they opened fire, which drew criticism from defendant Abdul Malik Abdul Kareem's lawyer and the lawyer for two security guards, who argued the "government has not been forthcoming about the agent's role in the plot and have questions why the agency didn't break up the plot." Lawyer Trenton Roberts said, "We are convinced that there is much more to this story than the FBI has admitted." The Dallas Morning News (2/10, 1.12M) posts the AP's coverage to its website.

Man Pleads Guilty To Planning Bomb Attack With Islamic State.

The AP (2/10, Hays) reported that Munther Omar Saleh of New York City on Friday pleaded guilty to charges that he was in communication with an Islamic State recruiter "who was killed in a US drone strike in Syria in 2015, according to a federal prosecutor." In his plea, Saleh admitted that he sought contact with the group "knowing that it was involved in terrorism."

Reuters (2/10, Raymond) reported that prosecutors said Saleh was planning a pressure-cooker bomb attack in conjunction with one of the Islamic State's top hackers and that he pleaded guilty to four counts, including "conspiring to provide material support to Islamic State and assaulting a federal officer by charging at a law enforcement vehicle." He is one of six men arrested in connection with "a group of individuals who had pledged allegiance to Islamic State, or ISIS, and discussed traveling to join the group." The New York Times (2/10, Mele, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reported that New York City man Fareed Mumuni also recently pleaded guilty in the plot to join ISIL. FBI New York Assistant Director in Charge William F. Sweeney Jr. said the men's guilty pleas "show just how close the threat of homegrown terrorism exists for New York City."

FBI JTTF Investigating Dakota Access Pipeline Protesters.

The Guardian (UK) (2/10, 4.07M) reported that an FBI joint terrorism task force is investigating activists who are protesting against the Dakota Access pipeline. "Multiple officers," The Guardian said, "have attempted to contact at least three people tied to the Standing Rock 'water protector' movement in North Dakota." The nature of the investigation is unknown, but some attorneys believe the FBI's actions are unconstitutional. "The idea that the government would attempt to construe this indigenous-led non-violent movement into some kind of domestic terrorism investigation is unfathomable to me," said civil rights attorney Lauren Regan. "It's outrageous, it's unwarranted ... and it's unconstitutional." In a piece based on The Guardian's coverage, the Daily Caller (2/10, White, 898K) reported that more than 600 arrests have taken place as a result of protests of the pipeline.

Former National Guardsman Sentenced To Prison For Trying To Join ISIL.

The AP (2/10) reported that 27-year-old former National Guardsman Mohamed Jalloh of Sterling, Virginia was sentenced on Friday to 11 years in prison after pleading guilty last October to "attempting to provide material support to" ISIL. The AP said Jalloh admitted that he traveled to Africa and boarded a truck to join ISIL before "bailing out." The charge against Jalloh "originated from an FBI sting operation." The Washington Post (2/10, Weiner, 11.43M) reported that Joseph Flood, a lawyer for Jalloh, blamed his client's actions on heavy drug use and childhood trauma, rather than radical sentiment. Jalloh's attachment to ISIL was "superficial" and he was confused, Flood said. "He's clearly a follower," he added. Jalloh, the Post noted, also claimed to have been in search of a wife when an FBI operative contacted him about pursuing terrorism. "For two months, Flood wrote, the informant 'hounded' Jalloh with 'nearly constant entreaties' to engage in a violent attack," the Post reported. Jalloh was arrested after attempting to buy an assault rifle.

The Portland (OR) Tribune (2/12, Rendleman, 104K) reports that the Clackamas County Sheriff's Office in Oregon has asked the FBI to investigate the release of some 50 pheasants from an aviary, purportedly by eco terrorists. The Animal Liberation Front lauded the release of the animals online, the Tribune reports. The pheasants were valued at approximately $1,000.

Trump Administration Delivers CIA Torture Report To Federal Court.

The Miami Herald (2/10, Rosenberg, 856K) reported the Trump Administration on Friday said it had delivered the Justice Department's copy of the "so-called Torture Report on the CIA's secret prison network during the George W. Bush administration" to a Federal court in DC. The Herald says Acting Assistant Attorney General Chad Readler notified the court that a redacted copy of the report had been deposited for secure storage with the Court Information Security Officers.

House Report Calls For Better Screening Of "Insider Threats" At Airports.

The Washington Post (2/11, Kunkle, 11.43M) says a new Congressional report released by the House Homeland Security Committee this week indicates a need for the "Transportation Security Administration, airport operators and airlines" to improve screening procedures for "workers such as baggage handlers or cleaning crews for possible security threats." The report notes cases going back to 2008 of "aviation workers, former employees or contractors" being "recruited to fight for ISIS or other terrorist groups" or "engag[ing] in efforts to smuggle firearms or other contraband aboard aircraft." Moreover, the report says that "approximately 450 airports remain vulnerable to insider attacks" given inadequate employee background checks and rechecks.

Bomb Scare In Los Angeles Creates "Commuter Nightmare."

Breitbart (2/11, Marlow, 2.02M) reports the Los Angeles County Sheriff's bomb squad was called to investigate a package, which resulted in the temporary shut down of the Hollywood, Universal/Studio City and Hollywood/Western stations. A "black backpack" was ultimately determined to not be a threat. The scare, according to Breitbart, "set off a commuting nightmare for those on the Metro Line as well as surrounding freeways."

WSJournal Analysis: In The Wake Of A Terror Attack In The US, Trump Should Not Round Up Muslims.

A Wall Street Journal (2/10, Benjamin, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) analysis reports that a terror attack will eventually take place against the US by jihadists and how the Trump Administration responds will affect not only national security but the national psyche. The Journal concedes that an attack may occur in the US, noting that while a 9/11 style attack is unlikely given aggressive counterterrorism efforts, it cannot be ruled out. Following any attack, the Journal says it is critical to avoid the post-9/11 round-up of Muslims as either suspects or witnesses.

Kristof: "Husbands Are More Deadly In America Than Jihadist Terrorists."

Nicholas Kristof writes in his New York Times (2/11, Kristof, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) column that between the years 1975 and 2015, terrorists from the seven nations listed in President Trump's travel ban "killed zero people in America," according to the Cato Institute. However, the number of people killed by guns in the same period was 1.34 million, which he says "includ[es] murders, suicides, and accidents." Citing University of North Carolina professor Charles Kurzman, Kristof says Americans last year were more likely to be killed for being Muslim rather than to be killed by Muslim terrorists. Kristof also notes "Husbands are incomparably more deadly in America than jihadist terrorists," being more "deadly in part because in America they have ready access to firearms."

Slate Analysis: Career Intel Officials Killed Order To Bring Back Black Sites, Enhanced Interrogation.

In an analysis, Slate (2/10, Carter, 1.83M) reported the Trump Administration withdrew language in a draft executive order that "would have resurrected the torture regime that existed immediately after 9/11" after career officials within the CIA and Defense Department rejected the order "from the moment it left the White House." Slate says those officials didn't oppose the order because of their political views. They did so, the article says, because "torture...doesn't work, corrodes their integrity, makes it harder to work with allies, and carries enormous risk for strategic blowback."

Gitmo Commander: No Input Into Trump Policies.

The Miami Herald (2/12, Rosenberg, 856K) reports Rear Adm. Peter J. Clarke, the commander of the prison at Guantánamo Bay, said he has not been consulted President Trump's policy for the prison, adding, "I don't need to provide my input to policy decisions." While the New York Times obtained a draft executive order authorizing adding ISIL captives to Guantánamo Bay, Clarke said he has not been ordered to prepare to receive new captives. Defense lawyers warn that some detainees are fearful of ISIS. While the prison currently has no female prisoners, there is speculation that they may be among new detainees, and Clarke would not provide clear assurance "that male soldiers would not be supervising female detainee showers."

California Islamic School Marks Fourth Group To Reject CVE Grant Under Trump Administration.

The AP (2/11, Abdollah) reports the Bayan Claremont Islamic school in California has rejected an $800,000 federal grant awarded as part of the "Countering Violent Extremism" program. This marks the fourth organization to do so under the Trump Administration. The AP says the Bayan Claremont grant was the second largest "among the first 31 federal grants for CVE awarded to organizations," but that the schools president, Jihad Turk, said that to accept the money would ultimately "do more harm than good." Turk stated, "if we're compromised, even if only by perception in terms of our standing in the community, we ultimately can't achieve that goal."

French Authorities Arrest Four People Suspected Of Plotting "Imminent" Terror Attack.

The New York Times (2/10, Breeden, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Paris prosecutors on Friday arrested three men and one 16-year-old girl in southern France. France's Interior Ministry explained that a two-week investigation led Paris prosecutors to believe that the suspects were preparing an "imminent" terror attack, although authorities "do not know where or how" it was to be implemented. Police officers discovered bomb-making materials in a raid of one of the suspect's homes.

The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Bisserbe, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that in the raid, police discovered the same explosive that ISIS suicide bombers used in attacks in Paris and in Brussels. The arrests are the latest in a string of raids across Europe, including in Germany, Belgium, and Britain, against suspected ISIS operatives.

"No Evidence" Of Terrorism As Likely Pepper Spray Causes Closure Of Hamburg Airport.

The Washington Post (2/12, Kirchner, 11.43M) reports that in response to 68 people experiencing eye irritation and breathing difficulties from the likely dissemination of pepper spray through the air-conditioning system, German authorities evacuated hundreds and closed Hamburg Airport between 11 a.m. and 2 p.m. Sunday. Hamburg police spokesman Rene Schönhardt insists there was "no evidence" the incident was part of a terror attack, but officials are investigating to determine how the spray from a lipstick-sized cartridge entered the ventilation system.

WPost A1: Children Targeted In ISIS' Latest Recruitment Strategy.

In a more than 2,000-word front-page article, the Washington Post (2/11, Faiola, Mekhennet, 11.43M) reports ISIS' threat "is taking on a new form: child terrorists either directly in contact with or inspired by the militant group." In Germany alone, at least 10 minors were involved in five terror plots within the last 12 months. Most of the minors were German-born homegrown threats, highlighting authorities' concerns "that the intelligence community is often blind to the threat posed by these teens and preteens." Furthermore, German authorities are prohibited from monitoring children to the extent that they track suspected adults. European intelligence officials also said ISIS' tactics to radicalize children now involve "propaganda tailor-made for youths" and meticulous scouting online. Many targeted children have psychological disorders or live in broken or violent households, enabling recruiters to "groom" them "through flattery and attention" and perceived friendship.

European Parents Of Foreign Fighters Worry Coalition Forces Will Kill Their Children. French and Belgian parents of children recruited by ISIS told USA Today (2/11, Vidon, 5.28M) that they want to see the militant group's destruction in Iraq and Syria, but worry that coalition forces will kill their radicalized children. A think tank in The Hague estimated that about 4,000 people have traveled from Europe to fight alongside ISIS in Iraq and Syria since 2012. Psychologist Patrick Amoyel, who founded the anti-extremism Entr'Autres Association in Nice, said many child recruits initially try to reconnect with their Arabic and North African heritages, and then reclaim Islamic identities as a means of redemption for the contempt and marginalization their ethnic communities face in European societies. Amoyel said many parents are also consumed with guilt and often deny that their children have been radicalized.

Suspect In Istanbul Nightclub Attack Formally Charged.

The AP (2/11) reports Turkish prosecutors formally arrested Abdulkadir Masharipov, accused of killing 39 people in an Istanbul nightclub on New Year's Day. Turkish authorities claimed Masharipov trained in Afghanistan and conducted the attack on behalf of ISIS.

The Turkish court charged Masharipov, an Uzbek citizen, with attempting to overthrow the constitutional order, multiple counts of murder and weapons possession, and for being a member of an armed terror group, Reuters (2/11, Tattersall, Dikmen) reports. Prior to his formal arrest, Masharipov was at large for 17 days before Turkish authorities apprehended him in a "massive operation," AFP (2/11) reports. He is believed to have entered the country in January last year.

CRIMINAL INVESTIGATIONS

Charleston Church Shooter Requests New Trial.

The AP (2/12, Kinnard) reports "Convicted Charleston church shooter Dylann Roof has asked for a new federal trial, saying prosecutors didn't have jurisdiction to bring their case against him." In a Friday motion, attorneys for Roof claimed the government failed to prove Roof's use of highways, a gun manufactured outside of South Carolina, and the Internet were sufficient links to bring federal religious obstruction charges. "Roof remains in custody in the Charleston County jail, where he awaits a death penalty trial in state court," the AP says.

The Daily Beast (2/12, 1.11M) and Columbia (SC) State (2/12, Monk, 357K) also report on Roof. The Christian Science Monitor (2/12, 387K) posts the AP's coverage to its website.

South Carolina Black Community Seeks "To Come To Terms" With Church Shooting. The AP (2/11, Collins) reported "the holes in the fabric of life in Charleston remain" following the shooting of an African-American church in Charleston, South Carolina. The AP highlighted the difficulties faced by the black community in the city "to come to terms with the murders at Emanual," and that this is made all the harder by the still unresolved case of a white police charged in the death of unarmed black man Walter Scott. However, the piece said "there has been progress," noting that after 50 years, the Confederate Flag was removed from Statehouse grounds.

He faces up to 35 years behind bars.

Amid Ethics Concerns, Philadelphia DA Announces He Will Not Seek Reelection.

Reuters (2/10, Ingram) reported that Philadelphia District Attorney Seth Williams announced Friday that he would not run for reelection, citing "regrettable mistakes" he made when he accepted gifts that resulted in his being fined $62,000 by Philadelphia's ethics board. The gifts, which Williams failed to disclose, "including NBA basketball tickets, cash and lodging," Reuters said. "The gifts prompted the FBI to interview members of the prosecutor's staff and at least one of the gift-givers, and the bureau is investigating a nonprofit Williams founded." Williams apologized for his actions during a televised news conference. The AP (2/10, Dale) reported that Williams "failed to disclose five sources of income and 89 gifts on 2010-2015 financial statements and omitted 10 items on an amended statement." Williams has served as district attorney for seven years. The Washington (DC) Times (2/10, Dale) posts the AP's coverage to its website.

Dossier Allegations Gaining Credibility After Details Corroborated By Intel.

The CBS News (2/11, Pegues, 4.4M) says the dossier is "gaining credibility among law enforcement," with one "U.S. official familiar with the document's origin say[ing] that even people who discounted it initially have begun to take it more seriously." Jim Sciutto reported on CNN The Situation Room (2/10, 6:02 p.m. EDT, 02:15, Blitzer, 554K) that "For the first time, US investigators say they have corroborated some of the communications detailed in a 35-page dossier compiled by a former British intelligence agent." Sciutto said "until now, US officials have said none of the content or allegations had been verified, but now multiple current and former US law enforcement and intelligence officials tell CNN that intelligence intercepts of foreign nationals confirmed that some of the conversations described in the dossier took place between the same individuals on the same days and from the same locations as detailed in the dossier."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/12, 387K) says the dossier is "gaining legitimacy" amid an ongoing FBI-led probe into the document. Officials caution, though, that "the more salacious things" alleged in the document have not been corroborated, and "a few specific facts and claims listed in the document have already been proven to be incorrect." Still, CSM says that news of the corroborated details "could bolster many Trump critics who question the president's ethics in regard to his business ties as well as his controversial policies."

Spicer: White House "Disgusted" By "Fake News" From CNN On Dossier. The Hill (2/10, Hensch, 1.25M) reports White House press secretary Sean Spicer on Friday "blasted CNN (2/10, Sciutto, Perez, 29.79M) for its reporting on an unverified dossier alleging that the Russian government has compromising information about President Trump." Spicer said, "We continue to be disgusted by CNN's fake news reporting." He added, "It is about time CNN focused on the success the President has had bringing back jobs, protecting the nation, and strengthening relationships with Japan and other nations. ... The president won the [2016] election because of his vision and message for the nation. This is fake news."

WSB-TV Atlanta (2/9, 410K) reported online that "The city of Atlanta...produced more than a million documents" last week "it says are related to a bribery scandal." At a news conference about an ongoing federal investigation into kickbacks for city contracts, Atlanta Mayor Kasim Reed, presented boxes containing some 1.4 million pages of records. "What I'm going to say is the documents that are in this room are the documents we provided to the Justice Department," Reed said. Among the records was a federal grand jury subpoena seeking documents "related to Mitzi Bickers, a political operative who helped Reed get elected and a former business partner of the contractor who admitted paying more than $1 million in bribes," WSB noted. The mayor has not been questioned by the FBI. In a more than 2,000-word article, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/11, 1.41M) discusses the bribery allegations in the context of previous Atlanta political scandals.

The scams, in which fraudsters use romance to solicit money, "cost victims an average of $15,000 to $20,000," Bankert says, citing the FBI. Some scammers pretend to be US soldiers based overseas. WBBM-TV Chicago (2/10, 61K) quoted FBI Chicago spokesman Garrett Croon as saying, "In 2015 the average loss in Illinois was just over $4-million to romance scams. ... Michael Custer is lying about why he fatally shot their unarmed son in the parking lot of the family's nursery business nearly five years ago, even though the sheriff's deputy was cleared by investigators." According to the AP, "the family will get a chance to prove its allegations when a federal civil rights trial against Custer and the sheriff's office begins Monday with jury selection." The family and their attorneys "say ballistics tests, contradictions in Custer's statements and observations by his Palm Beach County colleagues undermine his account of Adams as an immediate and persistent aggressor in the confrontation."

Criminal Justice Reform Advocates Facing "Hurdle" With Trump Administration.

The Wall Street Journal (2/10, O'Keeffe, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports the new president of Families Against Mandatory Minimums cleared an important hurdle in getting his probation officer to agree to allow him to interact with felons. However, the Journal says now the Trump Administration poses another significant hurdle. While President Obama sought to mitigate what he considered to be unfair sentences, the piece says that under Trump and Attorney General Jeff Sessions, there is a potentially more challenging road ahead. It additionally notes criminal justice reform was not explicitly discussed by Trump while on the campaign, but says that Sessions has been an opponent of shortening prisons sentences.

Miller Says Trump "Correct, 100 Percent" About Large-Scale Voter Fraud.

Presidential adviser Stephen Miller said on ABC's This Week (2/12, Stephanopoulos, 6.61M), "The White House has provided enormous evidence with respect to voter fraud, with respect to people being registered in more than one state. Dead people voting, non-citizens being registered to vote. ... That is a scandal! ... And I'm prepared to go on any show, anywhere, any time, and repeat it and say the President of the United States is correct, 100 percent."

The New York Post (2/12, Schultz, 3.82M) says Miller "doubled down on President Trump's unsubstantiated claims. ... Asked repeatedly [for] proof, Miller said voter fraud is a serious issue and will be evaluated by [the] Justice Department once it's up and running." The Los Angeles Times (2/12, King, 4.52M) says the Administration "continued Sunday to assert a widely debunked claim that massive vote fraud helped deprive the president of a popular-vote victory" last fall. The Wall Street Journal (2/12, Ballhaus, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) headlines a report on the comments "Trump Adviser Repeats Unsubstantiated Vote Fraud Assertions."

In the Washington Post (2/12, 11.43M) Fact Checker, Glenn Kessler awards Miller "bushels of Pinocchios" over the assertion, writing that "the White House continues to provide zero evidence to back up its claims of voter fraud," instead returning repeatedly "to the same bogus talking points that have been repeatedly shown to be false." Kessler adds, "It's pretty shameless to cite research in a way that even the researcher says is inappropriate."

Sanders, Franken: Vote Fraud Claims Show Trump Is A Liar. On NBC's Meet The Press [redacted] (2/12, Todd, 157K), Sen. Bernie Sanders said, "We have a president who is delusional in many respects, a pathological liar. ... When somebody goes before you and the American people and say three million to five million people voted illegally in the last election, nobody believes that. There is not the scintilla of evidence. What would you call that remark? It's a lie. It's a delusion." The Washington Post (2/12, O'Keefe, 11.43M) characterizes the remarks as "strong words."

On CNN's State Of The Union, [redacted] (2/12, Tapper, 420K) Sen. Al Franken similarly said that President Trump "lies a lot. He says things that aren't true. ... You know, three million to five million people voted illegally. There was a new one about people going in from Massachusetts to New Hampshire. ... That is not the norm for a president of the United States or actually for a human being."

The New York Daily News (2/12, Edelman, 4.45M) reports Franken, in response to a question by CNN's Jake Tapper as to whether any Republican senators had "expressed concerns about President Trump's mental health," replied, "A few," commenting, "We all have this suspicion that he...that he lies a lot, that he says things that aren't true." Politico (2/12, Cohen, 2.46M) reports Franken also criticized the President's referring to Sen. Elizabeth Warren as "Pocahontas" as "racist." The AP (2/12) and The Hill (2/12, Balluck, 1.25M) similarly report Franken's comments.

WSJournal: Texas Voter Fraud Sentence Is Excessive. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/12, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) argues that while the media minimizes the extent of voter fraud, the eight-year and $5,000 fine sentence for Rosa Maria Ortegaon, a green card holder who voted in Texas, is excessive. While the jury didn't believe Ortegaon's explanation that she thought legal residents have the right to vote, this wasn't a violent felony or a fraud ring. The Journal calls on Gov. Greg Abbott to commute the sentence should the a judge not be able to intervene.

FINANCIAL CRIME & CORPORATE SCANDALS

SEC Accuses Chinese Investor Of Insider Trading In Animation Deal.

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, James, 4.52M) reported that the SEC has accused Chinese investor Shaohua "Michael" Yin and his family of participating in an insider trading scheme to illegally profit "from Comcast Corp.'s $3.8-billion acquisition last year of DreamWorks Animation." According to the SEC, during a three-week period prior to the sale, five brokerage accounts purportedly controlled by Yin, acquired more than 2 million shares of DreamWorks stock. Yin had never owned stock in the animation company before. According to the SEC, Yin "has made illegal trades of stock of other companies, and the FBI executed a search warrant on Yin at the San Jose International Airport on Feb. 3, just before he boarded a flight to China," the Times said. Bloomberg News (2/10, Robinson, 2.41M) reported that Yin or his associates attempted to withdraw the illegal profits from the brokerage accounts after the FBI searched Yin, the SEC claims in its complaint.

Ex-Massey CEO Seeks En Banc Rehearing Of Appeal.

The Charleston (WV) Gazette-Mail (2/10, Ward, 9K) reports that attorneys for Don Blankenship "asked Friday that the full 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reconsider a previous decision in which a three-judge panel upheld the criminal conviction of the former Massey Energy Co. CEO." In a filing with the court, "Blankenship's defense team urged the full court to focus any re-examination of the case on two issues: Whether the trial jury was wrongly instructed on the definition of criminal willfulness and whether defense lawyers were improperly denied the chance for a second cross-examination of a key government witness." The Gazette-Mail notes that Blankenship "is serving a one-year sentence in a federal prison in California" after being "convicted in December 2015 of conspiring to violate federal mine safety standards at Massey's Upper Big Branch Mine, where 29 workers died in an April 2010 explosion."

Massachusetts Couple Sentenced For Tax Evasion.

The Boston Globe (2/11, Geanous, 1.08M) reported that Massachusetts couple Sergey and Anastasia Bulavchenko pleaded guilty Friday to tax evasion charges and were sentenced to two years probation. The couple was "charged with tax evasion and willful failure to file tax returns in connection to their business, UNEOL LLC, which provided a US shipping address for customers living in other countries," the Globe says. According to authorities, the Bulavchenko's business also facilitated identity theft and credit card fraud. The investigation of the couple and their business involved the FBI and Massachusetts State Police.

The Arizona Republic (2/10, Wagner, Harris, 1.1M) reports that former Pima County, Arizona Sheriff's Deputy Christopher Radkte pleaded guilty Friday to misappropriating funds as part of an embezzlement scheme. "Radtke, 55, once second in command of the Sheriff's Department, was indicted on seven felony counts of money laundering and theft after investigators discovered deputies misappropriated roughly a half-million dollars seized from criminals over 18 years," the Republic says. As part of the plea deal, Radtke will receive no prison time and will retain his state pension.

WSJournal: Greenberg Prosecution Shows Abuse Of Law By Prosecutors.

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/12, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) uses former AIG CEO Hank Greenberg's $9 million settlement to blast the businessman's prosecution, calling the amount negligible for Greenberg, who the Journal says admitted only accounting errors. The Journal touts the outcome as a vindication for Greenberg and blasts prosecutors for the money spent on the case. The Journal argues that the prosecution was revenge by former state AG Eliot Spitzer for Greenberg's criticism of him, illustrating the lengths progressives go to punish capitalists. The Journal concludes the case shows the ease whereby prosecutors can abuse the law to seek fame instead of justice.

Privacy Groups Criticize FBI Methods In Playpen Probe.

CSO Magazine (2/11, Kan, 81K) reported that three privacy advocacy groups on Friday "filed briefs in a lawsuit involving the FBI's hacking operation against Playpen." Privacy International, the Electronic Frontier Foundation, and the ACLU of Massachusetts claimed that the FBI's take down of the child pornography website violated the constitution and international law because the "operation involved the FBI hacking 8,700 computers in 120 countries, based on a single warrant," the magazine said. The groups filed their briefs in the case of Alex Levin, a "suspect in the FBI's Playpen investigation who's appealing the way the agency used malware to gather evidence against him," the magazine said. Slashdot (2/12, 46K) reported similarly.

UK Cyber Official: 188 "High-Level" Cyberattacks In Last Three Months.

BBC News (UK) (2/12, 2.39M) reports "Britain's security has been threatened by 188 high-level cyber attacks in the last three months, according to" National Cyber Security Centre chief executive Ciaran Martin, who "told the Sunday Times many of the attacks 'threatened national security.'" Martin "told the newspaper that attempts on government departments were designed to 'extract information on UK government policy on anything from energy to diplomacy to information on a particular sector.'"

The Guardian (UK) (2/12, 4.07M) reports that Martin "told the Sunday Times there had been a 'step change' in Russia's online aggression against the west." Martin is quoted saying, "Part of that step change has been a series of attacks on political institutions, political parties, parliamentary organisations and that's all very well evidenced by our international partners and widely accepted."

The Independent (UK) (2/12, Roberts, 1.28M) reports Martin "warn[ed] that Britain is being hit by 60 'significant' cyber-attacks each month." The Independent adds, "An attempt to disrupt the 2015 general election was thwarted by GCHQ in a cyber attack the security service said was the first of its kind."

British Schoolchildren To Receive Cybersecurity Lessons.

BBC News (UK) (2/11, Symonds, 2.39M) reports, "Schoolchildren in England will be offered lessons in cyber security" beginning in September "in a bid to find the experts of the future to defend the UK from attacks." BBC says, "Classroom and online teaching, 'real-world challenges' and work experience will be made available."

The Independent (UK) (2/11, Dearden, 1.28M) reports, "The new Cyber Schools Programme aims to teach pupils some of the skills they would need to help defend Britain's businesses and institutions against online threats." The Independent adds, "Ministers are making up to £20m available for extracurricular sessions that will see expert instructors drafted in to teach, test and train selected teenagers."

Cyber Experts: Recent Hacks Part Of International Effort, Resembling 2014 Sony Hack, To Target Global Banks.

The Wall Street Journal (2/12, McMillan, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports cybersecurity experts have found evidence which suggests recent attacks on Polish institutions form part of an international effort targeting global financial institutions in several countries, and that the effort shares traits with the 2014 Sony attack. Researchers say the attacks installed code on financial regulatory authorities' websites, then used them to attack the computers of certain financial institutions. The number of targeted banks and the extent of financial losses are unknown.

Defense Contractors Among "Vulnerability Hunters."

Under the headline "The secret world of vulnerability hunters," the Christian Science Monitor (2/10, Sternstein, 387K) reports on the market for network vulnerability exploitation – including the hackers who sell "bug bounty" programs to companies they've infiltrated, cybersecurity experts who "moonlight" for the agencies like FBI to infiltrate networks of criminal targets, and government contractors who also work to find vulnerabilities. According to the article, "defense contractors ManTech, Booz Allen Hamilton, Harris, and Raytheon have all landed formal US government contracts to infiltrate targeted software, say former employees there." The companies "have scooped up boutique firms that concentrate on spy technology, industry insiders say," with Mantech buying exploit researcher Oceans Edge and Raytheon purchasing bug developer SI Government Solutions.

begin grading the Office 365 security settings of its commercial customers, in order to strengthen its software and services from frequent hacking attempts. Microsoft did not say whether other insurance companies were approached to use the service.

Politico (2/10, 2.46M) "Morning Cybersecurity" reports that the "immediate priority" for US Sen. Mike Rounds, the "newly appointed chairman of a freshly created Armed Services cybersecurity-focused subcommittee," is to "figur[e] out the state of play." Rounds is quoted as saying that includes asking the Defense Department for an assessment of "where they see the need for either manpower or additional resources," as well as "assessing where the United States stands in its capabilities compared with 'both bad actors and peer competitors.'"

House Homeland Security Committee To Hold Hearing On Cyber Threats.

The Hill (2/10, Chalfant, 1.25M) reports, "The House Homeland Security Committee is planning a hearing on cybersecurity threats early next month." The committee "is expected to hold a full hearing on the Department of Homeland Security's (DHS) cyber defenses and threats to the U.S. on March 1, according to a committee aide." The Hill adds the hearing "will be the committee's first focusing on cybersecurity since the intelligence community concluded that Russia engaged in a cyber and disinformation campaign aimed at influencing the 2016 U.S. presidential election," though it "will not focus on the Russian election hacks but will instead cover the full scope of the threat landscape."

Russia Suspected In Italian Foreign Ministry Hack.

The Guardian (UK) (2/10, 4.07M) reports, "Russia is suspected by Italian officials of being behind a sustained hacking attack against the Italian foreign ministry last year that compromised email communications and lasted for many months before it was detected, according to people familiar with the matter." The Guardian says an Italian government official "confirmed that the attack took place last spring and lasted for more than four months but did not infiltrate an encrypted system used for classified communications." While then-foreign minister Paolo Gentiloni "was not affected by the hack, according to the official," the foreign ministry's "field offices" were affected, though "the government official said sensitive information had not been compromised because it would also have been encrypted."

"Prolific" Hacker Sentenced In "Rare Win" For Law Enforcement.

The AP (2/10) reports that "prolific foreign hacker" Ercan Findikoglu, who was "behind sophisticated cyberattacks that netted an estimated $55 million," was sentenced to eight years in prison Friday in a "rare win for law enforcement officials who have identified, but failed to arrest, hundreds of others like him." The AP describes Findikoglu as "a Russian-speaking Turkish national so skilled with computers that he tracked the sprawling international heist in real-time to make sure a small army of thieves wouldn't cheat him out of his share of the proceeds."

CSMonitor Analysis: Cyber System Flaws Trigger Efforts To Identify Vulnerabilities.

A more than 2,100-word Christian Science Monitor (2/10, Sternstein, 387K) analysis examines how "flawed" and "vulnerable" cyber systems, including "the websites we all use, the apps on our smartphones, the software on our laptops, and industrial systems running critical infrastructure," has lead a push in the hiring of cybersecurity professionals to detect these vulnerabilities. The Monitor says that such flaws have become "increasingly valuable to both the people trying to break into digital networks and those trying to defend them." It has driven efforts by companies to launch "so-called bug bounty programs" that pay researchers to locate system and product vulnerabilities.

Their letter is quoted saying, "Given your previous investigations of cybersecurity practices at multiple federal agencies, including the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) and Federal Reserve Board, and with respect to former Secretary Clinton's private email server, we trust you will be equally concerned with any and all careless cybersecurity practices of the Trump Administration."

John Thune and Jerry Moran sent a letter to outgoing Yahoo CEO Marissa Mayer on Friday raising questions about "a pair of high-profile data breaches that resulted in more than a billion accounts being compromised by hackers." In the letter, the Senators said, "Despite several inquiries by Committee staff seeking information about the security of Yahoo! user accounts, company officials have thus far been unable to provide answers to many basic questions about the reported breaches." The Times says they are requesting a response by February 23.

Representatives Urge Flynn To Change Export Agreement To Address Cybersecurity Concerns.

The Hill (2/10, Uchill, 1.25M) reports that bipartisan group of representatives "with cybersecurity chops" are urging National Security Adviser Flynn "to change an export agreement many believe weakens international cybersecurity." The Wassenaar Arrangement, the Hill says, is a non-binding agreement between 40 nations, which "creates export policies for civilian technologies with military uses." According to The Hill, the accord does not account for the "subtleties of cybersecurity" and "some of its restrictions can prevent the sharing of cybersecurity research and information about threats."

California, US Saw Surge In Gun Sales Last Year.

NBC Nightly News (2/12, story 6, 2:15, Snow, 16.61M) reported that last year, "more guns were sold" in California "than ever before," and the state "was not alone with the surge of gun sales as the fight over guns is heating up." NBC (Beck) added that one reason for the surge is "California's bullet button ban," in which "the state made it illegal to sell rifles that have a button shooters can use to reload faster." The ban was passed in July 2016 "but took a few months to go into effect." According to NBC, "gun store owner Vince Torrez says the ban helped make 2016 his busiest year in decades." California gun sales "surged last year, selling over a million firearms for the first time ever," which mirrored a nationwide trend. NBC added that "the gun industry is bracing for a slowdown in sales because of solid Republican control in Washington."

New York Planning To Have 23,000 Body Cams On Officers BY 2019.

The AP (2/11, Long) reports that New York City is planning to "put body cameras on all 23,000 of its patrol officers by 2019," which it notes is an "ambitious effort that would dwarf all others across the country," but that the department is still "lagging behind other cities, with only limited experience with the cameras and zero currently on the streets." Mayor Bill de Blasio's body camera plan, the AP says, "is crucial to restoring trust between officers and the communities they serve."

Podesta: Some "Forces" Within FBI Wanted Clinton "To Lose."

The Huffington Post (2/12, Bobic, 237K) reports that Hillary Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta on Wednesday criticized the FBI for its response to Russia's purported hacking of the DNC. "I think to this day it's inexplicable that they were so casual about the investigation of the Russian penetration of the DNC emails," Podesta said during a panel discussion in San Francisco. "They didn't even bother to send an agent to the DNC. ... They left a couple of messages at the IT help desk saying, 'You might want to be careful.'" Podesta added, "There are at least forces within the FBI that wanted her to lose."

Wyden Asks FBI To Explain Changes To FOIA Rules.

CNN Money (2/10, Larson, 3.59M) reports that Sen. Ron Wyden (D-OR) is asking the FBI for an explanation of the bureau's announcement last week that it "would stop accepting email requests for Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) data," and instead require the submission of FOIA requests "through an online portal called eFOIA – or via fax or snail mail." In a letter to the FBI on Thursday, Wyden, a member of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, "said there are limitations to the online portal," including "a 3,000 character limit on requests, unclear rules about what people can request, and technical barriers that prevent people 'engaged in the innovative use of technology' from automating their requests. 'These limitations may become serious problems if this system is to be the sole method through which the agency can receive digital FOIA requests,' Wyden said in his letter."

The Daily Dot (2/10, 287K) reports that Wyden "urged the FBI to revise its new policy, which he interpreted as potentially placing an 'unnecessary burden' on requesters, citing limitations of the FBI's new online submission platform. 'While it is admirable that the FBI has sought to make it easier to receive and process FOIA requests,' wrote Wyden, 'there are a number of limitations with the online portal. These limitations may become serious problems if this system is to be the sole method through which the agency can receive digital FOIA requests.'"

Sanctuary City Debate May Influence Decision On Building FBI's New Headquarters.

The Washington Times (2/12, Miller, 272K) reports the decision over where to build a new FBI headquarters may be influenced by the sanctuary city debate as the two finalist cities are Prince George's County, Maryland and Fairfax County, Virginia. In Prince George's County, "local officials resist helping deport illegal immigrants," while police cooperate with ICE in Fairfax County. The Times says it is unknown whether the executive order that bars federal funds from sanctuary jurisdictions will impact construction projects.

Miller: Administration Considering Options On Travel Ban.

Coverage of presidential adviser Stephen Miller's comments on four Sunday morning shows about the White House's next steps on the travel ban now frozen by a federal court is widespread but essentially straightforward. Reports cover Miller's defense of President Trump's policy as constitutional and examine the Administration's options with little additional analysis or comment – though several Democratic senators also appeared to rebut Miller's arguments and reiterated their opposition to the policy.

NBC Nightly News (2/12, lead story, 2:30, Snow, 16.61M) said in its lead story that "the White House is considering how to move forward on its immigration policy after losing in court last week." NBC's Kelly O'Donnell said, "Defending that travel ban across morning television [Sunday]...Miller lashed out at the courts." Miller: "We have a judiciary that has taken far too much power and become in many cases a supreme branch of government." ABC World News Tonight (2/12, story 3, 2:05, Wright, 14.63M) reported, "The Administration is now turning its attention back to the targeted travel ban, intent on rescuing the policy one way or another, even if that means writing a new, more limited order. ... The Administration doesn't want the courts to have the last word." Miller: "We can pursue further executive actions. All options are on the table. We have equal branches of government in this country. The judiciary is not supreme."

On ABC's This Week (2/12, Stephanopoulos, 6.61M), Miller said, "A district judge in Seattle cannot force the President of the United States to change the laws and our Constitution because of their own personal views. … And we will do whatever we need to do, consistent with the law, to keep this country safe." On CBS' Face The Nation (2/12, Dickerson, 4.61M), Miller said, "I think it has been an important reminder to all Americans we have a judiciary that has taken far too much power and become in many case as supreme branch of government. One unelected judge in Seattle cannot remake laws for the entire country."

On NBC's Meet The Press (2/12, Todd, 157K), Miller said, "The bottom line is we are pursuing every single possible action to keep our country safe from terrorism." On Fox News Sunday (2/12, Wallace), Miller said the Administration's options include "the possibility of new executive actions designed to prevent terrorist in perpetration of our country. And I want to say something very clearly, this will be very disappointing to the people protesting the President and the people in Congress like Sen. Schumer, who has attacked the President for his lawful and necessary action. The President's powers here are beyond question."

The Washington Post (2/12, Rucker, 11.43M) reports Miller said the Administration is considering appealing "and having an emergency hearing 'en banc,' or before all judges on the court; seeking an emergency stay at the Supreme Court; taking the case to trial at the district level; or writing a new executive order for Trump to sign that would withstand legal scrutiny." The Post calls Miller's Sunday interviews "unusually combative."

Bloomberg Politics (2/12, Niquette, 201K) reports that Miller said the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals "took power that belongs 'squarely in the hands of the president' in a 'judicial usurpation.'" The Wall Street Journal (2/12, Ballhaus, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) also reports Miller said several options are under consideration, and notes Miller's defense of Trump's actions as constitutional, while the New York Daily News (2/12, Edelman, 4.45M) says Miller's comments "indicated that the administration was actively looking at ways to keep the measure alive."

Newsweek (2/12, Loffredo, 862K) reports on its website that Miller "continued Donald Trump's attacks on the judiciary over his suspended travel ban while declining to indicate what legal strategy the administration will pursue." Reuters (2/12, Chiacu, Harte) says Miller "attacked" the court ruling, and the Los Angeles Times (2/12, King, 4.52M) reports he "renewed the White House attack on what the president and senior aides have characterized as overreach by the courts."

USA Today (2/12, Jackson, 5.28M) says the 31-year-old Miller's "influence and public profile appear to be on the rise," and the Washington Times (2/12, Howell, 272K) reports that the President, "who is known to keep tabs on his aides' TV performances, said he was pleased with Mr. Miller's defense." Trump tweeted, "Congratulations Stephen Miller – on representing me this morning on the various Sunday morning shows. Great job!" The Huffington Post (2/12, Fang, 237K), however, says Miller's appearances went "disastrously," on the travel ban and on other issues. Voice of America (2/12, Bredemeier, 57K) also covers Miller's appearances on its website.

Schumer: Trump Should Throw Travel Ban "In The Trash." On CBS' Face The Nation (2/12, Dickerson, 4.61M), Senate Minority Leader Schumer said Trump should not revise the travel ban executive order, but "he ought to throw it in the trash. I think this executive order is so bad and so poisoned and its genesis is so bad and terrible that he ought to just throw it in the trash can." Politico (2/12, Strauss, 2.46M) says the comment "came in response to a question about the Trump administration looking to introduce a new executive order similar to a travel ban for seven majority-Muslim countries" blocked by the Ninth Circuit.

The New York Post (2/12, Moore, 3.82M) reports that Schumer "went on to call the order 'un-American and unconstitutional.'" Schumer said, "A religious ban just goes against the American brain. We believe in immigrants in this country and we don't believe in a religious test." The Washington Times (2/12, Howell, 272K) also reports on Schumer's remarks.

Other senators were also critical. On NBC's Meet The Press (2/12, Todd, 157K), Sen. Bernie Sanders called Miller's remarks "a shell game," saying, "While there is a whole lot of discussion about the racist, in my view, immigration policies of the Trump Administration which are based on anti-Muslim ideology, which are doing us enormous harm all over the world, something else is going on at the exact same moment is that President Trump is backtracking on every economic promise that he made to the American people when he told workers and senior citizens he was not going to cut Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid."

On Fox News Sunday (2/12, Wallace), Sen. Ben Cardin said, "I've talked to leaders from around the world that tell us that" the travel ban executive order "will be used as a recruitment for terrorist organizations it will put Americans at greater risk traveling abroad, that it adds to self-radicalization." On CNN's State Of The Union (2/12, Tapper, 420K), Sen. Al Franken similarly said, "I agree with Sen. McCain and Sen. Graham that actually this kind of ban makes us less safe and it gives a recruiting tool to ISIS and to other jihadists saying America is anti-Muslim. ... I think that Trump and his group are trying to make Americans more afraid. I think that's part of how they got elected is make more people afraid."

However, Sen. Jeff Flake, a Republican who is frequently critical of Trump, said on CBS' Face The Nation (2/12, Dickerson, 4.61M), "I do think it is constitutional. It is not a Muslim ban. ... I think that the message that it sends to our allies abroad and the countries that we need to work with is not a good one."

WPost Analysis: 9th Circuit Cites 1993 Case About Ritual Sacrifices In Blocking Travel Ban. The Washington Post (2/12, Guerra, 11.43M) reported on its "Post Nation" blog that in 1993, the Supreme Court "granted constitutional protections to an Afro-Cuban religious group that sacrifices animals, such goats, chickens, ducks and turtles, as a form of ritual," and "more than two decades later, specifically Thursday, three federal appeals court judges relied partly on that ruling when they declined to reinstate President Trump's controversial entry ban on refugees and citizens from seven predominantly Muslim countries." The Post noted that "the states of Washington and Minnesota, which sued to block Trump's executive order, cited the president's fiery rhetoric and a previous statement about a 'total and complete shutdown' of Muslims entering the country to prove that his directive was meant to discriminate against one religion," and the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals "agreed, citing the 23-year-old Supreme Court ruling on animal sacrifices as precedent."

Page: Trump Running Up Against Realities Of Presidential Power. Susan Page of USA Today (2/12, 5.28M) writes under the headline "Reality Check: After Three Weeks, Trump Hits A Washington Wall" that after "a dizzying flurry of actions" in his first weeks in office, Trump "has begun running smack into constraints mandated by the Constitution and imposed by political reality. Without acknowledging he's being forced to trim his sails, the president is moving to delay some campaign promises and downsize others, steps that sometimes have been overshadowed by a continued stream of the defiant tweets that marked his political rise." Page writes that Trump is "discovering how the Constitution's structure, federal laws and rival power centers...make leadership in the Oval Office a more complicated calculation than in the corporate suite."

Washington State AG Ferguson Profiled. The AP (2/12, Johnson) profiles Washington State Attorney General Bob Ferguson, who is in "the vanguard of resistance" against Trump's travel ban. Ferguson said on ABC's This Week, "The Administration, the President, simply refused to recognize what everybody else can recognize. Four federal judges have looked at this case. ... All four have completely and utterly rejected the President's arguments in this case, and we anticipate winning as the case moves forward."

Some Employees Of Long-Established Tech Firms Join Critics Of Ban. The New York Times (2/12, Streitfeld, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that though "the older, stodgier, less glamorous part of the tech universe" has been generally quiet about the ban, not joining in the legal filings or public criticism of its peers, some employees of firms like Cisco, Hewlett Packard Enterprise, and IBM are showing "defiance" and "agitating for an explicit corporate morality."

Policy Puts Hospitals' Selections Of Residents In Turmoil. The Wall Street Journal (2/12, Evans, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) looks at the difficulties hospitals are having in selecting applicants for residencies, noting that in recent years, about 14 percent of residents have come from abroad.

Syrian Refugee Family Now In US. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, King, 4.52M) has a feature on a refugee family who had "survived war's bloody ruination of their Syrian hometown, Homs, endured years of hardscrabble life in Jordan and undergone an exhaustive US vetting process that had lasted more than two years," and are now in the US after the refugee ban initially froze their plans.

WPost: Trump Should Back Abolition Of EB-5 Visa Program. In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/12, 11.43M) says that if President Trump really wants "to show that his immigration policies reflect consistent principles, not his and his family's involvement in the real estate business," he should back a bill sponsored by Sens. Charles Grassley and Dianne Feinstein, the chair and ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, that would abolish the EB-5 visa program, "which began a quarter-century ago as a well-intentioned plan to attract international capital to the United States, but has morphed into a scandal-ridden embarrassment."

Law Professors: Trump Should Be Judicious In Criticism Of Judiciary. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/12, Subscription Publication, 6.37M), University of Virginia law professor Sai Prakash and University of California, Berkeley law professor John Yoo write that while it is legitimate to criticize the federal judiciary, it is unwise when such criticism is unfounded. The professors defend President Trump's right to lodge reasonable protests about important decisions, as his predecessors have done, but warn that such criticism should be reserved for issues and decisions of importance, not a legal setback in a minor procedural test of a temporary executive order.

Miller Says Blumenthal Misrepresented Gorsuch's Comments.

On Fox News Sunday (2/12, Wallace), Chris Wallace said Judge James Robart "has received death threats" since President Trump tweeted criticism of the judge in the wake of his decision to issue a temporary restraining order against the travel ban. Asked if Trump should be blamed if "something happens" to Robart, presidential adviser Stephen Miller said, "This is one of the most ludicrous things that the media does, where when any crazy person in this country issues a death threat, that they then blame a politician or a public official. That is reckless and irresponsible and should never be done." Asked about Supreme Court nominee Neil Gorsuch's comment that Trump's criticism of the judiciary was "disheartening and demoralizing," Miller said, "I have my opinions, and Judge Gorsuch has had his comments, as you know, misinterpreted and misrepresented by Senator Bluementhal, who as we all know has profound credibility issues."

Schumer Questions Gorsuch's Independence For Not Publicly Criticizing Trump. On CBS' Face the Nation, Senate Minority Leader Schumer said he asked Judge Gorsuch if he would "publicly condemn what President Trump did with the existing judge, which any judge worth his salt should do. He refused. He said to me, 'I'm disheartened.' Now, his handlers were sitting there and he whispered, 'You can make that public.' So this was not – you can't behind closed doors whisper to a senator and then not say anything. And then when President Trump attacked and said 'he didn't mean me,' they all said yeah, he didn't mean President Trump. That was a further indication of his lack of independence."

AP Analysis: Gorsuch Has Defended Freedom Of Speech, Religion. The AP (2/12, Donn, Mulvihill) reports that Gorsuch "has been a defender of free speech and a skeptic of libel claims, an Associated Press review of his rulings shows," a record that "puts him at odds with President Donald Trump's disdain for journalists and tendency to lash out at critics." However, the AP analysis found, "on other First Amendment cases involving freedom of religion," Judge Gorsuch's rulings "in his decade on the 10th US Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver reflect views more in line with the president and conservatives." Judge Gorsuch "repeatedly has sided with religious groups when they butt up against the secular state," according to the AP.

Gorsuch Scales Back Description Of Harvard Pro Bono Work. The Wall Street Journal (2/12, Reinhard, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that Judge Gorsuch has scaled back a description of his pro bono work at Harvard Law School after questions were raised over his involvement in two volunteer criminal justice programs. In a questionnaire released on Saturday by the Senate Judiciary Committee, Gorsuch said he "participated" in the two programs. He had said in a 2006 Senate form, as a federal appeals court nominee, that he had represented "defendants in criminal proceedings in Massachusetts state courts" and helped represent inmates, the Journal notes.

DC Area Prepares For Economic Woes Due To Trump's Effect On Federal Workforce, Spending.

The Washington Post (2/12, McCartney, 11.43M) reports that while "the administration and congressional leaders have sent mixed signals about their intentions," the Washington, DC region "is bracing for shock" to its economy due to decreased federal spending. "The region is widely expected to fare worse" than others due to efforts "to restrict the size and cost of the federal workforce." Predicted "sharp cuts in federal nondefense spending...would strain local budgets nationwide and pose a particular threat to economic growth," and while President Trump has called for infrastructure investment, detailed plans appear to involve tax credits, not spending. Meanwhile, business leaders say "Trump's demonization of the capital...has hurt the region's reputation as a good place to work." On top of all this, GOP proposals to convert domestic spending programs into block grants would "shift costs and responsibilities to state and local governments," as well as, according to critics, serve "to mask cuts."

INTERNATIONAL NEWS

Report Disputes Russia's Claims Of Restraint In Syria.

The New York Times (2/12, Gordon, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that while Russian military officials have "vociferously denied that their airstrikes have killed civilians in Syria," but a "new analysis that draws on satellite images, security camera videos, social media and even footage from the Kremlin-backed Russian television network has challenged Moscow's claims." The analysis by the Atlantic Council also "concludes that Syrian forces used chlorine gas on a far greater scale than is commonly believed."

Hezbollah Supports Syrian Ceasefire, Peace Talks.

Reuters (2/12, Francis) reports Hezbollah said Sunday it "strongly supports the Syrian ceasefire agreed on in Kazakhstan and any truce that could lead to a political solution." Leader Hassan Nasrallah said Sunday, "Hezbollah strongly supports, not just the Astana ceasefire, any ceasefire agreed upon in Syria," in order "to prevent bloodshed and pave the way for political solutions."

Opposition Selects Delegation For Geneva Talks.

Another Reuters (2/12, Al-Khalidi, Perry) report says Syria's main opposition body, the High Negotiation Committee (HNC), on Sunday approved a delegation to take part in Geneva peace talks later this month. The group said in a statement after two-days of meetings in Riyadh, the "21-member negotiating team included members of two dissident alliances with which it has previously been at odds."

Tension Mounts Among Shiites In Baghdad After Clashes.

Reuters (2/12, Majeed, Rasheed) reports tensions between Iraq's Shi'ite leaders "mounted on Sunday as the toll from protests in central Baghdad on Saturday increased to six killed." At least 174 other protesters were injured in clashes that pitted police and followers of cleric Moqtada al-Sadr demanding "an overhaul of a commission that supervises elections, ahead of a provincial poll due in September."

Baghdad Protesters, Police Clash Outside Baghdad's Green Zone.

Reuters (2/11, Chmaytelli, Hameed) reports thousands of protesters loyal to Moqtada al-Sadr, a prominent Shi'ite cleric, gathered in Baghdad on Saturday to press for election commission reforms. Police attempted to disperse some protesters who tried to cross a bridge into the Green Zone, and the protest escalated into clashes that killed as many as five demonstrators and at least one officer. The Interior Ministry said up to 320 people were wounded. Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi issued an investigation into the casualty claims. Al-Sadr, in a statement, accused the police of using excessive force on peaceful demonstrators and called on protesters to "withdraw until further notice."

The Wall Street Journal (2/11, Kesling, Adnan, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reported Abadi did not address the demonstrators' demands and reiterated that any electoral commission overhauls must be achieved through parliament. Separately, four Katyusha rockets were fired from the eastern side of the city at the Green Zone; no known casualties resulted.

Turkish-Backed Syrian Opposition Forces Stall In Al-Bab.

The Syrian Observatory for Human Rights told the AP (2/11, Issa) that ISIS still controls nine-tenths of the northern Syrian town al-Bab, even though Turkish and allied Syrian opposition troops reached the outskirts of the city seven weeks ago. The operation is a part of Turkey's broader "Euphrates Shield" mission, in which Turkey hopes to clear both ISIS and US-backed Kurdish forces in Syria away from its border, and Syrian opposition forces hope to secure territory. Meanwhile, Kazakhstan's Foreign Ministry announced on Saturday that it is inviting Syrian government and opposition forces as well as Russian, Turkish, and Iranian delegates for preparatory ceasefire talks on Feb. 16 and 17.

WPost Urges Administration To Support Assad's Removal.

The Washington Post (2/11, 11.43M) editorializes the Saydnaya military prison outside of Damascus "deserves attention, if only because it shows the regime's calculated sadism and cold determination to exterminate all who oppose it." Citing an Amnesty International report, the Post says up to 13,000 civilians were systematically executed at Saydnaya, dubbed the "human slaughterhouse," under Syrian President Bashar al-Assad's rule, "and there is no reason to believe the killings have stopped since then." The Post urges "all those who believe that the Syrian civil war" can conclude with Assad still in power to consider the report, and calls on the Administration to avoid decisions that "tolerate or even support the butchers of Damascus."

Iraqis Battling Oil Well Fires Set By Retreating ISIS Militants.

The Washington Post (2/12, Holley, 11.43M) reports on the challenges faced by Iraqi oil workers. Outside of Mosul, retreating ISIS militants set fire to oil wells, and "at least five of the 25 oil well fires left in the militants' wake still rage...forming a second front in the battle for Iraq that is no less dangerous for the proud men involved."

Amnesty International Urges UN To Investigate 13,000 Hangings In Syria.

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Agrawal, 4.52M) reports Amnesty International urged the United Nations to independently investigate and take action against Syrian government and military prison officials allegedly responsible for as many as 13,000 executions by hanging since 2011. Even though the UN and US have repeatedly denounced the Syrian government's use of chemical weapons, barrel bombs, and airstrikes against civilians, "inaction has been the norm." According to analysts, former President Obama could not convince Congress or any other world leader to move forward with a military operation, in part because Russian President Vladimir Putin is an ally of Syrian President Bashar Assad. Furthermore, any action on behalf of the UN Security Council would require unanimous approval, which China and Russia have vetoed in the past.

Afghan Official: Joint US-Afghan Raid Killed 22 Civilians.

The AP (2/12, Khan) reports Helmand presidential envoy Jabar Qahraman and residents of the Sangin district claimed that a joint US-Afghan operation last week led to 22 civilian deaths. A statement by American spokesman CAPT Bill Salvin indicates American forces have "not reached any conclusions" about civilian casualties. According to Reuters (2/12, Smith), a UN statement on Sunday indicated the strikes killed 18 civilians, primarily women and children, and the UN's most recent report shows civilian deaths from American and Afghan airstrikes "dramatically" increasing in 2016.

Media Analyses: Netanyahu Will Seek To Reset US Ties During Talks With Trump.

Bloomberg Politics (2/12, Wainer, 201K) reports that when he visits the White House this week, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu will try to "recalibrate ties" with the US "after eight years of high-profile clashes" with President Obama. Netanyahu "sees a chance for a warmer relationship" with President Trump. "The overriding goal will be to restore the relationship so that there are no surprises and no daylight," said former Ambassador Michael Oren, now a deputy minister in Netanyahu's office. The New York Times (2/12, Fisher, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Netanyahu "suggested on Sunday that it was unrealistic to expect their two countries to agree completely on all issues," but insisted that "he was the strongest leader to navigate the relationship – the nation's most important, yet often its trickiest." The Times says Wednesday's meeting is "expected to set the tone for the American-Israeli relationship."

According to Reuters (2/12, Heller), Netanyahu said Sunday he would present "responsible policies" in talks with Trump, "signaling to the Israeli far-right to curb its territorial demands in the occupied West Bank." Said the Israeli leader, "I understand there's great excitement about this meeting (with Trump). But...my primary concern is Israel's security (and) strengthening our solid alliance with the United States." That, he added, "requires responsible policies," without elaborating. The Washington Post (2/12, Booth, 11.43M) reports that during his visit, Israeli Education Minister Naftali Bennett, leader of the pro-settlement Jewish Home party, pressed Netanyahu "to abandon his tentative commitment to the two-state solution," and not to use the words "Palestinian state."

The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Wilkinson, 4.52M), however, notes that on Friday, Trump told Israel Today that "going forward with settlements" is not a "good thing for peace," a position the Times says "puts him far closer to traditional US policy, and to Obama, than before." Settlements "don't help the [peace] process. I can say that. There is [only] so much land left. And every time you take land for settlements, there is less land left." The Times says the President's remarks "put him at odds with Netanyahu."

Feinstein, Heinrich Call For Continued US Efforts Towards Two-State Solution. In an op-ed in USA Today (2/12, 5.28M), Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Martin Heinrich call for the Administration to "help create the conditions necessary for resuming direct talks between" Israel and the Palestinians, including "a halt to Israeli settlement construction and an end to Palestinian incitement of terror." The senators warn that a two-state solution, which both Democratic and Republican administrations have worked towards, is the only way to stem the violence, provide "true security for Israel," and keep Israel "both majority Jewish and democratic." With "the incitement of violence and terror by Palestinians," Israel expanding settlements, and Trump's nominee to be the ambassador to Israel, David Friedman, expressing "an openly hostile attitude to a two-state solution," Feinstein and Heinrich call for the United States to "continue to play a constructive role, rather than turning a blind eye to actions by either party that undermine the prospects for peace."

Media Analysis: Trump-Trudeau Meeting Comes Amid Questions About Relationship.

The AP (2/12, Gillies) reports the first in-person meeting between President Trump and Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau "could be the most important meeting for Canada" with a US leader "in decades." The meeting comes, according to the AP, as "many Canadians fear Trump will enact protectionist measures that could hurt their economy" and are worried that Trump "could be as combative as he was with the leaders of Mexico and Australia." The Wall Street Journal (2/12, Vieira, Mauldin, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) says the meeting likely will provide indications of how Washington intends to proceed with changes to the economic framework of the continent. Trudeau said last week that both Trump and he were "elected on commitments to strengthen the middle class and support those working hard to join it, and that's what we are going to focus on in these meetings."

NYTimes Analysis: Canada's Conservatives Looking For a Way Forward. The New York Times (2/12, Austen, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that while in many countries the "political right" has "been on the rise lately," Canada's Conservatives "are in the political wilderness" following their 2015 defeat to the Liberals and Trudeau. The Conservatives, according to the Times, also are "lacking a permanent leader to replace" former Prime Minister Stephen Harper. The Times says the Conservatives "are asking" who "can take up our standard, cross swords with a charismatic and popular opponent, and lead us back to power in Parliament?"

Media Analyses: North Korean Missile Launch A Challenge To Trump.

Media reports on North Korea's test early Sunday of a mid-range ballistic missile cast the move as a test of the Trump Administration. On NBC Nightly News (2/12, story 2, 0:55, Snow, 16.61M), for example, Kier Simmons said the launch "was a direct and deliberate challenge to the new Administration," and the AP (2/12, Talmadge) too says it was "an implicit challenge" to President Trump.

ABC World News Tonight (2/12, story 2, 1:50, Llamas, 14.63M) noted the test came as Trump hosted Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe at Mar-a-Lago. The leaders responded "with a swift joint statement, calling the test launch intolerable and Trump assuring that the US has Japan's back 100 percent." ABC's David Wright noted Sunday's launch was Pyongyang's first missile test since Trump took office, and while it "posed no threat to the US...it was a crucial test of Trump's commitment to the US-Japan security alliance."

The Washington Post (2/12, Wagner, 11.43M) reported early Sunday that Trump's "hastily called news conference" Saturday evening with Abe ended with a "pledge...to stand by Japan '100 percent' in the wake of North Korea's latest ballistic missile launch." The Post noted that the press conference "lasted barely two minutes" and neither leader took questions from reporters. The AP (2/12, Talmadge) said Abe "read a brief statement," and "Trump followed Abe with even fewer words," saying in part: "I just want everybody to understand and fully know that the United States of America stands behind Japan, its great ally, 100 percent."

The New York Times (2/12, Baker, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that in response to North Korea, Trump "reacted with surprising restraint" in "sharp contrast to his response after Iran tested a ballistic missile." The Times says if Pyongyang "was testing the new president, as many analysts believe, then Mr. Trump seemed intent on showing that he would not be baited into a confrontation."

USA Today (2/12, Madhani, 5.28M) reports Trump adviser Stephen Miller told Fox News Sunday (2/12, Wallace) that Trump is sending an "unmistakable signal to North Korea and to the entire world," and is determined to "reinforce and strengthen our vital alliances in the Pacific region as part of our strategy to deter and prevent the increasing hostility that we've seen in recent years from the North Korean regime." On CBS' Face the Nation, Miller said, "Last night was a show of strength. Saying that we stand with our ally, having the two men appear on camera worldwide to all of planet earth was a statement that will be understood very well by North Korea." Reuters (2/12, Chiacu) also reports Miller's comments.

The Wall Street Journal (2/12, A1, Nicholas, Lee, Cheng, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports on its front page that in the wake of Sunday's test, Trump is facing calls for a show of strength toward North Korea. Sen. Cory Gardner urged Trump to "immediately pursue a series of tough measures," including sanctions, military exercises with US allies in the region, and the accelerated deployment of an advanced missile system in South Korea. Sen. Tom Cotton similarly said, "It's time the regime had to face consequences for its behavior."

For its part, Reuters (2/12, Park) reports North Korea hailed the test of a new type medium-to-long-range ballistic missile as successful. State-run media said leader Kim Jong Un supervised the test of the Pukguksong-2. AFP (2/12) reports the missile flew for "about 500 kilometers (310 miles) before falling into the Sea of Japan," according to South Korea's defense ministry. The New York Times (2/13, Choe, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports North Korea said the missile "used a high-thrust, solid fuel-powered engine and was fired from a self-propelled missile launching truck," which is "an important stride."

The AP (2/12) reports the US, Japan, and South Korea have requested an urgent meeting of the UN Security Council, which "is expected to take place Monday."

Trump Urged To Pursue Tougher Sanctions. On CNN's Fareed Zakaria GPS (2/12, Zakaria, 410K), Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, said, "We're moving towards the situation where either...we get the Chinese on board and we increase the pressure on [North Korea] through sanctions, and the Chinese are in the unique position to do it ,or Mr. Trump is going to have to face a truly fateful decision about whether we're prepared to live with a North Korea with the capability against us or we're going to use military force one way or another to destroy their nuclear missile capabilities."

Also CNN's Fareed Zakaria GPS (2/12, Zakaria, 410K), former Director of Policy Planning at the State Department, Anne-Marie Slaughter, said, "There is a tougher policy. We can impose much more personal sanctions that strike at the heart of the actual North Korean regime. China doesn't want us to do that, but it has been effective. The question is whether Trump will use this to get a tougher policy."

CNN's Stelter Criticizes Trump For Tweets About CNN In Wake Of Missile Test. Brian Stelter said on CNN's Reliable Sources (2/12, 301K), "Donald Trump's Twitter feed matters, not because it gives us on TV something to talk about, but because foreign leaders are all monitoring it, all paying very close attention, foreign leaders like Kim Jong-un. On a weekend when the President faces his first real international test with North Korea, on a weekend when he's hosting the Japanese prime minister at Mar-a-Lago, on a weekend when he's supposedly working on his response to the Ninth Circuit, Trump is tweeting about all this: 'While he's on Fake News CNN, Bernie Sanders was cut off for using the term fake news to describe the network. They said technical difficulties.'"

Steinmeier, A "Critic" Of Trump, Elected Germany's President.

A special assembly on Sunday elected former German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier the country's new president. Steinmeier received 931 of the 1,260 votes that came from the lower house of parliament and representatives of Germany's states. Media coverage highlights that Steinmeier has been a critic of President Trump. The New York Times (2/12, Smale, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports – in a story discussing Chancellor Angela Merkel's precarious political situation caused by the rising popularity of the country's right – says Steinmeier's new position "provides stature and an important platform" despite its largely ceremonial role.

Bloomberg News (2/12, Donahue, 2.41M) says Steinmeier – who is a "vocal critic" of Trump and once called him a "hate preacher" – "predicted 'difficulties' in relations with the US" amid a "complete re-ordering of international relations." Steinmeier told broadcaster ZDF after his election, "In the past we were always certain that we would have more difficult negotiating partners in the east." He continued, "Suddenly we're confronted with a situation in which we'll at the very least deal with uncertainty and also difficulties in trans-Atlantic relations." The Washington Post (2/12, 11.43M) reports Steinmeier "shunned political tension or any mention of Trump" in his acceptance speech. However, the Post adds that Steinmeier characterized Germany as an "anchor of hope" in an increasingly uncertain world. Steinmeier said, "We're living in tumultuous times; many in our country feel insecure."

The Wall Street Journal (2/12, Geiger, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports Steinmeier's election was expected as, according to the AP (2/12, Press), the Social Democrat "had the backing" of German Chancellor Angela Merkel's "grand coalition" of center-right and center-left parties. The AP says Steinmeier "has long been one of Germany's most popular politicians." He was the chief of staff of former Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and "was a main architect" of Schroeder's economic reforms. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, Kirschbaum, 4.52M) reports Merkel's Christian Democrats "had failed to agree on their own candidate" and "reluctantly threw their weight behind" Steinmeier "after criticizing his uncharacteristically sharp comments about Trump." Reuters (2/12, Rinke) quotes Merkel as saying she has "faith" in Steinmeier "to lead our country in these difficult times."

UK Defense Minister Praises Trump's Efforts To Strengthen NATO.

The Wall Street Journal (2/12, Kesling, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports British Defense

Minister Michael Fallon said Saturday that US-British defense ties have never been stronger and welcomed President Trump's efforts to strengthen NATO by pushing allies to contribute more to their mutual defense. "The British-American defense partnership is the deepest, strongest defense partnership anywhere in the world," Fallon said.

Iran Arrests Eight Foreigners Suspected Of Plotting Attacks.

Reuters (2/11) reports Iranian Intelligence Minister Mahmoud Alavi announced on Saturday that security forces arrested eight armed Sunni Islamist foreigners, or "Takfiri." The state news agency IRNA wrote, "Initial information indicates that Kalashnikovs and other equipment were obtained to carry out terrorist operations" in Tehran and other cities "under the direct guidance" of militants in neighboring nations. Alavi did not indicate from what nation the alleged organizers resided, but Iranian officials have accused Saudi Arabia in the past of supporting ISIS.

Thousands Protest Against Trump, Pena Nieto In Mexico.

Thousands of Mexicans protested against President Trump on Sunday on the streets of Mexico City and other cities. Media coverage says that while protest organizers intended for the demonstrations to focus on Trump, many attendees chose to use the events to speak out against their own president – Enrique Pena Nieto. The Los Angeles Times (2/12, McDonnell, 4.52M) reports the protesters "wav[ed] Mexican flags and signs denouncing" Trump as they marched through Mexico City in "the largest mobilization in the capital to date against" the American President's policies. Protest organizers, according to the Times, "dubbed the march 'Vibra Mexico' (roughly, Mexican vibe) and mounted an aggressive social media campaign encouraging people to attend."

However, the Washington Post (2/12, Agren, 11.43M) says organizers "envisaged a protest that would condemn Trump's treatment of Mexico, but also demand more of Mexican politicians." The Post says the "balance was proving difficult to maintain" as "hashtags criticizing the Vibra México protest were trending on Twitter" and organizers "were pleading with protesters" to focus on Trump. Many protesters, according to Reuters (2/12, Garcia), "also heaped scorn on their own president" as they criticized him for being "a weak leader who has presided over rampant corruption and violence at home."

WSJournal Analysis: Trump Moves Toward Center On Foreign Policy.

The Wall Street Journal (2/12, Nicholas, Lee, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) under the headline "Donald Trump's Diplomatic Moderation" reports that President Trump seems to be moving towards following a more traditional US foreign policy than was suggested by some of his campaign statements. As an example, the Journal cites Trump's appearance with Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe following the North Korean missile launch in which he said the "United States of America stands behind Japan, its great ally, 100%." That is contrasted to campaign suggestions that Japan benefits more than the US from the alliance. Similar shifts towards established policy are described with respect to the "one-China" policy, NATO, and sanctions against Russia over Ukraine. The moves are credited to advice from Defense Secretary Mattis and Secretary of State Tillerson, as well as Trump's meetings with other leaders.

CSMonitor Analysis: With Similarities To FDR, Trump Moving To Reverse His International Legacy. The Christian Science Monitor (2/12, Jonsson, 387K) reports that, among Americans who feel "a mix of Christian apocalyptic thought peppered with a sense of humiliation at the hands of foreigners," there is a "broader sentiment taking root" that looks to President Trump to revise President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's "legacy of fearless optimism and world leadership." The Monitor uses examples of those who agree with Trump in Warm Springs, Georgia, where Roosevelt built his "Little White House." The Monitor says that despite their different philosophies, Trump and Roosevelt are similar in how "both took on the courts, both pushed the boundaries executive authority in the name of national security, and both showed an ability to take advantage of emerging media," as well as how much of their bases are "self-described 'commoners; who feel they have a handshake deal with the president."

WSJournal Lauds Trump's Handling Of China, Japan. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/12, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) lauds President Trump's phone call with China's Xi Jinping and summit with Japan's Shinzo Abe, contrasting the planning and respect with Trump's previous dealing with foreign leaders. The Journal defends Trump's affirmation of the "One China policy," which he previously said was under negotiation, as not capitulating to China's stance on the issue but setting the stage for expanding support for Taiwan. The Journal also welcomes Trump's reversal from casting Japan as a freeloader to expressing support for the country's defense and praise for Abe.

NYTimes Analysis: Foreign Diplomats Hope Haley Speaks For Administration.

The New York Times (2/12, Sengupta, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that world diplomats are "figuring out how to deal with President Trump." To do that, "they're counting on his United Nations envoy, Nikki R. Haley." They are, however, said to wonder whether Haley is "speaking for herself, or for the administration?" Still they are "queuing up to see her," and "nearly all described" her "as a natural politician and a refreshing contrast to the president."

Peruvian President Asks Trump To Consider Deporting Former Leader.

Reuters (2/12, Taj) reports Peruvian President Pedro Pablo Kuczynski said in a statement that he asked President Trump, by phone, to "consider deporting" ex-president Alejandro Toledo, who is "wanted in connection with a far-reaching graft probe." The issue "is threatening to strain tensions between the United States and Peru." Trump said that they spoke to "reinforce the strong bilateral ties that exist between the United States and Peru," the White House said, but it "did not mention Toledo in a read-out of the conversation."

IMF Head: Trump Policies Likely To Be Good For American Economy In The Short Term.

The AP (2/12, Gambrell) reports International Monetary Fund head Christine Lagarde, during an event at the World Government Summit, predicted President Trump's planned infrastructure investment and tax changes would produce short-term gains for the American economy, but warned of "a tightening that is going to be difficult on the global economy and for which economies have to prepare."

Hezbollah Leader Calls Trump An "Idiot."

The AP (2/12) reports Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah said Sunday that "the world will benefit from having an 'idiot' in the White House." Referring to President Trump, Nasrallah said, "We are very optimistic that when an idiot settles in the White House and boasts about his idiocy, this is the beginning of relief for the oppressed around the world."

Moscow Supporting Europe's Far Right Populists.

NBC Nightly News (2/12, story 3, 2:15, Snow, 16.61M) reported, "Moscow is exerting more and more political influence in Europe." NBC (Bradley) added that Russia is providing "loans, cooperation, and propaganda" to Europe's increasing vocal far right populists, "even as the US reels from Russian political interference in its own presidential election." In response, the EU "created an agency to counter anti-Europe propaganda."

WPost Touts Russian News Network, Warns Against Political Interference. In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/12, 11.43M), touts Current Time television as a response to Russia's "dark mastery" of soft power in the form of "propaganda, news, social media, cybermischief, deception, leaks and other means to influence hearts and minds." The 24/7 Russian-language television network provides fair reporting without disinformation in Russia and countries. Arguing that "key" to the venture's success is being "deemed credible by audiences that have been fed a steady diet of anti-Americanism in recent years," the Post warns the Administration against making it a propaganda machine. The Post also calls for Congress to make sure this response to Russia's information war, "using real news and straight programming and reflecting the highest and best values of our open society," remains "properly financed and politically unhindered."

Bolton Lauds Reports Trump Seeks To Cast Aside New START Treaty.

Former Ambassador John Bolton, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (2/12, Subscription Publication, 6.37M), welcomes reports of President Trump's disdain for the 2010 New START arms-control treaty. Bolton argues that the treaty has been bad for the US and Trump's position indicates a refusal to accede to Vladimir Putin's wishes. Acknowledging concerns that Trump will weaken the sanctions on Russia, Bolton warns this would embolden Russia in its dealings in the Middle East, particularly with Iran, weaken Western Europe's resolve on sanctions, and alarm Central and Eastern Europe. Bolton concludes that Trump has to realize that countries' foreign policies are driven by national interests, not personal chemistry.

Romanians Continue To Protest Government Corruption.

Bloomberg Politics (2/12, Timu, 201K) reports that 70,000 people demonstrated throughout Romania on Sunday to demand the cabinet step down, according to local media. Bloomberg Politics notes this 13-day protest is the largest show of unrest since the 1989 ousting of dictator Nicolae Ceausescu. According to the Wall Street Journal (2/12, Hinshaw, Subscription Publication, 6.37M), many protesters see National Anticorruption Directorate chief prosecutor Laura Codruta Kövesi as a symbol of change in Romania. The NAD has reportedly increased in authority in recent years, with 2,100 abuse-of-office cases currently under investigation, among them many high-profile politicians. The Journal says that older generations resist the anticorruption measures as reminiscent of communist era rule. The New York Times (2/12, Gillet, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) also reports on the story.

Kashmir Clash Between Indian Troops, Militants Leads To Violent Protests.

The New York Times (2/12, Kumar, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that four militants, two soldiers, and one civilian died in a gun battle between Indian security forces and Hizbul Mujahedeen militants lasting 12 hours into Sunday morning in a Kashmir village. Young people who gathered to grieve the deaths of the militants threw stones at security forces. The troops responded with gunshots and tear gas, resulting in one death and 21 injuries, according to the local hospital superintendent.

Somaliland To Allow UAE To Establish Naval Base.

Somaliland's parliament on Sunday approved the United Arab Emirates' formal application to establish a naval base in the territory's Berbera port town, the AP (2/12, Guled) reports. An official with the Somali breakaway territory explained the UAE intends to use the base to attack Shia Houthi fighters in Yemen and Somaliland President Ahmed Silanyo claimed the measure would create jobs and benefit the territory. Nine parliamentary lawmakers vehemently opposed the "controversial" plan, as did neighboring Ethiopia and Djibouti.

WSJournal Analysis: Despite European Unhappiness, IMF Won't Budge On Greece Bailout.

In an analysis, the Wall Street Journal (2/12, Nixon, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that the window for a with the window for a Greek Debt deal quickly closing, European governments and institutions sorely want to resolve the standoff over the next phase of the country's bailout program, but the International Monetary Fund is standing firm against political pressure, refusing to participate because it believes the numbers don't add up. Many Europeans criticize the IMF as being overly pessimistic in its forecasts and assessment of the country's prospects for reform. The Journal concludes that should Europe seek to postpone the Greek bailout issue until after this year's elections, the IMF will not be part of it.

Egyptian Cost Of Living Soars.

The Wall Street Journal (2/12, Lohade, Kholaif, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports Egypt's largely working- and middle-class people are seeing jumps in the cost of living due to high inflation, a weaker currency, falling government subsidies, a new value-added tax, and increased tariffs. However, the government has had to take tough measures on the economy to get International Monetary Fund money that will support an economy hurt by years of political unrest and pay for importing necessities such as wheat and medicine.

Cambodian Opposition Party Leader Resigns.

The New York Times (2/12, Wallace, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Cambodia's "embattled" opposition party leader, Sam Rainsy, abruptly resigned on Saturday in what he described as a "pre-emptive defense move" to save the Cambodia National Rescue Party ahead of June's local elections. Earlier this month, Prime Minister Hun Sen proposed a series of moves through which he could dissolve any party, including the CNRP, headed by someone with a criminal conviction. A number of criminal defamation lawsuits have been filed against Rainsy, a long-lasting, "internationally visible opposition figure," who leads the Cambodian People's Party.

Swiss Voters Approve Simplified Citizenship Process For Third-Generation Immigrants.

The New York Times (2/12, Cumming-Bruce, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Swiss voters, in a national referendum on Sunday, approved a government-sponsored measure to simplify and expedite the citizenship approval process for third-generation immigrants under 25-years-old. The measure will not grant automatic citizenship to children of non-citizens born in the nation, but nearly 25,000 people who are the descendants of foreigners with permanent residency status are no longer subjected to the "lengthy and expensive procedure to obtain citizenship." The Times says Sunday's vote "went against the recent tide of right-wing populism and anti-immigrant sentiment in much of Western Europe." The result also, according to the Times, came despite a campaign by the right-wing People's Party "to stoke fears of Muslims infiltrating the country."

Spain's Far-Left Podemos Party Head Defeats Leadership Challenge.

The New York Times (2/12, Minder, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Spain's Podemos Party leader Pablo Iglesias "won an unexpectedly clear victory" in a leadership challenge vote on Sunday. The Times says Iglesias' win is expected to bolster his far-left party's "radical" and "anti-institutional hard-line policies." The Times adds the result will also "likely" increase "pressure on the Socialists," which is in the throes of its own "bitter leadership dispute."

Voeten: Public Recognizes Friendly, Hostile Countries Well.

Erik Voeten, in the "Monkey Cage" blog of the Washington Post (2/12, 11.43M) writes, "The public does pretty well" in recognizing which countries are friendly and hostile to the United States in international affair. A YouGov survey of 7,150 Americans between Jan. 28 and Feb. 1 found a "quite high" correlation between public opinion of 144 countries and their alignment with US interests, as measure by voting with "the United States in the United Nations General Assembly on contentious issues during the 71st session (fall of 2016)." Voeten concludes, "In the aggregate, the public does have a pretty clear sense of who the United States' foes and friends are." However, Trump's hostility towards such countries may not hurt him politically, as academic research indicates "the public doesn't lead but follows messages by political leaders when forming opinions about foreign policy."

ATTORNEY GENERAL ANNOUNCES
CRIME REDUCTION AND PUBLIC SAFETY TASK FORCE

WASHINGTON – Attorney General Jeff Sessions today announced the formation of the U.S. Department of Justice Intra-Agency Task Force on Crime Reduction and Public Safety.

The Task Force was formed pursuant to the President's Executive Order on a Task Force on Crime Reduction and Public Safety and will be chaired by the Deputy Attorney General. Task Force members will be drawn from relevant Department components, and will include the Director of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF), the Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), the Director of the FBI and the Director of the U.S. Marshals Service (USMS).

"The President issued an executive order, and I feel strongly about it," said Attorney General Sessions. "On my first day in office, I called in the heads of the four major law enforcement agencies to discuss this plan. Violent crime is on the rise, and we must always remember that crimes are committed against real people. The creation of this task force is a critical step toward confronting this crisis vigorously, effectively and immediately."

The task force is central to the Attorney General's commitment to combatting illegal immigration and violent crime, such as drug trafficking and gun crimes, and to restoring public safety to all of the nation's communities.

The task force is charged with developing strategies to reduce crime; identifying deficiencies in existing laws that have made them less effective in reducing crime and proposing new legislation to improve public safety and reduce crime; evaluating the availability and adequacy of crime-related data and identifying measures to improve it; and conducting any other relevant studies. In conducting its work, the task force will consult with federal, state, tribal, and local law enforcement, law enforcement organizations and victims' and community advocacy organizations, among others, to learn about successful local efforts and how they can best be supported at the federal level.

In addition, the task force will promote respect for law enforcement – in support of the President's Executive Order on Preventing Violence Against Federal, State, Tribal and Local Law Enforcement Officers – by seeking ways to enhance protection and safety of federal officers and evaluate grants to ensure that they adequately support and protect law enforcement officials and their mission.

[FBI DIRECTOR QUOTE]

"The safety and well-being of our communities and our citizens is a vital part of our mission," said Acting DEA Administrator Chuck Rosenberg. "I look forward to our continued close work on the task force with our law enforcement partners on these crucial issues."

"The men and women of the United States Marshals Service stand ready to work with our federal, state, local and tribal law enforcement partners to remove the underlying criminal element from our communities," said USMS Acting Director David L. Harlow. "In 2016, working with our task force partners, the USMS arrested over 106,000 violent fugitives. We look forward to finding innovative methods to further reduce violent crime across our nation."

"ATF's top priority is reducing violent crime," said ATF Acting Director Thomas Brandon. "Across the nation, ATF focuses its resources on arresting and prosecuting violent criminals who use firearms to terrorize communities. ATF's Crime Gun Intelligence Centers provide timely, actionable leads to our agents and our partner agencies so they can identify, investigate and apprehend trigger-pullers and those who illegally supply them with firearms. ATF looks forward to working with Attorney General Sessions and our federal, state, tribal and local law enforcement counterparts to further enhance our violent crime reduction strategies through the Task Force on Crime Reduction and Public Safety."

LEADING THE NEWS

FBI Rejected Priebus' Request To Contest Stories On Russia Contacts, Sources Say.

CNN (2/23, Sciutto, Perez, Prokupecz, Raju, Brown, 29.79M) reports online that "multiple" anonymous "US officials briefed on the matter" indicated "the FBI rejected a recent White House request to publicly knock down media reports about communications between Donald Trump's associates and Russians known to US intelligence during the 2016 presidential campaign." Sources indicated FBI Director James "Comey rejected the request for the FBI to comment on the stories...because the alleged communications between Trump associates and Russians known to US intelligence are the subject of an ongoing investigation." A White House official commented late Thursday that White House Chief of Staff Reince Priebus made the request only "after the FBI indicated to the White House it did not believe the reporting to be accurate."

USA Today (2/23, Cummings, 5.28M), the AP (2/24, Pace), the Huffington Post (2/23, 237K), the New York Daily News (2/24, Slattery, 4.45M), The Hill (2/23, Bolton, 1.25M), the International Business Times (2/23, Kreiter, 814K), the Daily Beast (2/23, 1.11M), and the New York Post (2/23, Perez, 3.82M) summarize the CNN report.

Jim Sciutto said on CNN's Situation Room (2/23, 554K) that the White House "sought the help of the Bureau and other agencies investigating the Russian matter to say that the reports were wrong and that there had been no contacts." Evan Perez reported on CNN's Situation Room (2/23, 554K) that US law enforcement officials said the White House request began when White House Chief of Staff Reince Priebus met with FBI Deputy Director Andrew McCabe the day after those media reports broke. However, White House officials disputed that account, "saying that McCabe called Priebus that morning" and said a New York Times story on the matter "vastly overstated what the FBI knows about these Russia contacts."

Perez later said on CNN's Situation Room that communication between the White House and the FBI is "unusual because of a decade-old restriction on such contacts." Perez added, "the request from the White House is a violation of those procedures to limit communications with FBI on pending investigations."

Politico (2/23, Lima, 2.46M) says Democrats have "ripped" the White House over the reports. Rep. Andre Carson (D-IN) said on CNN's Situation Room (2/23, 554K), "The fact that the Administration is using its authority to impose on the FBI in a way that is unlawful and unethical, quite frankly, disturbs me." Carson was later asked if the White House contact with the FBI should be investigated, to which he replied, "Without a question. I think it goes along the lines of other questionable acts not only the violation of the emolument clause and other violations and general Flynn speaking to Russian diplomats." Sciutto said on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (2/23, 686K) that the FBI is still investigating the communications between Trump associates and Russian officials, as are the House and Senate Intelligence Committees, according to several members of those panels.

Ignatius: US, Allies Must Resist Russia Influence Efforts Or "Post-West Era" May "Be Next." In his Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) column, David Ignatius says "we may be missing the forest for the trees" in the story about Russia allegedly attempting to influence the US election as the effort "is part of a much bigger tale of Russian covert action" that used Trump's campaign as a "witting" or "unwitting" "tool." Ignatius urges Americans to "pay attention" because "this is how the Russians try to subvert politics – boldly, secretly and often corruptly." Ignatius adds that if the US and its allies "don't resist, a post-West era may indeed be next."

Reilly notes that the FBI has said it is investigating "possible civil rights violations in connection with threats to Jewish Community Centers across the country."

Wildman says "Trump is in denial about the dangers of white supremacists and neo-Nazis," citing Anti-Defamation League (ADL) Co-Director Oren Segal as asserting "not monitoring white supremacists...creates a feeling among Jewish Americans that their concerns are not being taken seriously."

The morning of the bombing, the Animal Liberation Front (ALF) – which has been designated a domestic terrorist organization by the FBI – "claimed responsibility in a press release" that Coronado said he wrote. In 1993, Coronado was indicted "on seven counts, ranging from conspiracy to commit crimes against the United States to malicious destruction and arson." However, "in exchange for pleading guilty for arson" at MSU, charges for "attacks in other states were dropped." The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/23, Habersham, 1.41M) reports that Gibbs had become radicalized online, saying, "Based on his social media profiles, Gibbs had recently become an adherent of the Church of Creativity, a largely internet-based holdover of the defunct Church of the Creator, a white supremacist, deeply anti-Semitic 'religion' that preaches racial warfare." US Attorney John Horn's office "charged Gibbs with one count of possession of a biological agent, a federal charge that carries a prison sentence of up to five years." The article notes the FBI's arrest last week "of Benjamin McDowell in South Carolina after he allegedly bought a gun and ammunition off a federal agent posing as a member of the Aryan Nations."

The article adds, "The FBI flew Abdulmutallab's relatives to the U.S. to speak to him and increase the chances of him opening up about the plot...a technique which proved a success," which Newsweek speculates "is likely to add weight to claims that torture is an unnecessary--and ultimately ineffective--means of extracting information from suspects."

The article cites reports of Administration "plans to rename 'Countering Violent Extremism' (CVE) – a Department of Homeland Security program that funds local terrorism prevention efforts – to 'Countering Islamic Extremism' or 'Countering Radical Islamic Extremism.'" In a discussion about former Gitmo detainee Jamal al-Harith, "who perpetrated a recent suicide bombing in Iraq" for ISIS, Gorka claimed that when President Obama "released lots and lots of people that were there for a very good reason," almost "half the time, they returned to the battlefield." However, "current statistics don't back up Gorka's claim of a re-engagement rate of almost 50%." In addition, while "Gorka suggests that al-Harith was released from Gitmo by Obama," he "was not. Al-Harith was transferred out of Gitmo to Britain on March 9, 2004, under [President George W.] Bush."

Court filings indicate "the FBI set up a phony business in 2009 to 'investigate allegations of public corruption in Pennsylvania'" and "the fake firm hired Estey and a top Harrisburg lobbying firm to help it obtain legislation to benefit its business, and made campaign contributions to further its goals." The undercover agents then "gave Estey $20,000 that he promised he would pass along as campaign contributions in his name, circumventing state laws that ban corporate gifts and the use of lobbyists as 'pass-throughs.'"

Former Comverse CEO Sentenced To 30 Months In Options Backdating Case.

Newsday (NY) (2/23, Riley, 1.3M) reports that Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, "the former CEO of Long Island software firm Comverse Technology who fled to Africa to avoid fraud charges, was sentenced Thursday in Brooklyn federal court to 30 months in prison." Alexander, 64, "an Israeli citizen who founded digital voicemail pioneer Comverse in 1982, returned last year to plead guilty to securities fraud after fleeing to Namibia in 2006 to evade prosecution for backdating stock options and trying to bribe an underling to take the fall. 'I really don't understand how someone as brilliant and accomplished and focused and respected as you could be so incredibly, abjectly foolish as to make some of the decisions you made,' said U.S. District Judge Nicholas Garaufis." Newsday adds that Alexander "claimed in a letter to the judge that he fled out of fear of a draconian sentence for a white-collar crime and fought extradition for a decade because he was 'terrified' by seeing his name on a Most Wanted list with Osama bin Laden."

Reuters (2/23) reports that Alexander's attorneys "had sought a prison term of no more than two years for the Israeli citizen, who has spent six months in custody after Garaufis rejected his request for release on a $25 million bond." Reuters notes that Alexander "is likely to be credited for the time he was held." Reuters adds that "the case was one of the last open U.S. prosecutions arising from government or internal investigations of backdating of stock options at over 200 companies, including Comverse, which was acquired in 2013 by former unit Verint Systems Inc."

CBS News (2/23, 4.4M) reports that in 2006, federal prosecutors "charged Alexander and other Comverse executives with a scheme to manipulate stock options." CBS adds that "the options' grant dates were allegedly falsified to coincide with a low point in the stock's value, thereby boosting the value of the stock option." Alexander "turned up in Namibia after having transferred tens of millions of dollars overseas," and "he lived comfortably there until last year, when he gave up an extradition fight and agreed to plead guilty in the U.S."

Bloomberg News (2/23, Hurtado, 2.41M) reports that "Alexander's decision to flee exacerbated the case and warranted imposing a prison term longer than the 24-month sentence, which to date had been the longest imposed for options backdating, the judge said. 'Corporate executives must know if they commit this type of crime, they will be punished swiftly and appropriately,' Garaufis said. 'They must know they cannot flee the jurisdiction to escape the criminal process, to buy a new life and evade the law.'" The New York Daily News (2/23, Moynihan,

4.45M) and the Wall Street Journal (2/23, Orden, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) also report.

Nevada Public Safety Director Argues For Creation Of Cyber Defense Office.

Nevada Appeal (2/23, Dornan, 86K) reports that on Thursday, Nevada Public Safety Director Jim Wright argued for the "creation of a Cyber Defense Office that would bring together not only public safety agencies but other agency efforts in the war against hacking." According to Wright, "the office would treat cyber attacks in much the same way the Department of Public Services currently treats terrorism, natural disasters and other emergencies." He added that "the office would be located within" the Department of Public Safety, partly because it "has access to the FBI and national criminal information data." Wright said, "Most of these attacks have a criminal background so it's a natural fit for us."

Cyber Experts Warn That "Global Action Must Be Taken" On Cybersecurity Issues.

McClatchy (2/23, 74K) reports that "alarms over the state of the internet appear with greater frequency" due to malware, data theft, and digital weapons wielded by nation-states. McClatchy says, "Once a platform for enlightenment, the internet flirts with a dark age, industry leaders warn, and global action must be taken." McClatchy goes on to discuss Microsoft President Brad Smith's proposal for a "Digital Geneva Convention, an international agreement to protect civilians from the destructive uses by states of the digital sphere," adding, "Whether an international treaty or convention could slow the destructive currents that make the internet increasingly hazardous is subject of intense debate." Former cybersecurity czar J. Michael Daniel "said he worries that some authoritarian nations would distort such an accord" to control content, and "a better first step...would be further agreements of the sort that Obama reached with China's President Xi Jinping...which barred purely commercial hacking between the two nations, but not digital espionage."

Senator Calls For "Retro Approach" To Protecting Power Grid.

McClatchy (2/23, Hotakainen, 74K) reports, "Idaho Republican Sen. Jim Risch says it's time for a retro approach to protect the nation's power grid, relying more on humans and less on sophisticated technology as a way to thwart hackers." Risch "said the U.S. should heed the lesson of the 2015 cyberattack on Ukraine's power grid," namely that more damage was prevented because hackers couldn't gain physical access to all of the power grids' controls as some were manually operated. Risch and fellow Senate intelligence committee member Angus King "want Congress to pass a $10 million bill that would create a two-year pilot program to investigate more low-tech approaches that might frustrate hackers."

Google Cracks SHA-1 Cryptographic Algorithm.

Forbes (2/23, 15.17M) reports that Google "cracked an old cryptographic algorithm called SHA-1," a "significant" occurrence "because SHA-1 has been in use across the web for some time, largely to check the authenticity of digital artefacts flying around the internet." Forbes says Google had SHA-1 create the same hash for two different files, something that "shouldn't be possible." Forbes goes on to explain that the "second file" could be malware or a forgery. Nonetheless, Forbes says, "For some time now, major web companies have downgraded SHA-1 and won't use it to carry out those verification processes." Google "thinks its research should get all companies still using the algorithm to move away from SHA-1, which has long been deemed vulnerable."

A report from Nuix Black "says that more than three-quarters of hackers – 88 percent in total – who responded to the Nuix survey believe most network defenses can be breached within 12 hours." Furthermore, "roughly a third said that their activities were never noticed by their victims – and 17 percent of hackers claimed it would take them no longer than two hours to breach a target."

Business Insider (2/23, 3.42M) reports, "Coast Guard Vice Adm. Marshall Lytle gave the perfect analogy that demonstrates how unique, and difficult it can be, for the US military to operate in the cyber realm." Lytle is quoted saying at the AFCEA West 2017 conference, "Cyberwarfare is like a soccer game with all the fans on the field with you and no one is wearing uniforms." BI adds, "Lytle's remark highlights the 'wild west' nature of the cyberwarfare," and "as Lytle explained, cyberwarfare doesn't have clear battle lines."

House Intelligence Staff Director: 2017 To Be A "Banner Year" For Congressional Cybersecurity Debates.

CyberScoop (2/23) reports House Intelligence Committee staff director Michael Bahar says, "It will be a banner year for cybersecurity debates in Congress – and that isn't necessarily a good thing." According to CyberScoop, "retrospective" efforts to investigate alleged Russian influence on the 2016 US election "are just a portion of the task ahead for lawmakers who handle cybersecurity issues." Bahar is quoted saying in a panel discussion, "For far too many industries, we are in a pre-Enron phase. If you think about Enron, what led to that was board members and senior executives at companies saying it looks fine and if it's an accounting issue, then take it to accounting. And I think that's where we are in many industries for cyber. ... And what I think that means is that a lot of it will be driven by what the courts do. And how Congress will respond to that."

In continuing coverage, eWeek (2/23, 668K) reports the National Association of Secretaries of State "adopted a resolution opposing the 'critical infrastructure' designation by the U.S. Department of Homeland Security." Their reasoning "was partly due to concerns of overreaching by the federal government and because the agency had refused to provide adequate information on the impact that the designation would have on the states, according to Kay Stimson, spokeswoman for the National Association of Secretaries of State (NASS)."

Hacked Texts Suggest Manafort Faced Blackmail Attempt From Ukrainian Official.

Politico (2/23, Vogel, Stern, Meyer, 2.46M) reports "undated communications, which are allegedly from the iPhone of" political consultant Paul Manafort's daughter suggest that Manafort "was the victim of a blackmail attempt while he was serving as Donald Trump's presidential campaign chairman last summer." One text "appears to come from a Ukrainian parliamentarian named Serhiy Leshchenko," in which he attaches "a note to Paul Manafort referring to 'bulletproof' evidence related to Manafort's financial arrangement with Ukraine's former president, the pro-Russian strongman Viktor Yanukovych, as well as an alleged 2012 meeting between Trump and a close Yanukovych associate named Serhiy Tulub." Leshchenko disavowed the texts in question and "Manafort denied brokering a 2012 meeting between Trump and Tulub and also point[e]d out that he wasn't working for Trump at the time." However, Manafort confirmed the authenticity of the texts as coming from his daughter's phone, saying he contacted a lawyer at the time they were received.

The Hill (2/23, Savransky, 1.25M) and Vanity Fair (2/22, Tracy, 6.22M) also cover Politico's report.

Local Leaders Comment On Possible Plans For FBI Expansion At Redstone Arsenal.

A 1,200-word report by Alabama Live (2/23, Gattis, 804K) says the FBI "is considering bringing hundreds, if not thousands, of jobs to Redstone Arsenal in what could possibly be a landmark economic development for Huntsville." Although "the plan exists on paper...it's not clear how close it is to becoming a reality or if the plan, conceived during the Obama administration, will change under President Trump. But some construction is already under way on Redstone." Huntsville/Madison County Chamber of Commerce Senior VP Mike Ward said, "I think the master plan that the FBI discussed at the Redstone Update is still notional and it remains so until the plan is funde[d]. Some parts of the plan have been funded and are being executed. We're hopeful that we will be able to advance this plan to make it a reality." US Rep. Mo Brooks (R-AL) "said he has heard many different estimates on potential jobs that could be associated with the FBI's growth in his hometown." The article notes, "FBI Director James Comey, in a visit to Redstone last year to formally open" the Terrorist Explosive Devices Analytical Center (TEDAC), "described Huntsville as a possible new 'center of gravity' for the bureau."

On its website, WAAY-TV Huntsville, AL (2/23, Martin, 2K) similarly quotes Ward's comments on the possible FBI expansion in Huntsville.

DOJ Reverses Obama Order Phasing Out Private Contractors To Run Prisons.

Reuters (2/23, Beech) and the New York Times (2/23, Lichtblau, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) report the Justice Department has reversed an Obama Administration order that called for the phasing out of using private contractors to run federal prisons. Reuters says that Attorney General Sessions wrote in a memo made public Thursday that former President Obama's policy harmed the government's ability to meet possible needs of the prison system. Sessions said, according to Bloomberg News (2/23, Strohm, 2.41M), "The memorandum changed long-standing policy and practice, and impaired the Bureau's ability to meet the future needs of the federal correctional system." Politico (2/23, Ocasio, 2.46M) reports a Justice Department spokesman indicated that the new memo provides the Federal Bureau Of Prisons with more flexibility. The spokesman said in a statement, "This will restore BOP's flexibility to manage the federal prison inmate population based on capacity needs."

The Washington Post (2/23, Zapotosky, 11.43M) says that while the change is "a significant policy shift" from the Obama Administration, "the practical impact might be somewhat muted." The Post indicates that "most inmates are housed in state prisons, rather than federal ones" and the Obama Administration's decision to no longer use private facilities "only affected 13,000 prisons" that "hous[ed] a little more than 22,000 inmates." The Post adds that the original order "also did not apply to Immigration and Customs Enforcement and US Marshals Service detainees."

Media: Private Prison Sector Supported Trump During Election. Eamon Javers said on CNBC's Closing Bell (2/23, 142K) that the private prison sector has been "very close" to Trump and "saw something they very much liked in Donald Trump's administration." USA Today (2/23, Schouten, 5.28M) reports private prison companies "have contributed big sums to pro-Trump groups" and now "stand to make big gains under President Trump's new immigration orders." USA Today says private prison companies "see the potential for significant growth" with Trump and some GOP lawmakers "pushing to toughen penalties for undocumented immigrants who are deported and then re-enter the country illegally." USA Today highlights that GEO Group donated $250,000 to support Trump's inauguration and a subsidiary of the company gave $225,000 to a super PAC that spent about $22 million to help Trump. CoreCivic provided $250,000 to support Trump's inauguration.

White House Says DOJ Will Crack Down On Recreational Marijuana.

The Washington Times (2/23, Boyer, 272K) reports White House press secretary Sean Spicer indicated Thursday that the Justice Department will increase enforcement of the federal ban on the recreational use of marijuana, and he "compared recreational marijuana loosely with the opioid epidemic." According to McClatchy (2/23, Kumar, Hotakainen, 74K), a 2014 John Hopkins School of Public Health report shows "there's little evidence to connect marijuana to opioid addiction." Washington Gov. Jay Inslee vowed to defend his voters' pro-pot preferences earlier this month, and Nevada Senate Majority Leader Aaron Ford called on the state's attorney general to "vigorously defend" its laws.

The AP (2/23, Gurman) says Spicer's announcement is "a departure from the Trump administration's statements in favor of states' rights." According to the Los Angeles Times (2/23, Halper, McGreevy, 4.52M), the Administration's options for enforcement could range from "largely symbolic gestures" to "filing injunctions seeking to nullify state legalization laws." The Washington Post (2/23, Wagner, Zapotosky, 11.43M) reports pro-cannabis organization and industry leaders' concern with Spicer's statement, with one noting, "Many of the states who helped elect President Trump just voted to also support recreational marijuana."

Media: Trump Calls Deportations "A Military Operation"; Kelly Quickly "Contradicts" Him.

President Trump's comment at a White House meeting of business executives that under his immigration policy, "we're getting really bad dudes out of this country at a rate that nobody's ever seen before" in "a military operation" draws considerable critical media attention, with every major story on the comment stating that DHS Secretary Kelly quickly followed by saying that no military force is being used. While the White House said the President was using the term figuratively, several sources use the contradiction between Trump and Kelly to highlight the difficulties the Administration has had with immigration policy.

ABC World News Tonight (2/23, lead story, 3:40, Muir, 14.63M) reported that the President called his "immigration crackdown...'a military operation' at the border." But "his own Homeland Security secretary had very different words about the operation." ABC's Matt Gutman: "At the White House today, President Trump declaring his new immigration crackdown" a success. Trump: "We're getting really bad dudes out of this country, and at a rate that nobody's ever seen before, and they are the bad ones, and it's a military operation." Gutman: "A military operation? Not according to Homeland Security Secretary John Kelly." Kelly: "No. Repeat, no use of military force in immigration operations. None." The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 2, 1:00, Pelley, 11.17M) said "there was some confusion today on immigration." CBS' Margaret Brennan: "The White House later tried to clarify, saying the President meant 'military operation' as an adjective to describe what they say is an efficient rate of deportation."

NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 4, 1:35, Alexander, 16.61M) reported that Trump was "contradicted quickly" by Kelly, who is in Mexico with Secretary of State Tillerson. USA Today (2/23, Agren, 5.28M) reports that Kelly "addressed an anxious audience of Mexican migrants living in the USA and Mexican officials preparing to receive an influx of deportees." Kelly said, "Everything that we do will be done in a legal way and with respect for human rights and the US justice system." The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Schwartz, Whelan, De Córdoba, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that Kelly also said there would be "no mass deportations." The AP (2/23, Lederman) reports that while Kelly and Tillerson "tried to alleviate Mexico's concerns, Trump was fanning them further," offering "an altogether different message from Kelly and Tillerson, who traveled here to meet with top Mexican officials at a time of intense turbulence for US-Mexico relations."

The Washington Post (2/23, Rucker, 11.43M) says the President "celebrated what he called 'a military operation' to round up and deport undocumented immigrants who have committed crimes or caused violence." The Post says the phrasing "could raise eyebrows among immigrant rights advocates and even within" DHS. The Post says "a leaked DHS proposal last week to deploy Army National Guard troops to help apprehend undocumented immigrants was quickly denied by DHS leadership and the White House as being under consideration."

The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Memoli, 4.52M) writes that while Trump "speaks in terms of unadulterated success" on immigration policy, "few others in the administration go so far," and "a muddled picture has emerged on where the Trump administration is headed. Thursday offered a clear example of the problems that arise when Trump and his top aides send different messages." The Hill (2/23, Fabian, 1.25M) reports that White House press secretary Sean Spicer said Trump

"wasn't speaking literally." Spicer said, "The President was using that as an adjective. It is happening with precision."

The New York Times (2/23, A1, Ahmed, Harris, Nixon, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) writes that Trump "has a penchant for dropping unwelcome surprises during visits between the United States and Mexico. Last month, on the first day of a trip to Washington by Mexico's foreign minister, Mr. Trump signed an executive order to build a wall between the two countries," and earlier this week, just before the trip by the two secretaries, the Administration "released policies that vastly expanded the potential for deportation of undocumented immigrants." The Washington Post (2/23, Olivo, 11.43M) says "the visit by Tillerson and Kelly comes a month after a heated volley of tweets between President Trump and Mexico's president, Enrique Peña Nieto, over who should pay for a wall on the southern US border prompted Peña Nieto to cancel a White House visit."

The Washington Times (2/23, Boyer, 272K) says Trump "praised" DHS efforts "to arrest and deport more illegal immigrants Thursday, calling it 'a military operation' that is getting 'really bad dudes' out of the US." The New York Post (2/23, Halper, 3.82M) also reports that Trump "likened the removal of illegal immigrants in the US to a 'military operation.'" Politico (2/23, Nussbaum, 2.46M) says "the comment was surprising given that ICE and the border patrol are civilian, not military, organizations." Business Insider (2/23, Woody, 3.42M) says the comments "appear to contradict some White House efforts to downplay the scope and scale of his deportation plans."

The TIME (2/23, Beckwith, 6.98M) and Vanity Fair (2/22, Nguyen, 6.22M) websites also highlight the President's use of the term "military operation," while the Washington Times (2/23, Dinan, 272K) and Politico (2/23, McCaskill, 2.46M) have brief items focused on Kelly's remarks.

CBS Fact-Checks Trump's Deportation "Boasting." The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 3, 0:40, Pelley, 11.17M) reported, "The President's boasting go the better of him today. He said the US is deporting drug dealers and gang members 'for the first time.' And as you heard, he said they're being deported at a rate nobody has ever seen before. For the record, our research department spoke to an official at the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency. In January of last year, there were 17,649 deportations. Last month, it was one thousand fewer. And last year, 58 percent had been convicted of serious crimes, such as drug dealing."

The Intercept (2/23, Devereaux) headlines a report "Donald Trump Plans To Bypass The Courts To Deport As Many People As Possible." Tennessee-based immigration attorney Greg Siskind said, "I see now what the plan is. Their plan is basically to have everybody thrown out of the country without ever going to court."

Newsweek Analysis: Trump's Deportation Policies Could Cost "Billions." Newsweek (2/23, Cadei, 862K) under the headline "Trump's Deportation Plans Would Cost Billions" that Trump's "plans to dramatically increase deportations are causing panic in immigrant communities across the country" and are also "likely to add billions of dollars to the tab for Trump's immigration crackdown, on top of the $21 billion that DHS officials have estimated it could cost to build the president's desired wall on the border with Mexico." Last year, Ben Gitis of the "center-right" American Action Forum estimated that it would cost $400 billion to $600 billion to deport all of those in the US illegally within two years. While Trump has not called for that, Newsweek says the additional staffing needs for increased enforcement could cost more than $1.5 billion.

Trump Tweets "Chicago Needs Help" After Seven Homicides On Wednesday.

The Chicago Sun-Times (2/23, Charles, 798K) reports seven homicides occurred in Chicago Wednesday, making it "the deadliest day of 2017 so far," and President Trump responded in a tweet that the situation is "totally out of control. Chicago needs help!" Six people were shot on the South Side and one was killed in Little Village. Among those killed were a young pregnant woman and a sexagenarian. Five of the shootings occurred in a two-hour span. According to the Chicago Tribune (2/23, Williams-Harris, Crepeau, Malagon, 2.54M), at least 495 people have been shot in Chicago so far this year, 60 more people than were shot over the same period a year ago. The Tribune provides details of the seven homicides Wednesday and notes that the West Side experienced the most violence last year. ABC World News Tonight (2/23, story 8, 0:15, Muir, 14.63M) also briefly reported on the story.

Administration Reportedly Broadens Search For Fed Vice Chair For Bank Oversight.

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Tracy, Ackerman, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that people familiar with the matter indicated the Administration has widened its search for the next Fed Vice Chair in charge of bank oversight. The Journal says the Administration is still considering David Nason, an executive in General Electric's financing arm, and met with US Bancorp chief executive Richard Davis and Harvard Law School professor Hal Scott.

CNN: IC Concerned White House Wants Report Tailored To Justify Immigration Order.

Anderson Cooper said on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360  (2/23, 686K) that as the White House works "to provide a factual basis" for Trump's immigration order, there is "pushback of some in the intelligence community who have been given the job of evaluating the evidence information and who are worried that they're being asked to tailor the facts to fit a preordained conclusion." Jake Tapper added that "sources" told CNN's Pamela Brown "that there are those within the Department of Homeland Security who have concerns that intelligence at the department might be becoming politicized." A New York Times (2/23, Qiu, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) analysis examines "some of the more misleading claims Mr. Trump and his administration have made about the first iteration of the travel ban."

Also on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360  (2/23, 686K), Tapper cited a "senior White House official" who said that "the Department of Homeland Security and the Justice Department, quote, 'are working on an intelligence report that will demonstrate that the security threat for these seven countries [covered by President Trump's immigration order] is substantial, and that these seven countries have all been exporters of terrorism into the United States.'" However, "sources tell the CNN" that DHS' Office of Intelligence and Analysis "filed a report that disagrees with the view that blocking immigration from the seven countries strategically make nice sense. Some DHS officials have said they do not think nationality is the best indicator of potential terrorism." Tapper added that when it was asked about the matter, DHS "essentially disparage[d] its own intelligence division's report saying, quote, the Ina report does not include data from other intelligence community sources. It is incomplete."

Rep. Dan Donovan said on CNN's The Lead  (2/23, 320K) that the Administration "looked at the decision by the Ninth Circuit" and is "taking into account where the failures were in the first roll out of the first executive order and trying to make sure that they do the next executive order within the constitutional boundaries."

Illinois, Connecticut Officials Push Back On Trump's Immigration Enforcement Plans.

The Chicago Sun-Times (2/23, Grimm, 798K) reports that President Trump is "not going to get much help from Illinois" with his "ambitious plans to step up immigration enforcement and arrest and deport undocumented people at a record pace." Cook County Sheriff Tom Dart "said he had 'no interest' in devoting his deputies' time to arresting undocumented county residents, and Mayor Rahm Emanuel has consistently said Chicago will remain a 'sanctuary city.'" Meanwhile, state Attorney General Lisa Madigan "said her office is looking into ways to offer legal backup to smaller towns that want to continue their resistance to immigration laws," and Gov. Bruce Rauner "said he had no plans to deputize the Illinois State Police to enforce immigration laws."

The Washington Times (2/23, Ernst, 272K) says a memo to Chicago Public Schools principals from Chicago Chief Education Officer Janice Jackson "positioned CPS as a roadblock to ICE's mission to enforce federal laws governing border control, customs, trade and immigration." The memo, which was issued Tuesday, reads, "To be very clear, CPS does not provide assistance to US Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) in the enforcement of federal civil immigration law. ... Therefore, ICE should not be permitted access to CPS facilities or personnel except in the rare instance in which we are provided with a criminal warrant."

Connecticut Gov. Dannel Malloy was asked on Fox News Tucker Carlson Tonight  (2/23) about his order to state law enforcement not to enforce federal immigration law. Malloy said, "There are federal laws that the federal authorities should enforce and there are state laws that the state authorities should enforce. We want the bad guys off the street, we want bad guys sent home. That's not the disagreement. The disagreement is the President can't order us to do federal work. Quite frankly, the federal government should do its own job and get it done. We are not standing in the way of that happening."

Clarke: Charge Sanctuary City Officials With Harboring Aliens. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (2/23, Glauber, 513K) reports that during a panel discussion at the Conservative Political Action Caucus Thursday, Milwaukee County Sheriff David A. Clarke Jr. said "he has a way to put a stop to sanctuary cities – use a federal statute to charge local officials for harboring aliens." Said Clarke, "I'm telling you right now folks, you charge one mayor, one governor, one council president that adopts these laws, this stuff is going to end right away." Clarke argued that sanctuary cities "provide cover" for "criminal illegal aliens to continue to prey on not only law-abiding people but also illegal immigrants in this country."

Taub, Fisher: Proposed Deportation Rules Risk Creating "Fragmented" Society. In the New York Times (2/23, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), Amanda Taub and Max Fisher say the Administration's proposed deportation rules "risk creating an American underclass with parallels to others around the world," such as "slum residents in India, guest workers in oil-rich Persian Gulf states and internal migrant workers in China." The groups, Taub and Fisher say, "provide a cautionary tale for what could happen" if illegal immigrants "are forced deep into the shadows." The authors say that the undocumented immigrants are "stuck in a gray zone outside the legal system," making them "vulnerable to exploitation, including wage theft and sex trafficking." Taub and Fisher say the end result could be "a fragmented" society, rather than the "cohesive society" that the Administration seeks.

Deportation Plan Dominates US Officials' Visit To Mexico.

Bloomberg Politics (2/23, Cattan, 201K) reports Secretary of State Tillerson and DHS Secretary Kelly "wanted to focus on a range of bilateral issues, including trade, in a meeting with their Mexican counterparts" on Thursday in Mexico City, but instead "immigration concerns dominated" the meeting. In its lead story, ABC World News Tonight  (2/23, lead story, 3:40, Muir, 14.63M) reported Tillerson and Kelly arrived in Mexico at a time when that country is "furious with the Administration's new plan to deport some undocumented immigrants to Mexico, even if they are not Mexican." On CNN's Situation Room  (2/23, 554K), Elise Labott said "the Mexicans do seem to be caught off guard. Normally, you have the White House rolling out a policy several days before the visit. There is time for dust to clear and the aides to set the meetings." Nevertheless, Tillerson "called the talks productive."

NBC Nightly News  (2/23, story 4, 1:35, Alexander, 16.61M) reported that prior to their arrival, demonstrators set fire to a fake wall, and "many were demanding that the Mexican president refuse to meet with" the two US officials. Tillerson tried "to translate [Trump's] tough talk into diplomacy," saying, "Two strong sovereign countries from time to time will have differences."

Reuters (2/23, Alper, Torres) reports Mexican officials expressed "worry and irritation" about Trump's policies during talks with Tillerson and Kelly, "giving a chilly reply to the new administration's hard line on immigration, trade and security." Foreign Minister Luis Videgaray told reporters, "There exists among Mexicans worry and irritation about what are perceived to be policies that could be harmful for the national interest and for Mexicans here and abroad." The Washington Times (2/23, Dinan, 272K) says Mexican officials "scolded their American counterparts," using the meeting to "register their displeasure and demand that the US not increase the number of people deported to Mexico." The New York Post (2/23, Moore, 3.82M) says Videgaray also expressed "concerns" about "the rights of Mexicans living in the US."

According to the Los Angeles Times (2/23, McDonnell, 4.52M), Videgaray told lawmakers "in private comments" on Wednesday that Mexico is preparing for a long "battle" with the Trump Administration, and is "prepared to retaliate with new tariffs if necessary." He is quoted as saying, "We are here preparing for a battle that is going to be long. This is not going to be resolved in three days."

In his "Talking Points Memo" segment on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor  (2/23, 767K), Bill O'Reilly said, "It's entirely Mexico's fault that millions of their own citizens feel they have to come here to earn a decent living. ... Mexico should take full responsibility for its inability to provide a decent economy for its own people and for failing to defeat the vicious drug peddling monsters. But they never will."

DeVos: Obama's Transgender Bathroom Guidance Was An "Overreach."

A day after the Trump Administration rescinded the Obama Administration transgender bathroom guidance, Education Secretary DeVos on Thursday told the Conservative Political Action Conference that the previous Administration's rules were "an overreach," USA Today (2/23, Estepa, 5.28M) reports. DeVos said, according to the Washington Times (2/23, Sherfinski, 272K), "Let me just say that this issue was a very huge example of the Obama administration's overreach to suggest a one-size-fits-all federal government approach, top-down approach to issues that are best dealt with and solved [at] a personal level and a local level."

The New York Times (2/23, Pérez-Peña, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that before the decision was announced, DeVos "met with a representative of gay and transgender employees at the Education Department to warn of what was coming." While an aide "assured the employee that, as was widely reported, Ms. DeVos had resisted the move, according to people briefed on the Wednesday meeting," DeVos "gave no public sign that there had been a rift within the Trump administration, or that she had come up short." However, "people who have known and watched Ms. DeVos through the years...warn against thinking that she will be a meek team player." In her home state of Michigan, DeVos "earned a reputation as a driven, relentless and effective political fighter, using her family's vast fortune to reward allies and punish foes, and working behind the scenes to pass legislation and unseat lawmakers who opposed her."

ABC World News Tonight  (2/23, story 4, 0:40, Muir, 14.63M) reported that White House press secretary Sean Spicer said Thursday that "it's not a matter for the federal government to decide." Spicer: "I think it's not a question of whether it's a civil right, it's where it's appropriately addressed. And as I noted, it's appropriately addressed at the state level." The Washington Post (2/23, Brown, Balingit, 11.43M) says that in the wake of the Administration rescinding the guidance, "school officials from New York to Washington to Tulsa, Okla., moved quickly this week to assure their communities that they would continue to allow students to use bathrooms aligned with their gender identity." Meanwhile, other districts never complied with the guidelines and do not intend to do so now. The result is "a patchwork of policies on transgender student accommodations that varies widely across the country."

The Washington Times (2/23, Richardson, 272K) reports that in an indication of "how states might proceed" now that Trump has rescinded the order, the National Conference of State Legislatures says lawmakers in 12 states "are considering bills that would require transgender people to use bathroom and locker room facilities based on their 'biological sex' or birth gender." Matt Sharp, legal counsel for the Alliance Defending Freedom, said, "I think [the repeal is] going to give states the motivation to start considering laws creating a baseline of privacy for all students...and really bring this issue back to where it belongs, which is in the states and local schools that know their students best." In that same vein, the Los Angeles Times (2/23, Lee, 4.52M) says the Administration's step "has buoyed the hopes of supporters of so-called bathroom bills, but they still face opposition in many states, even conservative ones."

The Administration move is prompting criticism from several fronts. Bloomberg News (2/23, Hagan, 2.41M) says it has "provoked one more outcry from Silicon Valley." Tech firms including Apple, Facebook and Microsoft "released statements and tweets following the administration's announcement."

In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M), former Education Secretary Arne Duncan and former Assistant Education Secretary Catherine Lhamon write that the Administration decision "reflects a fundamental misunderstanding of the federal role in protecting the civil rights of students," confuses "states and school districts, and puts real, live children at greater risk of harm." They add that while the federal government "rightly defers to states and school districts" on "issues such as standards and curriculum," when "it comes to protecting students, the law is clear: Civil rights are paramount."

In an editorial, the New York Times (2/23, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) cites Trump's campaign promise "to protect lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender Americans from violence and oppression," and says it is not surprising he has sided with Attorney General Sessions on rescinding the transgender bathroom guidance, because "has demonstrated time and again that his stated personal convictions are malleable." A Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) editorial also criticizes the decision, saying that while Trump once "seemed able to see through this hysteria, expressing support for the rights of transgender people to 'use the bathroom that they feel is appropriate' and saying Caitlyn Jenner was welcome to use whatever bathroom at Trump Tower she wanted," his endorsement of "the rollback of protections will inflict needless suffering on transgender students, a vulnerable population already subjected to harassment and bullying."

Decision Will Impact Supreme Court Case. USA Today (2/23, Wolf, 5.28M) reports that the Administration decision "could remove the controversial issue from the Supreme Court's docket this spring – or lead the justices to render an even more significant ruling." Next month, the Court is sent to hear Virginia high school student's legal fight to use the bathroom of his choice. However, a Federal appeals court in Richmond relied on the guidance last year "in ruling that Gavin Grimm should be permitted to use the boys' bathroom at his Gloucester County school, and the school district promptly appealed to the Supreme Court." The removal of that policy means the High Court can "vacate that decision and send the case back, or decide on their own which bathrooms are suitable under a 1972 federal law prohibiting sex discrimination." On Thursday, the Court "gave lawyers on both sides six days to submit their views on how best to proceed."

In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/23, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), Ria Tabacco Mar, a staff lawyer for the ACLU's Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender and H.I.V. Project, argues that "the president and his executive agencies cannot change what Title IX says and means. Those jobs still belong to Congress and the federal courts." The Grimm case, Mar adds, "could neutralize the Trump administration's cruel blow to vulnerable transgender youth."

Report: One In 137 Teens Would Identify As Transgender. The New York Times (2/23, Chokshi, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that "an analysis of state and federal data" shows that "nearly 150,000 American teenagers from 13 to 17 years old – or one out of every 137 – would identify as transgender if survey takers asked." The Times says the estimate, which was published in a report from Jody L. Herman, a scholar of public policy at the Williams Institute at the UCLA School of Law, and several co-authors, "stands to inform the fierce debate over the rights of transgender youth."

Trump, Trudeau Discuss Border Cooperation.

Reuters (2/23, Ljunggren) reports Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and President Trump on Thursday "discussed cooperation along the countries' shared border," Trudeau's office said in a statement without providing further details. Reuters notes that "dozens of asylum seekers, worried about Trump's plans for cracking down on immigration, have been crossing into Canada in recent weeks, putting a strain on border communities."

Southwest States May Hinder Trump's Border Wall.

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Frosch, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) highlights efforts in Southwestern US states to hinder President Trump's efforts to build a wall along the US border with Mexico including legislation from New Mexico Democratic state lawmakers to prohibit the Federal government from acquiring the land to build the wall and California Lt. Gov. Gavin Newsom's discussion of using state and federal environmental laws to hinder stymie construction.

Salvadoran Woman Awaiting Emergency Surgery "Forcibly Moved" To Detention Facility. The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Demick, 4.52M) reports that ICE agents "forcibly moved" Sara Beltran-Hernandez, "a critically ill woman from El Salvador who was awaiting emergency surgery for a brain tumor" from a Texas hospital to a detention center, "raising concerns about President Trump's directive to more aggressively pursue people living in the country illegally." Beltran-Hernandez "was bound by her hands and feet and removed by wheelchair from Huguley Hospital in Fort Worth late Wednesday" and taken to "a detention facility in Alvarado, Texas." Attorneys representing the woman in an asylum petition "said they plan to file an emergency appeal in Texas to get their client returned to the hospital."

CBP Agents Ask For Flight Passengers' IDs In Search For Undocumented Immigrant. The Washington Post (2/23, Lowery, 11.43M) reports that US Customs and Border

Protection "confirmed" on Thursday "that their agents requested to see the identification of domestic flight passengers landing at a New York airport Wednesday night as they searched for an undocumented immigrant who had received a deportation order to leave the United States." The agency said two CBP agents "asked passengers who had been on Delta Flight 1583 from San Francisco to show their identification while deplaning after landing at John F. Kennedy Airport at about 8 p.m. Wednesday." The search "was conducted at the request of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, CBP said in a statement, but the person they were seeking was not on the flight." A CBP spokesperson "said that the undocumented individual, who they did not publicly identify, received a deportation order after multiple criminal convictions for domestic assault, driving while impaired, and violating a protective order."

Pew Poll Gauges How Hispanic Immigrants See Their Place In US. The AP (2/23, Holland) reports that a Pew Research Center survey taken in December and January and released Thursday found that "more than half of Hispanic immigrants who were neither born in the United States nor have a permanent resident card said they were concerned about their place in the United States, even before the Trump administration made clear its intentions to aggressively crack down on illegal immigration." According to the survey, "55 percent of Hispanics surveyed who were foreign born and neither US citizens nor legal residents – a group Pew said was the most likely to be in the country without authorization – said they had serious concerns about their place in America after President Donald Trump's election." Among "Hispanic lawful permanent residents," 49 percent had the same concerns. Meanwhile, 59 percent of US-born Hispanics "said they were confident about their place in America, along with 60 percent of those US citizens who were foreign-born."

Former SOCOM Commander: Trump's Comments About Media A Threat To Democracy.

The Washington Times (2/23, Ernst, 272K) reports Ret. Adm. William McRaven, the former head of Special Operations Command, said Tuesday that he views President Trump's comments about the media as possibly "the greatest threat to democracy" in his lifetime. The current University of Texas system chancellor told members of the school's communication college that efforts to characterize the media as an "enemy" must be challenged. The Daily Texan quoted McRaven as saying, "We must challenge this statement and this sentiment that the news media is the enemy of the American people."

Ginsburg Says Reporters "Trying" To Tell "Truth," Praises Women's March. The AP (2/23, Hananel) reports Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg told BBC's "Newsnight" in a Thursday interview that she reads the Washington Post and the New York Times daily and "reporters are trying to tell the public the truth." While Ginsburg did not comment on President Trump directly, the AP says, the Justice "said she was encouraged" by the women's march in Washington. Ginsburg said, "I've never seen such a demonstration, both the numbers and the rapport of the people in that crowd." She added, "There was no violence, it was orderly. So yes, we are not experiencing the best times, but there is reason to hope that we will see a better day."

O'Keefe Offering $10,000 For Evidence Of Wrongdoing By Media.

The Washington Times (2/23, Richardson, 272K) reports "conservative sleuth" James O'Keefe "is ramping up his effort to take down the mainstream media" by asking "ordinary citizens to go undercover and expose wrongdoing in newsrooms" across the US. O'Keefe said he will award $10,000 to any person who provides evidence of "corruption, malfeasance and wrongdoing" in the press. O'Keefe said in a video, "If you have hidden audio recordings, videotapes or documents inside of a newsroom or media institution, and the material is good enough, I will pay you $10,000."

Strassel: Conflict Over Pentagon Staff Hurting Efforts To Improve Pentagon.

In her Wall Street Journal (2/23, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) column, Kimberley Strassel says conflict between the White House and Defense Secretary Mattis over who to appoint for senior level Pentagon positions risks leaving Mattis without the necessary staff to carry out needed changes for the military. Strassel argues that while Mattis' desire not to consider politics when choosing his staff has merit, the positions ultimately report to the President and carry out his vision.

WPost: World Leaders Should Treat Public Health Issues Like National Security Threats.

In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) says that Bill Gates' address at the Munich Security Conference Saturday "should have caught everyone's attention" because he said world leaders should equate the urgency of public health issues with the urgency of national security threats. While it may be impossible to anticipate the next "fast-moving [wave] of peril," Gates argued that more support should go toward research on speeding up vaccine development with genomics and more time and resources should be spent on surveillance to identify the outbreak of diseases before epidemics spread. A third priority should be exercises and training "the way the military prepares for war," said Gates.

Republicans Expected To Use Congressional Review Act To Repeal Obama Agency Rules.

Roll Call (2/23, Mejdrich, 63K) reports that congressional Republicans "are expected to send a stream of bills...to President Donald Trump's desk, using a process to repeal agency rules known as the Congressional Review Act," which "allows Congress to repeal certain rules of the previous administration under a fast-track process that requires only a simple majority in the Senate." The Act also "states that a rule 'may not be reissued in substantially the same form, and a new rule that is substantially the same as such a rule may not be issued, unless the reissued or new rule is specifically authorized by a law enacted after the date of the joint resolution disapproving the original rule.'"

Bannon Rips Media, Vows Trump Will Push Forward With Agenda.

Coverage of the joint appearance Thursday by Chief Strategist Steve Bannon and Chief of Staff Priebus at the annual Conservative Political Action Conference – which included reports on all three major network newscasts – focuses heavily on two themes: First, Bannon's excoriation of the media and his vow that President Trump is committed to following through on his campaign promises; and second, Bannon and Priebus seeking to put to rest reports of a rift between the two men.

In the lead story for the CBS Evening News (2/23, lead story, 2:55, Pelley, 11.17M), Margaret Brennan reported that Bannon, making "a rare appearance," portrayed "himself as a revolutionary." Bannon was shown saying, "There's a new political order that's being formed out of this, and it's still being formed. But if you look at the wide degree of opinions in this room, whether you're a populist, whether you're a limited-government conservative, whether you're a libertarian, whether you're an economic nationalist, we have wide and sometimes divergent opinions. We are a nation with a culture and a reason for being. And I think that's what unites us." Brennan added, "Bannon, a former Goldman Sachs banker who previously ran conservative website Breitbart, repeatedly attacked the media, which he referred to as 'the opposition party.'"

On ABC World News Tonight (2/23, story 3, 1:25, Karl, 14.63M), Jonathan Karl reported that in "rare public comments," Bannon, "dubbed 'the Great Manipulator' by the TIME magazine" and who "may be the President's most powerful and controversial aide," said that President Trump "won't moderate his views and won't back down from an all-out battle with his opponents." Referring to the media, Bannon was shown showing, "If you think they are going to give you your country back without a fight, you are sadly mistaken. Every day, every day it is going to be a fight."

On NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 2, 2:30, Holt, 16.61M), Lester Holt reported that Bannon made "a rare public appearance." NBC's Hallie Jackson added, "Stepping out of shadows of the West Wing, one of the President's most trusted advisers in a rare public appearance." Jackson described the "controversial" Bannon as "the power behind the populist brand that propelled Donald Trump to victory."

The New York Times (2/23, Peters, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that when Bannon on Thursday "appeared in public...for the first time since the president was sworn in, it was to deliver, in his own combative way, a message of soothing reassurance to the conservative activists" at CPAC. Bannon told the crowd "not [to] believe the 'corporatist globalist media' that was 'crying and weeping' on election night and is still 'dead wrong' about what the Trump administration is doing. Inside the White House, Mr. Bannon said, everything is going according to plan. The 'deconstruction of the administrative state' has just begun."

The Washington Times (2/23, Sherfinski, 272K) reports that Bannon and Priebus "assured conservatives" that Trump "will keep pressing on 'all of those promises' that got him elected, rejected reports of chaos within the White House and accused a hostile press of trying to undermine the new administration." The Times adds, "The joint appearance of" the pair "seemed designed to combat reports of discord within the White House – a characterization Mr. Priebus called 'ridiculous' and Mr. Bannon called 'dead wrong.'"

The Washington Post (2/23, Rucker, Costa, 11.43M), describing Bannon as "the reclusive mastermind behind...Trump's nationalist ideology and combative tactics," reports that Bannon delivered "a fiery rebuke of the media and [declared] that the new administration is in an unending battle for 'deconstruction of the administrative state,'" by which he meant "the system of taxes, regulations and trade pacts that the president says have stymied economic growth and infringed upon US sovereignty."

Breitbart (2/23, Spiering, 2.02M) reports that the crowd "applauded and cheered when Bannon spoke of the deconstruction of the administrative state, cutting cabinet agency regulations that were choking business growth. 'The way the progressive left runs is that if they can't get it passed, they're just going to put it in some sort of regulation in an agency,' he said. 'That's all going to be deconstructed.'"

The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Bierman, 4.52M) reports that during "a rare public appearance together," Bannon and Priebus "agreed on one common enemy: the media." The Times says Priebus, "who is often described as 'embattled,' said he has grown 'conditioned' to the media counting Trump out: during the presidential campaign, the transition and the first month of the presidency. 'The biggest misconception is everything that you're reading,' Priebus said." Bannon, meanwhile, "consistently called the media 'the opposition party.'"

Reuters (2/23, Cowan, Sullivan) reports that Bannon, making "a rare public appearance," urged "conservatives to unite behind [Trump] as he presses his agenda." Bannon told "the gathering, 'We want you to have our back' in upcoming battles, and [denounced] media criticism of Trump."

The Huffington Post (2/23, Bobic, 237K) reports that Bannon "denounced the 'corporatist, globalist media' for being 'adamantly opposed to an economic nationalist agenda'" being pushed by Trump. Bannon "repeated a reference to the media as the 'opposition party,' and bashed it for being 'always wrong' about the workings of the administration." Priebus concurred with the assessment, "adding that he hoped the relationship between the press and the White House would improve. 'It's going to get worse,' Bannon said."

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Bender, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that Bannon pledged that Trump's budget proposal would make good on the President's campaign vows. Said Bannon, "We have a team that's just grinding it through on what President Donald Trump promised the American people. And the mainstream media better understand something – all those promises are going to be implemented." The Washington Times (2/23, Ernst, 272K) quotes Bannon as saying of Trump, "He's laid out an agenda with those speeches, with the promises he made, and our job everyday is just to execute on that." Bannon added, "And he's maniacally focused on that."

Bannon, Priebus Dispute Reports That They Are At Odds With Each Other. The Hill (2/23, Kamisar, 1.25M) reported that while Bannon was "portrayed by 'Saturday Night Live' as the Grim Reaper" and "on the cover of Time magazine as 'the great manipulator,'" during Thursday's "rare public appearance," he "presented a softer image." The Hill added that Bannon "was relaxed and smiling on the convention hall stage next to a chipper Priebus," as the pair "sought to temper Bannon's public image and rebut reports of discord between the administration's top two advisers."

USA Today (2/23, Jackson, 5.28M) says that both men "disputed media reports casting them as rivals in Trump's political court, and each said they are working together to advance the president's ambitious agenda." USA Today adds, "Moderator Matt Schlapp – chairman of the American Conservative Union, which sponsors CPAC – seemed amused by the Bannon/Priebus pleasantries, saying at one point, 'you guys have been so kumbayah.'"

McClatchy (2/23, Glueck, 74K) reports, "Despite several weeks of often-rough headlines for the administration and rampant chatter about tensions between Bannon and Priebus, the two men sought to project unity." Said Priebus, "In regard to us two, the biggest misconception is everything you're reading," adding, "We share an office suite together, we're basically together from 6:30 in the morning until about 11:00 at night."

Law Professors File Misconduct Complaint Against Conway.

The Washington Post (2/23, Horwitz, 11.43M) reports that a group of law professors has filed a misconduct complaint against Conway, "who was admitted to the D.C. Bar in 1995." The letter, from 15 professors who specialize in legal ethics, "said Conway should be sanctioned for violating government ethics rules and 'conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation.'" The professors "cite several incidents, including a television interview in which Conway made the 'false statement that President Barack Obama had 'banned' Iraqi refugees from coming into the United States for six months'" after the "Bowling Green Massacre," as well as "the use of her position to endorse Ivanka Trump products." They argue that while Conway once "understood her ethical responsibilities as a lawyer and abided by them." She "is currently acting in a way that brings shame upon the legal profession."

Spencer Asked To Leave CPAC.

The Washington Times (2/23, Sherfinski, 272K) reports that "ethno-nationalist 'alt-right' movement" leader Richard Spencer "was booted from the Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC) on Thursday." American Conservative Union spokesman Ian Walters said, "He's not welcome here." Spencer posted a video online in which he "said he was 'expelled' from the event and had been 'politely asked to leave.'"

The Washington Post (2/23, Weigel, 11.43M) says that in his speech to the conference, ACU executive director Dan Schneider "challenged the media to stop referring to the 'alt-right,'...as conservative." Schneider said, "There is a sinister organization that is trying to warp its way into our ranks. ... We must not be deceived by [a] hateful, left-wing fascist group." He continued, "They hate the Constitution. They hate free markets. They hate pluralism. ... Fascists tend to want big government control."

Chamber of Commerce: Trump Should Halt, Evaluate Fiduciary Rule.

US Chamber of Commerce Center for Capital Markets Competitiveness President and CEO David Hirschmann and Randel Johnson, the chamber's senior vice president of labor, immigration and employee benefits, write in a USA Today (2/23, 5.28M) op-ed that President Trump's request to review the Labor Department's "well-intentioned, but poorly designed, fiduciary rule" is "a necessary first step in halting the rule's implementation and calling for an evaluation of its true impact." Hirschmann and Johnson say the rule's "rushed compliance period, severe consequences and compliance burdens" hinder small businesses' retirement plan offerings, and its flawed enforcement mechanism will lead to "frivolous lawsuits."

USA Today: Existing "Commonsense" Fiduciary Rule "Should Not Even Be Controversial." In an editorial, USA Today (2/23, 5.28M) argues the fiduciary rule the Administration has put under review is "not an onerous regulation," but rather a "commonsense rule" that "should not even be controversial." The fiduciary rule is a "simple measure that is needed to boost savings rates," and its end "will simply make brokerages richer at the expense of unsophisticated savers," says USA Today.

Stocks "Wobbled" As Dow Rises For 10th Straight Day.

The AP (2/23) reports that stocks "wobbled Thursday as investors changed course and tempered their expectations for faster economic growth." The Dow added 34.72 points to close at 20,810.32 and the S&P 500 rose 0.99 points to finish at 2,363.81, while the Nasdaq ended the day 25.12 points lower at 5,835.51. USA Today (2/23, Shell, 5.28M) says Thursday was the first time in nearly four years that the Dow "finish[ed] higher 10 consecutive trading days."

Scott Pelley said on the CBS Evening News  (2/23, story 5, 1:40, Pelley, 11.17M) that

"many people" are referring to it as "the Trump Rally." Jim Axelrod added that "industrial companies are expecting an increase in infrastructure spending as we saw today when the President met with manufacturing executives to discuss jobs." The President "has signaled he will push for an infrastructure spending bill, and, of course, everyone likes the signals on corporate tax reforms and regulation rollbacks." Early Thursday evening, Trump tweeted a Fox Business story headlined, "S&P 500 Edges Higher After Trump Renews Jobs Pledge." As 11:30 p.m., the post had been retweeted more than 6,000 times and liked more than 32,000 times.

A separate USA Today (2/23, Shell, 5.28M) analysis says that while "optimism is on the rise as investors cheer better economic numbers and stronger corporate profits," Lamar Villere, co-manager of the Villere Balanced Fund, warned, "The first time one of Trump's major economic policy platforms gets shut down by Congress, you might get the market to say, 'Hmm, maybe this won't happen.' The market could start to get shaky. ... You could have a pullback, as it would remove one of the main reasons for the rally." USA Today goes on to list other factors "that could roil the market."

State Department Says Press Briefings Will Resume "Soon."

The Washington Times (2/23, Taylor, 272K) reports the State Department is "pushing back against criticism from former senior officials and journalists over the lack of press conferences and other media access" at the department since Secretary of State Tillerson was sworn in three weeks ago. "The Department of State continues to provide members of the media a full suite of services," acting spokesman Mark Toner said, asserting that the department had "answered 174 questions from reporters in the [US] and around the globe in the past 24 hours alone." Toner also said "regular press briefings" will resume "soon" as officials explore ways to try and open them digitally to a wider group of reporters.

Under Fire At Town Halls, Republicans Hedge Their Support For Trump Agenda.

The Washington Post (2/23, Weigel, 11.43M) reports that town halls being held this week during the congressional recess "have repeatedly found Republicans hedging their support for" President Trump's "agenda – and in many cases contradicting their own past statements. Hostile questions put them on record criticizing some of the fights...Trump has picked, or pledging to protect policies such as the more popular elements of Obamacare. And voters got it all on tape, promising to keep hounding their lawmakers if they falter." As one example, the Post says that Sen. Chuck Grassley, asked during a town hall whether he backs an investigation of "Trump's tax returns," offered "a qualified 'yes.'"

On the CBS Evening News (2/23, story 4, 2:15, Pelley, 11.17M), Scott Pelley reported, "Congressional Republicans are getting an earful in their town hall meetings." CBS' Nancy Cordes added, "The question for Republicans this week: How strongly to defend the President. ... When they're already dealing with Democratic anger over plans to repeal Obamacare."

Politico: Republicans Divided On Whether Paid Protesters Behind Raucous Town Halls. Politico (2/23, Nelson, 2.46M) reported, "A rift has opened up among Republicans over whether paid protesters are the root cause of raucous town halls, with the White House fueling the narrative that organized, disruptive sympathizers of Hillary Clinton are the culprits." Politico said GOP lawmakers "have taken different stances in the debate." For example, Grassley has argued "there's no 'evidence' that paid protesters are disguising themselves as angry constituents." However, "others have adopted a stance more in line with the White House's," with Rep. Jason Chaffetz, for instance, contending "that Democrats were 'bullying' in a 'concerted effort' to create chaos."

Under the headline "Takeaways From A Week Of Raucous Town Halls," Politico (2/23, Cheney, 2.46M) reported, "Some Republicans – including White House aides – have complained that the protests popping up at town halls have been orchestrated by liberal activists, perhaps by paying out-of-district residents to pack GOP events. But lawmakers who showed up weren't so sure they were facing an artificial resistance."

In another report, Politico (2/23, Nelson, 2.46M) said that Counselor to the president Kellyanne Conway, appearing Thursday on Fox News, "dismissed the angry crowds that have filled town hall meetings hosted by GOP lawmakers across the country as little more than the venting of frustration by a directionless Democratic Party." Said Conway, "Some people are upset with an election result they didn't see coming. And the fact that this president, a man of action and impact is actually keeping his promises at very fast clip early in his administration."

WSJournal: Many At GOP Town Halls New To Political Activism. Under the headline "America's Rowdy Town Halls: More Organic Than Organized," the Wall Street Journal (2/23, Tau, Andrews, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that the White House and leading Republicans have for the most part contended the angry crowds showing up at GOP town halls are the product of professional organizers and activists who are being paid. However, the Journal says interviews it conducted, both with attendees of a town hall held this week by Rep. Leonard Lance and audience members at similar events across the US, found that a number of those people had never taken part in a town hall or political activism of any sort.

Sen. Bernie Sanders said on CNN's Out Front (2/23, 409K), "If you don't have the guts to face your constituents, you shouldn't be in the United States Congress. If you need police at the meetings, that's fine, have police at the meetings, have security at the meetings. But don't use that as an excuse to run away from your constituents after you support repealing the Affordable Care Act, doing away with pre-existing conditions. If you're going to do all those things, answer the questions your constituents have."

Meanwhile, a number of reports on the topic focus on various GOP lawmakers across the country. CNN (2/22, Williams, Murphy, 29.79M) reported on its website, "After testy town halls" held by Republican lawmakers such as Chaffetz and Grassley "went viral, some GOP politicians are staying clear of town hall-style events in their home districts." In response, "constituents have turned to some creative ways to voice their displeasure." For example, referring to Rep. Paul Cook, CNN said, "Missing congressman notices have been photographed on milk cartons and posted to the @WhereIsPaulCook Twitter account and website."

The AP (2/23) reports that Rep. Martha McSally "held a town hall-style meeting in Sahuarita," taking "questions from a loud but largely non-confrontational audience Thursday at a church that seats about 300. Organizers of a competing town hall in Tucson had repeatedly invited McSally, but she refused to attend that event," saying "activists wanted an opportunity to verbally berate members of Congress in a public setting and" calling "the attempt a 'political ambush for political theater.'" On its website, CNN (2/23, Fox, 29.79M) reported that McSally "broke with her party and President Donald Trump on a handful of occasions and yet failed to assuage the progressives in the audience who screamed at her to 'answer the question.'"

In another dispatch, the AP (2/23) reports, "A sometimes hostile crowd peppered" Rep. David Young on Thursday "with questions about the Affordable Care Act, environment and other issues at a public forum in Urbandale." The AP says an audience member asked Young "if health care would remain affordable for his 1-year-old son, who was born with a serious health problem. The crowd jeered Young as he sidestepped giving 'a definite answer' but said the boy wouldn't be denied care."

Study: Anti-Muslim, Anti-Immigrant Hate Groups Thrive On Twitter.

USA Today (2/23, Eversley, 5.28M) reports a study released this week by the community security research organization Safe Home this week shows hate groups targeting Muslims and immigrants had the largest number of followers on Twitter, and the number of likes and comments on hate group tweets was higher in 2016 than any year since 2008. Geographically, the Southern states of Arkansas, Mississippi, and Tennessee are home to the highest number of hate groups per capita, with South Dakota and Montana not far behind.

WSJournal: Gorsuch Confirmation Will Buttress Second Amendment Rights.

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) editorializes that the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals' ruling this week upholding Maryland's ban on military-style weapons underscores the importance of confirming Judge Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court, arguing that with Gorsuch on the court, a new majority will soon be in place to reinforce the court's ruling in DC v. Heller, in which it upheld the individual right to bear arms.

WPost: Bowser's Experienced Police Chief Choice Newsham "Makes Sense."

The Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) editorializes that Mayor Muriel Bowser's Thursday announcement that Peter Newsham will succeed Cathy Lanier as D.C. police chief, pending D.C. Council approval, "makes sense" for his help "transforming the department into a model agency." Noting his 28-year commitment to the D.C. force, the Post says he worked closely with police chiefs in the reform and professionalization of the force that has led to "a declining crime rate, the pioneering use of data and a department held out as a national example of how to make community policing work." The Post estimates that Newsham will survive inquiry into the "blemishes on his record" because he has learned lessons that put "him in good stead" to fulfill police chief responsibilities.

Arkansas Supreme Court Strikes Down City's LGBT Protections.

The AP (2/23, DeMillo) reports from Little Rock, AR that the Arkansas Supreme Court on Thursday "struck down a city's ordinance banning discrimination based on a person's sexual orientation or gender identity, but it stopped short of saying whether a state law aimed at prohibiting such local LGBT protections is constitutional." The court "reversed a judge's decision that Fayetteville's anti-discrimination ordinance didn't violate a state law prohibiting cities from enacting protections not covered by state law." The AP adds that Fayetteville, "a liberal enclave in northwestern Arkansas, is one of several cities that approved local protections for lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender people in response to the 2015 law." In the unanimous ruling, "the justices rejected the argument that Fayetteville and other cities with such ordinances have made, that such protections are covered elsewhere in state law."

SCOTUS Will Not Hear Ohio Man's Amish Hair-Cutting Case.

The AP (2/23) reports that the Supreme Court "won't review the case of the Ohio leader of a breakaway group that was accused in hair- and beard-cutting attacks on fellow Amish." Defense attorneys "challenged the constitutionality of the federal hate crimes law and how a kidnapping allegation was used to stiffen the sentence for 71-year-old Samuel Mullet Sr.," who "petitioned the Supreme Court after a federal court rejected his appeal last May." Mullet's attorney, Ed Bryan, said "he is disappointed by the high court's decision this week not to take up the case." Prosecutors "said some of the victims in the 2011 attacks were awakened in the middle of the night and restrained as others cut their hair and beards, which have spiritual significance in the Amish faith," and "prosecutors alleged the motive was religious, while the defense attributed it to family disputes."

Cruz Predicts Another SCOTUS Vacancy Later This Year.

The Washington Post (2/23, Sullivan, 11.43M) reports that in "one of his most prominent political appearances in months," Sen. Ted Cruz predicted at the Conservative Political Action Conference Thursday "that there will be another vacancy on the Supreme Court later this year" and "appeared to suggest that a departure of one of justices from the liberal wing of the court would trigger the opening." Cruz said, "The Scalia seat is defense. ... We're not going to get any better than Justice Scalia. The best we can do is preserve constitutional victories like upholding the Second Amendment. . . . I think we'll have another Supreme Court vacancy this summer. If that happens, as much as the left is crazy now, they will go full Armageddon." Cruz reiterated those comments in an interview with Fox News' Special Report (2/23, 1.53M), saying, "I think the odds are very good we will see a [Supreme Court] vacancy this summer. If not this summer, next summer. ... The next vacancy, which is going to be the opportunity to shift the course of this court, to put a five justice majority of constitutionalists on the court – that's going to be Armageddon and we need to be prepared to make the case to the American people."

Military Leaders Want Higher Level Talks With Russia About Air Operations Over Iraq, Syria.

The Washington Post (2/23, Lamothe, 11.43M) reports that senior US military officials "want to elevate talks with Russia about air operations over Iraq and Syria" in an effort to prevent mid-air collisions. However, the Post says that the prospect of discussions on the issue are "complicated by concerns at the Pentagon that doing so will make it look like Washington and Moscow have begun to collaborate on the battlefield." A 2015 agreement between the US and Russia "called for the use of specific communication frequencies and the establishment of a phone hotline" to deconflict operations, but Lt. Gen. Jeffrey Harrigian indicated the existing agreement has not provided US officers many options when there are points of contention between the two military forces. Harrigian said, "Our perspective has been that there needs to be another layer that allows us to have a more senior-level discussion, and we've got to work through where that layer is."

Mistura added, "They are waiting for a relief of their own suffering, and the dream of a new road out of this nightmare to a real and normal future in dignity." Mistura indicated that he will hold separate talks with each side as they try to create a plan that would lead to discussions about governance, a new constitution, and elections.

The Times says the progress is "an important milestone" in the effort to recapture the western half of Mosul and "is a promising start to what is expected to be a difficult and bloody fight." US Brig. Gen. Matthew Isler said Iraqi forces are "most of the way through the airfield," which New Zealand Brig. Gen. Hugh McAslan said is "ahead of schedule of where we thought they would be."

NBC Nightly News  (2/23, story 7, 1:45, Holt, 16.61M) reported "the offensive is not over" and it "could take another two or three days to secure the airport." The CBS Evening News  (2/23, story 7, 2:10, Pelley, 11.17M) showed CENTCOM Commander Gen. Joseph Votel saying that while the operation "might" go "faster if we did it ourselves," he is "pretty convinced the way we are approaching this, this campaign this time, working through our partners, is kind of the right way of doing it." Votel added that the Iraqis "own this" and "we are helping them, helping them to fight, but we are not fighting for them."

Trump Wants US Nuclear Capabilities To Be At "Top Of The Pack."

NBC Nightly News  (2/23, story 3, 0:55, Holt, 16.61M) reported that in an interview with Reuters on Thursday, President Trump "doubled down in his desire to beef up the nation's nuclear punch." ABC World News Tonight  (2/23, story 2, 1:15, Muir, 14.63M) said Trump "declared he wants the United States to be the world's dominant nuclear power." Trump: "It would be wonderful. A dream would be that no country would have nukes, but if countries are going to have nukes, we're going to be at the top of the pack." Jonathan Karl said Trump's comment comes after Russia violated a 1987 nuclear treaty by deploying a new cruise missile, which the President called "a big deal." In his interview with Reuters (2/23, Holland), Trump called New START "a one-sided deal." Said the President, "Just another bad deal that the country made, whether it's START, whether it's the Iran deal. ... We're going to start making good deals."

Trump Likes Two-State Solution, But Will Leave It Up To Israelis, Palestinians.

In an interview with Reuters (2/23, Holland), President Trump said Thursday that he "likes the concept of a two-state solution to the Israel-Palestinian conflict," but "stopped short of reasserting a US commitment to eventual Palestinian statehood and instead said again" he would be "satisfied with whatever makes both parties happy." Said the President, "I like the two-state solution. But I ultimately like what the both parties like." Reuters says the comments "put a new twist" on a statement he made earlier this month at a news conference with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu that could "send a signal to both sides, as well as the international community, that the principle...will not be discarded if the Trump administration moves forward, as he has promised, with an initiative to restart long-stalled peace efforts."

Trump "Not Liking" Chinese And North Korean Military Moves.

In an interview with Reuters (2/23) on Thursday, the President said he is "not liking" recent military moves by China and North Korea. Said Trump, "I know exactly what's going on between China and North Korea and everybody else. But I don't like talking about military strategy in newspapers. ... I'm not liking it. This didn't take place under the Trump Administration, this took place under the Obama Administration. Many things took place that should not have been allowed. One of them is the building of a...massive military complex in the middle of the South China Sea." Politico (2/23, Lima, 2.46M) reports that while Trump "praised China for halting coal imports from North Korea, he stressed the country's importance in avoiding escalating matters" with Pyongyang, saying, "Whether they say so or not is up to them, but they have tremendous control over North Korea. According to the piece, the unnamed country is "styling itself a big power, is dancing to the tune of the US."

Malaysia: Kim Jong-Nam Killed By VX Nerve Agent. The New York Times (2/23, Paddock, Sang-Hun, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Malaysian police announced Friday that the poison used to kill Kim-Jong-Nam, the half-brother of the North Korean leader Kim Jong-Un, was VX nerve agent, which is considered a chemical weapon under Chemical Weapons Conventions of 1997 and 2005. Police said samples taken from Kim's skin and eye were identified as the deadly nerve agent. The Washington Post (2/23, Fiffield, 11.43M) says the finding adds "to the increasing pile of evidence suggesting that Kim Jong Un's regime in North Korea was behind the brazen and public attack on Kim Jong Nam in a Kuala Lumpur airport terminal last week." CNN's Situation Room  (2/23, 554K), however, reported that North Korea is "pushing back strongly" against claims that the regime ordered Kim Jong-Nam's assassination.

Swedish Minister Hits Back At Trump Criticism.

Reuters (2/23, Ahlander) reports Sweden "hit back" on Thursday at criticism from President Trump, "defending its generous immigration policies and saying the diversity from thousands of asylum seekers would build a stronger society." Justice and Migration Minister Morgan Johansson told Reuters in an interview, "The next time I hope the president, if he's going to speak about Sweden, is better informed about what the conditions really are here," noting that unemployment figures continue to fall and public finances are in sound order, despite record number of immigrants.

Max Karlsson, a 22-year-old Swede who has been running the @Sweden account on Twitter since Monday, writes in the Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) that "fact-checking a president is an unusual task, but even people in power have to be held responsible for making unverified claims — and President Trump is no exception." Karlsson says "Trump's remarks, echoing those of high-level xenophobes, are reckless and not to be thrown around lightly. It's surreal seeing the leader of the free world actually believing that Sweden in going down the drain, making comments that risk increasing polarization and, on a larger scale, dehumanizing migrants and ignoring the human right to asylum."

The New York Times (2/23, Smale, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) interprets Germany's wiretapping approval and mass deportation Wednesday as "a clear sign of the stiffening political headwinds that have made Europe, like America, a less welcoming place for migrants." Although Sweden, the UK, Italy, and Hungary are all "restricting their welcome to strangers," Germany's steps are "more assertive," says the Times, noting this is a year in which Chancellor Angela Merkel faces a tough election challenge. Amnesty International is among the organizations who criticize European states for being too harsh on migrants "simply seeking a better life or striving to escape war and persecution."

Danish Man Who Burned Quran Charged With Blasphemy.

The New York Times (2/23, De Freytas-Tamura, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that a Danish man who burned a Quran and posted a video of it on Facebook has been charged with blasphemy, "a striking decision by prosecutors in a country that is largely secular but has grappled with the role of Islam in public life." According to the Times, the decision "stunned many" in the country, which has not convicted anyone of blasphemy since 1946.

Congress Urged To Withhold UN Funding.

Ron Prosor, a former Israeli ambassador to the UN, writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/23, Prosor, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) that Congress should withhold its funding to the UN until the world body returns to its core values, becomes more efficient, and halts its frequent attacks on American values and allies.

Krauthammer: Trump's "Two-Track" Foreign Policy May Work.

Charles Krauthammer writes in his column for the Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) that the set-up of the Administration is "a glaring contradiction," with the heads of State, Homeland Security, the CIA, and especially Defense and the national security adviser representing "mainstream American internationalism," while the President is "inexperienced, untraditional, unbounded" in his approach to foreign policy. Krauthammer argues that so far, the "good-cop, bad-cop" maneuvering seems like it might work a la Nixionian "madman theory," like in cases of China, NATO, free trade, and the Israeli-Palestinian resolution. The risk is that "a two-track, two-policy, two-reality" approach to foreign policy is "unsettling and has the potential to go totally off the rails."

Zakaria: US Can Help Save The Center.

Fareed Zakaria writes in his column for the Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) that amidst the "rise of radical forces on the left and right around the globe," "the center is rising again." Zakaria presents the likelihood that France's Emmanuel Macron will win the second round of the presidential election as a primary example. Macron is "emphatically in favor of free markets, globalization, the European Union and the transatlantic alliance," meanwhile being "an outsider, a reformer and a charismatic politician." German Chancellor Angela Merkel, with her 11-year reign, is also a bastion of centrism, says Zakaria, who notes she lags behind a left-of-center Martin Schulz, "who is even more pro-European, cosmopolitan and globalist." The US will play a critical role in maintaining, or not, an environment where the center can flourish.

Super PAC Begins Ads Urging Flake, Heller To Back Investigation Into Trump's Russia Ties.

Roll Call (2/23, Pathé, 63K) reports the Democratic super PAC American Bridge 21st Century is launching a two-week digital ad campaign that targets Sens. Jeff Flake and Dean Heller, "urging them to back an independent investigation into President Donald Trump's ties to Russia." The super PAC, Roll Call says, plans to expand the campaign to other platforms as it targets "engaged voters" of all parties. The ads call on voters to petition the senators to seek the investigation.

Trump Says China "Grand Champions" Of Currency Manipulation.

Reuters (2/23, Holland, Lawder) reports President Trump on Thursday characterized China as the "grand champions" of currency manipulation. Trump said during an interview with Reuters that he has not "held back" in accusing China of manipulating the yuan, despite "not acting on a campaign promise to declare" Beijing a currency manipulator on its first day. Reuters adds that Trump's comments came hours after Treasury Secretary Mnuchin "pledged a more methodical approach to analyzing Beijing's foreign exchange practices." Mnuchin told CNBC that he is not prepared at this time to make a determination on China's currency practices.

China Replacing Three Senior Economic Officials. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, A1, Wei, Wong, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that people familiar with the matter say that Chinese President Xi Jinping will be announcing changes to his economic team as China contends with domestic financial risk and tension with trading partners. The Journal says that with China's top banking regulator, commerce minister, and top economic planning official all at the retirement age of 65, two close associates of Xi and a well-known technocrat will replace them. Shandong Province Governor Guo Shuquing is expected to become the commissioner of the China Banking Regulatory Commission (replacing Shang Fulin), Vice Commerce Minister Zhong Shan will become Commerce Minister (replacing Gao Hucheng), and He Lifeng will head the National Development and Reform Commission (replacing Xu Shaoshi).

Trump Convenes Meeting Of Executives To Shape Economic Policies.

NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 6, 2:05, Holt, 16.61M) reported President Trump "met with the CEO of two dozens manufacturing companies" on Thursday and "asked for their help in coming up with the ways to bring back jobs that are lost to foreign competitions." The New York Times (2/23, Davis, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports the meeting is "giving powerful business leaders a potentially influential hand in shaping his still-evolving economic policies." Trump told the group, "My administration's policies and regulatory reform, tax reform, trade policies will return significant manufacturing jobs to our country." Trump added, "Everything's going to be based on bringing our jobs back – the good jobs, the real jobs. They've left and they're coming back. They have to come back." Trump said his campaign vow on taxes, jobs, and infrastructure helped him win the election and he "dispatched his cabinet and senior staff to gather input from the executives on what those packages should look like." Reuters (2/23, Shepardson, Gibson) reports the executives each attended one of four breakout sessions with Administration officials to discuss a variety of topics including conflict minerals regulations, a lack of qualified workers, export regulations for defense products, vocational training and business taxes.

Javers: Trump Was "Suggesting That A Strong Dollar Could Be Bad" For Caterpillar.

Eamon Javers said on CNBC's Closing Bell (2/23, 142K) that "we saw the President making some comments" during the meeting "that you don't typically hear from the President of the United States." Javers added that "to my ear that sounded a little bit like the President was suggesting that a strong dollar could be bad for Caterpillar in terms of the exports that the President's trying to encourage here. That's not something you usually hear from presidents." Javers continued, "Typically Treasury secretaries say the United States has a strong dollar and that's our policy, but here you're seeing a little bit of a shift here on the part of a White House that wants to emphasize exports over imports."

GE CEO Recounts Trump's Golf Hole-In-One During "The Apprentice" Negotiations. The Washington Times (2/23, Boyer, 272K) reports that during the meeting with executives, the President "prodded" General Electric CEO Jeffrey Immelt to talk about the time Trump shot a hole-in-one on the golf course. The Times says that Immelt "dutifully told the tale of their golf outing in 2004" during negotiations between Trump and NBC for "The Apprentice" show. Immelt said, "President Trump goes up to a par three on his course. He looks at the three of us and says, 'You realize, of course, I'm the richest golfer in the world.' And then gets a hole-in-one." Immelt added, "I have to say, you know, I've seen the magic before." Trump then explained that he "actually said I was the best golfer of all the rich people, to be exact. But then I got a hole-in-one. So it was sort of cool."

NYTimes Analysis: Trump's Economic Policies Leading To "Fear" In Aerospace Industry. The New York Times (2/23, Johnson, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that President Trump's discussion of "border tariffs and new trade deals" has led to "fear" in the aerospace industry that the policies "could raise the cost of American airplanes bought by foreign airlines or governments," leading to a trickle-down impact on the entire supply chain. The Times highlights Boeing as an example, saying that suffering sales or profits could impact the company's "nerve-system supply chain" which is composed of "more than 13,000 companies" in the US and "more than 1.5 million jobs."

Lane: US Business Leaders Must Speak Out Against Harmful Policies. In a Wall Street Journal (2/23, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) op-ed, Bill Lane – Caterpillar's former director of global government affairs – says that while US business leaders are praising or at least not pushing back against President Trump's efforts to prevent jobs from leaving the country, they realize that the approach would hurt their companies in the long run. Lane says the time has come for corporate America to speak out against policies that could hurt the US economy, while also continuing to support beneficial strategies.

LEADING THE NEWS

FBI Rejected Priebus' Request To Contest Stories On Russia Contacts, Sources Say.

CNN (2/23, Sciutto, Perez, Prokupecz, Raju, Brown, 29.79M) reports online that "multiple" anonymous "US officials briefed on the matter" indicated "the FBI rejected a recent White House request to publicly knock down media reports about communications between Donald Trump's associates and Russians known to US intelligence during the 2016 presidential campaign." Sources indicated FBI Director James "Comey rejected the request for the FBI to comment on the stories...because the alleged communications between Trump associates and Russians known to US intelligence are the subject of an ongoing investigation." A White House official commented late Thursday that White House Chief of Staff Reince Priebus made the request only "after the FBI indicated to the White House it did not believe the reporting to be accurate."

USA Today (2/23, Cummings, 5.28M), the AP (2/24, Pace), the Huffington Post (2/23, 237K), the New York Daily News (2/24, Slattery, 4.45M), The Hill (2/23, Bolton, 1.25M), the International Business Times (2/23, Kreiter, 814K), the Daily Beast (2/23, 1.11M), and the New York Post (2/23, Perez, 3.82M) summarize the CNN report.

Jim Sciutto said on CNN's Situation Room  (2/23, 554K) that the White House "sought the help of the Bureau and other agencies investigating the Russian matter to say that the reports were wrong and that there had been no contacts." Evan Perez reported on CNN's

Situation Room  (2/23, 554K) that US law enforcement officials said the White House request began when White House Chief of Staff Reince Priebus met with FBI Deputy Director Andrew McCabe the day after those media reports broke. However, White House officials disputed that account, "saying that McCabe called Priebus that morning" and said a New York Times story on the matter "vastly overstated what the FBI knows about these Russia contacts."

Perez later said on CNN's Situation Room  that communication between the White House and the FBI is "unusual because of a decade-old restriction on such contacts." Perez added, "the request from the White House is a violation of those procedures to limit communications with FBI on pending investigations."

Politico (2/23, Lima, 2.46M) says Democrats have "ripped" the White House over the reports. Rep. Andre Carson (D-IN) said on CNN's Situation Room  (2/23, 554K), "The fact that the Administration is using its authority to impose on the FBI in a way that is unlawful and unethical, quite frankly, disturbs me." Carson was later asked if the White House contact with the FBI should be investigated, to which he replied  , "Without a question. I think it goes along the lines of other questionable acts not only the violation of the emolument clause and other violations and general Flynn speaking to Russian diplomats." Sciutto said on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360  (2/23, 686K) that the FBI is still investigating the communications between Trump associates and Russian officials, as are the House and Senate Intelligence Committees, according to several members of those panels.

Ignatius: US, Allies Must Resist Russia Influence Efforts Or "Post-West Era" May "Be Next." In his Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) column, David Ignatius says "we may be missing the forest for the trees" in the story about Russia allegedly attempting to influence the US election as the effort "is part of a much bigger tale of Russian covert action" that used Trump's campaign as a "witting" or "unwitting" "tool." Ignatius urges Americans to "pay attention" because "this is how the Russians try to subvert politics – boldly, secretly and often corruptly." Ignatius adds that if the US and its allies "don't resist, a post-West era may indeed be next."

COUNTER-TERRORISM

New Orleans Jewish Community Center Evacuated After False Bomb Threat.

The New Orleans Times-Picayune (2/23, 656K) reports that on Thursday morning, the Jewish Community Center in New Orleans was evacuated "following a bomb threat, according to the New Orleans Police Department." However, "Mayor Mitch Landrieu tweeted just before 11 a.m. that the threat had been deemed 'non-credible,'" adding, "FBI is investigating. Be clear, anti-semitism will not be tolerated in NOLA." New Orleans JCC Executive Director Leslie Fischman "said they were outside for roughly 55 minutes before law enforcement cleared the building and allowed them to go back in," and that "this is the first threat the facility has received in her 21 years with the organization."

Analysis Highlights Difficulty Of Investigating Anti-Semitic Threats. TIME (2/23, 6.98M) contributor Katie Reilly provides an analysis of the challenges associated with investigating anti-Semitic threats. John Jay College of Criminal Justice adjunct professor James Mulvaney said, "Statistically, most of [the threats] are hoaxes. Realistically, you have to handle every one as if it's the real deal." The article highlights the increased level of threats since the election of President Trump. Reilly notes that the FBI has said it is investigating "possible civil rights violations in connection with threats to Jewish Community Centers across the country."

Jewish Americans Reportedly Concerned Trump Is Not Taking Threats Seriously. Vox (2/23, 1.15M) contributor Sarah Wildman provides an 1,800-word analysis of "the epidemic of bomb threats against Jewish organizations," saying there is a "genuine fear that the country has entered into a new era where anti-Semitism has left the shadows, and taken a new, louder, bolder place on the center stage of American society." Wildman says "Trump is in denial about the dangers of white supremacists and neo-Nazis," citing Anti-Defamation League (ADL) Co-Director Oren Segal as asserting "not monitoring white supremacists...creates a feeling among Jewish Americans that their concerns are not being taken seriously."

Ecoterrorist Admits To Firebombing MSU In 1992.

The Detroit Free Press (2/23, Wolcott, 1.01M) reports that twenty-five years after a firebombing at Michigan State University, Rodney Coronado "admits he was solely responsible," and that he intended to destroy the research of Richard Aulerich because he thought it was "funded by the commercial fur industry." The AP notes that the Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco Firearms and Explosives took part in the investigation.

Alaska AG: US Cannot Overturn State's Marijuana Law.

The AP (2/23) reports from Anchorage, AK that "a representative for the Alaska attorney general's office said a change in how the federal government enforces its own marijuana laws would not affect state marijuana laws." The AP adds that Alaska's law "legalizing recreational marijuana wouldn't be overturned, Department of Law spokeswoman Cori Mills said Thursday after White House spokesman Sean Spicer suggested during a press briefing that President Donald Trump's administration might crack down on states that have legalized marijuana for recreational use. 'The federal law is one thing and the state has the right to enact laws in this area and those are perfectly constitutional,' Mills said. 'Our law wouldn't be overturned. But there is a different federal law, and how they want to enforce the federal law is up to the federal government. We'll just wait and see what sort of actions they take.'"

Eastern Washington US Attorney Mike Ormsby "says he cannot comment

The Traverse City (MI) Record-Eagle (2/23, Troutman, 84K) reports a US District Court Judge sentenced Michigan woman Sarah Frances Bolhuis to five years in prison for wire fraud and money laundering. The woman was "accused of running a 'Ponzi scheme' that bilked investors out of millions of dollars," and "more than 50 investors lost their savings, abandoned retirement plans and experienced financial stress thanks to Bolhuis, authorities contended." FBI agents said "the scheme lasted from 2006 to 2015."

Former PA Governor's Aide Disbarred After Guilty Plea In FBI Sting.

The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/23, Shaw, 586K) reports Pennsylvania's Supreme Court's disciplinary board said Thursday that "one of former Gov. Ed Rendell's top aides," John H. Estey, "who pleaded guilty last May to one count of wire fraud after being caught up in an FBI sting, has agreed to be disbarred." Court filings indicate "the FBI set up a phony business in 2009 to 'investigate allegations of public corruption in Pennsylvania'" and "the fake firm hired Estey and a top Harrisburg lobbying firm to help it obtain legislation to benefit its business, and made campaign contributions to further its goals." The undercover agents then "gave Estey $20,000 that he promised he would pass along as campaign contributions in his name, circumventing state laws that ban corporate gifts and the use of lobbyists as 'pass-throughs.'"

Former Comverse CEO Sentenced To 30 Months In Options Backdating Case.

Newsday (NY) (2/23, Riley, 1.3M) reports that Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, "the former CEO of Long Island software firm Comverse Technology who fled to Africa to avoid fraud charges, was sentenced Thursday in Brooklyn federal court to 30 months in prison." Alexander, 64, "an Israeli citizen who founded digital voicemail pioneer Comverse in 1982, returned last year to plead guilty to securities fraud after fleeing to Namibia in 2006 to evade prosecution for backdating stock options and trying to bribe an underling to take the fall. 'I really don't understand how someone as brilliant and accomplished and focused and respected as you could be so incredibly, abjectly foolish as to make some of the decisions you made,' said U.S. District Judge Nicholas Garaufis." Newsday adds that Alexander "claimed in a letter to the judge that he fled out of fear of a draconian sentence for a white-collar crime and fought extradition for a decade because he was 'terrified' by seeing his name on a Most Wanted list with Osama bin Laden."

Reuters (2/23) reports that Alexander's attorneys "had sought a prison term of no more than two years for the Israeli citizen, who has spent six months in custody after Garaufis rejected his request for release on a $25 million bond." Reuters notes that Alexander "is likely to be credited for the time he was held." Reuters adds that "the case was one of the last open U.S. prosecutions arising from government or internal investigations of backdating of stock options at over 200 companies, including Comverse, which was acquired in 2013 by former unit Verint Systems Inc."

CBS News (2/23, 4.4M) reports that in 2006, federal prosecutors "charged Alexander and other Comverse executives with a scheme to manipulate stock options." CBS adds that "the options' grant dates were allegedly falsified to coincide with a low point in the stock's value, thereby boosting the value of the stock option." Alexander "turned up in Namibia after having transferred tens of millions of dollars overseas," and "he lived comfortably there until last year, when he gave up an extradition fight and agreed to plead guilty in the U.S."

Bloomberg News (2/23, Hurtado, 2.41M) reports that "Alexander's decision to flee exacerbated the case and warranted imposing a prison term longer than the 24-month sentence, which to date had been the longest imposed for options backdating, the judge said. 'Corporate executives must know if they commit this type of crime, they will be punished swiftly and appropriately,' Garaufis said. 'They must know they cannot flee the jurisdiction to escape the criminal process, to buy a new life and evade the law.'" The New York Daily News (2/23, Moynihan, 4.45M) and the Wall Street Journal (2/23, Orden, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) also report.

Timothy Sedlak, 43, pleaded guilty in a Manhattan federal court "to attempting to access protected computers without authorization," and federal prosecutors "accused him of trying to gain access to an unnamed New York-based charitable organization's network." In a court filing obtained by Reuters "that summarized a US Secret Service interview in 2015 with Sedlak, an agent said he was questioned about notes they found referencing former Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton and her daughter, Chelsea Clinton."

Cellebrite's Director of Forensics Research Shahar Tal "suggested Cellebrite has had the ability to crack iPhones for some time but was just announcing it publicly now." The IBT mentions that "it is believed that Cellebrite is the company the United States FBI tapped to help unlock the iPhone 5C that belonged to one of the killers involved in the San Bernardino, Calif. shooting in December 2015."

Nevada Public Safety Director Argues For Creation Of Cyber Defense Office.

Nevada Appeal (2/23, Dornan, 86K) reports that on Thursday, Nevada Public Safety Director Jim Wright argued for the "creation of a Cyber Defense Office that would bring together not only public safety agencies but other agency efforts in the war against hacking." According to Wright, "the office would treat cyber attacks in much the same way the Department of Public Services currently treats terrorism, natural disasters and other emergencies." He added that "the office would be located within" the Department of Public Safety, partly because it "has access to the FBI and national criminal information data." Wright said, "Most of these attacks have a criminal background so it's a natural fit for us."

Cyber Experts Warn That "Global Action Must Be Taken" On Cybersecurity Issues.

McClatchy (2/23, 74K) reports that "alarms over the state of the internet appear with greater frequency" due to malware, data theft, and digital weapons wielded by nation-states. McClatchy says, "Once a platform for enlightenment, the internet flirts with a dark age, industry leaders warn, and global action must be taken." McClatchy goes on to discuss Microsoft President Brad Smith's proposal for a "Digital Geneva Convention, an international agreement to protect civilians from the destructive uses by states of the digital sphere," adding, "Whether an international treaty or convention could slow the destructive currents that make the internet increasingly hazardous is subject of intense debate." Former cybersecurity czar J. Michael Daniel "said he worries that some authoritarian nations would distort such an accord" to control content, and "a better first step...would be further agreements of the sort that Obama reached with China's President Xi Jinping...which barred purely commercial hacking between the two nations, but not digital espionage."

Senator Calls For "Retro Approach" To Protecting Power Grid.

McClatchy (2/23, Hotakainen, 74K) reports, "Idaho Republican Sen. Jim Risch says it's time for a retro approach to protect the nation's power grid, relying more on humans and less on sophisticated technology as a way to thwart hackers." Risch "said the U.S. should heed the lesson of the 2015 cyberattack on Ukraine's power grid," namely that more damage was prevented because hackers couldn't gain physical access to all of the power grids' controls as some were manually operated. Risch and fellow Senate intelligence committee member Angus King "want Congress to pass a $10 million bill that would create a two-year pilot program to investigate more low-tech approaches that might frustrate hackers."

Google Cracks SHA-1 Cryptographic Algorithm.

Forbes (2/23, 15.17M) reports that Google "cracked an old cryptographic algorithm called SHA-1," a "significant" occurrence "because SHA-1 has been in use across the web for some time, largely to check the authenticity of digital artefacts flying around the internet." Forbes says Google had SHA-1 create the same hash for two different files, something that "shouldn't be possible." Forbes goes on to explain that the "second file" could be malware or a forgery. Nonetheless, Forbes says, "For some time now, major web companies have downgraded SHA-1 and won't use it to carry out those verification processes." Google "thinks its research should get all companies still using the algorithm to move away from SHA-1, which has long been deemed vulnerable."

Report: Majority Of Hackers Claim To Be Able To Break Cyberdefenses Within Hours.

ZDNet (2/23, 151K) reports, "The majority of hackers claim they can break through cybersecurity defenses and infiltrate their target's systems within hours, according to new research." A report from Nuix Black "says that more than three-quarters of hackers – 88 percent in total – who responded to the Nuix survey believe most network defenses can be breached within 12 hours." Furthermore, "roughly a third said that their activities were never noticed by their victims – and 17 percent of hackers claimed it would take them no longer than two hours to breach a target."

Business Insider (2/23, 3.42M) reports, "Coast Guard Vice Adm. Marshall Lytle gave the perfect analogy that demonstrates how unique, and difficult it can be, for the US military to operate in the cyber realm." Lytle is quoted saying at the AFCEA West 2017 conference, "Cyberwarfare is like a soccer game with all the fans on the field with you and no one is wearing uniforms." BI adds, "Lytle's remark highlights the 'wild west' nature of the cyberwarfare," and "as Lytle explained, cyberwarfare doesn't have clear battle lines."

House Intelligence Staff Director: 2017 To Be A "Banner Year" For Congressional Cybersecurity Debates.

CyberScoop (2/23) reports House Intelligence Committee staff director Michael Bahar says, "It will be a banner year for cybersecurity debates in Congress – and that isn't necessarily a good thing." According to CyberScoop, "retrospective" efforts to investigate alleged Russian influence on the 2016 US election "are just a portion of the task ahead for lawmakers who handle cybersecurity issues." Bahar is quoted saying in a panel discussion, "For far too many industries, we are in a pre-Enron phase. If you think about Enron, what led to that was board members and senior executives at companies saying it looks fine and if it's an accounting issue, then take it to accounting. And I think that's where we are in many industries for cyber. ... And what I think that means is that a lot of it will be driven by what the courts do. And how Congress will respond to that."

Continuing Coverage: States Oppose Critical Infrastructure Designation For Elections Systems.

In continuing coverage, eWeek (2/23, 668K) reports the National Association of Secretaries of State "adopted a resolution opposing the 'critical infrastructure' designation by the U.S. Department of Homeland Security." Their reasoning "was partly due to concerns of overreaching by the federal government and because the agency had refused to provide adequate information on the impact that the designation would have on the states, according to Kay Stimson, spokeswoman for the National Association of Secretaries of State (NASS)."

Hacked Texts Suggest Manafort Faced Blackmail Attempt From Ukrainian Official.

Politico (2/23, Vogel, Stern, Meyer, 2.46M) reports "undated communications, which are allegedly from the iPhone of" political consultant Paul Manafort's daughter suggest that Manafort "was the victim of a blackmail attempt while he was serving as Donald Trump's presidential campaign chairman last summer." One text "appears to come from a Ukrainian parliamentarian named Serhiy Leshchenko," in which he attaches "a note to Paul Manafort referring to 'bulletproof' evidence related to Manafort's financial arrangement with Ukraine's former president, the pro-Russian strongman Viktor Yanukovych, as well as an alleged 2012 meeting between Trump and a close Yanukovych associate named Serhiy Tulub." Leshchenko disavowed the texts in question and "Manafort denied brokering a 2012 meeting between Trump and Tulub and also point[e]d out that he wasn't working for Trump at the time." However, Manafort confirmed the authenticity of the texts as coming from his daughter's phone, saying he contacted a lawyer at the time they were received.

The Hill (2/23, Savransky, 1.25M) and Vanity Fair (2/22, Tracy, 6.22M) also cover Politico's report.

Local Leaders Comment On Possible Plans For FBI Expansion At Redstone Arsenal.

A 1,200-word report by Alabama Live (2/23, Gattis, 804K) says the FBI "is considering bringing hundreds, if not thousands, of jobs to Redstone Arsenal in what could possibly be a landmark economic development for Huntsville." Although "the plan exists on paper...it's not clear how close it is to becoming a reality or if the plan, conceived during the Obama administration, will change under President Trump. But some construction is already under way on Redstone." Huntsville/Madison County Chamber of Commerce Senior VP Mike Ward said, "I think the master plan that the FBI discussed at the Redstone Update is still notional and it remains so until the plan is funde[d]. Some parts of the plan have been funded and are being executed. We're hopeful that we will be able to advance this plan to make it a reality." US Rep. Mo Brooks (R-AL) "said he has heard many different estimates on potential jobs that could be associated with the FBI's growth in his hometown." The article notes, "FBI Director James Comey, in a visit to Redstone last year to formally open" the Terrorist Explosive Devices Analytical Center (TEDAC), "described Huntsville as a possible new 'center of gravity' for the bureau."

On its website, WAAY-TV Huntsville, AL (2/23, Martin, 2K) similarly quotes Ward's comments on the possible FBI expansion in Huntsville.

DOJ Reverses Obama Order Phasing Out Private Contractors To Run Prisons.

Reuters (2/23, Beech) and the New York Times (2/23, Lichtblau, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) report the Justice Department has reversed an Obama Administration order that called for the phasing out of using private contractors to run federal prisons. Reuters says that Attorney

General Sessions wrote in a memo made public Thursday that former President Obama's policy harmed the government's ability to meet possible needs of the prison system. Sessions said, according to Bloomberg News (2/23, Strohm, 2.41M), "The memorandum changed long-standing policy and practice, and impaired the Bureau's ability to meet the future needs of the federal correctional system." Politico (2/23, Ocasio, 2.46M) reports a Justice Department spokesman indicated that the new memo provides the Federal Bureau Of Prisons with more flexibility. The spokesman said in a statement, "This will restore BOP's flexibility to manage the federal prison inmate population based on capacity needs."

The Washington Post (2/23, Zapotosky, 11.43M) says that while the change is "a significant policy shift" from the Obama Administration, "the practical impact might be somewhat muted." The Post indicates that "most inmates are housed in state prisons, rather than federal ones" and the Obama Administration's decision to no longer use private facilities "only affected 13,000 prisons" that "hous[ed] a little more than 22,000 inmates." The Post adds that the original order "also did not apply to Immigration and Customs Enforcement and US Marshals Service detainees."

Media: Private Prison Sector Supported Trump During Election. Eamon Javers said on CNBC's Closing Bell  (2/23, 142K) that the private prison sector has been "very close" to Trump and "saw something they very much liked in Donald Trump's administration." USA Today (2/23, Schouten, 5.28M) reports private prison companies "have contributed big sums to pro-Trump groups" and now "stand to make big gains under President Trump's new immigration orders." USA Today says private prison companies "see the potential for significant growth" with Trump and some GOP lawmakers "pushing to toughen penalties for undocumented immigrants who are deported and then re-enter the country illegally." USA Today highlights that GEO Group donated $250,000 to support Trump's inauguration and a subsidiary of the company gave $225,000 to a super PAC that spent about $22 million to help Trump. CoreCivic provided $250,000 to support Trump's inauguration.

White House Says DOJ Will Crack Down On Recreational Marijuana.

The Washington Times (2/23, Boyer, 272K) reports White House press secretary Sean Spicer indicated Thursday that the Justice Department will increase enforcement of the federal ban on the recreational use of marijuana, and he "compared recreational marijuana loosely with the opioid epidemic." According to McClatchy (2/23, Kumar, Hotakainen, 74K), a 2014 John Hopkins School of Public Health report shows "there's little evidence to connect marijuana to opioid addiction." Washington Gov. Jay Inslee vowed to defend his voters' pro-pot preferences earlier this month, and Nevada Senate Majority Leader Aaron Ford called on the state's attorney general to "vigorously defend" its laws.

The AP (2/23, Gurman) says Spicer's announcement is "a departure from the Trump administration's statements in favor of states' rights." According to the Los Angeles Times (2/23, Halper, McGreevy, 4.52M), the Administration's options for enforcement could range from "largely symbolic gestures" to "filing injunctions seeking to nullify state legalization laws." The Washington Post (2/23, Wagner, Zapotosky, 11.43M) reports pro-cannabis organization and industry leaders' concern with Spicer's statement, with one noting, "Many of the states who helped elect President Trump just voted to also support recreational marijuana."

Media: Trump Calls Deportations "A Military Operation"; Kelly Quickly "Contradicts" Him.

President Trump's comment at a White House meeting of business executives that under his immigration policy, "we're getting really bad dudes out of this country at a rate that nobody's ever seen before" in "a military operation" draws considerable critical media attention, with every major story on the comment stating that DHS Secretary Kelly quickly followed by saying that no military force is being used. While the White House said the President was using the term figuratively, several sources use the contradiction between Trump and Kelly to highlight the difficulties the Administration has had with immigration policy.

ABC World News Tonight  (2/23, lead story, 3:40, Muir, 14.63M) reported that the President called his "immigration crackdown...'a military operation' at the border." But "his own Homeland Security secretary had very different words about the operation." ABC's Matt Gutman: "At the White House today, President Trump declaring his new immigration crackdown" a success. Trump: "We're getting really bad dudes out of this country, and at a rate that nobody's ever seen before, and they are the bad ones, and it's a military operation." Gutman: "A military operation? Not according to Homeland Security Secretary John Kelly." Kelly: "No. Repeat, no use of military force in immigration operations. None." The CBS Evening News  (2/23, story 2, 1:00, Pelley, 11.17M) said "there was some confusion today on immigration." CBS' Margaret Brennan: "The White House later tried to clarify, saying the President meant 'military operation' as an adjective to describe what they say is an efficient rate of deportation."

NBC Nightly News  (2/23, story 4, 1:35, Alexander, 16.61M) reported that Trump was "contradicted quickly" by Kelly, who is in Mexico with Secretary of State Tillerson. USA Today (2/23, Agren, 5.28M) reports that Kelly "addressed an anxious audience of Mexican migrants living in the USA and Mexican officials preparing to receive an influx of deportees." Kelly said, "Everything that we do will be done in a legal way and with respect for human rights and the US justice system." The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Schwartz, Whelan, De Córdoba, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that Kelly also said there would be "no mass deportations." The AP (2/23, Lederman) reports that while Kelly and Tillerson "tried to alleviate Mexico's concerns, Trump was fanning them further," offering "an altogether different message from Kelly and Tillerson, who traveled here to meet with top Mexican officials at a time of intense turbulence for US-Mexico relations."

The Washington Post (2/23, Rucker, 11.43M) says the President "celebrated what he called 'a military operation' to round up and deport undocumented immigrants who have committed crimes or caused violence." The Post says the phrasing "could raise eyebrows among immigrant rights advocates and even within" DHS. The Post says "a leaked DHS proposal last week to deploy Army National Guard troops to help apprehend undocumented immigrants was quickly denied by DHS leadership and the White House as being under consideration."

The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Memoli, 4.52M) writes that while Trump "speaks in terms of unadulterated success" on immigration policy, "few others in the administration go so far," and "a muddled picture has emerged on where the Trump administration is headed. Thursday offered a clear example of the problems that arise when Trump and his top aides send different messages." The Hill (2/23, Fabian, 1.25M) reports that White House press secretary Sean Spicer said Trump "wasn't speaking literally." Spicer said, "The President was using that as an adjective. It is happening with precision."

The New York Times (2/23, A1, Ahmed, Harris, Nixon, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) writes that Trump "has a penchant for dropping unwelcome surprises during visits between the United States and Mexico. Last month, on the first day of a trip to Washington by Mexico's foreign minister, Mr. Trump signed an executive order to build a wall between the two countries," and earlier this week, just before the trip by the two secretaries, the Administration "released policies that vastly expanded the potential for deportation of undocumented immigrants." The Washington Post (2/23, Olivo, 11.43M) says "the visit by Tillerson and Kelly comes a month after a heated volley of tweets between President Trump and Mexico's president, Enrique Peña Nieto, over who should pay for a wall on the southern US border prompted Peña Nieto to cancel a White House visit."

The Washington Times (2/23, Boyer, 272K) says Trump "praised" DHS efforts "to arrest and deport more illegal immigrants Thursday, calling it 'a military operation' that is getting 'really bad dudes' out of the US." The New York Post (2/23, Halper, 3.82M) also reports that Trump "likened the removal of illegal immigrants in the US to a 'military operation.'" Politico (2/23, Nussbaum, 2.46M) says "the comment was surprising given that ICE and the border patrol are civilian, not military, organizations." Business Insider (2/23, Woody, 3.42M) says the comments "appear to contradict some White House efforts to downplay the scope and scale of his deportation plans."

The TIME (2/23, Beckwith, 6.98M) and Vanity Fair (2/22, Nguyen, 6.22M) websites also highlight the President's use of the term "military operation," while the Washington Times (2/23, Dinan, 272K) and Politico (2/23, McCaskill, 2.46M) have brief items focused on Kelly's remarks.

CBS Fact-Checks Trump's Deportation "Boasting." The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 3, 0:40, Pelley, 11.17M) reported, "The President's boasting go the better of him today. He said the US is deporting drug dealers and gang members 'for the first time.' And as you heard, he said they're being deported at a rate nobody has ever seen before. For the record, our research department spoke to an official at the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency. In January of last year, there were 17,649 deportations. Last month, it was one thousand fewer. And last year, 58 percent had been convicted of serious crimes, such as drug dealing."

The Intercept (2/23, Devereaux) headlines a report "Donald Trump Plans To Bypass The Courts To Deport As Many People As Possible." Tennessee-based immigration attorney Greg Siskind said, "I see now what the plan is. Their plan is basically to have everybody thrown out of the country without ever going to court."

Newsweek Analysis: Trump's Deportation Policies Could Cost "Billions." Newsweek (2/23, Cadei, 862K) under the headline "Trump's Deportation Plans Would Cost Billions" that Trump's "plans to dramatically increase deportations are causing panic in immigrant communities across the country" and are also "likely to add billions of dollars to the tab for Trump's immigration crackdown, on top of the $21 billion that DHS officials have estimated it could cost to build the president's desired wall on the border with Mexico." Last year, Ben Gitis of the "center-right" American Action Forum estimated that it would cost $400 billion to $600 billion to deport all of those in the US illegally within two years. While Trump has not called for that, Newsweek says the additional staffing needs for increased enforcement could cost more than $1.5 billion.

Trump Tweets "Chicago Needs Help" After Seven Homicides On Wednesday.

The Chicago Sun-Times (2/23, Charles, 798K) reports seven homicides occurred in Chicago Wednesday, making it "the deadliest day of 2017 so far," and President Trump responded in a tweet that the situation is "totally out of control. Chicago needs help!" Six people were shot on the South Side and one was killed in Little Village. Among those killed were a young pregnant woman and a sexagenarian. Five of the shootings occurred in a two-hour span. According to the Chicago Tribune (2/23, Williams-Harris, Crepeau, Malagon, 2.54M), at least 495 people have been shot in Chicago so far this year, 60 more people than were shot over the same period a year ago. The Tribune provides details of the seven homicides Wednesday and notes that the West Side experienced the most violence last year. ABC World News Tonight  (2/23, story 8, 0:15, Muir, 14.63M) also briefly reported on the story.

Administration Reportedly Broadens Search For Fed Vice Chair For Bank Oversight.

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Tracy, Ackerman, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that people familiar with the matter indicated the Administration has widened its search for the next Fed Vice Chair in charge of bank oversight. The Journal says the Administration is still considering David Nason, an executive in General Electric's financing arm, and met with US Bancorp chief executive Richard Davis and Harvard Law School professor Hal Scott.

CNN: IC Concerned White House Wants Report Tailored To Justify Immigration Order.

Anderson Cooper said on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360  (2/23, 686K) that as the White House works "to provide a factual basis" for Trump's immigration order, there is "pushback of some in the intelligence community who have been given the job of evaluating the evidence information and who are worried that they're being asked to tailor the facts to fit a preordained conclusion." Jake Tapper added that "sources" told CNN's Pamela Brown "that there are those within the Department of Homeland Security who have concerns that intelligence at the department might be becoming politicized." A New York Times (2/23, Qiu, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) analysis examines "some of the more misleading claims Mr. Trump and his administration have made about the first iteration of the travel ban."

Also on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360  (2/23, 686K), Tapper cited a "senior White House official" who said that "the Department of Homeland Security and the Justice Department, quote, 'are working on an intelligence report that will demonstrate that the security threat for these seven countries [covered by President Trump's immigration order] is substantial, and that these seven countries have all been exporters of terrorism into the United States.'" However, "sources tell the CNN" that DHS' Office of Intelligence and Analysis "filed a report that disagrees with the view that blocking immigration from the seven countries strategically make nice sense. Some DHS officials have said they do not think nationality is the best indicator of potential terrorism." Tapper added that when it was asked about the matter, DHS "essentially disparage[d] its own intelligence division's report saying, quote, the Ina report does not include data from other intelligence community sources. It is incomplete."

Rep. Dan Donovan said on CNN's The Lead  (2/23, 320K) that the Administration "looked at the decision by the Ninth Circuit" and is "taking into account where the failures were in the first roll out of the first executive order and trying to make sure that they do the next executive order within the constitutional boundaries."

Illinois, Connecticut Officials Push Back On Trump's Immigration Enforcement Plans.

The Chicago Sun-Times (2/23, Grimm, 798K) reports that President Trump is "not going to get much help from Illinois" with his "ambitious plans to step up immigration enforcement and arrest and deport undocumented people at a record pace." Cook County Sheriff Tom Dart "said he had 'no interest' in devoting his deputies' time to arresting undocumented county residents, and Mayor Rahm Emanuel has consistently said Chicago will remain a 'sanctuary city.'" Meanwhile, state Attorney General Lisa Madigan "said her office is looking into ways to offer legal backup to smaller towns that want to continue their resistance to immigration laws," and Gov. Bruce Rauner "said he had no plans to deputize the Illinois State Police to enforce immigration laws."

The Washington Times (2/23, Ernst, 272K) says a memo to Chicago Public Schools principals from Chicago Chief Education Officer Janice Jackson "positioned CPS as a roadblock to ICE's mission to enforce federal laws governing border control, customs, trade and immigration." The memo, which was issued Tuesday, reads, "To be very clear, CPS does not provide assistance to US Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) in the enforcement of federal civil immigration law. ... Therefore, ICE should not be permitted access to CPS facilities or personnel except in the rare instance in which we are provided with a criminal warrant."

Connecticut Gov. Dannel Malloy was asked on Fox News Tucker Carlson Tonight  (2/23) about his order to state law enforcement not to enforce federal immigration law. Malloy said, "There are federal laws that the federal authorities should enforce and there are state laws that the state authorities should enforce. We want the bad guys off the street, we want bad guys sent home. That's not the disagreement. The disagreement is the President can't order us to do federal work. Quite frankly, the federal government should do its own job and get it done. We are not standing in the way of that happening."

Clarke: Charge Sanctuary City Officials With Harboring Aliens. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (2/23, Glauber, 513K) reports that during a panel discussion at the Conservative Political Action Caucus Thursday, Milwaukee County Sheriff David A. Clarke Jr. said "he has a way to put a stop to sanctuary cities – use a federal statute to charge local officials for harboring aliens." Said Clarke, "I'm telling you right now folks, you charge one mayor, one governor, one council president that adopts these laws, this stuff is going to end right away." Clarke argued that sanctuary cities "provide cover" for "criminal illegal aliens to continue to prey on not only law-abiding people but also illegal immigrants in this country."

Taub, Fisher: Proposed Deportation Rules Risk Creating "Fragmented" Society. In the New York Times (2/23, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), Amanda Taub and Max Fisher say the Administration's proposed deportation rules "risk creating an American underclass with parallels to others around the world," such as "slum residents in India, guest workers in oil-rich Persian Gulf states and internal migrant workers in China." The groups, Taub and Fisher say, "provide a cautionary tale for what could happen" if illegal immigrants "are forced deep into the shadows." The authors say that the undocumented immigrants are "stuck in a gray zone outside the legal system," making them "vulnerable to exploitation, including wage theft and sex trafficking." Taub and Fisher say the end result could be "a fragmented" society, rather than the "cohesive society" that the Administration seeks.

Deportation Plan Dominates US Officials' Visit To Mexico.

Bloomberg Politics (2/23, Cattan, 201K) reports Secretary of State Tillerson and DHS Secretary Kelly "wanted to focus on a range of bilateral issues, including trade, in a meeting with their Mexican counterparts" on Thursday in Mexico City, but instead "immigration concerns dominated" the meeting. In its lead story, ABC World News Tonight  (2/23, lead story, 3:40, Muir, 14.63M) reported Tillerson and Kelly arrived in Mexico at a time when that country is "furious with the Administration's new plan to deport some undocumented immigrants to Mexico, even if they are not Mexican." On CNN's Situation Room  (2/23, 554K), Elise Labott said "the Mexicans do seem to be caught off guard. Normally, you have the White House rolling out a policy several days before the visit. There is time for dust to clear and the aides to set the meetings." Nevertheless, Tillerson "called the talks productive."

NBC Nightly News  (2/23, story 4, 1:35, Alexander, 16.61M) reported that prior to their arrival, demonstrators set fire to a fake wall, and "many were demanding that the Mexican president refuse to meet with" the two US officials. Tillerson tried "to translate [Trump's] tough talk into diplomacy," saying, "Two strong sovereign countries from time to time will have differences."

Reuters (2/23, Alper, Torres) reports Mexican officials expressed "worry and irritation" about Trump's policies during talks with Tillerson and Kelly, "giving a chilly reply to the new administration's hard line on immigration, trade and security." Foreign Minister Luis Videgaray told reporters, "There exists among Mexicans worry and irritation about what are perceived to be policies that could be harmful for the national interest and for Mexicans here and abroad." The Washington Times (2/23, Dinan, 272K) says Mexican officials "scolded their American counterparts," using the meeting to "register their displeasure and demand that the US not increase the number of people deported to Mexico." The New York Post (2/23, Moore, 3.82M) says Videgaray also expressed "concerns" about "the rights of Mexicans living in the US."

According to the Los Angeles Times (2/23, McDonnell, 4.52M), Videgaray told lawmakers "in private comments" on Wednesday that Mexico is preparing for a long "battle" with the Trump Administration, and is "prepared to retaliate with new tariffs if necessary." He is quoted as saying, "We are here preparing for a battle that is going to be long. This is not going to be resolved in three days."

In his "Talking Points Memo" segment on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor  (2/23, 767K), Bill O'Reilly said, "It's entirely Mexico's fault that millions of their own citizens feel they have to come here to earn a decent living. ... Mexico should take full responsibility for its inability to provide a decent economy for its own people and for failing to defeat the vicious drug peddling monsters. But they never will."

DeVos: Obama's Transgender Bathroom Guidance Was An "Overreach."

A day after the Trump Administration rescinded the Obama Administration transgender bathroom guidance, Education Secretary DeVos on Thursday told the Conservative Political Action Conference that the previous Administration's rules were "an overreach," USA Today (2/23, Estepa, 5.28M) reports. DeVos said, according to the Washington Times (2/23, Sherfinski, 272K), "Let me just say that this issue was a very huge example of the Obama administration's overreach to suggest a one-size-fits-all federal government approach, top-down approach to issues that are best dealt with and solved [at] a personal level and a local level."

The New York Times (2/23, Pérez-Peña, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that before the decision was announced, DeVos "met with a representative of gay and transgender employees at the Education Department to warn of what was coming." While an aide "assured the employee that, as was widely reported, Ms. DeVos had resisted the move, according to people briefed on the Wednesday meeting," DeVos "gave no public sign that there had been a rift within the Trump administration, or that she had come up short." However, "people who have known and watched Ms. DeVos through the years...warn against thinking that she will be a meek team player." In her home state of Michigan, DeVos "earned a reputation as a driven, relentless and effective political fighter, using her family's vast fortune to reward allies and punish foes, and working behind the scenes to pass legislation and unseat lawmakers who opposed her."

ABC World News Tonight  (2/23, story 4, 0:40, Muir, 14.63M) reported that White House press secretary Sean Spicer said Thursday that "it's not a matter for the federal government to decide." Spicer: "I think it's not a question of whether it's a civil right, it's where it's appropriately addressed. And as I noted, it's appropriately addressed at the state level." The Washington Post (2/23, Brown, Balingit, 11.43M) says that in the wake of the Administration rescinding the guidance, "school officials from New York to Washington to Tulsa, Okla., moved quickly this week to assure their communities that they would continue to allow students to use bathrooms aligned with their gender identity." Meanwhile, other districts never complied with the guidelines and do not intend to do so now. The result is "a patchwork of policies on transgender student accommodations that varies widely across the country."

The Washington Times (2/23, Richardson, 272K) reports that in an indication of "how states might proceed" now that Trump has rescinded the order, the National Conference of State Legislatures says lawmakers in 12 states "are considering bills that would require transgender people to use bathroom and locker room facilities based on their 'biological sex' or birth gender." Matt Sharp, legal counsel for the Alliance Defending Freedom, said, "I think [the repeal is] going to give states the motivation to start considering laws creating a baseline of privacy for all students...and really bring this issue back to where it belongs, which is in the states and local schools that know their students best." In that same vein, the Los Angeles Times (2/23, Lee, 4.52M) says the Administration's step "has buoyed the hopes of supporters of so-called bathroom bills, but they still face opposition in many states, even conservative ones."

The Administration move is prompting criticism from several fronts. Bloomberg News (2/23, Hagan, 2.41M) says it has "provoked one more outcry from Silicon Valley." Tech firms including Apple, Facebook and Microsoft "released statements and tweets following the administration's announcement."

In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M), former Education Secretary Arne Duncan and former Assistant Education Secretary Catherine Lhamon write that the Administration decision "reflects a fundamental misunderstanding of the federal role in protecting the civil rights of students," confuses "states and school districts, and puts real, live children at greater risk of harm." They add that while the federal government "rightly defers to states and school districts" on "issues such as standards and curriculum," when "it comes to protecting students, the law is clear: Civil rights are paramount."

In an editorial, the New York Times (2/23, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) cites Trump's campaign promise "to protect lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender Americans from violence and oppression," and says it is not surprising he has sided with Attorney General Sessions on rescinding the transgender bathroom guidance, because "has demonstrated time and again that his stated personal convictions are malleable." A Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) editorial also criticizes the decision, saying that while Trump once "seemed able to see through this hysteria, expressing support for the rights of transgender people to 'use the bathroom that they feel is appropriate' and saying Caitlyn Jenner was welcome to use whatever bathroom at Trump Tower she wanted," his endorsement of "the rollback of protections will inflict needless suffering on transgender students, a vulnerable population already subjected to harassment and bullying."

Decision Will Impact Supreme Court Case. USA Today (2/23, Wolf, 5.28M) reports that the Administration decision "could remove the controversial issue from the Supreme Court's docket this spring – or lead the justices to render an even more significant ruling." Next month, the Court is sent to hear Virginia high school student's legal fight to use the bathroom of his choice. However, a Federal appeals court in Richmond relied on the guidance last year "in ruling that Gavin Grimm should be permitted to use the boys' bathroom at his Gloucester County school, and the school district promptly appealed to the Supreme Court." The removal of that policy means the High Court can "vacate that decision and send the case back, or decide on their own which bathrooms are suitable under a 1972 federal law prohibiting sex discrimination." On Thursday, the Court "gave lawyers on both sides six days to submit their views on how best to proceed."

In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/23, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), Ria Tabacco Mar, a staff lawyer for the ACLU's Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender and H.I.V. Project, argues that "the president and his executive agencies cannot change what Title IX says and means. Those jobs still belong to Congress and the federal courts." The Grimm case, Mar adds, "could neutralize the Trump administration's cruel blow to vulnerable transgender youth."

Report: One In 137 Teens Would Identify As Transgender. The New York Times (2/23, Chokshi, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that "an analysis of state and federal data" shows that "nearly 150,000 American teenagers from 13 to 17 years old – or one out of every 137 – would identify as transgender if survey takers asked." The Times says the estimate, which was published in a report from Jody L. Herman, a scholar of public policy at the Williams Institute at the UCLA School of Law, and several co-authors, "stands to inform the fierce debate over the rights of transgender youth."

Trump, Trudeau Discuss Border Cooperation.

Reuters (2/23, Ljunggren) reports Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and President Trump on Thursday "discussed cooperation along the countries' shared border," Trudeau's office said in a statement without providing further details. Reuters notes that "dozens of asylum seekers, worried about Trump's plans for cracking down on immigration, have been crossing into Canada in recent weeks, putting a strain on border communities."

Southwest States May Hinder Trump's Border Wall.

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Frosch, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) highlights efforts in Southwestern US states to hinder President Trump's efforts to build a wall along the US border with Mexico including legislation from New Mexico Democratic state lawmakers to prohibit the Federal government from acquiring the land to build the wall and California Lt. Gov. Gavin Newsom's discussion of using state and federal environmental laws to hinder stymie construction.

Salvadoran Woman Awaiting Emergency Surgery "Forcibly Moved" To Detention Facility. The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Demick, 4.52M) reports that ICE agents "forcibly moved" Sara Beltran-Hernandez, "a critically ill woman from El Salvador who was awaiting emergency surgery for a brain tumor" from a Texas hospital to a detention center, "raising concerns about President Trump's directive to more aggressively pursue people living in the country illegally." Beltran-Hernandez "was bound by her hands and feet and removed by wheelchair from Huguley Hospital in Fort Worth late Wednesday" and taken to "a detention facility in Alvarado, Texas." Attorneys representing the woman in an asylum petition "said they plan to file an emergency appeal in Texas to get their client returned to the hospital."

CBP Agents Ask For Flight Passengers' IDs In Search For Undocumented Immigrant. The Washington Post (2/23, Lowery, 11.43M) reports that US Customs and Border Protection "confirmed" on Thursday "that their agents requested to see the identification of domestic flight passengers landing at a New York airport Wednesday night as they searched for an undocumented immigrant who had received a deportation order to leave the United States." The agency said two CBP agents "asked passengers who had been on Delta Flight 1583 from San Francisco to show their identification while deplaning after landing at John F. Kennedy Airport at about 8 p.m. Wednesday." The search "was conducted at the request of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, CBP said in a statement, but the person they were seeking was not on the flight." A CBP spokesperson "said that the undocumented individual, who they did not publicly identify, received a deportation order after multiple criminal convictions for domestic assault, driving while impaired, and violating a protective order."

Pew Poll Gauges How Hispanic Immigrants See Their Place In US. The AP (2/23, Holland) reports that a Pew Research Center survey taken in December and January and released Thursday found that "more than half of Hispanic immigrants who were neither born in the United States nor have a permanent resident card said they were concerned about their place in the United States, even before the Trump administration made clear its intentions to aggressively crack down on illegal immigration." According to the survey, "55 percent of Hispanics surveyed who were foreign born and neither US citizens nor legal residents – a group Pew said was the most likely to be in the country without authorization – said they had serious concerns about their place in America after President Donald Trump's election." Among "Hispanic lawful permanent residents," 49 percent had the same concerns. Meanwhile, 59 percent of US-born Hispanics "said they were confident about their place in America, along with 60 percent of those US citizens who were foreign-born."

Former SOCOM Commander: Trump's Comments About Media A Threat To Democracy.

The Washington Times (2/23, Ernst, 272K) reports Ret. Adm. William McRaven, the former head of Special Operations Command, said Tuesday that he views President Trump's comments about the media as possibly "the greatest threat to democracy" in his lifetime. The current University of Texas system chancellor told members of the school's communication college that efforts to characterize the media as an "enemy" must be challenged. The Daily Texan quoted McRaven as saying, "We must challenge this statement and this sentiment that the news media is the enemy of the American people."

Ginsburg Says Reporters "Trying" To Tell "Truth," Praises Women's March. The AP (2/23, Hananel) reports Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg told BBC's "Newsnight" in a Thursday interview that she reads the Washington Post and the New York Times daily and "reporters are trying to tell the public the truth." While Ginsburg did not comment on President Trump directly, the AP says, the Justice "said she was encouraged" by the women's march in Washington. Ginsburg said, "I've never seen such a demonstration, both the numbers and the rapport of the people in that crowd." She added, "There was no violence, it was orderly. So yes, we are not experiencing the best times, but there is reason to hope that we will see a better day."

O'Keefe Offering $10,000 For Evidence Of Wrongdoing By Media.

The Washington Times (2/23, Richardson, 272K) reports "conservative sleuth" James O'Keefe "is ramping up his effort to take down the mainstream media" by asking "ordinary citizens to go undercover and expose wrongdoing in newsrooms" across the US. O'Keefe said he will award $10,000 to any person who provides evidence of "corruption, malfeasance and wrongdoing" in the press. O'Keefe said in a video, "If you have hidden audio recordings, videotapes or documents inside of a newsroom or media institution, and the material is good enough, I will pay you $10,000."

Strassel: Conflict Over Pentagon Staff Hurting Efforts To Improve Pentagon.

In her Wall Street Journal (2/23, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) column, Kimberley Strassel says conflict between the White House and Defense Secretary Mattis over who to appoint for senior level Pentagon positions risks leaving Mattis without the necessary staff to carry out needed changes for the military. Strassel argues that while Mattis' desire not to consider politics when choosing his staff has merit, the positions ultimately report to the President and carry out his vision.

WPost: World Leaders Should Treat Public Health Issues Like National Security Threats.

In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) says that Bill Gates' address at the Munich Security Conference Saturday "should have caught everyone's attention" because he said world leaders should equate the urgency of public health issues with the urgency of national security threats. While it may be impossible to anticipate the next "fast-moving [wave] of peril," Gates argued that more support should go toward research on speeding up vaccine development with genomics and more time and resources should be spent on surveillance to identify the outbreak of diseases before epidemics spread. A third priority should be exercises and training "the way the military prepares for war," said Gates.

Republicans Expected To Use Congressional Review Act To Repeal Obama Agency Rules.

Roll Call (2/23, Mejdrich, 63K) reports that congressional Republicans "are expected to send a stream of bills...to President Donald Trump's desk, using a process to repeal agency rules known as the Congressional Review Act," which "allows Congress to repeal certain rules of the previous administration under a fast-track process that requires only a simple majority in the Senate." The Act also "states that a rule 'may not be reissued in substantially the same form, and a new rule that is substantially the same as such a rule may not be issued, unless the reissued or new rule is specifically authorized by a law enacted after the date of the joint resolution disapproving the original rule.'"

Bannon Rips Media, Vows Trump Will Push Forward With Agenda.

Coverage of the joint appearance Thursday by Chief Strategist Steve Bannon and Chief of Staff Priebus at the annual Conservative Political Action Conference – which included reports on all three major network newscasts – focuses heavily on two themes: First, Bannon's excoriation of the media and his vow that President Trump is committed to following through on his campaign promises; and second, Bannon and Priebus seeking to put to rest reports of a rift between the two men.

In the lead story for the  CBS Evening News (2/23, lead story, 2:55, Pelley, 11.17M), Margaret Brennan reported that Bannon, making "a rare appearance," portrayed "himself as a revolutionary." Bannon was shown saying, "There's a new political order that's being formed out of this, and it's still being formed. But if you look at the wide degree of opinions in this room, whether you're a populist, whether you're a limited-government conservative, whether you're a libertarian, whether you're an economic nationalist, we have wide and sometimes divergent opinions. We are a nation with a culture and a reason for being. And I think that's what unites us." Brennan added, "Bannon, a former Goldman Sachs banker who previously ran conservative website Breitbart, repeatedly attacked the media, which he referred to as 'the opposition party.'"

On  ABC World News Tonight (2/23, story 3, 1:25, Karl, 14.63M), Jonathan Karl reported that in "rare public comments," Bannon, "dubbed 'the Great Manipulator' by the TIME magazine" and who "may be the President's most powerful and controversial aide," said that President Trump "won't moderate his views and won't back down from an all-out battle with his opponents." Referring to the media, Bannon was shown showing, "If you think they are going to give you your country back without a fight, you are sadly mistaken. Every day, every day it is going to be a fight."

On  NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 2, 2:30, Holt, 16.61M), Lester Holt reported that Bannon made "a rare public appearance." NBC's Hallie Jackson added, "Stepping out of shadows of the West Wing, one of the President's most trusted advisers in a rare public appearance." Jackson described the "controversial" Bannon as "the power behind the populist brand that propelled Donald Trump to victory."

The New York Times (2/23, Peters, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that when Bannon on Thursday "appeared in public...for the first time since the president was sworn in, it was to deliver, in his own combative way, a message of soothing reassurance to the conservative activists" at CPAC. Bannon told the crowd "not [to] believe the 'corporatist globalist media' that was 'crying and weeping' on election night and is still 'dead wrong' about what the Trump administration is doing. Inside the White House, Mr. Bannon said, everything is going according to plan. The 'deconstruction of the administrative state' has just begun."

The Washington Times (2/23, Sherfinski, 272K) reports that Bannon and Priebus "assured conservatives" that Trump "will keep pressing on 'all of those promises' that got him elected, rejected reports of chaos within the White House and accused a hostile press of trying to undermine the new administration." The Times adds, "The joint appearance of" the pair "seemed designed to combat reports of discord within the White House – a characterization Mr. Priebus called 'ridiculous' and Mr. Bannon called 'dead wrong.'"

The Washington Post (2/23, Rucker, Costa, 11.43M), describing Bannon as "the reclusive mastermind behind...Trump's nationalist ideology and combative tactics," reports that Bannon delivered "a fiery rebuke of the media and [declared] that the new administration is in an unending battle for 'deconstruction of the administrative state,'" by which he meant "the system of taxes, regulations and trade pacts that the president says have stymied economic growth and infringed upon US sovereignty."

Breitbart (2/23, Spiering, 2.02M) reports that the crowd "applauded and cheered when Bannon spoke of the deconstruction of the administrative state, cutting cabinet agency regulations that were choking business growth. 'The way the progressive left runs is that if they can't get it passed, they're just going to put it in some sort of regulation in an agency,' he said. 'That's all going to be deconstructed.'"

The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Bierman, 4.52M) reports that during "a rare public appearance together," Bannon and Priebus "agreed on one common enemy: the media." The Times says Priebus, "who is often described as 'embattled,' said he has grown 'conditioned' to the media counting Trump out: during the presidential campaign, the transition and the first month of the presidency. 'The biggest misconception is everything that you're reading,' Priebus said." Bannon, meanwhile, "consistently called the media 'the opposition party.'"

Reuters (2/23, Cowan, Sullivan) reports that Bannon, making "a rare public appearance," urged "conservatives to unite behind [Trump] as he presses his agenda." Bannon told "the gathering, 'We want you to have our back' in upcoming battles, and [denounced] media criticism of Trump."

The Huffington Post (2/23, Bobic, 237K) reports that Bannon "denounced the 'corporatist, globalist media' for being 'adamantly opposed to an economic nationalist agenda'" being pushed by Trump. Bannon "repeated a reference to the media as the 'opposition party,' and bashed it for being 'always wrong' about the workings of the administration." Priebus concurred with the assessment, "adding that he hoped the relationship between the press and the White House would improve. 'It's going to get worse,' Bannon said."

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Bender, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that Bannon pledged that Trump's budget proposal would make good on the President's campaign vows. Said Bannon, "We have a team that's just grinding it through on what President Donald Trump promised the American people. And the mainstream media better understand something – all those promises are going to be implemented." The Washington Times (2/23, Ernst, 272K) quotes Bannon as saying of Trump, "He's laid out an agenda with those speeches, with the promises he made, and our job everyday is just to execute on that." Bannon added, "And he's maniacally focused on that."

Bannon, Priebus Dispute Reports That They Are At Odds With Each Other. The Hill (2/23, Kamisar, 1.25M) reported that while Bannon was "portrayed by 'Saturday Night Live' as the Grim Reaper" and "on the cover of Time magazine as 'the great manipulator,'" during Thursday's "rare public appearance," he "presented a softer image." The Hill added that Bannon "was relaxed and smiling on the convention hall stage next to a chipper Priebus," as the pair "sought to temper Bannon's public image and rebut reports of discord between the administration's top two advisers."

USA Today (2/23, Jackson, 5.28M) says that both men "disputed media reports casting them as rivals in Trump's political court, and each said they are working together to advance the president's ambitious agenda." USA Today adds, "Moderator Matt Schlapp – chairman of the American Conservative Union, which sponsors CPAC – seemed amused by the Bannon/Priebus pleasantries, saying at one point, 'you guys have been so kumbayah.'"

McClatchy (2/23, Glueck, 74K) reports, "Despite several weeks of often-rough headlines for the administration and rampant chatter about tensions between Bannon and Priebus, the two men sought to project unity." Said Priebus, "In regard to us two, the biggest misconception is everything you're reading," adding, "We share an office suite together, we're basically together from 6:30 in the morning until about 11:00 at night."

Law Professors File Misconduct Complaint Against Conway.

The Washington Post (2/23, Horwitz, 11.43M) reports that a group of law professors has filed a misconduct complaint against Conway, "who was admitted to the D.C. Bar in 1995." The letter, from 15 professors who specialize in legal ethics, "said Conway should be sanctioned for violating government ethics rules and 'conduct involving dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation.'" The professors "cite several incidents, including a television interview in which Conway made the 'false statement that President Barack Obama had 'banned' Iraqi refugees from coming into the United States for six months'" after the "Bowling Green Massacre," as well as "the use of her position to endorse Ivanka Trump products." They argue that while Conway once "understood her ethical responsibilities as a lawyer and abided by them." She "is currently acting in a way that brings shame upon the legal profession."

Spencer Asked To Leave CPAC.

The Washington Times (2/23, Sherfinski, 272K) reports that "ethno-nationalist 'alt-right' movement" leader Richard Spencer "was booted from the Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC) on Thursday." American Conservative Union spokesman Ian Walters said, "He's not welcome here." Spencer posted a video online in which he "said he was 'expelled' from the event and had been 'politely asked to leave.'"

The Washington Post (2/23, Weigel, 11.43M) says that in his speech to the conference, ACU executive director Dan Schneider "challenged the media to stop referring to the 'alt-right,'...as conservative." Schneider said, "There is a sinister organization that is trying to warp its way into our ranks. ... We must not be deceived by [a] hateful, left-wing fascist group." He continued, "They hate the Constitution. They hate free markets. They hate pluralism. ... Fascists tend to want big government control."

Chamber of Commerce: Trump Should Halt, Evaluate Fiduciary Rule.

US Chamber of Commerce Center for Capital Markets Competitiveness President and CEO David Hirschmann and Randel Johnson, the chamber's senior vice president of labor, immigration and employee benefits, write in a USA Today (2/23, 5.28M) op-ed that President Trump's request to review the Labor Department's "well-intentioned, but poorly designed, fiduciary rule" is "a necessary first step in halting the rule's implementation and calling for an evaluation of its true impact." Hirschmann and Johnson say the rule's "rushed compliance period, severe consequences and compliance burdens" hinder small businesses' retirement plan offerings, and its flawed enforcement mechanism will lead to "frivolous lawsuits."

USA Today: Existing "Commonsense" Fiduciary Rule "Should Not Even Be Controversial." In an editorial, USA Today (2/23, 5.28M) argues the fiduciary rule the Administration has put under review is "not an onerous regulation," but rather a "commonsense rule" that "should not even be controversial." The fiduciary rule is a "simple measure that is needed to boost savings rates," and its end "will simply make brokerages richer at the expense of unsophisticated savers," says USA Today.

Stocks "Wobbled" As Dow Rises For 10th Straight Day.

The AP (2/23) reports that stocks "wobbled Thursday as investors changed course and tempered their expectations for faster economic growth." The Dow added 34.72 points to close at 20,810.32 and the S&P 500 rose 0.99 points to finish at 2,363.81, while the Nasdaq ended the day 25.12 points lower at 5,835.51. USA Today (2/23, Shell, 5.28M) says Thursday was the first time in nearly four years that the Dow "finish[ed] higher 10 consecutive trading days."

Scott Pelley said on the CBS Evening News (2/23, story 5, 1:40, Pelley, 11.17M) that "many people" are referring to it as "the Trump Rally." Jim Axelrod added that "industrial companies are expecting an increase in infrastructure spending as we saw today when the President met with manufacturing executives to discuss jobs." The President "has signaled he will push for an infrastructure spending bill, and, of course, everyone likes the signals on corporate tax reforms and regulation rollbacks." Early Thursday evening, Trump tweeted a Fox Business story headlined, "S&P 500 Edges Higher After Trump Renews Jobs Pledge." As 11:30 p.m., the post had been retweeted more than 6,000 times and liked more than 32,000 times.

A separate USA Today (2/23, Shell, 5.28M) analysis says that while "optimism is on the rise as investors cheer better economic numbers and stronger corporate profits," Lamar Villere, co-manager of the Villere Balanced Fund, warned, "The first time one of Trump's major economic policy platforms gets shut down by Congress, you might get the market to say, 'Hmm, maybe this won't happen.' The market could start to get shaky. ... You could have a pullback, as it would remove one of the main reasons for the rally." USA Today goes on to list other factors "that could roil the market."

State Department Says Press Briefings Will Resume "Soon."

The Washington Times (2/23, Taylor, 272K) reports the State Department is "pushing back against criticism from former senior officials and journalists over the lack of press conferences and other media access" at the department since Secretary of State Tillerson was sworn in three weeks ago. "The Department of State continues to provide members of the media a full suite of services," acting spokesman Mark Toner said, asserting that the department had "answered 174 questions from reporters in the [US] and around the globe in the past 24 hours alone." Toner also said "regular press briefings" will resume "soon" as officials explore ways to try and open them digitally to a wider group of reporters.

Under Fire At Town Halls, Republicans Hedge Their Support For Trump Agenda.

The Washington Post (2/23, Weigel, 11.43M) reports that town halls being held this week during the congressional recess "have repeatedly found Republicans hedging their support for" President Trump's "agenda – and in many cases contradicting their own past statements. Hostile questions put them on record criticizing some of the fights...Trump has picked, or pledging to protect policies such as the more popular elements of Obamacare. And voters got it all on tape, promising to keep hounding their lawmakers if they falter." As one example, the Post says that Sen. Chuck Grassley, asked during a town hall whether he backs an investigation of "Trump's tax returns," offered "a qualified 'yes.'"

On the  CBS Evening News (2/23, story 4, 2:15, Pelley, 11.17M), Scott Pelley reported, "Congressional Republicans are getting an earful in their town hall meetings." CBS' Nancy Cordes added, "The question for Republicans this week: How strongly to defend the President. ... When they're already dealing with Democratic anger over plans to repeal Obamacare."

Politico: Republicans Divided On Whether Paid Protesters Behind Raucous Town Halls. Politico (2/23, Nelson, 2.46M) reported, "A rift has opened up among Republicans over whether paid protesters are the root cause of raucous town halls, with the White House fueling the narrative that organized, disruptive sympathizers of Hillary Clinton are the culprits." Politico said GOP lawmakers "have taken different stances in the debate." For example, Grassley has argued "there's no 'evidence' that paid protesters are disguising themselves as angry constituents." However, "others have adopted a stance more in line with the White House's," with Rep. Jason Chaffetz, for instance, contending "that Democrats were 'bullying' in a 'concerted effort' to create chaos."

Under the headline "Takeaways From A Week Of Raucous Town Halls," Politico (2/23, Cheney, 2.46M) reported, "Some Republicans – including White House aides – have complained that the protests popping up at town halls have been orchestrated by liberal activists, perhaps by paying out-of-district residents to pack GOP events. But lawmakers who showed up weren't so sure they were facing an artificial resistance."

In another report, Politico (2/23, Nelson, 2.46M) said that Counselor to the president Kellyanne Conway, appearing Thursday on Fox News, "dismissed the angry crowds that have filled town hall meetings hosted by GOP lawmakers across the country as little more than the venting of frustration by a directionless Democratic Party." Said Conway, "Some people are upset with an election result they didn't see coming. And the fact that this president, a man of action and impact is actually keeping his promises at very fast clip early in his administration."

WSJournal: Many At GOP Town Halls New To Political Activism. Under the headline "America's Rowdy Town Halls: More Organic Than Organized," the Wall Street Journal (2/23, Tau, Andrews, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that the White House and leading Republicans have for the most part contended the angry crowds showing up at GOP town halls are the product of professional organizers and activists who are being paid. However, the Journal says interviews it conducted, both with attendees of a town hall held this week by Rep. Leonard Lance and audience members at similar events across the US, found that a number of those people had never taken part in a town hall or political activism of any sort.

Sen. Bernie Sanders said on CNN's Out Front (2/23, 409K), "If you don't have the guts to face your constituents, you shouldn't be in the United States Congress. If you need police at the meetings, that's fine, have police at the meetings, have security at the meetings. But don't use that as an excuse to run away from your constituents after you support repealing the Affordable Care Act, doing away with pre-existing conditions. If you're going to do all those things, answer the questions your constituents have."

Meanwhile, a number of reports on the topic focus on various GOP lawmakers across the country. CNN (2/22, Williams, Murphy, 29.79M) reported on its website, "After testy town halls" held by Republican lawmakers such as Chaffetz and Grassley "went viral, some GOP politicians are staying clear of town hall-style events in their home districts." In response, "constituents have turned to some creative ways to voice their displeasure." For example, referring to Rep. Paul Cook, CNN said, "Missing congressman notices have been photographed on milk cartons and posted to the @WhereIsPaulCook Twitter account and website."

The AP (2/23) reports that Rep. Martha McSally "held a town hall-style meeting in Sahuarita," taking "questions from a loud but largely non-confrontational audience Thursday at a church that seats about 300. Organizers of a competing town hall in Tucson had repeatedly invited McSally, but she refused to attend that event," saying "activists wanted an opportunity to verbally berate members of Congress in a public setting and" calling "the attempt a 'political ambush for political theater.'" On its website, CNN (2/23, Fox, 29.79M) reported that McSally "broke with her party and President Donald Trump on a handful of occasions and yet failed to assuage the progressives in the audience who screamed at her to 'answer the question.'"

In another dispatch, the AP (2/23) reports, "A sometimes hostile crowd peppered" Rep. David Young on Thursday "with questions about the Affordable Care Act, environment and other issues at a public forum in Urbandale." The AP says an audience member asked Young "if health care would remain affordable for his 1-year-old son, who was born with a serious health problem. The crowd jeered Young as he sidestepped giving 'a definite answer' but said the boy wouldn't be denied care."

Study: Anti-Muslim, Anti-Immigrant Hate Groups Thrive On Twitter.

USA Today (2/23, Eversley, 5.28M) reports a study released this week by the community security research organization Safe Home this week shows hate groups targeting Muslims and immigrants had the largest number of followers on Twitter, and the number of likes and comments on hate group tweets was higher in 2016 than any year since 2008. Geographically, the Southern states of Arkansas, Mississippi, and Tennessee are home to the highest number of hate groups per capita, with South Dakota and Montana not far behind.

WSJournal: Gorsuch Confirmation Will Buttress Second Amendment Rights.

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) editorializes that the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals' ruling this week upholding Maryland's ban on military-style weapons underscores the importance of confirming Judge Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court, arguing that with Gorsuch on the court, a new majority will soon be in place to reinforce the court's ruling in DC v. Heller, in which it upheld the individual right to bear arms.

WPost: Bowser's Experienced Police Chief Choice Newsham "Makes Sense."

The Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) editorializes that Mayor Muriel Bowser's Thursday announcement that Peter Newsham will succeed Cathy Lanier as D.C. police chief, pending D.C. Council approval, "makes sense" for his help "transforming the department into a model agency." Noting his 28-year commitment to the D.C. force, the Post says he worked closely with police chiefs in the reform and professionalization of the force that has led to "a declining crime rate, the pioneering use of data and a department held out as a national example of how to make community policing work." The Post estimates that Newsham will survive inquiry into the "blemishes on his record" because he has learned lessons that put "him in good stead" to fulfill police chief responsibilities.

Arkansas Supreme Court Strikes Down City's LGBT Protections.

The AP (2/23, DeMillo) reports from Little Rock, AR that the Arkansas Supreme Court on Thursday "struck down a city's ordinance banning discrimination based on a person's sexual orientation or gender identity, but it stopped short of saying whether a state law aimed at prohibiting such local LGBT protections is constitutional." The court "reversed a judge's decision that Fayetteville's anti-discrimination ordinance didn't violate a state law prohibiting cities from enacting protections not covered by state law." The AP adds that Fayetteville, "a liberal enclave in northwestern Arkansas, is one of several cities that approved local protections for lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender people in response to the 2015 law." In the unanimous ruling, "the justices rejected the argument that Fayetteville and other cities with such ordinances have made, that such protections are covered elsewhere in state law."

SCOTUS Will Not Hear Ohio Man's Amish Hair-Cutting Case.

The AP (2/23) reports that the Supreme Court "won't review the case of the Ohio leader of a breakaway group that was accused in hair- and beard-cutting attacks on fellow Amish." Defense attorneys "challenged the constitutionality of the federal hate crimes law and how a kidnapping allegation was used to stiffen the sentence for 71-year-old Samuel Mullet Sr.," who "petitioned the Supreme Court after a federal court rejected his appeal last May." Mullet's attorney, Ed Bryan, said "he is disappointed by the high court's decision this week not to take up the case." Prosecutors "said some of the victims in the 2011 attacks were awakened in the middle of the night and restrained as others cut their hair and beards, which have spiritual significance in the Amish faith," and "prosecutors alleged the motive was religious, while the defense attributed it to family disputes."

Cruz Predicts Another SCOTUS Vacancy Later This Year.

The Washington Post (2/23, Sullivan, 11.43M) reports that in "one of his most prominent political appearances in months," Sen. Ted Cruz predicted at the Conservative Political Action Conference

Thursday "that there will be another vacancy on the Supreme Court later this year" and "appeared to suggest that a departure of one of justices from the liberal wing of the court would trigger the opening." Cruz said, "The Scalia seat is defense. ... We're not going to get any better than Justice Scalia. The best we can do is preserve constitutional victories like upholding the Second Amendment. . . . I think we'll have another Supreme Court vacancy this summer. If that happens, as much as the left is crazy now, they will go full Armageddon." Cruz reiterated those comments in an interview with Fox News' Special Report  (2/23, 1.53M), saying, "I think the odds are very good we will see a [Supreme Court] vacancy this summer. If not this summer, next summer. ... The next vacancy, which is going to be the opportunity to shift the course of this court, to put a five justice majority of constitutionalists on the court – that's going to be Armageddon and we need to be prepared to make the case to the American people."

Military Leaders Want Higher Level Talks With Russia About Air Operations Over Iraq, Syria.

The Washington Post (2/23, Lamothe, 11.43M) reports that senior US military officials "want to elevate talks with Russia about air operations over Iraq and Syria" in an effort to prevent mid-air collisions. However, the Post says that the prospect of discussions on the issue are "complicated by concerns at the Pentagon that doing so will make it look like Washington and Moscow have begun to collaborate on the battlefield." A 2015 agreement between the US and Russia "called for the use of specific communication frequencies and the establishment of a phone hotline" to deconflict operations, but Lt. Gen. Jeffrey Harrigian indicated the existing agreement has not provided US officers many options when there are points of contention between the two military forces. Harrigian said, "Our perspective has been that there needs to be another layer that allows us to have a more senior-level discussion, and we've got to work through where that layer is."

Mistura added, "They are waiting for a relief of their own suffering, and the dream of a new road out of this nightmare to a real and normal future in dignity." Mistura indicated that he will hold separate talks with each side as they try to create a plan that would lead to discussions about governance, a new constitution, and elections.

Callimachi, Gordon, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says the troops seized most of the facility. The Times says the progress is "an important milestone" in the effort to recapture the western half of Mosul and "is a promising start to what is expected to be a difficult and bloody fight." US Brig. Gen. Matthew Isler said Iraqi forces are "most of the way through the airfield," which New Zealand Brig. Gen. Hugh McAslan said is "ahead of schedule of where we thought they would be."

NBC Nightly News  (2/23, story 7, 1:45, Holt, 16.61M) reported "the offensive is not over" and it "could take another two or three days to secure the airport." The CBS Evening News  (2/23, story 7, 2:10, Pelley, 11.17M) showed CENTCOM Commander Gen. Joseph Votel saying that while the operation "might" go "faster if we did it ourselves," he is "pretty convinced the way we are approaching this, this campaign this time, working through our partners, is kind of the right way of doing it." Votel added that the Iraqis "own this" and "we are helping them, helping them to fight, but we are not fighting for them."

Trump Wants US Nuclear Capabilities To Be At "Top Of The Pack."

NBC Nightly News  (2/23, story 3, 0:55, Holt, 16.61M) reported that in an interview with Reuters on Thursday, President Trump "doubled down in his desire to beef up the nation's nuclear punch." ABC World News Tonight  (2/23, story 2, 1:15, Muir, 14.63M) said Trump "declared he wants the United States to be the world's dominant nuclear power." Trump: "It would be wonderful. A dream would be that no country would have nukes, but if countries are going to have nukes, we're going to be at the top of the pack." Jonathan Karl said Trump's comment comes after Russia violated a 1987 nuclear treaty by deploying a new cruise missile, which the President called "a big deal." In his interview with Reuters (2/23, Holland), Trump called New START "a one-sided deal." Said the President, "Just another bad deal that the country made, whether it's START, whether it's the Iran deal. ... We're going to start making good deals."

Trump Likes Two-State Solution, But Will Leave It Up To Israelis, Palestinians.

In an interview with Reuters (2/23, Holland), President Trump said Thursday that he "likes the concept of a two-state solution to the Israel-Palestinian conflict," but "stopped short of reasserting a US commitment to eventual Palestinian statehood and instead said again" he would be "satisfied with whatever makes both parties happy." Said the President, "I like the two-state solution. But I ultimately like what the both parties like." Reuters says the comments "put a new twist" on a statement he made earlier this month at a news conference with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu that could "send a signal to both sides, as well as the international community, that the principle...will not be discarded if the Trump administration moves forward, as he has promised, with an initiative to restart long-stalled peace efforts."

Trump "Not Liking" Chinese And North Korean Military Moves.

In an interview with Reuters (2/23) on Thursday, the President said he is "not liking" recent military moves by China and North Korea. Said Trump, "I know exactly what's going on between China and North Korea and everybody else. But I don't like talking about military strategy in newspapers. ... I'm not liking it. This didn't take place under the Trump Administration, this took place under the Obama Administration. Many things took place that should not have been allowed. One of them is the building of a...massive military complex in the middle of the South China Sea." Politico (2/23, Lima, 2.46M) reports that while Trump "praised China for halting coal imports from North Korea, he stressed the country's importance in avoiding escalating matters" with Pyongyang, saying, "Whether they say so or not is up to them, but they have tremendous control over North Korea. I think they could solve the problem very easily if they want to."

The existence of the new launch sites was first reported by Reuters on Wednesday, and on Thursday, "photos of the nearly completed structures were obtained" by CSIS.

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Cheng, Wong, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports North Korea criticized long-time ally China in a state-media commentary published Thursday. The commentary, published by the state-controlled Korean Central News Agency, didn't specifically name China, instead referring to "a neighboring country, which often claims itself to be a 'friendly neighbor'." According to the piece, the unnamed country is "styling itself a big power, is dancing to the tune of the US."

Malaysia: Kim Jong-Nam Killed By VX Nerve Agent. The New York Times (2/23, Paddock, Sang-Hun, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Malaysian police announced Friday that the poison used to kill Kim-Jong-Nam, the half-brother of the North Korean leader Kim Jong-Un, was VX nerve agent, which is considered a chemical weapon under Chemical Weapons Conventions of 1997 and 2005. Police said samples taken from Kim's skin and eye were identified as the deadly nerve agent. The Washington Post (2/23, Fiffield, 11.43M) says the finding adds "to the increasing pile of evidence suggesting that Kim Jong Un's regime in North Korea was behind the brazen and public attack on Kim Jong Nam in a Kuala Lumpur airport terminal last week."

CNN's Situation Room (2/23, 554K), however, reported that North Korea is "pushing back strongly" against claims that the regime ordered Kim Jong-Nam's assassination.

State Department spokesman Noel Clay "said he had nothing to confirm at this time."

According to the Washington Times (2/23, Richardson, 272K), "more than 300 scientists have urged President Trump to withdraw from the UN's climate-change agency, warning that its push to curtail carbon dioxide threatens to exacerbate poverty without improving the environment." In a letter to the President, MIT professor emeritus Richard Lindzen called on the US and other nations to "change course on an outdated international agreement that targets minor greenhouse gases," starting with carbon dioxide.

Swedish Minister Hits Back At Trump Criticism.

Reuters (2/23, Ahlander) reports Sweden "hit back" on Thursday at criticism from President Trump, "defending its generous immigration policies and saying the diversity from thousands of asylum seekers would build a stronger society." Justice and Migration Minister Morgan Johansson told Reuters in an interview, "The next time I hope the president, if he's going to speak about Sweden, is better informed about what the conditions really are here," noting that unemployment figures continue to fall and public finances are in sound order, despite record number of immigrants.

Max Karlsson, a 22-year-old Swede who has been running the @Sweden account on Twitter since Monday, writes in the Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) that "fact-checking a president is an unusual task, but even people in power have to be held responsible for making unverified claims — and President Trump is no exception." Karlsson says "Trump's remarks, echoing those of high-level xenophobes, are reckless and not to be thrown around lightly. It's surreal seeing the leader of the free world actually believing that Sweden in going down the drain, making comments that risk increasing polarization and, on a larger scale, dehumanizing migrants and ignoring the human right to asylum."

NYTimes Analysis: European Governments, Like America, Less Welcoming To Migrants.

The New York Times (2/23, Smale, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) interprets Germany's wiretapping approval and mass deportation Wednesday as "a clear sign of the stiffening political headwinds that have made Europe, like America, a less welcoming place for migrants." Although Sweden, the UK, Italy, and Hungary are all "restricting their welcome to strangers," Germany's steps are "more assertive," says the Times, noting this is a year in which Chancellor Angela Merkel faces a tough election challenge. Amnesty International is among the organizations who criticize European states for being too harsh on migrants "simply seeking a better life or striving to escape war and persecution."

Krauthammer: Trump's "Two-Track" Foreign Policy May Work.

Charles Krauthammer writes in his column for the Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) that the set-up of the Administration is "a glaring contradiction," with the heads of State, Homeland Security, the CIA, and especially Defense and the national security adviser representing "mainstream American internationalism," while the President is "inexperienced, untraditional, unbounded" in his approach to foreign policy. Krauthammer argues that so far, the "good-cop, bad-cop" maneuvering seems like it might work a la Nixionian "madman theory," like in cases of China, NATO, free trade, and the Israeli-Palestinian resolution. The risk is that "a two-track, two-policy, two-reality" approach to foreign policy is "unsettling and has the potential to go totally off the rails."

Zakaria: US Can Help Save The Center.

Fareed Zakaria writes in his column for the Washington Post (2/23, 11.43M) that amidst the "rise of radical forces on the left and right around the globe," "the center is rising again." Zakaria presents the likelihood that France's Emmanuel Macron will win the second round of the presidential election as a primary example. Macron is "emphatically in favor of free markets, globalization, the European Union and the transatlantic alliance," meanwhile being "an outsider, a reformer and a charismatic politician." German Chancellor Angela Merkel, with her 11-year reign, is also a bastion of centrism, says Zakaria, who notes she lags behind a left-of-center Martin Schulz, "who is even more pro-European, cosmopolitan and globalist." The US will play a critical role in maintaining, or not, an environment where the center can flourish.

The ads call on voters to petition the senators to seek the investigation.

Trump Says China "Grand Champions" Of Currency Manipulation.

Reuters (2/23, Holland, Lawder) reports President Trump on Thursday characterized China as the "grand champions" of currency manipulation. Trump said during an interview with Reuters that he has not "held back" in accusing China of manipulating the yuan, despite "not acting on a campaign promise to declare" Beijing a currency manipulator on its first day. Reuters adds that Trump's comments came hours after Treasury Secretary Mnuchin "pledged a more methodical approach to analyzing Beijing's foreign exchange practices." Mnuchin told CNBC that he is not prepared at this time to make a determination on China's currency practices.

China Replacing Three Senior Economic Officials. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, A1, Wei, Wong, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that people familiar with the matter say that Chinese President Xi Jinping will be announcing changes to his economic team as China contends with domestic financial risk and tension with trading partners. The Journal says that with China's top banking regulator, commerce minister, and top economic planning official all at the retirement age of 65, two close associates of Xi and a well-known technocrat will replace them. Shandong Province Governor Guo Shuquing is expected to become the commissioner of the China Banking Regulatory Commission (replacing Shang Fulin), Vice Commerce Minister Zhong Shan will become Commerce Minister (replacing Gao Hucheng), and He Lifeng will head the National Development and Reform Commission (replacing Xu Shaoshi).

Trump Convenes Meeting Of Executives To Shape Economic Policies.

NBC Nightly News  (2/23, story 6, 2:05, Holt, 16.61M) reported President Trump "met with the CEO of two dozens manufacturing companies" on Thursday and "asked for their help in coming up with the ways to bring back jobs that are lost to foreign competitions." The New York Times (2/23, Davis, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports the meeting is "giving powerful business leaders a potentially influential hand in shaping his still-evolving economic policies." Trump told the group, "My administration's policies and regulatory reform, tax reform, trade policies will return significant manufacturing jobs to our country." Trump added, "Everything's going to be based on bringing our jobs back – the good jobs, the real jobs. They've left and they're coming back. They have to come back." Trump said his campaign vow on taxes, jobs, and infrastructure helped him win the election and he "dispatched his cabinet and senior staff to gather input from the executives on what those packages should look like." Reuters (2/23, Shepardson, Gibson) reports the executives each attended one of four breakout sessions with Administration officials to discuss a variety of topics including conflict minerals regulations, a lack of qualified workers, export regulations for defense products, vocational training and business taxes.

Javers: Trump Was "Suggesting That A Strong Dollar Could Be Bad" For Caterpillar. Eamon Javers said on CNBC's Closing Bell  (2/23, 142K) that "we saw the President making some comments" during the meeting "that you don't typically hear from the President of the United States." Javers added that "to my ear that sounded a little bit like the President was suggesting that a strong dollar could be bad for Caterpillar in terms of the exports that the President's trying to encourage here. That's not something you usually hear from presidents." Javers continued, "Typically Treasury secretaries say the United States has a strong dollar and that's our policy, but here you're seeing a little bit of a shift here on the part of a White House that wants to emphasize exports over imports."

GE CEO Recounts Trump's Golf Hole-In-One During "The Apprentice" Negotiations. The Washington Times (2/23, Boyer, 272K) reports that during the meeting with executives, the President "prodded" General Electric CEO Jeffrey Immelt to talk about the time Trump shot a hole-in-one on the golf course. The Times says that Immelt "dutifully told the tale of their golf outing in 2004" during negotiations between Trump and NBC for "The Apprentice" show. Immelt said, "President Trump goes up to a par three on his course. He looks at the three of us and says, 'You realize, of course, I'm the richest golfer in the world.' And then gets a hole-in-one." Immelt added, "I have to say, you know, I've seen the magic before." Trump then explained that he "actually said I was the best golfer of all the rich people, to be exact. But then I got a hole-in-one. So it was sort of cool."

NYTimes Analysis: Trump's Economic Policies Leading To "Fear" In Aerospace Industry. The New York Times (2/23, Johnson, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that President Trump's discussion of "border tariffs and new trade deals" has led to "fear" in the aerospace industry that the policies "could raise the cost of American airplanes bought by foreign airlines or governments," leading to a trickle-down impact on the entire supply chain. The Times highlights Boeing as an example, saying that suffering sales or profits could impact the company's "nerve-system supply chain" which is composed of "more than 13,000 companies" in the US and "more than 1.5 million jobs."

Lane: US Business Leaders Must Speak Out Against Harmful Policies. In a Wall Street Journal (2/23, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) op-ed, Bill Lane – Caterpillar's former director of global government affairs – says that while US business leaders are praising or at least not pushing back against President Trump's efforts to prevent jobs from leaving the country, they realize that the approach would hurt their companies in the long run. Lane says the time has come for corporate America to speak out against policies that could hurt the US economy, while also continuing to support beneficial strategies.

The Washington Post is prepared to write a story as early as this weekend that will discuss the so-called "Trump dossier" and how it was handled. The Washington Post has confirmed through a number of sources that a former MI-6 intelligence officer prepared the alleged dossier in 2016 that contained information about then-presidential candidate Trump, his associates and Russia. The story draws upon non-government sources in describing how the FBI and Christopher Steele, known to us for his work in the FIFA investigation, discussed payment for his services including the dossier. It will say that the money has never been paid. It will make clear he worked for opponents of President Trump and had provided credible information during the FIFA investigation. It will also discuss the intelligence community's ability to corroborate some aspects of the dossier but not others. It will include a quote from former DNI Clapper that was released at the time the IC briefed President-elect Trump in NYC.

Importantly, it will not include the FBI agent's name who received the dossier nor the location of the where agent is located or where the meeting took place. It will state that FBI declined to comment for the story.

A second story will detail an individual named Sergey Milian as a main source for some of the information included in the dossier. It will discuss his background and credibility. It will state that he was associated with an organization with ties to Russia that had been investigated by the FBI. The association with this organization will suggest that he did have connections to Russia. At the same time, it will quote associates and acquaintances of Milian that will raise doubts about his credibility.

LEADING THE NEWS

Pressure Grows For Independent Investigation Into Trump-Russia Ties.

In the wake of former House Oversight Chairman Darrell Issa's call for a special prosecutor, the debate over how – or whether – to probe the Trump Administration's ties to Russia continued to intensify on Monday, and was covered by all three broadcast network newscasts. ABC World News Tonight (2/27, story 2, 2:40, Muir, 14.63M) reported, "The White House is pushing back against the idea from Democrats, and at least one top Republican, now calling for a special prosecutor to investigate any possible ties between the President's campaign and Russia." ABC's Jonathan Karl: "The White House today firmly rejected calls for a special prosecutor to investigate Russian influence into the presidential campaign." White House press secretary Sean Spicer: "I guess my question would be, a special prosecutor for what? ... We have now for six months heard story after story come out about unnamed sources saying the same thing over and over again. And nothing's come of it."

NBC Nightly News (2/27, story 3, 2:20, Holt, 16.61M) similarly reported that "pressure is intensifying for an independent investigation on Russia, including a call from a leading Republican. There's also new resistance to those calls by the White House." Issa: "You're going to need to use the special prosecutor's statute and office." Welker: "The President declining to directly weigh in today. Do you support a special prosecutor on Russia? As the press was hustled out, whispering he hasn't spoken to Russia in years." President Trump: "I haven't called Russia in ten years." Welker: "That contradicts Mr. Trump's own public statements. This 2014 speech one of many in which he's touted his ties to Russian President Vladimir Putin." Trump: "As an example I own the Miss Universe, I was in Russia, I was in Moscow recently. And I spoke indirectly and directly with President Putin, who could not have been nicer."

USA Today (2/27, Jackson, 5.28M) says it is "hard to know what Trump meant by his comment" given his 2013 trip to Russia and his conversation with Putin one month ago. The Huffington Post (2/27, Wilkie, 237K) reports that Spicer said on Monday, "The President has said time and time again that he has no [business] interests in Russia, and hasn't talked to people from Russia for years."

The CBS Evening News (2/27, story 3, 2:10, Pelley, 11.17M) focused its coverage on questions of White House pressure on Congress, reporting, "There are questions tonight about whether the White House is trying to influence congressional investigations of the 2016 presidential election and possible contacts between Russia and the Trump campaign." CBS' Nancy Cordes: "[House] Intelligence Chair and Republican Devin Nunes is leading the House investigation in possible collusion between Trump campaign officials and Russian operatives, but he insisted today there was nothing wrong with him and his Senate counterpart Richard Burr making a few calls at the request of Trump's aides." Nunes: "All it was was a White House communications person passing a number and name of a reporter over, if I would talk to them." Cordes: "But that, combined with reports that White House officials made similar requests of the CIA director and FBI officials, prompted fresh accusations from Democrats about White House tampering."

Axios (2/27, Allen) reports in an exclusive that Spicer "personally picked up the phone" and connected CIA Director Pompeo and Senate Intelligence Chairman Richard Burr "with reporters to try to discredit a New York Times article about Trump campaign aides' contact with Russia, then remained on the line for the brief conversations." Spicer "provided reporters' phone numbers" to Nunes, "who offered to make the calls himself." In its top story Monday night, the Huffington Post (2/27, Linkins, 237K) writes that while it is "only natural that Spicer, as press secretary, would try to enable pushback by putting reporters in touch with those who could dispute the story...many of these specific moves Spicer made will have the unintended effect of diminishing the perceived integrity of these sources."

Schiff Questions Comey's Commitment To Probe Of Trump's Ties To Russia. The Hill (2/27, Lillis, 1.25M) reports that Rep. Adam Schiff on Monday questioned FBI Director Comey's desire to cooperate with the House Intelligence Committee's investigation into possible ties between President Trump's campaign and Russia. "I have yet to be convinced … by the director of the FBI that we will have the fulsome kind of cooperation that we will need," said Schiff, top-ranking Democrat on the panel. Without the FBI, Schiff warned, the House Intelligence Committee may not have the resources to conduct the investigation. "We can't become the FBI, we can't send out our own investigators spanning all over the globe," he said. "We will need their cooperation, and whether we will get that in as fulsome a manner as we need has yet to be determined, in my view." Schiff says his committee has requested a "full debriefing on everything that the FBI has looked at" in the Trump campaign case.

Nunes, Schiff At Odds On Scope And Specifics Of Investigation. The AP (2/27, Riechmann) reports that House Intelligence Chairman Nunes said Congress "should not begin a McCarthy-style investigation based on news reports that a few Americans" with ties to Trump "had contacted Russians during the 2016 presidential campaign." Reuters (2/27, Zengerle) reports that Nunes told reporters that "the 'only serious crime' was leaks of information from the Trump administration to the news media and others." The Washington Post (2/27, Demirjian, 11.43M) says it was "the first time a leading House Republican – in this case, the lawmaker who is leading the investigation in the lower chamber – has said flatly that he has not seen any evidence of inappropriate communications between Trump aides and Russia." The Hill (2/27, Williams, 1.25M) also reports on Nunes' remarks.

The New York Times (2/27, Schmidt, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that Nunes and the Intelligence Committee's ranking Democrat, Rep. Adam Schiff, "gave sharply conflicting views" of the investigation, "raising questions about whether they will be able to work together on the inquiry." Schiff said, "We don't know whether there were US persons involved, but it is our responsibility to find out. And I don't think anyone on the committee, or our chairs in the House or Senate, ought to be stating a conclusion or deeming it their responsibility to push back on unfavorable press stories." Schiff said on CNN's OutFront (2/27, 409K), "Let's make sure there is a fully independent commission set up. Let's make sure that the House and Senate Intelligence Committees are free to do their work unfettered by interference from the White House. I think that really has to be the most immediate priority."

Durbin Calls For Independent Commission And Special Prosecutor. Bloomberg Politics (2/27, Dennis, 201K) reports, "The second-ranking US Senate Democrat called Monday for an independent commission as well as a special prosecutor to investigate Russian interference." Senate Minority Whip Durbin told Bloomberg News, "It has to reach a point where we have public sentiment strong enough that we launch an independent, transparent investigation of what the Russians did to us. Think 9/11." Durbin said on MSNBC's Morning Joe (2/27, 270K), "I think we need a special prosecutor or independent commission." Durbin added, "I believe that the venue they have chosen guarantees the American people will not know what is said and ultimately, months from now, maybe years from now, they will produce a classified report which they will say is available to the American people if the approval is gained from the White House."

Other Democrats also weighed in. Senate Intelligence Vice Chairman Mark Warner said on CNN's The Lead (2/27, 320K), "I have said from the outset that I think this committee is the way to go. But if there is any indication that there is an effort to try to stymie or stop us from getting access to information, then we've got to look at other options."

Rep. Kathleen Rice (D-NY) said on CNN's Situation Room (2/27, 554K), "The Trump Administration needs to just bite the bullet and support an independent commission. ... You can't have an Administration leaning on chairmen of relevant committees of jurisdiction that are supposed to be looking into this in order to get their help in a PR campaign."

Sessions Pledges To Preserve DOJ's Independence. Politico (2/27, Gerstein, 2.46M) reports that Attorney General Sessions "is vowing to preserve the independence of the Justice Department in the wake of reports of White House efforts to get the FBI to issue statements to the press about an investigation into alleged Russian influence on the 2016 presidential election," but "speaking to reporters Monday, Sessions cautioned that not all such exchanges between White House officials and law enforcement are automatically unethical." Politico adds that "asked if he had advance knowledge about the exchanges between the White House and the FBI, Sessions said he did not." Sessions "also continued to be cagey about whether he will accede to calls from some lawmakers that he bow out of any decisions related to that probe because of the prominent role he played in President Donald Trump's campaign. 'I will recuse myself on anything that I should recuse myself from. That's all I can tell you,' the attorney general said."

The Washington Times (2/27, Noble, 272K) reports that Sessions said "he had not examined in detail recent interactions between top FBI officials and the White House regarding alleged connections between Trump administration officials and Russia, nor has he decided whether or not to recuse himself from any potential Justice Department investigation of the matter." Bloomberg Politics (2/27, Strohm, 201K) reports Sessions' Monday comments marked the first time the Attorney General suggested he might recuse himself from the investigation into Trump's ties to Russia.

Bush Says "We All Need Answers" On Russia Ties. Bloomberg Politics (2/27, Epstein, 201K) reports that ex-President George W. Bush, "in his first interview since the start of Donald Trump's administration, said he sees a need for an investigation into the Trump team's ties to Russia." He told NBC's Today Show, "We all need answers." However, Bush "declined to say whether he thinks a special prosecutor should be named and said he trusted congressional committees to make that call."

CNN Discusses Ability Of White House To Communicate With FBI. In an analysis piece, the CNN (2/27, Jarrett, 29.79M) website evaluates whether "the White House and FBI [are] permitted to talk about an ongoing criminal investigation." According to the network, "While no law in the US code prohibits communications between the White House and the Justice Department, guidance issued by the DOJ in 2007 and 2009 explicitly limits communications on pending investigations to avoid any appearance of improper political influence." A 2009 memo says communications between the White House and DOJ should only occur when it is "important for the performance of the President's duties and appropriate from a law enforcement perspective." The White House has defended Chief of Staff Reince Priebus' recent contact with the FBI, claiming Priebus and FBI officials did not discuss the investigation into contacts between Trump associates and Russia, but rather media reports surrounding the alleged contacts.

NYTimes Analysis: Russia Exploiting "Weakness In Washington." The New York Times (2/27, Macfarquhar, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports, "The Kremlin, increasingly convinced that President Trump will not fundamentally change relations with it, is instead seeking to bolster its global influence by exploiting what it considers weakness in Washington," according to various analysts and observers. Russia "has continued to test the United States on the military front," and "any turbulence that Russia foments" in Washington "also gives the Kremlin leverage that it can try to trade in the global arena at a time when it does not have much that others want."

Jarrett: Pelosi Wrong To Claim Priebus Acted Illegally. In an op-ed for Fox News (2/27, Jarrett, 11.07M), former defense attorney Gregg Jarrett disputes a claim by Rep. Nancy Pelosi that Priebus' conversation with top FBI officials was "a grave abuse of power...which may also be illegal." Priebus, Jarrett says, was simply asking the FBI to refute a false news story when he spoke with the FBI. "It is not a crime to solicit the truth. Honesty is not a felony," Jarrett says. "Reince Priebus may have been naïve to think that the FBI would get involved in rebutting a false narrative. But Nancy Pelosi is the one who is guilty of making a false accusation."

Former Neo-Nazi Warns Of Dangers Of Ignoring White Extremism.

Vox (2/27, 1.15M) interviews Christian Picciolini, former Neo-Nazi and founder of the Life After Hate nonprofit group. Picciolini is at the "forefront of warning Americans against the growing threat from white nationalists." Picciolini warned that putting fewer resources into monitoring white extremism is a "mistake," because it is "denying that we have a problem with our own borders," and it's "also marginalizing other people." Picciolini added, "And if you remove white extremism from the focus of terrorism and counterterrorism, we're only setting ourselves up for failure because we'll only embolden that side. And it will only marginalize the others."

Eco-Terrorist Admits To Bombing Facility 25 Years Ago.

The Washington Post (2/27, Hawkins, 11.43M) reports that in a Thursday interview, animal rights activist Rodney Coronado admitted responsibility for a 1992 explosion at the office of a Michigan State University animal science professor. Though Coronado, a spokesman for the Animal Liberation Front at the time, pleaded guilty and was sentenced to nearly five years in prison following in the attack, until Thursday he had maintained his innocence. "There are no looming criminal charges against me," Coronado said of his decision to admit guilt. "I won't sugar coat it; we were about psychological warfare," he said. "We wanted researchers like Aulerich never to know when they came to work and opened their office door whether there had been an attack. We wanted them to live in fear."

ABC World News Tonight (2/27, story 3, 0:30, Muir, 14.63M) reported White House Press Secretary Sean Spicer is "defending the secret military raid in Yemen" last month, saying the White House is "very comfortable with what it achieved." Navy SEAL William "Ryan" Owens was killed in the raid, and over the weekend his father criticized the raid in an interview with the Miami Herald and called for an investigation. The CBS Evening News (2/27, story 5, 2:10, Pelley, 11.17M) reported the White House said Monday "that the military is conducting three investigations" into the raid. CENTCOM Commander Gen. Joseph Votel told CBS that the timing of the raid "was linked to a broader offensive that we're pursuing in Yemen." Asked if he agrees with the White House's assessment that the raid was a success, Votel said, "The object was to go in and collect intelligence. We accomplished that. From that perspective it was successful. I certainly understand how the family would look at this in a different light." But on NBC Nightly News (2/27, lead story, 2:55, Holt, 16.61M), Cynthia McFadden said that "multiple officials tell NBC News that...the raid has yielded no intelligence of value, at least not yet." The suspected beheading was condemned by both Philippine President Rodrigo Duterte and German Chancellor Angela Merkel.

The CBS Evening News (2/27, story 2, 1:35, Pelley, 11.17M) reported that police in Philadelphia "are hunting for whoever damaged more than 100 headstones at a Jewish cemetery on Saturday night." CBS (Pegues) added that in Cherry Hill, NJ, "another Jewish community center was evacuated this morning after a threatening call," and that "since the beginning of the year, there have been at least 90 similar phone calls across 30 states and one Canadian province." According to CBS News, "a US official says the calls appear to be coordinated," and that "some may be originating from overseas." TIME (2/27, Chan, 6.98M) reports that the FBI is also investigating the vandalism of the Philadelphia grave sites. "The FBI will collect all available facts and evidence," the bureau said of its probe.

NBC Nightly News (2/27, story 2, 1:55, Holt, 16.61M) reported that "as happened in St. Louis last week, when Jewish graves there were desecrated, today an offer of help from the Muslim community." Salaam Bhatti, Ahmadiyya Muslim Community Spokesperson: "I'm worried more that it's being seen as it's okay to do. So whoever did it, we hope that you're watching, we hope that you're caught."

USA Today (2/27, Bacon, 5.28M) reports that White House spokesman Sean Spicer said on Monday that President Trump "was 'deeply disappointed and concerned' by the cemetery vandalism and other acts. 'The president continues to condemn these and any other forms of anti-Semitic and hateful acts in the strongest terms,' Spicer said." Reuters (2/27, Ainsley) reports that Attorney General Sessions told reporters on Monday "that recent bomb threats made against Jewish groups are 'unacceptable' and a 'very serious and destructive practice.'" The AP (2/27) quotes Sessions as saying, the Justice Department will "do what it can to assist in prosecuting anybody" proven to have taken part in the bomb threats or vandalism.

The Washington Post (2/27, Shapiro, 11.43M) reports that two Jewish schools in the Washington, DC area "received bomb threats Monday, disrupting classroom activities and leading police to sweep the campuses in Maryland and Virginia." The threats "came to both schools through what seemed to be an automated voice message system, school officials said."

The AP (2/27, Rubinkam) reports that a total of 13 community centers and eight schools were searched by authorities following Monday's wave of threats. No explosives were found and the institutions had returned to normal by the afternoon. The bomb threats have prompted outrage among members of the Jewish community who are now seeking a federal response. "The Justice Department, Homeland Security, the FBI, and the White House, alongside Congress and local officials, must speak out — and speak out forcefully — against this scourge of anti-Semitism impacting communities across the country," said JCC Association of North America official David Posner. "Members of our community must see swift and concerted action from federal officials to identify and capture the perpetrator or perpetrators who are trying to instill anxiety and fear in our communities."

Politico (2/27, Quigley, 2.46M) reports that Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-VT) said on Monday "that the 'entire world is watching' the reaction of President Donald Trump and his chief strategist Steve Bannon to the waves of anti-Semitic bomb threats and vandalisms across the country." Sanders said "since Trump's election there has been 'a significant outbreak of anti-Semitism in our country,' saying he was 'alarmed' by the string of bomb threats targeting Jewish Community Centers across the country and Jewish cemetery vandalisms in Philadelphia and St. Louis during the past two weeks. 'These attacks must be condemned at the highest levels of government,' Sanders said during his address to J Street, a group promoting the two-state solution in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict." Noting Bannon's former affiliation with right-wing website Breitbart News, the Christian Science Monitor (2/27, Thomson, 387K) reports that some observers have claimed that the election of Trump "has empowered the extreme right in general."

The Miami Herald (2/27, Smiley, 856K) reports that in comments Monday, Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz labeled the anti-Semitic incidents "nothing short of domestic terrorism" an call for the capture of the culprits. "I'm here today to channel my anger, so that we can make sure that first and foremost we find these bastards and we make sure that we don't rest, and there is nowhere that they think they can hide that we won't hunt them down and find them," he congresswoman said. Suspect In Kansas Bar Shooting Thought Victims Were Iranian.

NBC Nightly News' (2/27, story 5, 1:45, Holt, 16.61M) Blake McCoy reported Adam Purinton, accused of shooting two Indian immigrants in Kansas last week, was appointed a public defender in "his first court appearance via CCTV" on Monday. Purinton waived the judge's formal reading of charges against him, ABC World News Tonight (2/27, story 6, 0:20, Muir, 14.63M) reported.

The AP (2/27) reports Purinton faces first-degree murder and first-degree attempted murder charges for allegedly shooting and killing Srinivas Kuchibhotla and shooting Alok Madasani. According to the 911 call made to a Henry County, Missouri dispatcher, a bartender claimed Purinton told her he did something "really bad," and eventually confessed "that he shot and killed two Iranian people." Authorities have not disclosed a possible motive or confirmed whether they are investigating the case as a hate crime, but the shooting "has raised concern about the treatment of immigrants, who feel targeted by President Donald Trump's promises to ban certain travelers, build a wall along the Mexico border and put 'America first.'" Yahoo! News (2/27, Goodwin, 8.62M) reports the FBI is probing to determine whether a hate crime to place. "Our role in this investigation is to see if anyone's civil rights were violated," said FBI spokeswoman Bridget Patton.

He must step up & speak out." Politico says that Clinton "also criticized Trump's travel ban executive order that impacted those from seven Muslim-majority countries" in a subsequent tweet.

Bribery Trial Paints Dallas Commissioner As Generous Public Servant, Greedy Crook.

The Associated Press (2/27) reports Dallas County (TX) Commissioner John Wiley Price accepted about $1 million in bribes in return for giving county contracts to specific companies, according to claims by federal prosecutors during the trial's opening statements Monday. WFAA-TV Dallas (2/27, Trahan, Shipp, 252K)reports federal prosecutor Nicolas Bunch acknowledged the positive work Price has done in his 30-year tenure as commissioner, but "at some point, [Price decided] he was entitled to something more" than his $100,000 salary. Bunch then told jurors to "follow the money" in his one-and-a-half-hour long presentation that showed how Price received over $1 million in cash, cars, and land over more than a decade with the help of executive assistant Dapheny Fain, political consultant, Kathy Nealy, and friend and art gallery owner Karen Manning. Bunch noted the discovery of about $230,000 in cash by a 2011 FBI raid of Price's home. The money trail is "tedious," said Bunch, because it consisted primarily of small and difficult-to-track banking transactions.

According to the Dallas (TX) Morning News (2/27, Krause, 1.12M), Price's attorney Shirley Baccus-Lobel portrayed Price as a generous public servant. She accused the government's case of allowing nine years to pass between the events and the indictment, which at 26,000 words "reads like a mantra" and constitutes "brainwashing." The prosecutor misconstrued the nature of Price's relationships with the three women accused of funneling money to Price from companies seeking influence, which were "minor ordinary transactions between close friends."

Former Utah AG Requests Clarification Of Racketeering Allegations.

The Salt Lake (UT) Tribune (2/27, Dobner, 426K) reports former Utah Attorney General John Swallow's attorney Scott Williams requested Monday that a judge make the Salt Lake County district attorney's office decide whether Swallow's racketeering charge is for bribery or extortion because the two are "mutually exclusive." Court filings say businessman Marc Sessions Jenson bribed Swallow, his predecessor Mark Shurtleff, and his predecessor's late "fixer" Time Lawson, but Jenson has twice testified to being extorted by the three men. The contradictory allegations deny "a criminal defendant his right to adequate notice" and burden the defense, wrote Williams.

Prosecutors Seek Prison Time For Friend Failing To Report Dylann Roof's Plot.

According to the Charleston (SC) Post and Courier (2/27, Knapp, 300K), federal prosecutors are seeking up to eight years in prison for Joey Meek, who pleaded guilty to misprision of a felony and lying to federal agents after the June 2015 hate crime perpetrated by white supremacist Dylann Roof. It would be "just punishment" for Meek's offense and engender "respect for the law," Assistant US Attorney Nathan Williams wrote in the motion filed Monday. The Post and Courier reports that recently unsealed court documents show Meek's admission of having lied to federal agents when the FBI approached him three days following the attack.

The New York Daily News (2/27, Durkin, 4.45M) reports that New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio "said he told federal investigators 'everything I know' about probes into his fundraising during a questioning session Friday and believes the meeting went 'fine.' 'My goal was to be open and transparent and communicative and to be cooperative. And I think it's quite clear a four-hour interview is a good faith effort to try to provide information,' de Blasio said in his first comments since being grilled by U.S. Attorney Preet Bharara's office. 'I believe when all the facts are looked at, it will be quite clear that we've handled things appropriately.'" De Blasio "met for four hours at his Midtown attorney's office with investigators who are looking into whether donors to his campaigns and his now-defunct non-profit, the Campaign for One New York, got special favors in return."

Newsday (NY) (2/27, Figueroa, 1.3M) reports that de Blasio "told cable network NY1 the four-hour meeting signaled his willingness to 'cooperate' with authorities as they reportedly investigate allegations that contributors to his first mayoral campaign were given preferential treatment by City Hall officials. 'I want to emphasize from the beginning, when the investigation began, we said "I want to cooperate. My team's going to cooperate in every way. We want to provide all the information the U.S. attorney needs,"' de Blasio told NY1 Political Reporter Errol Lewis, during his weekly 'Mondays with the Mayor' segment." De Blasio "said he was unsure when U.S. Attorney Preet Bharara's office will wrap up its investigation."

The Mercury News says "it is too soon to tell whether" Garcia-Torres' lawyer Al Lopez undermined the prosecution's case by casting doubt on the original presence of the missing girl's hair on piece of rope, the certainty of carpet fibers originating from the defendant's car, and the possibility of verifying whether Garcia-Torres used bleach to clean up his alleged deed.

woke him up and shot him after Anderson reached for a gun that was on the front seat." In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/27, 11.43M) lauds the DC Circuit Court of Appeals' ruling last Tuesday that dismissed hedge funds' "most consequential argument" against Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac's statutory authority in its 2012 profit sweep. The ruling "basically confirmed" the reasoning of a 2014 ruling that denies a court's ability to restrain the regulator. The Post says Congress might now "bring a fair and reasonable end" to the "endless limbo" of the mortgage-finance giants because the appeals court ruled against the attempt by "Wall Street gamblers" gain control of them "for a pittance."

Gizmodo Analysis: Questions About Timing Of Charges In Russian Treason Case.

Treason charges against Ruslan Stoyanov, head of the computer incidents investigation team at Russian cybersecurity firm Kaspersky Lab, and Russian FSB agents Sergei Mikhailov and Dmitry Dokuchayev continue to garner coverage. Gizmodo (AUS) (2/27, Jones, 1K) discusses revelations from a recent Reuters report, which said the charges stem from a seven-year-old allegation by Russian businessman Pavel Vrublevsky. Gizmodo says some speculate "that the suspects might be the sources that led to all 17 US intelligence services unanimously concluding that Russia deliberately tried to aid Donald Trump's presidential campaign." One of Reuters' anonymous sources "suggested there was more to the recent treason case and that 'Russian authorities at times use old cases as a way of charging people suspected of later crimes.'" Gizmodo, referring to that suggestion, concludes that "the idea that an ancient accusation can turn into a legitimate case will undoubtedly make anyone question their own past if they are considering opposing the Kremlin."

Media Analysis: Trump's Speech To Congress Is Opportunity To "Refocus" Administration.

Media coverage of President Trump's scheduled speech to a joint session of Congress tonight characterizes the address as an opportunity for the President to "refocus" and highlight a "concrete blueprint" for his Administration and its goals. The Los Angeles Times (2/27, Bierman, 4.52M) reports Trump "vowed to use" his first joint speech to Congress on Tuesday to call for a $54 billion increase in military spending that is accompanied by significant cuts to domestic programs. The Times says the speech is "setting up [the President's] most concrete blueprint yet for reordering the nation's priorities." Trump said, "This is a landmark event, a message to the world in these dangerous times – of American strength, security and resolve." USA Today (2/27, Jackson, 5.28M) reports that Trump "previewed" his Tuesday night address to a joint session of Congress during a Monday meeting with governors. Trump said his budget proposal "will be a public safety and national security budget," adding that the US is "going to start spending on infrastructure – big."

Politico (2/27, Kim, 2.46M) says that it obtained "a list of 11 key bullet points outlining" the speech that says Trump will provide an "optimistic vision" for the country that includes a "bold agenda" on tax and regulatory reform, changes in the workplace, and a vow to "sav[e] American families from the disaster of Obamacare." According to Politico, Trump will also "paint his agenda with broad, unifying tones, saying he will 'invite Americans of all backgrounds to come together in the service of a stronger, brighter future for our nation.'" One of the bullet points, Politico adds, indicates that Trump will urge Congress to act, saying he is eager to partner with lawmakers to fix the country's problems.

The AP (2/27, Pace) says Trump's address "gives him a welcome opportunity to refocus his young administration on the core economic issues that helped him get elected" and his supporters "hope" it also provides him with the chance "to move beyond the distractions and self-inflicted wounds that have roiled his White House." The AP says Trump's advisers indicate the President will use tonight's speech "to declare early progress on his campaign promises" and "map a path ahead on thorny legislative priorities." The White House, according to the AP, indicated that Trump has been using listening sessions with law enforcement officials, union representatives, coal minors and other groups to compile ideas for the address. Gloria Borger said on CNN Wolf (2/27, 224K) that the speech is "important because" it "really provides a blueprint for what they want to do for the country." Borger said the speech is "an opportunity for President Trump to look forward as opposed to looking to the past and how large his victory was, how large the crowds were at the inauguration, and talk about the media." Reuters White House correspondent Jeff Mason said on CNN Wolf (2/27, 224K) that a question is whether the President will "reach out to both sides, which I think would be welcomed by both sides? Will he set a tone of unity?"

Wall Street Billing Speech As "Most Important" For Markets Since Trump Took Office. USA Today (2/27, Shell, 5.28M) reports that Trump's speech "is being billed by Wall Street as the most important speech – at least for markets" since the President took office. USA today says Wall Street "is hungry for details" about Trump's vow to reduce taxes for corporations, his views on taxes connected to trade, and his plans to increase growth by spending money on infrastructure. Investors, according to USA Today, are "beginning to get impatient" after being "willing to wait for specifics." USA Today adds that "the stock rally could falter" if the President "disappoints Wall Street by getting off message or by putting key pro-growth plans like tax cuts on the back burner." Bloomberg News (2/27, McCormick, Burger, 2.41M) similarly reports that Trump's speech is "taking on the importance of a State of the Union" address for the financial markets. Bloomberg says that "adding to the anxiety" is the presence of "differing views on how to proceed on tax reform" as Trump has called House Republicans adjustment-tax proposal that shifts the burden from exporters to importers "too complicated."

Pelosi, Schumer Criticize Trump At National Press Club Forum. The Washington Examiner (2/27, Scarry, 400K) reports House Minority Leader Pelosi and Senate Minority Leader Schumer on Monday – during comments at the National Press Club Forum – "condemned" Trump's presidency, "hinted they might eventually seek to impeach him," and said they anticipate that his Tuesday address to Congress would include empty promises. Pelosi said Trump has misled the public to the extent that "there are plenty of grounds right now" for impeachment. However, Pelosi said the American public is not ready for that step, because "many of the president's supporters are not ready to accept the fact that their judgment may not have been so great in voting for him." Schumer said Tuesday's speech "will be the usual bluster and blame," adding, "Populist platitudes will be a dime a dozen, but the focus should be on the president's actions rather than his empty words."

Dems Seek To Capitalize On Beshear's ACA Experience By Tapping Him To Respond To Trump. McClatchy (2/27, Roarty, 74K) reports that while former Kentucky Gov. Steve Beshear – at 72-years-old and on "nobody's shortlist of presidential contenders" – is a "seemingly odd choice" by Democrats to respond to Trump's address, his supporters believe that his experience leading the "health care law's model state" makes him the ideal choice "to rebut Trump" as the GOP seeks to repeal the Affordable Care Act. McClatchy says Democrats view Kentucky as the state "where the ACA has done the most good and had the fewest problems" and party officials "say that success is thanks to Beshear." Kentucky's uninsured rate, according to a Census Bureau report released last year, dropped from 14 percent in 2013 to six percent in 2015. The Wall Street Journal (2/27, Epstein, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) quotes Colorado Gov. John Hickenlooper as saying Beshear "is going to talk about jobs and job creation." Hickenlooper said Beshear "knows the Affordable Care Act inside and out, as well as any governor" and "Kentucky's killed it on job creation."

Democratic Lawmakers To Highlight Legislation Aimed At Working-Class Voters. USA Today (2/27, Przybyla, 5.28M) reports Democratic lawmakers from "at least 30 states" will announce or highlight legislation this week "aimed at President Trump's working class voters" as part of a "nationwide coordinated rebuttal to the agenda" that Trump is expected to outline during his speech. USA Today says "the timing creates a juxtaposition between Democratic economic security prescriptions for workers" and Trump's tax and budget proposals that Democrats claim "are at odds with his populist campaign oath to prioritize 'forgotten' Americans."

Democrats Inviting Immigrants To Speech. McClatchy (2/27, Douglas, 74K) reports that Congressional Democrats are "bringing immigrants, refugees or advocates" to the speech "to protest" the President's immigration policy. Rep. Alma Adams invited after-school program ourBRIDGE founder Sil Ganzo, Rep. Marc Veasey invited two Syrian refugees, and Sen. Kamala Harris invited Mexican-born Rush Medical College instructor Yuriana Aguilar.

Female Democratic House Members To Honor Women's Suffrage Movement By Wearing White. The AP (2/27, Jalonick) reports Democratic women in the House "are planning to wear white in honor of women's suffrage" during Trump's speech. Rep. Lois Frankel, the chairwoman of the Democratic Women's Working Group, and other female members sent a letter to their colleagues on Monday "reminding them to wear white" to "stand in solidarity with the women of our nation."

Rosie O'Donnell To Lead Protest Before Trump's Speech. The Washington Times (2/27, Dinan, 272K) reports Rosie O'Donnell will lead a Tuesday night protest outside the White House prior to Trump delivering his speech. The Times says "a number of liberal groups are hosting" the demonstration and indicated they expect thousands to attend. The groups said in a statement that Trump "is expected to articulate a discriminatory agenda that continues to put people in harm's way, undermines equality and our shared values, and damages our environment."

Thiessen: Trump Should "Dare" Democrats To Refuse Bipartisan Efforts. In his Washington Post (2/27, 11.43M) column, Marc Thiessen says Trump should use his speech to extend "his hand in a spirit of bipartisan cooperation" and "dar[e]" Democrats "to refuse it." Thiessen argues that Democrats are utilizing the "single theme" of "Resist!" and that is their "Achilles heal" as "they are so blinded by hate they cannot bring themselves to work with Trump" on issues where agreement is possible. Thiessen continues that while this position may receive support from the Democrats' base, "it is only serving to further alienate millions of once-Democratic voters in middle America who abandoned the party in the last election."

Udall Floats Proposal To Confirm Gorsuch And Garland At Same Time.

Politico (2/27, Kim, 2.46M) reports that Sen. Tom Udall (D-NM) met with Supreme Court nominee Neil Gorsuch on Monday, "but the senator's mind was still on Merrick Garland," so he "pitched an unusual proposal during his private meeting" with President Trump's nominee: "Have both Gorsuch and Garland – whose nomination by Barack Obama was blockaded by Senate Republicans for nearly a year – simultaneously confirmed to the Supreme Court. 'You had President Trump saying, "I want to unite the country, I'm a deal-maker, I'm going to bring people together,"' Udall told reporters following his meeting with Gorsuch on Monday. 'Well, the deal right now for President Trump, if he wanted to do it, would be to put Gorsuch and Merrick Garland on the court at the same time.'"

The Washington Post (2/27, Sullivan, 11.43M) reports that Udall said his proposal "would begin with Trump visiting privately with current justices mulling retirement. 'If one of those judges decided that they would be willing to retire…and would agree to that, then what they would do is submit a resignation contingent upon the approval of Merrick Garland as their replacement,' explained Udall," and "if that happens, both Gorsuch and Garland could be confirmed by the Senate in bipartisan fashion. 'That's, to me, presidential leadership,' he added."

Sessions Says He Will Focus On Violent Crime Reduction.

USA Today (2/27, Johnson, 5.28M) reports that Attorney General Sessions "reaffirmed a commitment Monday to elevate violent crime reduction as one of his top priorities," suggesting that a "recent uptick in murder likely foreshadowed deeper public safety problems across the country." Sessions said, "We're going to focus on some things to reduce crime in America. ... Something is happening out there." Sessions will today address the National Association of Attorneys General.

The AP (2/27, Gurman, Tucker) reports that Sessions also said the Justice Department "will try to adopt 'responsible policies' for enforcement of federal anti-marijuana laws. ... Sessions says he's heard from experts that there's more violence around marijuana than 'one would think.'" Politico (2/27, Gerstein, 2.46M) reports that Sessions said, "Most of you probably know I don't think America is going to be a better place when more people of all ages and particularly young people start smoking pot."

Illinois' Rauner In Talks With Administration On "Violence Issues." The Chicago Tribune (2/27, Geiger, 2.54M) reports that Illinois Gov. Bruce Rauner "kept his distance" from President Trump while in Washington this weekend for the National Governors Association meeting. Rauner was one of just four governors to skip the White House dinner for the governors. Trump "has made a habit of bashing Chicago over its persistent problems with violent crime," and Rauner "has often avoided the topic, even veering away from uttering the president's name." But he said Monday that he has "been in 'communication' with members of the 'Trump administration' on 'violence issues.'"

Sessions Undecided On Imposing Chicago Police Reforms. Reuters (2/27) reports that Attorney General Sessions said on Monday that the Justice Department "was still deciding whether it would seek to impose reforms on the Chicago police force, which was the subject of a critical report by the former Obama administration." Reuters adds that "in a report issued on Jan. 13, a week before President Donald Trump took office, the Justice Department said Chicago police routinely violated the civil rights of people," and "it cited excessive force, racially discriminatory conduct and a 'code of silence' to thwart investigations into police misconduct." Chicago "and federal officials signed an agreement in principle to create a court-enforced consent decree addressing the issues revealed by the probe when the report was released." Sessions "has not committed to entering into negotiations with the department to determine what reforms, if any, should follow. 'I have not made a decision about that, but I am really worried about Chicago,' Sessions said told reporters at a briefing."

Sessions Says Marijuana Use Can Lead To Violence. The AP (2/27, Gurman, Tucker) reports that Sessions also said the Justice Department "will try to adopt 'responsible policies' for enforcement of federal anti-marijuana laws. ... Sessions says he's heard from experts that there's more violence around marijuana than 'one would think.'" Politico (2/27, Gerstein, 2.46M) reports that Sessions said, "Most of you probably know I don't think America is going to be a better place when more people of all ages and particularly young people start smoking pot."

Pentagon Delivers Draft Plan To Defeat ISIS To White House.

Reuters (2/27, Ali) reports the Pentagon on Monday delivered a "preliminary plan" to defeat ISIS to the White House. Pentagon spokesman Capt. Jeff Davis "told reporters that it was the framework for a broader plan and looked at Islamic State around the world, not just Iraq and Syria." He added that Defense Secretary Mattis would discuss the plan with members of the Principals Committee on Monday afternoon. According to the AP (2/27, Burns, Baldor), the plan to "rapidly defeat" ISIS includes "significant elements of the approach President Donald Trump inherited, while potentially deepening US military involvement in Syria." While it is "unclear" whether Trump attended Monday's Principals meeting, White House Press Secretary Sean Spicer "said Mattis was ensuring that he had input from other Cabinet agencies."

Drone Strike Reportedly Kills Al Qaeda Figure Linked To US Embassy Bombings.

ABC World News Tonight (2/27, story 4, 0:25, Muir, 14.63M) said there are unconfirmed reports that a US drone strike killed Abu al-Khayr al-Masri – Osama bin Laden's son-in-law and a "top al Qaeda official" – in Syria on Sunday. Masri was linked to the 1998 bombings of the US Embassies in Tanzania and Kenya.

US-Backed Iraqi Forces Seize Key Bridge In Western Mosul.

The AP (2/27, Abdul-Zahra) reports US-backed Iraqi forces seized a damaged bridge along the Tigris River in Mosul on Monday. Maj. Gen. Thamir al-Hussaini said Iraq's militarized Federal Police first advanced against ISIS snipers, anti-tank missiles, and suicide car bombs in "fierce" clashes. Reuters (2/27, Kalin, Coles) reports the damaged bridge, once repaired, will help Iraqi forces transport reinforcements and supplies from eastern Mosul into the western districts, furthering efforts to defeat the terror group. Meanwhile, at least 10,000 western Mosul residents have fled ISIS-held areas since Thursday, and about 1,000 civilians seeking food, water, and medical assistance reached a sector held by Iraq's Counter Terrorism Services on early Monday morning.

UN To Vote On Resolution To Impose Sanctions Against Syria.

Reuters (2/27, Nichols) reports that on Tuesday, the UN Security Council will vote on a draft resolution submitted by Britain and France to prohibit the supply of helicopters to Syria's government, and impose sanctions against 10 government entities and 11 military commanders and officials. The resolution stems from an international inquiry that found Syrian government forces conducted three chlorine gas attacks, which are banned under the Chemical Weapons Convention. Russian Ambassador Vladimir Safronkov pledged to veto the measure.

Clashes In Syria Escalate As Peace Negotiations Continue.

The AP (2/27, Issa) reports the Syrian Observatory for Human Rights said Monday that separate airstrikes in Idlib, presumably from the Russian or Syrian government, killed at least 11 people as UN-brokered peace discussions continue in Geneva. The Syrian government and opposition delegations have not resolved ongoing disagreements over the agenda, delaying progress in peace negotiations.

Meanwhile, in the rebel-held city of al-Bab, clashes between Turkish-backed rebel groups and Syrian government forces erupted late on Sunday for the second time this month, Reuters (2/27, Perry, Pamuk) reports. A Syrian military source accused the Free Syrian Army rebel factions, which the source described as "terrorist groups that belong to Turkey," of targeting "our forces in Tadef with artillery and machine guns." The source maintained the incident evidenced the rebels' main goal is not fighting ISIS, but to obstruct the Syrian army's operation against the militant group. A rebel official conceded FSA factions opened fire, but accused Syrian government forces of attempting to advance closer to al-Bab. The official said Turkish forces were not involved in the incident. Russia mediated an end to the confrontation.

Trump, Chinese Top Diplomat Meet At White House.

Reuters (2/27, Holland, Brunnstrom) reports President Trump held his "first face-to-face talks with a member of the Chinese leadership" on Monday, and the White House "said it was a chance to discuss shared security interests and a possible meeting with President Xi Jinping." State Councilor Yang Jiechi met Trump "briefly" after talks with National Security Adviser McMaster, senior adviser Jared Kushner and Chief Strategist Steve Bannon. A senior Administration official said the meeting with Trump lasted five to seven minutes, and press secretary Sean Spicer called it "an opportunity to say 'hi' to the president." The Wall Street Journal (2/27, Schwartz, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports Yang will meet Tuesday with Secretary of State Tillerson, who spoke with the Chinese diplomat by phone last week.

US, Japan, South Korea Discuss Tensions With North Korea.

The AP (2/27, Pennington) reports as President Trump met China's State Councilor Yang Jiechi on Monday, "US officials huddled with key Asian powers to discuss tensions with North Korea." US Special Representative for North Korea Joseph Yun met at the State Department with his Japanese and South Korean counterparts, Kenji Kanasugi and Kim Hong-kyun, as "part of continued US efforts to get its main allies in Asia to cooperate more closely on security." In a joint statement, Reuters (2/27, Wroughton) reports, the three said they "discussed ways to further restrict funding for North Korea's weapons programs."

Former CIA Director James Woolsey and former CIA analyst Peter Vincent Pry write in the Wall Street Journal (2/27, Woolsey, Pry, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) of the dangers they say North Korea poses. They argue that the North probably has nuclear arms specialized for electromagnetic pulse, or "Super-EMP" weapons, and calls on the US to protect its electric grid against a possible EMP attack.

Seoul: Kim Jong-Nam Assassination Organized By North Korean Ministries.

The New York Times (2/27, Choe, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports South Korean intelligence officials said Monday that "officials from North Korea's secret police and Foreign Ministry were involved in the killing" of Kim Jong-Nam, the half-brother of leader Kim Jong-Un. South Korea's National Intelligence Service said four of the eight North Koreans identified as suspects by Malaysian authorities "were agents from North Korea's Ministry of State Security, the country's secret police."

Palestinian Envoy Warns US Against Moving Embassy.

The AP (2/27, Lardner) reports the Palestinians' top envoy to the US, Maen Areikat, on Monday warned that moving the US Embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem could disrupt efforts to secure a peace deal. Areikat said an "emotional decision" to move the Embassy "is going to have very, very negative repercussions" and could complicate future peace efforts.

US Embassy Condemns Neo-Nazi March In Croatia.

The AP (2/27) reports on Monday, the US Embassy in Croatia "strongly denounced a march by far-right nationalists...who waved an American flag and reportedly voiced support for President Donald Trump." In a statement, the Embassy said it "rejects, in the strongest terms, neo-Nazi and pro-Ustasha views expressed during the demonstration of a few people in Zagreb on Sunday." Ustasha refers to the "pro-Nazi World War II Ustasha regime" that "killed tens of thousands Jews, Serbs, Gypsies and anti-Nazi Croats."

Germany Reports "Alarmingly High" Number Of Crimes Against Migrants.

Using figures from 16 German states, the nation's Interior Ministry compiled a report detailing crimes against migrants in 2016, the AP (2/27, Rising) reports. Threats, slander, far-right graffiti, and vandalism-related crimes constituted most attacks against asylum-seekers, according to the report, but more serious incidents like arson, assault, and attempted murder caused injuries to at least 560 people, including 43 children. Interior Ministry spokesman Johannes Dimroth "condemned" the "alarmingly high" number of crimes as a "cause for concern." He conceded the "trend is downward," but added a "ban" against extremism was impossible.

"Dutch Trump" Politician Builds Unlikely Far-Right Movement Ahead Of "Pivotal" Elections.

The New York Times (2/27, Rubin, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports far-right politician Geert Wilders, coined the "Dutch Trump," is campaigning for prime minister on an anti-immigration, anti-European Union platform in the Netherlands, a nation with low unemployment and a "centuries-long tradition of promoting religious tolerance and welcoming immigrants." Wilders "lives as a political phantom under police protection" but "is omnipresent on social media," and he has "managed to build a movement despite his infrequent public appearances." Wilders has also succeeded in pushing the nation's politics "to the right" and made possible once unheard-of conversations about bloc membership and immigrant prohibitions. The success of Wilders and his far-right party in the Mar. 15 elections could foreshadow "how the far right will do in pivotal elections in France, Germany and possibly Italy later this year, and ultimately determine the future of the European Union."

UN Experts Call On China To Address Allegations Of Repression Against Tibetans.

The New York Times (2/27, Wong, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports six UN experts who "each specialize in a single aspect of human rights" collaborated on a "sharply worded statement" in which they expressed "grave concern" over the Chinese government's "serious repression of the Buddhist Tibetans' cultural and religious practices and learning in Larung Gar and Yachen Gar." The experts called on Beijing to address the allegations of evictions and demolitions at the Tibetan enclaves and urged officials to take "all necessary interim measures...to halt the alleged violations and prevent their reoccurrence." The experts sent the statement to the Chinese government in November, but its recent public release ahead of the UN's Human Rights Council session in Geneva on Monday "puts more pressure on China to explain the actions taking place at the two Tibetan Buddhist institutions."

Japan's Abe Faces "Burgeoning Scandal" Involving New School.

The Washington Post (2/27, Fifield, 11.43M) reports a new school slated to open this April in Osaka, which "is home to a high proportion of the ethnically Korean residents of Japan," self-identifies on its website as the "first and only Shinto elementary school" and pledges to "foster children who hold pride in being Japanese and have a solid backbone." The educational organization behind the school, Moritomo Gakuen, purchased land appraised at $8.4 million for only $1.2 million, triggering suspicions of political collusion. Prime Minister Shinzo Abe is also under scrutiny for alleged ties to another Moritomo Gakuen-run school that promoted anti-Chinese and anti-Korean ideologies. The "burgeoning scandal" prompted the prime minister's wife, Akie Abe, to resign on Friday as the planned school's "honorary principal." Analysts believe if Abe played a larger role in the land deal or has closer ties to Moritomo Gakuen than he disclosed, it could cause "a diplomatic firestorm" and "gravely hurt the prime minister."

NYTimes A1: Witnesses Accuse Nigerian Army Of Killing Unarmed Civilians.

The New York Times (2/28, A1, Searcey, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports on its front page that witnesses are accusing the Nigerian army of killing unarmed civilians amid efforts to defeat Boko Haram. The Times says the "reports of civilian massacres have emerged in recent weeks as residents" from regions previously cut off by Boko Haram "start to stream out." Nigerian Director of Defense Information Brig. Gen. Rabe Abubakar denied the accusations and said his country's army is "guided by rules and guided by our transparency of operations."

NYTimes Urges US To "Step Up" In Efforts To Address Global Food Shortages.

In an editorial, the New York Times (2/27, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) outlines efforts by the UN, South Sudanese President Salva Kiir, European Commission, and Britain to address the famine in South Sudan and the escalating food crises in Yemen, northern Nigeria, and Somalia. The Times notes the US supports the Saudi-led coalition against Houthi rebels in Yemen, where "more than seven million people are in urgent need of food," and is the UN's biggest donor at a time when the organization "says it needs $4.4 billion by the end of March to avert famine, yet barely 2 percent is in hand." The Times warns that "this is no time for the United States to abandon its commitments" and adds, "It will be an unconscionable failure of moral leadership if the United States does not step up."

LEADING THE NEWS

Comey Discusses Encryption, Says Country "Stuck" With Him For Rest Of His Term.

Several major print and online outlets report on FBI Director Comey's remarks before a cybersecurity conference Wednesday at Boston College. In his speech, Comey primarily discussed the importance of cybersecurity issues and the impact of strong encryption on law enforcement. Reports noted that Comey did not address recent controversies in his speech and also declined to take questions from reporters.

The Washington Times (3/8, Noble, 272K) reports that Comey said the country is "stuck with" him for "another 6½ years," indicating his plans to remain at the helm of the bureau for his full 10-year term. The FBI, he said, is working to build stronger relationships with private companies so they feel comfortable approaching the bureau when they are victims of cyber intrusion and ransomware attacks. Comey emphasized that the bureau will protect the privacy of their employees and operations. Companies, said Comey, Bloomberg Politics (3/8, Strohm, 201K) reports, should not retaliate against cybercriminals by trying to hack their attackers. "Don't do it; it's a crime," Comey said. "It's not only against the law but it runs the risk of tremendous confusion in a crowded space."

According to the Wall Street Journal (3/8, Levitz, Viswanatha, Subscription Publication, 6.37M), Comey also called for a return to the debate over how to best balance law enforcement needs with desires for encryption and privacy. "The advent of default, ubiquitous, strong encryption is making more and more of the room in which the FBI investigates dark," Comey said. The director noted that the bureau was unable to open 1,200 of the 2,800 cellphones it obtained lawfully for investigations between October and December. The Boston Globe (3/8, Vaccaro, 1.08M) reports that Comey said encryption was once used exclusively by "the sophisticated actor," but is now in use by drug dealers and similar low-level criminals.

Politico (3/8, Dezenski, 2.46M) quotes Comey as saying, "All of us have a reasonable expectation of privacy in our homes, in our cars, and in our devices. But it also means with good reason, in court, government through law enforcement can invade our private spaces." In certain circumstances, the director said, "Even our memories aren't private...a judge can compel any of us to testify in court on those private communications." He added, "There is no such thing as absolute privacy in America," because "there is no place in America outside of judicial reach."

The AP (3/8) reports that Comey also said the FBI must focus on recruiting talented computer experts who might otherwise go to work for Google or Apple. "The cyberthreats we face are enormous. I don't know if we can stay ahead of them. And I think to say otherwise would be hubris," Comey said. "We need to ensure that cybersecurity is a priority for every enterprise in the United States at all levels. We need to get better and faster at sharing information in the appropriate ways."

Following his remarks, Reuters (3/8, Finkle) reports, Comey did not speak with reporters and ignored "questions about the wiretapping accusation that [President] Trump made on Saturday without offering any evidence to support it." According to reports, Comey had asked the Justice Department to refute Trump's claims because they suggested the FBI broke the law. "The department has not acted on his request," Reuters says. "I'll avoid talking about things I don't want to talk about," Comey joked at the start of his speech, the Boston Herald (3/8, Stout, 509K) reports.

The Hill (3/8, Williams, 1.25M) reports that whereas Comey did not discuss Trump's wiretapping allegations on Wednesday, he has been invited to appear before the House Intelligence Committee on March 20, where Rep. Adam Schiff has indicated he intends to press the director to address the issue. "If the public reports are accurate and Mr. Comey wanted the Justice Department to speak out on this, he will have his own opportunity on March 20," Schiff said.

NPR (3/8, 1.92M), the New York Post (3/8, Moore, 3.82M), Roll Call (3/8, Prater, 63K), The Guardian (UK) (3/8, Borger, 4.07M), GQ (3/8, 18.73M), the Boston Business Journal (3/8, O'Brien, Subscription Publication, 90K), and the WCVB-TV Boston (3/8, 482K), CNN (3/8, Mallonee, Scott, 29.79M), NBC News (3/8, 2.67M), and Fox News (3/8, 11.07M) websites report similarly. The New York Post (3/8, 3.82M) posts the AP's coverage to its website and USA Today (3/8, 5.28M) posts a video from a portion of Comey's remarks online.

Palmieri Blasts Comey. Politico (3/8, Conway, 2.46M) reports Hillary Clinton Campaign Communications Director Jennifer Palmieri responded to Comey's remarks Wednesday by calling him a "particularly infuriating character" who cares above all about "protecting his own reputation." Palmieri stated she believes the Trump campaign did collude with Russia, or at least with WikiLeaks, based on their eagerness to "jump on" the "leak du jour" from John Podesta's email accounts.

White House Says Trump Not Under Investigation.

Media coverage of President Trump's claim that former President Obama wiretapped the phones at Trump Tower has diminished significantly. While the story continues to be a major source of discussion on cable television, print and online reporting are much lighter than in previous days. Network news coverage has markedly declined as well, with only two networks mentioning the story Wednesday evening. The reporting continues to be decidedly negative toward the White House, highlighting that the Administration has still offered no evidence to support Trump's claim, and casting a request from Sens. Lindsey Graham and Sheldon Whitehouse for the FBI and DOJ to provide proof as an effort to call "the White House's bluff" on the issue.

Typical of the ongoing coverage is Jake Tapper's statement on CNN's The Lead  (3/8, 320K) that while the White House says Trump "has no regrets about his fact-free claim that then President Obama tapped his phone last year," nearly "everyone else in this city in the know or with the power to investigate the claim says it's not true, or that they've seen nothing that can support the accusation."

In its lead story, the CBS Evening News  (3/8, lead story, 0:30, Pelley, 11.17M) reported, "The White House said today it does not believe that the President is under investigation by the FBI" amid questions about Trump's "insistence that his phones were tapped during the campaign on orders from President Obama." The Washington Times (3/8, Boyer, 272K) says White House press secretary Sean Spicer was asked if Trump "is the target of counter-intelligence operation raising accusations about links to Russia," and he replied, "I think that's what we need to find out." However, the New York Times (3/8, Landler, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says an aide then "slipped Mr. Spicer a note," after which "he circled back to clarify." USA Today (3/8, Jackson, 5.28M) quotes Spicer as saying, "There is no reason to believe there is any type of investigation with respect to the Department of Justice."

Margaret Brennan reported on the CBS Evening News  (3/8, story 2, 2:35, Pelley, 11.17M) that the White House says Trump "may have been swept up in surveillance that was not directly targeted at him, though the President has claimed it was his phones that were tapped, an allegation denied by former Director of National Intelligence James Clapper." The AP (3/8, Pearson) cites "three former Trump Organization executives" who say that Trump "expressed regular concern that his phone lines were not secure." Trump at times "talked about possible listening devices and worried that he was being monitored," and in other instances, "he was doing the monitoring."

Sara Murray said on CNN's The Lead  (3/8, 320K), "It's been four days since President Trump's shocking claim that President Obama spied on him and while there is still no evidence from the White House, today senators say they want proof." USA Today (3/8, Collins, 5.28M) reports that Graham and Whitehouse "are asking the Justice Department to prove" Trump's accusation that Obama wiretapped Trump Tower. In a letter to FBI Director Comey and acting Deputy Attorney General Dana Boente, the senators requested "specific information regarding the accusation." They wrote, "We request that the Department of Justice provide us copies of any warrant applications and court orders – redacted as necessary to protect intelligence sources and methods that may be compromised by disclosure, and to protect any ongoing investigations – related to wiretaps of President Trump, the Trump Campaign, or Trump Tower. ... We will be glad to review any such applications and orders once they are disclosed, and proceed as appropriate with the oversight the President has requested."

CNN's Situation Room  (3/8, 554K) showed reporter Manu Raju asking Graham about the possibility that the Administration doesn't provide the evidence. Graham responded, "Then I'll have done my job. Either they are lying to me or there is no information, and I don't believe they would lie to me about this. I expect them to come forward as to whether or not a warrant was obtained or sought." Graham also confirmed to Raju that he will subpoena the information if the Administration doesn't comply.

David Muir said on ABC World News Tonight  (3/8, story 5, 1:15, 14.63M) that the White House is "still not providing any proof," but Jonathan Karl said Graham and Whitehouse "are calling the White House's bluff on this." The White House has argued that "it is up to Congress to investigate," so the senators "are saying they will investigate. ... They want to get the FBI on record either admitting it happened, or much more likely, saying it didn't." Reuters (3/8, Cowan) says Graham told CNN that if DOJ does not cooperate, "subpoenas would be issued." A.B. Stoddard of RealClear Politics said on CNN Wolf  (3/8, 224K) that the White House has sent the matter to Congress and "Congress is calling their bluff. ... If there's no evidence, it's going to be more than embarrassing, actually."

Meanwhile, lawmakers from both sides of the aisle said Wednesday that they have seen no evidence that would support Trump's claim. For example, Sen. Dianne Feinstein was asked on CNN's The Lead  (3/8, 320K) if she has seen any evidence that Obama tapped Trump's phones. Feinstein said, "No, I have not. And it's all rather shocking to me that a sitting President would make this kind of an allegation about a former President without any proof whatsoever."

Sen. Tim Kaine said on MSNBC's Morning Joe  (3/8, 270K), "The President's behavior...is sort of shocking but not surprising because this is a guy who said Ted Cruz's dad was involved in the JFK assassination on the campaign trail and he got a pass to that. He is saying he was wiretapped or that his inaugural crowd was bigger than it was, it shouldn't surprise us. But it is shocking. You don't want to see that behavior in the President."

Sen. Tom Cotton was asked on MSNBC's Morning Joe  (3/8, 270K) if he has seen any evidence of that Obama wiretapped Trump Tower. Cotton said, "I have seen no evidence of that. But I would also say a lot of the anonymous sources in the media are stating things that are very precise and not exactly the full picture either. When, for instance, the President's spokesman denies that either the President or White House official, quote-unquote, ordered surveillance, that doesn't really deny very much if you understand how the foreign intelligence surveillance court works. It's a judge that would order those things and it's the attorney general or her agent that would file that application."

Appearing on CNN's Situation Room  (3/8, 554K), Rep. Adam Schiff, ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, said he is "not aware of any evidence of any wiretapping," calling Trump's allegation "irresponsible." He said his panel will also look into the matter. Schiff noted that the panel has asked Clapper, former CIA Director Brennan, and FBI Directory Comey to testify on March 20, and he thinks "we'll have ample testimony that this claim was nonsensical, false, reckless, and scandalous in its breathtaking dishonesty."

Rep. Elijah Cummings said on CNN's Situation Room  (3/8, 554K) said the Congressional probes will "hopefully...get to the bottom of this, and I expect that there is absolutely no truth to" Trump's claim.

Rep. Trey Gowdy was asked on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360  (3/8, 686K) if Trump could simply declassify any evidence to back up his claim if he wants to. Gowdy, noting that he and Cooper were "speculating that [evidence] exists," replied, "That's true, in theory. ... The President has the power to both declassify it and to have it released, as long as it's not held by the judicial branch, which would be a court matter."

In an interview with the CBS Evening News  (3/8, story 3, 3:40, Pelley, 11.17M), former CIA Director Leon Panetta said there are two conclusions one can draw from Trump's claim. Said Panetta, "One is that he says these things knowing that they're not true in order to divert the public, and if he's doing that, he's misusing the powers of the presidency. Or if he truly believes that they are true, when indeed they're not true, and he has not tried to find out the truth, which then shows a real lack of judgment. Either way, I think it undermines and weakens the strength of the presidency in this country."

Obama "Irked And Exasperated" By Trump's Accusation. Jeff Zeleny said on CNN's

Situation Room (3/8, 554K) that Obama was "stunned by the allegations." Zeleny added that "we are told that the former President was irked and exasperated by yet another accusation from this President." On its website, CNN (3/8, Zeleny, Liptak, 29.79M) cited "sources close to the former president" who said his reaction "stopped short of outright fury." Those sources offered "slightly different insight into Obama's demeanor than others who told The Wall Street Journal that Obama was 'livid.'"

Residents Of Ohio Town Largely Indifferent To Trump-Russia News. The Washington Post (3/8, Gibbons-Neff, 11.43M) reports that in the town of Wilmington, Ohio, "the barrage of news coming out about the Trump administration's ties to Russia has fallen on mostly indifferent ears." The town "has been more focused on local issues" such as a decision by Amazon.com "to pull a burgeoning shipping hub and plans for as many as 3,000 new jobs at Wilmington's airpark, opting instead to take a $10 million dollar tax break to relocate to Kentucky."

NYTimes: Warner Faces "Stand-And-Deliver Moment" In Russian Inquiry. The New York Times (3/8, Fiegenheimer, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that as Republicans "resist calls for a select committee or special prosecutor to oversee" the investigation into President Trump's ties to Russia, the "Democrats' best hope for acquiring answers most likely remains an investigation by the Senate Intelligence Committee," where Sen. Mark Warner – a "former rising star" in the Democratic party – is vice chairman. The result is a "spotlight trained brightly on a southern-state centrist with a nine-figure net worth, a decade-old itch to be president and, until recently, according to friends and former aides, a healthy disdain for the institution he serves."

Spicer Laments Lack Of Outrage Over WikiLeaks Release.

Media coverage of WikiLeaks recent release of more than 8,000 pages of documents it says are classified CIA files continues to garner heavy media attention. White House press secretary Sean Spicer's expression of frustration at the lack of media outrage over the release gets some attention, but the main media focus are efforts the FBI and CIA to determine the source of the leak and assess the damage it has caused.

The Washington Post (3/8, Johnson, 11.43M) reports Spicer "will not authenticate the documents released by WikiLeaks," but he is "frustrated that more people aren't more outraged about their release." Spicer told reporters, "This should be a major concern to people in terms of the leaks that are coming out and the desire to get to the bottom of them. ... I think the idea that we are having these ongoing disclosures of national security and classified information should be something that everybody is outraged about in this country." While Spicer "repeatedly said that the government's policy is to not confirm the authenticity of sensitive information that might have been leaked or hacked," he "accused the media of not focusing enough on the national security implications of the information." In addition, Spicer "reflected on how these alleged surveillance tools would have been at the disposal of the Obama administration," which President Trump accused of wiretapping the phones at Trump Tower.

USA Today (3/8, Jackson, 5.28M) reports that Spicer argued, "There is a massive, massive difference," between WikiLeaks' release of emails from Hillary Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta and leaking national security secrets. Spicer also said argued that there was more outrage from Democrats and the media over WikiLeaks at that time than now. Said Spicer, "It's interesting how there's sort of a double standard with when the leaks occur, how much outrage there is."

Meanwhile, the FBI has launched a criminal investigation into the release of the documents, USA Today (3/8, Johnson, 5.28M) reports, citing "a US official." According to the official, the inquiry "will seek to determine whether the disclosure represented a breach from the outside or a leak from inside the spy agency," and "a separate review will attempt to assess the damage caused by such a disclosure." The New York Times (3/8, Rosenberg, Shane, Goldman, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) describes the CIA as "scrambl[ing]...to assess and contain the damage" from the leak, which investigators say "was the work not of a hostile foreign power like Russia but of a disaffected insider," while the Los Angeles Times (3/8, Wilber, 4.52M) cites a CNN report which said that "the FBI and CIA 'are coordinating reviews of the matter.'" An FBI spokeswoman "referred calls on the matter to the CIA," and "a CIA spokeswoman, in a statement declined to comment 'on the status of any investigation into the source of the documents.'"

Brian Ross reported on ABC World News Tonight  (3/8, story 3, 2:45, Muir, 14.63M) that the hunt is focused on "the headquarters of the top secret center for cyber intelligence, the CCI. Officials believe whoever was responsible had to have access to one of the highly classified US spy networks, such as the one called JWICS." Andrea Mitchell reported in the lead story for NBC Nightly News  (3/8, lead story, 2:50, Holt, 16.61M) that according to "a senior US official," the documents "contain authentic information about the CIA's top secret tools for hacking." Mitchell added that "two US intelligence sources" said "Russia is suspect because of Moscow's ties to WikiLeaks, and the hacked emails during the 2016 campaign." Meanwhile, WikiLeaks "is claiming they've released only one percent of what they've got," and "inside the CIA tonight...the hunt is on."

In what Politico (3/8, Geller, 2.46M) calls a "rare step," the CIA on Wednesday "publicly defend[ed] its mission ." CIA spokesman Jonathan Liu released "an unprompted on-the-record statement" in which he "argued that the agency exists to 'aggressively collect foreign intelligence,' stressed that its agents are 'legally prohibited' from hacking Americans and emphasized that the public 'should be deeply troubled' by the WikiLeaks release." Liu said there are "critical points," but he "reiterated that the CIA will not confirm the authenticity of the WikiLeaks materials." A brief report on the CBS Evening News  (3/8, story 4, 0:30, Pelley, 11.17M) said the CIA said Wednesday that the leak "has jeopardized US personnel and operations and given US adversaries the tools to do America harm." Tom Costello reported on NBC Nightly News  (3/8, story 2, 2:05, Holt, 16.61M) that "security pros say the CIA's alleged hacking blueprints should serve as a reality check for all Americans." Georgia Weidman of Shevirah Security said, "The only secure device would be one that's turned off, stepped-on, melted down, buried, and then maybe it's secure."

In his "Talking Points Memo" on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor  (3/8, 767K), Bill O'Reilly that "leakers of classified documents are actively committing treason. It's apparent that the federal government does not have a handle on how to apprehend these traitors, much less stop the espionage."

A Washington Post (3/8, 11.43M) editorial stresses that the CIA cyberhacking tools released by WikiLeaks "are not instruments of mass surveillance," and there is "no evidence they have been used against Americans or otherwise improperly; if there were, we can be sure that WikiLeaks, whose core mission is not transparency but undermining US national security, would have trumpeted it." The Post says "it won't be a surprise if Moscow again turns out to be the source of the leak."

Officials Focus On Contractors As Source Of Leak. Reuters (3/8, Walcott, Shalal) reports that intelligence and law enforcement officials are "focusing on contractors as the likeliest source of documents" being leaked to WikiLeaks. According to an official with knowledge of the investigation, CIA contractors "have been checking to see which of their employees had access to the material that Wikileaks published, and then going over their computer logs, emails and other communications for any evidence of who might be responsible." The Wall Street Journal (3/8, Harris, Subscription Publication, 6.37M)says the possibility that a contractor was behind the leak is certain to result in increased scrutiny of the use of outside entities to conduct classified work. While contractors are vetted like government employees, in the last four years, they have been responsible for two significant breaches.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein said on CNN's The Lead  (3/8, 320K) that "this is the third contractor now that's done this kind of leaking. ... I think we really need to take a look at the contractor portion of the employee work force because you have to be loyal to America to work for an intelligence agency. Otherwise, don't do it. Don't come aboard as a contractor."

Rep. Jackie Speier said on CNN Wolf  (3/8, 224K) that "whether it was Edward Snowden or some of the other leakers of information, they have historically been contractors, persons who have been hired by contractors who then provide services to the Central Intelligence agency. I'm concerned that we do not have a handle on making sure those persons are properly vetted in terms of whether or not they are, in fact, going to put our country first."

COUNTER-TERRORISM

Senate Panel Assessing Why Refugee Was Not Arrested Prior To The Election.

The Fox News (3/8, Lajeunesse, Zimmerman, 11.07M) website reports that the "The Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee has asked Attorney General Jeff Sessions to find out why the terror suspect's pending arrest was allegedly spiked just over a week before the election." In a letter to Sessions, committee Chairman Ron Johnson said, "When [Joint Terrorism Task Force]-San Antonio and the U.S. Attorney's office for the Western District of Texas sought to prosecute this refugee, the local law enforcement and prosecutors allegedly 'met resistance' from officials within the National Security Division's Counter Terrorism section in Washington DC." The suspect, an Iraqi man who entered the US using an assumed identity, is now at large, Fox says. "His real name was not released." Fox notes that President Trump ran for the presidency "on a tough-on-terror platform and had been critical of President Obama's refugee policy."

Administration Invokes State Secrets Privilege To Block Testimony In CIA Torture Case.

The New York Times (3/8, Risen, Fink, Savage, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports the Administration has invoked executive powers in an effort "to block the testimony of several top CIA officials," including new CIA Deputy Director Gina Haspel, in a federal lawsuit "against two psychologists who helped run the agency's harsh interrogation program, along with portions of 172 internal agency documents." The lawsuit was filed in 2015 by two former detainees at CIA secret prisons overseas "and the representative of a third man who died in custody." The Times adds that if they win the suit against former military psychologists James E. Mitchell and Bruce Jessen, "who helped devise and run the interrogation program, it would be the first time an American civilian court has held anyone accountable for a role in developing counterterrorism policies after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks."

Lawyers Dispute Spicer's Clarification Of Trump Tweet On Gitmo Releases.

According to Politico (3/8, Gerstein, 2.46M), White House press secretary Sean Spicer's clarifications of President Trump's tweet about the release of Guantanamo prisoners under Presidents Bush and Obama "stray from the facts." Sabin Willett, "a prominent lawyer for Guantanamo detainees," said the claim that Bush released most detainees on court orders is "loony" because the number of people a district court ordered released is fewer than five. Another Guantanamo detainee lawyer, David Remes, said "the D.C. Circuit held that the courts cannot force the president to release anybody." Former Obama White House Counsel Greg Craig said Spicer "doesn't know what he is talking about."

The New York Post (3/8, Saul, Eustachewich, 3.82M) reports that "an Air Force veteran fought back tears on the stand Wednesday as he testified about the moment his fellow airman took a bullet to the head in Afghanistan nearly 14 years ago." The Post adds that "the chaotic scene, which left airman Raymond Losano and another serviceman dead, unfolded in just seconds, according to Master Sgt. Lee Blackwell." Blackwell "was testifying at the trial for admitted al Qaeda member Ibrahim Harun, 46, who is charged with killing Losano, 24, of Texas, and Army Pvt. Jerod Dennis, 19, of Oklahoma, in the Afghanistan ambush as well as plotting bomb strikes against US facilities in Nigeria." The trial is taking place in a Brooklyn federal court.

Trey Gowdy is rejecting calls for a congressional investigation into a January raid in Yemen that resulted in the death of Navy SEAL William "Ryan" Owens and "perhaps more than a dozen Yemeni civilians." In an email to USA TODAY, Gowdy said, "Is there any evidence of a failure to provide information to Congress in the Yemen raid? Is there any evidence of failure to provide access to witnesses?"

COUNTER-INTELLIGENCE

US, Ukrainian Authorities Looked Into Manafort Associate.

Politico (3/8, Vogel, Stern, 2.46M) reports that the activities of Konstantin Kilimnik, "a Kiev-based operative with suspected ties to Russian intelligence who consulted regularly with Paul Manafort last year while Manafort was running Donald Trump's presidential campaign," are of interest to US and Ukrainian authorities. Kilimnik came under FBI and State Department scrutiny "partly because of at least two trips he took to the US during the presidential campaign, according to three international political operatives familiar with the agencies' interest in Kilimnik." It is not clear whether "either agency launched any kind of official inquiry into Kilimnik, nor is it clear whether the interest from the US authorities is ongoing." However, Politico cites documents which show that the Ukrainian prosecutor general "did launch a formal investigation into Kilimnik's suspected ties to Russian intelligence" and "has cleared Kilimnik, though the Ukrainian parliamentarian who requested the investigation questioned its thoroughness."

The Turkish businessman who hired Flynn's consulting firm, Ekim Alptekin, told the AP on Wednesday that the amended filings were made "in response to pressure from Justice Department officials in recent weeks." USA Today (3/8, Schouten, 5.28M) reports Flynn's lawyer, Robert Kelner, said Flynn shut down his firm last year, but decided to register because his work for Inovo BV "could be construed to have principally benefited the Republic of Turkey."

ABC World News Tonight  (3/8, story 6, 0:30, Muir, 14.63M) reported 140 leaders of Jewish community centers spoke out against the wave of threats and asked federal law enforcement to increase efforts to thwart anti-Semitic acts. Reuters (3/8, Ax) reports that the Jewish leaders expressed their concerns in a Wednesday letter to Attorney General Sessions. "We are frustrated with the progress in resolving this situation," the leaders wrote. "We insist that all relevant federal agencies, including your own, apply all the resources available to identify and bring the perpetrator or perpetrators, who are trying to instill anxiety and fear in communities across the country, to justice." The Huffington Post (3/8, 237K) reports that the letter was also address to FBI Director Comey and DHS Secretary Kelly. The threats are currently being investigated by the FBI and Justice Department. So far, one person has been arrested for a handful of the at least 110 total "threats made to over 80 Jewish community centers...since January," the Post says.

The AP (3/8) reports that the sole individual implicated in the threats thus far, Juan Thompson, has not yet received a ruling on his request to be granted bond. His public defender, Lucille Liggett, told a judge Wednesday that he would agree to be on house arrest and refrain from using electronics. "But Assistant U.S. Attorney Howard Marcus called Thompson 'unstable' and says he should remain jailed," the AP says.

According to Greenblatt, though radical Islam is a problem, the scope of the government's Countering Violent Extremism program "must encompass neo-Nazis and white supremacists."

"My office takes very seriously any threat of violence against an individual or their place of worship based on race, religion or cultural practices. We will continue to work closely with the FBI to prosecute these types of crimes, which threaten religious freedoms and violate fundamental civil rights," said US Attorney Andrew Luger. According to FBI Minneapolis Special Agent in Charge Richard Thornton, Fisher's sentence "reflects the severity of his appalling hate crime."

Prosecutors said Vaughn "accepted more than $10,000 in cash bribes, 'influencing the performance of his official duties,' including voting for a bill to expand alcohol sales on Sundays." They also said that "from January 2015 through April 2016, Vaughn conspired with a liquor regulation official and store owners 'to enrich himself personally.'"

The Washington Post (3/8, Bui, 11.43M) reports that "a judge allowed Vaughn released on his own personal recognizance during his initial appearance in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt Wednesday." Vaughn "was indicted on eight counts of wire fraud, conspiracy and bribery in connection with actions that occurred during his time in office between 2012 and 2016." Politico Analysis: Sessions Signals Changes To Drug-Charge Policies.

Politico (3/8, Gerstein, 2.46M) reports in its "Under The Radar" blog that Attorney General Sessions "is signaling" that the Trump Administration "plans to make changes to policies the Obama administration implemented to seek less serious charges in some drug cases." In a memo sent to federal prosecutors nationwide on Wednesday, Sessions "says changes in Justice Department charging policies are in the offing. 'I encourage you to employ the full complement of federal law to address the problem of violent crime in your district,' Sessions wrote. 'Further guidance and support in executing this priority – including an updated memo on charging for all criminal cases – will be forthcoming.'" According to Politico, "legal experts said the language indicates that Sessions is planning to make significant revisions to policies Attorney General Eric Holder issued" in 2010 and 2013 regarding drug charges.

The AP (3/8, Gurman) reports that in the memo, Sessions "told the 94 U.S. attorneys to use 'the substantial tools at their disposal' to pursue more prosecutions and seek harsh sentences for those who commit robberies and gun crimes," and he "acknowledged that U.S. attorneys already view this as a main part of their job, but said they must do more to see a drop in violence." The AP adds that the memo "is a reiteration of Sessions' tough-on-crime stance," and that "it came two weeks after he repealed a memo that directed the department to phase out the use of private prisons, signaling he sees them as necessary for the future." In the memo, Sessions "lamented a spike in murders 'while federal prosecutions for violent crimes have been declining' and urged prosecutors to work with their local counterparts to punish criminals and dismantle drug gangs."

The Washington Post (3/8, Horwitz, 11.43M) reports that Sessions's memo "follows a speech he gave last month to state attorneys general in which he said that historically low crime rates might be coming to an end and that recent crime increases could foreshadow a violent new period in the nation's history. 'Unfortunately, the most recent crime data available shows a 10.8 percent increase in the number of murders in this country, while federal prosecutions for violent crimes have been declining,' Sessions said in his memo to prosecutors." Sessions "encouraged his prosecutors to use laws regarding firearms, robbery, carjacking and drug offenses as tools to bring investigations and prosecutions against suspected criminals," and he "said that prosecutions under the federal Controlled Substances Act 'can drive violent crime down.'"

The Chicago Sun-Times (3/8, Owen, 798K) reports that the FBI is looking for victims of Arizona music promoter Frederick Stahmer who "promoted at least 23 concerts featuring 1980s rock bands in Tucson, Chicago, Tulsa, Nashville and Las Vegas." Several vendors and individuals to have worked with Stahmer say they were not repaid money advanced for goods and services related to the concerts. "While the FBI can't provide additional information regarding the ongoing investigation at this time, it does need to speak with anyone who lost money in connection with Stahmer or his company in the last five years," the bureau said.

Report Accuses Caterpillar Of Tax Fraud.

The New York Times (3/7, Drucker, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that "for years, federal investigators have been scrutinizing Caterpillar's overseas tax affairs with no resolution to the examinations of the complex maneuvers involving billions of dollars and one of the company's Swiss subsidiaries," and now, "a report commissioned by the government and reviewed by The New York Times accuses the heavy-equipment maker of carrying out tax and accounting fraud." The Times notes that "it is extremely rare to accuse a big multinational company of tax fraud, which could result in high penalties. 'Caterpillar did not comply with either U.S. tax law or U.S. financial reporting rules,' wrote Leslie A. Robinson, an accounting professor at the Tuck School of Business at Dartmouth College and the author of the report." The Times notes that "no charges have been filed, and it is not clear whether investigators agree with the findings or intend to act on them."

Mnuchin Seeks Dismissal Of Fraud Suit.

USA Today (3/8, McCoy, 5.28M) reports that Treasury Secretary Mnuchin has asked New York County Supreme Court Justice Charles Ramos "to dismiss a multi-million dollar fraud case, arguing the movie industry firm that accused him has 'no legitimate claim.'" In a court filing Tuesday, defense lawyers argued that RKA Film Financing "has not identified a single contact that it ever had with Mr. Mnuchin at any time on any subject." The attorneys also asked that legal sanctions be imposed "against RKA and its lawyers for continuing its case against Mnuchin." In a separate filing last week, however, RKA argued that Mnuchin "was an active and knowing participant in a scheme to defraud."

Watchdogs Asks Bharara To Probe Trump Over Foreign Business Deals.

The Washington Post (3/8, Hamburger, 11.43M) reports that "a trio of watchdog groups has asked" Manhattan US Attorney Preet Bharara "to investigate whether President Trump has received payments or other benefits from foreign governments through his business interests in violation of an obscure clause in the U.S. Constitution." In request, sent by letter to Bharara, "is a novel strategy by ethics critics who have been pressing Trump to comply with the Constitution's 'emoluments clause,' which prohibits top officials from receiving payments or favors from foreign governments." The Post notes that "Trump's business empire stretches across the globe," and that "the letter was sent six weeks after one of the groups filed a lawsuit in federal district court making a similar claim." Trump "has said he addressed ethics concerns by turning over management of his business to his adult sons, who've said they have separated the family business from their relationship with their father and the U.S. government." NPR (3/8, 1.92M) also reports.

Lawmakers Asked To Probe Icahn's Role With Trump. MSN (3/8, Prentice, 7.46M) reports that the government watchdog group Public Citizen said on Wednesday "it will ask lawmakers to investigate whether billionaire investor Carl Icahn should have been subject to lobbying disclosure laws when he advised President Donald Trump to overhaul the U.S. biofuels program." Icahn, "an unpaid adviser to Trump on regulation, submitted a proposal to Trump last month to change the U.S. Renewable Fuel Standard by shifting the burden of blending biofuels into gasoline away from oil refining companies, and further down the supply chain to marketers." Public Citizen said that, "because Icahn owns a controlling stake in a refinery that could benefit from the proposed change, he may have been required by a 1995 lobbying disclosure law to disclose his discussions with Trump on the subject as lobbying."

The AP (3/8) reports Deric Lostutter of Winchester, Kentucky was sentenced to "two years in prison for hacking into a high school sports website to promote his online identity and harass and intimidate the website owner and others." Holland: Fusion Centers "Can Serve As The Cement" For Public-Private Cybersecurity Mission.

NIC Inc. chief security officer Jayne Friedland Holland writes in Government Computer News (3/8, 1K), "With the explosion of hacktivism and other forms of cyber crimes in recent years, fusion centers have increased their intelligence gathering and their focus on cybersecurity." Holland adds, "Fusion centers can serve as the cement for a shared cybersecurity mission across government, law enforcement and private industry, and state and local governments have a distinct role to play in the fusion centers' work." Furthermore, "State and local governments must interact regularly with fusion centers and encourage more private companies to share information."

Continuing Coverage: Child Pornography Case Dropped After DOJ Refuses To Show Software Code.

The AP (3/8) reports in continuing coverage that federal prosecutors "have dropped child pornography charges against a Washington teacher after the U.S. Justice Department refused to disclose information about a software weakness it exploited during an investigation last year." The AP reports that "charges against Vancouver, Washington, teacher Jay Michaud in U.S. District Court in Seattle were dismissed Monday." In 2015, Michaud "was arrested and accused of downloading child pornography," and "during the child porn investigation, the FBI allowed a secret child porn website on the largely anonymous Tor network to run for two weeks while it tried to identify users by hacking into their computers." The website, "called Playpen, operated on Tor," and "after arresting Playpen's operator in Florida in early 2015, the FBI let the website continue running for two weeks while trying to identify users, a move the agency said was necessary to apprehend those posting and downloading images of children being sexually abused."

911 DDoS Attack Provides Evidence Of "Potentially Devastating" Smartphone Glitch.

The Christian Science Monitor (3/8, 387K) "Passcode" discusses the case of Meetkumar Hiteshbhai Desai, who faces "four counts of felony computer tampering" for a distributed denial of service attack that overwhelmed 911 systems in three states. Desi "said he didn't intend to cause any harm" but "did surface a potentially devastating glitch in smartphone software that could exact damage on any number of sensitive and critical targets." Passcode adds, "It's exactly the type of attack that national law enforcement officials have been concerned about for years," and DHS "has been working on technology to protect 911 centers from DDoS and telephone-based, or TDoS, attacks for three years." DHS S&T cybersecurity division program manager Dan Massey is quoted saying the incident proved that an attacker can "cause a large number of phones or a large number of computers or a large number of whatever connected device to start generating these calls."

Former FBI Director Discusses Bureau's IT, Cybersecurity Issues.

FedTech (3/8) reports on a speech by former FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III at the CDW Managing Risk Summit about the bureau's IT modernization. Mueller "notes that when he came on board in 2001 the FBI's IT was 'a mess' and was archaic." Upgrades of the networks and network backbone "went fine," but "the FBI's plans to upgrade its software" all at once, on one day in July 2003, "went awry." Mueller is quoted saying, "I never asked the hard questions. The lesson to me was, when it comes to IT and you're running an organization, you better ask the hard questions and it better come from the top." FedTech goes on to cite Mueller discussing the bureau's recruitment and development of cybersecurity talent, "crucial to" which was "the FBI's partnership with other federal agencies, including the National Security Agency."

Former Obama Cyber Official Discusses Technical Skills Training, International Cyberspace Agreements.

The Washington Post (3/8, Fung, 11.43M) features an interview with R. David Edelman, former National Security Council and National Economic Council member under President Obama, who was "among those responsible for crafting U.S. policies on cybersecurity, technology and innovation." Edelman says the stigmatization of non-traditional higher education is "wrong. And as long as we continue to culturally stigmatize that, we're going to have a shortage of labor in" jobs requiring technical skills. Edelman says that job retraining to fill skill gaps or replace jobs lost due to automation "is going to have to be an all-hands on deck thing," involving not just government but academia and employers. Edelman goes on to discuss international agreements over cyberspace, saying, "The way the U.S. can guarantee it won't have a say is to withdraw from everything."

Report: International Treaty Needed To Protect People From "Unfettered Cybersurveillance."

Reuters (3/8, Miles) reports, "The world needs an international treaty to protect people's privacy from unfettered cybersurveillance, which is being pushed by populist politicians preying on fear of terrorism, according to" a report "submitted to the U.N. Human Rights Council by the U.N. independent expert on privacy, Joe Cannataci." Cannataci is quoted saying, "It's time to start reclaiming cyberspace from the menace of over-surveillance."

Republicans Propose Repeal Of Obama-Era Internet Privacy Regulations.

Reuters (3/8, Shepardson) reports Sen. Jeff Flake (R-AZ) introduced a resolution Tuesday with backing from 34 other senators that proposes the undoing of Obama-era regulations that put Internet service providers under closer scrutiny than websites for consumer data protection. Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-TN) introduced a companion bill in the House Wednesday. Reuters notes that the US Federal Communications Commission temporarily blocked some of the regulations from taking effect last Thursday. ACLU general counsel Neema Singh Giuliani criticized Flake's proposal for "essentially allowing...Comcast, AT&T, and Verizon to sell consumers' private information to the highest bidder."

Media Analyses: Trump Moves To Calm GOP "Revolt" Over Healthcare Bill.

Much of the coverage of the debate over the American Health Care Act deals with efforts by House Speaker Ryan and other congressional GOP leaders to forge party unity. But there is also significant coverage of President Trump's role in trying to get conservatives to support the bill. Several reports and analysts say this is Trump's first opportunity to prove he is the dealmaker he campaigned as; analyses also cast the debate as one of the first times that Trump has been on the side of the party establishment and facing opposition from the populist wing.

Though the three broadcast networks spent more than eight minutes combined on the story, none led with it. ABC World News Tonight  (3/8, story 4, 3:35, Muir, 14.63M) reported, "With his healthcare plan under siege from Democrats and Republicans too, House Speaker Paul Ryan is trying to calm the storm." Ryan: "I have no doubt we'll pass this because we're going to keep our promises. We're going through the inevitable growing pains of being an opposition party to becoming a governing party." ABC's Mary Bruce: "But now, the nation's leading healthcare groups are piling on, joining AARP to denounce the plan. In a letter to Congress, the American Medical Association citing the 'expected decline in health insurance coverage and the potential harm it would cause to vulnerable patient populations.' President Trump has promised insurance for everybody." Kellyanne Conway: "He has committed that no one will lose their insurance and everyone will have access to coverage. Everyone will have access to coverage. He has assured that."

NBC Nightly News  (3/8, story 3, 2:25, Holt, 16.61M) said there is a "growing revolt inside the Republican Party over the GOP's plan to replace Obamacare – a hard sell for GOP leaders, stressing these are just the beginning stages, expressing confidence they'll win enough support to get it done. And President Trump getting involved in a full-court press as millions of Americans' healthcare hangs in the balance." NBC's Hallie Jackson: "After campaigning on his art of the deal..." Trump: "Everybody wants me to negotiate. That's what I'm known as, a negotiator." Jackson: "...the ultimate test now of whether he can close one. President Trump hard-selling healthcare with the bill he backs in big trouble, even with conservatives."

The CBS Evening News  (3/8, story 5, 2:15, Pelley, 11.17M) reported, "At the White House tonight, President Trump returned to dealmaking as he tried the persuade conservative leaders to support the Republican replacement for Obamacare," which "is meeting more opposition than expected." CBS' Nancy Cordes: "Republicans began pushing their Obamacare replacement bill through two House committees today, trying to outpace mounting criticism." Phil Mattingly reported on CNN's The Lead  (3/8, 320K) that "GOP leaders blitzed their members behind closed doors today with House Majority Whip Steve Scalise placing a split-screen slide on a projection screen of Trump and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi. The question Scalise asked: 'Whose side are you on?' The GOP aides realize it will take more than that as conservatives continue to threaten to sink the bill altogether."

Chuck Todd said on MSNBC's MTP Daily  (3/8) that the Republican Party "has an identity crisis, at least when it comes to ideology. The healthcare fight has exposed the growing divide between the party's old fashioned movement conservative base and its new nationalist president." The Washington Post (3/8, Weigel, 11.43M) reports that the President met with conservative leaders at the White House on Wednesday evening after other meetings earlier in the day, and The Hill (3/8, Fabian, Wong, 1.25M) says that members of the House Freedom Caucus have been invited to the White House "next week for a pizza dinner and policy discussion at the bowling alley." But Axios (3/8, Swan) says "the message from the conservatives is clear: It's going to take more than schmoozing to change their minds on the Obamacare replacement plan the House Republican leadership wants. They want big, substantive changes – enough to make it a fundamentally different bill."

The Washington Post (3/8, Costa, Weigel, 11.43M) says that Trump's "salesmanship" on the bill has so far been uncharacteristically "understated. ... There is still urgency in his efforts, just markedly less Trump." There have been no "skewering tweets" or "raging news conferences." Instead, the President "is quietly courting wary conservatives in private meetings and keeping himself somewhat out of the picture as party leaders and his Cabinet officials defend the plan." Bloomberg Politics (3/8, House, 201K) reports that OMB Director Mulvaney has told House Republicans that the President "is 'agnostic' on the details of the plan, suggesting the current draft could face alterations."

Politico (3/8, Dawsey, Bade, 2.46M) reports the President on Wednesday told conservatives that the bill was "strong and necessary," though just "minutes later his top aides offered some willingness to consider changing some of the core provisions. ... In other words, Trump was ready to deal." The Hill (3/8, Roubein, Hellmann, 1.25M) reports that the conservative Republican Study Committee, which consists of 172 House members, wants to "change the structure of the tax credits in the bill to make them partially refundable" and freeze enrollment in the Affordable Care Act's Medicaid expansion.

The Washington Times (3/8, Sherfinski, 272K) reports that Kellyanne Conway told Fox News, "The President is confident that the American Health Care Act will pass the House and the Senate and [will] become the law – absolutely. He is really husbanding this through. Some people suggested that he be the closer. Some people suggested he be the leadoff batter. The President and the Vice President are all in here."

Chris Cillizza of the Washington Post (3/8, 11.43M) writes, "Donald Trump was elected president on this basic idea: Everyone currently in the government is dumb and makes bad deals. I am smart and make good deals." The healthcare bill is "where the rubber meets the road for Dealmaker Donald. If this bill goes down, it's a major political problem for Republicans," angering the base and potentially alienating "independents who voted for Trump believing he might, maybe, actually be able to change things."

Politico (3/8, Nussbaum, Haberkorn, 2.46M) says that while Trump "built his career in large part by plastering his name" on his properties, he appears to have no interest in having his name attached to the healthcare legislation. The Hill (3/8, Easley, Kamisar, 1.25M) reports that Democrats have been "branding the legislation 'TrumpCare' in their attempt to derail it," but Republicans and the White House are "rejecting the term." #TrumpCare is the emerging Twitter hashtag for critics of the legislation, though comments with the more neutral hashtag #AHCA were also heavily negative toward the bill.

Mulvaney Says CBO Score For Bill Will Be "Really Good" Or "Great." OMB Director Mulvaney was asked on MSNBC's Morning Joe (3/8, 270K) about concerns that legislators will not know the cost of the bill before they have to vote on it. Mulvaney said, "It is not unusual for us to take up bills in committee without a CBO score. ... That CBO score will be there before the final vote. Just as importantly, however, this is a reconciliation bill. We all know it's going to score positive to helping out the deficit, to spending less money, another thing conservatives should be supportive of." The Washington Times (3/8, Sherfinski, 272K) reports that Mulvaney added that the score "will be 'really good' or 'great.'"

The Hill (3/8, Fabian, 1.25M) reports that the White House was critical of the CBO, with press secretary Sean Spicer saying the CBO "was 'way off last time' in its cost estimate of the Affordable Care Act." Spicer added, "If you're looking at the CBO for accuracy, you're looking in the wrong place."

Ryan Says He Has "No Doubt" That Bill Will Pass. The AP (3/8, Fram, Alonso-Zaldivar) reports that House Speaker Ryan and other Republican leaders are also trying to unify the GOP caucus. Ryan "praised the proposal as 'what good, conservative health care reform looks like' as lawmakers cast Congress' first votes on the GOP legislation." The AP says their goal of getting the bill through the House Ways and Means Committee and Energy and Commerce Committee by the end of the week "seemed likely." The Wall Street Journal (3/8, A1, Armour, Hackman, Rubin, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) says there was no significant dissent in committee among Republicans on Wednesday, though USA Today (3/8, Groppe, 5.28M) and Politico (3/8, Caygle, 2.46M) both report that Democrats, who know that they cannot kill the bill, are trying to delay passage for as long as possible in the hopes of exacerbating divisions in the larger GOP caucus.

The Los Angeles Times (3/8, Levey, Mascaro, 4.52M) reports that Ryan "said he had 'no doubt' the bill would pass, brushing off discontent from opponents as the 'inevitable growing pains' of tackling a difficult policy now that Republicans control the White House as well as Congress." The Washington Times (3/8, Howell, Dinan, 272K) says that Ryan "also said his troops have had months to review their blueprint and offer feedback, so it's time to get moving."

House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady writes in a USA Today (3/8, 5.28M) op-ed, "Obamacare has harmed far more people than it has helped. As President Trump said in his recent address to Congress, 'Obamacare is collapsing,' and 'decisive action must be taken to protect all Americans.' With the American Health Care Act, House Republicans are answering President Trump's call to action." The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/8, Rao, 1.27M) reports that Minnesota's three GOP members of the House said Wednesday that they support the bill.

The Wall Street Journal (3/8, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) says in an editorial that while the AHCA is flawed, it is the best available option. A repeal bill without replacement would likely fail in the Senate, and if it did pass would create chaos at the state level and among insurers. The Journal also says that the tax credits that are now angering conservatives have been a regular feature of past GOP healthcare bills. Karl Rove similarly writes in his Wall Street Journal (3/8, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) column that the bill is similar to past GOP efforts and repeals many of the worst aspects of the ACA.

House Ways And Means Approves GOP Healthcare Bill On Party-Line Vote. The AP (3/9, Alonso-Zaldivar, Fram) reports that the House Ways and Means Committee voted 23-16 along party lines to approve the American Health Care Act, "an initial triumph" for Republicans that came just before 4:30 a.m. on Thursday. The House Energy and Commerce Committee continues its work on the bill.

Cotton Warns GOP Is "Moving A Little Bit Too Quickly." Sen. Tom Cotton said on MSNBC's Morning Joe (3/8, 270K), "I think we are moving a little bit too quickly on healthcare reform. ... We have only had this bill in public 36 hours and to rush it through this week and then vote on it within the next few weeks really does hearken back to some of the problems that Obamacare was graded under." The Washington Times (3/8, Sherfinski, 272K) reports on Cotton's remarks.

Paul Calls For Vote On "Clean Repeal" Before Consideration Of Replacement. McClatchy (3/8, Tate, 74K) reports that Sen. Rand Paul has emerged as one of the most vocal critics of the bill. He "is firmly allied with members of the conservative House Freedom Caucus in a dogged effort to defeat" the bill. Paul says the House should again vote on the same ACA repeal measure that passed last year but was vetoed by President Obama. Paul said, "We are united on repeal, but we are divided on replacement. What's the best way to get past this impasse? Let's vote on what we voted on before: a clean repeal."

The Washington Times (3/8, Sherfinski, 272K) reports Paul told MSNBC that "the White House is in the midst of a 'charm offensive' to try to cajole wary conservatives who have criticized" the House bill. Politico (3/8, Everett, 2.46M) reports under the headline "Rand Stands Up To Trump On Obamacare" that while the President has urged Paul to back the bill, he "is not backing down" and is instead pushing his own measure. Paul said on MSNBC's Morning Joe  (3/8, 270K), "The House plan is Obamacare lite. ... My plan would legalize freedom and competition. We would get rid of all the mandates so inexpensive insurance could be sold. We would allow health saving accounts to expand. Every Republican agrees with that."

Politico Analysis: Bill Puts Heritage Foundation At Odds With Trump And GOP. Politico (3/8, Cook, Restuccia, 2.46M) reports under the headline "An Outsider Becomes An Insider" that while "the Heritage Foundation has been cozying up to top Trump aides and congressional leaders for months," the "first major bill that Republicans proposed this week – to repeal and replace Obamacare – runs completely afoul of Heritage's priorities and threatens to upend a critical relationship between conservative activists and the Trump administration." Politico spoke with Heritage staff members to get "an inside look at how the group is trying find a middle ground between agitator and dealmaker."

Breitbart Goes On Attack Against AHCA. Business Insider (3/8, Darcy, 3.42M) reports that though Breitbart "has been reluctant lately to skewer former Republican National Committee members who now work inside the Trump administration," that "appeared to change" this week with the unveiling of the AHCA, "which Trump supports. The website deemed it 'Obamacare 2.0' and told its readers the legislation 'gives illegal aliens healthcare through identity fraud' and amounted to 'GOP welfare entitlement.'" A Breitbart report also "went after Spicer for 'inaccurately' claiming the bill 'fully repeals Obamacare.'"

Trump Meets With AFL-CIO's Trumka, Who Remains Strongly Opposed To Bill. Breitbart (3/8, Munro, 2.02M) reports that the President met with AFL-CIO President Richard Trumka on Wednesday afternoon, but that the meeting did little to win over the union leader. Trumka said of the AHCA, "This isn't a healthcare plan at all. It's a massive transfer of wealth from working people to Wall Street...it's bad for healthcare, It's bad for working families, it's bad for our economy and we will fully oppose it."

Major Hospital Associations Announce Opposition To Bill. USA Today (3/8, O'Donnell, 5.28M) reports, "Associations representing virtually every type of hospital wrote members of Congress Wednesday to voice their opposition to the Republican plan to replace the Affordable Care Act." A letter from seven hospital associations reads in part, "We are very concerned that the draft legislative proposal being considered by the House committees could lead to tremendous instability for those seeking affordable coverage." The New York Times (3/8, A1, Goodnough, Kaplan, Pear, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says that "all major hospital groups, including the American Hospital Association, the Association of American Medical Colleges, the Catholic Health Association of the United States and the Children's Hospital Association, came out against the Republican bill."

In addition, McClatchy (3/8, Welsh, 74K) reports that the American Medical Association said the AHCA "endangers expanded treatment for opioid abuse, an epidemic that kills 91 Americans each day." The Wall Street Journal (3/8, Armour, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) has a feature on how those currently covered by the ACA are preparing for the potential loss of coverage. The New York Times (3/8, Quealy, Sanger-Katz, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) "The Upshot" looks at "Who Wins And Who Loses" under the GOP plan.

WPost Analysis: Bill "Would Provide Major Tax Breaks" To Wealthiest Americans. The Washington Post (3/8, Snell, 11.43M) writes that the AHCA "could create a major shift in taxes for low-and-middle income people while delivering a big tax break to the rich." The Post says the legislation "would provide major tax breaks for the wealthiest one percent of the population. Low-income people are most likely to see their credits slashed while middle-income earners could have access to bigger, better credits down the line."

LATimes Analysis: Bill's Abortion Provision "Could Make It Impossible" For Californians To Get Tax Credits. The Los Angeles Times (3/8, Mason, 4.52M) reports that an antiabortion provision in the AHCA "could make it impossible for most Californians to take advantage" of the bill's proposed tax credits. The measure would offer such credits "to people who do not get insurance from their employer, but it would prohibit that money from being spent on plans that cover abortion – a ban that would make virtually all health plans in the state ineligible for such credits." California Insurance Commissioner Dave Jones said the "House GOP proposal 'is directly at odds with California law and California's constitutional protection of an individual's right to have access to abortions.'"

Quinnipiac Poll: More Than Half Say Sessions Lied Under Oath, Should Resign.

More than half of respondents to a Quinnipiac poll released this week said Attorney Genera; Sessions "lied under oath" during his confirmation hearing and should resign, Politico (3/8, Nelson, 2.46M) reports. According to the poll, 52 percent "said Sessions was guilty of lying under oath when he told the Senate Judiciary Committee that he had not been in contact with any Russian official when he had, in fact, met twice with Russia's ambassador to the U.S. during the presidential campaign," and 51 percent "said Sessions should resign over the controversy."

However, in an analysis piece in "The Fix" blog of the Washington Post (3/8, Blake, 11.43M), Aaron Blake notes that "upon further inspection, there are a few reasons for skepticism" about the poll numbers. Blake notes that "the question Quinnipiac asked doesn't include Sessions's actual response – nor does it include the actual question that Sen. Al Franken (D-Minn.) asked him." Blake points out that Sessions "has argued that the context of the exchange is relevant here; he said that his meeting with Russian Ambassador Sergey Kislyak was in his official capacity and that his answer to Franken was in the context of the campaign." Blake also notes "a real disconnect between the number of people who think Sessions lied and those who think he broke the law," and he concludes that "this poll seems to be a great example of the way you ask the question determining the answers you get." CBS News (3/8, 4.4M), Roll Call (3/8, Chuang, 63K), Vox (3/8, Gardenswartz, 1.15M), and CNN International (3/8, Mueller, 598K) also report on the poll.

Coalition Airstrikes On ISIS Up Nearly 50% From Same Time Last Year.

According to USA Today (3/8, Michaels, 5.28M), the US-led coalition has dropped "a record number of bombs on Islamic State targets so far this year, a sign of intensified action even before President Trump has had a chance to deliver on his promise of ramped-up efforts to defeat the radical group." The coalition dropped "7,494 bombs, rockets and other munitions in Iraq and Syria during the first nine weeks of this year, up nearly 50% from 5,025 during the same period in 2016 and nearly double 4,100 strikes in 2015, according to statistics provided to USA TODAY." Lt. Gen. Jeffrey Harrigian, who commands US air operations in the Middle East, told USA TODAY in a phone interview, "Anytime the enemy has shown their face or provided an opportunity to identify where they were…we've targeted them."

US Drone Technology Helping In Battle For Mosul. The CBS Evening News (3/8, story 6, 2:10, Pelley, 11.17M) reported that despite ISIS' use of car bombs against the US-backed Iraqi military in Mosul, Iraqi forces are "gaining ground every day," in part because of the help of a $1.5 million US drone – known as "The Shadow" – that helps the American-led coalition call in airstrikes targeting ISIS positions.

Haley: "We Need To Get Iran" Out Of Syria.

Reuters (3/8, Nichols) reports Ambassador Haley said Wednesday that Syria can no longer be a "safe haven for terrorists" and that it was important "we get Iran and their proxies out." Speaking to reporters after UN special envoy Staffan de Mistura briefing the Security Council, Haley "did not respond to questions on whether the United States believed Syrian President Bashar al-Assad…should step down." Said Haley, "The United States absolutely supports Staffan de Mistura and the work that he's doing, we support the UN process, we support the talks in Geneva, we want to see them continue." The AP (3/8, Lederer), meanwhile, reports that de Mistura said yesterday that he intends to hold a "fifth round of talks on March 23" in Geneva.

The Washington Times (3/8, Scarborough, 272K) reports Iran has spent "up to $100 billion the last five years financing operations in Syria that were instrumental in keeping President Bashar Assad in power, according to a new book" by an Iranian opposition group. The National Council of Resistance of Iran estimates that Tehran has paid "nearly $100 million a year in salaries to a grab-bag of mercenaries it sent to Syria" under the direction of the Quds Force.

Pentagon: Marines On The Ground In Syria Ahead Of Raqqa Offensive.

Fox News' Special Report (3/8, 1.53M) reported the Pentagon has confirmed that US Marines are on the ground in Syria. The Marines, on a "specific mission...directed by the President," are in addition to US Special Operations forces that were recently deployed to northwest Syria. Barbara Starr reported on CNN's Situation Room (3/8, 554K) that the Pentagon won't provide details on the location or exact number of Marines, but the AP (3/8, Baldor) reports the number is around "a couple hundred" and their deployment "is temporary." Still, the AP says "it is likely an early indication that the White House is leaning toward giving the Pentagon greater flexibility to make routine combat decisions" in the fight against ISIS. According to the Washington Post (3/8, Lamothe, Gibbons-Neff, 11.43M), the Marines were deployed "in support of the fight to take back...Raqqa," and are "part of the 11th Marine Expeditionary Unit, which left San Diego on Navy ships in October."

According to an exclusive Reuters (3/8, Stewart) report, the Administration is also "weighing a deployment of up to 1,000 American soldiers to Kuwait to serve as a reserve force" in the fight against ISIS. US officials said "proponents of the option...said it would provide US commanders on the ground greater flexibility to quickly respond to unforeseen opportunities and challenges on the battlefield." However, it is unclear whether the proposal had the support of Defense Secretary Mattis.

US Official: ISIS Leaders Fleeing Raqqa. The New York Times (3/8, Gordon, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that as US-backed Syrian fighters close in on Raqqa, "some of the Islamic State's leaders have fled their self-declared capital and are planning to carry on the fight from other sanctuaries in Syria and Iraq, an American defense official said on Wednesday." However, the official cautioned that their departure "does not mean that the battle to take Raqqa will be easy."

WPost A1 Analysis: US Forces Drawn Into Struggle Among Kurdish, Arab Allies.

The Washington Post (3/8, A1, Sly, 11.43M) reports on its front page that the US military is "getting drawn into a deepening struggle for control over areas liberated from the Islamic State that risks prolonging American involvement" in the war long after the militants are defeated. For example, the Post says US troops "have headed in recent days to the northern town of Manbij...to protect their Kurdish and Arab allies against a threatened assault by other US allies in a Turkish-backed force." The Manbij deployment "has not yet affected US plans for taking Raqqa," according to Pentagon spokesman, Capt. Joe Davis, "but it does raise new questions about the viability of the US plan to capture Raqqa, an overwhelmingly Arab city, by a force that is commanded mostly by Kurds."

Warplanes Bomb East Of Damascus Despite Ceasefire.

Reuters (3/8, Perry, Al-Khalidi) reports warplanes bombed "rebel-held towns east of Damascus on Wednesday, striking residential areas where Russia had declared a ceasefire less than 24 hours earlier and leaving dozens injured," according to residents, rebels and the Syrian Observatory for Human Rights. "At least 30 air raids hit the region on Wednesday, along with dozens of artillery rounds and ground-to-ground missiles fired from government-held areas."

Iraqi Forces Capture Last Major Road In Western Mosul.

Reuters (3/8, Coles, Davison) reports Iraqi forces battled ISIS militants Wednesday in Mosul, capturing control of "the last major road leading west from the city." The road links Mosul to Tal Afar, another ISIS stronghold 40 miles to the west, and then to the Syrian border.

US Official: Al-Baghdadi Has Fled Mosul.

AFP (3/8) reports a US defense official said Wednesday that ISIS leader Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi "has fled Mosul and has apparently delegated tactical control of the battle for the city to local commanders." The official said Baghdadi fled "some time before Iraqi security forces surrounded the city during an offensive to retake it." The Washington Times (3/8, Muñoz, 272K) says that while US military and intelligence officials "do not have a location on al-Baghdadi's whereabouts," the Pentagon "was wary to characterize the Islamic State leader as 'on the run.'" Reuters (3/8, Coles, Walcott, Chmaytelli) reports that US intelligence sources also "point to a sharp drop in Islamic State postings on social media as evidence that Baghdadi and his circle have become increasingly isolated."

ISIS Claims Deadly Attack On Afghan Military Hospital.

ABC World News Tonight  (3/8, story 8, 0:25, Muir, 14.63M) reported ISIS has claimed responsibility for a suicide attack on a military hospital in Afghanistan that left at least 30 people dead and "some 50 wounded." NBC Nightly News  (3/8, story 5, 1:35, Holt, 16.61M) said the attack happened in Kabul, "just yards from the US Embassy." According to the CBS Evening News  (3/8, story 9, 0:20, Pelley, 11.17M), ISIS militants disguised themselves as doctors and "went floor-to-floor with automatic rifles and grenades." According to the AP (3/8, Faiez, Shah), the "brazen assault" demonstrates the capability of Afghan militants "to stage large-scale and complex attacks" in Kabul's "heavily-guarded diplomatic quarter." Afghan President Ashraf Ghani said the attack "trampled on all human values." The New York Times (3/8, Mashal, Abed, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) quotes Afghan Ambassador to the US Dr. Hamdullah Mohib calling the attack "an abhorrent new low" and "a cowardly, wicked act."

US Rejects China's Call To Halt Drills If North Korea Suspends Tests.

The AP (3/8, Lederer) reports the US on Wednesday rejected China's proposal for a halt to joint US-South Korean military exercises if North Korea suspends its nuclear and missile activities. State Department spokesman Mark Toner said, "At this point we don't see it as a viable deal." At the Pentagon, spokesman Cmdr. Gary Ross said US activities to defend South Korea "cannot be equated to North Korea's repeated violations of its obligations and agreements." Fox News' Special Report  (3/8, 1.53M) showed Toner saying, "This is apples and oranges. ... What we're doing in terms of our defense cooperation with South Korea is in no way comparable to the blatant disregard North Korea has shown with respect to international law and international concerns – repeatedly – about its nuclear weapons program."

At the UN on Wednesday, USA Today (3/8, Bacon, 5.28M) reports Ambassador Haley said North Korea's nuclear and ballistic missile programs defy international law and should not be negotiated. "I appreciate my counterparts wanting to talk about talks and negotiations, but we are not dealing with a rational person," Haley said at a news conference with the ambassadors from South Korea and Japan. Haley said Kim must take "positive action" before he can be taken seriously at the negotiating table and urged UN members to tighten sanctions against Pyongyang. Haley, Reuters (3/8, Nichols) reports, also told reporters that "all options are on the table" with regards to dealing with North Korea.

According to Bloomberg Politics (3/8, Wadhams, 201K), US officials now acknowledge "that US efforts to curtail North Korea's nuclear ambitions have failed," and Secretary of State Tillerson will use a trip to Asia next week "to look at new ways of approaching a problem that has vexed American presidents since Bill Clinton." Toner told reporters yesterday, "All of the efforts we have taken thus far to attempt to persuade North Korea to engage in meaningful negotiations have fallen short, to be honest. So we need to look at new ways to convince them, to persuade them, that it's in their interests." Bloomberg calls Toner's remarks "a rare and frank public admission from the US government that the approach taken toward North Korea in recent years...hasn't worked and isn't likely to now."

Son Of Kim Jong-Nam Appears In New Online Video. Coverage of the alleged assassination of Kim Jong-un's half-brother continued Wednesday. CNN's Situation Room (3/8, 554K) reported Kim Han-sol, the son of Kim Jong-Nam, has appeared in a "bizarre" new video in which he acknowledges his father's death and "says...he's with his mother and sister, but doesn't say where." The video was posted online by a group called Cheollima Civil Defense, which said it had "responded to an emergency request by Kim Jong-Nam's family" after he was killed last month at the Kuala Lampur airport.

US General: Russia Has Deployed Banned Missile.

The New York Times (3/8, Gordon, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Gen. Paul Selva, the vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told Congress Wednesday that Russia has deployed "a prohibited cruise missile, the first public confirmation by the United States that the Kremlin had fielded the weapon in violation of a landmark arms control agreement." The missile is believed to have been moved in December from a test site in southern Russia to an undisclosed operational base. "We believe that the Russians have deployed a land-based cruise missile that violates the spirit and intent of the Intermediate Nuclear Forces Treaty," Gen. Selva told the House Armed Services Committee. "The system itself presents a risk to most of our facilities in Europe," he added. "And we believe that the Russians have deliberately deployed it in order to pose a threat to NATO and to facilities within the NATO area of responsibility." The AP (3/8, Burns) reports Selva also "said he sees no indication that Moscow intends to return to compliance with the 1987 Intermediate-range Nuclear Forces Treaty," and Reuters (3/8, Ali) reports he said the US has brought up the issue with Russia.

Khodorkovsky: Window For Reaching Deal With Russia Narrow. Russian opposition leader Mikhail Khodorkovsky writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/8, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) that Russian are waiting to see if President Trump and President Vladimir Putin can reach some kind deal, but cautions that each side must understand the needs and desires of the other. He warns that the window for reaching such a deal is very narrow. Mr. Trump's brashness has stopped at attacking Mr. Putin personally. That atypical restraint horrified many Russia hawks in the West. But it may turn out that Mr. Trump took a better approach. Whether accidentally or by design, he has left the door open for Mr. Putin to make a graceful exit. That would be good for everyone.

Khodorkovsky told the Washington Free Beacon (3/8, Gertz, 115K) in an interview that the Administration has "a unique chance to persuade...Putin to give up power and return the country to the path of democratic political reform." Said the Russian opposition figure, "The only opportunity to seriously change things in the relations between Putin and America under [the Trump] administration would be to convince Putin that it is in his best interest to leave power while this administration is in power. Then all the other problems can and will be solved."

NYTimes A1: Western Governments View Russia's RT As Kremlin Tool. In a front-page story, the New York Times (3/8, A1, Erlanger, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) examines charges from Western governments that RT is "an agent of Kremlin policy and a tool directly used by President Vladimir V. Putin to undermine Western democracies" by meddling in the US presidential election and, "European security officials say, trying to do the same in the Netherlands, France and Germany, all of which vote later this year." Even as Russia insists that RT is "just another global network like the BBC or France 24," many Western countries regard it as "the slickly produced heart of a broad, often covert disinformation campaign designed to sow doubt about democratic institutions and destabilize the West."

State Department Approves Resumption Of Arms Sales To Saudi Arabia.

The Washington Post (3/8, Ryan, Gearan, 11.43M) reports that the State Department has approved a resumption of weapons sales "that critics have linked to Saudi Arabia's bombing of civilians in Yemen, a potential sign of reinvigorated US support for the kingdom's involvement" in the ongoing civil war there. According to the Post, the proposal from the State Department "would reverse a decision made late in the Obama administration to suspend the sale of precision guided munitions to Riyadh." Secretary of State Tillerson's approval this week of the measure, "which officials say needs White House backing to go into effect, provides an early indication of the new administration's more Saudi-friendly approach to the conflict in Yemen, and a sign of its more hawkish stance on Iran." The move comes as AFP (3/8) reports Amnesty International on Thursday accused the Saudi-led coalition of using "banned cluster munitions in raids on residential areas."

Chinese Outlets Mistakenly Publish Media Satire On Trump As Real News.

The New York Times (3/8, Hernández, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that several Chinese publications reported this week that a "frantic President Trump, holding court in a bathrobe, ordered his aides to wrap the White House telephones in tinfoil," citing The New Yorker. However, the article by the comedian Andy Borowitz "was satire." The Times notes that "it was not the first time that American humorists have unintentionally duped the Chinese news media." In 2012, People's Daily, reported that North Korean leader Kim Jong-un had been named "Sexiest Man Alive for 2012," based on a satirical article in The Onion.

Malaysia Airlines Marks Third Anniversary Of Plane's Disappearance.

The New York Times (3/8, Belopotosky, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports on the third anniversary of "one of the biggest aviation mysteries of all time" – the disappearance of Malaysia Airlines Flight 370 on a routine flight from Kuala Lumpur to Beijing. The flight's disappearance prompted "the largest and costliest search in aviation history."

Worldwide Protests Held On International Women's Day.

The CBS Evening News (3/8, story 7, 1:55, Pelley, 11.17M) reported that Wednesday marked International Women's Day, and "from New York to Los Angeles, Istanbul to St. Petersburg, women walked off their jobs to protest." Fox News' Special Report (3/8, 1.53M) said women held "rallies on almost every continent including several in the Middle East, calling attention to lower wages, sexual harassment, discrimination, and other issues women face every day." In fact, reported CNN's Situation Room (3/8, 554K), the UN held "their own series of events to promote universal paid parental leave." The New York Times (3/8, Times, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) similarly reports that "people and governments across the globe observed it in an outpouring of support for women's equality and empowerment." ABC World News Tonight (3/8, story 9, 0:25, Muir, 14.63M) noted the protests are international, while NBC Nightly News (3/8, story 7, 1:20, Holt, 16.61M) focused solely on domestic protests.

In a separate report, the New York Times (3/8, Minder, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) focuses on Spanish women, who it says "have made tremendous advances in recent years as the revolt against mainstream parties helped break down some old-boy networks," but that "upheaval, the women say, has also laid bare the deeply entrenched sexism and machismo" in the nation's political establishment.

WSJournal: UK Budget Will Not Create Growth Amid Brexit.

A Wall Street Journal (3/8, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) editorial says the budget plans released Wednesday by UK Chancellor Philip Hammond are too cautious to allow the nation to grow outside of Europe amid its exit from the EU. If the UK is going to attract investors, the Journal argues that it needs to make dramatic cuts in corporate- and personal-tax rates, create a welcoming regulatory environment, and improve its fiscal discipline.

LEADING THE NEWS

Comey Discusses Encryption, Says Country "Stuck" With Him For Rest Of His Term.

Several major print and online outlets report on FBI Director Comey's remarks before a cybersecurity conference Wednesday at Boston College. In his speech, Comey primarily discussed the importance of cybersecurity issues and the impact of strong encryption on law enforcement. Reports noted that Comey did not address recent controversies in his speech and also declined to take questions from reporters.

The Washington Times (3/8, Noble, 272K) reports that Comey said the country is "stuck with" him for "another 6½ years," indicating his plans to remain at the helm of the bureau for his full 10-year term. The FBI, he said, is working to build stronger relationships with private companies so they feel comfortable approaching the bureau when they are victims of cyber intrusion and ransomware attacks. Comey emphasized that the bureau will protect the privacy of their employees and operations. Companies, said Comey, Bloomberg Politics (3/8, Strohm, 201K) reports, should not retaliate against cybercriminals by trying to hack their attackers. "Don't do it; it's a crime," Comey said. "It's not only against the law but it runs the risk of tremendous confusion in a crowded space."

According to the Wall Street Journal (3/8, Levitz, Viswanatha, Subscription Publication, 6.37M), Comey also called for a return to the debate over how to best balance law enforcement needs with desires for encryption and privacy. "The advent of default, ubiquitous, strong encryption is making more and more of the room in which the FBI investigates dark," Comey said. The director noted that the bureau was unable to open 1,200 of the 2,800 cellphones it obtained lawfully for investigations between October and December. The Boston Globe (3/8, Vaccaro, 1.08M) reports that Comey said encryption was once used exclusively by "the sophisticated actor," but is now in use by drug dealers and similar low-level criminals.

Politico (3/8, Dezenski, 2.46M) quotes Comey as saying, "All of us have a reasonable expectation of privacy in our homes, in our cars, and in our devices. But it also means with good reason, in court, government through law enforcement can invade our private spaces." In certain circumstances, the director said, "Even our memories aren't private...a judge can compel any of us to testify in court on those private communications." He added, "There is no such thing as absolute privacy in America," because "there is no place in America outside of judicial reach."

The AP (3/8) reports that Comey also said the FBI must focus on recruiting talented computer experts who might otherwise go to work for Google or Apple. "The cyberthreats we face are enormous. I don't know if we can stay ahead of them. And I think to say otherwise would be hubris," Comey said. "We need to ensure that cybersecurity is a priority for every enterprise in the United States at all levels. We need to get better and faster at sharing information in the appropriate ways."

Following his remarks, Reuters (3/8, Finkle) reports, Comey did not speak with reporters and ignored "questions about the wiretapping accusation that [President] Trump made on Saturday without offering any evidence to support it." According to reports, Comey had asked the Justice Department to refute Trump's claims because they suggested the FBI broke the law. "The department has not acted on his request," Reuters says. "I'll avoid talking about things I don't want to talk about," Comey joked at the start of his speech, the Boston Herald (3/8, Stout, 509K) reports.

The Hill (3/8, Williams, 1.25M) reports that whereas Comey did not discuss Trump's wiretapping allegations on Wednesday, he has been invited to appear before the House Intelligence Committee on March 20, where Rep. Adam Schiff has indicated he intends to press the director to address the issue. "If the public reports are accurate and Mr. Comey wanted the Justice Department to speak out on this, he will have his own opportunity on March 20," Schiff said.

NPR (3/8, 1.92M), the New York Post (3/8, Moore, 3.82M), Roll Call (3/8, Prater, 63K), The Guardian (UK) (3/8, Borger, 4.07M), GQ (3/8, 18.73M), the Boston Business Journal (3/8, O'Brien, Subscription Publication, 90K), and the WCVB-TV Boston (3/8, 482K), CNN (3/8, Mallonee, Scott, 29.79M), NBC News (3/8, 2.67M), and Fox News (3/8, 11.07M) websites report similarly. The New York Post (3/8, 3.82M) posts the AP's coverage to its website and USA Today (3/8, 5.28M) posts a video from a portion of Comey's remarks online.

Palmieri Blasts Comey. Politico (3/8, Conway, 2.46M) reports Hillary Clinton Campaign Communications Director Jennifer Palmieri responded to Comey's remarks Wednesday by calling him a "particularly infuriating character" who cares above all about "protecting his own reputation." Palmieri stated she believes the Trump campaign did collude with Russia, or at least with WikiLeaks, based on their eagerness to "jump on" the "leak du jour" from John Podesta's email accounts.

White House Says Trump Not Under Investigation.

Media coverage of President Trump's claim that former President Obama wiretapped the phones at Trump Tower has diminished significantly. While the story continues to be a major source of discussion on cable television, print and online reporting are much lighter than in previous days. Network news coverage has markedly declined as well, with only two networks mentioning the story Wednesday evening. The reporting continues to be decidedly negative toward the White House, highlighting that the Administration has still offered no evidence to support Trump's claim, and casting a request from Sens. Lindsey Graham and Sheldon Whitehouse for the FBI and DOJ to provide proof as an effort to call "the White House's bluff" on the issue.

Typical of the ongoing coverage is Jake Tapper's statement on CNN's The Lead  (3/8, 320K) that while the White House says Trump "has no regrets about his fact-free claim that then President Obama tapped his phone last year," nearly "everyone else in this city in the know or with the power to investigate the claim says it's not true, or that they've seen nothing that can support the accusation."

In its lead story, the CBS Evening News  (3/8, lead story, 0:30, Pelley, 11.17M) reported, "The White House said today it does not believe that the President is under investigation by the FBI" amid questions about Trump's "insistence that his phones were tapped during the campaign on orders from President Obama." The Washington Times (3/8, Boyer, 272K) says White House press secretary Sean Spicer was asked if Trump "is the target of counter-intelligence operation raising accusations about links to Russia," and he replied, "I think that's what we need to find out." However, the New York Times (3/8, Landler, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says an aide then "slipped Mr. Spicer a note," after which "he circled back to clarify." USA Today (3/8, Jackson, 5.28M) quotes Spicer as saying, "There is no reason to believe there is any type of investigation with respect to the Department of Justice."

Margaret Brennan reported on the CBS Evening News  (3/8, story 2, 2:35, Pelley, 11.17M) that the White House says Trump "may have been swept up in surveillance that was not directly targeted at him, though the President has claimed it was his phones that were tapped, an allegation denied by former Director of National Intelligence James Clapper." The AP (3/8, Pearson) cites "three former Trump Organization executives" who say that Trump "expressed regular concern that his phone lines were not secure." Trump at times "talked about possible listening devices and worried that he was being monitored," and in other instances, "he was doing the monitoring."

Sara Murray said on CNN's The Lead  (3/8, 320K), "It's been four days since President Trump's shocking claim that President Obama spied on him and while there is still no evidence from the White House, today senators say they want proof." USA Today (3/8, Collins, 5.28M) reports that Graham and Whitehouse "are asking the Justice Department to prove" Trump's accusation that Obama wiretapped Trump Tower. In a letter to FBI Director Comey and acting Deputy Attorney General Dana Boente, the senators requested "specific information regarding the accusation." They wrote, "We request that the Department of Justice provide us copies of any warrant applications and court orders – redacted as necessary to protect intelligence sources and methods that may be compromised by disclosure, and to protect any ongoing investigations – related to wiretaps of President Trump, the Trump Campaign, or Trump Tower. ... We will be glad to review any such applications and orders once they are disclosed, and proceed as appropriate with the oversight the President has requested."

CNN's Situation Room  (3/8, 554K) showed reporter Manu Raju asking Graham about the possibility that the Administration doesn't provide the evidence. Graham responded, "Then I'll have done my job. Either they are lying to me or there is no information, and I don't believe they would lie to me about this. I expect them to come forward as to whether or not a warrant was obtained or sought." Graham also confirmed to Raju that he will subpoena the information if the Administration doesn't comply.

David Muir said on ABC World News Tonight  (3/8, story 5, 1:15, 14.63M) that the White House is "still not providing any proof," but Jonathan Karl said Graham and Whitehouse "are calling the White House's bluff on this." The White House has argued that "it is up to Congress to investigate," so the senators "are saying they will investigate. ... They want to get the FBI on record either admitting it happened, or much more likely, saying it didn't." Reuters (3/8, Cowan) says Graham told CNN that if DOJ does not cooperate, "subpoenas would be issued." A.B. Stoddard of RealClear Politics said on CNN Wolf  (3/8, 224K) that the White House has sent the matter to Congress and "Congress is calling their bluff. ... If there's no evidence, it's going to be more than embarrassing, actually."

Meanwhile, lawmakers from both sides of the aisle said Wednesday that they have seen no evidence that would support Trump's claim. For example, Sen. Dianne Feinstein was asked on CNN's The Lead  (3/8, 320K) if she has seen any evidence that Obama tapped Trump's phones. Feinstein said, "No, I have not. And it's all rather shocking to me that a sitting President would make this kind of an allegation about a former President without any proof whatsoever."

Sen. Tim Kaine said on MSNBC's Morning Joe  (3/8, 270K), "The President's behavior...is sort of shocking but not surprising because this is a guy who said Ted Cruz's dad was involved in the JFK assassination on the campaign trail and he got a pass to that. He is saying he was wiretapped or that his inaugural crowd was bigger than it was, it shouldn't surprise us. But it is shocking. You don't want to see that behavior in the President."

Sen. Tom Cotton was asked on MSNBC's Morning Joe  (3/8, 270K) if he has seen any evidence of that Obama wiretapped Trump Tower. Cotton said, "I have seen no evidence of that. But I would also say a lot of the anonymous sources in the media are stating things that are very precise and not exactly the full picture either. When, for instance, the President's spokesman denies that either the President or White House official, quote-unquote, ordered surveillance, that doesn't really deny very much if you understand how the foreign intelligence surveillance court works. It's a judge that would order those things and it's the attorney general or her agent that would file that application."

Appearing on CNN's Situation Room  (3/8, 554K), Rep. Adam Schiff, ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, said he is "not aware of any evidence of any wiretapping," calling Trump's allegation "irresponsible." He said his panel will also look into the matter. Schiff noted that the panel has asked Clapper, former CIA Director Brennan, and FBI Directory Comey to testify on March 20, and he thinks "we'll have ample testimony that this claim was nonsensical, false, reckless, and scandalous in its breathtaking dishonesty."

Rep. Elijah Cummings said on CNN's Situation Room  (3/8, 554K) said the Congressional probes will "hopefully...get to the bottom of this, and I expect that there is absolutely no truth to" Trump's claim.

Rep. Trey Gowdy was asked on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360  (3/8, 686K) if Trump could simply declassify any evidence to back up his claim if he wants to. Gowdy, noting that he and Cooper were "speculating that [evidence] exists," replied, "That's true, in theory. ... The President has the power to both declassify it and to have it released, as long as it's not held by the judicial branch, which would be a court matter."

In an interview with the CBS Evening News  (3/8, story 3, 3:40, Pelley, 11.17M), former CIA Director Leon Panetta said there are two conclusions one can draw from Trump's claim. Said Panetta, "One is that he says these things knowing that they're not true in order to divert the public, and if he's doing that, he's misusing the powers of the presidency. Or if he truly believes that they are true, when indeed they're not true, and he has not tried to find out the truth, which then shows a real lack of judgment. Either way, I think it undermines and weakens the strength of the presidency in this country."

Obama "Irked And Exasperated" By Trump's Accusation. Jeff Zeleny said on CNN's Situation Room  (3/8, 554K) that Obama was "stunned by the allegations." Zeleny added that "we are told that the former President was irked and exasperated by yet another accusation from this President." On its website, CNN (3/8, Zeleny, Liptak, 29.79M) cited "sources close to the former president" who said his reaction "stopped short of outright fury." Those sources offered "slightly different insight into Obama's demeanor than others who told The Wall Street Journal that Obama was 'livid.'"

Residents Of Ohio Town Largely Indifferent To Trump-Russia News. The Washington Post (3/8, Gibbons-Neff, 11.43M) reports that in the town of Wilmington, Ohio, "the barrage of news coming out about the Trump administration's ties to Russia has fallen on mostly indifferent ears." The town "has been more focused on local issues" such as a decision by Amazon.com "to pull a burgeoning shipping hub and plans for as many as 3,000 new jobs at Wilmington's airpark, opting instead to take a $10 million dollar tax break to relocate to Kentucky."

NYTimes: Warner Faces "Stand-And-Deliver Moment" In Russian Inquiry. The New York Times (3/8, Flegenheimer, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that as Republicans "resist calls for a select committee or special prosecutor to oversee" the investigation into President Trump's ties to Russia, the "Democrats' best hope for acquiring answers most likely remains an investigation by the Senate Intelligence Committee," where Sen. Mark Warner – a "former rising star" in the Democratic party – is vice chairman. The result is a "spotlight trained brightly on a southern-state centrist with a nine-figure net worth, a decade-old itch to be president and, until recently, according to friends and former aides, a healthy disdain for the institution he serves."

Spicer Laments Lack Of Outrage Over WikiLeaks Release.

Media coverage of WikiLeaks recent release of more than 8,000 pages of documents it says are classified CIA files continues to garner heavy media attention. White House press secretary Sean Spicer's expression of frustration at the lack of media outrage over the release gets some attention, but the main media focus are efforts the FBI and CIA to determine the source of the leak and assess the damage it has caused.

The Washington Post (3/8, Johnson, 11.43M) reports Spicer "will not authenticate the documents released by WikiLeaks," but he is "frustrated that more people aren't more outraged about their release." Spicer told reporters, "This should be a major concern to people in terms of the leaks that are coming out and the desire to get to the bottom of them. ... I think the idea that we are having these ongoing disclosures of national security and classified information should be something that everybody is outraged about in this country." While Spicer "repeatedly said that the government's policy is to not confirm the authenticity of sensitive information that might have been leaked or hacked," he "accused the media of not focusing enough on the national security implications of the information." In addition, Spicer "reflected on how these alleged surveillance tools would have been at the disposal of the Obama administration," which President Trump accused of wiretapping the phones at Trump Tower.

USA Today (3/8, Jackson, 5.28M) reports that Spicer argued, "There is a massive, massive difference," between WikiLeaks' release of emails from Hillary Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta and leaking national security secrets. Spicer also said argued that there was more outrage from Democrats and the media over WikiLeaks at that time than now. Said Spicer, "It's interesting how there's sort of a double standard with when the leaks occur, how much outrage there is."

Meanwhile, the FBI has launched a criminal investigation into the release of the documents, USA Today (3/8, Johnson, 5.28M) reports, citing "a US official." According to the official, the inquiry "will seek to determine whether the disclosure represented a breach from the outside or a leak from inside the spy agency," and "a separate review will attempt to assess the damage caused by such a disclosure." The New York Times (3/8, Rosenberg, Shane, Goldman, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) describes the CIA as "scrambl[ing]...to assess and contain the damage" from the leak, which investigators say "was the work not of a hostile foreign power like Russia but of a disaffected insider," while the Los Angeles Times (3/8, Wilber, 4.52M) cites a CNN report which said that "the FBI and CIA 'are coordinating reviews of the matter.'" An FBI spokeswoman "referred calls on the matter to the CIA," and "a CIA spokeswoman, in a statement declined to comment 'on the status of any investigation into the source of the documents.'"

Brian Ross reported on ABC World News Tonight (3/8, story 3, 2:45, Muir, 14.63M) that the hunt is focused on "the headquarters of the top secret center for cyber intelligence, the CCI. Officials believe whoever was responsible had to have access to one of the highly classified US spy networks, such as the one called JWICS." Andrea Mitchell reported in the lead story for NBC Nightly News  (3/8, lead story, 2:50, Holt, 16.61M) that according to "a senior US official," the documents "contain authentic information about the CIA's top secret tools for hacking." Mitchell added that "two US intelligence sources" said "Russia is suspect because of Moscow's ties to WikiLeaks, and the hacked emails during the 2016 campaign." Meanwhile, WikiLeaks "is claiming they've released only one percent of what they've got," and "inside the CIA tonight...the hunt is on."

In what Politico (3/8, Geller, 2.46M) calls a "rare step," the CIA on Wednesday "publicly defend[ed] its mission ." CIA spokesman Jonathan Liu released "an unprompted on-the-record statement" in which he "argued that the agency exists to 'aggressively collect foreign intelligence,' stressed that its agents are 'legally prohibited' from hacking Americans and emphasized that the public 'should be deeply troubled' by the WikiLeaks release." Liu said there are "critical points," but he "reiterated that the CIA will not confirm the authenticity of the WikiLeaks materials." A brief report on the CBS Evening News  (3/8, story 4, 0:30, Pelley, 11.17M) said the CIA said Wednesday that the leak "has jeopardized US personnel and operations and given US adversaries the tools to do America harm." Tom Costello reported on NBC Nightly News  (3/8, story 2, 2:05, Holt, 16.61M) that "security pros say the CIA's alleged hacking blueprints should serve as a reality check for all Americans." Georgia Weidman of Shevirah Security said, "The only secure device would be one that's turned off, stepped-on, melted down, buried, and then maybe it's secure."

In his "Talking Points Memo" on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor  (3/8, 767K), Bill O'Reilly that "leakers of classified documents are actively committing treason. It's apparent that the federal government does not have a handle on how to apprehend these traitors, much less stop the espionage."

A Washington Post (3/8, 11.43M) editorial stresses that the CIA cyberhacking tools released by WikiLeaks "are not instruments of mass surveillance," and there is "no evidence they have been used against Americans or otherwise improperly; if there were, we can be sure that WikiLeaks, whose core mission is not transparency but undermining US national security, would have trumpeted it." The Post says "it won't be a surprise if Moscow again turns out to be the source of the leak."

Officials Focus On Contractors As Source Of Leak. Reuters (3/8, Walcott, Shalal) reports that intelligence and law enforcement officials are "focusing on contractors as the likeliest source of documents" being leaked to WikiLeaks. According to an official with knowledge of the investigation, CIA contractors "have been checking to see which of their employees had access to the material that Wikileaks published, and then going over their computer logs, emails and other communications for any evidence of who might be responsible." The Wall Street Journal (3/8, Harris, Subscription Publication, 6.37M)says the possibility that a contractor was behind the leak is certain to result in increased scrutiny of the use of outside entities to conduct classified work. While contractors are vetted like government employees, in the last four years, they have been responsible for two significant breaches.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein said on CNN's The Lead  (3/8, 320K) that "this is the third contractor now that's done this kind of leaking. ... I think we really need to take a look at the contractor portion of the employee work force because you have to be loyal to America to work for an intelligence agency. Otherwise, don't do it. Don't come aboard as a contractor."

Rep. Jackie Speier said on CNN Wolf  (3/8, 224K) that "whether it was Edward Snowden or some of the other leakers of information, they have historically been contractors, persons who have been hired by contractors who then provide services to the Central Intelligence agency. I'm concerned that we do not have a handle on making sure those persons are properly vetted in terms of whether or not they are, in fact, going to put our country first."

COUNTER-TERRORISM

Senate Panel Assessing Why Refugee Was Not Arrested Prior To The Election.

The Fox News (3/8, Lajeunesse, Zimmerman, 11.07M) website reports that the "The Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee has asked Attorney General Jeff Sessions to find out why the terror suspect's pending arrest was allegedly spiked just over a week before the election." In a letter to Sessions, committee Chairman Ron Johnson said, "When [Joint Terrorism Task Force]-San Antonio and the U.S. Attorney's office for the Western District of Texas sought to prosecute this refugee, the local law enforcement and prosecutors allegedly 'met resistance' from officials within the National Security Division's Counter Terrorism section in Washington DC." The suspect, an Iraqi man who entered the US using an assumed identity, is now at large, Fox says. "His real name was not released." Fox notes that President Trump ran for the presidency "on a tough-on-terror platform and had been critical of President Obama's refugee policy."

Administration Invokes State Secrets Privilege To Block Testimony In CIA Torture Case.

The New York Times (3/8, Risen, Fink, Savage, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports the Administration has invoked executive powers in an effort "to block the testimony of several top CIA officials," including new CIA Deputy Director Gina Haspel, in a federal lawsuit "against two psychologists who helped run the agency's harsh interrogation program, along with portions of 172 internal agency documents." The lawsuit was filed in 2015 by two former detainees at CIA secret prisons overseas "and the representative of a third man who died in custody." The Times adds that if they win the suit against former military psychologists James E. Mitchell and Bruce Jessen, "who helped devise and run the interrogation program, it would be the first time an American civilian court has held anyone accountable for a role in developing counterterrorism policies after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks."

Lawyers Dispute Spicer's Clarification Of Trump Tweet On Gitmo Releases.

According to Politico (3/8, Gerstein, 2.46M), White House press secretary Sean Spicer's clarifications of President Trump's tweet about the release of Guantanamo prisoners under Presidents Bush and Obama "stray from the facts." Sabin Willett, "a prominent lawyer for Guantanamo detainees," said the claim that Bush released most detainees on court orders is "loony" because the number of people a district court ordered released is fewer than five.

Another Guantanamo detainee lawyer, David Remes, said "the D.C. Circuit held that the courts cannot force the president to release anybody." Former Obama White House Counsel Greg Craig said Spicer "doesn't know what he is talking about."

The Post adds that "the chaotic scene, which left airman Raymond Losano and another serviceman dead, unfolded in just seconds, according to Master Sgt. Lee Blackwell." Blackwell "was testifying at the trial for admitted al Qaeda member Ibrahim Harun, 46, who is charged with killing Losano, 24, of Texas, and Army Pvt. In an email to USA TODAY, Gowdy said, "Is there any evidence of a failure to provide information to Congress in the Yemen raid? Is there any evidence of failure to provide access to witnesses?"

COUNTER-INTELLIGENCE

US, Ukrainian Authorities Looked Into Manafort Associate.

Politico (3/8, Vogel, Stern, 2.46M) reports that the activities of Konstantin Kilimnik, "a Kiev-based operative with suspected ties to Russian intelligence who consulted regularly with Paul Manafort last year while Manafort was running Donald Trump's presidential campaign," are of interest to US and Ukrainian authorities. Kilimnik came under FBI and State Department scrutiny "partly because of at least two trips he took to the US during the presidential campaign, according to three international political operatives familiar with the agencies' interest in Kilimnik." It is not clear whether "either agency launched any kind of official inquiry into Kilimnik, nor is it clear whether the interest from the US authorities is ongoing." However, Politico cites documents which show that the Ukrainian prosecutor general "did launch a formal investigation into Kilimnik's suspected ties to Russian intelligence" and "has cleared Kilimnik, though the Ukrainian parliamentarian who requested the investigation questioned its thoroughness."

Paperwork filed Tuesday with the Justice Department's Foreign Agent Registration Unit said Flynn and his firm were voluntarily registering for lobbying from August through November that "could be construed to have principally benefited the Republic of Turkey." The Turkish businessman who hired Flynn's consulting firm, Ekim Alptekin, told the AP on Wednesday that the amended filings were made "in response to pressure from Justice Department officials in recent weeks." USA Today (3/8, Schouten, 5.28M) reports Flynn's lawyer, Robert Kelner, said Flynn shut down his firm last year, but decided to register because his work for Inovo BV "could be construed to have principally benefited the Republic of Turkey."

ABC World News Tonight (3/8, story 6, 0:30, Muir, 14.63M) reported 140 leaders of Jewish community centers spoke out against the wave of threats and asked federal law enforcement to increase efforts to thwart anti-Semitic acts. Reuters (3/8, Ax) reports that the Jewish leaders expressed their concerns in a Wednesday letter to Attorney General Sessions. "We are frustrated with the progress in resolving this situation," the leaders wrote. "We insist that all relevant federal agencies, including your own, apply all the resources available to identify and bring the perpetrator or perpetrators, who are trying to instill anxiety and fear in communities across the country, to justice." The Huffington Post (3/8, 237K) reports that the letter was also address to FBI Director Comey and DHS Secretary Kelly. The threats are currently being investigated by the FBI and Justice Department. So far, one person has been arrested for a handful of the at least 110 total "threats made to over 80 Jewish community centers...since January," the Post says.

The AP (3/8) reports that the sole individual implicated in the threats thus far, Juan Thompson, has not yet received a ruling on his request to be granted bond. His public defender, Lucille Liggett, told a judge Wednesday that he would agree to be on house arrest and refrain from using electronics. "But Assistant U.S. Attorney Howard Marcus called Thompson 'unstable' and says he should remain jailed," the AP says.

The Times Of Israel (3/8, Frazer, 21K) reports that Anti-Defamation League President Jonathan Greenblatt has called upon the federal government to take increased steps to address the threats. "We would like to see the president convene a federal inter-agency task force, and convene all of the right players around the table: the Department of Homeland Security, the Department of Justice, the Department of State, the Department of Education and others to develop policy measures," the Times says. According to Greenblatt, though radical Islam is a problem, the scope of the government's Countering Violent Extremism program "must encompass neo-Nazis and white supremacists."

"My office takes very seriously any threat of violence against an individual or their place of worship based on race, religion or cultural practices. We will continue to work closely with the FBI to prosecute these types of crimes, which threaten religious freedoms and violate fundamental civil rights," said US Attorney Andrew Luger. According to FBI Minneapolis Special Agent in Charge Richard Thornton, Fisher's sentence "reflects the severity of his appalling hate crime."

Federal prosecutors said Vaughn was due to appear in a Greenbelt federal court on Wednesday. Prosecutors said Vaughn "accepted more than $10,000 in cash bribes, 'influencing the performance of his official duties,' including voting for a bill to expand alcohol sales on Sundays." They also said that "from January 2015 through April 2016, Vaughn conspired with a liquor regulation official and store owners 'to enrich himself personally.'"

The Washington Post (3/8, Bui, 11.43M) reports that "a judge allowed Vaughn released on his own personal recognizance during his initial appearance in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt Wednesday." Vaughn "was indicted on eight counts of wire fraud, conspiracy and bribery in connection with actions that occurred during his time in office between 2012 and 2016." Politico Analysis: Sessions Signals Changes To Drug-Charge Policies.

Politico (3/8, Gerstein, 2.46M) reports in its "Under The Radar" blog that Attorney General Sessions "is signaling" that the Trump Administration "plans to make changes to policies the Obama administration implemented to seek less serious charges in some drug cases." In a memo sent to federal prosecutors nationwide on Wednesday, Sessions "says changes in Justice Department charging policies are in the offing. 'I encourage you to employ the full complement of federal law to address the problem of violent crime in your district,' Sessions wrote. 'Further guidance and support in executing this priority – including an updated memo on charging for all criminal cases – will be forthcoming.'" According to Politico, "legal experts said the language indicates that Sessions is planning to make significant revisions to policies Attorney General Eric Holder issued" in 2010 and 2013 regarding drug charges.

The AP (3/8, Gurman) reports that in the memo, Sessions "told the 94 U.S. attorneys to use 'the substantial tools at their disposal' to pursue more prosecutions and seek harsh sentences for those who commit robberies and gun crimes," and he "acknowledged that U.S. attorneys already view this as a main part of their job, but said they must do more to see a drop in violence." The AP adds that the memo "is a reiteration of Sessions' tough-on-crime stance," and that "it came two weeks after he repealed a memo that directed the department to phase out the use of private prisons, signaling he sees them as necessary for the future." In the memo, Sessions "lamented a spike in murders 'while federal prosecutions for violent crimes have been declining' and urged prosecutors to work with their local counterparts to punish criminals and dismantle drug gangs."

The Washington Post (3/8, Horwitz, 11.43M) reports that Sessions's memo "follows a speech he gave last month to state attorneys general in which he said that historically low crime rates might be coming to an end and that recent crime increases could foreshadow a violent new period in the nation's history. 'Unfortunately, the most recent crime data available shows a 10.8 percent increase in the number of murders in this country, while federal prosecutions for violent crimes have been declining,' Sessions said in his memo to prosecutors." Sessions "encouraged his prosecutors to use laws regarding firearms, robbery, carjacking and drug offenses as tools to bring investigations and prosecutions against suspected criminals," and he "said that prosecutions under the federal Controlled Substances Act 'can drive violent crime down.'"

The Times notes that "it is extremely rare to accuse a big multinational company of tax fraud, which could result in high penalties. 'Caterpillar did not comply with either U.S. tax law or U.S. financial reporting rules,' wrote Leslie A. Robinson, an accounting professor at the Tuck School of Business at Dartmouth College and the author of the report." The Times notes that "no charges have been filed, and it is not clear whether investigators agree with the findings or intend to act on them."

The attorneys also asked that legal sanctions be imposed "against RKA and its lawyers for continuing its case against Mnuchin." In a separate filing last week, however, RKA argued that Mnuchin "was an active and knowing participant in a scheme to defraud."

In request, sent by letter to Bharara, "is a novel strategy by ethics critics who have been pressing Trump to comply with the Constitution's 'emoluments clause,' which prohibits top officials from receiving payments or favors from foreign governments." The Post notes that "Trump's business empire stretches across the globe," and that "the letter was sent six weeks after one of the groups filed a lawsuit in federal district court making a similar claim." Trump "has said he addressed ethics concerns by turning over management of his business to his adult sons, who've said they have separated the family business from their relationship with their father and the U.S. government." NPR (3/8, 1.92M) also reports.

MSN (3/8, Prentice, 7.46M) reports that the government watchdog group Public Citizen said on Wednesday "it will ask lawmakers to investigate whether billionaire investor Carl Icahn should have been subject to lobbying disclosure laws when he advised President Donald Trump to overhaul the U.S. biofuels program." Icahn, "an unpaid adviser to Trump on regulation, submitted a proposal to Trump last month to change the U.S. Renewable Fuel Standard by shifting the burden of blending biofuels into gasoline away from oil refining companies, and further down the supply chain to marketers." Public Citizen said that, "because Icahn owns a controlling stake in a refinery that could benefit from the proposed change, he may have been required by a 1995 lobbying disclosure law to disclose his discussions with Trump on the subject as lobbying."

NIC Inc. chief security officer Jayne Friedland Holland writes in Government Computer News (3/8, 1K), "With the explosion of hacktivism and other forms of cyber crimes in recent years, fusion centers have increased their intelligence gathering and their focus on cybersecurity." Holland adds, "Fusion centers can serve as the cement for a shared cybersecurity mission across government, law enforcement and private industry, and state and local governments have a distinct role to play in the fusion centers' work." Furthermore, "State and local governments must interact regularly with fusion centers and encourage more private companies to share information."

Continuing Coverage: Child Pornography Case Dropped After DOJ Refuses To Show Software Code.

The AP (3/8) reports in continuing coverage that federal prosecutors "have dropped child pornography charges against a Washington teacher after the U.S. Justice Department refused to disclose information about a software weakness it exploited during an investigation last year." The AP reports that "charges against Vancouver, Washington, teacher Jay Michaud in U.S. District Court in Seattle were dismissed Monday." In 2015, Michaud "was arrested and accused of downloading child pornography," and "during the child porn investigation, the FBI allowed a secret child porn website on the largely anonymous Tor network to run for two weeks while it tried to identify users by hacking into their computers." The website, "called Playpen, operated on Tor," and "after arresting Playpen's operator in Florida in early 2015, the FBI let the website continue running for two weeks while trying to identify users, a move the agency said was necessary to apprehend those posting and downloading images of children being sexually abused."

911 DDoS Attack Provides Evidence Of "Potentially Devastating" Smartphone Glitch.

The Christian Science Monitor (3/8, 387K) "Passcode" discusses the case of Meetkumar Hiteshbhai Desai, who faces "four counts of felony computer tampering" for a distributed denial of service attack that overwhelmed 911 systems in three states. Desi "said he didn't intend to cause any harm" but "did surface a potentially devastating glitch in smartphone software that could exact damage on any number of sensitive and critical targets." Passcode adds, "It's exactly the type of attack that national law enforcement officials have been concerned about for years," and DHS "has been working on technology to protect 911 centers from DDoS and telephone-based, or TDoS, attacks for three years." DHS S&T cybersecurity division program manager Dan Massey is quoted saying the incident proved that an attacker can "cause a large number of phones or a large number of computers or a large number of whatever connected device to start generating these calls."

Former FBI Director Discusses Bureau's IT, Cybersecurity Issues.

FedTech (3/8) reports on a speech by former FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III at the CDW Managing Risk Summit about the bureau's IT modernization. Mueller "notes that when he came on board in 2001 the FBI's IT was 'a mess' and was archaic." Upgrades of the networks and network backbone "went fine," but "the FBI's plans to upgrade its software" all at once, on one day in July 2003, "went awry." Mueller is quoted saying, "I never asked the hard questions. The lesson to me was, when it comes to IT and you're running an organization, you better ask the hard questions and it better come from the top." FedTech goes on to cite Mueller discussing the bureau's recruitment and development of cybersecurity talent, "crucial to" which was "the FBI's partnership with other federal agencies, including the National Security Agency."

Former Obama Cyber Official Discusses Technical Skills Training, International Cyberspace Agreements.

The Washington Post (3/8, Fung, 11.43M) features an interview with R. David Edelman, former National Security Council and National Economic Council member under President Obama, who was "among those responsible for crafting U.S. policies on cybersecurity, technology and innovation." Edelman says the stigmatization of non-traditional higher education is "wrong. And as long as we continue to culturally stigmatize that, we're going to have a shortage of labor in" jobs requiring technical skills. Edelman says that job retraining to fill skill gaps or replace jobs lost due to automation "is going to have to be an all-hands on deck thing," involving not just government but academia and employers. Edelman goes on to discuss international agreements over cyberspace, saying, "The way the U.S. can guarantee it won't have a say is to withdraw from everything."

Report: International Treaty Needed To Protect People From "Unfettered Cybersurveillance."

Reuters (3/8, Miles) reports, "The world needs an international treaty to protect people's privacy from unfettered cybersurveillance, which is being pushed by populist politicians preying on fear of terrorism, according to" a report "submitted to the U.N. Human Rights Council by the U.N. independent expert on privacy, Joe Cannataci." Cannataci is quoted saying, "It's time to start reclaiming cyberspace from the menace of over-surveillance."

Republicans Propose Repeal Of Obama-Era Internet Privacy Regulations.

Reuters (3/8, Shepardson) reports Sen. Jeff Flake (R-AZ) introduced a resolution Tuesday with backing from 34 other senators that proposes the undoing of Obama-era regulations that put Internet service providers under closer scrutiny than websites for consumer data protection. Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-TN) introduced a companion bill in the House Wednesday. Reuters notes that the US Federal Communications Commission temporarily blocked some of the regulations from taking effect last Thursday. ACLU general counsel Neema Singh Giuliani criticized Flake's proposal for "essentially allowing...Comcast, AT&T, and Verizon to sell consumers' private information to the highest bidder."

AP Chronicles Levinson Case In Timeline.

The Miami Herald (3/8, 856K) posts to its website an AP timeline of events in the case of "Robert Levinson, a former FBI agent who vanished while in Iran on an unauthorized CIA mission." The timeline, which begins with Levinson's disappearance March 2007, continues through March 2017 with an entry that reads: "As Levinson's family marks 10 years since his disappearance, they say they hope President Donald Trump can draw on his background as a dealmaker to bring him home."

Media Analyses: Trump Moves To Calm GOP "Revolt" Over Healthcare Bill.

Much of the coverage of the debate over the American Health Care Act deals with efforts by House Speaker Ryan and other congressional GOP leaders to forge party unity. But there is also significant coverage of President Trump's role in trying to get conservatives to support the bill. Several reports and analysts say this is Trump's first opportunity to prove he is the dealmaker he campaigned as; analyses also cast the debate as one of the first times that Trump has been on the side of the party establishment and facing opposition from the populist wing.

Though the three broadcast networks spent more than eight minutes combined on the story, none led with it. ABC World News Tonight  (3/8, story 4, 3:35, Muir, 14.63M) reported, "With his healthcare plan under siege from Democrats and Republicans too, House Speaker Paul Ryan is trying to calm the storm." Ryan: "I have no doubt we'll pass this because we're going to keep our promises. We're going through the inevitable growing pains of being an opposition party to becoming a governing party." ABC's Mary Bruce: "But now, the nation's leading healthcare groups are piling on, joining AARP to denounce the plan. In a letter to Congress, the American Medical Association citing the 'expected decline in health insurance coverage and the potential harm it would cause to vulnerable patient populations.' President Trump has promised insurance for everybody." Kellyanne Conway: "He has committed that no one will lose their insurance and everyone will have access to coverage. Everyone will have access to coverage. He has assured that."

NBC Nightly News (3/8, story 3, 2:25, Holt, 16.61M) said there is a "growing revolt inside the Republican Party over the GOP's plan to replace Obamacare – a hard sell for GOP leaders, stressing these are just the beginning stages, expressing confidence they'll win enough support to get it done. And President Trump getting involved in a full-court press as millions of Americans' healthcare hangs in the balance." NBC's Hallie Jackson: "After campaigning on his art of the deal..." Trump: "Everybody wants me to negotiate. That's what I'm known as, a negotiator." Jackson: "...the ultimate test now of whether he can close one. President Trump hard-selling healthcare with the bill he backs in big trouble, even with conservatives."

The CBS Evening News (3/8, story 5, 2:15, Pelley, 11.17M) reported, "At the White House tonight, President Trump returned to dealmaking as he tried the persuade conservative leaders to support the Republican replacement for Obamacare," which "is meeting more opposition than expected." CBS' Nancy Cordes: "Republicans began pushing their Obamacare replacement bill through two House committees today, trying to outpace mounting criticism."

Phil Mattingly reported on CNN's The Lead (3/8, 320K) that "GOP leaders blitzed their members behind closed doors today with House Majority Whip Steve Scalise placing a split-screen slide on a projection screen of Trump and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi. The question Scalise asked: 'Whose side are you on?' The GOP aides realize it will take more than that as conservatives continue to threaten to sink the bill altogether."

Chuck Todd said on MSNBC's MTP Daily (3/8) that the Republican Party "has an identity crisis, at least when it comes to ideology. The healthcare fight has exposed the growing divide between the party's old fashioned movement conservative base and its new nationalist president." The Washington Post (3/8, Weigel, 11.43M) reports that the President met with conservative leaders at the White House on Wednesday evening after other meetings earlier in the day, and The Hill (3/8, Fabian, Wong, 1.25M) says that members of the House Freedom Caucus have been invited to the White House "next week for a pizza dinner and policy discussion at the bowling alley." But Axios (3/8, Swan) says "the message from the conservatives is clear: It's going to take more than schmoozing to change their minds on the Obamacare replacement plan the House Republican leadership wants. They want big, substantive changes – enough to make it a fundamentally different bill."

The Washington Post (3/8, Costa, Weigel, 11.43M) says that Trump's "salesmanship" on the bill has so far been uncharacteristically "understated. ... There is still urgency in his efforts, just markedly less Trump." There have been no "skewering tweets" or "raging news conferences." Instead, the President "is quietly courting wary conservatives in private meetings and keeping himself somewhat out of the picture as party leaders and his Cabinet officials defend the plan." Bloomberg Politics (3/8, House, 201K) reports that OMB Director Mulvaney has told House Republicans that the President "is 'agnostic' on the details of the plan, suggesting the current draft could face alterations."

Politico (3/8, Dawsey, Bade, 2.46M) reports the President on Wednesday told conservatives that the bill was "strong and necessary," though just "minutes later his top aides offered some willingness to consider changing some of the core provisions. ... In other words, Trump was ready to deal." The Hill (3/8, Roubein, Hellmann, 1.25M) reports that the conservative Republican Study Committee, which consists of 172 House members, wants to "change the structure of the tax credits in the bill to make them partially refundable" and freeze enrollment in the Affordable Care Act's Medicaid expansion.

The Washington Times (3/8, Sherfinski, 272K) reports that Kellyanne Conway told Fox News, "The President is confident that the American Health Care Act will pass the House and the Senate and [will] become the law – absolutely. He is really husbanding this through. Some people suggested that he be the closer. Some people suggested he be the leadoff batter. The President and the Vice President are all in here."

Chris Cillizza of the Washington Post (3/8, 11.43M) writes, "Donald Trump was elected president on this basic idea: Everyone currently in the government is dumb and makes bad deals. I am smart and make good deals." The healthcare bill is "where the rubber meets the road for Dealmaker Donald. If this bill goes down, it's a major political problem for Republicans," angering the base and potentially alienating "independents who voted for Trump believing he might, maybe, actually be able to change things."

Politico (3/8, Nussbaum, Haberkorn, 2.46M) says that while Trump "built his career in large part by plastering his name" on his properties, he appears to have no interest in having his name attached to the healthcare legislation. The Hill (3/8, Easley, Kamisar, 1.25M) reports that Democrats have been "branding the legislation 'TrumpCare' in their attempt to derail it," but Republicans and the White House are "rejecting the term." #TrumpCare is the emerging Twitter hashtag for critics of the legislation, though comments with the more neutral hashtag #AHCA were also heavily negative toward the bill.

Mulvaney Says CBO Score For Bill Will Be "Really Good" Or "Great." OMB Director Mulvaney was asked on MSNBC's Morning Joe  (3/8, 270K) about concerns that legislators will not know the cost of the bill before they have to vote on it. Mulvaney said, "It is not unusual for us to take up bills in committee without a CBO score. ... That CBO score will be there before the final vote. Just as importantly, however, this is a reconciliation bill. We all know it's going to score positive to helping out the deficit, to spending less money, another thing conservatives should be supportive of." The Washington Times (3/8, Sherfinski, 272K) reports that Mulvaney added that the score "will be 'really good' or 'great.'"

The Hill (3/8, Fabian, 1.25M) reports that the White House was critical of the CBO, with press secretary Sean Spicer saying the CBO "was 'way off last time' in its cost estimate of the Affordable Care Act." Spicer added, "If you're looking at the CBO for accuracy, you're looking in the wrong place."

Ryan Says He Has "No Doubt" That Bill Will Pass. The AP (3/8, Fram, Alonso-Zaldivar) reports that House Speaker Ryan and other Republican leaders are also trying to unify the GOP caucus. Ryan "praised the proposal as 'what good, conservative health care reform looks like' as lawmakers cast Congress' first votes on the GOP legislation." The AP says their goal of getting the bill through the House Ways and Means Committee and Energy and Commerce Committee by the end of the week "seemed likely." The Wall Street Journal (3/8, A1, Armour, Hackman, Rubin, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) says there was no significant dissent in committee among Republicans on Wednesday, though USA Today (3/8, Groppe, 5.28M) and Politico (3/8, Caygle, 2.46M) both report that Democrats, who know that they cannot kill the bill, are trying to delay passage for as long as possible in the hopes of exacerbating divisions in the larger GOP caucus.

The Los Angeles Times (3/8, Levey, Mascaro, 4.52M) reports that Ryan "said he had 'no doubt' the bill would pass, brushing off discontent from opponents as the 'inevitable growing pains' of tackling a difficult policy now that Republicans control the White House as well as Congress." The Washington Times (3/8, Howell, Dinan, 272K) says that Ryan "also said his troops have had months to review their blueprint and offer feedback, so it's time to get moving."

House Ways and Means Chairman Kevin Brady writes in a USA Today (3/8, 5.28M) op-ed, "Obamacare has harmed far more people than it has helped. As President Trump said in his recent address to Congress, 'Obamacare is collapsing,' and 'decisive action must be taken to protect all Americans.' With the American Health Care Act, House Republicans are answering President Trump's call to action." The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/8, Rao, 1.27M) reports that Minnesota's three GOP members of the House said Wednesday that they support the bill.

The Wall Street Journal (3/8, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) says in an editorial that while the AHCA is flawed, it is the best available option. A repeal bill without replacement would likely fail in the Senate, and if it did pass would create chaos at the state level and among insurers. The Journal also says that the tax credits that are now angering conservatives have been a regular feature of past GOP healthcare bills. Karl Rove similarly writes in his Wall Street Journal (3/8, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) column that the bill is similar to past GOP efforts and repeals many of the worst aspects of the ACA.

House Ways And Means Approves GOP Healthcare Bill On Party-Line Vote. The AP (3/9, Alonso-Zaldivar, Fram) reports that the House Ways and Means Committee voted 23-16 along party lines to approve the American Health Care Act, "an initial triumph" for Republicans that came just before 4:30 a.m. on Thursday. The House Energy and Commerce Committee continues its work on the bill.

Cotton Warns GOP Is "Moving A Little Bit Too Quickly." Sen. Tom Cotton said on MSNBC's Morning Joe  (3/8, 270K), "I think we are moving a little bit too quickly on healthcare reform. ... We have only had this bill in public 36 hours and to rush it through this week and then vote on it within the next few weeks really does hearken back to some of the problems that Obamacare was graded under." The Washington Times (3/8, Sherfinski, 272K) reports on Cotton's remarks.

Paul Calls For Vote On "Clean Repeal" Before Consideration Of Replacement. McClatchy (3/8, Tate, 74K) reports that Sen. Rand Paul has emerged as one of the most vocal critics of the bill. He "is firmly allied with members of the conservative House Freedom Caucus in a dogged effort to defeat" the bill. Paul says the House should again vote on the same ACA repeal measure that passed last year but was vetoed by President Obama. Paul said, "We are united on repeal, but we are divided on replacement. What's the best way to get past this impasse? Let's vote on what we voted on before: a clean repeal."

The Washington Times (3/8, Sherfinski, 272K) reports Paul told MSNBC that "the White House is in the midst of a 'charm offensive' to try to cajole wary conservatives who have criticized" the House bill. Politico (3/8, Everett, 2.46M) reports under the headline "Rand Stands Up To Trump On Obamacare" that while the President has urged Paul to back the bill, he "is not backing down" and is instead pushing his own measure. Paul said on MSNBC's

Morning Joe  (3/8, 270K), "The House plan is Obamacare lite. ... My plan would legalize freedom and competition. We would get rid of all the mandates so inexpensive insurance could be sold. We would allow health saving accounts to expand. Every Republican agrees with that."

Politico Analysis: Bill Puts Heritage Foundation At Odds With Trump And GOP. Politico (3/8, Cook, Restuccia, 2.46M) reports under the headline "An Outsider Becomes An Insider" that while "the Heritage Foundation has been cozying up to top Trump aides and congressional leaders for months," the "first major bill that Republicans proposed this week – to repeal and replace Obamacare – runs completely afoul of Heritage's priorities and threatens to upend a critical relationship between conservative activists and the Trump administration." Politico spoke with Heritage staff members to get "an inside look at how the group is trying find a middle ground between agitator and dealmaker."

Breitbart Goes On Attack Against AHCA. Business Insider (3/8, Darcy, 3.42M) reports that though Breitbart "has been reluctant lately to skewer former Republican National Committee members who now work inside the Trump administration," that "appeared to change" this week with the unveiling of the AHCA, "which Trump supports. The website deemed it 'Obamacare 2.0' and told its readers the legislation 'gives illegal aliens healthcare through identity fraud' and amounted to 'GOP welfare entitlement.'" A Breitbart report also "went after Spicer for 'inaccurately' claiming the bill 'fully repeals Obamacare.'"

Trump Meets With AFL-CIO's Trumka, Who Remains Strongly Opposed To Bill. Breitbart (3/8, Munro, 2.02M) reports that the President met with AFL-CIO President Richard Trumka on Wednesday afternoon, but that the meeting did little to win over the union leader. Trumka said of the AHCA, "This isn't a healthcare plan at all. It's a massive transfer of wealth from working people to Wall Street…it's bad for healthcare, It's bad for working families, it's bad for our economy and we will fully oppose it."

Major Hospital Associations Announce Opposition To Bill. USA Today (3/8, O'Donnell, 5.28M) reports, "Associations representing virtually every type of hospital wrote members of Congress Wednesday to voice their opposition to the Republican plan to replace the Affordable Care Act." A letter from seven hospital associations reads in part, "We are very concerned that the draft legislative proposal being considered by the House committees could lead to tremendous instability for those seeking affordable coverage." The New York Times (3/8, A1, Goodnough, Kaplan, Pear, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says that "all major hospital groups, including the American Hospital Association, the Association of American Medical Colleges, the Catholic Health Association of the United States and the Children's Hospital Association, came out against the Republican bill."

In addition, McClatchy (3/8, Welsh, 74K) reports that the American Medical Association said the AHCA "endangers expanded treatment for opioid abuse, an epidemic that kills 91 Americans each day." The Wall Street Journal (3/8, Armour, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) has a feature on how those currently covered by the ACA are preparing for the potential loss of coverage. The New York Times (3/8, Quealy, Sanger-Katz, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) "The Upshot" looks at "Who Wins And Who Loses" under the GOP plan.

WPost Analysis: Bill "Would Provide Major Tax Breaks" To Wealthiest Americans. The Washington Post (3/8, Snell, 11.43M) writes that the AHCA "could create a major shift in taxes for low-and-middle income people while delivering a big tax break to the rich." The Post says the legislation "would provide major tax breaks for the wealthiest one percent of the population. Low-income people are most likely to see their credits slashed while middle-income earners could have access to bigger, better credits down the line."

LATimes Analysis: Bill's Abortion Provision "Could Make It Impossible" For Californians To Get Tax Credits. The Los Angeles Times (3/8, Mason, 4.52M) reports that an antiabortion provision in the AHCA "could make it impossible for most Californians to take advantage" of the bill's proposed tax credits. The measure would offer such credits "to people who do not get insurance from their employer, but it would prohibit that money from being spent on plans that cover abortion – a ban that would make virtually all health plans in the state ineligible for such credits." California Insurance Commissioner Dave Jones said the "House GOP proposal 'is directly at odds with California law and California's constitutional protection of an individual's right to have access to abortions.'"

Quinnipiac Poll: More Than Half Say Sessions Lied Under Oath, Should Resign.

More than half of respondents to a Quinnipiac poll released this week said Attorney Genera; Sessions "lied under oath" during his confirmation hearing and should resign, Politico (3/8, Nelson, 2.46M) reports. According to the poll, 52 percent "said Sessions was guilty of lying under oath when he told the Senate Judiciary Committee that he had not been in contact with any Russian official when he had, in fact, met twice with Russia's ambassador to the U.S. during the presidential campaign," and 51 percent "said Sessions should resign over the controversy."

However, in an analysis piece in "The Fix" blog of the Washington Post (3/8, Blake, 11.43M), Aaron Blake notes that "upon further inspection, there are a few reasons for skepticism" about the poll numbers. Blake notes that "the question Quinnipiac asked doesn't include Sessions's actual response – nor does it include the actual question that Sen. Al Franken (D-Minn.) asked him." Blake points out that Sessions "has argued that the context of the exchange is relevant here; he said that his meeting with Russian Ambassador Sergey Kislyak was in his official capacity and that his answer to Franken was in the context of the campaign." Blake also notes "a real disconnect between the number of people who think Sessions lied and those who think he broke the law," and he concludes that "this poll seems to be a great example of the way you ask the question determining the answers you get." CBS News (3/8, 4.4M), Roll Call (3/8, Chuang, 63K), Vox (3/8, Gardenswartz, 1.15M), and CNN International (3/8, Mueller, 598K) also report on the poll.

According to USA Today (3/8, Michaels, 5.28M), the US-led coalition has dropped "a record number of bombs on Islamic State targets so far this year, a sign of intensified action even before President Trump has had a chance to deliver on his promise of ramped-up efforts to defeat the radical group." The coalition dropped "7,494 bombs, rockets and other munitions in Iraq and Syria during the first nine weeks of this year, up nearly 50% from 5,025 during the same period in 2016 and nearly double 4,100 strikes in 2015, according to statistics provided to USA TODAY." Lt. Gen. Jeffrey Harrigian, who commands US air operations in the Middle East, told USA TODAY in a phone interview, "Anytime the enemy has shown their face or provided an opportunity to identify where they were…we've targeted them."

US Drone Technology Helping In Battle For Mosul. The CBS Evening News (3/8, story 6, 2:10, Pelley, 11.17M) reported that despite ISIS' use of car bombs against the US-backed Iraqi military in Mosul, Iraqi forces are "gaining ground every day," in part because of the help of a $1.5 million US drone – known as "The Shadow" – that helps the American-led coalition call in airstrikes targeting ISIS positions.

Haley: "We Need To Get Iran" Out Of Syria.

Reuters (3/8, Nichols) reports Ambassador Haley said Wednesday that Syria can no longer be a "safe haven for terrorists" and that it was important "we get Iran and their proxies out." Speaking to reporters after UN special envoy Staffan de Mistura briefing the Security Council, Haley "did not respond to questions on whether the United States believed Syrian President Bashar al-Assad...should step down." Said Haley, "The United States absolutely supports Staffan de Mistura and the work that he's doing, we support the UN process, we support the talks in Geneva, we want to see them continue." The AP (3/8, Lederer), meanwhile, reports that de Mistura said yesterday that he intends to hold a "fifth round of talks on March 23" in Geneva.

The National Council of Resistance of Iran estimates that Tehran has paid "nearly $100 million a year in salaries to a grab-bag of mercenaries it sent to Syria" under the direction of the Quds Force.

Pentagon: Marines On The Ground In Syria Ahead Of Raqqa Offensive.

Fox News' Special Report (3/8, 1.53M) reported the Pentagon has confirmed that US Marines are on the ground in Syria. The Marines, on a "specific mission...directed by the President," are in addition to US Special Operations forces that were recently deployed to northwest Syria. Barbara Starr reported on CNN's Situation Room  (3/8, 554K) that the Pentagon won't provide details on the location or exact number of Marines, but the AP (3/8, Baldor) reports the number is around "a couple hundred" and their deployment "is temporary." Still, the AP says "it is likely an early indication that the White House is leaning toward giving the Pentagon greater flexibility to make routine combat decisions" in the fight against ISIS. According to the Washington Post (3/8, Lamothe, Gibbons-Neff, 11.43M), the Marines were deployed "in support of the fight to take back...Raqqa," and are "part of the 11th Marine Expeditionary Unit, which left San Diego on Navy ships in October."

According to an exclusive Reuters (3/8, Stewart) report, the Administration is also "weighing a deployment of up to 1,000 American soldiers to Kuwait to serve as a reserve force" in the fight against ISIS. US officials said "proponents of the option...said it would provide US commanders on the ground greater flexibility to quickly respond to unforeseen opportunities and challenges on the battlefield." However, it is unclear whether the proposal had the support of Defense Secretary Mattis.

US Official: ISIS Leaders Fleeing Raqqa. The New York Times (3/8, Gordon, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that as US-backed Syrian fighters close in on Raqqa, "some of the Islamic State's leaders have fled their self-declared capital and are planning to carry on the fight from other sanctuaries in Syria and Iraq, an American defense official said on Wednesday." However, the official cautioned that their departure "does not mean that the battle to take Raqqa will be easy."

WPost A1 Analysis: US Forces Drawn Into Struggle Among Kurdish, Arab Allies.

The Washington Post (3/8, A1, Sly, 11.43M) reports on its front page that the US military is "getting drawn into a deepening struggle for control over areas liberated from the Islamic State that risks prolonging American involvement" in the war long after the militants are defeated. For example, the Post says US troops "have headed in recent days to the northern town of Manbij...to protect their Kurdish and Arab allies against a threatened assault by other US allies in a Turkish-backed force." The Manbij deployment "has not yet affected US plans for taking Raqqa," according to Pentagon spokesman, Capt. Joe Davis, "but it does raise new questions about the viability of the US plan to capture Raqqa, an overwhelmingly Arab city, by a force that is commanded mostly by Kurds."

Warplanes Bomb East Of Damascus Despite Ceasefire.

Reuters (3/8, Perry, Al-Khalidi) reports warplanes bombed "rebel-held towns east of Damascus on Wednesday, striking residential areas where Russia had declared a ceasefire less than 24 hours earlier and leaving dozens injured," according to residents, rebels and the Syrian Observatory for Human Rights. "At least 30 air raids hit the region on Wednesday, along with dozens of artillery rounds and ground-to-ground missiles fired from government-held areas."

Iraqi Forces Capture Last Major Road In Western Mosul.

Reuters (3/8, Coles, Davison) reports Iraqi forces battled ISIS militants Wednesday in Mosul, capturing control of "the last major road leading west from the city." The road links Mosul to Tal Afar, another ISIS stronghold 40 miles to the west, and then to the Syrian border.

US Official: Al-Baghdadi Has Fled Mosul.

AFP (3/8) reports a US defense official said Wednesday that ISIS leader Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi "has fled Mosul and has apparently delegated tactical control of the battle for the city to local commanders." The official said Baghdadi fled "some time before Iraqi security forces surrounded the city during an offensive to retake it." The Washington Times (3/8, Muñoz, 272K) says that while US military and intelligence officials "do not have a location on al-Baghdadi's whereabouts," the Pentagon "was wary to characterize the Islamic State leader as 'on the run.'" Reuters (3/8, Coles, Walcott, Chmaytelli) reports that US intelligence sources also "point to a sharp drop in Islamic State postings on social media as evidence that Baghdadi and his circle have become increasingly isolated."

ISIS Claims Deadly Attack On Afghan Military Hospital.

ABC World News Tonight (3/8, story 8, 0:25, Muir, 14.63M) reported ISIS has claimed responsibility for a suicide attack on a military hospital in Afghanistan that left at least 30 people dead and "some 50 wounded." NBC Nightly News (3/8, story 5, 1:35, Holt, 16.61M) said the attack happened in Kabul, "just yards from the US Embassy." According to the CBS Evening News (3/8, story 9, 0:20, Pelley, 11.17M), ISIS militants disguised themselves as doctors and "went floor-to-floor with automatic rifles and grenades." According to the AP (3/8, Faiez, Shah), the "brazen assault" demonstrates the capability of Afghan militants "to stage large-scale and complex attacks" in Kabul's "heavily-guarded diplomatic quarter." Afghan President Ashraf Ghani said the attack "trampled on all human values." The New York Times (3/8, Mashal, Abed, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) quotes Afghan Ambassador to the US Dr. Hamdullah Mohib calling the attack "an abhorrent new low" and "a cowardly, wicked act."

US Rejects China's Call To Halt Drills If North Korea Suspends Tests.

The AP (3/8, Lederer) reports the US on Wednesday rejected China's proposal for a halt to joint US-South Korean military exercises if North Korea suspends its nuclear and missile activities. State Department spokesman Mark Toner said, "At this point we don't see it as a viable deal." At the Pentagon, spokesman Cmdr. Gary Ross said US activities to defend South Korea "cannot be equated to North Korea's repeated violations of its obligations and agreements."  Fox News' Special Report (3/8, 1.53M) showed Toner saying, "This is apples and oranges. ... What we're doing in terms of our defense cooperation with South Korea is in no way comparable to the blatant disregard North Korea has shown with respect to international law and international concerns – repeatedly – about its nuclear weapons program."

At the UN on Wednesday, USA Today (3/8, Bacon, 5.28M) reports Ambassador Haley said North Korea's nuclear and ballistic missile programs defy international law and should not be negotiated. "I appreciate my counterparts wanting to talk about talks and negotiations, but we are not dealing with a rational person," Haley said at a news conference with the ambassadors from South Korea and Japan. Haley said Kim must take "positive action" before he can be taken seriously at the negotiating table and urged UN members to tighten sanctions against Pyongyang. Haley, Reuters (3/8, Nichols) reports, also told reporters that "all options are on the table" with regards to dealing with North Korea.

According to Bloomberg Politics (3/8, Wadhams, 201K), US officials now acknowledge "that US efforts to curtail North Korea's nuclear ambitions have failed," and Secretary of State Tillerson will use a trip to Asia next week "to look at new ways of approaching a problem that has vexed American presidents since Bill Clinton." Toner told reporters yesterday, "All of the efforts we have taken thus far to attempt to persuade North Korea to engage in meaningful negotiations have fallen short, to be honest. So we need to look at new ways to convince them, to persuade them, that it's in their interests." Bloomberg calls Toner's remarks "a rare and frank public admission from the US government that the approach taken toward North Korea in recent years...hasn't worked and isn't likely to now."

Son Of Kim Jong-Nam Appears In New Online Video. Coverage of the alleged assassination of Kim Jong-un's half-brother continued Wednesday.  CNN's Situation Room (3/8, 554K) reported Kim Han-sol, the son of Kim Jong-Nam, has appeared in a "bizarre" new video in which he acknowledges his father's death and "says...he's with his mother and sister, but doesn't say where." The video was posted online by a group called Cheollima Civil Defense, which said it had "responded to an emergency request by Kim Jong-Nam's family" after he was killed last month at the Kuala Lampur airport.

US General: Russia Has Deployed Banned Missile.

The New York Times (3/8, Gordon, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Gen. Paul Selva, the vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told Congress Wednesday that Russia has deployed "a prohibited cruise missile, the first public confirmation by the United States that the Kremlin had fielded the weapon in violation of a landmark arms control agreement." The missile is believed to have been moved in December from a test site in southern Russia to an undisclosed operational base. "We believe that the Russians have deployed a land-based cruise missile that violates the spirit and intent of the Intermediate Nuclear Forces Treaty," Gen. Selva told the House Armed Services Committee. "The system itself presents a risk to most of our facilities in Europe," he added. "And we believe that the Russians have deliberately deployed it in order to pose a threat to NATO and to facilities within the NATO area of responsibility." The AP (3/8, Burns) reports Selva also "said he sees no indication that Moscow intends to return to compliance with the 1987 Intermediate-range Nuclear Forces Treaty," and Reuters (3/8, Ali) reports he said the US has brought up the issue with Russia.

Khodorkovsky: Window For Reaching Deal With Russia Narrow. Russian opposition leader Mikhail Khodorkovsky writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/8, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) that Russian are waiting to see if President Trump and President Vladimir Putin can reach some kind deal, but cautions that each side must understand the needs and desires of the other. He warns that the window for reaching such a deal is very narrow. Mr. Trump's brashness has stopped at attacking Mr. Putin personally. That atypical restraint horrified many Russia hawks in the West. But it may turn out that Mr. Trump took a better approach. Whether accidentally or by design, he has left the door open for Mr. Putin to make a graceful exit. That would be good for everyone.

Khodorkovsky told the Washington Free Beacon (3/8, Gertz, 115K) in an interview that the Administration has "a unique chance to persuade...Putin to give up power and return the country to the path of democratic political reform." Said the Russian opposition figure, "The only opportunity to seriously change things in the relations between Putin and America under [the Trump] administration would be to convince Putin that it is in his best interest to leave power while this administration is in power. Then all the other problems can and will be solved."

NYTimes A1: Western Governments View Russia's RT As Kremlin Tool. In a front-page story, the New York Times (3/8, A1, Erlanger, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) examines charges from Western governments that RT is "an agent of Kremlin policy and a tool directly used by President Vladimir V. Putin to undermine Western democracies" by meddling in the US presidential election and, "European security officials say, trying to do the same in the Netherlands, France and Germany, all of which vote later this year." Even as Russia insists that RT is "just another global network like the BBC or France 24," many Western countries regard it as "the slickly produced heart of a broad, often covert disinformation campaign designed to sow doubt about democratic institutions and destabilize the West."

State Department Approves Resumption Of Arms Sales To Saudi Arabia.

The Washington Post (3/8, Ryan, Gearan, 11.43M) reports that the State Department has approved a resumption of weapons sales "that critics have linked to Saudi Arabia's bombing of civilians in Yemen, a potential sign of reinvigorated US support for the kingdom's involvement" in the ongoing civil war there. According to the Post, the proposal from the State Department "would reverse a decision made late in the Obama administration to suspend the sale of precision guided munitions to Riyadh." Secretary of State Tillerson's approval this week of the measure, "which officials say needs White House backing to go into effect, provides an early indication of the new administration's more Saudi-friendly approach to the conflict in Yemen, and a sign of its more hawkish stance on Iran." The move comes as AFP (3/8) reports

Amnesty International on Thursday accused the Saudi-led coalition of using "banned cluster munitions in raids on residential areas."

Chinese Outlets Mistakenly Publish Media Satire On Trump As Real News.

The New York Times (3/8, Hernández, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that several Chinese publications reported this week that a "frantic President Trump, holding court in a bathrobe, ordered his aides to wrap the White House telephones in tinfoil," citing The New Yorker. However, the article by the comedian Andy Borowitz "was satire." The Times notes that "it was not the first time that American humorists have unintentionally duped the Chinese news media." In 2012, People's Daily, reported that North Korean leader Kim Jong-un had been named "Sexiest Man Alive for 2012," based on a satirical article in The Onion.

Malaysia Airlines Marks Third Anniversary Of Plane's Disappearance.

The New York Times (3/8, Belopotosky, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports on the third anniversary of "one of the biggest aviation mysteries of all time" – the disappearance of Malaysia Airlines Flight 370 on a routine flight from Kuala Lumpur to Beijing. The flight's disappearance prompted "the largest and costliest search in aviation history."

Worldwide Protests Held On International Women's Day.

The CBS Evening News  (3/8, story 7, 1:55, Pelley, 11.17M) reported that Wednesday marked International Women's Day, and "from New York to Los Angeles, Istanbul to St. Petersburg, women walked off their jobs to protest." Fox News' Special Report  (3/8, 1.53M) said women held "rallies on almost every continent including several in the Middle East, calling attention to lower wages, sexual harassment, discrimination, and other issues women face every day." In fact, reported CNN's Situation Room  (3/8, 554K), the UN held "their own series of events to promote universal paid parental leave." The New York Times (3/8, Times, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) similarly reports that "people and governments across the globe observed it in an outpouring of support for women's equality and empowerment." ABC World News Tonight  (3/8, story 9, 0:25, Muir, 14.63M) noted the protests are international, while NBC Nightly News  (3/8, story 7, 1:20, Holt, 16.61M) focused solely on domestic protests.

In a separate report, the New York Times (3/8, Minder, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) focuses on Spanish women, who it says "have made tremendous advances in recent years as the revolt against mainstream parties helped break down some old-boy networks," but that "upheaval, the women say, has also laid bare the deeply entrenched sexism and machismo" in the nation's political establishment.

WSJournal: UK Budget Will Not Create Growth Amid Brexit.

A Wall Street Journal (3/8, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) editorial says the budget plans released Wednesday by UK Chancellor Philip Hammond are too cautious to allow the nation to grow outside of Europe amid its exit from the EU. If the UK is going to attract investors, the Journal argues that it needs to make dramatic cuts in corporate- and personal-tax rates, create a welcoming regulatory environment, and improve its fiscal discipline.

Crazy stuff. I'm tempted to tease about John being accused of being the "brains" behind our operation, but that's the only fun part of this sick piece. The whole thing leaves me incredulous, as usual.

All:

A few updates since our meeting on Friday afternoon:

1. OCA has connected with HPSCI minority staff about the issue of questions that the D cannot answer. They understand and expect (but cannot guarantee) that such questions will NOT be asked.

2. Staff also mentioned that they are thinking about a slightly atypical structure for the hearing. That is, instead of 2 rounds of questions with each Member having 5 mins per round, they are talking about each "side" (R and D) taking alternating 15 minute turns with 1 – 2 members asking questions during each 15 minute turn.

3. [redacted] called me yesterday just to let me know that he has been retained to represent former Directors Clapper and Brennan who will be appearing, along for former DAG Yates, at a follow on hearing tentatively scheduled for March 28.

4. SSCI is planning a similar hearing to take place on March 30. However, as of today, no USG witnesses are planned.

That is all for now.

Jim R/all (note the subset of recipients on this),

See below, relates to a 3/15 letter from HPSCI to us, CIA, NSA. Best version i could find online is attached. The second file has the actual questions.

[redacted] b5

Nunes said Trump could be referring to new information about whether intelligence officials "unmasked," or identified, U.S. citizens who were captured speaking with foreign officials who are under routine surveillance — a process governed by FISA. "That is very possible, and we don't have the answers to those questions yet," he said. "We had a deadline of Friday for the NSA, FBI and CIA to get us those names that were unmasked through the FISA system. We didn't get those names on Friday, and until we get those names, we can't rule this out."

https://www.washingtonpost.com/news/powerpost/wp/2017/03/19/no-new-evidence-to-support-trumps-wiretap-claims-house-intelligence-chairman-says/?hpid=hp_hp-top-table-main_pwr-nunes-1158am%3Ahomepage%2Fstory&utm_term=.e45a37b52efe

1. All specific policies and/or procedures each agency employs to make a determination to unmask and disseminate the identity of a USP; specifically, the Committee requests the approval process required to authorize such a dissemination within and outside the agency, including the number of individuals who can approve an unmasking in each agency;

2. The total number of disseminations of any unmasked USP identities between June 2016 and January 2017, if they exist;

3. If they exist, the names of any unmasked USPs whose identities were disseminated in response to requests from IC agencies, law enforcement, or senior Executive Branch officials between June 2016 and January 2017, and that relate to Presidential candidates Donald J. Trump and Hillary Rodham Clinton and their associates in 2016;[1]

4. If they exist, the names of any IC agencies, law enforcement agencies, and/or senior Executive Branch officials that requested and/or authorized the unmasking and dissemination of USP information relating to the specific individuals and entities specified in request #3 above, as well as the titles of all specific recipients of that unmasked USP information; and

5. If it exists, the stated reason, pursuant to the relevant minimization procedures, for unmasking each USP identity relating to request #3 above.

We appreciate your prompt attention to this request. If you have any questions regarding the foregoing, please contact the Committee at (202) 225-4121.

The Honorable James Comey
Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation
Washington, D.C. 20535

The Honorable Mike Pompeo
Director, Central Intelligence Agency
Washington, D.C. 20505

Dear Directors Rogers, Comey, and Pompeo:

As you know, the Committee has been very concerned regarding the purported unauthorized disclosures of classified information, particularly when they pertain to intelligence collection on, or related to, U.S. persons (USP). To take a prominent example, a January 12, 2017 article in a major newspaper was the first to claim that "Retired Lt. Gen. Michael T. Flynn, [then President-Elect] Trump's choice for national security adviser . . . . phoned Russian Ambassador Sergey Kislyak several times on Dec. 29."

Such stories would appear to contain the unauthorized disclosure of USP identities. This potential misuse is a key reason why the Intelligence Community (IC) has developed robust "minimization procedures" for the protection of USP information, including requiring the "masking" of USP identities in most circumstances.

However, as recent news stories seem to illustrate, individuals talking to the media would appear to have wantonly disregarded these procedures. The Committee is concerned that USP identifiable information may have been mishandled in violation of approved minimization and dissemination procedures pursuant to statute and/or Executive Order 12333, as amended. Therefore, no later than Friday, March 17, 2017, each of your agencies should provide the Committee with the following:

Nunes said Trump could be referring to new information about whether intelligence officials "unmasked," or identified, U.S. citizens who were captured speaking with foreign officials who are under routine surveillance — a process governed by FISA. "That is very possible, and we don't have the answers to those questions yet," he said. "We had a deadline of Friday for the NSA, FBI and CIA to get us those names that were unmasked through the FISA system. We didn't get those names on Friday, and until we get those names, we can't rule this out."

SPEAKERS: CHRIS WALLACE, FOX NEWS HOST

REP. PAUL RYAN (R-WI), SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE

KARL ROVE, GOP STRATEGIST

DR. EZEKIEL EMANUEL, FOX NEWS CONTRIBUTOR

NEERA TANDEN, CENTER FOR AMERICAN PROGRESS RACHEL CAMPOS-DUFFY, FOX NEWS CONTRIBUTOR

REP. DEVIN NUNES (R), CALIFORNIA

[*] CHRIS WALLACE, FOX NEWS ANCHOR: I'm Chris Wallace.

The Trump agenda faces a critical crossroads on Russia, the president Supreme Court nominee and dismantling Obamacare.

First, the GOP repeal and replace plan heads for a full vote in the House.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

REP. PAUL RYAN (R-WI), SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE: This is legislating. This is going through the regular order process.

REP. RAND PAUL (R), KENTUCKY: Conservatives want a seat at the table and we don't want Obamacare light.

WALLACE: We'll talk with House Speaker Paul Ryan about the effort to get enough Republican votes to pass the bill. And also about the battle of the president's budget. It's a FOX NEWS SUNDAY exclusive.

Then, FBI Director Comey testifies tomorrow about Mr. Trump's charge former President Obama wiretapped Trump Tower.

REP. DEVIN NUNES (R), CALIFORNIA: We don't have any evidence that that took place.

REP. ADAM SCHIFF (D), CALIFORNIA: To even put that forth was irresponsible, the president and his spokesman.

WALLACE: We'll preview the hearing with the chair of the House Intelligence Committee, Devin Nunes, only on FOX NEWS SUNDAY.

Plus, the president's Supreme Court nominee gets ready to take the hot seat as Senate Democrats try to block his nomination. We'll ask our Sunday panel about the confirmation showdown.

And get Obamacare architect Ezekiel Emanuel's take on the GOP's plan to repeal and replace.

Plus, our power player of the week, behind the scenes at the White House bowling alley. We'll give you an exclusive look at where the administration is trying to pin down votes.

All, right now, on FOX NEWS SUNDAY.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

WALLACE: And hello again from FOX News in Washington.

This week could be the most pivotal so far in the two-month-old Trump presidency. Tomorrow, Mr. Trump's Supreme Court nominee Neil Gorsuch goes before the Senate Judiciary Committee for his confirmation hearing.

Also, the first public hearing on possible ties between Russia and the Trump campaign gets underway and the Republican bill to repeal and replace Obamacare may be headed for a vote on the House floor.

Joining us now live from Janesville, Wisconsin, is House Speaker Paul Ryan.

Mr. Speaker, welcome back to FOX NEWS SUNDAY.

RYAN: Good morning, Chris. Thanks for having me.

WALLACE: Will you bring repeal and the replace bill to the House floor on Thursday as some people have suggested? And if so, does that mean that you now have the votes to pass it?

RYAN: That is our plan. I think Thursday is most likely going to be our day to bring it forward. We bring it to the rules committee first. So, part of our regular order process is to go through four committees. We're now going to go to the rules committee. And so, we feel very good where we are.

We're still having conversations with our members. We are making fine-tuning improvements to the bill to reflect people's concerns, to reflect people's improvements. The president, you say people being seated at the table, the president is bringing people to his table and I'm very impressed with how the president is helping us close this bill, and making the improvements that we've been making, getting the votes.

And so, we feel very good where we are. We like the process because it's the regular order process. We're going to make those changes at the rules committee that the budget committee and others have asked for. And so, we feel like we're on track and we are doing -- we are right where we want to be.

WALLACE: So, what would you say the prospects that you have the votes and will be able to pass it on Thursday?

RYAN: Yes, I feel very good about actually. I feel like it's exactly where we want to be. The reason I feel so good about this is because the president has become a great closer. He's the one who was helped negotiate changes to this bill with members from all over our caucus. I call it getting the sweet spot, you've got to get 218 Republicans, who come from all different walks of life, to come together to agree on the best possible plan to repeal and replace Obamacare.

And the reason I feel very good where we are, we all, all of us, all Republicans in the House, Senate, and the president, made a promise to the American people that we would repeal and replace this faulty collapsing law, and we're going to make good on that promise.

WALLACE: You talk about changes. You're going to offer what is known up on the Hill as a "manager's amendment" to reflect the changes you're going to make to try to pick up the final votes you need. And I want to go through some of the items that are being discussed about that.

Allow states to impose a work requirement for able-bodied Medicaid recipients. Allow states to accept a fixed block grant for Medicaid, and boost the tax credits for lower income and older people.

Mr. Speaker, will all of those items be in the manager's amendment?

RYAN: Yes, those are all things that we are working on and the manager's amendment. We're making sure that we get all the language right. As you know, we have this weird thing called the Byrd rule, which is reconciliation. So, we're making sure that these changes that were being discussed conform with this.

And so, we've gotten lots of feedback from conservatives, from governors, from people in all walks of life in our conference, from different perspectives about changes they think to improve this bill. We are working on the kinds of changes you just described and we're going through that process and we're going to bring those changes to the rules committee.

WALLACE: You have been talking about this, calling it a binary choice, either you accept the GOP bill or you have to stay with Obamacare as it exists, and with a lot of people say, as it's collapsing. But now, you're talking about making changes.

And this week, President Trump said this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

DONALD TRUMP, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: If we're not going to take care of the people, I'm not signing anything. I'm not going to be doing it, just so you understand. I'm in a little way, I'm an arbitrator.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: In fact, there are going to be changes, as you say this week, in the House. There are going to have to be even more changes in Congress. Respectfully, sir, isn't your binary choice out the window?

RYAN: No. You are misinterpreting me. The binary choice is when we bring this to a vote, that's when it becomes a binary choice. Until we bring the bill to the floor, we are always making improvements.

There is one more to describe what's going on, legislating. We are not actually doing this behind the scenes and just bringing some bill to the floor and making people vote for it. We're listening to people and the president is right. He is the one, it's -- we've never had this before, that's why I'm very excited. We have a president who is rolling up his sleeves, he's learning -- he's a very quick learner on health care. He's a business guy who came to the presidency, and now, he's helping us make sure that would bridge differences with members who are bringing constructive ideas and solutions for how to make this bill better. Four-committee process, we've got the fourth committee coming up, that's always been the plan, to always learn, listen, negotiate and improve the bill, make the fine-tuning, and then bring the bill to the floor, and that is where it then becomes a binary choice.

That's what I meant all along what I said this, which is, when we bring this to a vote, either we're going to keep the Obamacare status quo, the law is collapsing, five states have one plan left, over a third of the counties in America have only one insurer left. Some are already pulling out, massive premium increases in the future, a collapsing law. Or, we replace it with patient-centered health care that works where we give people more freedom, where we let the states go back to running their health insurance markets.

That is what we ran on. This is the plan we ran on all of last year. And we've been working with administration hand in glove and the Senate since January to put this together, and when this vote comes up, that's when it will be a binary choice, either for the status quo or for repealing and replacing this law.

WALLACE: Mr. Speaker, as a governing principle, do you believe that every American should be able to get health care insurance if they wanted?

RYAN: Yes, I do believe this is a critical need for Americans. I do believe that we can have in this country a health care system for everyone can get access to affordable health care coverage, including people with pre-existing conditions. I believe that that is achievable. I believe that that is what we are achieving in this legislation.

And the answer is not a government one-size-fits-all, arrogant micromanaging system where the government forces you to buy something you don't want, don't need, or can't afford.

The goal here is to get every American access to affordable coverage. That means we have to bring the cost of health care down. That means we don't want monopolies.

WALLACE: But, Mr. Speaker, let me --

RYAN: And that is what we are achieving.

WALLACE: Let me pick up on this, because the Congressional Budget Office, I don't have to tell you, came out this week with a pretty dramatic forecast and they said that 24 million fewer Americans will have health insurance in ten years under your plan. You said that part of that is that this is what freedom looks like.

Here you are.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RYAN: This isn't a government mandate. This is not the government makes you by what we say you should buy and, therefore, the government thinks you're all going to buy it.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: But, sir, is the major decrease in the number of people, according to the CBO, who will have health insurance, is it freedom or is it that some people will no longer be able to afford health insurance under your plan?

I want to show a specific case that the CBO put up. Look at these numbers. In ten years, the CBO said a 64-year-old with an income of $26,500 will pay $1,700 out-of-pocket under Obamacare for health insurance. Under your plan, the CBO says that same person will have to pay $14,600 because insurance companies can charge more and the tax credit that you're going to offer is smaller than the subsidy that Obamacare will offer.

So, what they are saying is that this isn't freedom. This isn't people voluntarily deciding not to have health insurance. It's that your plan makes it unaffordable for people.

RYAN: So, there are three things I would say.

Number one, what they basically say is people -- Obamacare is not going to last. There's no way Obamacare could stick another two or three years, let alone ten years. And so, they are comparing in Obamacare plan that's mythical, that won't exist in ten years.

And then they're saying, well, if people are buying what Obamacare is going to make them buy, then they will be able to afford it.

Here's the point: we believe that we do need to add some additional assistance with people in those older cohorts. But the apples to oranges comparison that's happening here is, we're not going to make people buy something that's so expensive that they can't afford, that the market is not going to offer.

And so, where I dispute that comparison is it suggests that we're going to have the same kind of plans being offered in ten years that Obamacare would otherwise offer. It won't be it is collapsing.

(CROSSTALK)

WALLACE: If I may.

(CROSSTALK)

WALLACE: But I want to get to two points.

(CROSSTALK)

RYAN: OK, Chris, this real quick. WALLACE: Yes, go ahead.

RYAN: Let me just say, the older, the person in their 50s and 60s -- the person in the 50s and 60s does have additional health care cost than a person in the 20s and 30s, the tax credit adjust for that. But you're right in saying, and we agree, we believe we should have even more assistance. And that's one of the things we're looking at for that person in the 50s and 60s because they experience higher health care costs.

So, the critical difference here is we're going to --

(CROSSTALK)

WALLACE: So, you're going to change the plan as it was written and the CBO analyzed it?

RYAN: That is among the things we're looking at doing, yes. And the point I would say is, we're going to let people buy what they want to buy. We're going to have more plans being offered, more choice and competition, and this is before Tom Price does anything to deregulate the marketplace, to bring more competition and lower prices which the CBO could not and did not analyze.

So, the CBO looked at a little piece of the issue when we know that the secretary of HHS will help bring market freedom and regulatory relief to the health insurance markets to dramatically lower the price of plans for those 50 and 60-year-olds. But even with that, we think that we should be offering even more assistance than what the bill currently does.

WALLACE: OK.

RYAN: That's the point I'm trying to make.

WALLACE: No, I understand that.

RYAN: Thanks for indulging --

WALLACE: Let me turn on the time we have left, sir, to the budget that the Trump administration offered this week. Here is Budget Director Mick Mulvaney.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MICK MULVANEY, DIRECTOR, OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET: This is a hard power budget that this administration tends to change course from a soft power budget to a hard power budget.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: And what he basically means by that is they're going to be big defense increases, spending increases, and they're going to be offsetting and sizable decreases in a lot of domestic discretionary programs. Are you comfortable -- and I want to talk about two in specifics, because what really gets down to is not big numbers, but specific programs. Are you comfortable with cutting the National Institutes of Health by 20 percent? Are you comfortable with cutting funding for Meals on Wheels, which supplies food to two -- and seniors depend on it -- to 2.5 million elderly Americans?

RYAN: Well, I would say, this is the very, very beginning of the budget process, a process I have worked with for many years. They submitted their budget. They will go through the congressional system.

What typically happens as a president submits their budget and then Congress takes it from there and makes necessary changes to that budget going forward. We are encouraged that we seeing an increasing in defense because we think our military has been hollowed out.

But I will say that NIH is something that's particularly popular in Congress. We just passed the Cures Act just this last December to increase spending in the NIH, we really think we're kind of getting close to some breakthrough discoveries on cancer and other diseases. So, that is something that I think and Congress you'll see probably some changes.

But with respect to any one of these types of programs, this is the beginning of a very long multi-stage process of budgeting and I do believe at the end of the day, we're going to honor these priorities, in particular our defense spending priorities. And so, I'm glad that the administration got going. I want financial pressure, I want spending caps, because that makes us focus on cutting spending that is wasteful spending.

There are a lot of programs that are duplicative, that are wasteful, that aren't measuring up to the goals that they are supposed to achieve. And you want that kind of fiscal pressure, so you go after waste, you go after fraud, you go after abuse and you move money from programs that aren't succeeding or working or achieving the goals to those that do, while we honor our priorities.

So, this is just the beginning of that long process, and I'm encouraged that we are up and starting with it. That's what I'm really mostly encouraged about is the White House gave us numbers so we can get started, that's what encourages me.

WALLACE: I got less than a minute left. I want to ask you finally about President Trump. We are now into week three of his allegation that that the Obama administration wiretapped Trump Tower. This week, he swept the Brits into it, he swept the Germans into it.

The question I have is, sir, and I don't expect you to comment on that -- but isn't this a big distraction from the very ambitious legislative agenda that you are trying to get through Congress?

RYAN: Yes, it's why I focused on the very ambitious agenda that I'm trying to get through Congress. I'm not really focused on these things. Only to the extent that we have a committee that is investigating, I think you have the chairman coming on next.

So, the president and Congress is already working on this. They've asked us to investigate this. We're going to investigate each and everyone of these things, all things related to Russia.

That investigation is ongoing, it's not complete. Let's see this investigation run its course. We have not seen evidence that you just described. I think you will probably get that same kind of answer from Chairman Nunes in a few minutes.

WALLACE: Would you like us to be over quickly?

RYAN: I want to get on with passing our agenda. And we are. So, I'm pretty -- I'm in a good place.

WALLACE: Mr. Speaker, thank you. Thanks for your time. And, of course, we'll be tracking what happens in the House this week. Thanks again, sir.

RYAN: You bet. Thanks, Chris.

WALLACE: Up next, we will bring in our Sunday group to discuss the chances that House Republicans will unite behind the GOP health care a plan.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

TRUMP: We are negotiating with everybody. It's a big, fat, beautiful negotiation and hopefully, we'll come up with something that's going to be really terrific.

SEN. CHARLES SCHUMER (D-NY), SENATE MINORITY LEADER: We are here today because we see something that a Republican colleagues in the House can't see. Trumpcare is a wreck.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: President Trump sounding optimistic about the GOP's health care legislation, while Senate Democratic leader Chuck Schumer slams it.

And it's time now for our Sunday group. GOP strategist Karl Rove, Dr. Ezekiel Emanuel, one of the architects of Obamacare, Neera Tanden, head of the liberal think tank, the Center for American Progress, and FOX News contributor Rachel Campos-Duffy.

Carl, let me start with you. Same question I started with Speaker Ryan. Will the House pass a version of repeal and replace this week? And how damaging, and how much of the Republicans had to respond to that CBO assessment score that 24 million fewer Americans would have health insurance under this plan in ten years?

KARL ROVE, GOP STRATEGIST: Well, it is a damaging number, but when you look under the surface of it, it starts with 14 million fewer people in the next years not having insurance who would otherwise have it. Virtually, all of those, the CBO says, are as a result of the end of the mandate. That is to say, the penalties that are inflicted upon people who don't buy insurance. And if they are not inflicted with a penalty, then they're not going to buy insurance.

So, the Republicans have got a different approach, which is, let's provide fair track tax treatment in the form of an advancable, refundable tax credit to the people who are self-employed, who don't get that kind of treatment, because they don't get their insurance from their employer, and the people and small businesses that don't get coverage. And the CBO has historically underestimated the effect of market choices like that, as it did in the Medicare Part D, and overestimated the impact of what a government mandate penalty would do.

(CROSSTALK)

WALLACE: For all of the conservatives in the House, who have had heartburn over this, do you think that they're going to hold their nose, mixing my metaphors here, and vote for it?

ROVE: Yes. I think, look, actually, I think that they started to come -- they wanted some things. They couldn't figure out what those things were, but they stumbled into a couple of them, and they are happy. I think the biggest one is, is that poor people who are on Medicaid who are able-bodied without children that states ought to be able to impose a work requirement that says if you want this government benefit, much like we did with welfare, you got to be looking for work or working in order to get the benefit. And I think that's made a lot of conservatives more comfortable.

WALLACE: Dr. Emanuel, for an architect of Obamacare, you have been surprisingly open, and we have discussed this in the last weeks, to at least the idea of changing -- amending the law. What do you think about where House Republicans seem to be headed with this bill?

DR. EZEKIEL EMANUEL, FOX NEWS CONTRIBUTOR: That's a disaster. By 2026, one in five Americans are not going to have insurance. That is worse than before the Affordable Care Act was created. That is not a place we want to be.

It's basically Australia with no insurance.

WALLACE: Let me --

(CROSSTALK)

EMANUEL: Wait a second. By the way, their notion of affordability, all right, we're going to bring down the premium. Let's say -- how are they going to bring down the premium? There is nothing in this bill about cost control. They're going to bring down the premium by not covering a variety of services.

WALLACE: They're saying a lot of things. They're going to bring down -- they say -- they're gong to bring down cost control --

(CROSSTALK)

WALLACE: Wait a minute, in other parts of the process and the regulations by Tom Price in the legislation. They also, you just heard Speaker Ryan say, they're going to boost the tax credit, so that will make it more affordable to the 65-year-old man I talked about, 64-year-old.

EMANUEL: Well, you're going to have to see what they're going to boost it by. But as your numbers show, they have to boost it by $10,000 and that doesn't seem to be in the cards for Mr. Ryan.

But more importantly I'd say, you're going to see the premiums may become down, but that's because they're not covering services and the deductibles are going to go up. So, net-net, it's actually going to be worse for people.

The Brookings Institute said that when you analyze this bill, premiums are going to go up on average 13 percent for Americans. That doesn't sound like a good deal for most Americans and especially the Americans that voted for Trump.

WALLACE: All right. You know what? I was going to talk about the budget. Let's just talk about this. Rachel?

RACHEL CAMPOS-DUFFY, FOX NEWS CONTRIBUTOR: I was just going to say, it's really hard to listen to this because you're the architect of the bill. This bill is not working. It's in a death spiral. You promised that people can keep their doctor. You promised that people can keep this --

(CROSSTALK)

EMANUEL: Excuse me. Can we just have some serious news? The CBO said says there's no death spiral.

WALLACE: Wait --

EMANUEL: That's not accurate.

CAMPOS-DUFFY: Wait a minute, first of all, the CBO is measuring what is before the House this week. The bill includes three parts. It includes what's going to happen when the HHS secretary does the things he's going to do to the bill and to regulations and also, the third part, which is really important, that's where they're going to take on across state lines, allow --

WALLACE: A bunch of other stuff.

CAMPOS-DUFFY: Exactly. But also, very important, tort reform, which is a huge driver.

(CROSSTALK)

WALLACE: Let's bring in -- no, let's -- Zeke, play fair.

(CROSSTALK)

NEERA TANDEN, CENTER FOR AMERICAN PROGRESS: Can I just say, I mean, just for your district, your husband's district, 45,000 people lose health insurance from this. CAMPOS-DUFFY: But, right now, Neera, people can't use the insurance they had because the premiums are going up and the deductibles are so high.

TANDEN: People had coverage that they will lose. And I think the essential promise here --

WALLACE: Wait, Neera, your ignoring what she said and the fact, which is that the premiums are going up and the deductibles are huge, so you have to pay enormous out of -- let me finish --

TANDEN: Yes, yes.

WALLACE: -- out-of-pocket expense before you even get the advantage of it. And you've got insurance companies all over the country that are pulling out. So, there's no choice.

TANDEN: The CBO did an analysis of both the Affordable Care Act today and compared it to the Ryan bill. So, that's what they looked at. And that's what people are looking at when they think 45,000 people are going to lose coverage.

The Affordable Care Act, the CBO said, is not collapsing. This is false. It is fake news from you guys. There are places that bring in.

(CROSSTALK)

WALLACE: Fake news --

TANDEN: There are places, premiums -- let me just finish. There are places premiums have increased, but the Affordable Care Act is stable. The reality is, that what unwinds --

WALLACE: Karl, go ahead.

TANDEN: -- the insurance market, what unwinds the insurance market is what Ryancare or Trumpcare will do. And this is the essential quandary (ph) of what we're going to face on Thursday, or what we're facing this week -- Trump voters --

WALLACE: All right.

(CROSSTALK)

TANDEN: No, let me just finish one point, Trump voters --

WALLACE: You've been finishing the whole --

TANDEN: No, no, let me just say one thing.

(CROSSTALK)

TANDEN: I would love to answer this. Donald Trump promised working-class people, and they relied on it, they would keep it. Now, he would like -- now, Paul Ryan put forward a bill that hurts them and he might have to change -- he might have to change.

ROVE: I'm ready to answer.

WALLACE: Go ahead.

ROVE: First of all, talk about promises. We were promised, Neera, your premiums are going to go down $2,500 for family of four.

TANDEN: Across the country.

ROVE: You can keep your plan, you can keep your doctor. All these wonderful things -- it's not going to not add a dime to the debts, and all of which --

TANDEN: It didn't add a dime to the debt.

ROVE: I didn't interrupt, so stop.

That turned out not to be true. This year, the average premium increase is 25 percent, on top of a double digit last year.

Now, I love how everybody was so quick to count CBO numbers. CBO said, looking at one-third of what Republicans are offering, that within two years, we will have a 10 percent decline in premiums under the Republicans. So, love it how they love the CBO number when it comes to 14 percent, love it how they don't love it --

(CROSSTALK)

EMANUEL: That's not accurate. Just let's make three quick points.

First of all, by 2020, premiums are supposed to go up 15 percent to 20 percent, and then by 2026, they will be down for younger people but up for older people. That's the first point.

The second point is, one of the ways they're going to drive your premiums down is by driving your deductibles off. And that is not a good thing.

WALLACE: Well, you guys know all about that.

EMANUEL: Wait a second, they're going to drive them up even higher, Chris.

WALLACE: OK.

EMANUEL: And the third point I would make is that this is not a bill that is actually going to be beneficial for people. They're going to throw a lot of people on Medicaid off coverage and they're going to transfer a lot of costs to states, which is going to put them in a very difficult spot that -- in cutting their enrollment.

ROVE: I love the newfound concern for younger people. To say all these older people are going to have the premiums go up. Well, their premiums are going up because Obamacare makes younger, healthier workers subsidized older, less healthy workers, and then why are we surprised that Obamacare is not getting the percentage of younger, healthier workers to make the system work?

Now, what is the answer to Obamacare? One of its leading architects has three suggested answers: increased payments to insurance companies so they can hide the premium increases, increased penalties on those without insurance, penalize people even more, and increased subsidies for those in the exchanges.

Now, I think Dr. Emanuel was pretty serious in these, but none of these is doing anything except throwing more money at a system that's broken.

EMANUEL: Karl, your plan, Speaker Ryan's plan has $100 million for insurance companies in the stability plan --

(CROSSTALK)

ROVE: -- even more --

TANDEN: No, not even more.

(CROSSTALK)

ROVE: And it saves over $300 billion --

(CROSSTALK)

WALLACE: We have the rest of the show -- no, we have the rest of the show to do. Take it into the panel room. We should put a separate camera in there so you could watch that. We're going to take a break here. We'll see you a little later.

Up next, the chair of the House Intelligence Committee, Devin Nunes, is here ahead of a big hearing tomorrow where FBI Director Comey will testify about Russia and the Trump campaign.

Man, that was intense.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WALLACE: Coming up, FBI Director Comey testifies before Congress tomorrow about the president's charge Trump Tower was wiretapped by Barack Obama.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

NUNES: I don't think there was an actual tap of Trump Tower.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: We'll get a preview of the hearing from the chair of the House Intelligence Committee, Devin Nunes, next.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK) WALLACE: A look at the cherry blossoms along the tidal basin here in Washington, were peak Bloom was delayed after this week's snowstorm.

Tomorrow, FBI Director Comey testifies before the House Intelligence Committee on the Trump campaign's alleged ties to Russia and claims by the president that Barack Obama wiretapped Trump Tower.

Joining me here in Washington is the man who will chair that hearing, California Congressman Devin Nunes.

Chairman Nunes, welcome back to FOX NEWS SUNDAY.

NUNES: Thank you.

WALLACE: You said earlier this week that you had, your words, "no evidence" of the Trump claim that he had been wiretapped in Trump Tower by President Obama during the campaign. Then, on Friday, you got a response to questions from the FBI on this issue of whether thy had any evidence of surveillance there. I know you can't say much about it, but based on what you receive from the FBI on Friday, do you want to amend your statement that there's no evidence of wiretapping?

NUNES: No. So I actually said this a couple of weeks ago that it was -- you know, the president doesn't go and physically wiretapped something. So if you take the president literally, it didn't happen.

I think the concern that we have is that are -- were there any other surveillance activities that were used unmasked (ph) the names. For example, we know that General Flynn's name was unmasked. And so, was there a physical wiretap of Trump Tower? No. But there -- there never was. And -- and the information we got on Friday continues to lead us in that direction.

WALLACE: Well, I just -- I just want to make that point because you -- you -- there is no evidence that there was any wiretapped -- I'm not talking with President Obama doing it, but his administration -- no evidence of any wiretapping of Trump Tower?

NUNES: No -- no -- there was no FISA warrant that I'm aware of to Trump -- to tap Trump Tower. That's correct.

WALLACE: And that's after you received this information?

NUNES: That's accurate.

WALLACE: OK. So then what's your point?

NUNES: So the other -- the other issue though that's still remaining out there is the unmasking of names and the leaking of names. And so there's a -- you know, we have a lot of surveillance activities in this country and I think the concern that the Trump administration has is, you know, were they actually using surveillance activities to know what they were up to, because we know that that happened with General Flynn. We know that his name was unmasked and we know that it was leaked out to the press. So the question is, did that happen --

WALLACE: Right, but -- but our -- but our understanding of that is that that was because you had regular surveillance, not you, but I mean the government had regular surveillance of the Russian ambassador, Sergey Kislyak. What I'm asking about is something -- and I'll get back to the unmasking in a second.

NUNES: Uh-huh.

WALLACE: There's this whole question of whether there was any surveillance, not wiretapping but any surveillance at Trump Tower. And I want to play what Donald Trump said this week. Here it is.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

TRUMP: We will be submitting certain things and I will be perhaps speaking about this next week. Wiretap covers a lot of different things. I think you're going to find some very interesting items coming to the forefront over the next two weeks.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: As I said, we're going to get to the unmasking issue, which is a serious issue, in a moment. But is -- do you know what he's talking about? Is there any evidence of any surveillance, electronic surveillance --

NUNES: Well, if he's talking about the unmasking of names, and so if there were other surveillance activities where names were picked up and then unmasking occurred, and that was spread throughout the intelligence community, that is very -- that is very possible, and we don't have the answers to those questions yet. I don't know if the president has those are not. But we had a deadline of Friday for the NSA, FBI and CIA to get us those names that were unmasked through the FISA system. We didn't get those names on Friday. So until we get those names, we can't rule this out.

WALLACE: You're going to have a hearing tomorrow. We've been talking about FBI Director Comey is going to be there. NSA Chief Mike Rogers is going to be there. What do you hope to learn at that hearing?

NUNES: Well, we're excited about this because for the first time the American people, and all the political parties now, are paying attention to the threat that Russia poses. So we're going to highlight that. We'll highlight the fact that we know that the Russians were trying to get involved in our campaign, like they have for many decades. They're also trying to get involved in campaigns around the globe and -- over in Europe. So I think it will be good to highlight that.

Secondly, we're worried about analytical integrity. We don't know how there were information changed and if information changed because in December, the beginning of December, the assessment was that, hey, the Russians were trying to go -- get into our election process and cause problems and sew doubt in our -- in our system. But then that changed a month later and they it said, no, no, no, that they were trying to help Donald Trump. So we need to get to the bottom of that.

And then also, you know, whether or not they did try to help Trump, and if any Trump associates or anyone else was involved.

WALLACE: I -- I guess -- because there's a little confusion here. You -- it's clear that Michael Flynn's conversation with the Russian ambassador were swept up by electronic intelligence and, as you say, unmasked. Here's the name of an American, and that's illegal, that was leaked to the public. Do we believe there was any specific -- well, do we know of anybody else other than Mike Flynn who was -- who was swept up in this?

NUNES: Well, you're -- you're right to point that out, because the one crime we know that's been committed is that one, the leaking of someone's name through the FISA system. That is -- that is a crime that's been committed. We don't know the answer to that. That's what we're trying to get to the bottom of. Where there any other names that were unmasked, leaked, and leaked out? We just don't know that yet.

WALLACE: Do we think there was any surveillance of people in Trump world, or do we think that there was surveillance of other people, like Ambassador Kislyak, and that these folks who were talking to them were incidentally swept up in the conversations, in the -- in the intercepts?

NUNES: Well, if you look at the folks that are working in the White House today that are involved in the -- in the Trump -- in the Trump administration, I don't think there's any but one there that's under any type of -- of -- of investigation or surveillance activities at all. When you consider -- when you look at what happened to General Flynn, it's very, very concerning. This is -- this is someone, you know, look, the president had the right to get rid of him. He's going -- he's not in the administration any longer, but he is -- was an American citizen. He was talking to the Russian ambassador. Talking to diplomats in this town, as you know, Chris, is something that happens -- occurs on a -- on a regular basis. I probably talk to a dozen -- a dozen diplomats a week. And, you know, we should not be going after our diplomats and making them into -- as if it's -- as if it's wrong to talk to diplomats in his town. That is his job.

WALLACE: I want to ask you -- it's a little bit confusing and I want to put -- try to button this down. Two bottom line questions. First, as the chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, as you sit here today before the hearing on March 20th, have you seen any evidence of any collusion between what I'll call Trump world, associates, of campaign officials, Trump world and the Russians to swing the 2016 presidential election?

NUNES: I'll give you a very simple answer. No.

WALLACE: No evidence of any collusion.

NUNES: No evidence.

WALLACE: And this is after talking -- getting this information from the FBI, after -- NUNES: Up to speed on everything I have up to this morning.

WALLACE: He --

NUNES: There's no -- no evidence of collusion.

WALLACE: Do you believe that there are elements inside the intelligence community or the FBI that are leaking information, like the name of Mike Flynn, like perhaps the fact that Attorney General Sessions met with the Russian ambassador to undercut the Trump presidency?

NUNES: I think that's pretty clear. And, in fact, I mean there's been --

WALLACE: Pretty clear what?

NUNES: It's pretty clear that that's happening. There's even been stories written about it in -- in numerous newspapers talking about how they said -- they left breadcrumbs around to hurt the Trump administration.

WALLACE: So you believe that there are people inside these intelligence communities --

NUNES: I don't think so anymore. I think it was largely people maybe who were there, had classified information, who are now no longer there and decided to leak it.

WALLACE: To what end?

NUNES: I think to hurt -- I mean clearly to leak Michael Flynn's name talking to the Russian ambassador. That was clearly designed to her General Flynn and -- and the president's national security advisor.

WALLACE: Do you -- I -- do you think this is all going to be cleared up with your hearing tomorrow or not?

NUNES: Well, this is the beginning. I mean what we're trying to get to the bottom of -- I mean this is just the beginning. Another week from now, a week from Tuesday, on the 28th, we have an additional hearing with at least three more witnesses. So we're trying to get to everyone who -- for lack of a better term -- was at the crime scene, and we're trying to bring them all in and see what they knew, when they knew it, if they know about the leaks, if they knew about General Flynn's his name being unmasked. These are all questions that we need to get to the bottom of.

WALLACE: But, to make it clear, when you talk about the crime scene, you're talking about the leaking of names of Americans that shouldn't have been leaked as part of our electronic surveillance.

NUNES: Yes (ph).

WALLACE: You're not talking about anything involving the Trump campaign?

NUNES: Because that's the only crime that we know has been committed right now. That we know. We know a law has been broken and we need to get to the bottom of it. As it relates to the Russians, we are happy to investigate it because I think Putin is a bad actor on the world stage.

WALLACE: Two quick questions on other issues. Secretary of State Tillerson has been traveling through the Middle East this week announcing a change in U.S. policy toward North Korea. Here he is.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

REX TILLERSON, SECRETARY OF STATE: Let me be very clear, the policy of strategic patience has ended. We're exploring the new range of diplomatic, security and economic measures. All options are on the.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: But, while Tillerson is in China, and here's a picture of it, North Korea has just tested a new rocket engine. A couple of questions, how urgent is the threat that North Korea is going to be able to put a nuclear warhead on an ICBM missile that could hit the U.S., and should we seriously consider the military option, whether it's a strike by the U.S. or getting North -- South Korea and Japan to boost their military capabilities?

NUNES: The closer that the North Korean regime gets to being able to deliver a nuclear weapon, the -- we're going to have to be in a position to take some type of preemptive strike. We hope that we -- it doesn't come to that. But this is -- this is an unhinged regime. You have 20 million people, you know, living in extreme poverty. And so I -- I'm actually very impressed. I've never met the -- the new secretary of state yet, but I am -- I am happy that we're getting off of this strategic patience, which was our last policy towards North Korea. And I think what -- what -- what -- at the end of the day here, something may have to be done because we can't afford to let a nuclear weapon go off in Seoul or Tokyo or the United States for that matter.

WALLACE: And, briefly, there's a -- a new story today from out of Turkey, in Turkey they are saying that the Trump administration is considering the extradition of Fethullah Gulen, an Islamic cleric, who has been in the country and Turkey wants to get back. They say he was the architect of the attempted coup against Turkish President Erdogan. Do you know anything about that?

NUNES: Yes, I find that hard to believe. The Erdogan government, he's becoming very authoritarian. NATO, for a long time, has been a strong ally of ours, but -- but they're becoming more and more worrisome in terms of actually being a reliable ally. And, you know, I don't know that we would extradite somebody like that. I haven't seen the evidence for that, that Gulen was involved in anything like that. If he was, I mean clearly that would be a different -- a different issue. But our relationship with Turkey is strained and I think it's going to become even more complicated as we -- as we begin to try to -- to get ISIS out of Iraq and Syria.
WALLACE: Chairman Nunes, thank you. Thanks for coming in. We covered a lot of territory today. Thank you, sir.

NUNES: Sure.

WALLACE: Up next, we'll bring back our group. They're still arguing about Obamacare, to discuss the upcoming showdown over President Trump's Supreme Court nominee as Democrats try to block him.

Plus, what would you like to ask the panel about the confirmation hearing for Judge Neil Gorsuch tomorrow? Just go to FaceBook or Twitter, @foxnewssunday, and we may use your question on the air.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

TRUMP,: As far as wiretapping, I guess, by, you know, this past administration, at least we have something in common perhaps.

REPORTER: Did you ever give him any reason to believe that he was wiretapped by the previous administration?

JEFF SESSIONS, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES: Um, look, um, the answer is no.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: President Trump digs in on his claim he was surveilled by the Obama administration, just as German Chancellor Angela Merkel was. But Attorney General Sessions unable to give his boss any backup.

And we're back now with the panel.

Karl, not only is the president standing by his claim that he was wiretapped by his predecessor, but this week, as we saw there, he swept the Germans into this, he swept the Brits into this with a White House report, or citing a Fox report that they had done some spying for the Obama administration on President Trump. How big a deal is this continuing controversy and how disruptive to a president getting his agenda through Congress?

ROVE: Well, it's a big deal publicly. I'm not certain how much it has to do with getting his agenda through, because most people outside of the confines of the West Wing are quick to dismiss this all. Look, we are in an age of paranoia and everybody's participating in it. You said we're in the third week of the president making these claims. We're in the 16th week of the Democrats making the claims of collusion between the Russians and the Trump campaign brought about Hillary Clinton's defeat.

I say a pox on all their houses. Let's stop it. It's in the hands of a couple of adults. You had one of them on, Devin Nunes. I was surprised, Adam Schiff, who has a reputation for sometimes being an overt partisan, he handled it in an adult way last week. Senator Burr, the chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee and the ranking Democrat Senator Warner are appearing to approach this in a -- in a thoughtful fashion. I -- I would hope the American people would leave it in their hands to -- to wrap this all up.

The only thing -- Chairman Nunes was right, the only thing we know is the name of one person has been leaked in violation of federal law. All the rest of this is conjecture of which there has been no evidence on either side whatsoever.

WALLACE: And that's General -- General Michael Flynn.

Dr. Emanuel, let me bring you into this. This isn't your area of expertise, but can this kind of thing get in the way of a president trying to get something as complicated as Obamacare, or in this case the replacement of Obamacare, through Congress?

EMANUEL: The whole thing is a distraction inside the West Wing and you see mainly a distraction by his people, who are trying to, you know, cover up without contradicting their boss. There's never been a shred of evidence, it's a baseless charge that, in fact, there was spying on the Trump Tower. And why we're devoting any attention to it on just, you know, I can make up something tomorrow. Chris Wallace, what did you embezzle? You know, it's ridiculous with no evidence.

WALLACE: Let me ask you -- let me ask you a question. Do you -- would you also say it's baseless, this charge, that there was collusion or at least if we have no evidence?

EMANUEL: Well, we know -- wait -- wait a second. We know about Russian hacking --

WALLACE: Yes.

EMANUEL: And we don't know the extent of it. And when -- until we get the extent of it. There, there's actually some evidence that there is hacking going on, and that -- and that is the important issue.

WALLACE: That's not my question -- sir, it's not my question. No, it isn't. My question is -- because we have known that for months now. The question -- the continuing mystery is, did the Trump campaign collude with the Russians? Do -- we don't have any evidence of that.

EMANUEL: I don't think that's the only question. The question is whether the Russians influence our election, and that is a very serious charge that we have not gotten to the base of it. And that, I do think, is worth looking at because we know they have acted very (INAUDIBLE).

WALLACE: Yes or no, is there any evidence of collusion? Yes or no?

EMANUEL: We don't at the moment.

WALLACE: OK.

EMANUEL: But we have reason to suspect it. TANDEN: Well, but, see, this is what I think this is an odd mystery, right, we have -- the intelligence community has issued a report saying the Russians tried to influence the election --

WALLACE: Right.

TANDEN: And did influence the election.

WALLACE: Right.

TANDEN: And the issue here is --

CAMPOS-DUFFY: But did not influence the outcome.

TANDEN: Said -- no, they did influence the outcome. Yes.

WALLACE: Well, no -- no, no, no, wait, wait, no, let's not talk about that. Let's -- let's talk about that --

TANDEN: But let me just --

WALLACE: But that -- we -- that's kind of settled.

TANDEN: It's not settled.

CAMPOS-DUFFY: Yes.

TANDEN: This is the issue. Those Democrats are literally just asking for public investigations of this issue to air because there hasn't been public discussion of this in -- amongst -- in the -- in any committee in which you can do that.

WALLACE: All right.

TANDEN: And that's the reason why I find it so weird that Devin Nunes (INAUDIBLE) --

WALLACE: All right, we're going to switch -- we're going to switch --

ROVE: This isn't an investigation. They want a 9/11 investigation because Hillary Clinton's loss was --

TANDEN: Not even that.

ROVE: Was -- Hillary Clinton's loss was the result, Schumer says, of a 9/11-style attack on American by the Russians. Here, let's be clear about something --

TANDEN: It's weird that they --

CAMPOS-DUFFY: Can I just say that --

ROVE: July 22nd, when these -- when the WikiLeaks began, she was ahead in the RealClearPolitics average by 2.6 points. On October 6th, when the second (INAUDIBLE) came out, she was (INAUDIBLE) -- WALLACE: All right. All right. Enough -- enough numbers. I want to talk about Neil Gorsuch.

TANDEN: This is like (INAUDIBLE) --

WALLACE: Neil Gorsuch.

TANDEN: (INAUDIBLE) this to be a real investigation.

WALLACE: Excuse me.

TANDEN: That's all anyone asks (INAUDIBLE).

WALLACE: Wow, this panel. I need a -- I need a -- I need a chair and a whip. Like a lion tamer.

CAMPOS-DUFFY: (INAUDIBLE).

WALLACE: Because there's nothing that is more important or longer-lasting than a president's nominee to the Supreme Court, who, if he gets on the court, can be there for 30 years. And this is the question of Neil Gorsuch. Democrats looking for some way to oppose him. Here they are.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. RICHARD BLUMENTHAL (D-CT), JUDICIARY COMMITTEE: I have demanded that he condemn Donald Trump's attacks on an independent judiciary. So far he has failed to do so. And I believe he should be held accountable in that hearing.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Now, we asked you for questions for the panel and we got a bunch on this issue of what should be done about the threat of a Democratic filibuster, which the Democrats are putting out there. Karen Springer tweets this, "can the Republicans just go to the nuclear option right away and get Gorsuch on the court right away?" What she's talking about is the fact that the GOP majority could change the rules, as the Democrats did back in 2013, they did it for lower court judges, the Democrats -- the Republicans could do it for Supreme Court nominees to make it 51 votes instead of 60.

EMANUEL: We should remember --

WALLACE: Wait, wait, wait.

Rachel.

CAMPOS-DUFFY: Look, they can go nuclear if they need to. Hopefully they won't have to. But here's the -- the thing. This week it's going to be like pouring salt in the words of Democrats because they are so angry that Donald Trump gets to pick this nominee and also potentially two or three during his presidency. And so they are going to pressure their -- Schumer and everybody else to complain about this, to try and block this, to have a filibuster. But the truth is, it will make them look like they're not main stream because I think once Gorsuch goes up for these hearings, everybody's going to see that this person is absolutely --

EMANUEL: Neil Gorsuch may be -- he may be a good judge, but he's --

CAMPOS-DUFFY: Neil Gorsuch is main stream, he's intelligent, he's brilliant and he's a --

EMANUEL: He's definitely intelligent. He may be a good judge. But the Republicans upset tradition. They were not conservative in this way. Ten months, Merrick Garland was there and the Republicans violated every tradition.

CAMPOS-DUFFY: Again, you want -- you want to re-litigate the election, just like you want to do with the Obamacare and --

TANDEN: Oh, my God.

(CROSS TALK)

ROVE: The tradition has been there's not been a presidential nominee of a -- to the Supreme Court has been approved in the last year of a presidency.

EMANUEL: The Republicans violated --

CAMPOS-DUFFY: We're not going to re-litigate the election.

ROVE: They upheld an 80 year tradition.

TANDEN: Exactly.

EMANUEL: No, and I --

ROVE: And -- and I --

EMANUEL: The country's 240 years old and they violated every tradition that the president has the right to nominate someone.

TANDEN: You're just making up these numbers over here.

WALLACE: All right, you --

TANDEN: I just really want to say --

WALLACE: You've got -- you've got literally 10 seconds.

TANDEN: The independent -- the independent judiciary is what's at stake here. And I think that's where the Democrats are going to focus.

WALLACE: I'm glad we settled all of this. Thank you, panel. See you next Sunday. This was a great panel.

EMANUEL: Thank you.

WALLACE: We'll have you all back.

Up next, our "Power Player of the Week." A behind the scenes look at one of the perks President Trump is using to win support for his agenda.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WALLACE: It's been the talk of Washington recently, even though this White House gem has been around since the 1940s. Now, the Trump team is inviting members of Congress to enjoy it and maybe pick up some support. Here's our "Power Player of the Week."

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

JENNIFER KORN, DEPUTY DIRECTOR, OFFICE OF PUBLIC LIAISON: Welcome to the Harry Truman Bowling Alley. Come on in.

WALLACE: I can't wait to -- my gosh.

KORN: We are in the basement of the executive Eisenhower Office Building.

WALLACE: Right.

KORN: And here is one of the pins that was signed by President Nixon himself.

WALLACE (voice-over): Jennifer Korn, who's deputy director of the Office of Public Liaison, was our guide to the White House Bowling Alley.

KORN: Here's President Truman and he was the first president to bring bowling to the White House.

WALLACE (on camera): Although he bowled in a suit, which is --

KORN: He did. Very formal.

WALLACE: I covered the White House for six years. I never knew this facility existed.

KORN: It's a wonderful facility, and we're really happy to have you here.

Let's go bowl.

WALLACE (voice-over): But before bowling, Jennifer told us about the alley's rich history.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: President Nixon was the most avid bowler of all presidents. It is said that he took four hours at a time to bowl.

WALLACE (on camera): Who can both for four hours straight?

KORN: I don't know, because I can't, but the president did. He's -- I guess that's the way he let off steam.
WALLACE (voice-over): There's even video of Nixon, his high score, 229. And some first ladies also hit the lanes.

WALLACE (on camera): Here's Lady Bird herself. I love they had their own bowling bags.

KORN: They had their own bowling bags and also see that they are bowling in their dresses.

WALLACE (voice-over): President Trump hasn't visited yet, but his staff uses the alley often to make its pitch to members of Congress and outside groups.

WALLACE (on camera): When you invite somebody to come bowl at the White House, how many of them say no?

KORN: So far we haven't had anybody say no.

WALLACE (voice-over): In addition to Congress this week, members of veteran service groups and the Hispanic Chamber of Commerce got to bowl. But does it translate into political support?

KORN: I think it's less about the actual bowling and the personal touch, the engagement.

WALLACE: House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi is playing the Grinch here, calling the Trump charm offensive offensive.

REP. NANCY PELOSI (D-CA), MINORITY LEADER: I think he's making fools of his own people quite frankly. You don't agree philosophically in what the legislation is, let's go bowling at the White House.

KORN: That's a very simplistic way to look at it. You can't pass good legislation without having a great conversations.

WALLACE: I couldn't put it off any longer, but I just want to say, I haven't bold in 15 years.

Not bad. But then I try to pick up the spare.

WALLACE (on camera): Oh, that was terrible. All right.

WALLACE (voice-over): Then it was Jennifer's turn.

KORN: Are you ready to talk about the Affordable Care Act now?

WALLACE (on camera): Oh, now, you've softened me up.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

WALLACE: She did not pick up that split.

During my time at the White House, I did not knock down many pins, but it did come away with this, a souvenir from what is officially called the Truman Bowling Alley. Now, a program note. Be sure to tune into Fox News Channel tomorrow for special coverage of the Gorsuch Supreme Court confirmation hearing. I'll join Bret Baier and Shannon Bream for a special edition of America's newsroom starting at 9:00 p.m. Eastern.

And that's it for today. Have a great week. And we'll see you next FOX NEWS SUNDAY.

CHUCK TODD:

This Sunday, credibility crisis. President Trump's unapologetic defense of his unsubstantiated claims.

PRESIDENT TRUMP:

As far as wiretapping, I guess, by, you know, this past administration, at least we have something in common perhaps.

CHUCK TODD:

Did President Obama wiretap Mr. Trump? The former head of U.S. intelligence:

JAMES CLAPPER:

There was no such wiretap activity.

CHUCK TODD:

The speaker of the House:

SPEAKER PAUL RYAN:

I have not seen any evidence of this.

CHUCK TODD:

The Republican House Intel chair:

A.REP. DEVIN NUNES:

We don't have any evidence that that took place.

CHUCK TODD:

The top Democrat on the House Intel committee:

REP: ADAM SCHIFF:

Thus far, we have seen no basis for that whatsoever.

CHUCK TODD:

Now F.B.I. Director James Comey is set to testify before the House tomorrow on those spy claims and on Russia's role in the 2016 election. The ranking Democrat on that Intel committee, Adam Schiff of California joins me this morning. Plus, that budget blueprint, sharp increases in spending for the military, sharp decreases in domestic programs for the poor.

MICK MULVANEY:

Look, we want to give you money for programs that don't work. I can't defend that anymore.

CHUCK TODD:

President Trump's budget director Mick Mulvaney is here this morning. And healthcare fight, can President Trump win over enough Republicans to get his bill through Congress? I'll talk to one Republican no vote this morning, Senator Susan Collins of Maine.

Joining me for insight and analysis are syndicated columnist George Will, Yamiche Alcindor of The New York Times, Robert Costa of The Washington Post, and anchor of BBC World News America, Katty Kay. Welcome to Sunday, it's Meet the Press.

ANNOUNCER:

From NBC News in Washington, the longest-running show in television history, celebrating its 70th year, this is Meet the Press with Chuck Todd.

(END TAPE)

CHUCK TODD:

Good Sunday morning. It was in the late '60s that the term "credibility gap" first gained currency, as people drew increasingly skeptical of President Lyndon Johnson's claims about U.S. progress and Vietnam. Now just two months into his presidency, Donald Trump is facing similar growing distrust. What began with claims on such trivial matters as whether his inauguration crowds were larger than President Obama's, they weren't, has metastasized into something far more consequential.

The president and the White House have spent more than two weeks redefining but never retracting Mr. Trump's insistence that President Obama had him wiretapped or surveilled. He even revived it on Friday, taking a swipe at the National Security Agency under President Obama for listening in on German Chancellor Angela Merkel's phone conversations.

And this week, the administration's policy of "ready, fire, aim," caused an international incident with the U.K. When the White House peddled a claim that Britain's spy agency worked with President Obama to spy on Mr. Trump. Tomorrow, F.B.I. Director James Comey will testify before the House Intelligence Committee where he will be asked about the spy claims, as well as about Russian meddling in the 2016 election. And the president's credibility issues are growing just as he's struggling to sell his agenda to Congress.

(BEGIN TAPE)

PRESIDENT TRUMP:

As far as wiretapping, I guess by, you know, this past administration, at least we have something in common perhaps.

CHUCK TODD:

President Trump, claiming yet again on Friday that President Obama had him wiretapped despite unambiguous statements from Republican leaders who would know.

SEN. MITCH McCONNELL:

There's no evidence of that.

REP. PAUL RYAN:

I have not seen any evidence of this.

REP. DEVIN NUNES:

We don't have any evidence that that took place.

CHUCK TODD:

Now the British are livid after Press Secretary Sean Spicer used the White House power to traffic in an unverified claim by a Fox News commentator that it was Britain's spy agency that monitored Mr. Trump on Mr. Obama's behalf.

ANDREW NAPOLITANO:

He's able to get it. And there's no American fingerprints on this.

SEAN SPICER:

He's able to get it, and there's no American fingerprints on this.

CHUCK TODD:

The British agency called it "nonsense, utterly ridiculous." The White House is refusing to apologize, quote, "I don't think we regret anything."

PRESIDENT TRUMP:

All we did was quote a certain very talented legal mind who was the one responsible for saying that on television.

CHUCK TODD:

He's referring to Fox commentator Andrew Napolitano. But on Friday, Fox News distanced itself. In the two weeks since Mr. Trump tweeted the allegations, the president and his aides just can't let it go.

SEAN SPICER:

The president's already been very clear that he didn't mean specifically wiretapping, he had it in quotes.

PRESIDENT TRUMP:

Let's see whether or not I prove it. I just don't choose do it right now.

CHUCK TODD:

President Trump's wiretapping claims are straining his credibility with Republicans just at the time he needs a united party to push his agenda through Congress. And two months into the Trump presidency, that agenda looks stuck in the mud. The president's revised travel ban blocked again, this time by federal judges in Hawaii and Maryland.

PRESIDENT TRUMP:

I think we ought to go back to the first one and go all the way, which is what I wanted to do in the first place.

CHUCK TODD:

Healthcare legislation, on the rocks with a House vote scheduled for Thursday, the president promises he is getting Republicans to yes.

PRESIDENT TRUMP:

Every single person sitting in this room is now a yes. And we made certain changes.

CHUCK TODD:

Those changes recommended by the House Budget Committee, giving states the option to require able-bodied Medicaid recipients to work in order to get medical care and further limiting Medicaid spending. But Freedom Caucus conservatives say they need further changes before they support the bill.

REP. MARK MEADOWS:

I've been very fully articulating my problems for about two weeks. So I don't know that any of those have changed.

CHUCK TODD:

But every time this bill is changed to placate conservatives, they risk losing another moderate in the Senate.

SEN. LISA MURKOWSKI:

We want to be there for our constituents who have received the benefit of Medicaid expansion.

(END TAPE)

CHUCK TODD:

In addition to healthcare, there's President Trump's budget. The budget blueprints calls for significant increases for the Defense Department, Homeland Security, and the Department of Veterans Affairs, while making huge cuts in what's known as discretionary spending, the EPA and the State, Agricultural, Labor Departments all in that part all take big hits in this budget outline. And joining me now is the director of the Office of Management and Budget, Mick Mulvaney. Sir, welcome to the show.

MICK MULVANEY:

Good morning, thanks for having me.

CHUCK TODD:

Very quickly, on this surveillancing, do you take the president at his word, that he or his associates were wiretapped by the president?

MICK MULVANEY:

Well, I saw the thing with Angela Merkel, I thought it was sort of tongue in cheek. But again, I'm the numbers guy. I'm sitting here doing the budget, so I'm really not involved in the wiretapping issue.

CHUCK TODD:

On one hand, are you concerned though that eroding credibility on that issue makes your job harder on Congress, on Capitol Hill?

MICK MULVANEY:

No, no. Listen, those of us who see and work with the president every day believe him, trust him, have no difficulties like the folks in the press do.

CHUCK TODD:

And you think this is just a press thing? You don't think that this is a difficulty for folks, that they can take the president at his word on healthcare? He's made some, "Hey, take my word for it, I'm going to make these changes," and some of these folks are out on a limb on it. They--

MICK MULVANEY:

Listen, I was in that meeting in the Oval Office, either Thursday or Friday, I lose track of the days. But the president had a very clear and cogent argument to these folks, got all these folks to commit to the bill. It was a very credible discussion, so no, I don't have any concerns of those things.

CHUCK TODD:

I'm going to start on the budget with something you said in March of 2013. You said this, you're not the first person to say something like this, but, "Remember, a budget is more than just a spending document. It is also a vision document." Explain the vision behind this budget that does lack a lot of domestic programs, some of which are ones that a lot of people benefit from and puts all the emphasis on security.

MICK MULVANEY:

Yeah, well, the vision is that this is what the president ran on. He's trying to do something that politicians are not very famous for, which is actually following through on his promises. So if you go back, which is what we did, and look at his speeches, look at his interviews, talk to him directly, and say, "What's important to you?" Look for that message the president was trying to deliver, that meant more money for defense, more money to secure the border, more money for law enforcement generally, and then more money for things like Veterans Affairs, veterans' healthcare, and private and public school choice.

And that's where we spent more money. At the same time, the president was very clear that he did not want this to add to the deficit this year. So when we added that $54 billion for defense, we took that money from other places. So that's the vision. More money for what the president said, without adding to the deficit.

CHUCK TODD:

But he also said, "We're going to take care of those people." He's not going to let his people go untaken care of. And there is, look, you've seen them, it's story after story of just specific programs. You can take Appalachia, programs that benefit his voters.

MICK MULVANEY:

Sure.

CHUCK TODD:

That he is taking a whack at here. Why do that?

MICK MULVANEY:

And some of the stories are just either grossly wrong or nearly grossly wrong, all the stories about how we cut Meals on Wheels. I think the program that we proposed to eliminate regarding Meals on Wheels accounts for 3 percent, 3 percent of the Meals on Wheels funding across the nation. But step back, and talk about--

CHUCK TODD:

But you're getting rid of the full block grant. You're getting rid of the whole block grant that that provides.

MICK MULVANEY:

But the block grant only provides 3 percent of Meals on Wheels money. And that didn't get very broadly reported. But step back to what you asked the question, which is what about the Trump voters. The president knows who his voters are. His voters are folks who pay taxes as well. And I think for the first time in a long time, you have an administration that is looking at the compassion of both sides of the equation.

Not just the compassion in terms of where the money goes, but the compassion in terms of where the money comes from. Could we, as an administration, could I as a budget director, look at the coal miner in West Virginia and say, "I want you please to give some of your money to the federal government so that I can give it to the National Endowment for the Arts?"

And I just think we finally got to the point in the administration where we couldn't do that. The debt is so significant, you owe $60,000 to the government, so do I in terms of the debt. And the president said, "Look, let's take care of both sides of the equation."

CHUCK TODD:

All right, but let's go to some of these cuts seem to be counterproductive to the president's message, for instance, on infrastructure. You want to do a bunch of spending on infrastructure at some point, but you're cutting the Advanced Technology Vehicle Manufacturing Program, Manufacturing Extension Partnership, that provides assistance to small and midsized manufacturers to get off the ground, to create jobs in these very counties that need the jobs created. Why cut these programs and why do it before you've even come up with your infrastructure plan?

MICK MULVANEY:

Sure, because when we looked at the infrastructure, we know we're working on a plan to come out later in this year. We think we'll do health reform, I think, this week, as a matter of fact in the House. I think tax reform after that. And that moves infrastructure probably to sometime around summer or early fall.

And so what we did with this budget was go through and find out where we thought the infrastructure money was not being spent as efficiently as it possibly could and said, "Okay, let's take it out of the discretionary budget with the intention of putting it back into the infrastructure bill," and that's exactly what we did. We think it's a better allocation, a better use of Americans' resources.

CHUCK TODD:

I want to talk though about the issue, you said that one of the president's goals was not to add to the deficit as it is. But this budget will have a deficit. Is that fair to say?

MICK MULVANEY:

Sure. The deficit before we came into office was going to be $488 billion this year, according to the Congressional Budget Office. And after we spent all of this additional money on defense, on border enforcement, law enforcement, veterans, the deficit will be the same. So we did is we plussed up the spending, we increased the spending on the president's priorities without adding to that number.

CHUCK TODD:

All right. But I want to play something, this is Candidate Donald Trump throughout the last year.

(BEGIN TAPE)

PRESIDENT TRUMP:

I do want a balanced budget. We owe $19 trillion, we've got to start paying it down. We've got to start balancing budgets.

These people are talking about balancing budgets in 35 years from now. We can do it, believe me, much quicker. We can do it quickly.

(END TAPE)

CHUCK TODD:

He even made a pledge to get rid of the debt in eight years. Okay, if you're going to do this very, very quickly, nothing in this budget goes close to balance. The fact that you're just even doing neutral to what the deficit was last year is not progress.

MICK MULVANEY:

Keep in mind what a budget blueprint is, and this is fairly traditional, Chuck, for the first year of a new administration. Obama did it, Bush did it. What this is is a spending outline and all it is, as you mentioned in the intro, is the discretionary spending part of the budget.

That's only about, oh, I don't know, 25 percent of what the government spends. The other 75 percent roughly is the mandatory, what some people call entitlement spending. In May, we'll be introducing the full budget, which will address the ten-year budget window, tax flows, larger policy changes, healthcare reforms.

CHUCK TODD:

Are you pledging a balanced budget in May?

MICK MULVANEY:

No, we won't be able to balance the budget this year, but we're working on try to get it to balance within the ten-year budget window, which is what Republicans in the House and the Senate have traditionally done in the last couple of years.

CHUCK TODD:

So the goal is to have a balanced budget within ten years, but basically that means you will add to the debt every single year in the next ten years.

MICK MULVANEY:

That's correct. It's very difficult, and we've been talking about this, you and I have talked about this.

CHUCK TODD:

I know, that's not what Candidate Trump said. Candidate Trump said this is going to be very easy. Does it turn out this is not easy? This is complicated too?

MICK MULVANEY:

It is a very complicated budget process when your entitlements, your mandatory spending is driving most of your budget deficit. For example, you could cut the Agriculture Department to zero, H.H.S. to zero, HUD to zero, the F.B.I. to zero, and you'd still have a deficit this year. So over the course of the next decade, we'll have to look at the mandatory spending side in order to figure out a way to make changes to the way we spend money.

CHUCK TODD:

Have you figured out how to pay for the trillion dollar infrastructure yet?

MICK MULVANEY:

No, but in all fairness, there's some great ideas, things that I think-- one of the neat things about having a business man in the office and all of these folks come from the private sector, is they brought ideas that I don't think government has ever contemplated before.

We're talking about public/private partnerships, talking about ways to sort of capitalize future revenue flows, really creative ideas. So, listen, I'm a deficit hawk. I think it's why I got the job. But the more and more I hear about the infrastructure plan, the more comfortable I'm getting.

CHUCK TODD:

Speaking of being a deficit hawk, the debt ceiling, we hit it. On Friday, extraordinary measures by the Treasury secretary will mean a couple more months. You were somebody that was-- you were a tough nut to track on the debt ceiling when you were Congressman Mulvaney.

MICK MULVANEY:

Yup.

CHUCK TODD:

Why should people who were like-minded with you, who basically said, "Hey, look, I'll give you that debt ceiling, but I want real cuts, I want real deficit reduction, I want a real plan." I think at one point, you said, "I'll raise the debt ceiling in exchange for a balanced budget." You're not going to be making that ask this time, are you?

MICK MULVANEY:

I voted to raise the debt ceiling before, as most people in Congress have, traditionally, you back to the 1920s, and the 1930s, and 1940s, the debt ceiling debate has been used to try and sort of step back and say, "Okay, why do we have a deficit problem? Why do we have a debt problem, and how can we fix it?" So we'll be coming forward with his ideas to raise the debt ceiling, but at the same time, try to address some of those long-term reasons that we have a debt in the first place.

CHUCK TODD:

You're not somebody that voted for a lot of budgets when you were in Congress. This doesn't look like a budget Congress Mulvaney would have supported, because why would you support keeping the deficit? I feel like Congress Mulvaney would not be supporting the numbers that this budget shows.

MICK MULVANEY:

It's a fair question. But keep in mind that the administration is different than members of the Hill, members of the House and the Senate. Every House member, as I used to be, has a constituency, that we have a group of people back home we represent. Senators represent the whole state. There's also a lot of special interests, a lot of lobbying involved.

The president's not beholden to any of that. The president represents everybody. And believe me, consultants were consulted on this, lobbyists were not, special interests were not, this is a budget for the entire nation, because that's who he represents.

CHUCK TODD:

As you put together this budget, did you look back on some of your votes and go, "Hmm, maybe I shouldn't have voted that way"?

MICK MULVANEY:

No. I've always thought that I do the best job I could to represent the folks in South Carolina. But now I'm the president's budget director, and I think we put out a really, really good budget.

CHUCK TODD:

All right. I want to wrap up with one final question. When will you be able to propose a balanced budget? What year?

MICK MULVANEY:

I don't know yet. We're getting into that now. By May, I think it's mid May we're shooting for right now, we'll have that larger budget which puts a little bit more--

CHUCK TODD:

You think you can do it in the first term?

MICK MULVANEY:

--flesh on the bone. I don't know yet. I honestly don't, because we don't know what healthcare reform will look like, what it will do to the budget, we don't know what tax reform will look like, will do to the budget. We haven't finished the infrastructure program yet. Those are the really, really big-picture items that we won't know more about for a couple months.

CHUCK TODD:

All right, Mick Mulvaney, I'll have to leave it there, the director of Office and Management Budget. Thanks for coming on and sharing your views. Appreciate it.

MICK MULVANEY:

Thanks for having me.

CHUCK TODD:

Turning now to the issue of healthcare, President Trump is working hard to get the Republican support in the House, and that healthcare plan to get through the House. But the Obamacare replacement does face some tough opposition in the Senate as well. If all 48 senators who caucused with the Democrats vote no right now, as expected, the president can only afford to lose two Republicans.

Right now, there are four Republican no's, Rand Paul, Mike Lee, who say the bill is too generous, and Dean Heller and Susan Collins, who argue the bill is too harsh. And Senator Susan Collins of Maine joins me now from Bangor. Senator Collins, welcome back to the show.

SEN. SUSAN COLLINS:

Thank you.

CHUCK TODD:

You were very tough on the House bill. You were unambiguous when it came to your no vote on that House bill. So very simply, what would it take to get you from no to yes?

SEN. SUSAN COLLINS:

We have to deal with three issues. The first is coverage. Under the House bill, 14 million Americans would lose coverage next year. That rises to 24 million over the next decade. Second, we have to do something about the fact that the House bill disproportionately affects older, rural Americans.

The Congressional Budget Office has estimated that a 64 year old who is earning $26,500 a year would see an increase in his or her costs from $1,700 to $14,600. That is unaffordable. And third, we have to do something about the Medicaid changes would shift billions of dollars of costs to the state, to hospitals, and to other people who are insured.

CHUCK TODD:

Do you believe that healthcare is a right? And if so, that it is a right that the government is responsible for fulfilling?

SEN. SUSAN COLLINS:

I believe that as a practical matter, people have a right to healthcare in that if they're sick and they go to a hospital, they're not going to be turned away. In fact, federal law requires the hospitals to treat someone who comes to an emergency room. But that is the least cost-effective way to treat an individual who does not need emergency-room care. So there's a lot that we can do to reduce the cost of healthcare by, for example, using managed care for the Medicaid program.

CHUCK TODD:

Let me ask you a couple questions on the president's budget. Is there any part of the president's budget that you support?

SEN. SUSAN COLLINS:

Yes, I do think that we need an increase for our veterans and that we need an increase in military spending because readiness has really suffered. But I think we may have to do a more gradual increase. One of the most disturbing parts of the president's budget is his slashing the funding for the National Institutes of Health.

We have been making tremendous progress in increasing N.I.H.'s budget and that has helped us to develop effective treatments and new cures for very expensive diseases. If we're serious about reducing healthcare costs, the last thing that we should be doing is cutting the budget for biomedical research.

CHUCK TODD:

Where do you get the money though? I mean, I think that's going to be the fundamental question is that, you know, there's a lot of these programs that I think a lot of people can individually make a case for. And I think what the White House would say is, "Hey, some of these, maybe they are good programs that could be done better, but we have a financial problem in this country. We have a rising national debt. We can't seem to get out from under an annual deficit." Where do we find the money? Do we have, for instance, can we afford a massive tax cut?

SEN. SUSAN COLLINS:

We do have to scour the budget. And tax reform does not necessarily mean that we're going to have a significant reduction in revenue. It's possible to come up with a tax reform bill that is more pro-growth, simpler, and fairer, and does not substantially reduce revenues.

Senator Bill Cassidy and I have a healthcare bill, and we're looking at different paid-fors for that bill, including some that were included for the Affordable Care Act, but some others as well. So we need to scour the budget, there are duplicative programs that could be combined. We need to look at everything. But I'm worried about the outlines of the budget that have been submitted. I would point out that I've never seen a president's budget make it through Congress unchanged.

CHUCK TODD:

Yeah, it never does. Yeah, that's for sure. Let me ask you about the president and the issue of credibility. He continues to believe that he was somehow either he or his associates were wiretapped or under surveillance and that it was ordered by President Obama. You also have access to various intelligence. Is there any way that statement to your knowledge is true?

SEN. SUSAN COLLINS:

I have seen no evidence supporting that statement. And what we need is evidence. If the president has evidence of that, I would encourage him to turn it over to the House and Senate Intelligence Committee. We're in the midst of a big investigation of Russian activities in our country. And we would want to look at this allegation as well.

CHUCK TODD:

Can you take the president at his word?

SEN. SUSAN COLLINS:

Yes. I mean, do I think the president gets everything right? No. But I want President Trump, just as I've wanted every other president, to be successful. Because he is America's president. Now that doesn't mean that I support his policies, and it doesn't mean that I'm going to be with him when I think he's wrong, or has misstated what the facts are.

CHUCK TODD:

If he's wrong about this allegation, Congressman Tom Cole said that President Trump owes President Obama an apology. Do you concur?

SEN. SUSAN COLLINS:

Well, I'd like to first get to the bottom of this before saying what should be done. I don't know the basis for President Trump's assertion. And that's what I wish he would explain to us on the Intelligence Committee and to the American people. And I do believe he owes us that explanation.

CHUCK TODD:

All right, Senator Susan Collins, Republican from Maine, I will leave it there. Senator Collins, thank you for coming on the show, sharing your views.

SEN. SUSAN COLLINS:

Thank you.

CHUCK TODD:

When we come back, tomorrow big day in Washington. Hearings begin for Supreme Court nominee Neil Gorsuch and F.B.I. Director James Comey testifies on Russia's role in the 2016 election and those wiretap claims made by President Trump likely will come up. We'll be right back.

COMMERCIAL BREAK

CHUCK TODD:

Welcome back, panel is here. Syndicated columnist, George Will, he's making his 52nd appearance on Meet the Press, but it's his first since 1981. Where've you been? You know, I don't know, have you been on some other show that I never, don't think about?

Yamiche Alcindor of The New York Times, BBC America anchor Katty Kay, and Robert Costa of The Washington Post, welcome to you all. George, I will give you the first word, and that is on the president's credibility. Is it-- At what point does it become a problem on Capitol Hill when you're trying to sell healthcare and sell this budget?

GEORGE WILL:

It becomes a problem immediately, and there's a much bigger credibility problem down the road. This week, Secretary Tillerson in the Far East, in Korea, obliquely but clearly raised the possibility of preemptive war against the ballistic missile program and nuclear weapons program in North Korea.

That means there's a not-trivial possibility that sometime in the life of this term, this presidential term, the president will have to come to the country and say, "We have to do something dangerous and difficult and even morally ambiguous because the intelligence services tell me X, Y, and Z." And the country's going to say, "Wait a minute, those are the people we don't trust and you don't trust. And we're not sure about you particularly." So it's hard to hermetically seal the loss of credibility.

CHUCK TODD:

Robert, do they understand this, or are they not thinking about this?

ROBERT COSTA:

My sources inside of the White House tell me that the president reviews news organizations' information, sometimes even more than intelligence information.

CHUCK TODD:

So we're more important than the presidential daily brief?

ROBERT COSTA:

Well, he gets the presidential daily brief, but if you look at the tweets a few weeks ago that started this whole wiretapping situation, it was because of a Breitbart article, my sources tell me, that was put in front of the president. Now he's watching Judge Napolitano on Fox News, and he's digesting all of this information rather than just the intelligence brief, and he's disseminating it publicly.

CHUCK TODD:

Katty, I just think about him with these House Republicans this week going, "No, no, no, don't worry, I'm going to make these fixes for you. You have my word on it." Okay.

KATTY KAY:

And the question is, how valuable is that word, which is what we have had members of both Republican and Democratic parties asking quite publicly this week when they refuted from the Senate Intelligence Committee the idea that there had been wiretapping, effectively, that the president, and it was very interesting to hear Susan Collins there, she wouldn't actually directly answer your question, "Do you trust him," but she says, "Do I think everything he says is right? No I don't." That's a pretty precarious position for a president to be in.

CHUCK TODD:

By the way, it was interesting to me, I thought this observation in The New York Times, Yamiche, Jeremy Shapiro, a research director for European Council on Foreign Relations, he said this, "It's very easy to have a good meeting with Trump, it's very pleasant and he's very pleasant in person. He'll promise you the world, and 48 hours later, he'll betray you without a thought. He won't even know he'll be betraying you." Sort of this idea that you just, you don't know when to take the president at his word.

YAMICHE ALCINDOR:

And that means that our allies, and the people that are not our allies are sitting down with Donald Trump and again, they might have a great meeting with him, but as soon as they get on the plane to go back to their respective countries, they can already tell that he might betray them. And I think that was really interesting too when I was waiting for Senator Collins to say, "I really do trust him. He's someone who when he says something, he's going to do it. He made these promises, I believe in these promises."

She said nothing that even came close to that. And I think when I think about the credibility issue as a whole, I think about the fact that before he was president, before he walked into the Oval Office, this is someone who also came into politics because he thought that President Obama wasn't born in the United States.

He is someone who also said that the Central Park Five were still guilty. I think that those things are things that are not lost on people, including his own party. I think that it would be somewhat foolish to only think about the fact that these are the credibility issues he has.

KATTY KAY:

You know, you've had exactly that with two very important American allies. Theresa May came here and she thought she had a good meeting. She got on the plane, back to Europe, wakes up, and the executive order has been issued. She felt she had been stabbed in the back.

I suspect exactly like Shapiro says, Trump never even thought about that. They were apologized to this week over the issue of whether G.C.H.Q. had spied on the president. And then I don't know about you, but if you apologize to your wife and then you roll back the apology, it never goes down very well. You're left in a worse position than you were originally.

GEORGE WILL:

When Mr. Trump was standing next to Angela Merkel, treating this wiretapping as a kind of flippantly and even some would say as a kind of joke, he was standing next to someone who grew up in East Germany, where the Stasi was listening all the time. And it's not funny to those people.

CHUCK TODD:

Not to her.

GEORGE WILL:

And probably won't be funny to Americans over time.

ROBERT COSTA:

One thing I keep hearing from people in the foreign police community, diplomats, is they wonder who's going to actually shape this White House in the coming months. We know Bannon, Steve Bannon, the chief strategist is there, this populist, but you look at this rising force within the White House, he wrote about it in today's Post, Dina Powell, one of the new national security advisors from Goldman Sachs, Gary Cohn from Goldman Sachs.

CHUCK TODD:

The New Yorkers.

ROBERT COSTA:

The New Yorkers. And they're--

CHUCK TODD:

Oh, the New York liberals.

ROBERT COSTA:

Well, and Gary Cohn's a registered Democrat and they're seen as a more moderate force. And a lot of people in the foreign policy world are saying, "Can Dina Powell, can Gary Cohn, can they have more influence in the coming months?"

CHUCK TODD:

We'll see. All right, we're going to discuss this. I wanted to get to healthcare. Now we're going to do a little healthcare in a second, when you guys come back. But first, the House Intelligence Committee does hear from F.B.I. Director James Comey on Russia tomorrow and about those wiretap claims. The leading Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, Adam Schiff joins me next for a preview.

COMMERCIAL BREAK

CHUCK TODD:

When FBI Director James Comey testifies before the House Intelligence Committee tomorrow. We can expect to hear about two stories that have dominated the news. 1) Evidence that the Russians interfered with the 2016 election, perhaps on behalf of the Trump campaign and 2.) the committee has asked the FBI to turn over any evidence it has to support President Trump's allegations that President Obama wiretapped Trump Tower prior to the election.

Congressman Adam Schiff is the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee. You will see him a lot tomorrow. And he joins me here now for a preview. Congressman Schiff, welcome back to the show.

REP. ADAM SCHIFF:

Thanks. Great to be with you.

CHUCK TODD:

Let me start with your two witnesses tomorrow are going to be the FBI director and the National Security Agency Director Mike Rogers. What do you hope - what light will be shed tomorrow, do you hope?

REP. ADAM SCHIFF:

I think for a lot of Americans this will be the first time to really tune in to exactly what the Russians did and what the investigation involves and I'd like to walk through with both directors: What do we know about the Russian operation? What was its breadth?

REP. ADAM SCHIFF:

We know it was hacking and dumping of documents. We know their slick use of their media campaign. But more than that I think we want to share with the country why we're so concerned about the issue of US person involvement. Were there US persons who were helping the Russians in any way. Was there any form of collusion? And what can we do to protect not only ourselves in the future and our allies who are facing the same Russian onslaught right now?

CHUCK TODD:

But if this is an ongoing investigation by the counter-terrorism unit in the FBI. What do you think Dir. Comey can say publically?

REP. ADAM SCHIFF:

Well, on the issue of collusion he'll probably be the most limited in what he can share, but there's a lot he can tell us about the Russian motivations for their intervention in our election, how the Russians operate in Europe, what techniques they use and what we should be on the lookout for in our investigation in Europe and other places we've seen them use blackmail, use compromise, use the natives of those foreign countries that they're intervening in, how they use paid social media trolls, so the full range of Russian intervention and what that looks like. So I think fleshing out why this ought to matter to Americans. I think people need to understand we are in a global war of ideas. It's not communism vs. capitalism, but it is authoritarianism vs. democracy and Putin is very much at the vanguard of that autocratic movement and that ought to concern all of us.

CHUCK TODD:

Let me ask you about - you received information on Friday from the Department of Justice about President Trump's claims on wiretapping. What can you tell us? Were you satisfied with the information they provided?

REP. ADAM SCHIFF:

Well, I got a classified briefing on their response. They delivered it after most of us had left town. But once again no evidence to support the President's claim that he was wiretapped by his predecessor. And you know, I have a lot of respect for Susan Collins, but I have to differ with her on this, she said we need to get to the bottom of this. We are at the bottom of this.

CHUCK TODD:

Is there any bottom? We are at the bottom?

REP. ADAM SCHIFF:

There is nothing at the bottom.

CHUCK TODD:

Will Director Comey say that definitively tomorrow, do you expect?

REP. ADAM SCHIFF:

I expect that he will. And I hope that we can put an end to this wild goose chase because what the president said was just patently false. And the wrecking ball it created now has banged into our British allies and our German allies, it's continuing to grow in terms of damage, and he needs to put an end to this.

I suspect what's really at root here, Chuck, is this is just how the president does business. Now maybe this is the way he conducted his real estate business with half-truths and sometimes no-truths, and a lot of bluster. That, in my opinion, is no way to run a business. But it's an even worse way to run a country.

It's dangerous to us, it's already alienating allies, and as George Will so correctly pointed out, when there is a crisis over North Korea or Iran or whatnot, and every president has one in their term, we need to be able to believe our president and he's making it very, very difficult.

CHUCK TODD:

I want to get to the point of, look, collusion is sort of what hasn't been proven here between whatever the Russians did and the Trump campaign. In fact, the former acting director of the C.I.A., Mike Morell, who was a supporter of Hillary Clinton, he essentially reminded people, took Director Clapper at his word on this show who said, "There has been no evidence that has been found of collusion." Are we at the point of, at what point do you start to wonder if there is a fire to all this smoke?

REP. ADAM SCHIFF:

Well, first of all, I was surprised to see Director Clapper say that, because I don't think you can make that claim categorically, as he did. I would characterize it this way, at the outset of the investigation, there was circumstantial evidence of collusion. There was direct evidence, I think, of deception.

And that's where we begin the investigation. Now I don't want to prejudge where we ultimately end up, and of course, there's one thing to say there's evidence. There's another thing to say we can prove this or prove it beyond a reasonable doubt, or there's enough evidence to bring to a grand jury for purposes of criminal indictment.

But there was certainly enough for us to conduct an investigation. The American people have a right to know, and in order to defend ourselves, we need to know whether the circumstantial evidence of collusion and direct evidence of deception is indicative of more.

CHUCK TODD:

Well I want to get to the witness list here. You have subpoena power if you choose to use it.

But you and Congressman Nunes need to come to an agreement on that. Is he willing to use subpoena power?

REP. ADAM SCHIFF:

He's going to have to be willing to use subpoena power, because there will be people we need to bring in before the committee who may not be willing witnesses. And if we're going to do this credibly, and right now, we're the only game in town, we and the Senate Intelligence Committee, we're going to need the power of compulsion.

You know, I still think we have a lot of spade work to do before that. You don't want to bring the witnesses in before you've reviewed the evidence that you want to question them with. You may only get one shot at the witnesses. But we're going to have to do that.

CHUCK TODD:

But you guys seem far behind. The Senate Intel Committee has already been asking Roger Stone, a one-time advisor of President Trump, who admitted some at least communication with Julian Assange of WikiLeaks. He's been ordered to preserve documents, sort of to make sure he doesn't destroy any documents, sort of, perhaps he is going to be subpoenaed by them. Have you done that with any, have you formally sent letters to any potential witnesses to say, "Hey, you need to make sure you have saved any documents related to the campaign or Russia"?

REP. ADAM SCHIFF:

You know, I think we were the first to send letters to the U.S. government to tell them to preserve evidence.

CHUCK TODD:

What about outside fols? So Mike Flynn, Carter Page, Roger Stone?

REP. ADAM SCHIFF:

We have not yet sent letters to individuals. And I think it's a good practice. I'm not sure that if you have someone who wants to hide, that that letter's going to have the effect that it ought to. But nonetheless, there is a great deal that we are doing. And I think in some respects, we are ahead of where this Senate investigation is, in some respects, they're ahead of where we are.

I do think, look, at the end of the day, the real question where the rubber will really hit the road, is as you suggest, when we have to use compulsion to get documents that we need, to bring in witnesses. I hope the answer is going to be yes from the majority. I also do think though--

CHUCK TODD:

But right now, you have not been given that authority?

REP. ADAM SCHIFF:

Well, we haven't asked for it.

CHUCK TODD:

Or you haven't asked for it? Okay.

REP. ADAM SCHIFF:

To subpoena certain witnesses. But we will be. There are a lot of witnesses that we're going to want to--

CHUCK TODD:

Devin Nunes agrees with you on this?

REP. ADAM SCHIFF:

Well, he's going to have to. Otherwise we really can't do our job.

CHUCK TODD:

Which means he doesn't yet agree with you on it?

REP. ADAM SCHIFF:

Oh, you know, I don't want to say that.

CHUCK TODD:

Okay.

REP. ADAM SCHIFF:

You know, we hammered out a very detailed agreement that allows us to look into issues like collusion with U.S. persons, people in the Trump campaign. That's what we wanted, that's what we got, and we have to hold him to that commitment.

CHUCK TODD:

Adam Schiff, the top Democrat on House Intel, we'll be watching your hearing tomorrow. Thanks for coming on today.

REP. ADAM SCHIFF:

You bet.

CHUCK TODD:

When we come back, the one big thing that may be more responsible than anything else for our current state of polarization in American politics.

And before we go to break, this note. Centuries from now, when rock-n-roll is merely one chapter in the history books, there may only be one name that you have time to associate with rock-n-roll.

And that name may very well be Chuck Berry. He was the genius who created the kind of music that paved the way for performers like Elvis Presley and countless other white rockers to become megastars. The writer of such rock-n-roll classics like Johnny B. Goode and Roll Over Beethoven. Chuck Berry died yesterday at the age of 90.

COMMERCIAL BREAK

(BEGIN TAPE)

CHUCK TODD:

Welcome back, Data Download time. And an issue I've been spending quite a bit of time on: how the misuse of big data is destroying the American political system. Campaigns traditionally aim to win the middle, and if you won the middle, you won the election. Now campaigns are using or abusing big data to identify and mobilize like-minded voters, rather than using it to make arguments that change minds. So how bad has this polarization gotten in the last twenty years?

According to Pew, in 1994 there was a good deal of ideological overlap between the two parties. Thirty six percent of Republican voters were more liberal than the typical Democrat, and thirty percent of Democrats were more conservative than the typical Republican.

Today, no longer the case. In 2014, just eight percent of Republicans, six percent of Democrats, were more liberal or conservative than the members of the opposite party. And guess what? We've seen the same shift among our elected officials. Based on a National Journal analysis of voting records, in 2002 there were 137 House members who fell in the ideological middle ground. With voting records somewhere between the most conservative Democrat and the most liberal Republican. In 2013 that number was down to four. Let's go to the Senate. 2002 there were seven members in that middle ground. 2013? Zero.

So as you can see, in the last fifteen years we've seen a complete hollowing out of the political center. And this coincided with the advent of microtargeting in 2004, then advanced by team Obama, and now, of course, everybody uses it. Look, the electorate and politicians alike used to be conditioned to know that the middle mattered. That's why big deals in Washington were bipartisan. Tax reform in the eighties, welfare reform in the nineties. Flash-forward to 2010, Democrats pass health care without a single Republican vote, and right now Republicans appear poised to try to do it the same way.

But look, there is good news in this. Big data can be used to fix the very problems it helped create, as long as there is a political will to do it. The incentive structure has to change where we persuade the middle again, because then elected officials who win by persuasion suddenly want to make deals.

When we come back, how far are Democrats willing to go in opposition to President Trump? Are they ready to become the new party of no?

(END TAPE)

COMMERCIAL BREAK

CHUCK TODD:

Welcome back, panel is here. Yes, Director Comey is testifying tomorrow. Yes, we have Neil Gorsuch and his first confirmation hearing. But I think the biggest story of next week could be the house vote on Thursday on health care. George Will, where is this headed for Republicans?

GEORGE WILL:

They don't know yet because usually in legislative dealmaking, it's an additive process. I support X, you support Y, I'll support you if you support me. That's how coalitions grow, that's also how government grows. In this case, however, addition is subtraction because the big issue and it turns out the heart of Obamacare is the expansion of Medicaid. Twenty Republican senators represent states that expanded Medicaid. Absent that expansion, they have huge holes in their budget, they're a problem.

CHUCK TODD:

Asa Hutchinson, John Kasich, Brian Sandoval- three Republican governors all over the ideological spectrum, Yamiche, signed a letter saying 'Hey, be careful of this Medicaid cut'.

YAMICHE ALCINDOR:

Mainly because, as soon as the CBO came out and said that all these people are going to lose their health insurance, it sent shock waves into the party because there are some things that are very complicated for maybe voters to understand. Losing your health insurance is not very complicated, it's either you have it or you don't. And a lot of Trump supporters,while they didn't like the idea of being forced to have insurance, the idea that you might lose it in a state where you really, really need it is, I think, scary for a lot of people

KATTY KAY:

It's been an interesting shift amongst House Republicans who have gone on the conservative side, who with President Trump's very effective wooing, have gone from kind of 'hell no' to possibly 'yes'. But now you have moderates amongst the Republican Party in the House who are all saying hold on a second, if this is going to die, thanks to people like Susan Collins, in the Senate, why should I sign my name to it? Where does that leave me for the next two years?

CHUCK TODD:

Robert Costa, here is the conundrum. Colorado poll out this week shows here's the president's approval rating among all Republicans, he's got 83 percent favorable rating, excuse me, among Republicans 83 percent, but among all voters he has got a 55 percent unfavorable rating. You're Cory Gardner, Republican senator, what do you do? Do you listen to the Republican base that loves Trump or your overall, realize, oh my gosh a majority in Colorado don't trust him, aren't satisfied, do you go with him on health care?

ROBERT COSTA:

It's not just Senate Republicans, it's also the president. Who actually has ownership of this healthcare bill? We know the speaker's tweaking it with the Medicaid expansion, doing some things that the conservatives want to get it through the house. But when it gets to the Senate, is the president really going to rally behind it? When I spoke to the president right before he got inaugurated, he said he wanted insurance for everybody. He said he's not driven by philosophy, and his team, his populists at his side talk about infrastructure and taxes. They didn't get elected, in their minds, to do health care first.

CHUCK TODD:

George Will, is the debate over about the idea of whether government is involved with our health care or not? Meaning, you know, because there are still some that want to have this fight going no you know what we shouldn't-- the right-- the issue of whether it's a right or a privilege type of thing is-- Bill-- Cassidy-- Senator Cassidy in Louisiana said hey the debate is over, we have got to provide these people health care.

GEORGE WILL:

Before the Obamacare legislation was passed, fifty cents of every health care dollar was a government fifty cents. The government's been deeply involved in this forever and it will only become more so.

YAMICHE ALCINDOR:

And I think when I was listening to Senator Collins talk about not wanting to say health care is a right, in some ways, as soon as you say that sentence, you think about Bernie Sanders. But in theory, she made this point that we're paying for health care whether we like it or not. So whether we take away Medicaid and then we feel like we're not paying for it in this way, you're still paying for it when you go, when people go show up to the emergency room and have to pay for it and these hospitals have to provide them care anyways.

CHUCK TODD:

All right, very quickly, Neil Gorsuch, is there a filibuster? Do Democrats get forced to filibuster Neil Gorsuch?

KATTY KAY:

No, I think there are going to be enough Democrats up for reelection in conservative states who are just going to say, this is not the fight that they want to have now. They may have to have a fight on the second pick, but they're not going to have--

CHUCK TODD:

It's an easy way to look bipartisan if you're a red-state Democrat on this pick, isn't it?

ROBERT COSTA:

And in almost any other period, they would be consumed by Gorsuch. But when I talk to progressive activists in Washington, they say, "Russia, Trump, the wiretapping allegations, chaos at the White House," they're focused on different issues.

CHUCK TODD:

And health care. Don't forget that. All right, we'll be back in 45 seconds with End Game, and a viewer's alternative version of a segment we aired last week. Yes, we really do pay attention to what you have to say. Stay with us.

ANNOUNCER:

Coming up, Meet the Press End Game, brought to you by Boeing, always working to build something better.

COMMERCIAL BREAK

ANNOUNCER:

Meet the Press End Game is brought to you by Boeing, always working to build something better.

CHUCK TODD:

Back now with End Game, and I want to actually continue quickly. We talked about on the Gorsuch conversation whether Democrats can aff-- is it the right strategy to just be party of no? George Will, the Washington, you've been used to covering for 30 years, of course the answer to that used to be no. But perhaps it's better for them politically to be the party of no.

GEORGE WILL:

It's better in the sense that it energizes their base. You get to an election and you realize you can't win an election with your base alone. The old axiom used to be that American politics took place within the 40-yard lines. I still think it's true.

CHUCK TODD:

Yet, does anybody win that way? Or if they don't think they win that way, whether they actually do or not, if they don't think they win that way, Yamiche, this is why they act the way they act.

YAMICHE ALCINDOR:

Yeah, and I think, I mean when I talk to both-- I've talked to some freshman U.S. representatives who are saying we should be the party of no, mainly because they feel as though their base is really watching this and saying, "We need to stick to our grounds, we need to not go and try to make compromises when it comes to health care but start pushing a single-payer system. So they're facing these people who are really frustrated and think that they should be kind of like the Tea Party and that they should really stop and not make deals.

ROBERT COSTA:

But when I'm at the Capitol, we keep talking about the Democratic party. Who are the leaders of the Democratic party? We know there's Leader Schumer and there's Leader Pelosi, but who's the soul right now of the Democratic party if they are going to be the party of no? Is it Senator Warren? It's hard to tell.

KATTY KAY:

And I mean, Democrats can easily point to the last six years of the Obama presidency and say, "Hey, it didn't do the Republicans any harm being the party of no. Take Merrick Garland. Case in point. Why on earth shouldn't we try that too?"

CHUCK TODD:

All right, good luck being a centrist in today's Washington. Finally it's not often that we do viewer mail here. Actually, we never do it and we don't want to make a habit of it, trust me. But this week is an exception.

As you may remember, last week we took a tongue in cheek look at what it would be like if we applied "repeal and replace Obamacare" language to repealing and replacing American sports. We pointed out, for instance, that sports was already in a death spiral since on any given day, 50 percent of all teams are losers. And if you throw in soccer into this, we even have losers and ties. That it's important to give players greater access to more home runs, touchdowns and slam dunks, allowing players to choose the success that's best for them. And that teams need the ability to cross state lines, as the New York Giants and Jets did when they moved to New Jersey.

Well, one viewer, Kevin McGonagle, he wrote to offer perhaps a more conservative alternative to our examples.

(BEGIN TAPE)

McGonagle writes that because of sports' death spiral, the San Francisco Giants, Oakland Athletics, L.A. Dodgers, and San Diego Padres all disband, leaving just the Los Angeles Angels of Anaheim as the only baseball team in California. And without competition, the Angels could increase prices by 160 percent. Now Senators Elizabeth Warren and Bernie Sanders may insist that sports is a basic right for citizens and noncitizens alike, and that all states must have sports. So in order to cover everyone, the NHL is forced to set up a failing team in a hockey hotbed like New Mexico. Subsidizing teams like that and others would force prices to rise for all hockey fans.

(END TAPE)

And of course, everyone will be mandated to buy season tickets to their home teams, whether they want to or not. Anyway, see, we can have a little fun here.

That's all we have for today. We'll be back next week, when I guess the Big Ten is going to teach the ACC another lesson. Ugh. If it's Sunday, it's Meet the Press.

Meeting went well. Just the two of us. I worry that many of my sentences were not coherent givdn how fried I am, but she was nice enough to pretend otherwise. We talked about our risk based allocation and TRP, opioid epidemic, new building, my testimony today and challenges of doing an investigation in these conditions, kids, email investigation aftermath (briefly).

It was very pleasant and worth doing.

Hi Jim,

I know its last minute but I just saw this on Senator Shaheen's twitter page -- "Meeting w/ Director Comey shortly to discuss FBI budget. I'll work to ensure FBI has resources it needs for Trump/Russia investigation."

Not sure if it is something you want to give the Director a heads up about before he goes in with her.

Rep. Devin Nunes

>> TODAY I BRIEFED THE PRESIDENT ON THE CONCERNS THAT I HAD ABOUT INCIDENTAL COLLECTION AND HOW IT RELATES TO THE PRESIDENT-ELECT TRUMP AND HIS TRANSITION TEAM AND THE CONCERNS THAT I HAVE.
AS I SAID EARLIER, THERE WILL BE MORE INFORMATION HOPEFULLY BY FRIDAY. THE NSA IS COOPERATING VERY, VERY WELL AND LASTLY I'LL SAY THAT THE REPORTS THAT I WAS ABLE TO SEE DID NOT HAVE ANYTHING TO DO WITH RUSSIA OR THE RUSSIAN INVESTIGATION OR ANY TIE TO THE TRUMP TEAM. WITH THAT, I'LL TAKE A COUPLE OF QUESTIONS.

>> WHY IS IT APPROPRIATE FOR YOU TO BRIEF PRESIDENT TRUMP GIVEN IT IS HIS OWN CAMPAIGN OR ASSOCIATES --

>> BECAUSE WHAT I SAW HAS NOTHING TO DO WITH RUSSIA AND NOTHING TO DO WITH THE RUSSIAN INVESTIGATION. HAS EVERYTHING TO DO WITH POSSIBLE SURVEILLANCE ACTIVITIES AND THE PRESIDENT NEEDS TO KNOW THESE INTELLIGENCE REPORTS ARE OUT THERE. AND I HAVE A DUTY TO TELL HIM THAT.
[INAUDIBLE] >> I'M NOT DRAWING NIKON ANY CONCLUSIONS.

>> IT APPEARS I DON'T WANT TO GET TOO MUCH INTO THE DETAILS BUT THESE WERE INTELLIGENCE REPORTS AND IT BRINGS UP A LOT OF CONCERNS ABOUT YOU KNOW WHETHER THINGS WERE PROPERLY MINIMIZED OR NOT.
BUT I WILL TELL YOU, I'VE ONLY SEEN SOME, IT'S IN THE DOZENS. BUT WE DON'T HAVE THE FULL SCOPE OF ALL THE INTELLIGENCE REPORTS THAT WERE PRODUCED. OR, WHO ORDERED THE UNMASKING OF ADDITIONAL NAMES.

>> ARE YOU SAYING THE SURVEILLANCE IF IT WASN'T RELATED TO RUSSIA OR ANYTHING LIKE THAT, ARE YOU SAYING THEN IT WAS POLITICAL SURVEILLANCE OF POLITICAL OHPPONENTS AS WHAT THE PRESIDENT SUGGESTED IN HIS TWEETS?

>> WHAT I HAVE READ BOTHERS ME AND I THINK IT SHOULD BOTHER THE PRESIDENT HIMSELF AND HIS TEAM BECAUSE I THINK SOME OF IT SEEMS TO BE INAPPROPRIATE, BUT LIKE I SAID UNTIL WE GET ALL THE INFORMATION TO THE COMMITTEE, IT'S HARD TO REALLY SAY UNTIL WE SEE IT –

>> MR. CHAIRMAN, WE KNEW THERE WAS SOME INCIDENTAL COLLECTION BECAUSE LIEUTENANT GENERAL MICHAEL DPLIN MICHAEL FLYNN WAS CAUGHT UP TALKING WITH KISLYAK. DOES THIS GO BEYOND THAT AND QUALIFY THAT WHAT THE PRESIDENT WAS TWEETING ABOUT WIRETAPPING?

>> IT DEFINITELY GOES BEYOND WHAT HAPPENED TO GENERAL DPLIN

FLYNN. WE DON'T OFFICIALLY KNOW WHAT HAPPENED TO GENERAL FLYNN, THAT WAS ONE OF THE THINGS WE ASKED FOR IN THE MARCH 15th LETTER WAS FOR THE NSA, CIA, AND FBI TO GET DONE, SO FAR THE FBI HAS NOT TOLD US WHETHER OR NOT THEY'RE GOING TO RESPOND TO OUR MARCH 15th LETTER WHICH IS NOW A COUPLE WEEKS OLD.

>> AGAIN DOES THIS SEEM TO DESCRIBE WHAT THE PRESIDENT WAS TALKING ABOUT QUOTE WIRETAPPING WHICH THEY THEN SAID WAS BROADER SURVEILLANCE?

>> WHAT I'VE READ SEEMS TO ME TO BE SOME LEVEL OF SURVEILLANCE ACTIVITY, PERHAPS LEGAL, BUT I DON'T KNOW THAT IT'S RIGHT AND I DON'T KNOW THAT THE AMERICAN PEOPLE WOULD BE COMFORTABLE WITH WHAT I'VE READ BUT LET US GET THE ALL THE REPORTS.

>> CHAIRMAN WAS THE PRESIDENT PERSONALLY INVOLVED?
--
>> [CROSSTALKING]
>> THE PRESIDENT SAID THAT PRESIDENT OBAMA TAPPED HIS PHONES --

>> THAT DID NOT HAPPEN. I'VE SAID THIS A COUPLE WEEKS INCLUDING A DAY AFTER IN FRONT OF THE PRESS, THAT NEVER HAPPENED.

>> DID PRESIDENT OBAMA ORDER ANY KIND OF SURVEILLANCE OF THE PRESIDENT-ELECT?

>> WELL, WE DON'T KNOW WHO SEND THE TASKINGS, IF THEY WERE CHANGED INTO WHAT WENT INTO THESE INTELLIGENCE REPORTS BUT WE'RE GOING TO TRY TO FIND THAT OUT.

>> CHAIRMAN WAS THE PRESIDENT PERSONALLY INVOLVED?

>> DID THE JUSTICE DEPARTMENT GIVE YOU THE OKAY TO TALK ABOUT THIS?

>> THE JUSTICE DEPARTMENT DOESN'T HAVE ANYTHING TO DO WITH THIS. THIS IS INFORMATION THAT WAS BROUGHT TO ME THAT I THOUGHT THE PRESIDENT NEEDED TO KNOW ABOUT INCIDENTAL COLLECTION WHERE THE PRESIDENT HIMSELF AND OTHERS IN THE TRUMP TRANSITION TEAM WERE CLEARLY PUT INTO INTELLIGENCE REPORTS IN THIS WHITE HOUSE AND ACROSS A WHOLE BUNCH OF OTHER AGENCIES AND I THOUGHT IT WAS IMPORTANT FOR THE PRESIDENT TO KNOW THAT THAT'S WHY I REACHED THE SPEAKER, AND CAME DOWN HERE AS SOON AS I COULD.

>> HOW MANY PEOPLE ARE YOU SEEING IN THESE REPORTS?

AND DO ANY OF THEM CURRENTLY WORK AT THE WHITE HOUSE FOR MR. TRUMP?

>> YEAH -- WELL I DON'T WANT TO GET INTO THE SPECIFICS OF IT BECAUSE I WAS ONLY ABLE TO SEE A FEW DOZEN. OF WHICH I THINK A LOT OF IT DOES HAVE FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE VALUE.

>> REPORTS OF PEOPLE?

>> THERE WERE DOZENS OF REPORTS I WAS ABLE TO SEE THAT WE'RE HOPING THAT THE NSA, FBI, CIA WILL PROVIDE BECAUSE I KNOW THEY EXIST SO I WANT THEM TO PROVIDE THEM TO OUR COMMITTEE SO ALL MEMBERS HAVE AN OPPORTUNITY TO SEE WHAT I'VE BEEN SHOWN.

>> WHAT DID THE PRESIDENT TELL YOU AFTER YOU BRIEFED HIM ABOUT THIS?

>> I THINK THE PRESIDENT IS CONCERNED, AND HE SHOULD BE AND HE WOULD LIKE TO SEE THESE REPORTS AND HOPEFULLY WHEN WE GET THEM THEY'LL GET THEM TO THE WHITE HOUSE ALSO.

>> DO YOU BELIEVE THE PRESIDENT APPROPRIATELY USED THE WORD WIRETAPPING? WAS IT USED CORRECTLY IN HIS TWEETS BASED ON THE INFORMATION THAT YOU HAVE SEEN?

>> I THINK THE WIRETAPPING IF YOU USE IT GENERALLY LIKE THE PATH HAS SAID HE CLEARLY USED IT DIFFERENTLY THAN WHAT I THINK A LOT OF PEOPLE TOOK IT WAS DID OBAMA WIRETAP THE PRESIDENT, WHICH CLEARLY DIDN'T HAPPEN,

>> DO YOU SEE ANYTHING –

>> NO, AND I SAID THAT ON DAY TWO.

>> CAN YOU RULE OUT THE POSSIBLE THAT PRESIDENT OBAMA AN SENIOR OFFICIALS WERE INVOLVED IN THIS?

>> NO, I CANNOT.

>> A FISA WARRANT APPROVED BY A JUDGE ARE YOU SAYING THAT -- THEY WERE IN CONTACT WITH A TARGET OF A COUNTERINTELLIGENCE OR SOME FORM –

>> NO, I THINK YOU'RE READING TOO MUCH INTO THAT. THIS IS NORMAL INTELLIGENCE REPORTING, JUST NORMAL INTELLIGENCE REPORTING. THE QUESTION IS YOU KNOW SHOULD HE HIMSELF OR OTHERS, SHOULD

THEY HAVE BEEN PUT INTO THESE REPORTS? AND I DON'T KNOW THE ANSWER TO THAT YET, BUT WE'RE GOING TO TRY TO GET TO THE BOTTOM OF IT.

>> SO THE UNMASKING NOT THAT THERE WAS THIS MONITORING?

>> WELL, THERE'S TWO ISSUES HERE. THERE'S ADDITIONAL UNMASKING OF NAMES WHICH I THINK IS TOTALLY INAPPROPRIATE BUT I DON'T KNOW HOW MANY NAMES WERE UNMASKED BUT I KNOW THERE WERE ADDITIONAL UNMASKINGS THAT OCCURRED AND THEN THE ISSUE OF THE NAMES THAT WERE PUT INTO THESE INTELLIGENCE REPORTS THAT WE HAVE TO GET TO THE BOTTOM OF AND THIS IS WHY WE SENT THE LETTER TWO WEEKS AGO WE NEED A RESPONSE TO IT.

>> ARE YOU SUGGESTING THAT MR. TRUMP'S COMMUNICATIONS ARE IN THOSE REPORTS FIRST. SECOND, ARE YOU SAYING YOU'RE CONCERNED ENOUGH THAT THIS WILL TRIGGER A DIFFERENT SEPARATE INVESTIGATION?
AND THIRD, WHY DID YOU NOT DISCUSS THIS WITH A RANKING MEMBER BEFORE YOU CAME TO THE WHITE HOUSE?

>> YES. NO. AND I'M GOING TO BE MEETING AT SOME POINT TO TALK ABOUT WHERE TO GO WITH THIS INVESTIGATION, BUT I HAD TO BRIEF THE SPEAKER FIRST AND THEN I HAD TO TALK TO THE CIA DIRECTOR, NSA DIRECTOR, AND I'M WAITING TO TALK TO THE FBI DIRECTOR BECAUSE WE'RE STILL WAITING TO FIND OUT HOW WE'RE GOING TO GET THIS, I WENT AND VOTED AND TALKED TO THE PRESIDENT.

>> TO BE CLEAR MR. TRUMP'S COMMUNICATIONS ARE IN A REPORTS, YOU'RE NOT CONCERNED ENOUGH ABOUT IT FOR AN DECISIONAL INVESTIGATION?

>> WE ARE INVESTIGATING IT. WE'RE NOT OPENING A NEW INVESTIGATION.

>> YOU SAID IT HAS NOTHING TO DO WITH RUSSIA.

>> IT HAS TO DEAL WITH THE UNMASKING OF NAMES.

>> SO AN ON GOING INVESTIGATION YOU THOUGHT IT WAS APPROPRIATE TO COME OUT AND TALK --

>> JUST REMEMBER, WE HAVE HAD AN ON GOING INVESTIGATION INTO RUSSIA FOR A VERY, VERY LONG TIME AND ALL OF THEIR ACTIVITIES, SO WE HAVE THE SCOPING DOCUMENT OF THE RUSSIAN INVESTIGATION, AN WE WILL CONTINUE TO INVESTIGATE ANYTHING AND EVERYTHING ELSE THAT MIGHT BE CAUGHT UP IN THIS BECAUSE CLEARLY WE ARE CONCERNED ABOUT WHAT ENDS UP IN INTELLIGENCE PRODUCTS, WHY, AND WHETHER OR NOT THERE WAS UNMASKING.
>> CAN YOU SAY WHAT HE WAS COMMUNICATING ABOUT OR WHO HE WAS COMMUNICATING WITH?

>> NO, I CAN'T GET INTO THAT I'M SORRY.

>> CAN YOU TELL US WHO BROUGHT YOU THIS INFORMATION AND WHY THEY BROUGHT YOU –

>> I CAN TELL YOU WE'VE BEEN ASKING FOR PEOPLE TO COME FORWARD AND THEY CAME THROUGH THE PROPER CHANNELS, THEY HAD THE PROPER CLEARANCES, AND I'M JUST GOING TO LEAVE IT AT THAT BECAUSE WE HAVE TO PROTECT PEOPLE WHO CAME FORWARD IN THE RIGHT MANNER.

>> CAN YOU DESCRIBE THE PERSON IN THE INTELLIGENCE --

>> I'M NOT EVEN GOING TO SAY IT WAS ONE PERSON.

>> YOU SAID IT HAS NOTHING TO DO WITH RUSSIA, BUT ARE YOU SUGGESTING IT COULD BE COLLECTED AS PART OF A CRIMINAL INVESTIGATION, A CRIMINAL WARRANT?

>> NO.

>> HOW --

>> BECAUSE IN THE DOZENS OF REPORTS I WAS ABLE TO SEE I WAS ABLE TO DETERMINE IT LOOKS LIKE IT WAS LEGAL COLLECTION, INCIDENTAL COLLECTION BUT THEN MADE ITSELF INTO INTELLIGENCE REPORTS, SO IT HAS TO DEAL WITH FISA AND MULTIPLE FISA WARRANTS OUT THERE BUT NOTHING CRIMINAL INVOLVED. HOLD ON, I'VE GOING TO TAKE ONE MORE QUESTION.

>> WAS IT'S INFORMATION LOOKED AT IN REALTIME OR INFORMATION COLLECTED, HELD, STORED AND ALLOWED TO BE LOOKED AT LATER?
>> IT WAS FAIRLY QUICKLY FROM WHAT I'VE SEEN BUT ONCE WE GET THE REPORTS THEN WE CAN ASK MORE QUESTIONS OF THE AGENCIES THAT PRODUCE THE REPORTS.

>> -- LEGAL COLLECTION WHAT IS IT THAT YOU FIND INAPPROPRIATE ABOUT IT AND ARE YOU ATTEMPTING TO GIVE THE PRESIDENT POLITICAL COVER FOR HIS WIRETAPPING CLAIMS?

>> BECAUSE WE -- THE REASON THAT WE DO THIS AND WE HAVE ALL THESE PROCEDURES IN PLACE IS TO PROTECT AMERICAN CITIZENS INCIDENTALLY COLLECT ED ED SO THERE ARE CERTAIN THINGS THAT HAVE TO BE MET INTO FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE PRODUCTS. IF SOMETHING ELSE HAPPENS -- IT APPEARS THERE WERE THINGS THAT MAYBE THEY DIDN'T MEET THE MINIMUM QUALIFIES. THERE ARE THINGS TO ME THAT DON'T REACH THE LEVEL OF FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE VALUE. AND IF THAT'S THE CASE, YOU HAVE TO ASK YOURSELF WHY DID THOSE END UP IN REPORTS?

>> JUST TO CLARIFY, THIS IS NOT INTENTIONAL SPYING ON DONALD TRUMP OR ANYBODY IN HIS –

>> I HAVE NO IDEA. WE WON'T KNOW THAT --

>> WELL YOU SAID THIS IS INCIDENTAL –

>> WE WON'T KNOW THAT UNTIL WE GET TO THE BOTTOM OF DID PEOPLE ASK FOR THE UNMASKING OF ADDITIONAL NAMES WITHIN PRESIDENT-ELECT'S TRANSITION TEAM.

>> BUT YOU SAID LEGAL AND INCIDENTAL THAT DOESN'T SOUND LIKE A PROACTIVE EFFORT TO SPY.

>> I WOULD REFER YOU TO – WE HAD A SIMILAR ISSUE WITH MEMBERS OF CONGRESS THAT WERE BEING PICKED UP IN INCIDENTAL COLLECTION A LITTLE OVER A YEAR AGO, WE HAD TO SPENT A FULL YEAR WORKING WITH THE DNI FOR MEMBERS OF CONGRESS TO BE NOTIFIED WHICH COMES THROUGH THE GANG OF EIGHT AND I WOULD REFER YOU TO THAT BECAUSE IT LOOKS VERY SIMILAR TO THAT WOULD BE THE BEST WAY I CAN DESCRIBE IT. \

[CROSSTALKING]

>> WAS HIS NAME UNMASKED.

>> I'M NOT GOING TO GET INTO THAT BUT HAVE EVER INDICATION IT'S CLEAR WHO IS IN THESE REPORTS.

>> WHO HAS ACCESS OF THE UNMASKED NAMES? JUST PEOPLE IN INTELLIGENCE COMMUNITY?

>> WE DON'T KNOW YET. BECAUSE WE DON'T KNOW WHO IT WOULD HAVE BEEN DISSIMILAR NATED TO --

Great story.

Jewish Center Bomb Threat Suspect Is Arrested in Israel

By ISABEL KERSHNER, ADAM GOLDMAN, ALAN BLINDER and RICHARD PÉREZ-PEÑAMARCH 23, 2017

JERUSALEM — A Jewish teenager in Israel made a wave of threats to Jewish institutions in the United States and other countries in recent months, contributing to fears of a spike in anti-Semitism, law enforcement officials said on Thursday after the man was arrested.

The 18-year-old suspect, who holds dual Israeli and American citizenship, suffers from a brain tumor that can affect his behavior, his lawyer said.

An Israeli police spokesman, Micky Rosenfeld, said that the man, who lives in the Ashkelon area of southern Israel, had made threats to Jewish community centers and other sites in the United States, Australia and New Zealand, and to at least one commercial airline flight, prompting an emergency landing. The authorities did not offer a motive.

“This is the guy we are talking about,” Mr. Rosenfeld said.

A judge ordered the suspect, who has not been charged, held until at least March 30 and ordered a medical examination. The police also arrested the suspect’s father, who was ordered held for eight days, on suspicion that he might have been aware of the threats, or even been involved. The father denies any knowledge of the threats, his lawyer said. The judge imposed an order of silence forbidding Israeli authorities to release either man’s name.

The teenager, who was born in Israel, has a brain tumor that can affect his cognitive abilities and lead to “irrational” behavior, but he has no criminal record, his lawyer, Galit Bash, said. She refused to say whether her client had admitted or denied involvement.

Ms. Bash and the father’s lawyer, Eran Rau, who are both from the Office of the Israeli Public Defender, said the young man was an only child who lived with his parents and had been home-schooled, which is unusual in Israel.

While most Israelis are drafted into military service, the teenager was rejected, which Ms. Bash said was because of his medical condition. Israeli media reported that she said in court that he had the tumor since he was 14.

The father, an engineer in his early 50s, also has no criminal record, and was cooperating with investigators, Mr. Rau said. He said his client was concerned primarily with his son’s welfare, given his medical condition.

“This all seems very strange and preliminary to me,” Mr. Rau said.

Israeli news outlets reported that when the teenager was arrested, he tried to grab an officer’s gun. In his brief court appearance, the suspect, wearing khaki cargo pants, bowed his head and pulled his shirt up to conceal his face.

The arrest appeared to be a turning point after months of investigation and waves of turmoil and panic, as Jewish community centers across the United States reported more than 100 bomb threats since the beginning of the year. The calls, which President Trump condemned during an address to Congress last month, led to evacuations and bomb sweeps and heightened worries about anti-Semitism across the country.

A Missouri man was arrested this month and charged with making some of the recent anti-Semitic threats. But some acts, like the vandalizing of Jewish cemeteries, were apparently committed by others, still unidentified. It was not immediately clear how many threats investigators had traced to the teenager.

On Thursday morning, the Federal Bureau of Investigation held a conference call with leaders of Jewish organizations to discuss the arrest. In the hours after the announcement, Joel Dinkin, the executive vice president of the Evelyn Rubenstein Jewish Community Center of Houston, said in an interview that it was "a little bit perplexing from the standpoint of the fact that it's somebody Jewish."

But Jonathan A. Greenblatt, chief executive of the Anti-Defamation League, cautioned that many of the people responsible for anti-Semitic threats, vandalism and "a torrent of abuse online" remained at large. And even the threats attributed to the Israeli teenager, he said, should still be considered acts of anti-Semitism.

"The motive may have been unclear, but the impact was crystal clear," Mr. Greenblatt said. "These were acts that terrorized a community just because of their faith."

Critics of President Trump have tied him to a rise in hate crimes, pointing to his anti-immigrant remarks and accusing him of not condemning attacks swiftly or strongly enough. On Feb. 28, in a meeting with state attorneys general, Mr. Trump suggested that some of the threats and vandalism could be a politically motivated effort to "make people look bad," rather than actual bigotry, according to people who took part in the meeting. The comment troubled Jewish leaders and people who track hate crimes, who saw it as playing down real dangers.

Despite the arrest, "we hope our elected officials will directly confront the wave of hate violence that we've seen since the election," said Heidi Beirich, the director of the Southern Poverty Law Center Intelligence Project.

The person who made the calls sent them through the internet, and used sophisticated software to disguise his location and camouflage his voice, which slowed the investigation, the authorities said. When the Israeli police searched the suspect's house, investigators confiscated computers, an antenna and other equipment.

An American official said it appeared that the man had used Tor, a widely available anonymity software that masks a computer's true whereabouts by routing its internet traffic through various points around the globe. Many people use Tor, which is managed by a nonprofit digital privacy group, including those conducting illicit business and activists trying to avoid government censorship or surveillance.

"The investigation began in several countries at the same time, in which dozens of threatening calls were received at public places, events, synagogues and community buildings that caused panic and disrupted events and activities in various organizations," the Israeli police said in a statement.

The F.B.I. worked closely with Israeli intelligence on the investigation, starting in September — months before American organizations began to note a surge in threats to American targets, according to Cary Gleicher, the bureau's top agent in Israel.

Some of the earliest American targets of bomb threats were schools, centers and museums in Alaska, Florida and New York that were affiliated with Chabad-Lubavtich, an Orthodox Jewish movement, according to a Chabad official. The movement did not publicize the threats, and they received little or no news coverage.

Mr. Gleicher said he met in early March in Washington with James B. Comey, the F.B.I. director, who asked about efforts to find the person making the threatening calls, and made it clear that he had "great interest in getting this thing done." In mid-March, Mr. Comey met with Jewish leaders at bureau headquarters in Washington to brief them on the investigation.

"I left with a level of confidence that they were definitively making strides," said Jerry B. Silverman, chief executive of the Jewish Federations of North America. "It was clear that they were moving at very rapid pace."

The American-Israeli cooperation intensified last week, when the F.B.I. sent 14 people — both agents and technical experts — to Israel to assist in the investigation, Mr. Gleicher said in an interview from Israel.

"This was a big deal," he said, adding that it took the resources of both countries to get "across the finish line."

"Monday was the eureka moment," he said, when investigators figured out who was making the calls.

In a statement, Attorney General Jeff Sessions, who described the threats as "hate crimes," said, "The Department of Justice is committed to protecting the civil rights of all Americans, and we will not tolerate the targeting of any community in this country on the basis of their religious beliefs."

The case in Israel is separate from that of the St. Louis man who was arrested this month and accused of making at least a half-dozen other threats to Jewish centers. In a complaint in Federal District Court in Manhattan, the authorities said that man, Juan Thompson, had acted as part of an effort to intimidate a former girlfriend.

Isabel Kershner reported from Jerusalem, Adam Goldman from Washington, Alan Blinder from Atlanta, and Richard Pérez-Peña from New York. Laurie Goodstein contributed reporting from New York and James Kerstetter from San Jose, Calif.

FYI, the following is from the Boston field office town hall in early March:

At one point during the conversations about it, one of my great debates about what to do, one of my advisors said, "Should you consider that what you're doing may help elect Donald Trump president?" And I said, "Absolutely not. Down that road lies the death of the FBI." If we ever start considering who might be affected and in what way by what we do, we're done. I said, "I don't care what impact it has. I can't care." People say that what I did had an impact on the election. Lordy, I hope not. It makes me mildly nauseous to think that I did. But honestly, it doesn't change how I think about it. I would have done the same thing again. It stunk to high heaven, but we did the right thing for the right reasons. Someday people will calm down enough to understand that, I hope.

Dear Director,

I hope this email finds you well on the curtails of a long week. I imagine a many people have already urged you to watch Seth Meyer's "A Closer Look" series featuring 'Comey Hearing Adds to Chaos of Trump Presidency', but I feel I would not be doing my job if I didn't behoove you to watch it. Yes, it makes light of a tough situation, but I also feel that it gives the American people a better understanding of the political difficulties and disconnects our system throws at you every day. Please take a look, have a laugh, and know you have our every endearing respect. Thank you for all you've done and have a wonderful, much deserved, weekend.

Director Comey,

I'm not fully confident this will actually make it to you, but I wanted to take a moment to say I was able to hear and watch the Trump wiretapping and Russian involvement hearing. I figure everyone likes hearing kudos for the job they have done. I wanted to say I, and members of my squad were very impressed with how you represented us in that hearing. Our mission is thankless and often misunderstood by those outside the Bureau. A cross we all bear with our service to this country and it's people.

As [redacted] I love and believe in the FBI and have known or heard of the faults of Directors in the past. With yourself and Director Mueller, I certainly believe that I have been around for Directors that have seen the greatest workload in the bureau's existence, and have seen both excel.

This may be a fruitless attempt, but just in case this makes it to you… I, along with my family, my squad mates, and I'm confident the rest of the FBI would like to say we are proud to have someone like yourself representing us.

Audit of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's New Jersey Regional Computer Forensic Laboratory Hamilton, New Jersey

Audit Division 16-11 March 2016

AUDIT OF THE FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION'S NEW JERSEY REGIONAL COMPUTER FORENSIC LABORATORY HAMILTON, NEW JERSEY

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) Regional Computer Forensic Laboratory (RCFL) Program is a partnership between the FBI and other federal, state, and local law enforcement agencies operating within a geographic area. In 2001, Congress directed the Attorney General to establish new RCFLs, and provide support for existing RCFLs, to ensure that they have the capability to perform forensic examinations of computer evidence related to criminal activity and cyberterrorism, as well as to train and educate federal, state, and local law enforcement personnel and prosecutors about computer crime. The USA Patriot Act of 2001 authorized $50 million in annual appropriations to develop this capacity.[1] In 2002, the FBI established the RCFL National Program Office (NPO) to oversee the establishment and operations of the RCFLs.

This audit report focuses on the operations of the New Jersey RCFL (NJRCFL), located in Hamilton, New Jersey. The objectives of the audit were to assess the: (1) efficiency and effectiveness of the NJRCFL's performance, (2) effectiveness of the NJRCFL's outreach and partnership with the law enforcement community, and (3) NJRCFL's case management system and its efforts to address any service request backlog. To accomplish these objectives, we interviewed officials from the NJRCFL and reviewed documents related to the NJRCFL's structure, its accomplishments, and operational standards. We also interviewed the eight agencies that participate with the NJRCFL.

We found that the NJRCFL experienced mixed results in achieving its various performance goals in fiscal years 2011 through 2014. We found that although the FBI revised the definition of a backlog case, that reduced the number of backlog cases at the NJRCFL, a material backlog still existed as of June 2015. We found the backlog was attributable to a number of factors, but chief among them was the need for both more examiners and additional advanced training for those already conducting exams. However, we also found that participating agencies were generally satisfied with the work performed by the NJRCFL.

In addition, similar to what we found in a previous audit at the Philadelphia RCFL, we identified material weaknesses in Cell Phone Investigative Kiosk (Kiosk) usage that, if not addressed, could leave the Kiosk vulnerable to abuse.[2] A Kiosk allows users to quickly and easily view data stored on a cell phone, extract the data to use as evidence, put the data into a report, and copy the report to an electronic storage device. Although FBI policy requires Kiosk users to confirm they possess the proper legal authority for the search of data on cell phones or loose media, we found that the Technical Assistance Form used by the NJRCFL did not require users to confirm the legal authority for the search conducted using the Kiosk. However, after our audit fieldwork was complete, the RCFL National Program Office introduced a mandatory electronic form to be used on Kiosks. Law Enforcement Officers logging onto a Kiosk are required to complete the mandatory electronic form and indicate the type of legal authority and the number of devices processed. The NJRCFL has implemented the new mandatory form, which mitigates the Kiosk weaknesses we previously identified. We also found that 26 percent of Kiosk users that examined a cell phone did not certify that they had completed self-paced or hands-on training as required by FBI policy.

We also found that the current process used to capture data for the number of law enforcement personnel that the NJRCFL trained, did not include adequate supporting documentation. For example, training participants registered for courses online using a system managed by the RCFL National Program Office. The NJRCFL used that registration information to identify the number of individuals that participated in training; however, we found that not everyone who registered for a class actually attended the class, and that the registration data was never updated to reflect actual attendance information. As a result, the FBI was unable to accurately determine the degree to which the RCFL program accomplished one of its core missions.

Our report contains three recommendations to help minimize potential abuse or mishandling of the Kiosk program, maintain adequate supporting documentation to support training, and manage the current backlog.

AUDIT OF THE FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION'S NEW JERSEY REGIONAL COMPUTER FORENSIC LABORATORY HAMILTON, NEW JERSEY

INTRODUCTION

According to the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), the Regional Computer Forensic Laboratory (RCFL) Program was created in response to law enforcement's urgent demand for expert digital forensics services and training. It is a partnership between the FBI and other federal, state, and local law enforcement agencies operating within a geographic area. In 1999, the FBI piloted the first RCFL in San Diego, California, as a full service forensics laboratory and training center devoted to examining digital evidence in support of criminal investigations and the detection and prevention of terrorist acts.

In 2001, Congress directed the Attorney General to establish more RCFLs and provide support for existing RCFLs to ensure that each had the capability to: (1) perform forensic examinations of intercepted computer evidence related to criminal activity and cyberterrorism; (2) train and educate federal, state, and local law enforcement personnel, and prosecutors in computer crime; (3) assist federal, state, and local law enforcement in enforcing federal, state, and local laws related to computer-related crime; (4) facilitate and promote the sharing of federal law enforcement expertise and information about the investigation, analysis, and prosecution of computer-related crime, including the use of multijurisdictional task forces; and (5) to carry out such other activities as the Attorney General considers appropriate. The USA Patriot Act of 2001 authorized $50 million in annual appropriations to develop these capabilities.[3] In 2002, the FBI established the RCFL National Program Office (NPO) to oversee the establishment and operations of the RCFLs. In June 2015, the FBI's RCFL Program consisted of 16 RCFLs.

FBI Regional Computer Forensics Laboratories

RCFLs were established to strengthen law enforcement computer forensic capabilities throughout the United States and have provided forensic expertise and training to thousands of law enforcement personnel. The primary forensic responsibilities of an RCFL are to:

1. Conduct a comprehensive examination of digital evidence;
2. Provide a complete and timely report to the contributor;
3. Provide testimony as needed; and

[3] The USA Patriot Act is an antiterrorism law enacted by Congress in October 2011 in response to the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. Title VIII of the USA Patriot Act directs the Attorney General to create RCFLs to strengthen the fight against terrorism.

4. Act as a regional focal point for digital evidence issues.

According to the FBI, the key goals of the RCFL Program are to:

1. Provide timely, professional, and technically advanced digital forensic services to law enforcement agencies in an RCFL's service area;

2. Fully utilize applied science and engineering capabilities to support digital forensic examinations;

3. Increase the confidence of investigators, prosecutors, and judges in the digital forensics examination discipline through standardized training and forensic protocols;

4. Provide responsive and flexible services in support of diverse investigative programs; and

5. Meet legal and administrative requirements of diverse judicial systems.

General information on the governance of RCFLs, RCFL personnel and Program Membership, RCFL accreditation, and a summary of backlog service requests at RCFLs for fiscal years (FY) 2011 through 2013 can be found in our previous audit report on the Philadelphia RCFL.[4]

New Jersey Regional Forensic Laboratory

The New Jersey Regional Forensic Laboratory (NJRCFL), located in Hamilton, New Jersey, was established in 2004 and obtained its American Society of Crime Laboratory Directors (ASCLD)/ Laboratory Accreditation Board (LAB) Legacy Accreditation in 2006, and its ASCLD/LAB International Accreditation in 2012.[5] From FYs 2011 through 2014, the NJRCFL had a combined budget of $452,470 that was used for rent, equipment, supplies, administrative services, and other items such as travel and training.[6]

The NJRCFL's mission is to provide its customers with high quality digital forensics services and training. In FY 2014, the NJRCFL had 29 staff members from [5] The American Society of Crime Laboratory Directors (ASCLD) is a nonprofit professional society of crime laboratory directors and forensic science managers dedicated to providing excellence in forensic science. The ASCLD/LAB Accreditation Program, currently known as the ASCLD Legacy Accreditation Program, was the first accreditation program in the world for crime laboratories. The Legacy Accreditation Program has been replaced by the International Accreditation.

[6] The NJRCFL is located within a New Jersey Department of Law and Public Safety (NJ L&PS) facility. There is a current Memorandum of Agreement in place which states, "FBI will not reimburse L&PS for… apportionment for space rent, building utilities, building security, custodial services…."

8 participating agencies, including: 8 FBI Special Agents, 6 FBI support staff, 10 sworn task force officers and 4 non-sworn task force officers, and 1 FBI contractor (a system administrator).[7] The NJRCFL provides law enforcement agencies in New Jersey with pre-seizure consultation, on-site seizure and collection, duplication and storage of electronic equipment and other digital evidence, examination of digitally stored media, and courtroom testimony. Organizationally, the NJRCFL is a laboratory facility operated out of the FBI's Operational Technology Division (OTD) under the RCFL NPO and the third largest RCFL by staff size. Within the NJRCFL, the Lab Director position is funded by the OTD as a temporary position and not a permanent position within the Newark Field Office. All other FBI positions assigned to the NJRCFL report to the Newark Field Office.

Office of the Inspector General Audit Approach

The objectives of our audit were to assess the: (1) efficiency and effectiveness of the NJRCFL's performance, (2) effectiveness of the NJRCFL's outreach and partnership with the law enforcement community, and (3) NJRCFL's case management system and its efforts to address any service request backlog.

To accomplish these objectives, we interviewed officials from the NJRCFL and reviewed documents related to the NJRCFL's organizational structure, accomplishments, and operational standards. We also interviewed representatives from the 8 NJRCFL participating agencies and 1 non-participating agency to obtain their opinions on the effectiveness of the NJRCFL operations. To assess the NJRCFL's efforts to address its service request backlog, we examined the FBI's Computer Analysis Response Team's (CART) database information to determine if a backlog existed. After determining that the NJRCFL had a backlog, we reviewed the NJRCFL requests for examination for unassigned cases and aging reports for open cases to determine the cause of the backlog.

The results of our review are detailed in the Findings and Recommendations section of this report.

[7] The eight participating agencies at the NJRCFL are the New Jersey State Police, the Essex County Prosecutor's Office, the Mercer County Prosecutor's Office, the Middlesex County Prosecutor's Office, the Monmouth County Prosecutor's Office, the New Jersey Division of Criminal Justice, the FBI Newark Field Office, and the New Jersey Attorney General's Office. The Somerset County Prosecutor's Office was a participating agency through FY 2013; however, in FY 2014 it was no longer able to participate because its lone assignee became a part-time employee and the NJRCFL rules require participating agencies to provide at least one full-time employee.

FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

NEW JERSEY RCFL PERFORMANCE, PARTNERSHIPS, AND CASE BACKLOG

RCFLs are responsible for providing timely and high quality digital forensics services and training to the FBI and their RCFL partners. The NJRCFL had mixed success in meeting its various performance goals in FYs 2011 through 2014. We identified weaknesses in the Cell Phone Investigative Kiosk (Kiosk) program that, if not addressed, could increase the risk of abuse and mishandling in the NJRCFL's Kiosk. Further, we also identified weaknesses in the training program that could result in the misreporting of the number of personnel trained, one of the key goals of the RCFL program. Finally, we found that NJRCFL had a backlog as of June 2015. Despite the backlog, participating agencies were still satisfied with the work completed at the NJRCFL.

Performance

Performance for RCFLs is measured across a wide range of services – including laboratory performance, partnerships, and casework. We focused our audit testing on the capabilities that the USA Patriot Act of 2001 cited as the basis for the creation of the RCFLs.

Forensic Examinations, Assisting Law Enforcement, Sharing Expertise

The FBI's Operational Technology Division maintains the CART Database, which tracks forensic examination work from inception to completion. In our audit of the Philadelphia RCFL, we assessed the reliability of the information in the CART Database and found it to be reliable for the purpose of evaluating performance achievements during the period covered by our audit. Additionally, the OTD recently identified the need for a more robust digital evidence tracking system. OTD has engineered and is in the process of fielding its new Digital Evidence Management System (DEMS) to better capture digital forensic matrices and replace the CART Database. The NJRCFL is in the process of transitioning from the CART Database to DEMS.

The NJRCFL is the third largest RCFL by staff size and number of cases. The performance of an RCFL can be measured by different sets of data, including the number of service requests received, examinations completed, and terabytes of data processed. Table 1 provides a summary of these metrics included in our period of review for this audit.

Cell Phone Kiosk Program

The Cell Phone Investigative Kiosk (Kiosk) allows users to quickly and easily view data stored on a cell phone, extract the data to use as evidence, put the data into a report, and copy the report to an electronic storage device such as a compact disk.[8] In addition to the Kiosk, there is also a Loose Media Kiosk, which processes digital evidence stored on loose media, such as a DVD or memory card. Kiosks may be located at an FBI field office, FBI resident agency, or at an RCFL.[9] The NJRCFL Kiosk, which was first available for use in December 2008, is located in the reception area of the NJRCFL, which is outside of the FBI laboratory. To use the Kiosk, law enforcement personnel are required to schedule an appointment. However, the NJRCFL does not require Kiosk users to sign its Visitors Log since users do not go beyond the reception area or enter the NJRCFL's laboratory space. While the Kiosk is housed in the reception area, the cables necessary to connect the Kiosk to a cell phone are not stored with the Kiosk. Instead, the NJRCFL examiner responsible for supervising the Kiosk provides the cables to a visiting user. Without the cables, cell phones cannot be connected to the Kiosk, ensuring that the examiner on duty would have to know that a person was attempting to use the Kiosk because the examiner would have to supply the appropriate cable. This procedure provides the appropriate level of assurance that a person cannot use the Kiosk without the knowledge of the examiner on duty.

To make an appointment to use the Kiosk, generally, users email the NJRCFL Management and Program Analyst or the Operational Support Specialist to schedule their visit. According to the Director, sometimes one investigator will schedule a Kiosk appointment and another investigator will show up in his or her place, or [8] Unlike a full exam by a Certified Forensic Examiner, the report generated by a law enforcement officer using the Kiosk might not be acceptable as evidence at trial. However, its value in providing police and agents with quick access to the information on a cell phone without having to wait for a full exam to be conducted, which could be delayed for weeks or months, is often critical in helping law enforcement obtain investigative leads, gather evidence for additional arrest or search warrants or to convince a defendant who doesn't contest the charges to plead guilty.

[9] According to the FBI, non-FBI law enforcement personnel are allowed to use the Kiosks located in FBI field offices and resident agencies, but FBI personnel must escort them at all times.

more than one investigator may accompany the scheduled investigator to use the Kiosk. According to the Director, NJRCFL personnel assume that all of the personnel who arrive for a scheduled appointment are part of the same case. However, he said that the NJRCFL does not verify that everyone arriving for a scheduled appointment is working on the same investigative matter.

As a result of the procedures and practices described above, we found that the NJRCFL did not have adequate controls over the access to and use of its Kiosk. FBI policy requires Kiosk users to confirm they possess the proper legal authority for the search of data on cell phones or loose media. During our fieldwork, neither the FBI nor the NJRCFL provided any confirmation to show that NJRCFL Kiosk users possessed the proper legal authority to search for evidence on the devices examined. In addition, the FBI did not provide us with any information regarding controls in place at the NJRCFL to ensure that users do not use the Kiosk for non-law enforcement matters, an inherent risk of Kiosks without adequate controls.

We reviewed two versions of NJRCFL's Technical Assistance Form, which Kiosk users are required to complete and return to the NJRCFL for their records. The first version of the form, used from January to June 2011, included the user's name, agency, type of case, case number, and the type of technical assistance requested and/or provided. It also included a signature line. In June 2011, the form was revised to add the following four statements and corresponding signature lines:

- I certify that the legal authority indicated above is valid and authorizes a preview/examination of the items described above and this preview/examination does not exceed the scope of such authorization.

- I certify that I have taken the Kiosk training (when applicable).

- I understand that I must conduct all processing with the Kiosk and am responsible for testifying to any results generated. I also understand that laboratory personnel will not conduct any processing, prepare reports as to processing, or testify regarding results.

- I certify that I have AUSA [Assistant United States Attorney] concurrence to conduct this preview (FBI/LMK only).

While the first of the four statements asks each user to certify that he or she has valid legal authority to examine the device in question, the form does not request that the person completing the form list the specific legal authority for the examination, nor does it even offer a list of possible legal authorities for conducting such a search. When we brought this concern to the attention of the NJRCFL Director, he said he was not aware of this omission. Because the Technical Assistance Form used by the NJRCFL did not require users to cite the legal authority for their search each time they used the Kiosk, we were unable to determine if the Kiosk users had the appropriate legal authority to use the Kiosk.

As discussed in our previous report on the Philadelphia RCFL, we believe that although the Kiosk is an efficient tool for Law Enforcement Officers to use to examine digital evidence that may not require the extensive examination of a Certified Forensic Examiner, they are potentially vulnerable to serious abuse.[10] In its July 2015 response to our audit, the FBI stated that the RCFL NPO introduced a mandatory electronic form on the front end of all Kiosks requiring that any Law Enforcement Officer logging on to the Kiosk provide the type of legal authority and the number of devices processed. This new mandatory electronic form was not being used at the NJRCFL Kiosk at the time of our initial visit.

We reviewed all 330 Technical Assistance Forms that were made available to us during our fieldwork to verify that each form had the required content and signatures. We found that more than a quarter of the forms did not have a signature attesting that the user had completed the required Kiosk training. According to the FBI's Digital Evidence Corporate Policy Directive and Policy Implementation Guide (Implementation Guide), prior to Kiosk use, self-paced or hands on training is required.[11] Training is required to familiarize the user with the Kiosk equipment to prevent improper usage. In addition, as shown in Table 2, we also found that five percent of the forms were missing a signature for the statement concerning the user's responsibility for testifying about the results generated by the Kiosk and two percent were missing all of the signatures.

Table 2

OIG Review of NJRCFL Technical Assistance Forms

	Frequency	Total Universe	Percent
Missing All Signatures	5	330	2%
Missing Kiosk Training Signature	77	301	26%
Missing "Testifying to any Results" Signature	18	330	5%

Source: OIG Analysis of NJRCFL Technical Assistance Forms

We believe that without completing the required training, Kiosk users could mishandle or improperly use the Kiosk or the results generated by it. However, after our audit fieldwork was complete, the NJRCFL implemented the new mandatory electronic form requiring Law Enforcement Officers to cite the legal authority allowing the officer to search the device and the number of devices processed.

Training

The RCFL program's mission includes training law enforcement personnel around the nation on topics related to seizing and handling digital evidence, using FBI-developed preview tools, and understanding digital forensic examination results. The NJRCFL included expanding the number of tools on which laboratory examiners are trained as one of its annual goals for FYs 2013 and 2014. Additionally, during that period, the NJRCFL offered training to law enforcement personnel that included the proper techniques for seizing, handling, and examining digital evidence.

According to information provided by the FBI, the NJRCFL trained 422 personnel in FY 2011, 493 in FY 2012, 303 in FY 2013, and 301 in FY2014. However, as described below, we were unable to verify the accuracy of these reported accomplishments because the NJRCFL did not maintain adequate documentation for training. As shown in Table 3, the FBI accomplishment data did not match the training records made available to us by the NJRCFL.

Table 3

NJRCFL Number of Persons Trained

Fiscal Year	FBI Accomplishment Data	Training Records	Percent Difference
2011	422	394	7%
2012	493	388	21%
2013	303	309	-2%
2014	301	277	8%

Source: OIG Analysis of NJRCFL Training Records and FBI Data

As a result of not having adequate documentation, the accomplishment data reported by the FBI on the number of personnel trained was not reliable. Until spring 2014, personnel attending training offered by the NJRCFL registered using the RCFL NPO's Training Registration System (TRS). All training data, including the attendance roster, was maintained on the registration website. However, according to a NJRCFL staff member, the instructors at the NJRCFL never retrieved an updated attendance sheet from TRS and therefore could not remove those registered participants who did not actually attend.

According to the FBI, in spring 2014, the TRS was compromised after an intruder gained unauthorized access, and it was taken out of service until a more secure website could be deployed. During our audit, we compared the number of participants listed on the NJRCFL's training records to the information reported in the accomplishment data the FBI provided to the Office of the Inspector General (OIG). As the comparison in the Table 3 above shows, the training records did not support the information reported to the OIG. The percent difference between the FBI accomplishment data and the NJRCFL training records ranged from 2 to 21 percent. According to a NJRCFL staff member, since TRS was taken offline, the NJRCFL has been responsible for printing the class roster, creating and maintaining a sign-in sheet, and subsequently reporting training data to the RCFL NPO.

In addition to the training conducted at the NJRCFL, staff also conduct seminars and speak outside of the NJRCFL. For this outside training, NJRCFL personnel did not require participants to sign-in. Instead, attendance at these events was estimated. These estimates were reported to the RCFL NPO and included in the Annual Report. Because no supporting documentation was available for training conducted outside the NJRCFL, we could not reconcile the numbers provided by the FBI or those subsequently included in the Annual Reports.

Because the RCFL NPO maintains the TRS, the challenges encountered by the NJRCFL are not unique to the NJRCFL. In our previous report on the Philadelphia RCFL, we recommended that the FBI create a secure automated system to register users for training held at local RCFLs, record user attendance at RCFL training, and report training data to the NPO. Following this audit, the FBI stated that while the RCFL NPO had sought to develop a technical solution to track all training, the cost and current budget do not permit such a training registration system at this time. Despite this, we recommend that the FBI develop interim procedures to accurately capture all training registrations and attendance for training conducted at the NJRCFL and at off-site locations.

Law Enforcement Agency Participation

According to the FBI, partnering is a central part of the RCFL Program and the key to its success. As of May 2015, there were 8 participating agencies at the NJRCFL. To become a participating agency, a law enforcement agency must sign a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) and detail personnel certified as forensic examiners to the local RCFL. According to officials from participating agencies, performance reviews of law enforcement personnel assigned to the NJRCFL are performed by their parent agency. Therefore, each agency is responsible for the conduct of its own NJRCFL assignee.

Since partnering with other agencies is critical to the RCFL Program's success, through 2014, the NJRCFL has made it a goal to expand the number of participating agencies. However, NJRCFL did not successfully meet this goal in 2011 and 2012, but had success in adding three new agencies in 2013 and 2014. According to the NJRCFL Director, efforts to recruit additional agencies have not always been successful because: (1) travel time to the NJRCFL has been problematic for some agencies, and (2) at least one agency utilized the same forensic services that are available at the NJRCFL from another source at no cost and without a commitment for personnel to be detailed to the agency.

We interviewed all eight participating agencies and one non-participating agency to obtain their opinions on the effectiveness of the NJRCFL operations. Overall, the participating agencies were satisfied with the services provided by the NJRCFL. However, when it came to the timeliness of examinations, the participating agencies agreed that the timeliness of examinations was an issue, but it did not present a problem for their daily operations.

Case Backlog

Beginning in January 2014, the FBI defined a 'backlog' request as a service request that had not been assigned to an examiner within 30 days of the request. Prior to January 2014, a 'backlog' request was any request not closed within 60 days of receipt from the requesting agency. According to the FBI, the change was necessary because the original definition did not take into account the complexity of each case. According to the January 2014 Implementation Guide, to ensure an effective and efficient workflow, supervisors should assign service requests as examiners become available. At no time should a service request be assigned to avoid being identified as a backlog.

According to the FBI, the goal of the new definition is to more accurately track any backlog by identifying requests that an RCFL does not have the resources to address. To help keep an accurate accounting of backlogged requests, FBI policy now limits service requests to no more than 10 unique items.[12] The case agent or requesting agency should list the items in the service request and rank them in order of priority to the investigation.

Using these criteria, we reviewed the case backlog and aging reports from the CART Database and interviewed the NJRCFL Director. Based on our review, the NJRCFL carries a backlog of requests, both assigned and unassigned. As shown in the figure below, using the new backlog definition, the NJRCFL carried 15 backlog service requests at the time of our review. However, when using the previous backlog definition, the NJRCFL had 194 service requests that were not closed within 60 days, including 39 that were more than a year old.

[12] A unique item is considered a laptop, cell phone, desktop, tablet, etc. An exception is made for numerous items of the same type of disposable media (e.g., CDs, DVDs, flash drives and SD cards less than 1 GB), which can be counted as one item in a service request.

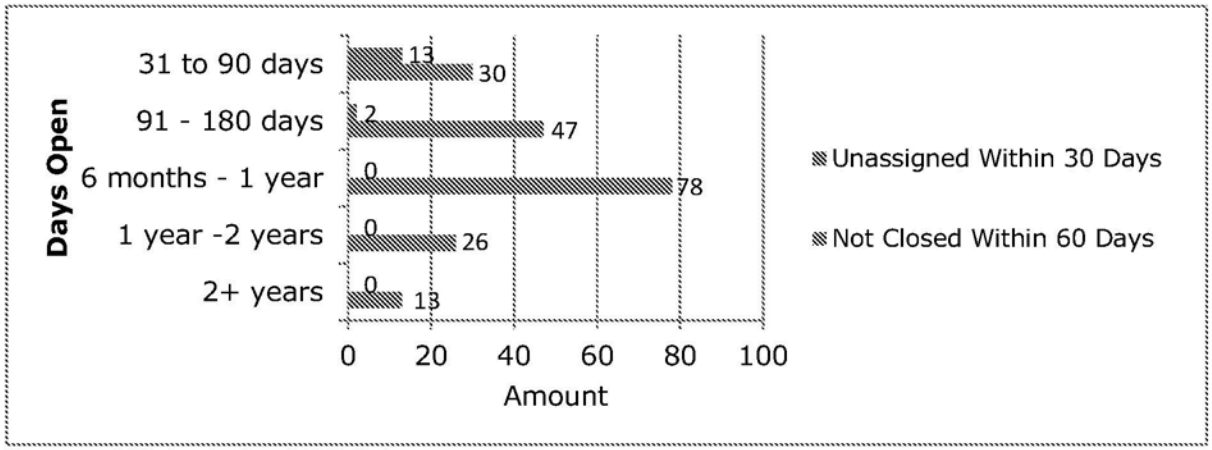
Backlog Service Requests by Days Open



Source: OIG Analysis of FBI Data

The NJRCFL Director requires that each examiner close at least 2 cases each month. However, according to NJRCFL's Director, Deputy Director, and the Chief Forensic Examiner, this goal has become increasingly difficult to achieve as the storage capacity of the items to be reviewed has dramatically increased over the past three years.

In December 2014, all RCFLs were informed by FBI's Operational Technology Division that service requests that remain open for more than a year are seen as a high risk and could potentially impact the FBI's operational cycle and ability to conduct effective and timely investigations. Therefore, a new measurement for CART service requests open for 1 year or more has been added to the Director's Scorecard.[13] The FY 2015 target is to have less than 20 percent of total service requests open for longer than 1 year. According to the FBI, less than 20 percent is a target that all CART programs are requested to work towards; it is not a mandate. As shown in the table below, even when using a different definition of what constitutes a backlog, the NJRCFL is still trying to reduce its backlog.

[13] The Director receives a Scorecard monthly that provides the same information as the service request but at the program level and encompasses the entire CART/RCFL Programs.

Efforts to Address Service Request Backlog

Based on our interviews, the NJRCFL has made several efforts to manage their case backlog, including bringing on more examiners, implementing policies specific to reducing the backlog that have been approved by the NJRCFL Local Executive Board (LEB), streamlining the examination process, and providing additional advanced training to staff.[14] However, these efforts have not effectively reduced the case backlog.

According to the Director, the clearest solution to the backlog is bringing on additional examiners. However, the NJRCFL wants to balance the need for more examiners that come with more participating agencies against the need to complete the additional examination work. The Director estimated that it takes approximately 14-24 months to get a new RCFL employee through the training program to become a Certified Forensic Examiner. According to the Implementation Guide, Forensic Examiners in Training (FET) are only authorized to perform forensic tasks under the supervision of a Certified Forensic Examiner, which therefore limits the amount of exams they can complete. Accordingly, the NJRCFL Director cited their high percentage of FETs as a cause for the backlog.

[14] The Local Executive Board (LEB) sets policies for the NJRCFL. The LEB is comprised of the head of each of the participating agencies, or a chosen representative.

NJRCFL's LEB implemented new policies to help manage the case backlog. In FY 2011, the LEB adopted a policy to only process non-participating cases that involved crimes that were at least 2nd degree offenses, except for crimes against children. In FY 2012, the LEB established that all case-related cellular devices must be processed on the Kiosk prior to laboratory submission. This policy was fine-tuned in FY 2013 requiring all agencies to provide a "Page 2" in conjunction with any cellular device or loose media service request. Page 2 is the supplemental form for cellular phones that accompanies all service requests that include a cellular telephone as a submission. As mentioned earlier, all cellular devices must be analyzed utilizing the Kiosk before being submitted for a forensic examination. If the Kiosk is unable to recover the necessary information, the cellular telephone will be assigned to a forensic examiner for further analysis. No cellular telephone will be accepted for examination without this supplemental form.

The NJRCFL sought to streamline the examination process through the Digital Crime Analysis Position (DCAP), the Virtual Machine Forensics Platform, and Centralized Imaging. DCAP was designed to enable state and local cases to have their review process performed remotely by the persons most familiar with the case, the investigator. DCAP is similar to FBI's Case Agent Investigative Review in that it helps to free up the specialized examiner time for case processing and not image and review analysis. At the time of our audit, there were six stations with DCAP access available for state and local use at the NJRCFL. Additionally, three participating agencies obtained DCAP access outside of the NJRCFL; however, none of the three agencies were able to establish the remote connection at the time of our audit – which may be a result of certain firewall issues.

According to the NJRCFL Director, participating agencies have been encouraged to use DCAP; however, he acknowledged that while this was supposed to alleviate some of the backlog issues, it may have actually caused some additional delays. He said that while it is a great idea to have the investigator most closely related to a particular case reviewing the data; it may take additional time because of the investigator's competing priorities, which may result in un-reviewed data on the network. Additionally, many of the participating agencies we interviewed stated that DCAP is cumbersome to navigate and too time consuming to use.

The Virtual Machine Forensics Platform enables NJRCFL examiners to work numerous cases on a single workstation. Additionally, Centralized Imaging is a tool that can image numerous computers in a large case simultaneously, reducing the wait time for pending cases to begin examination. According to the NJRCFL Director, Centralized Imaging has worked for the NJRCFL, especially with exigent, large cases; however, it also has not helped reduce the backlog as much as he thought it would. According to the NJRCFL Director, RCFL examiners have found that the Virtual Machine Forensic Platform was more troublesome than helpful in streamlining the examination process.

According to the NJRCFL Director, in recent years, there had been very few advanced examiner training classes offered by the FBI and none were offered during sequestration. According to the FBI, the training budget has been significantly reduced every year for the past 5 years. The Digital Forensic Analysis Section, Digital Sciences Development and Staffing Unit has encouraged examiners to find local sources of training and has made funds available to allow examiners to attend advanced training. When a class was advertised, before an examiner could sign up for it, it would be either cancelled or quickly filled by other RCFL examiners. The more advanced training an examiner receives, the greater the examiner's skill sets. A well-rounded examiner with multiple skill sets can complete most, if not all, of the different service requests received (e.g., Linux, Mac, cell phone, etc.). However, examiners cannot examine particular evidence if they have not received certification in that specific area. For example, if an iPhone arrives at the NJRCFL, the examiner must be cell phone certified as well as Mac certified. The Director explained that at least part of the backlog could be attributed to the lack of advanced training. Some of his examiners are unable to get certification in specialized areas because the training is unavailable. Therefore, NJRCFL has examiners that cannot complete certain exam requests and must wait until the certified examiners are available to complete the task.

One of the primary responsibilities of an RCFL is to provide a complete and timely report to the requestor. Because the NJRCFL maintains a backlog, the timeliness with which the requestor receives the report can be problematic and may hinder an investigation where digital evidence plays a significant role. As a result, we recommend that the FBI ensure that the NJRCFL continue to examine its backlog to determine the causes and to develop and implement new measures to address the causes. In its July 2015 response to our Philadelphia RCFL report, the FBI stated that the Forensic Operations Unit has been in contact with the RCFLs experiencing a backlog to determine the reason for the backlogs and to assist with addressing them on a weekly basis. Furthermore, the FBI stated that the RCFL NPO will temporarily transfer personnel to RCFLs that are unable to address the backlog on their own, or identify other RCFLs, Field Divisions, or Headquarters' laboratories that are able to accept additional workload to help reduce the backlog.

Conclusion

In FYs 2011 through 2014, the NJRCFL experienced mixed results in achieving its various performance goals. We found that while a material backlog existed at the NJRCFL, participating agencies were still satisfied with the work performed there. We also found that the current process for training law enforcement personnel was inadequate. As a result, the FBI was unable to accurately determine the degree to which the RCFL program is accomplishing one of its core missions. Therefore, we make the following recommendations.

Recommendations

We recommend that the FBI:

1. Ensure compliance with the FBI's Implementation Guide policy that requires Kiosk users to have taken proper training prior to Kiosk usage.

2. Continue to examine NJRCFL's backlog to determine the causes and to develop and implement new measures to address them.

3. Develop interim procedures to accurately capture all training registrations and attendance for training conducted at the NJRCFL and at off-site locations.

STATEMENT ON INTERNAL CONTROLS

As required by the Government Auditing Standards, we tested, as appropriate, internal controls significant within the context of our audit objectives. A deficiency in an internal control exists when the design or operation of a control does not allow management or employees, in the normal course of performing their assigned functions, to timely prevent or detect: (1) impairments to the effectiveness and efficiency of operations, (2) misstatements in performance information, or (3) violations of laws and regulations. Our evaluation of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's internal controls was not made for the purpose of providing assurance on its internal control structure as a whole. FBI management is responsible for the establishment and maintenance of internal controls.

Through our audit testing, we did not identify any deficiencies in the FBI's internal controls that are significant within the context of the audit objectives and based upon the audit work performed that we believe would affect the FBI's ability to effectively and efficiently operate, to correctly state performance information, and to ensure compliance with laws and regulations.

Because we are not expressing an opinion on the FBI's internal control structure as a whole, this statement is intended solely for the information and use of the FBI. This restriction is not intended to limit the distribution of this report, which is a matter of public record.

STATEMENT ON COMPLIANCE WITH LAWS AND REGULATIONS

As required by the Government Auditing Standards we tested, as appropriate given our audit scope and objectives, selected transactions, records, procedures, and practices, to obtain reasonable assurance that FBI management complied with federal laws and regulations, for which noncompliance, in our judgment, could have a material effect on the results of our audit. FBI's management is responsible for ensuring compliance with applicable federal laws and regulations. In planning our audit, we identified the following law that concerned the operations of the auditee and that was significant within the context of the audit objectives:

- Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act (USA Patriot Act of 2001).

Our audit included examining, on a test basis, the FBI's compliance with the aforementioned law that could have a material effect on the FBI's operations, through interviewing FBI personnel, surveying NJRCFL participants, and reviewing program performance documentation. Nothing came to our attention that caused us to believe that the FBI was not in compliance with the aforementioned law.

APPENDIX 1

OBJECTIVES, SCOPE, AND METHODOLOGY

Objectives

The objectives were to review performance in the following areas: (1) assess the efficiency and effectiveness of the NJRCFL's laboratory performance; (2) assess the effectiveness of the NJRCFL's outreach and partnership with the law enforcement community; and (3) assess the NJRCFL's case management system and its efforts to address its service request backlog.

Scope and Methodology

We conducted the audit in accordance with generally accepted government auditing standards. These standards require that we plan and perform the audit to obtain sufficient, appropriate evidence to provide a reasonable basis for our findings and conclusions based on our audit objectives. We conducted work at the NJRCFL in Hamilton, New Jersey.

In conducting our audit, we interviewed officials from the NJRCFL and from the eight participating agencies. We also reviewed documents related to the NJRCFL organizational structure, RCFL accomplishments, and operational standards.

To assess the efficiency and effectiveness of the NJRCFL's laboratory performance, we examined the NJRCFL's progress towards achieving its annual goals. We reviewed and compared the annual goals to the statistics maintained in the CART Database. We compared the number of participants listed on the training roster to the information reported in the accomplishment data the FBI provided to the OIG. In addition, we compared the number of law enforcement and non-law enforcement persons trained at the NJRCFL.

To assess the effectiveness of the NJRCFL's outreach and partnership with the law enforcement community, we interviewed representatives from NJRCFL participating agencies to determine the effectiveness of the work conducted at the NJRCFL. In addition, we assessed the practices regarding the NJRCFL Kiosk usage and training.

To assess the controls surrounding the NJRCFL Kiosk usage, we reviewed the NJRCFL Technical Assistance Form for required items, selected a judgmental sample of NJRCFL Technical Assistance Forms and compared the names on the forms to those for whom an appointment was made. In addition we reviewed the forms to determine whether they contained the required signatures.

To assess NJRCFL training practices, we compared the number that attended NJRCFL training as reported by the FBI in its Accomplishment Data to the number of sign-ins for those training classes. Additionally, we tabulated the number of Law Enforcement Officers and non-law enforcement persons trained.

To assess the NJRCFL's efforts to address its service request backlog, we examined CART Database information to determine if a backlog existed. Based on the information obtained, the NJRCFL had a backlog. We also reviewed the NJRCFL requests for examination for unassigned cases and aging reports for open cases.

March 14, 2016

The Honorable Michael E. Horowitz
Inspector General
Office of the Inspector General
U.S. Department of Justice
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W.
Washington, DC 20530

Dear Mr. Horowitz:

The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) appreciates the opportunity to review and respond to your office's report entitled, Audit of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's New Jersey Regional Computer Forensics Laboratory Hamilton, New Jersey.

We are pleased that you found, "…the participating agencies were satisfied with the services provided by the NJRCFL."

We agree that it is important to minimize potential abuse of the Kiosk program, maintain adequate supporting documentation to support training, and manage backlogs appropriately. In that regard, we concur with your three recommendations for the FBI.

Should you have any questions, feel free to contact me. We greatly appreciate the professionalism of your audit staff throughout this matter.

Sincerely,

The Federal Bureau of Investigation's (FBI) Response to the Office of the Inspector General's Audit of the FBI's New Jersey Regional Computer Forensics Laboratory, Hamilton, New Jersey

Recommendation #1: Ensure compliance with the FBI's Implementation Guide policy that requires Kiosk users to have taken proper training prior to Kiosk usage.

FBI Response to Recommendation #1: Concur. The Digital Forensics and Analysis Section (DFAS) will issue a new version of the Cell Phone Investigative Kiosk (CPIK) statistic report program which will require the Kiosk user to indicate, via a checkbox prompt at sign on, whether or not they have received the self paced training associated with the Kiosk. If user indicates they have not yet received training, a training document will open allowing the user to take a self paced course with step by step instructions on how operate the Kiosk. Once the user passes the course, they will be able to access the functionality of the Kiosk. DFAS will implement this update for all Regional Computer Forensic Laboratories (RCFLs) by the end of June 2016.

Recommendation #2: Continue to examine NJRCFL's backlog to determine the causes and to develop and implement new measures to address them.

FBI Response to Recommendation #2: Concur. Digital Evidence Field Operations (DEFO) personnel will continue to contact the RCFLs to assess the material backlog. Thus far, the material backlog is trending down for all RCFLs. Prior to the OIG Audit, the Field Operations Unit was contacting the RCFLs experiencing a backlog to determine reasons for the backlogs and to assist with addressing the backlog. Currently, DEFO personnel are contacting the RCFLs quarterly to assess the material backlog. DEFO will canvas and provide travel for Temporary Duty (TDY) assignments to RCFLs that are unable to address the backlog on their own. NJRCFL currently has no backlog.

Recommendation #3: Develop interim procedures to accurately capture all training registrations and attendance for training conducted at the NJRCFL and at off-site locations.

FBI Response to Recommendation #3: Concur. DEFO is currently working with the developers of RCFL.GOV to include a link on the web page allowing for the recording of trainees registered for training held at RCFLs and their personnel attendance, which will be reported back to the DEFO Unit. In discussions with the web developers, it was determined that security restrictions will not allow the RCFL.GOV website to function as a training portal at this time. Training is currently tracked manually and reported to the RCFL National Program Office by each RCFL. DEFO Unit continues to work to get this functionality added to the RCFL.GOV website or find another viable method of tracking.

APPENDIX 3

OFFICE OF THE INSPECTOR GENERAL ANALYSIS AND SUMMARY OF ACTIONS NECESSARY TO CLOSE THE REPORT

The Office of the Inspector General (OIG) provided a draft of this audit report to the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI). The FBI's response is incorporated in Appendix 2 of this final report. The following provides the OIG analysis of the response and summary of actions necessary to close the report.

Recommendation:

1. Ensure compliance with the FBI's Implementation Guide policy that requires Kiosk users to have taken proper training prior to Kiosk usage.

   Resolved. The FBI concurred with our recommendation. In its response, the FBI stated that its Digital Forensics and Analysis Section will issue a new version of the Kiosk statistic report program which will require the Kiosk users to indicate, via a checkbox prompt at sign on, whether or not they have received the self-paced training associated with the Kiosk. If users indicate they have not yet received training, a training document will open allowing the user to take a self-paced course with step by step instructions on how to operate the Kiosk. Once the user passes the course, he or she will be able to access the functionality of the Kiosk. The FBI stated that it will implement this update for all Regional Computer Forensics Laboratories (RCFL) by the end of June 2016.

   This recommendation can be closed when we receive evidence that the Digital Forensics and Analysis Section has implemented a new version of the Kiosk statistic report program for all RCFLs that requires Kiosk users to indicate that they have taken the proper training or prompts the user to take the proper training prior to using the Kiosk.

2. Continue to examine New Jersey RCFL's (NJRCFL) backlog to determine the causes and to develop and implement new measures to address them.

   Resolved. The FBI concurred with our recommendation. In its response, the FBI stated that Digital Evidence Field Operations (DEFO) personnel will continue to contact the RCFLs to assess the material backlog. Further, the FBI stated that DEFO personnel are currently contacting the RCFLs quarterly to assess the material backlog. DEFO will canvas and provide travel for Temporary Duty assignments to RCFLs that are unable to address the backlog on their own. The FBI's response also stated that the NJRCFL currently has no backlog, however, no documentation demonstrating that the backlog no longer exists was provided.

This recommendation can be closed when we receive evidence that DEFO personnel have assessed the RCFLs material backlog, the underlying causes and measures to address them and, when necessary, have provided additional resources to RCFLs unable to address their backlog on their own. We also ask that the FBI provide evidence to demonstrate that the NJRCL has no backlog currently, or as of the response to our audit report.

3. Develop interim procedures to accurately capture all training registrations and attendance for training conducted at the NJRCFL and at off-site locations.

Resolved. The FBI concurred with our recommendation. In its response, the FBI stated DEFO is currently working with the developers of RCFL.GOV to include a link on the web page allowing for the recording of trainees registered for training held at RCFLs and their personnel attendance, which will be reported back to the DEFO. In discussions with the web developers, it was determined that security restrictions will not allow the RCFL.GOV website to function as a training portal at this time. The FBI further stated that training is currently tracked manually and reported to the RCFL National Program Office by each RCFL. In addition, the DEFO continues to work to get this functionality added to the RCFL.GOV website or find another viable method of tracking.

This recommendation can be closed when we receive evidence that the FBI has developed a viable method of tracking who registered for and attended training held at the RCFLs and off-site locations.

Thanks. My MO is to be notified whenever HRT is deployed on an operation. Not a big deal but let's see what broke there. I caught it in weekend book but I need Andy (or whoever is covering DD) slot to tell me in advance you are aware of the deployment and think it makes sense.

Boss,

Not too many things to be briefed tonight other than below items:

1. Candidate Trump's team has requested a briefing on Cyber threats. We are awaiting further details/response from the DNI who actually controls the briefings. I will keep you updated as I know more.
2. Former Top Ten fugitive [redacted] will be extradited from Mexico City to Dallas on October 6th. [redacted] is the 19th FBI b6 b7C

Top Tenner apprehended in Mexico. As you may recall, [redacted] is believed to be responsible for orchestrating a murder-for-hire plot of a prominent Dallas area dentist who was shot and killed next to her car in a basement parking garage. b6 b7C

3. The Baltimore takedown went well and you were correct, HRT did assist.....can't find "emogi" or you would get a smiley face. As of tonight, there were 46 subjects in custody. All total, the breakdown of individuals indicted were as follows: 18 correctional officers, 34 inmates, and 28 outside facilitators.

I asked [redacted] to stay behind tomorrow to quickly brief you on the Weiner matter which is growing more complicated, but it can wait until then.

That's it for tonight.

Sirs,

We have the first four (4) initial President Elect Transition Team (PETT) names assigned to the DOJ.

1. - Former DOJ b6 b7C
2. - Former DOJ
3.
4.

These four were introduced by AAG Lee Lofthus during the 1pm Executive Officer/Transition meeting today at DOJ who indicated additional names (up to possibly 10 total) are anticipated.

The four met with the AG and DAG today and have space at DOJ. They are anticipated to begin by receiving high level DOJ overviews and budget briefings next week followed by requests to meet with indivudual components over the next few weeks.

The PETT will publish their schedule to DOJ of which agencies they want to meet with and on what issues. Agencies should be prepared but contact may not be for days or weeks.

However, I spoke with AAG Lofthus who indicated the FBI should be ready which may telegraph an interest to meet with FBI as one of the first

As we learn more about these individuals, get additional names and briefing/schedule requests we will advise.

Please see below for National Security Presidential Memorandum 2 which lays out the framework for the NSC, HSC, PC, DC, and Policy Coordination Committees (PCC). We are not listed as a regular member of any committee, which is consistent with PPD-1 in 2009. Also, members of the NSC staff will chair the PCCs, but the DC may add co-chairs.

SUBJECT: Organization of the National Security Council and the Homeland Security Council

As President, my highest priority is to ensure the safety and security of the American people. In order to advise and assist me in executing this solemn responsibility, as well as to protect and advance the national interests of the United States at home and abroad, I hereby direct that my system for national security policy development and decision-making shall be organized as follows:

A. The National Security Council, the Homeland Security Council, and Supporting Staff

The National Security Act of 1947, as amended, established the National Security Council (NSC) to advise the President with respect to the integration of domestic, foreign, and military policies relating to the national security. There is also a Homeland Security Council (HSC) -- established through Executive Order 13228 of October 8, 2001, and subsequently codified in the Homeland Security Act of 2002 -- that has the purpose of advising the President on matters pertaining to homeland security. Each Council is also responsible for the effective coordination of the security-related activities and functions of the executive departments and agencies.

The security threats facing the United States in the 21st century transcend international boundaries. Accordingly, the United States Government's decision-making structures and processes to address these challenges must remain equally adaptive and transformative. Both Councils are statutory bodies that the President will continue to chair. Invitations to participate in specific Council meetings shall be extended to those heads of executive departments and agencies, and other senior officials, who are needed to address the issue or issues under consideration. When the President is absent from a meeting of either Council, the Vice President may preside at the President's direction.

The Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs (National Security Advisor) and the Assistant to the President for Homeland Security and Counterterrorism (Homeland Security Advisor) shall be responsible, as appropriate and at the President's direction, for determining the agenda for the NSC or HSC, respectively, ensuring that the necessary papers are prepared, and recording Council actions and Presidential decisions in a timely manner. When international economic issues are on the agenda of the NSC, the National Security Advisor and the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy shall perform these tasks in concert.

The NSC and HSC shall have as their regular attendees (both statutory and non-statutory) the President, the Vice President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Energy, the Secretary of Homeland Security, the National Security Advisor, the Homeland Security Advisor, and the Representative of the United States to the United Nations. When international economic issues are on the agenda of the NSC, the NSC's regular attendees will include the Secretary of Commerce, the United States Trade Representative, and the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy. The Director of National Intelligence and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as statutory advisers to the NSC, shall also attend NSC meetings. The Assistant to the President and Chief of Staff, the Assistant to the President and Chief Strategist, the Counsel to the President, the Deputy Counsel to the President for National Security Affairs, and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget are invited as attendees to any NSC meeting.

In addition to the NSC and HSC, there is also a single NSC staff within the Executive Office of the President that serves both the NSC and HSC. The staff is composed of regional, issue-focused, and functional directorates and headed by a single civilian Executive Secretary, pursuant to 50 U.S.C. 3021, who is also the Chief of Staff. All policy and staff activity decisions will be transmitted to the Executive Secretary for appropriate distribution and awareness. The purpose of the NSC staff is to advise me, the National Security Advisor, the Homeland Security Advisor, the NSC members, the HSC members, and others in the White House; to facilitate the implementation of Administration policy; and to help coordinate the national-security-related activities of the executive departments and agencies.

B. The Principals Committee

The Principals Committee (PC) shall continue to serve as the Cabinet-level senior interagency forum for considering policy issues that affect the national security interests of the United States. The PC shall be convened and chaired by the National Security Advisor or the Homeland Security Advisor, as appropriate, in consultation with the appropriate attendees of the PC. The Chair shall determine the agenda in consultation with the appropriate committee members, and the Executive Secretary shall ensure that necessary papers are prepared and that conclusions and decisions are communicated in a timely manner. Invitations to participate in or attend a specific PC shall be extended at the discretion of the National Security Advisor and the Homeland Security Advisor, and may include those Cabinet-level heads of executive departments and agencies, and other senior officials, who are needed to address the issue under consideration.

The PC shall have as its regular attendees the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Homeland Security, the Assistant to the President and Chief of Staff, the Assistant to the President and Chief Strategist, the National Security Advisor, and the Homeland Security Advisor. The Director of National Intelligence and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff shall attend where issues pertaining to their responsibilities and expertise are to be discussed. The Counsel to the President, the Deputy Counsel to the President for National Security Affairs, and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget may attend all PC meetings.

The Assistant to the President and Deputy National Security Advisor (Deputy National Security Advisor), the Deputy Assistant to the President and National Security Advisor to the Vice President, and the Executive Secretary (who shall serve as the Executive Secretary of the PC) shall attend all of the meetings of the PC, and the Representative of the United States to the United Nations and the Assistant to the President for Intragovernmental and Technology Initiatives may attend as appropriate.

When international economic issues are on the agenda of the PC, the Committee's regular attendees will include the Secretary of Commerce, the United States Trade Representative, and the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy (who shall serve as Chair for agenda items that principally pertain to international economics).

C. The Deputies Committee

The Deputies Committee (DC) shall continue to serve as the senior sub-Cabinet interagency forum for consideration of, and where appropriate, decision-making on, policy issues that affect the national security interests of the United States. The DC shall be convened and chaired by the Deputy National Security Advisor or the Deputy Assistant to the President and Deputy Homeland Security Advisor (Deputy Homeland Security Advisor), as appropriate. The Chair shall determine the agenda in consultation with the regular DC members, and the Executive Secretary shall ensure that necessary papers are prepared and that conclusions and decisions are communicated in a timely manner. Invitations to participate in or attend a specific DC meeting shall be extended by the Chair to those at the Deputy or Under Secretary level of executive departments and agencies, and to other senior officials, who are needed to address the issue under consideration.

The DC shall have as its regular members the Deputy Secretary of State, the Deputy Secretary of the Treasury, the Deputy Secretary of Defense, the Deputy Attorney General, the Deputy Secretary of Homeland Security, the Deputy Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Deputy Director of National Intelligence, the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Deputy Assistant to the President and National Security Advisor to the Vice President, the Deputy National Security Advisor, the Deputy Homeland Security Advisor, and the Administrator of the United States Agency for International Development.

The Executive Secretary shall attend the DC meetings. The Deputy Counsel to the President for National Security Affairs may attend all DC meetings. The relevant Deputy Assistant to the President for the specific regional and functional issue under consideration shall also be invited to attend. Likewise, when and where appropriate, the Deputy Assistant to the President for Strategic Planning, the Deputy Assistant to the President for Strategic Communication, the Deputy Assistant to the President for International Economic Affairs, the Deputy Assistant to the President for Transnational Issues, and the Deputy Representative of the United States to the United Nations, shall also be invited to attend. Other senior officials shall be invited where appropriate.

The DC shall review and monitor the work of the interagency national security process, including the interagency groups established pursuant to section D below. The DC shall help to ensure that issues brought before the NSC, HSC, and PC have been properly analyzed and prepared for decision. The DC shall also focus significant attention on monitoring the implementation of policies and decisions and shall conduct periodic reviews of the Administration's major national security and foreign policy initiatives. The DC is responsible for establishing Policy Coordination Committees (PCCs) and for providing objectives and clear guidance.

D. Policy Coordination Committees

Management of the development and implementation of national security policies by multiple executive departments and agencies typically shall be accomplished by the PCCs, with participation primarily occurring at the Assistant Secretary level. As the main day-to-day fora for interagency coordination of national security policies, the PCCs shall provide policy analysis for consideration by the more senior committees of the national security system and ensure timely responses to the President's decisions.

Regional and issue-related PCCs shall be established at the direction of the DC. Members of the NSC staff (or National Economic Council staff, as appropriate) will chair the PCCs; the DC, at its discretion, may add co-chairs to any PCC. The PCCs shall review and coordinate the implementation of Presidential decisions in their respective policy areas. The Chair of each PCC, in consultation with the Executive Secretary, shall invite representatives of other executive departments and agencies to attend meetings of the PCC where appropriate. The Chair of each PCC, with the agreement of the Executive Secretary, may establish subordinate working groups to assist that PCC in the performance of its duties.

An early meeting of the DC will be devoted to establishing the PCCs, determining their memberships, and providing them with mandates and strict guidance. Until the DC has established otherwise, the existing system of Interagency Policy Committees shall continue.

E. General

The President and the Vice President may attend any and all meetings of any entity established by or under this memorandum.

This document is part of a series of National Security Presidential Memoranda that shall replace both Presidential Policy Directives and Presidential Study Directives as the instrument for communicating relevant Presidential decisions. This memorandum shall supersede all other existing Presidential guidance on the organization or support of the NSC and the HSC. With regard to its application to economic matters, this document shall be interpreted in concert with any Executive Order governing the National Economic Council and with Presidential Memoranda signed hereafter that implement either this memorandum or that Executive Order.

The Secretary of Defense is hereby authorized and directed to publish this memorandum in the Federal Register.

DONALD J. TRUMP

Boss,

Not too many things to be briefed tonight other than below items:

1. Candidate Trump's team has requested a briefing on Cyber threats. We are awaiting further details/response from the DNI who actually controls the briefings. I will keep you updated as I know more.
2. Former Top Ten fugitive [redacted] will be extradited from Mexico City to Dallas on October 6th. [redacted] is the 19th FBI Top Tenner apprehended in Mexico. As you may recall, [redacted] is believed to be responsible for orchestrating a murder-for-hire plot of a prominent Dallas area dentist who was shot and killed next to her car in a basement parking garage. b6 b7C
3. The Baltimore takedown went well and you were correct, HRT did assist.....can't find "emogi" or you would get a smiley face. As of tonight, there were 46 subjects in custody. All total, the breakdown of individuals indicted were as follows: 18 correctional officers, 34 inmates, and 28 outside facilitators.

I asked [redacted] to stay behind tomorrow to quickly brief you on the Weiner matter which is growing more complicated, but it can wait until then. b6 b7C

That's it for tonight.

The FBI Presidential Transition Team has not yet received any official requests for briefings or materials from the President Elect's Transition Team (PETT) at the DOJ. ASAC [redacted] and I are scheduled to participate in a DOJ led transition teleconference this afternoon with AAG Lee Lofthus where we may learn more about the potential PETT schedule and activities. We will keep you posted.

For your situational awareness, according to the President Elect's website (https://www.greatagain.gov/index.html), below is the count of PETT members assigned by department or agency that have been announced so far. It should be noted that DOJ (at 13) is second only to Department of Defense (at 16) in the total number assigned. The Department of State has 9 currently assigned, six at the National Security Council, four at Department of Homeland Security, and the Office of the Director of National Intelligence currently has one assigned. If past is prologue, some agencies may not be assigned any review teams prior to the inauguration and some may only have one or two assigned. Traditionally, the larger the agency and the larger the number of potential appointees, the larger the number of PETTs assigned.

Number Assigned - Organization

GRIZZLY STEPPE – Russian Malicious Cyber Activity

Summary

This Joint Analysis Report (JAR) is the result of analytic efforts between the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) and the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI). This document provides technical details regarding the tools and infrastructure used by the Russian civilian and military intelligence Services (RIS) to compromise and exploit networks and endpoints associated with the U.S. election, as well as a range of U.S. Government, political, and private sector entities. The U.S. Government is referring to this malicious cyber activity by RIS as GRIZZLY STEPPE.

Previous JARs have not attributed malicious cyber activity to specific countries or threat actors. However, public attribution of these activities to RIS is supported by technical indicators from the U.S. Intelligence Community, DHS, FBI, the private sector, and other entities. This determination expands upon the Joint Statement released October 7, 2016, from the Department of Homeland Security and the Director of National Intelligence on Election Security.

This activity by RIS is part of an ongoing campaign of cyber-enabled operations directed at the U.S. government and its citizens. These cyber operations have included spearphishing campaigns targeting government organizations, critical infrastructure entities, think tanks, universities, political organizations, and corporations leading to the theft of information. In foreign countries, RIS actors conducted damaging and/or disruptive cyber-attacks, including attacks on critical infrastructure networks. In some cases, RIS actors masqueraded as third parties, hiding behind false online personas designed to cause the victim to misattribute the source of the attack. This JAR provides technical indicators related to many of these operations, recommended mitigations, suggested actions to take in response to the indicators provided, and information on how to report such incidents to the U.S. Government.

Description

The U.S. Government confirms that two different RIS actors participated in the intrusion into a U.S. political party. The first actor group, known as Advanced Persistent Threat (APT) 29, entered into the party's systems in summer 2015, while the second, known as APT28, entered in spring 2016.

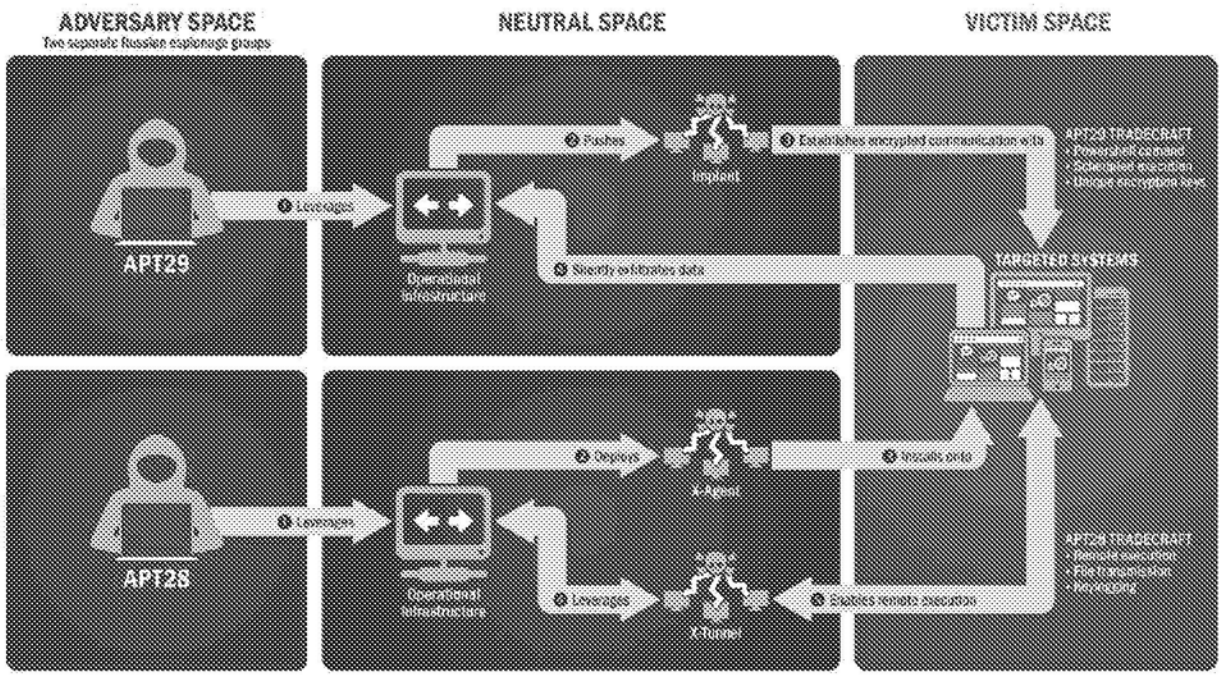

Figure 1: The tactics and techniques used by APT29 and APT 28 to conduct cyber intrusions against target systems

Both groups have historically targeted government organizations, think tanks, universities, and corporations around the world. APT29 has been observed crafting targeted spearphishing campaigns leveraging web links to a malicious dropper; once executed, the code delivers Remote Access Tools (RATs) and evades detection using a range of techniques. APT28 is known for leveraging domains that closely mimic those of targeted organizations and tricking potential victims into entering legitimate credentials. APT28 actors relied heavily on shortened URLs in their spearphishing email campaigns. Once APT28 and APT29 have access to victims, both groups exfiltrate and analyze information to gain intelligence value. These groups use this information to craft highly targeted spearphishing campaigns. These actors set up operational infrastructure to obfuscate their source infrastructure, host domains and malware for targeting organizations, establish command and control nodes, and harvest credentials and other valuable information from their targets.

In summer 2015, an APT29 spearphishing campaign directed emails containing a malicious link to over 1,000 recipients, including multiple U.S. Government victims. APT29 used legitimate domains, to include domains associated with U.S. organizations and educational institutions, to host malware and send spearphishing emails. In the course of that campaign, APT29 successfully compromised a U.S. political party. At least one targeted individual activated links to malware hosted on operational infrastructure of opened attachments containing malware. APT29 delivered malware to the political party's systems, established persistence, escalated privileges, enumerated active directory accounts, and exfiltrated email from several accounts through encrypted connections back through operational infrastructure.

In spring 2016, APT28 compromised the same political party, again via targeted spearphishing. This time, the spearphishing email tricked recipients into changing their passwords through a fake webmail domain hosted on APT28 operational infrastructure. Using the harvested credentials, APT28 was able to gain access and steal content, likely leading to the exfiltration of information from multiple senior party members. The U.S. Government assesses that information was leaked to the press and publicly disclosed.

Actors likely associated with RIS are continuing to engage in spearphishing campaigns, including one launched as recently as November 2016, just days after the U.S. election.

Actions to Take Using Indicators

DHS recommends that network administrators review the IP addresses, file hashes, and Yara signature provided and add the IPs to their watchlist to determine whether malicious activity has been observed within their organizations. The review of network perimeter netflow or firewall logs will assist in determining whether your network has experienced suspicious activity.

When reviewing network perimeter logs for the IP addresses, organizations may find numerous instances of these IPs attempting to connect to their systems. Upon reviewing the traffic from these IPs, some traffic may correspond to malicious activity, and some may correspond to legitimate activity. Some traffic that may appear legitimate is actually malicious, such as vulnerability scanning or browsing of legitimate public facing services (e.g., HTTP, HTTPS, FTP). Connections from these IPs may be performing vulnerability scans attempting to identify websites that are vulnerable to cross-site scripting (XSS) or Structured Query Language (SQL) injection attacks. If scanning identified vulnerable sites, attempts to exploit the vulnerabilities may be experienced.

Network administrators are encouraged to check their public-facing websites for the malicious file hashes. System owners are also advised to run the Yara signature on any system that is suspected to have been targeted by RIS actors.

Threats from IOCs

Malicious actors may use a variety of methods to interfere with information systems. Some methods of attack are listed below. Guidance provided is applicable to many other computer networks.

- Injection Flaws are broad web application attack techniques that attempt to send commands to a browser, database, or other system, allowing a regular user to control behavior. The most common example is SQL injection, which subverts the relationship between a webpage and its supporting database, typically to obtain information contained inside the database. Another form is command injection, where an untrusted user is able to send commands to operating systems supporting a web application or database. See the United States Computer Emergency Readiness Team (US-CERT) Publication on SQL Injection for more information.
- Cross-site scripting (XSS) vulnerabilities allow threat actors to insert and execute unauthorized code in web applications. Successful XSS attacks on websites can provide the attacker unauthorized access. For prevention and mitigation strategies against XSS, see US-CERT's Alert on Compromised Web Servers and Web Shells.
- Server vulnerabilities may be exploited to allow unauthorized access to sensitive information. An attack against a poorly configured server may allow an adversary access to critical information including any websites or databases hosted on the server. See US-CERT's Tip on Website Security for additional information.

Recommended Mitigations

Commit to Cybersecurity Best Practices

A commitment to good cybersecurity and best practices is critical to protecting networks and systems. Here are some questions you may want to ask your organization to help prevent and mitigate against attacks.

1. Backups: Do we backup all critical information? Are the backups stored offline? Have we tested our ability to revert to backups during an incident?
2. Risk Analysis: Have we conducted a cybersecurity risk analysis of the organization?
3. Staff Training: Have we trained staff on cybersecurity best practices?
4. Vulnerability Scanning & Patching: Have we implemented regular scans of our network and systems and appropriate patching of known system vulnerabilities?
5. Application Whitelisting: Do we allow only approved programs to run on our networks?
6. Incident Response: Do we have an incident response plan and have we practiced it?

7. Business Continuity: Are we able to sustain business operations without access to certain systems? For how long? Have we tested this?
8. Penetration Testing: Have we attempted to hack into our own systems to test the security of our systems and our ability to defend against attacks?

Top Seven Mitigation Strategies

DHS encourages network administrators to implement the recommendations below, which can prevent as many as 85 percent of targeted cyber-attacks. These strategies are common sense to many, but DHS continues to see intrusions because organizations fail to use these basic measures.

1. Patch applications and operating systems – Vulnerable applications and operating systems are the targets of most attacks. Ensuring these are patched with the latest updates greatly reduces the number of exploitable entry points available to an attacker. Use best practices when updating software and patches by only downloading updates from authenticated vendor sites.
2. Application whitelisting – Whitelisting is one of the best security strategies because it allows only specified programs to run while blocking all others, including malicious software.
3. Restrict administrative privileges – Threat actors are increasingly focused on gaining control of legitimate credentials, especially those associated with highly privileged accounts. Reduce privileges to only those needed for a user's duties. Separate administrators into privilege tiers with limited access to other tiers.
4. Network Segmentation and Segregation into Security Zones – Segment networks into logical enclaves and restrict host-to-host communications paths. This helps protect sensitive information and critical services and limits damage from network perimeter breaches.
5. Input validation – Input validation is a method of sanitizing untrusted user input provided by users of a web application, and may prevent many types of web application security flaws, such as SQLi, XSS, and command injection.
6. File Reputation – Tune Anti-Virus file reputation systems to the most aggressive setting possible; some products can limit execution to only the highest reputation files, stopping a wide range of untrustworthy code from gaining control.
7. Understanding firewalls – When anyone or anything can access your network at any time, your network is more susceptible to being attacked. Firewalls can be configured to block data from certain locations (IP whitelisting) or applications while allowing relevant and necessary data through.

Responding to Unauthorized Access to Networks

Implement your security incident response and business continuity plan. It may take time for your organization's IT professionals to isolate and remove threats to your systems and restore normal operations. Meanwhile, you should take steps to maintain your organization's essential functions according to your business continuity plan. Organizations should maintain and regularly test backup plans, disaster recovery plans, and business continuity procedures.

Contact DHS or law enforcement immediately. We encourage you to contact DHS NCCIC (NCCICCustomerService@hq.dhs.gov or 888-282-0870), the FBI through a local field office or the FBI's Cyber Division (CyWatch@ic.fbi.gov or 855-292-3937) to report an intrusion and to request incident response resources or technical assistance.

Detailed Mitigation Strategies

Protect Against SQL Injection and Other Attacks on Web Services

Routinely evaluate known and published vulnerabilities, perform software updates and technology refreshes periodically, and audit external-facing systems for known Web application vulnerabilities. Take steps to harden both Web applications and the servers hosting them to reduce the risk of network intrusion via this vector.[1]

- Use and configure available firewalls to block attacks.
- Take steps to further secure Windows systems such as installing and configuring Microsoft's Enhanced Mitigation Experience Toolkit (EMET) and Microsoft AppLocker.
- Monitor and remove any unauthorized code present in any www directories.
- Disable, discontinue, or disallow the use of Internet Control Message Protocol (ICMP) and Simple Network Management Protocol (SNMP) and response to these protocols as much as possible.
- Remove non-required HTTP verbs from Web servers as typical Web servers and applications only require GET, POST, and HEAD.
- Where possible, minimize server fingerprinting by configuring Web servers to avoid responding with banners identifying the server software and version number.
- Secure both the operating system and the application.
- Update and patch production servers regularly.
- Disable potentially harmful SQL-stored procedure calls.
- Sanitize and validate input to ensure that it is properly typed and does not contain escaped code.
- Consider using type-safe stored procedures and prepared statements.
- Perform regular audits of transaction logs for suspicious activity.
- Perform penetration testing against Web services.
- Ensure error messages are generic and do not expose too much information.

Phishing and Spearphishing

- Implement a Sender Policy Framework (SPF) record for your organization's Domain Name System (DNS) zone file to minimize risks relating to the receipt of spoofed messages.
- Educate users to be suspicious of unsolicited phone calls, social media interactions, or email messages from individuals asking about employees or other internal information. If an unknown individual claims to be from a legitimate organization, try to verify his or her identity directly with the company.
- Do not provide personal information or information about your organization, including its structure or networks, unless you are certain of a person's authority to have the information.
- Do not reveal personal or financial information in social media or email, and do not respond to solicitations for this information. This includes following links sent in email.
- Pay attention to the URL of a website. Malicious websites may look identical to a legitimate site, but the URL often includes a variation in spelling or a different domain than the valid website (e.g., .com vs. .net).
- If you are unsure whether an email request is legitimate, try to verify it by contacting the company directly. Do not use contact information provided on a website connected to the request; instead, check previous statements for contact information. Information about known phishing attacks is also available online from groups such as the Anti-Phishing Working Group (http://www.antiphishing.org).
- Take advantage of anti-phishing features offered by your email client and web browser.
- Patch all systems for critical vulnerabilities, prioritizing timely patching of software that processes Internet data, such as web browsers, browser plugins, and document readers.

Permissions, Privileges, and Access Controls

- Reduce privileges to only those needed for a user's duties.
- Restrict users' ability (permissions) to install and run unwanted software applications, and apply the principle of "Least Privilege" to all systems and services. Restricting these privileges may prevent malware from running or limit its capability to spread through the network.
- Carefully consider the risks before granting administrative rights to users on their own machines.
- Scrub and verify all administrator accounts regularly.
- Configure Group Policy to restrict all users to only one login session, where possible.
- Enforce secure network authentication where possible.
- Instruct administrators to use non-privileged accounts for standard functions such as Web browsing or checking Web mail.

- Segment networks into logical enclaves and restrict host-to-host communication paths. Containment provided by enclaving also makes incident cleanup significantly less costly.
- Configure firewalls to disallow RDP traffic coming from outside of the network boundary, except for in specific configurations such as when tunneled through a secondary VPN with lower privileges.
- Audit existing firewall rules and close all ports that are not explicitly needed for business. Specifically, carefully consider which ports should be connecting outbound versus inbound.
- Enforce a strict lockout policy for network users and closely monitor logs for failed login activity. This can be indicative of failed intrusion activity.
- If remote access between zones is an unavoidable business need, log and monitor these connections closely.
- In environments with a high risk of interception or intrusion, organizations should consider supplementing password authentication with other forms of authentication such as challenge/response or multifactor authentication using biometric or physical tokens.

Credentials

- Enforce a tiered administrative model with dedicated administrator workstations and separate administrative accounts that are used exclusively for each tier to prevent tools, such as Mimikatz, for credential theft from harvesting domain-level credentials.
- Implement multi-factor authentication (e.g., smart cards) or at minimum ensure users choose complex passwords that change regularly.
- Be aware that some services (e.g., FTP, telnet, and .rlogin) transmit user credentials in clear text. Minimize the use of these services where possible or consider more secure alternatives.
- Properly secure password files by making hashed passwords more difficult to acquire. Password hashes can be cracked within seconds using freely available tools. Consider restricting access to sensitive password hashes by using a shadow password file or equivalent on UNIX systems.
- Replace or modify services so that all user credentials are passed through an encrypted channel.
- Avoid password policies that reduce the overall strength of credentials. Policies to avoid include lack of password expiration date, lack of lockout policy, low or disabled password complexity requirements, and password history set to zero.
- Ensure that users are not re-using passwords between zones by setting policies and conducting regular audits.
- Use unique passwords for local accounts for each device.

Logging Practices

- Ensure event logging (applications, events, login activities, security attributes, etc.) is turned on or monitored for identification of security issues.
- Configure network logs to provide enough information to assist in quickly developing an accurate determination of a security incident.
- Upgrade PowerShell to new versions with enhanced logging features and monitor the logs to detect usage of PowerShell commands, which are often malware-related.
- Secure logs, potentially in a centralized location, and protect them from modification.
- Prepare an incident response plan that can be rapidly implemented in case of a cyber intrusion.

How to Enhance Your Organization's Cybersecurity Posture

DHS offers a variety of resources for organizations to help recognize and address their cybersecurity risks. Resources include discussion points, steps to start evaluating a cybersecurity program, and a list of hands-on resources available to organizations. For a list of services, visit https://www.us-cert.gov/ccubedvp. Other resources include:

- The Cyber Security Advisors (CSA) program bolsters cybersecurity preparedness, risk mitigation, and incident response capabilities of critical infrastructure entities and more closely aligns them with the Federal Government. CSAs are DHS personnel assigned to districts throughout the country and territories, with at least one advisor in each of the 10 CSA regions, which mirror the Federal Emergency Management Agency regions. For more information, email cyberadvisor@hq.dhs.gov.
- Cyber Resilience Review (CRR) is a no-cost, voluntary assessment to evaluate and enhance cybersecurity within critical infrastructure sectors, as well as state, local, tribal, and territorial governments. The goal of the CRR is to develop an understanding and measurement of key cybersecurity capabilities to provide meaningful indicators of an entity's operational resilience and ability to manage cyber risk to critical services during normal operations and times of operational stress and crisis. Visit https://www.cert.org/resilience/rmm.html to learn more about the CERT Resilience Management Model.
- Enhanced Cybersecurity Services (ECS) helps critical infrastructure owners and operators protect their systems by sharing sensitive and classified cyber threat information with Commercial Service Providers (CSPs) and Operational Implementers (OIs). CSPs then use the cyber threat information to protect CI customers. OIs use the threat information to protect internal networks. For more information, email ECS_Program@hq.dhs.gov.
- The Cybersecurity Information Sharing and Collaboration Program (CISCP) is a voluntary information-sharing and collaboration program between and among critical infrastructure partners and the Federal Government. For more information, email CISCP@us-cert.gov.

- The Automated Indicator Sharing (AIS) initiative is a DHS effort to create a system where as soon as a company or federal agency observes an attempted compromise, the indicator will be shared in real time with all of our partners, protecting them from that particular threat. That means adversaries can only use an attack once, which increases their costs and ultimately reduces the prevalence of cyber-attacks. While AIS will not eliminate sophisticated cyber threats, it will allow companies and federal agencies to concentrate more on them by clearing away less sophisticated attacks.
- AIS participants connect to a DHS-managed system in the NCCIC that allows bidirectional sharing of cyber threat indicators. A server housed at each participant's location allows each to exchange indicators with the NCCIC. Participants will not only receive DHS-developed indicators, but can share indicators they have observed in their own network defense efforts, which DHS will then share with all AIS participants. For more information, visit https://www.dhs.gov/ais.
- The Cybersecurity Framework (Framework), developed by the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) in collaboration with the public and private sectors, is a tool that can improve the cybersecurity readiness of entities. The Framework enables entities, regardless of size, degree of cyber risk, or cyber sophistication, to apply principles and best practices of risk management to improve the security and resiliency of critical infrastructure. The Framework provides standards, guidelines, and practices that are working effectively today. It consists of three parts—the Framework Core, the Framework Profile, and Framework Implementation Tiers—and emphasizes five functions: Identify, Protect, Detect, Respond, and Recover. Use of the Framework is strictly voluntary. For more information, visit https://www.nist.gov/cyberframework or email cyberframework@nist.gov.

By way of update for the Director's speech tomorrow, neither Jim Trainor nor Lisa Monaco addressed the DNC hack, save to confirm that FBI is investigating. Monaco named FBI in particular as lead responder in significant intrusion impacting national security, per PPD, as expected.

Much discussion on the impact of DNC hack during final panel today with Ted Koppel and Keith Alexander. Lots of media present and all focused on hack. All assume it is Russia and want to know what can be done about it.

There are index cards by each seat for questions for the Director so that seems to be the plan, as opposed to the free-for-all from today. Questions to be moderated by Father McShane and ADIC Rodriguez.

Cy Vance spoke about impact of encryption on state and locals, per his report of earlier this year. Proposed following solution: Tech companies should keep operating systems encrypted but still be able to answer lawful search warrants issued by neutral judges, as they did before September 2014. No back door for law enforcement. Only ability to respond.

Let me know if you need anything from me.

Putin's Puppet
If the Russian president could design a candidate to undermine American interests—and advance his own—he'd look a lot like Donald Trump.
By Franklin Foer

On Wednesday, Donald Trump told the New York Times that he would not necessarily come to the aid of NATO states threatened by Russia and would make his decision to defend them from an attack after reviewing whether they "have fulfilled their obligations to us." It was the latest statement from Trump that was likely greeted with delight in the Kremlin. Earlier this month, Franklin Foer wrote on the frightening ways in which Trump seems to be playing right into Vladimir Putin's plans for destabilizing the West.?

Vladimir Putin has a plan for destroying the West—and that plan looks a lot like Donald Trump. Over the past decade, Russia has boosted right-wing populists across Europe. It loaned money to Marine Le Pen in France, well-documented transfusions of cash to keep her presidential campaign alive. Such largesse also wended its way to the former Italian premier Silvio Berlusconi, who profited "personally and handsomely" from Russian energy deals, as an American ambassador to Rome once put it. (Berlusconi also shared a 240-year-old bottle of Crimean wine with Putin and apparently makes ample use of a bed gifted to him by the Russian president.)

There's a clear pattern: Putin runs stealth efforts on behalf of politicians who rail against the European Union and want to push away from NATO. He's been a patron of Golden Dawn in Greece, Ataka in Bulgaria, and Jobbik in Hungary. Joe Biden warned about this effort last year in a speech at the Brookings Institution: "President Putin sees such political forces as useful tools to be manipulated, to create cracks in the European body politic which he can then exploit." Ruptures that will likely multiply after Brexit—a campaign Russia's many propaganda organs bombastically promoted.

The destruction of Europe is a grandiose objective; so is the weakening of the United States. Until recently, Putin has only focused glancing attention on American elections. Then along came the presumptive Republican nominee.

Donald Trump is like the Kremlin's favored candidates, only more so. He celebrated the United Kingdom's exit from the EU. He denounces NATO with feeling. He is also a great admirer of Vladimir Putin. Trump's devotion to the Russian president has been portrayed as buffoonish enthusiasm for a fellow macho strongman. But Trump's statements of praise amount to something closer to slavish devotion. In 2007, he praised Putin for "rebuilding Russia." A year later he added, "He does his work well. Much better than our Bush." When Putin ripped American exceptionalism in a New York Times op-ed in 2013, Trump called it "a masterpiece." Despite ample evidence, Trump denies that Putin has assassinated his opponents: "In all fairness to Putin, you're saying he killed people. I haven't seen that." In the event that such killings have transpired, they can be forgiven: "At least he's a leader." And not just any old head of state: "I will tell you that, in terms of leadership, he's getting an A."

Donald Trump is like the Kremlin's favored candidates, only more so.

That's a highly abridged sampling of Trump's odes to Putin. Why wouldn't the Russians offer him the same furtive assistance they've lavished on Le Pen, Berlusconi, and the rest? Indeed, according to Politico's Michael Crowley, Russian propaganda has gone full throttle for Trump, using its Russia Today apparatus to thrash Hillary Clinton and hail the courage of Trump's foreign policy. (Sample headline: "Trump Sparks NATO Debate: 'Obsolete' or 'Tripwire That Could Lead to World War III.' ") Russian intelligence services hacked the Democratic National Committee's servers, purloining its opposition research files on Trump and just about everything else it could find. They also wormed their way into the computers of the Clinton Foundation, a breach reported by Bloomberg. And though it may be a mere coincidence, Trump's inner circle is populated with advisers and operatives who have long careers advancing the interests of the Kremlin.

We shouldn't overstate Putin's efforts, which will hardly determine the outcome of the election. Still, we should think of the Trump campaign as the moral equivalent of Henry Wallace's communist-infiltrated campaign for president in 1948, albeit less sincere and idealistic than that. A foreign power that wishes ill upon the United States has attached itself to a major presidential campaign.

Donald Trump's interest in Russia dates back to Soviet times. In fact, there's extraordinary footage of him shaking hands with Mikhail Gorbachev. It comes from 1988, the peak of perestroika and Gorbachev's efforts to charm the American public. On his legendary trip to Washington and New York, the Soviet in chief left the confines of his limousine and security cordon to glad-hand with the American people. Donald Trump suggested to reporters that the Soviet leader would be making his way to Trump Tower, a crucial station on his journey to capitalism. This was, in fact, a self-aggrandizing fabrication that Trump himself planted in the tabloids, but it was a convincing lie. A year earlier, Trump had traveled to Russia at the invitation of the Soviets. They wanted Trump to develop luxury hotels in Moscow and Leningrad to feed the regime's new appetite for Western business. "The idea of building two monuments in the U.S.S.R. has captured his imagination," Newsweek reported.

Trump likely reveled in the newspaper stories that reported Gorbachev's forthcoming visit to his HQ as fact. But surely even he never expected his fake story to become reality. He must have been gobsmacked when he received word that Gorbachev wanted to pay a spontaneous visit to Trump Tower. The skyscraper's namesake rushed down from his penthouse office to pay obeisance. From the video, we can see the blotched head of Gorbachev emerge from his car. Trump and his retinue push through the crowd. “Great, great honor,” the mogul says as he pumps the hand of the Soviet supremo.

One of Trump's vulnerabilities is that he doesn't always vet his people, whether it's business partners, the dubious characters he retweets, or the foreign leaders who show up at his door. As it turns out, this Gorbachev wasn't really the Soviet leader but an impersonator called Ronald Knapp. Trump was lavishing praise on the winner of a look-alike contest.

“The Russian market is attracted to me.”
Donald Trump

It was merely the first instance of Trump carelessly sucking up to Russian power in the hopes of securing business. Those Soviet hotel projects never went anywhere. But over the years, Trump has returned to the idea of building in Russia again and again. Effective real estate developers are genuine seers; they can conjure mental images of glorious structures and vibrant neighborhoods where other mortals see mere blight. Trump had the brashness to imagine developing hotels in Moscow when that was a fatal enterprise. In 1996, a Kalashnikov sprayed the American hotelier Paul Tatum, who had the temerity to complain about the Chechen mafia and the less-than-scrupulous business culture he endured. Yet it wasn't hard to see the appeal of Russia, to both the bottom line and the ego. An article in the Moscow Times described Trump as the city's first grand builder since Stalin. Indeed, he later planned a development on the site where Stalin once hoped to construct the Palace of Soviet Congresses.

Five separate times Trump attempted Russian projects, hotels, apartments, and retail on the grandest scale. In one iteration, he promised an ice rink, a “members club,” and a spa, for “the finest residences in Moscow.” Another project he described as “the largest hotel in the world.” His gaudy style appealed to Russian nouveau riche, and he knew it. “The Russian market is attracted to me,” he once boasted. He registered his name as a trademark in Moscow and even licensed it to a liquor company, which sold Trump Super Premium Vodka. Government officials claimed that they wanted to do business with Trump because they also considered him super premium. In the mid-'90s, the general-turned-politician Alexander Lebed told him, “If Trump goes to Moscow, I think America will follow.”

Trump never could quite simultaneously align all the elements—investment, approval—to actually break ground. Yet his foray into Russia should be considered a smashing success; Trump set himself up for triumph even as he failed. With each doomed real estate project, he lavished praise on the key constituency that blesses deals, namely Russian politicians. (In front of a pack of reporters he told Lebed, “We've been reading a lot of great things about this gentleman and his country.”) The praise encouraged Russian officials to keep inviting Trump back for big potential deals. Each time he traveled to Moscow for a high profile visit, he attracted press attention and his stature increased. (After one trip, he bragged about a meeting where “almost all of the oligarchs were in the room.”) This elevated profile ultimately attracted investors. Russians helped finance his projects in Toronto and SoHo; they snapped up units in his buildings around the world—so much so that he came to target them, hosting cocktail parties in Moscow to recruit buyers. (His tenants included a Russian mobster, who ran an illegal poker ring in the Trump Tower and accompanied Trump to the staging of the Miss Universe contest in Moscow.) Even when he built a tower in Panama, he narrowcast his sales efforts to draw Russians, as the Washington Post has reported. “Russians make up a pretty disproportionate cross-section of a lot of our assets,” Trump's son, Donald Jr., bragged. “We see a lot of money pouring in from Russia.”

The nature of the Donald Trump campaign is its fundamental blurring of his political and business interests —on display just recently in Scotland, when he praised the Brexit vote as a boon for his golf courses. As one campaign finance expert told the New York Times, “Historically, candidates would separate themselves from their business interests when running for office. Trump has done the opposite by promoting his businesses while running for office.” Such mercantilist motives likely undergird Trump's ornate praise of Putin, too. Having a friend in the Kremlin would help Trump fulfill his longtime dream of planting his name in the Moscow skyline—a dream that he pursued even as he organized his presidential campaign. “Russia is one of the hottest places in the world for investment,” he once said. “We will be in Moscow at some point.”

One of the important facts about Trump is his lack of creditworthiness. After his 2004 bankruptcy and his long streak of lawsuits, the big banks decided he wasn't worth the effort. They'd rather not touch the self-proclaimed “king of debt.” This sent him chasing less conventional sources of cash. BuzzFeed has shown, for instance, his efforts to woo Muammar Qaddafi as an investor. Libyan money never did materialize. It was Russian capital that fueled many of his signature projects—that helped him preserve his image as a great builder as he recovered from bankruptcy.

The money didn't come directly. Hunting for partners with cash, he turned to a small upstart called the Bayrock Group, which would pull together massive real estate deals using the Trump name. Its chairman was a former Soviet official named Tevfik Arif, who made a small fortune running luxe hotels in Turkey. To run Bayrock's operation, Arif hired Felix Satter, a Soviet-born, Brighton Beach-bred college dropout. Satter changed his name to Sater, likely to distance himself from the criminal activity that a name-check would easily turn up. As a young man, Sater served time for slashing a man's face with a broken margarita glass in a barroom brawl. The Feds also busted him for a working in a stock brokerage tied to four different Mafia families, which made $40 million off fraudulent trades. One lawsuit would later describe “Satter's proven history of using mob-like tactics to achieve his goals.” Another would note that he threatened a Trump investor with the prospect of the electrocution of his testicles, the amputation of his leg, and his corpse residing in the trunk of Sater's car.

“Russia is one of the hottest places in the world for investment,” Trump said. “We will be in Moscow at some point.”

What was Trump thinking entering into business with partners like these? It's a question he has tried to banish by downplaying his ties to Bayrock and minimizing Sater's sins. (“He got into trouble because he got into a barroom fight which a lot of people do,” Trump once said in a deposition.) But he didn't just partner with Bayrock; the company embedded with him. Sater worked in Trump Tower; his business card described him as a “Senior Advisor to Donald Trump.” Bayrock put together deals for mammoth Trump-named, Trump-managed projects—two in Fort Lauderdale, Florida, a resort in Phoenix, the Trump SoHo in New York. Several of those projects broke ground, but they were a mere prelude. “Mr. Trump was particularly taken with Mr. Arif's overseas connections,” the Times reported (after buyers of units in the Trump SoHo sued him for fraud). “In a deposition, Mr. Trump said that the two had discussed ‘numerous deals all over the world' and that Mr. Arif had brought potential Russian investors to Mr. Trump's office to meet him.” Trump described the scope of their ambitions: “[T]his was going to be Trump International Hotel and Tower Moscow, Kiev, Istanbul, etc., Poland, Warsaw.”

Based on its cast of characters, Bayrock itself was an enterprise bound to end in a torrent of litigation. The company's finance chief Jody Kriss has sued it for fraud. In the course of the litigation, which is ongoing,

Kriss alleged a primary source of funding for Trump's big projects: “Month after month for two years, in fact whenever Bayrock ran out of cash, Bayrock Holdings would magically show up with a wire from ‘somewhere' just large enough to keep the company going.” According to Kriss, these large payments would come from sources in Russia and Kazakhstan that hoped to hide their cash. Another source of Bayrock funding was a now-defunct Icelandic investment fund called the FL Group, a magnet for Russian investors “in favor with” Putin, as a lawsuit puts it. (The Daily Telegraph has reported that Bayrock mislabeled FL's investment as a loan, in order to avoid at least $20 million in taxes.)

These projects are simply too ambitious, too central to his prospects, for Trump to have ignored the underlying source of financing. And it was at just the moment he came to depend heavily on shadowy investment from Russia that his praise for Putin kicked into high gear. In 2007, he told Larry King, “Look at Putin—what he's doing with Russia—I mean, you know, what's going on over there. I mean this guy has done—whether you like him or don't like him—he's doing a great job.”

While Putin hasn't dirtied his hands in American elections, the Russians have cultivated Washington—hiring fancy firms to craft strategy, donating money to think tanks, building a small coterie of wonks sympathetic to their leader's view of the world. The Trump campaign is the unlikely culmination of this effort. It has been a magnet for like-minded fans of Putin. Fans might not be quite the right term, since so many of these advisers have profited from proxies of the Russian state.

Let's begin at the top. Trump's campaign manager is a wizened operative named Paul Manafort. It's true that Manafort is a mercenary by trade. His old Washington consulting firm pioneered the practice of representing the dictators of the world, no matter their grim record. (I profiled his authoritarian ambit earlier this year.) Late in his career, however, Manafort dedicated himself to working on behalf of clients close to the Kremlin. His grand achievement was reviving the doomed career of the anti-charismatic politician Viktor Yanukovych. Manafort's image-crafting and shrewd strategy culminated in Yanukovych's election to Ukraine's presidency in 2010. Thanks to Manafort's handiwork, Ukraine pulled into Putin's sphere of influence. Unlike other American consultants who flitted in and out of Kiev, Manafort set up camp there. He became an essential adviser to the president—his tennis partner even.

“Russians make up a pretty disproportionate cross-section of a lot of our assets.” Donald Trump Jr.

If Manafort were the only Kremlin connection in the Trump campaign, his presence might signify nothing. But he's hardly isolated. Many pundits have scoffed at the idea that Trump has a circle of foreign policy advisers given that his initial list of gurus emerged abruptly in March and included names unknown to most experts. Yet the list suggests certain tendencies. One of the supposed Trump whisperers was an investment banker named Carter Page. During a stint in Moscow in the 2000s, he advised the state-controlled natural gas giant, Gazprom and helped it attract Western investors. (In March, Page told Bloomberg that he continues to own shares in the company.) Page has defended Russia with relish. He wrote a column explicitly comparing the Obama administration's Russia policy to chattel slavery in the American South. His reasoning: “Numerous quotes from the February 2015 National Security Strategy closely parallel an 1850 publication that offered guidance to slaveholders on how to produce the ‘ideal slave.' ”

Also on the list of advisers is Lt. Gen. Michael Flynn, the former head of the Defense Intelligence Agency. Eighteen months after he departed government, he journeyed to Moscow and sat two chairs away from Putin at the 10th anniversary gala celebrating Russia Today. In Politico, an anonymous Obama official harshly criticized Flynn: “It's not usually to America's benefit when our intelligence officers—current or former—seek refuge in Moscow.”

More recently, Richard Burt, a Reagan administration official, has begun advising Trump on foreign policy. His criticisms of NATO and pleas for greater cooperation with Putin grow from a deeply felt realism. Yet his ideological positions jibe with his financial interests. Burt is on the boards of Alfa-Bank, the largest commercial bank in Russia, and an investment fund with a large position in Gazprom.

Trump's advisers have stakes in businesses where the health of the Russian state is the health of the firm—where, in fact, the state and the firm are deeply entangled. The campaign isn't just one man with an aesthetic affinity for Putin and commercial interests in Russia; his sentiments are reinforced and amplified by an organization rife with financial ties to the Kremlin.

Is Putin already meddling in this campaign? In his chilly way, he has signaled his rooting interest. He praised Trump as “very talented.” His mouthpieces are more effusive. Vladimir Yakunin, the former chairman of Russian Railways, has said of Trump, “He is addressing some internal failings of the American people.” The Kremlin doesn't seem much bothered to disguise its help. Soon after the discovery of Russian intelligence hacking into Clinton servers, documents suddenly materialized on the web: a PDF of the DNC's opposition research file and a trove of spreadsheets, including a list of donors to the Clinton Foundation.

Foreign intelligence agencies often go fishing for information on American political campaigns. Chinese hackers tapped Mitt Romney's servers in search of useful nuggets. But the Russians have made an art of publicizing the material they have filched to injure their adversaries. The locus classicus of this method was a recording of a blunt call between State Department official Toria Nuland and the American ambassador to Kiev, Geoffrey Pyatt. The Russians allegedly planted the recording on YouTube and then tweeted a link to it—and from there it became international news. Though they never claimed credit for the leak, few doubted the White House's contention that Russia was the source.

We can only speculate about the documents the Russians have in their possession and how they might use them. The material they have released thus far is relatively innocuous, but it may just be a hint of leaks to come—as they experiment with unfurling their material and gauging the reactions to leaks. The Clinton Foundation is, after all, a pretty juicy target to have hit—a place with an ethically borderline approach to fundraising and already a primary object of Trump campaign fusillades. One of the sites that has posted purloined material is called Guccifer 2.0, which strenuously protests that it is the work of a lone hacker. The site features a warning that it has released only a small smattering of documents from the “many thousands I extracted.” He is not the only one sitting on a pile of damaging material. Julian Assange, who hosted a show on Russia Today, warned, “We have emails relating to Hillary Clinton which are pending publication.”

Donald Trump's ego compounds his naïveté. He's vulnerable to flattery; his confidence in himself exceeds his intellectual capacities. All of this makes him particularly susceptible to exploitation, an easy mark. For this reason, dubious figures have always gravitated to him. (Please read David Cay Johnston's persuasive account of Trump's long ties to organized crime.) It seems the Russian president has noticed this, too. To quote Trump on Putin, “A guy calls me a genius and they want me to renounce him? I'm not going to renounce him.”

In the end, we only have circumstantial evidence about the Russian efforts to shape this election—a series of disparate data points and a history of past interference in similar contests. But the pattern is troubling, and so is the premise. If Putin wanted to concoct the ideal candidate to serve his purposes, his laboratory creation would look like Donald Trump. The Republican nominee wants to shatter our military alliances in Europe; he cheers the destruction of the European Union; he favors ratcheting down tensions with Russia over Ukraine and Syria, both as a matter of foreign policy and in service of his own pecuniary interests. A Trump presidency would weaken Putin's greatest geo-strategic competitor. By stoking racial hatred, Trump will shred the fabric of American society. He advertises his willingness to dismantle constitutional limits on executive power. In his desire to renegotiate debt payments, he would ruin the full faith and credit of the United States. One pro-Kremlin blogger summed up his government's interest in this election with clarifying bluntness: “Trump will smash America as we know it, we've got nothing to lose.” For more great stories like this one, subscribe to Slate's daily newsletter, the Angle.

U.S. intelligence officials are seeking to determine whether an American businessman identified by Donald Trump as one of his foreign policy advisers has opened up private communications with senior Russian officials — including talks about the possible lifting of economic sanctions if the Republican nominee becomes president, according to multiple sources who have been briefed on the issue.

The activities of Trump adviser Carter Page, who has extensive business interests in Russia, have been discussed with senior members of Congress during recent briefings about suspected efforts by Moscow to influence the presidential election, the sources said. After one of those briefings, Senate minority leader Harry Reid wrote FBI Director James Comey, citing reports of meetings between a Trump adviser (a reference to Page) and "high ranking sanctioned individuals" in Moscow over the summer as evidence of "significant and disturbing ties" between the Trump campaign and the Kremlin that needed to be investigated by the bureau.

Some of those briefed were "taken aback" when they learned about Page's contacts in Moscow, viewing them as a possible back channel to the Russians that could undercut U.S. foreign policy, said a congressional source familiar with the briefings but who asked for anonymity due to the sensitivity of the subject. The source added that U.S. officials in the briefings indicated that intelligence reports about the adviser's talks with senior Russian officials close to President Vladimir Putin were being "actively monitored and investigated."

A senior U.S. law enforcement official did not dispute that characterization when asked for comment by Yahoo News. "It's on our radar screen," said the official about Page's contacts with Russian officials. "It's being looked at."

Page is a former Merrill Lynch investment banker in Moscow who now runs a New York consulting firm, Global Energy Capital, located around the corner from Trump Tower, that specializes in oil and gas deals in Russia and other Central Asian countries. He declined repeated requests to comment for this story.

Trump first mentioned Page's name when asked to identify his "foreign policy team" during an interview with the Washington Post editorial team last March. Describing him then only as a "PhD," Trump named Page as among five advisers "that we are dealing with." But his precise role in the campaign remains unclear; Trump spokeswoman Hope Hicks last month called him an "informal foreign adviser" who "does not speak for Mr. Trump or the campaign." Asked this week by Yahoo News, Trump campaign spokesman Jason Miller said Page "has no role" and added: "We are not aware of any of his activities, past or present." Miller did not respond when asked why Trump had previously described Page as one of his advisers.

The questions about Page come amid mounting concerns within the U.S. intelligence community about Russian cyberattacks on the Democratic National Committee and state election databases in Arizona and Illinois. In a rare public talk this week, former undersecretary of defense for intelligence Mike Vickers said that the Russian cyberattacks constituted meddling in the U.S. election and were "beyond the pale." Also, this week, two senior Democrats — Sen. Dianne Feinstein, ranking minority member on the Senate Intelligence Committee, and Rep. Adam Schiff, ranking minority member on the House Intelligence Committee — released a joint statement that went further then what U.S. officials had publicly said about the matter.

"Based on briefings we have received, we have concluded that the Russian intelligence agencies are making a serious and concerted effort to influence the U.S. election," they said. "At the least, this effort is intended to sow doubt about the security of our election and may well be intended to influence the outcomes of the election." They added that "orders for the Russian intelligence agencies to conduct such actions could come only from very senior levels of the Russian government."

Page came to the attention of officials at the U.S. Embassy in Moscow several years ago when he showed up in the Russian capital during several business trips and made provocative public comments critical of U.S. policy and sympathetic to Putin. "He was pretty much a brazen apologist for anything Moscow did," said one U.S. official who served in Russia at the time.

He hasn't been shy about expressing those views in the U.S. as well. Last March, shorty after he was named by Trump as one of his advisers, Page told Bloomberg News he had been an adviser to, and investor in, Gazprom, the Russian state-owned gas company. He then blamed Obama administration sanctions — imposed as a response to the Russian annexation of Crimea — for driving down the company's stock. "So many people who I know and have worked with have been so adversely affected by the sanctions policy," Page said in the interview. "There's a lot of excitement in terms of the possibilities for creating a better situation."

Page showed up again in Moscow in early July, just two weeks before the Republican National Convention formally nominated Trump for president, and once again criticized U.S. policy. Speaking at a commencement address for the New Economic School, an institution funded in part by major Russian oligarchs close to Putin, Page asserted that "Washington and other West capitals" had impeded progress in Russia "through their often hypocritical focus on ideas such as democratization, inequality, corruption and regime change."

At the time, Page declined to say whether he was meeting with Russian officials during his trip, according to a Reuters report.

But U.S. officials have since received intelligence reports that during that same three-day trip, Page met with Igor Sechin, a longtime Putin associate and former Russian deputy prime minister who is now the executive chairman of Rosneft, Russian's leading oil company, a well-placed Western intelligence source tells Yahoo News. That meeting, if confirmed, is viewed as especially problematic by U.S. officials because the Treasury Department in August 2014 named Sechin to a list of Russian officials and businessmen sanctioned over Russia's "illegitimate and unlawful actions in the Ukraine." (The Treasury announcement described Sechin as "utterly loyal to Vladimir Putin — a key component to his current standing." At their alleged meeting, Sechin raised the issue of the lifting of sanctions with Page, the Western intelligence source said.

U.S. intelligence agencies have also received reports that Page met with another top Putin aide while in Moscow — Igor Diveykin. A former Russian security official, Diveykin now serves as deputy chief for internal policy and is believed by U.S. officials to have responsibility for intelligence collected by Russian agencies about the U.S. election, the Western intelligence source said

Boss,

Not too many things to be briefed tonight other than below items:

1. Candidate Trump's team has requested a briefing on Cyber threats. We are awaiting further details/response from the DNI who actually controls the briefings. I will keep you updated as I know more.
2. Former Top Ten fugitive [redacted] will be extradited from Mexico City to Dallas on October 6th. [redacted] is the 19th FBI Top Tenner apprehended in Mexico. As you may recall, [redacted] is believed to be responsible for orchestrating a murder-for-hire plot of a prominent Dallas area dentist who was shot and killed next to her car in a basement parking garage. b6 b7C
3. The Baltimore takedown went well and you were correct, HRT did assist.....can't find "emogi" or you would get a smiley face. As of tonight, there were 46 subjects in custody. All total, the breakdown of individuals indicted were as follows: 18 correctional officers, 34 inmates, and 28 outside facilitators.

I asked [redacted] to stay behind tomorrow to quickly brief you on the Weiner matter which is growing more complicated, but it can wait until then. b6 b7C

That's it for tonight.

SUBJECT: Organization of the National Security Council and the Homeland Security Council

As President, my highest priority is to ensure the safety and security of the American people. In order to advise and assist me in executing this solemn responsibility, as well as to protect and advance the national interests of the United States at home and abroad, I hereby direct that my system for national security policy development and decision-making shall be organized as follows:

A. The National Security Council, the Homeland Security Council, and Supporting Staff

The National Security Act of 1947, as amended, established the National Security Council (NSC) to advise the President with respect to the integration of domestic, foreign, and military policies relating to the national security. There is also a Homeland Security Council (HSC) -- established through Executive Order 13228 of October 8, 2001, and subsequently codified in the Homeland Security Act of 2002 -- that has the purpose of advising the President on matters pertaining to homeland security. Each Council is also responsible for the effective coordination of the security-related activities and functions of the executive departments and agencies.

The security threats facing the United States in the 21st century transcend international boundaries. Accordingly, the United States Government's decision-making structures and processes to address these challenges must remain equally adaptive and transformative. Both Councils are statutory bodies that the President will continue to chair. Invitations to participate in specific Council meetings shall be extended to those heads of executive departments and agencies, and other senior officials, who are needed to address the issue or issues under consideration. When the President is absent from a meeting of either Council, the Vice President may preside at the President's direction.

The Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs (National Security Advisor) and the Assistant to the President for Homeland Security and Counterterrorism (Homeland Security Advisor) shall be responsible, as appropriate and at the President's direction, for determining the agenda for the NSC or HSC, respectively, ensuring that the necessary papers are prepared, and recording Council actions and Presidential decisions in a timely manner. When international economic issues are on the agenda of the NSC, the National Security Advisor and the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy shall perform these tasks in concert.

The NSC and HSC shall have as their regular attendees (both statutory and non-statutory) the President, the Vice President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Energy, the Secretary of Homeland Security, the National Security Advisor, the Homeland Security Advisor, and the Representative of the United States to the United Nations. When international economic issues are on the agenda of the NSC, the NSC's regular attendees will include the Secretary of Commerce, the United States Trade Representative, and the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy. The Director of National Intelligence and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as statutory advisers to the NSC, shall also attend NSC meetings. The Assistant to the President and Chief of Staff, the Assistant to the President and Chief Strategist, the Counsel to the President, the Deputy Counsel to the President for National Security Affairs, and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget are invited as attendees to any NSC meeting.

In addition to the NSC and HSC, there is also a single NSC staff within the Executive Office of the President that serves both the NSC and HSC. The staff is composed of regional, issue-focused, and functional directorates and headed by a single civilian Executive Secretary, pursuant to 50 U.S.C. 3021, who is also the Chief of Staff. All policy and staff activity decisions will be transmitted to the Executive Secretary for appropriate distribution and awareness. The purpose of the NSC staff is to advise me, the National Security Advisor, the Homeland Security Advisor, the NSC members, the HSC members, and others in the White House; to facilitate the implementation of Administration policy; and to help coordinate the national-security-related activities of the executive departments and agencies.

B. The Principals Committee

The Principals Committee (PC) shall continue to serve as the Cabinet-level senior interagency forum for considering policy issues that affect the national security interests of the United States. The PC shall be convened and chaired by the National Security Advisor or the Homeland Security Advisor, as appropriate, in consultation with the appropriate attendees of the PC. The Chair shall determine the agenda in consultation with the appropriate committee members, and the Executive Secretary shall ensure that necessary papers are prepared and that conclusions and decisions are communicated in a timely manner. Invitations to participate in or attend a specific PC shall be extended at the discretion of the National Security Advisor and the Homeland Security Advisor, and may include those Cabinet-level heads of executive departments and agencies, and other senior officials, who are needed to address the issue under consideration.

The PC shall have as its regular attendees the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Homeland Security, the Assistant to the President and Chief of Staff, the Assistant to the President and Chief Strategist, the National Security Advisor, and the Homeland Security Advisor. The Director of National Intelligence and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff shall attend where issues pertaining to their responsibilities and expertise are to be discussed. The Counsel to the President, the Deputy Counsel to the President for National Security Affairs, and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget may attend all PC meetings.

The Assistant to the President and Deputy National Security Advisor (Deputy National Security Advisor), the Deputy Assistant to the President and National Security Advisor to the Vice President, and the Executive Secretary (who shall serve as the Executive Secretary of the PC) shall attend all of the meetings of the PC, and the Representative of the United States to the United Nations and the Assistant to the President for Intragovernmental and Technology Initiatives may attend as appropriate.

When international economic issues are on the agenda of the PC, the Committee's regular attendees will include the Secretary of Commerce, the United States Trade Representative, and the Assistant to the President for Economic Policy (who shall serve as Chair for agenda items that principally pertain to international economics).

C. The Deputies Committee

The Deputies Committee (DC) shall continue to serve as the senior sub-Cabinet interagency forum for consideration of, and where appropriate, decision-making on, policy issues that affect the national security interests of the United States. The DC shall be convened and chaired by the Deputy National Security Advisor or the Deputy Assistant to the President and Deputy Homeland Security Advisor (Deputy Homeland Security Advisor), as appropriate. The Chair shall determine the agenda in consultation with the regular DC members, and the Executive Secretary shall ensure that necessary papers are prepared and that conclusions and decisions are communicated in a timely manner. Invitations to participate in or attend a specific DC meeting shall be extended by the Chair to those at the Deputy or Under Secretary level of executive departments and agencies, and to other senior officials, who are needed to address the issue under consideration.

The DC shall have as its regular members the Deputy Secretary of State, the Deputy Secretary of the Treasury, the Deputy Secretary of Defense, the Deputy Attorney General, the Deputy Secretary of Homeland Security, the Deputy Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Deputy Director of National Intelligence, the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Deputy Assistant to the President and National Security Advisor to the Vice President, the Deputy National Security Advisor, the Deputy Homeland Security Advisor, and the Administrator of the United States Agency for International Development.

The Executive Secretary shall attend the DC meetings. The Deputy Counsel to the President for National Security Affairs may attend all DC meetings. The relevant Deputy Assistant to the President for the specific regional and functional issue under consideration shall also be invited to attend. Likewise, when and where appropriate, the Deputy Assistant to the President for Strategic Planning, the Deputy Assistant to the President for Strategic Communication, the Deputy Assistant to the President for International Economic Affairs, the Deputy Assistant to the President for Transnational Issues, and the Deputy Representative of the United States to the United Nations, shall also be invited to attend. Other senior officials shall be invited where appropriate.

The DC shall review and monitor the work of the interagency national security process, including the interagency groups established pursuant to section D below. The DC shall help to ensure that issues brought before the NSC, HSC, and PC have been properly analyzed and prepared for decision. The DC shall also focus significant attention on monitoring the implementation of policies and decisions and shall conduct periodic reviews of the Administration's major national security and foreign policy initiatives. The DC is responsible for establishing Policy Coordination Committees (PCCs) and for providing objectives and clear guidance.

D. Policy Coordination Committees

Management of the development and implementation of national security policies by multiple executive departments and agencies typically shall be accomplished by the PCCs, with participation primarily occurring at the Assistant Secretary level. As the main day-to-day fora for interagency coordination of national security policies, the PCCs shall provide policy analysis for consideration by the more senior committees of the national security system and ensure timely responses to the President's decisions.

Regional and issue-related PCCs shall be established at the direction of the DC. Members of the NSC staff (or National Economic Council staff, as appropriate) will chair the PCCs; the DC, at its discretion, may add co-chairs to any PCC. The PCCs shall review and coordinate the implementation of Presidential decisions in their respective policy areas. The Chair of each PCC, in consultation with the Executive Secretary, shall invite representatives of other executive departments and agencies to attend meetings of the PCC where appropriate. The Chair of each PCC, with the agreement of the Executive Secretary, may establish subordinate working groups to assist that PCC in the performance of its duties.

An early meeting of the DC will be devoted to establishing the PCCs, determining their memberships, and providing them with mandates and strict guidance. Until the DC has established otherwise, the existing system of Interagency Policy Committees shall continue.

E. General

The President and the Vice President may attend any and all meetings of any entity established by or under this memorandum.

This document is part of a series of National Security Presidential Memoranda that shall replace both Presidential Policy Directives and Presidential Study Directives as the instrument for communicating relevant Presidential decisions. This memorandum shall supersede all other existing Presidential guidance on the organization or support of the NSC and the HSC. With regard to its application to economic matters, this document shall be interpreted in concert with any Executive Order governing the National Economic Council and with Presidential Memoranda signed hereafter that implement either this memorandum or that Executive Order.

The Secretary of Defense is hereby authorized and directed to publish this memorandum in the Federal Register.

DONALD J. TRUMP

Boss - In anticipation of your remarks tomorrow at MCCA and MCSA, below are a few notes gathered from the meeting of the Encryption and Law Enforcement Working Group today. AD Sleeper and EAD Piehota participated in the morning session and STB staff remained through the day to capture the discussion. Please let us know if you would like additional information. Thanks, dawn.

- The Director of Government Affairs for MCSA suggested the organizations develop draft encryption legislation and asked if the FBI might be willing to provide legislative drafts to give them a starting point.

- Extensive discussion among participants about whether the political environment has changed given the new administration, particularly, the incoming AG.

- The Manhattan DA's office representatives indicated Cy Vance has spoken with President Trump and the President offered his support with regard to encryption matters (DA's office also provided WH a copy of their white paper at President's request)
